FINAL PERSEVERANCE is defined by Billuart ("De Grat." diss. viii. a. 5) as that great and special gift in virtue of which a man remains in a state of grace till the moment of death. The Council of Trent (Sess. vi. can. 16 and cap. 13) teaches that no one without special revelation can know for certain that he will persevere, and also that we are utterly unable to secure this gift by merits of our own. It comes from the grace of God, "who is able to establish him who stands so that he may continue to stand, and to re-establish him who falls." The teaching of the council is confirmed by reason and Scripture. To merit a gift from God, it is necessary that God should promise to bestow the gift in question, as a reward for good works. No such promise has been made. On the contrary, Scripture reminds the just that they must work out their salvation "with fear and trembling," and warns him who stands "to take heed lest he fall."

It is possible, however, to obtain this gift by prayer and good works, which appeal, not to the justice, but to the liberality and kindness of God; and some theologians speak of final perseverance as obtained in such cases by merit "de congruo." In this sense St. Augustine ("De Dono Persever." cap. 6) says we can merit final perseverance by prayer ("suppliciter emereri"). (See St. Thomas, 1ª 2æ, q. 114, a. 9; Wilhelm and Scannell, "Cath. Theol." II. 242; and the ordinary text-books "De Gratia.")

FIRST-FRUITS. By the law of Moses the first-fruits of man, of animals, and of "whatsoever thou hast sown in the field," [1] were owed to the Lord. A command was given to Aaron, as representing the priestly caste—"For the first-born of man thou shalt take a price, and every beast that is unclean thou shalt cause to be redeemed." [2] In another place [3] the Levites are said to be taken by the Lord in commutation of this price ("I have taken them instead of the first-born that open every womb in Israel"), but it was still required that a first-born son should be presented to the Lord in the Temple, and redeemed by the payment of five shekels.[4] The firstlings of clean beasts—cows, sheep, and goats—were not to be redeemed, but offered in sacrifice; and of the meat, the consecrated breast and right shoulder were assigned to the sons of Aaron. Of this meat only the males in the priestly families were to partake; [5] but the first-fruits of the produce of the land were given "to thee, and to thy sons, and to thy daughters, by a perpetual law." The Levites themselves, though, being without land, they could not offer "first-fruits of the barn-floor and the wine-press," [6] yet were instructed to offer the first-fruits of the tithes paid to them by the children of Israel to the Lord—that is, "the tenth part of the tenth."

A Hebrew tradition mentioned in the body of the canon law assigns some part of the crop, not less than a sixtieth, and not more than a fortieth, as the proportion which ought to be given as first-fruits. In substance, the obligation to offer first-fruits, which is equivalent to an intention of sustaining the FISTULA (also called siphon, calamus, pugillaris). A pipe or reed through which the faithful used to receive the Blood of Christ from the chalice. This manner of communicating is mentioned in the most ancient Roman Ordines (the oldest is attributed by Mabillon to the time of Gregory the Great), and a curious relic of this custom remains to this day. At Papal Masses, the deacon brings the Precious Blood to the Pope, who takes it through a fistula. (See Rock, i. pp. 128–132; Kraus, "Real-Encykl." i. 529.)

FLABELLUM. (See FAN.)

FLAGELLANTS. So called from the scourges (flagella) which they carried in their processions, and with which they lashed their bare arms and shoulders. They first appeared in the thirteenth century, an age when Christian architecture reached a height of glory and perfection never since equalled, and extraordinary sanctity revealed marvels of grace and divine power before unsuspected, but in which, also, the reign of law being but imperfectly established, the world was often startled from its propriety by the apparition of monsters of cruelty and lust, like Eccelin da Romano and his brother, whose touch was contamination and their very existence a curse. No human arm seemed able to reach far enough, or strike hard enough, to punish a twentieth part of the crimes that were committed. God appeared to be the one refuge left. Numbers of persons—men, women and children—collected together; they veiled their faces and uncovered their shoulders; in each town that they entered, forming a melancholy procession, they sought by tears, groans, and voluntary penance—singing penitential songs the while—to appease the divine wrath; the sound of the lash was continual, and blood flowed abundantly. The first association of Flagellants appeared in Perugia in 1260. The sympathy and agitation which their proceedings at first excited would almost surpass belief; everywhere they were joined by crowds of fervent neophytes. The rule of the association was that every person should remain a member of it during thirty-three days, in honour of the thirty-three years of the life of our Lord. A contemporary[1] writer says that, whatever might be alleged against them, "nevertheless by this means many who were at enmity were reconciled, and many good things were done." The secular governments, after a time, observing that the Holy See and the bishops in general did not encourage the movement, began to prohibit the Flagellant processions. After the Black Death (1348) the Flagellants again appeared. They now gave way to many extravagances; their leader spoke of a mysterious letter which had fallen from heaven and been found at Jerusalem, in which Jesus Christ promised to be gracious to all penitents in the processions of Flagellants, "because their blood was mingled with His blood."[2] Clement VI. repressed them; but they appeared again, and for the last time, about the date of the Council of Constance, among the canons of which is one condemning their excesses. (See Bareille in DThC; Haupt in "Realencykl. für Prot. Theol." Geisslerbruderschaften.)

FLECTAMUS GENUA ("Let us bend our knees"). Words used by the deacon before the collects in the office of Good Friday and in certain Masses. The subdeacon immediately afterwards says "Levate" ("rise," literally "raise them up"), and the ministers at the altar do so, having knelt on one knee for a moment. In ancient times each summons came from the deacon; the people knelt, and a longer space was allowed for silent prayer. (See GENUFLEXION; Benedict XIV. "De Miss." ii. 5.) In accordance with a tradition ratified by the Council of Nicaea (325) the "Flectamus genua" and corresponding kneeling down are omitted on all Sundays and during Paschal Time.

FLORENCE, COUNCIL OF.[1] Several remarkable attempts to heal the schism of the East and West were made during the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. In 1339 Andronicus III. Palaeologus sent the Abbot Barlaam to negotiate with one of the Avignon Popes, Benedict XII.; but the Pope would not listen to Barlaam's proposal—viz. that the churches should be united, while the dogmatic differences remained as they were. New attempts at reconciliation were made by John V. Palaeologus, who was hard pressed by the Turks. The emperor himself became a Catholic in 1369, but his example was not followed by the clergy or the people. At last John VI. Palaeologus was reduced to straits which made him see the impossibility of saving the Byzantine empire without help from the Western Christians. The Turks had taken Adrianople (1360), and his throne was already tottering beneath him. In his extremity he was willing to negotiate for peace with the Catholic Church. Nicolas of Cusa went to Constantinople and smoothed the way for reconciliation. No doubt, there was also a real desire for unity and doctrinal agreement among many of the Greeks, apart from the political motives which induced them to come to terms with the Latin Church. One of the Greek ecclesiastics expressly said at a council held for preliminary consultation at Constantinople that a union on merely political grounds would not last. At the end of November 1437, 700 Greeks sailed from the Bosporus. The emperor, the Patriarch Joseph of Constantinople, deputies from the other Patriarchs, entrusted by them with complete power to act as their representatives, and Bessarion, the famous archbishop of Nicaea, were among their number. On February 8, 1438, they landed at Venice. Early in March they reached Ferrara, to which the Council of Basle had been transferred, and were received with great solemnity by the Pope, Eugenius IV. On April 9th the council was opened, and the discussion on the addition of the word "Filioque" to the Creed began. It lasted for fifteen sessions, after which, partly because the plague had broken out at Ferrara, partly because the Florentines wished to have the council in their city and offered to supply the Pope with money, which he sorely needed for the maintenance of the Greeks, the council was transferred thither. At Florence the council continued to sit from 1439 to 1442.

First of all the great dogmatic question on the procession of the Holy Ghost was decided. The Greeks accepted the Latin terminology—viz. that the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father and the Son, when its real meaning was explained to them. The Latins fully admitted and the council defined that the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father and the Son as from one principle and by a single spiration. The Latins, moreover, fully allowed the orthodoxy of the Greek terminology—viz. that the third Person proceeds from the Father through the Son; and this expression also was approved by the Council. Other points of difference were next discussed. It was defined that the Body of Christ is truly consecrated either with leavened or unleavened bread, Latins and Greeks being required to follow in this matter the custom of their respective churches; further, that such souls as have departed in God's grace, but without having done penance enough for their sins, are detained in Purgatory, and, while there, are assisted by the sacrifices, prayers, and good works of Christians on earth; that, on the other hand, souls perfectly purified or, like infants just baptized, needing no purification, go straight to heaven and see God face to face, whereas the souls of those who die in mortal sin descend at once to hell. The discussions on the primacy of the Roman bishop were much more long and keen. John of Torquemada (Turrecremata), John of Ragusio, and Ambrose Traversari were the great advocates of the Papal prerogatives. At last, however, the council defined that "the Holy Apostolic See and Roman Pontiff hold the primacy over all the world; that the Roman Pontiff is the successor of Peter, prince of the Apostles; that he is the true vicar of Christ, the head of the whole Church, the father and teacher of all Christians; and that to him in [the person of] blessed Peter full power has been committed by our Lord Jesus Christ of feeding, ruling, and governing the universal Church; as also (quemadmodum etiam, καθ' ὃν τρόπον)[1] is contained in the acts of oecumenical councils and in the holy canons." On July 5, 1439, all the members, except Mark of Ephesus and the bishop of Stauropolis, signed the Decree of Union containing the above definitions. On the evening of the same day the Greeks again appeared before the Pope, and Bessarion declared their belief that the transubstantiation of the bread and wine in the Mass is effected by the words of consecration, thus abandoning the opinion which ascribed the change to the ἐπίκλησις or invocation of the Holy Ghost. [See CONSECRATION.] The Decree of Union was solemnly published next day (Sunday) in the Cathedral of Florence, being read aloud by Cardinal Julian in Latin, and by Bessarion in Greek. On August 26, 1439, the Greek emperor left Florence.

The union effected was of short duration. Joseph, Patriarch of Constantinople, had died during the council; his successor, Metrophanes, who was well disposed to the union, died shortly after it, in 1443. Mark of Ephesus and other enemies of unity were active in their intrigues, and it was not till 1452 that Cardinal Isidore, the fugitive metropolitan of Kiew and legate of Pope Nicolas V., succeeded in having the Florentine decrees acknowledged and promulgated in the church of St. Sophia. But on May 29, 1453, the Turks took Constantinople, and the Sultan Muhammed II. appointed the anti-Roman Gennadius to the Patriarchate. In 1472 the decrees of Florence were formally repudiated by a schismatical council at Constantinople.

Other Orientals besides the Greek schismatics were reunited with the Church during the course of the council. In 1439 the Armenians, in 1440 a part of the Jacobites or Monophysite Christians, were received into Catholic communion, and Eugenius IV. issued special instructions for them which are still extant. After Eugenius had returned to Rome, in 1443, the council was still continued and sessions held in the Lateran church. At the second session of the council after it had been transferred to Rome, in 1445, Timothy, the Chaldaean or Nestorian Metropolitan of Tarsus living in Cyprus, with his clergy and people made their submission to the Pope, and about the same time the Maronites in that island became Catholics.

For a time Gallican divines denied the claims of Florence to rank as a General Council, because they held that the Pope exceeded his power in transferring the Council from Basle to Ferrara. Even at Trent the French refused to admit the Florentine definition on the Papal authority. But the learned Gallican Natalis Alexander points out that the Pope has the right to modify and dispense from the canons of councils, if public necessity or the good of the Church requires him to do so. He argues further that the "sounder part" of the Fathers of Basle consented to the removal of the assembly from Basle to Ferrara. It is scarcely necessary to say that such doubts have long since ceased to be possible among Catholics.

The Acts of the Council have perished, but we possess (1) a minute history in the form of Acts, written in Greek, and evidently by a Greek member of the council. Hefele, Frommann, and other scholars attribute the history to Dorotheus of Mitylene. It will be found in the collections of Mansi or Hardouin, with a Latin translation by the Cretan Caryoptilus. (2) A history agreeing in all the most important points with the one just mentioned was published, in 1638, by Justiniani, Custos of the Vatican Library. This history is drawn up, partly from notes made by the Papal advocate Andreas de Sta Cruce, who was present at the council, partly from other documents in the Vatican archives and in other Roman libraries. Hardouin has printed Justiniani's history in his collection. (3) A history by Syropulus, a Greek priest and dignitary of Constantinople. Syropulus was present at the council and signed the Decree of Union, but he was from the first a secret, and soon became an open and most bitter, enemy of the council. A very inaccurate Latin translation from a Paris MS. was published by the Anglican Robert Creyghton, at the Hague, in 1660. The best modern history of the council is by Hefele-Leclercq (vol. vii.). FONT. A vessel to contain the baptismal water. In the early ages Baptism was given by immersion out in the open in rivers or in pools of water (e.g. Acts viii. 38); sometimes indoors (e.g. Acts ix. 18, xvi. 33). In the course of time the latter came to be the prevailing practice, and the artificial pool or cistern for Baptism became an important adjunct to the Christian place of worship. The neophyte stood in it with feet immersed, while the water was poured over his head. This mode of baptizing regulated the size and shape of the vessel. When the custom of immersion ceased in the West, and infusion came to be the rule, the font took the form of a large vase mounted on a pedestal of sufficient height for the infant to be held over it.

For the blessing of the Font see HOLY WEEK, p. 420. Tertullian speaks of the water being hallowed by the invocation of God (invocato Deo, "De Bapt." iv., PL, i. 1204). St. Cyprian, St. Basil, and St. Ambrose refer to this blessing (Chardon, Baptême, ch. iv.). (See BAPTISM, p. 64; BAPTISTERY; Peterson in "Cath. Enc."; Ferraris, Baptismus, i. 991, 1003–8; Leclercq in "Cath. Enc." Holy Water Fonts.)

FORUM ECCLESIASTICUM. The tribunals of the Church are of two kinds, internal and external. The internal forum is the tribunal established in the sacrament of penance, where the coercive power is the Holy Ghost acting on the conscience, the penitent is his own accuser, and the confessor, guided by the principles of Moral Theology, remits or retains sin, exacts satisfaction, and directs restitution, according to the circumstances of each case. [PENANCE.]

Under the name of forum externum is included every exercise of ecclesiastical jurisdiction external to the tribunal of penance. The judicial office in the external forum belongs to bishops in their respective dioceses, metropolitans in the cases assigned to them by the canons, and supremely and universally to the Holy See. But a previous question arises—viz.: Is the exercise of an external coercive jurisdiction a right inherent in the constitution of the Church? Is it not rather an encroachment on the rights of the civil power? It will be found on a close examination that this is part of a larger question—viz.: Whether the Church instituted by Jesus Christ really possesses a native and supreme authority, parallel—not subordinate—to the supreme authority of the State? If the Church is and ought to be thus independent, then the right of making laws for the government of her children, not liable to the revision of the civil power, cannot be denied to her; and if she has the right of legislation, she must also possess that of coercive jurisdiction, since in human society it is useless to pass laws if one has not the power of enforcing them. But if Christ never meant His Church to be an independent society, these rights could not be claimed for her. Among Protestants it is generally held that the Church possesses no power originally and absolutely independent of that of the State. The view of Puffendorf, or some modification of it, is still generally accepted, according to which the Christian Church is a kind of college or society within the State—in which all the members, qua Christians, are equal, and can meet together as in other colleges to elect officers, transact business, adopt rules and by-laws, and so on—but which has no power of passing laws, administering justice, condemning, or punishing.

Catholic teaching, grounded on Scripture and tradition, rejects so degrading a view of the Church which God Incarnate founded upon earth and endowed with supernatural power and grace. To Peter and the other Apostles Christ gave the power of binding and loosing. He commanded them to go and teach all nations; He promised to be with them all days, even to the consummation of the world; He said that while the things of Caesar were to be rendered to Caesar, the things of God were to be given to God; finally he declared, "He that heareth you heareth me, and he that despiseth you despiseth me." [1] He promised to build His Church on Peter, and that against this Church, which St. Paul calls "the pillar and the ground of truth," [2] the gates of Hell should not prevail. There is not the slightest hint anywhere that Christ intended that these powers should be exercised in subjection to the civil power. We find abundant evidence that the Apostles and the early Church freely exercised the powers thus committed to them, not in preaching, converting, and working miracles only, but also in the three specific modes with which we are concerned—viz. in making laws, in judging, and in punishing. At a synod publicly held in Jerusalem to decide whether the Gentile Christians were to be obliged to receive circumcision, a decision was arrived at which was to all intents and purposes a law—which was promulgated under the formula "It hath seemed good to the Holy Ghost and to us" [3]—and which St. Paul enjoined his converts to obey, as being "precepts of the apostles and ancients" (Acts xvi. 4). The powers of judging and punishing were exercised in the cases of Ananias and Sapphira, Elymas the sorcerer, and notably in that of the incestuous Corinthian.[4] Following the example of the Apostles, the bishops in the first and every succeeding age of the Church have been accustomed to meet in synod and enact canons—that is, ecclesiastical laws concerning every religious interest and duty of man; and they never considered it incumbent on them to submit these laws for the approval of the civil power. The emperors themselves often endorsed the doctrine of ecclesiastical liberty. Arcadius and Honorius, in one of their Constitutions, [5] say "Whenever the cause is one of religion, it belongs to the bishops to judge"; and the Theodosian Code contains an explicit direction in the same sense.[6] In the early ages of the Church the judicial office was largely exercised by episcopal synods, in which important cases of heresy, immorality, &c., were tried and decided, and the punishment of excommunication, deposition, suspension, degradation, or imprisonment was inflicted. In course of time ordinary cases came to be heard in the individual bishop's court, whilst causae majores—e.g. those of bishops—were reserved to the Holy See. At the same time a settled mode of procedure with regular officials became established in the episcopal courts. By the twelfth century this change had been generally effected, and still continues substantially in force, though, in some cases, the regular officials and procedure are necessarily dispensed with to a greater or less degree, according to the position of the Church in different countries.

It will be admitted that the right of legislation draws with it the judicial power; if the Church possesses one, she possesses also the other. But it has been contended that the sanctions of her judicial decisions ought to be of a spiritual nature only, and as such should involve no suffering to the criminal except either within the self-accusing conscience, or in another world. The Church may have courts, it is said, but she may not enforce the decisions of these courts by temporal penalties; if these are required, she must ask the civil power to apply them. Marsilius Ficinus maintained that "the Pope, or the whole Church taken collectively, cannot punish any man, however wicked he may be, with a coercive punishment, unless the Emperor give them authority to do so." [1] But this was condemned as erroneous by John XXII., and a similar opinion promulgated by the too famous synod of Pistoia was censured by Pius VI. in the bull "Auctorem fidei." To admit such a doctrine would be tantamount to condemning the heroic bishops of the early Church, who feared not to depose an Arius or a Dioscorus against the opposition of the civil power. For certainly deposition is a "coercive punishment," and in numerous instances, if the leave of the State had been waited for before inflicting it, it would never have been inflicted at all. Even while all along asserting her independence, we know what the Church has had to suffer at the hands of heretical and despotic princes; what, then, would have become of Christianity if she had admitted that she had no right of punishing except by their hands?

The punishments inflicted in the forum externum are of various kinds: besides those already enumerated (excommunication, deposition, &c.), they include, or have included, stripes, fines, and relegation to a monastery. It is the general opinion of canonists that they should be such as not to involve the shedding of blood—citra sanguinis effusionem; and this because the Church can never, like human justice, merge the consideration of the possible reformation of the offender in that of what is required for the safety of society, and to deter others from doing the like. The Holy Office, in the day of its most unsparing severities, did not itself inflict the death-penalty on those whom it sentenced, but delivered them over to the secular arm. Practically it amounted to much the same thing; but the reason of this was that secular governments in those days sincerely believed that the heretic not only sinned against God, but was also a dangerous offender against human society. It may be rejoined that the ecclesiastical authorities not only shared in this opinion of the rulers, but by their writings and exhortations partly caused it. This cannot be denied; nor were they wrong in their belief and action; but it may probably be held that they did so in their civil capacity, as members of a community, rather than in their ecclesiastical capacity, as churchmen. With regard to stripes, the change in manners scarcely permits of its being included at the present day among ecclesiastical punishments. With regard to fines, the canonists prescribe that they should be imposed with great caution, and so that no suspicion can arise that the judges or officials derive any benefit from them.

Lay encroachment and usurpation have laboured to destroy the network of ecclesiastical jurisdiction which formerly overspread Europe. In the day of their power the canonists, speaking generally, comprehended well the limits of the two jurisdictions, and never encroached systematically on the temporal domain; the lawyers, on the contrary, taking advantage of the decline of faith, and the confusion caused by the heresies of northern Europe, have everywhere encroached on the ecclesiastical domain, and laboured to substitute their various systems of local law for the jurisprudence founded on divine revelation, the tradition of the Church, and general reason. They say, indeed, that their jurisprudence is guided by the principles of universal morality, and ask what more is needed? Even if this were true to the fullest extent, it would not follow that the civil courts should assume jurisdiction in spiritual causes. Morality—justice—must be the norm of every endurable jurisdiction set up amongst men; but it will not take us far enough: for man is not only capax morum but also capax religionis. Jurisprudence requires not only a rule but an end. This end, for the Roman jurists, was found in the arbitrary pleasure of the prince (quod principi placuit, &c.); for modern jurists it is found in the arbitrary pleasure of a majority. In either case the general good of the community is the real end, which is supposed at one period to be best attained through despotism, at another through universal suffrage. This, which is the highest end of man conceived as living in time, is treated by the unbelieving governments of the day as if it were his sole end. His religious destiny is absolutely ignored, and the jurisprudence which rests on the assumption that he has such a destiny is trampled upon and suppressed. In the Middle Ages the lawyers admitted that the jurisprudence of the Church was informed by a loftier aim than their own, and the two systems were administered side by side with—on the whole—extraordinary success and advantage. FOUNDATION. [See BENEFICE, ENDOWMENT, ESTABLISHMENT.]

FRANCE, CHURCH OF. In the articles CIVIL CONSTITUTION OF THE CLERGY and CONCORDAT, the transition during the French Revolution, from the ancient ecclesiastical order in France to a new state of things was briefly described. Some account of the organization and working of the modern Church of France will be attempted in the present article, both during the working of the Concordat and since its dissolution (Dec. 11, 1905).

Since the commencement of the Second Empire in 1852, the dioceses of Metz and Strasburg have been lost to France; on the other hand, the Savoyard dioceses of Annecy, St. Jean de Maurienne, and Tarentaise, with the archdiocese of Chambéry, have been annexed to it, and Algiers, which was then subject to the Archbishop of Aix, has been erected into an archiepiscopal see, with the suffragan sees of Constantine and Oran. There are now in France and her dependencies eighteen archbishoprics,[1] and seventy-two bishopries. The bishopric of Lille was added by Pius X. in the last year of his pontificate. The parish priests are divided into Curés and Desservants, and the distinction between the two classes is important. The Concordat between Napoleon and Pius VII. made no mention of Desservants; it merely stipulated that the priests serving the cures should receive certain emoluments. In this, nothing but bare justice, or rather a small instalment of justice, was asked from the state; for the "traitement" or annual grant was to replace the far larger income from tithes and other Church property, which had been confiscated during the Revolution. But if every parish priest should receive a decent stipend, the government considered that it would not have made a good bargain. It was accordingly resolved to recognize as priests for the purposes of the above-mentioned article, speaking generally, only the curés of the chief places in the several cantons[2] in France. These curés cantonaux were about 3500 in number; they were divided into two classes, the stipend for the first class being 1500, that for the second 1200 francs per annum.

[1] Viz. Aix, Alby, Algiers, Auch, Avignon, Besançon, Bordeaux, Bourges, Cambrai, Chambéry, Lyons, Paris, Rheims, Rennes, Rouen, Sens, Toulouse, and Tours.

[2] A canton is a division of an arrondissement, containing usually from ten to twenty communes.

Under each curé cantonal are usually several vicaires. The priests serving all the other churches within the canton are called Desservants. They are first mentioned in the Organic Articles [CONCORDAT], where it is said that they shall be under the surveillance of the curés—i.e. the curés cantonaux. They were so for a time, but their real canonical position gradually prevailed, and a desservant is now immediately under his bishop, and is commonly called, and is, "M. le Curé" in his own parish, as much as the dignitary in the chef lieu de canton, to whom alone the law allowed the title. Their position, however, was so far different that, while the curé proper can only be appointed, and perhaps removed, by the bishop, with the approval of the government, the desservant is appointed by the bishop alone, and can be removed by him, on his own sole authority. But see below, the changes since the abolition of the Concordat.

The religious orders and congregations which adorned the modern French Church were very numerous: it is estimated that their members amounted to 140,000, of whom about 20,000 were men and the rest women.

The total amount of the annual grant from public funds for the support of the French clergy somewhat exceeded 2,000,000*l.* sterling. The ecclesiastical buildings were in the hands of Conseils de Fabrique. The annual salary of a desservant was 900 francs, or 36*l.* The commune was bound to provide him with a residence rent-free; if it was too poor to do this, the State sometimes gave assistance; but in most cases private subscriptions had to be resorted to. Every diocese had a great or upper seminary for the education of priests, and there were also about a hundred and fifty little seminaries which gave an education corresponding to that given in the State lycées, but under ecclesiastical management, to boys destined either for clerical or for secular life. Of the orders and congregations, some—e.g. the Lazarists, the Sulpicians, the Sisters of Charity, &c.—were recognized by the State, and could possess property and also acquire it by bequest, but under close and constant inquisition on the part of the Department of Public Worship. The unrecognized congregations also of late years acquired a great amount of property; it is said that, taking the recognized and unrecognized congregations together, the value of their property exceeded a thousand million francs. With regard to political privileges, the French law recognized no distinction between cleric and layman; hence bishops and priests were capable of being elected to the Chambers. Chapters of canons were attached to the cathedrals but the canonries were regarded chiefly in the light of a dignified provision for aged or distinguished clergymen; the canons had no share in the government of the diocese. The old Church tribunals, abolished at the Revolution, were not revived; the bishops acted ex informata conscientia, and there was no appeal for the inferior clergy except to Rome. Of the close, vexatious, and almost ridiculous character of the surveillance which the lay power exercised over the Church, some idea may be formed from the fact that the Department of Worship undertook the furnishing of a bishop's palace, and required a yearly inventory, that it might know what to expend in repairs and new purchases!

Such was generally the state of things in France until some years after the foundation of the Third Republic. Gambetta openly expressed his hostility to the Church in his famous utterance (Sept. 8, 1878) "Le cléricalisme, voilà l'ennemi." In 1880 the Religious Orders were expelled and in 1889 the exemption of ecclesiastics from military service was repealed. The anti-Catholic action of the government in many other directions naturally caused opposition to the Republic, in spite of the repeated admonitions of Leo XIII. that the Church had no objection to that particular form of government. The Pope went so far as to write to President Grévy begging him to use his influence to procure moderation. In an encyclical letter to the clergy and laity (Feb. 10, 1892) His Holiness besought them to remember the distinction between the form of government and the particular laws which it might make—the former should be accepted even if the latter might be opposed. This policy of "rallying" to the Republic met with considerable adhesion among moderate men of all parties, but was vehemently opposed both by extreme monarchists and by anti-clericals. In the elections of Oct. 1893, a moderate Republican ministry was formed under Casimir-Périer and Spuller. The good feeling subsisting between the Vatican and the Republic was the subject of a letter from the new President, M. Félix Faure (Feb. 5, 1896) to the Pope, wherein, however, he pointed out, with regret, that the enlightened counsels of the Pontiff had not met with acceptance on the part of those who might have been expected to obey them. Under the Méline ministry (1896–8) the moderate action of the government made these relations still more friendly. Unhappily, the continued dissensions between the "ralliés" and the "non-ralliés" led to the triumph of the anti-clericals and the successive ministries of Waldeck-Rousseau (1899–1902) and Combes (1902–5). On July 1, 1901, the Law of Associations dissolved the religious congregations and confiscated their property. Grave difficulties also arose as to the nomination of bishops. According to the terms of the Concordat, the State nominated the persons to be made bishops, and the Pope granted them canonical institution. In the episcopal bulls the Pontiff stated that the State "nominated to us" (nobis nominavit) such and such a person. In 1901 the government objected to the word "nobis," as implying that the State had not the sole right of nomination. After prolonged discussion a compromise was effected, and it was agreed that in future the President's letter asking for canonical institution should contain the words "We nominate A.B. and present him to your Holiness." It must be admitted that Leo XIII. had gone to the utmost limit of concession. But there was a point beyond which even he could not go. It had been customary for the Nuncio and the Minister to come to an informal understanding as to the suitability of the candidates before they were presented to Rome. Combes did away with this custom, and insisted that the persons whom he nominated should be instituted without any inquiry. And to bring matters to a head, he did in fact nominate persons utterly unsuited. Consequently, a number of sees remained vacant. We necessarily omit mention of various other difficulties in the relations between the Church and the Republic during the period 1899–1904, until we come to the incident which precipitated the crisis—the visit of the President, M. Loubet, to the King of Italy in Rome (April 1904). On the following July 30 diplomatic relations between France and the Holy See were broken off, and on Dec. 1, 1905, the Law of the Separation of Church and State was published. Beginning from December 1906, the State no longer paid to the ministers of Catholic worship the emoluments which the government had in 1801 undertaken to pay as compensation for the revolutionary spoliation of the Church's property. On the other hand, the State gave up all right of interference in the nomination of bishops and parish priests. As regards the matériel, the whole of the bishops' palaces and all the seminaries have become the property of the State. The presbyteries are the property of the communes, but as a rule they are let to the parish priests at a low rental. "The Law of Separation ordered that all edifices used for worship, as well as all ecclesiastical property, should be put in the hands of associations cultuelles, 'drawn up,' said the fourth article of the law, 'according to the regulations of the general organization of worship.' For Catholics this evidently meant associations approved by the bishops and by bishops in communion with the Pope. Since then, the Conseil d'État has always interpreted the law in this sense. For reasons for which he alone is the judge, Pius X. forbade Catholics to form such associations"—(Fonsegrive in "Dublin Review," Oct. 1913). Hence by law the bishops and parish priests have no rights whatever over the cathedrals and parish churches. As a matter of fact, however, the State has not ventured to carry out the full consequences of the Law of Separation. The clergy continue to use the churches just as before. The Conseil d'État has even guarded the right of the Catholic curé against would-be intruders who had formed associations cultuelles. But troubles arise as to the upkeep of the buildings, and before long it is expected that some means will be found to make these over to the effective control of the parish priests. The support of the clergy has been carried on with great difficulty by voluntary effort, but we understand that in some of the larger towns the difficulty is becoming less. It will take time for the thrifty Frenchman to realize that religion cannot be continued without his generous support. The Law of Separation has naturally led to a marked diminution in the number of seminarists, and consequently in the number of priests. But here again the more hopeful condition of the Church has induced parents to allow their sons to enter upon a career which is not wholly without means of support. "The general tendency of the French episcopate seems to be to organize Catholics into associations—of the parish, of the canton, of the diocese, absolutely dissociated from any party and from any political point of view; solely occupied with the development of Catholic life and the defence of Catholic interests." (Fonsegrive, loc. cit.) It is too soon to judge of the effect of the great war (1914–6); but the noble conduct of the clergy and nuns has worked a vast change in popular feeling towards the Church. (See CONCORDAT; Goyau in "Cath. Enc."; Bonet-Maury in DThC., France, État Religieux Actuel; Fonsegrive in "Dub. Rev." Oct. 1913.)

FRANCISCANS. This order takes its name from its founder, St. Francis of Assisi, who died in 1226. The Life of St. Francis has been so frequently written that we shall confine ourselves to the mention of those incidents in it which are connected with the rise and growth of the order. The saint had entirely broken with the world in 1206, when, being then in his twenty-fifth year, he had stripped himself of the clothes which he wore belonging to his father, and embraced a life of strict poverty. He lived for several years in a cottage near Assisi, in the practice of almost continual prayer accompanied by severe bodily discipline. In 1209 Bernard of Quintavalle, a rich merchant of Assisi, and Peter of Catana, a canon in the cathedral of the same city, who had long witnessed and admired the heroic virtue of the saint, openly joined themselves to him; this is considered the date of the foundation of the order. Another disciple soon appeared in Giles of Assisi, who was afterwards beatified. The rule which the saint at first prescribed to his followers is not now extant: it consisted, says Alban Butler (October 4), "of the gospel counsels of perfection, to which he added some things necessary for uniformity in their manner of life. He exhorts his brethren to manual labour, but will have them content to receive for it things necessary for life, not money." In the later editions of the rule the prohibition against the handling or use of money, even by the intervention of a third person, was maintained.[1] "He bids them not to be ashamed to beg alms, remembering the poverty of Christ; and he forbids them to preach in any place without the bishop's licence." (See also Fr. Cuthbert, "Life of St. Francis of Assisi," p. 86 sqq., and Appendix I.) In a larger (extant) version of the rule he laid down twenty-seven precepts, all of which several Pontiffs have declared to be binding on the friars of the order under pain of mortal sin. They prescribe the particular means by which the vow of poverty is to be carried out, regulate the dress to be worn, order that the friars shall go barefoot, specify the fasts to be observed, and enjoin a blind unlimited obedience to superiors for the love of God. The habit which he gave them was a grey gown of coarse cloth with a pointed hood or capuche attached to it, one under-tunic and drawers, and a cord round the waist. This costume closely resembled that worn by poor shepherds in that part of Italy. After several other disciples had joined him, the cottage at Assisi was found too small to hold them, and St. Francis was in doubt whether it was not the will of God—who had already announced to him in visions that the destined work for him and his company was to preach and labour for the conversion of souls, and bring sinners to penance—that he should establish the order elsewhere. But about this time the Benedictines of the neighbouring monastery of Soubasio gave him a small plot of ground near Assisi called Portiuncula, on which stood an abandoned church dedicated in honour of Our Lady of the Angels. Francis would not accept the land as an absolute gift, but consented to hold it as a tenant-at-will by the tenure of rendering yearly to the Benedictines a basket of little fish, called lasche, caught in the stream that flowed hard by. From this humble site, which thus became the cradle of the order, thousands of monasteries were to be planted, missioners were to go forth to all parts of the world to preach, toil, and in many cases suffer martyrdom for the gospel of Jesus Christ, and a vast multitude of doctors and holy prelates, among them even Popes, were to issue, by whom the purity of the faith should be sustained, and its principles methodized and applied. In 1210 St. Francis went to Rome to obtain the confirmation of his rule. The Sovereign Pontiff at that time was Innocent III. At the first interview he rejected the saint's petition. Francis humbly withdrew; but the same night the Pope dreamt that he saw a palm spring up from the ground between his feet and wax gradually till it became a great tree; at the same time an impression was borne in upon his mind that by this palm tree was designated the poor petitioner whom he had repelled the day before. The Pope ordered that search should be made for him; Francis was found, and, being brought before the Pope and the Cardinals, expounded in simple but glowing language the plan and aims of his institute. The Pope was much moved, but some of the Cardinals thought that the poverty required surpassed the strength of man. Francis betook himself to prayer, and at the next interview Innocent granted him a verbal approbation of his rule. The Pope declared that he had seen in a dream the Lateran basilica tottering to its fall, but saved by a poor despised man, who set his back against the wall and propped it up. "Truly," said he, "here is that man who by his work and teaching will sustain the Church of Christ." The above particulars are taken from the Life of the saint by St. Bonaventure, who heard them from the Pope's nephew. Some years later, St. Francis drew up the rule in a more compendious form, and in this shape it was solemnly ratified by Honorius III. in 1223.

It is difficult to realize in this twentieth century the extraordinary attraction which the example and preaching of St. Francis exercised on his contemporaries. Long before the final confirmation by Honorius III., the Friars Minor[1] (such was the name which the founder in his humility chose for them) had made their way into the principal countries of Europe, preaching penance and founding convents. St. Francis himself visited Spain in 1214, was well received by Alfonso IX., the grandfather of St. Louis of France, and founded houses of his order at Burgos and other places. In 1216 he sent Pacifico, who had been a troubadour (trouvère) and was called the "king of verse," to France, Bernard of Quintavalle to Spain, and John of Penna to Germany, besides many others whom he despatched to various parts of Italy. The noble instructions, full of divine light and evangelical fire, with which he dismissed them—instructions on the whole so faithfully observed by his followers—go far to explain the wonderful success which has attended them in every age in doing their Master's work. Amongst other things he said "Let your behaviour in the world be such that everyone who sees or hears you may praise the Heavenly Father. Preach peace to all; but have it in your hearts still more than on your lips. Give no occasion of anger or scandal to any, but by your gentleness lead all men to goodness, peace, and union. We are called to heal the wounded, and recall the erring. For there are many who appear to you limbs of the devil, who will be one day disciples of Jesus Christ." [1]

[1] A curious discussion on the subject may be read in Pecock's Repressor of over much Wyting [blaming] of the Clergy (1456).

[1] "Minores" (lesser people) was the epithet applied in that age to what we should now term the lower middle classes. Hence "Ordo Minorum" would denote a Religious Congregation ranking with them.

The missions above mentioned all prospered greatly, except that to Germany, which failed, chiefly because the friars did not know the language. England welcomed the messengers, Angelo of Pisa and eight others, whom the saint sent to our shores in 1219: landing at Dover in 1220, they formed their first convent at Canterbury, and another soon afterwards at Northampton. The romantic story of two friars finding their way to Oxford and beginning the great friary there (in St. Ebbe's parish) may be read in the Monasticon.[2] In London, at Coventry, and other places, there were famous Franciscan convents; the list will be given further on. So rapidly did the order increase that at the first general chapter, that called of Mats (because those who attended it were lodged in huts roofed with strioje or mats), held at the Portiuncula in 1219, upwards of five thousand friars were present.

St. Francis, after receiving the sacred Stigmata [q.v.], died in 1226. The next Minister-General of the entire order was Elias of Cortona. He relaxed the rule of poverty, admitting rents and foundations; he also mitigated the fasts, &c., and oppressed those who desired to keep up the original strictness of the rule. A long controversy arose, which ended in the division of the order into two great branches, Conventuals and Observantines—the former living in large convents and following a mitigated rule; the latter living more in the manner of hermits, in low, mean dwellings, and according to the original rigour of the institute. The Observantines received in France the name of Cordeliers. In the course of time they, too, became split up into four great "families," called respectively Observants, Reformed, Discalced (or Alcantarines), and Recollects; and there was also a separate branch called Capuchins [q.v.]. Various attempts have been made to reunite these families, and at length in our own day the task was accomplished by Leo XIII. (Apost. Constit. "Felicitate quadam," October 4, 1897). The Conventuals and Capuchins remain distinct; but the others are all embraced under the name of Friar Minor (Ordo Fratrum Minorum), are bound by the same rule, and are subject to one and the same Minister-General.

In 1380 the number of Franciscan monasteries was estimated at fifteen hundred, containing ninety thousand friars. Hélyot states that in his time—that is, in the beginning of the eighteenth century, long after the destruction of the houses of the order in England and other northern countries, where they were once numerous — there were, of the first and third orders, seven thousand convents, with 120,000 friars; and of the second order [see POOR CLARES], above nine hundred convents, with 28,000 nuns.

No order in the Church has surpassed the Franciscans in zeal for the propagation of the gospel. St. Francis himself visited the Holy Land, presented himself before the Sultan of Egypt (1220) and endeavoured to convert him; and sent five friars to Morocco, who were all martyred. Franciscans preached in Tartary about the middle of the thirteenth century, and in China and Armenia before the end of it. By a bull of Clement VI. (1342) the guardianship of the Holy Places at Jerusalem was committed to the order, and they still retain it. Franciscan missions were established in Bosnia in 1340, in Bulgaria about 1366, and in Georgia in 1370. We find them taking a large share in the conversion of the natives of the Canary Isles in and after 1423; they got into Abyssinia in 1480, and established a mission on the Congo (which for a long time bore great fruit) about 1490. The order was instrumental in the discovery of America. Fr. John Perez de Marchena, guardian [1] of a convent near Seville, himself a learned cosmographer, entered warmly into the designs of Columbus, and used his influence with Isabella the Catholic, whose confessor he had been, to persuade her to fit out the memorable expedition of 1492. In the following year Fr. John himself went to America, and opened the first Christian church in the New World, at a small settlement in the island of Hayti. Not to speak of the Franciscan missions in India, Brazil, and Peru—in all which countries other orders effected yet more—it was Observantine friars who were welcomed to Mexico by Cortes in 1523, and who, under their holy leader, Martin de Valenza, planted Christianity firmly in that empire, whence they went forth to preach the gospel in New Mexico (1580), in Texas (1600), and lastly, in California (1769).[2]

The order of St. Francis has given five Popes, more than fifty cardinals, and an immense number of patriarchs and bishops to the Church. The great statesman Cardinal Ximenes was a Franciscan. Among the schoolmen, St. Bonaventure, the Seraphic Doctor; Duns Scotus, the Subtle Doctor; Alexander of Hales, the Irrefragable Doctor; Roger Bacon, the Wonderful Doctor; and William of Ockham (the last four being natives of the British Isles), were members of this order. Its history is recorded in the elaborate "Annals" of Fr. Luke Wadding, an Irish Franciscan of the seventeenth century.

At the dissolution there were sixty-four Franciscan houses in England; the names are given below.[1] The English province was restored by Fr. Jennings, who founded a convent at Douay about 1617; of the friars who went from it on the English mission four (Frs. Bell, Heath, Bullaker, and Woodcock) were put to death for their religion by the Long Parliament between 1642 and 1646.

FRANKFORT, COUNCIL OF. At this, the first national council of Germany, convened by Charlemagne in 794, three hundred bishops and abbots were present.[2] Under the guidance of the English Alcuin, the council confirmed the condemnation of the Adoptionist heresy of Elipandus and Felix, pronounced at Ratisbon two years before [ADOPTIONISM], and also rejected the decrees of the Second General Council of Nicaea which the Fathers of Frankfort knew only in a grossly erroneous translation. [See ICONOCLASTS.] (Baronius, "Annales" ad ann. 794; Hefele-Leclerq, iii. 1045 sqq.; also p. 1240 sqq. on the rejection of the last-named decrees).

FRANKS. [See MISSIONS TO THE HEATHEN.]

FRATERNAL CORRECTION. An admonition which in certain circumstances we are bound to give our neighbour in order to withdraw him from sin. The duty of so admonishing is founded on the natural law, which obliges us to help our neighbour in the necessities of his soul, and also on the command of Christ (Mt. xviii. 15) "If thy brother shall offend thee, go and reprove him between thee and him alone."

In order to be under such an obligation, we must be certain that the sin has been committed; we must have reason to think that it has not been repented of, and some reasonable hope that the correction will do good. We must also have grounds for supposing that no one else who is equally fit with ourselves to give the correction is likely to do so. The admonition must of course be given with great prudence and charity. Bishops, parish-priests, parents, &c., are more strictly bound than others to the duty of fraternal correction. Many causes, such as inconvenience and loss, or even bashfulness, may often excuse private persons from administering it. (St. Alphonsus, "Theol. Mor." lib. iii. tr. 3, n. 34 sqq.)

FRATICELLI (lit. "little friars"). An heretical sect which issued from the Franciscan order in the thirteenth century, attracted many adherents and caused great confusion, chiefly in Italy and Sicily, but disappeared towards the end of the fifteenth century. The Franciscans were divided, soon after the death of their founder, into two great parties, one of which—represented by Elias, the second general—was favourable to some relaxation of the rule in regard to poverty, while the other vehemently opposed the least abatement of the original rigour. [See FRANCISCANS.] The contention became so warm that the Popes were obliged to interfere, and reserved to themselves the right of interpreting the Franciscan rule. Gregory IX., Innocent IV., Alexander IV., and Nicholas III. successively undertook this task, and settled the rule in such a modified form as to allow the convents to possess the usufruct of landed estates, the property of which was vested in the Holy See. This did not satisfy the rigorists, some of whom were so carried away by a false zeal as to forget the earnest and repeated precept of their founder, that his friars should be obedient to the Holy See, and fanatically to declare that the Pope and the Church were in error. Among their leaders were Peter John Oliva, Raymond, Peter of Macerata, Henry of Ceva, &c. Apostate Franciscans formed at all times the chief strength of the sect, but they were glad to accept the co-operation of laymen, and even of women. They wandered about Italy, Sicily, Greece, and countries further east, proclaiming that the Popes had ceased to be the Vicars of Christ, and that the Church, corrupted by riches, had failed. They pretended to consecrate popes and bishops from among themselves. In their dress, and all about them that met the eye, they affected extreme poverty and simplicity; but a contemporary writer (Pelagius, the penitentiary of Pope John XXII.) reports that this external austerity was the cloak of abominable vices. The bull of John XXII. against them (1318) attributes to them various errors, some of which were revived by Wyclif sixty years later, and condemned by Gregory XI. and the Council of Constance. For instance, the bull of John XXII. gives as one of their tenets that "those who are regularly ordained lose their power by their sins"; and the council condemned as a Wyclifite error the proposition that "The power of a temporal lord, of a prelate, or of a bishop, is null while he is in mortal sin."[1] Martin V. (1418) published a bull and took other active measures against the sect, employing for this purpose the great preacher St. John Capistran, whose efforts appear to have been crowned with signal success. (See Wadding, "Annales Minorum" ad ann. 1320–34; Pastor, "Hist. of the Popes" [Eng. tr.] iv. p. 113 sqq.; "Analecta Franciscana" [Quaracchi] ii. 120 sqq.; Bihl in "Cath. Enc.")

FREEDOM OF WILL, says St. Thomas (1ª, q. 83, a. 2), consists essentially in the power of choice. We are said to be endowed with free will because we are able to accept one object, rejecting another; which acceptance we call "choice." A few words will explain the doctrine of the scholastic philosophers on this point, and serve as the best introduction to the decisions of the Church.

The will is an appetite which follows upon intellectual cognition, which tends, in other words, to the good apprehended and proposed by the mind. It is therefore proper to intellectual beings, and wholly distinct from the animal appetites, which tend to good apprehended by the senses. Now, if the object apprehended by the intellect be purely and simply good, and seen only as such, the will tends to it of necessity, and there can in such a case be no question of choice or freedom. No man can will to be unhappy or can help willing the objects which he only thinks of as necessary means of happiness. But a vast number of objects apprehended by the intellect are neither perfectly or in all respects bad or good. A virtuous act, for example, may involve self-restraint and suffering; the mind, influenced by the will, may fix its attention chiefly on this element of evil, and the will in its turn may reject the good act because of the physical suffering or evil which accompanies it. So again, stealing may relieve a man from great discomfort, and here, again, the lesser good may be chosen, accompanied though it is by a moral evil. To the metaphysical arguments other very obvious ones may be added from psychological experience, e.g. the sense of sin if we choose wrongly, and the general feeling of all societies, in which criminals have been punished precisely on the ground that they were free and therefore responsible agents.

The Reformers generally denied that man, after the fall, possessed free will; or, if they admitted it in words, they explained the freedom of the will to mean, not the power of choice, the power which the will has to determine its own acts, but a mere freedom from external restraint (libertas a coactione). The same error was revived, though more cautiously asserted, by Baius and the Jansenists. On the other hand, it was defined under anathema by the Tridentine Council (sess. vi. can. 5), that free will remains really and truly in man after the fall: and the true sense of this definition was frequently enforced, and insisted on by subsequent Popes. (See GRACE; on Determinism; i.e. the total denial of freedom of the will, apart from any theological belief, see W. G. Ward, "Philosophy of Theism"; Maher, "Psychology"; and the scholastic philosophers generally in their treatment of the will.)

FREEMASONRY. The system of the Freemasons, a secret society, which professes, by means of a symbolical language and certain ceremonies of initiation and promotion, to lay down a code of morality founded on the brotherhood of humanity only. Some writers, chiefly continental, apply the term Freemasonry not only to the Freemasons proper, but also to all secret organizations which seek to undermine Christianity and the political and social institutions that have Christianity for their basis.

The origin of Freemasonry is disputed. The Freemasons themselves, in the language of their rituals, assume the sect to have begun its existence at the building of Solomon's Temple; but serious Masonic writers, as well as all writers of repute, declare this to be merely a conventional fiction. Nor is any more value to be attached to the attempts that are occasionally made to find a link between the pagan mysteries and Freemasonry. Some writers trace Freemasonry to the heresies of Eastern origin that prevailed during the Early and Middle Ages in certain parts of Europe, such as those of the Gnostics, Manichaeans, and Albigenses, some of whose mischievous tenets are, no doubt, apparent in the sect. The suppressed order of the Knights Templars, too, has been taken to have been the source of the sect; and this theory may have some countenance in the facts that a number of the Knights in Scotland illicitly maintained their organization after the suppression, and that it was from Scotland that Freemasonry was brought into France at the beginning of the 18th century.

But it seems more in consonance with many known historical facts to trace the sect to the mediaeval guild of stonemasons, who were popularly called by the very name of Free Masons. During the Middle Ages the various trades were formed, with the approbation of the Church, into guilds or close protective societies. In general no one was permitted to follow a trade for wages or profit as apprentice, journeyman, or master, until he had been made free of the guild representing that trade. Each guild had its patron saint, and several guilds, it is certain, had each its peculiar ritual, using its own tools and technical language in a symbolical way in the ceremonies of initiation and promotion—that is to say, in entering an apprentice, and at the end of his time declaring him a worthy fellow-journeyman or craftsman, &c. The guild of Free Masons was singular in this: that it was a migratory one, its members travelling under their masters in organized bodies through all parts of Europe, wherever their services were required in building. When first referred to, they are found grouped about the monasteries, especially about those of the Benedictines. The earliest form of initiation used by the guild is said to have been suggested by the ritual for the reception of a Benedictine novice.

The south of France, where a large Jewish and Saracenic element remained, was a hotbed of heresies, and that region was also a favourable one with the guild of Masons. It is asserted, too, that as far back as the twelfth century the lodges of the guild enjoyed the special protection of the Knights Templars. It is easy in this way to understand how the symbolical allusions to Solomon and his Temple might have passed from the Knights into the Masonic formulary. In this way, too, might be explained how, after the suppression of the order of the Temple, some of the recalcitrant Knights, maintaining their influence over the Free Masons, would be able to pervert what hitherto had been a harmless ceremony into an elaborate ritual that should impart some of the errors of the Templars to the initiated. A document was long ago published which purports to be a charter granted to a lodge of Free Masons in England in the time of Henry VII., and it bears the marks in its religious indifference of a suspicious likeness between Freemasonry then and now. In Germany the guild was numerous and was formally recognized by a diploma granted in 1489 by the Emperor Maximilian. But this sanction was finally revoked by the Imperial Diet in 1707.

So far, however, the Free Masons were really working stonemasons; but the so-called Cologne Charter—the genuineness of which seems certain—drawn up in 1535 at a meeting of Free Masons gathered at Cologne to celebrate the opening of the cathedral edifice, is signed by Melanchthon, Coligny, and other similar ill-omened names. Nothing certain is known of the Free Masons—now evidently become a sect—during the seventeenth century, except that in 1646 Elias Ashmole, an Englishman, founded the order of Rose Croix, Rosicrucians, or Hermetic Freemasons—a society which mingled in a fantastic manner the jargon of alchemy and other occult sciences with pantheism. This order soon became affiliated to some of the Masonic lodges in Germany, where from the time of the Reformation there was a constant founding of societies, secret or open, which undertook to formulate a philosophy or a religion of their own.

As we know it now, however, Freemasonry first appeared in 1725, when Lord Derwentwater, a supporter of the expelled Stuart dynasty, introduced the order into France, professing to have his authority from a lodge at Kilwinning, Scotland. This formed the basis of that variety of Freemasonry called the Scotch Rite. Rival organizations soon sprang up. Charters were obtained from a lodge at York, which was said to have been of very ancient foundation. In 1754 Martinez Pasquales, a Portuguese Jew, began in some of the French lodges the new degree of "cohens," or priests, which was afterwards developed into a system by the notorious Saint-Martin, and is usually referred to as French Illuminism. But it remained for Adam Weishaupt, Professor of Canon Law at the University of Ingolstadt, in Bavaria, to give a definite shape to the anti-Christian tendencies of Freemasonry. In 1776, two years after the expulsion of the Jesuits from the university, he brought together a number of his pupils and friends, and organized the order of the Illuminati, which he established on the already existing degrees of Freemasonry. The avowed object of the Illuminati was to bring back mankind—beginning with the Illuminated—to their primitive liberty by destroying religion, for which this newest philosophical invention was to be substituted, and by re-shaping ideas of property, society, marriage, &c. One of the Illuminati, a Sicilian, Joseph Balsamo, otherwise Cagliostro, organized what he called Cabalistic Freemasonry, under the name of the Rite of Misraim. He it was who in 1783 predicted, as the approaching work of the Freemasons, the overthrow of the French monarchy. Indeed, Freemasonry was very active in the French Revolution, and assisted in bringing about many of the calamities which accompanied that great upturning of society.

Freemasonry in the meantime had split up into numerous sects, or "rites," all working to the common effect of destroying a belief in the divine revelation of Christianity. In 1781 a great assembly of all the Masonic rites was held at Wilhelmsbad, in Hanover, under the presidency of the Duke of Brunswick, which refused to recognise Weishaupt's system, but at the same time permitted the most mischievous tenets of Illuminism to be engrafted on the higher degrees of Freemasonry, especially of the so-called Scotch Rite. About this time the Scotch Rite was established at Charleston, South Carolina, by some officers of the French auxiliary army. The York Rite had been introduced into the United States by English colonists.

Freemasonry in continental Europe has been the hatching-ground of most of the revolutionary societies, many of which were affiliated to the higher Masonic degrees. In France the sect was officially recognized by the government of Napoleon III., but advanced Freemasons bore this unwillingly, as it involved restraint. An avowed belief in God was required for initiation, but this requirement, through the efforts of M. Macé, of the University, was finally abolished in the convention of Freemasons held at Paris, September 14, 1877. It is fair to add that the English lodges had no part in this convention and repudiate its authority.

A recent French writer maintains that Freemasonry is—unknown to most of the craft—managed by five or six Jews, who bend its influence in every possible way to the furtherance of the anti-Christian movement that passes under the name of Liberalism. Throughout continental Europe, in the Spanish-American States, and in Brazil, Freemasonry has of late years again become very active. The war against the Catholic Church in Germany had no more bitter supporter than Freemasonry. If the Kulturkampf was not directed from the lodges, at least nearly all its leaders were Freemasons. During "the Commune" of Paris, in 1871, Masonic lodges took part as a body in the insurrection, marching out to the fight with their red banners. In France and Belgium the lodges have officially commanded their members to assist the Ligue de l'Enseignement—a league intended to bring about the complete secularization of the primary public schools.

In the English-speaking countries, however, Freemasonry has hitherto protested its respect for government and established society, and it has not had any immediate action on politics, its members being usually found as numerous in one political party as another. But it has never failed indirectly to use its influence for the advancement of its members over others. English-speaking Freemasons have usually been accustomed to regard the pantheism of their rituals as an amusing mummery rather than as a reality. These Freemasons usually disown for their order any aims but those of a convivial and mutual-benefit society, but no one can fail to see that indifferentism in religion at least is one of the necessary results of English-speaking Freemasonry at its best. But the constant influx into the English-speaking countries of Jews and Continental Freemasons must necessarily impregnate the order with all the poison of the Continental sect.

Freemasonry is essentially opposed to the belief in the personality of God, whose name in the Masonic rituals veils the doctrine of blind force only governing the universe. It is also essentially subversive of legitimate authority, for by professing to furnish man with an all-sufficient guide and help to conduct, it makes him independent of the Church, and by its everywhere ridiculing rank and authority it tends, in spite of its occasional protests of loyalty, to bring all governments into contempt.

The sect has been repeatedly condemned by learned and respectable men of all countries, Protestant and Catholic. Six Papal bulls have been directed against it by name—viz. "In eminenti," Clement XII., 1738; "Providas," Benedict XIV., 1751; "Ecclesiam Jesu Christi," Pius VII., 1821; "Qui graviora," Leo XII., 1826; "Quanta cura," Pius IX., 1864; "Humanum genus," Leo XIII., 1884. FREQUENT COMMUNION. Although the subject is considered in the art. COMMUNION, a few words may be added here on account of the recent legislation of Pius X.

The Fourth Lateran Council (c. Omnis utriusque sexus) binds the faithful to receive Holy Communion at least once a year. This rule is of course intended only as a minimum. Our Lord Himself simply bids us eat His Flesh and drink His Blood, without specifying how often we should do so. But as bread and wine were the ordinary daily nourishment of His hearers, the fact of giving Himself under these forms would indicate His wish that we should communicate daily. Hence in the early Church and in the patristic ages the faithful received, or were expected to receive, whenever the Holy Eucharist was celebrated. This was every day at Jerusalem when the Christians were in their first fervour (Acts ii. 46). Later on, however, it was on the first day of the week (ἐν τῇ μιᾷ σαββάτων) that the faithful assembled to break bread" (Acts xx. 7; cf. 1 Cor. xvi. 2). So, too, in the "Didache" the breaking of bread took place "on the Lord's day" (κατὰ κυριακὴν); and in St. Justin's time "on the day called Sunday" (τῇ τοῦ ἡλίου λεγομένῃ ἡμέρᾳ). Tertullian, however, tells us that the Liturgy was celebrated on other days besides Sunday ("De Orat." c. xix, PL, i. 1181; "De Corona" c. iii, PL, ii. 79). Daily Celebration, and consequently daily Communion, is mentioned by St. Cyprian ("De Orat. Dom."

c. xviii, ed. Hartel, p. 280); St. Ambrose ("In Ps. cxviii." PL, xv. 1461–2); St. John Chrysostom ("Hom. iii. in Eph. PG, lxii. 29); St. Jerome (Ep. xlviii. n. 15, and Ep. lxxi, n. 6, PL, xxii. 506, 672). St. Augustine deals with the matter in his answer to Januarius's inquiries. He first describes the various customs: "Some receive the Body and Blood of the Lord every day; others on certain days; in some places there is no day on which (the sacrifice) is not offered; in others on Saturday and Sunday only; in others on Sunday alone. Under these circumstances it is best to follow the custom of the place where one is living." He then goes on to discuss the question of daily Communion: "Some say that only those days should be chosen on which one is especially pure and continent, while others are of opinion that if our sins are not of such gravity as to deserve excommunication, they should not be deprived of the daily remedy of the Lord's Body." St. Augustine himself thinks that there is much to be said on both sides. Zacchaeus and the Centurion did not set themselves one above the other, though the Publican received his Lord into his house with joy, whereas the righteous soldier said "Lord, I am not worthy that thou shouldst enter under my roof" (Ep. liv, PL, xxxiii. 200 sqq.). We should bear in mind that during the Patristic times the system of the catechumenate was in force, and consequently none but the initiated communicated. Moreover, except in times of special fervour, practice fell far short of precept, and hence the faithful were frequently rebuked for so seldom receiving (St. John Chrysostom, "In Ephes. Hom. iii." PG, lxii. 29; St. Ambrose, "In Ps. cxviii." PL, xv. 1461–2). St. Bede laments that the devout received only three times a year. Strange to say, it was in the Middle Ages, "the ages of faith," that the faithful received less frequently than in any other period of the Church; and it was in consequence of this abuse that the above-mentioned decree of the Fourth Lateran Council was made. The teaching of the great Schoolmen, however, was all on the side of frequent and even daily Communion (St. Thomas, 3ª, q. 80, a. 10). In the later Middle Ages a change for the better began, chiefly through the efforts of Tauler, St. Catherine of Siena, St. Vincent Ferrer, and Savonarola. Their work was carried on in the sixteenth century by St. Antonio Maria Zaccaria, St. Cajetan, St. Ignatius, and St. Philip Neri. The Fathers of the Council of Trent expressed the wish "that at each Mass the faithful who are present should communicate" (sess. xxii. c. 6). Frequent and even daily Communion now became common in Spain and Italy. Arnauld's famous work "On Frequent Communion" (1643) required rigid conditions for reception, such as severe penance for past sins and most pure love of God. These conditions were condemned in 1690. Yet, through Jansenistic influences, the frequency of Communion began to fall off once again, in spite of the sound teaching of Fénelon, St. Alphonsus, and the advocates of devotion to the Sacred Heart. In our own day Pius IX. and Leo XIII. warmly recommended the practice of frequent and daily Communion. Pius X. went further, and warned confessors "not to deter from frequent or daily Communion anyone who is in a state of grace and approaches with a right intention" (December 20, 1905). In this decree of the Congregation of the Council, issued by order of the Pope, the conditions for daily Communion are clearly stated. His action has led to a great revival of the ancient practice of frequent and daily Communion. (See Dalgairns, "The Holy Communion," part III. ch. i.; Hedley, "The Holy Eucharist," ch. viii.; Scannell, in "Eucharistic Congress of Westminster Report," p. 214 sqq.; Zulueta, "Notes on Daily Communion"; Bridgett, "Hist. of the H. FRIAR. The word is a corruption of the French frère, the distinguishing title of the members of the Mendicant orders. The Franciscans and Dominicans, approved by the Holy See in 1210 and 1216 respectively, were the first friars; to these Innocent IV. in 1245 added the Carmelites, and Alexander IV. the Augustinian hermits (1256). Hence Chaucer, writing about 1390, speaks of "alle the ordres foure."[1] The Servites received in the fifteenth century the same privileges as the four Mendicant orders from Martin V. and Innocent VIII.

FRIDAY. [See ABSTINENCE.]

FRONTAL (antependium, pallium). An embroidered cloth which often covers the front side of the altar. The colour should vary with the feast or season. In early times the altar was open in front, so that there was no need of such a covering, and even now Gavantus says it may be dispensed with if the altar is of costly material or fine workmanship. (Gavant. P. I. tit. xx.; Rock, I. 183.)

FUNDAMENTAL ARTICLES. [See DOGMA, p. 277.]

FUNERAL (exequiae). The following are the chief points in the funeral rite as prescribed in the Roman Ritual. The corpse is borne in procession with lights to the church. The parish-priest assists in surplice and black stole; the clerks carry the holy water and cross; the coffin is first sprinkled with holy water and the psalm "De Profundis" recited; then the corpse is carried to church while the "Miserere" is said. The coffin is then placed in the middle of the building, with the feet to the altar if the dead person was a layman, the head if he was a priest. Candles are lighted round the coffin, and the office and Mass of the dead, followed by the absolution, accompanied by aspersion and incensation over the corpse, are said. Then another procession, and the corpse is carried to the grave. At the grave the "Benedictus" is sung, with the antiphon "I am the resurrection and the life," and a prayer for the soul of the departed. The body is sprinkled for the last time with holy water, just before the prayer. The funeral of infants is very different. The psalms said are of praise and thanksgiving, nor is there, of course, any prayer for the repose of the soul. The vestments used by the officiating clergy are white, a crown of flowers is placed on the coffin, and the church bells are not rung, or else rung with a joyful tone. The Ritual speaks of these rites as handed down by "most ancient custom"; and with good right. The custom of bearing the dead body to the grave with psalms, and the Mass for the soul of the departed, can be traced back to very early times; indeed, the funeral procession is the oldest of all, being mentioned by Fathers such as Gregory Nazianzen, Jerome and Chrysostom, who wrote in the age immediately following the heathen persecution of the Church. The last of these Fathers (Hom. iv. in Hebr.) notes the custom of carrying lighted torches at these processions, and as early at least as the sixth century (see Greg. Turon. "Vit. Patr." c. 14) the cross was carried. The practice, on the other hand, of tolling the bell at funerals does not date beyond the eighth or ninth age. (See Smith and Cheetham, Article Burials.)

In the Greek rite, as given by Goar, the clergy keep vigil and sing psalms by the corpse. The kiss of peace is given to the corpse or at least to the coffin, and at the actual interment the priest sprinkles the coffin with earth and then with oil from the lamp, or else ashes from the censer. G

GALILEO. The object of the present article is, not to write a Life of Galileo, but to give an account, as clear as our limits will permit, of the two condemnations of the doctrine of the immobility of the sun and the rotation of the earth, pronounced by the Congregations of the Holy Office (Roman Inquisition) and the Index, with special reference to the teaching and writing of Galileo in 1616 and 1633. After the most material facts have been narrated without comment, it will be necessary to examine three separate points:—1. What was the precise nature of the condemnation pronounced? 2. What was the character of the considerations which appeared to the Pope and the cardinals to justify them in pronouncing it? 3. Was Galileo, as some writers have maintained, really put to the torture?

In 1613 the great astronomer, who had long inclined to the heliocentric[1] system of Copernicus, published a letter addressed to his friend the Padre Castelli, in which he says that it is not the object of God in the Holy Scriptures to teach us science and philosophy, and that the received Ptolemaic system could no more be reconciled to the text of Scripture than the Copernican. Some time afterwards, in 1615, he wrote a much longer and more important letter to the Grand Duchess Christina of Tuscany, in which he may be said[1] to have endeavoured to accommodate to the Copernican theory the various passages in Scripture which seem to be inconsistent with it. This letter was not published till 1636, but its tenor appears to have become known to many persons. Galileo visited Rome towards the end of 1615, and was shortly summoned before the Congregation of the Holy Office. The original minutes, showing exactly what occurred, have been published by M. de l'Epinois.[2] On February 25, 1616, Cardinal Millin reported to the Congregation that the Pope (Paul V.) had ordered that Cardinal Bellarmine should call Galileo before him, and should "warn him to abandon the said opinion [of the immobility of the sun, &c.], and if he refused to obey, the Father Commissary . . . . was to lay a command upon him to abstain altogether from teaching or defending a doctrine and opinion of this kind, or from dealing with it [in any way]." If he was refractory, he was to be imprisoned—"carceretur." The minutes of the following day show how all this was done, and an injunction, as above, laid upon Galileo: "in which command the said Galileo acquiesced, and promised to obey it." The prohibition of the Pope was identical in intention[3] with that contained in a decree of the Congregation of the Index dated a week later, March 5, 1616. This decree first

[1] The terms "heliocentric" and "geocentric," as denoting the systems which assume the sun or the earth respectively to be the fixed centre round which the planets revolve, are borrowed from two articles in the Dublin Review (by W. G. Ward), of which we have made free use in the present paper: one is headed "Copernicanism and Pope Paul V." (April 1871); the other, "Galileo and the Pontifical Congregations" (July 1871).

[2] Les Pièces du Procès de Galilée, Rome, Paris, 1877.

[3] This is certain; for Bellarmine, in the certificate which he gave to Galileo in 1616—of which we shall again have occasion to speak—says that "the declaration made by the Pope, and published by the Sacred Congregation of the Index [italics ours], was notified to him," &c.

condemns five theologico-political works, and then goes on to say that it has come to the knowledge of the Sacred Congregation "that the well-known doctrine—of Pythagorean origin and wholly repugnant to the sacred Scriptures—concerning the mobility of the earth and the immobility of the sun," formerly taught by Copernicus and Diego of Astorga, "was now being spread abroad and embraced by many; . . . . therefore, lest such an opinion should insinuate itself any more, to the destruction of Catholic truth, it gave sentence" that the books of Copernicus and Diego "should be suspended [from circulation] till they were corrected," that the work of a certain Foscarini upholding the same opinion should be altogether prohibited and condemned, "and that all other books teaching the same thing were to be similarly prohibited."

That this decree was sanctioned and confirmed by the Pope it is impossible to doubt. The writer of the article Galileo in the "Encyclopaedia Britannica" maintains that its responsibility rests with a disciplinary congregation in no sense representing the Church, and that it was never confirmed by the Pope. This view is untenable in view of the fact that in any decree of one of the Sacred Congregations confirmed and ordered to be published by the Pope, it is the Pope himself who speaks—not the cardinals merely—if not always in his capacityof Universal Doctor yet always in that of Supreme Pastor or ruler. That the decree was not confirmed by Paul V. there is not, so far as we know, the smallest shred of evidence for maintaining; and the onus probandi rests on those who make an assertion so improbable.

Galileo was thus estopped by a decision in which he had acquiesced, and which he had promised not to infringe, from publishing anything more on the Copernican theory. Some years passed; Urban VIII. ascended the Papal chair in 1623; he was an enlightened man, of considerable learning, and, as Cardinal Barberini, had had much friendly intercourse with Galileo. The philosopher visited Rome in 1624, and was received with great warmth and kindness by the Pope. Soon after this he began to return to the forbidden subject; in an essay on sun-spots he assumed the fact of the sun's immobility. In his famous Dialogo on the "System of the World," published at Florence in February 1632, he spoke out still more plainly. The dialogue is carried on between three persons, Salvati, Sagredo, and Simplicio; the last being a well-meaning ignoramus, who supports the Ptolemaic side by arguments manifestly futile. At the conclusion of the work the question is in words left open; but the whole effect of the treatise is said to be that of a powerful and vehement defence of the Copernican theory. The book reached Rome at the end of February 1632, and caused great excitement. The Pope was very angry; he said that Galileo had been ill advised; that great mischief might be done to religion in this way, greater than was ever done before.[1] Riccardi, the Master of the Apostolic Palace, whose licence Galileo had obtained for the printing of the book by representations which do not seem quite straightforward, complained that arguments which Urban himself had used to Galileo against the Copernican theory were in the Dialogo placed in the mouth of Simplicio, a ridiculous personage. The authority of Aristotle was in that age inconceivably great, and Aristotle had believed the earth to be immovable. The Peripatetics—so his followers were called—flocked round the Pope, urged against Galileo the breach of his promise, and the insulting neglect of the prohibition of 1616, and pressed for the condemnation both of the book and its author. Urban, still desirous of keeping the case out of the Inquisition, appointed a commission of theologians to examine and report on the book. Their report was submitted in September 1632; it was highly unfavourable to Galileo. The Pope then wrote to the Grand Duke of Tuscany, in whose service Galileo was at the time, saying that the case must go before the Inquisition, and that the accused must come to Rome and stand his trial. After a considerable delay, which produced a stern letter from Urban (December 30, 1632) to the effect that if Galileo could travel at all he was to be sent up to Rome in chains, the philosopher departed from Florence and arrived in Rome about the middle of February 1633, taking up his abode at the Tuscan embassy. The trial came on in April; for ten days after its commencement Galileo was committed to the house of the fiscal of the Holy Office; but on his complaining that from his feeble state of health he could ill bear the confinement, he was allowed to return to the Tuscan embassy.

The minutes of the Holy Office show that Galileo was examined on April 12 and 30, May 10, and June 21. The report of the commissioners, one of whom was Melchior Inchofer, told heavily against him. Melchior said that the author of the Dialogo did not put the case in favour of the immobility of the sun "hypothetice," but "theorematice," and that his having written in Italian, so that "vulgares etiam homines" might read it, made the matter worse. The disobedience to the command issued by the Holy Office in 1616 was also much dwelt upon; to which Galileo could only reply by putting in the certificate which he had obtained at the time from Bellarmine,[2] and pleading that as the latter had not in this expressly referred to the injunction not to write any more on the question, he had forgotten all about it. It is probable that this was not believed, and that some intention other than one purely scientific was ascribed to him, as accounting for his open disregard of the prohibition of 1616. We read in the minutes for June 16, 1633, that the Pope ordered that Galileo should be questioned "concerning his intention, a threat even of torture being used to him; and that if he persisted in his statement (et si sustinuerit), his abjuration having been first taken, he was to be condemned," &c.

[1] L'Epinois, La Question de Galilée, p. 114.

[2] The certificate ends thus—after stating that Galileo had made no abjuration, nor been put to penance—"but only the declaration made by the Pope and published by the Sacred Congregation of the Index was solemnly notified to him, in which it is contained that the doctrine attributed to Copernicus that the earth moves round the sun, and that the sun remains in the centre of the world without moving from east to west, is contrary to the Sacred Scriptures and therefore cannot be defended or held. In testimony whereof," &c.

On June 21 he was examined according to this instruction. Being asked whether he had not held the opinion [of the immobility of the sun] since the decree of 1616, he said, "I do not hold and have not held this opinion of Copernicus since it was intimated to me by authority (con precetto) that I must abandon it; for the rest, I am here in your hands: you must do what you please." He was then warned to speak the truth, otherwise the torture would be applied. He answered, "I am here to make my submission, and I have not held this opinion since the decision was given, as I have said." He was then allowed to withdraw. The sentence was pronounced the next day in the convent of the Minerva. A full narrative of what passed may be read in a letter addressed by the Cardinal di S. Onofrio on July 2, 1633, to the Inquisition of Venice.[1] The sentence opened with the words, "Whereas thou, Galileo," &c., and after reciting the proceedings of 1615 and 1616, stated that the Holy Office appointed theologians on that occasion as qualificators, who reported to this effect:—

1. That the sun is the centre of the world and immovable is a proposition absurd and false in philosophy, and formally heretical, as being expressly contrary to Holy Scripture.

2. That the earth is not the centre of the world, nor immovable, but that it moves even with a diurnal motion, is in like manner a proposition absurd and false in philosophy, and, considered in theology, at least erroneous in faith.

The accused is reminded that, after Bellarmine had advised and admonished him, the then commissary of the Inquisition told him that he could not defend or teach that doctrine any more, either orally or in writing. In publishing the Dialogo he had manifestly disobeyed the precept, and in consequence of the publication, the tribunal understood, the said opinion was spreading more and more. He had acted disingenuously in saying nothing about the precept when he applied for the licence to print. Mistrusting him, the tribunal had thought it right to proceed to the rigorous examen ("rigoroso esame") in which he had answered as a Catholic should ("rispondesti cattolicamente"). "We therefore," proceeds the tribunal, "say, pronounce, declare, &c., that you, Galileo, have made yourself vehemently suspect of heresy to this Holy Office—i.e. of having believed and held a doctrine false and contrary to the sacred and divine Scriptures." He had therefore incurred all the usual penalties; nevertheless the tribunal would absolve him if he abjured and detested the said errors. But, as a warning to others, they ordered: 1, that his Dialogo should be prohibited; 2, that he should be "formally" imprisoned[1] during the pleasure of the Holy Office; 3, that he should say once a week, for three years to come, the seven penitential psalms. Galileo then abjured the condemned opinion,[2] and swore never to promote it in future, and to denounce to the Holy Office any whom he might find maintaining it.

Harsh as this sentence sounds, the fact is that Galileo was treated with little that can be called severity for the remainder of his life. He resided at first at Siena, afterwards in his own villa at Arcetri, near Florence. He was so far under restraint that he was not allowed to go into the city, nor to remove elsewhere without permission; but within his own house and grounds he seems to have been left entirely free. Milton visited him at Arcetri in 1638 or 1639. "There [i.e. in Italy] I found and visited the famous Galileo, grown old, a prisoner to the Inquisition."[3] Perhaps Milton did not mean to mislead, but the common inference drawn from his words has been, that he found Galileo immured in the dungeons of the Inquisition,[4] instead of living as a private gentleman in his own country house. The philosopher died at an advanced age at Arcetri in 1642.

Such, in brief outline, were the facts of this celebrated condemnation. Before considering the motives actuating those who pronounced it, let us examine what the sentence itself amounted to. Did the Roman Pontiff, at any stage of these proceedings, pronounce ex cathedra that the theory of Copernicus was wrong, and that the earth was the fixed centre of the world? The writer in the "Dublin Review" already referred to appears to us to make it quite plain that the Roman Pontiff did nothing of the kind. Whether the decrees of Pontifical congregations on matters of doctrine, in which there is a clause expressly asserting the Papal sanction, are or are not to be regarded as ex cathedra and infallible judgments, is a point, according to the reviewer, on which

[1] Under restraint, but not in a material prison.

[2] The clever fiction which makes him say at this point Eppur si muove ("And yet it [the earth] does move"), first appeared, according to the writer in the Enc. Brit., in an Historical Dictionary published at Caen in 1788.

[3] Areopagitica.

[4] Thus Dr. Johnson says, in his Life of Milton, "He had perhaps given some offence by visiting Galileo, then a prisoner in the Inquisition [italics ours] for philosophical heresy."

theologians are not entirely agreed; but no one, he adds, has ever doubted that decrees not containing this clause are not to be regarded as decisions ex cathedra. Now, the decree of the Congregation of the Index of March 5, 1616, does not contain the clause; it cannot, therefore, be regarded as defining ex cathedra.

I. What, then, does the decree decide or do? It decides that the theory of Copernicus is "false" and "entirely contrary to Scripture," and that the books which teach it are to be prohibited. To this must be added the language used by the Holy Office in the preamble of their sentence, as given in a previous paragraph. It is abundantly clear that both Pontifical congregations held that the opinion about the earth's motion now universally received was false and contrary to Scripture, and that no Catholic could hold it without falling into heresy. The reviewer maintains that it was natural and inevitable that they should so regard it, seeing that the obvious sense of Scripture is unquestionably opposed to the Copernican theory, and only "some overwhelming scientific probability" (p. 159) could render it legitimate to override the obvious in favour of an unobvious sense. Later researches have supplied this overwhelming probability, and consequently all Catholics now "admit that the Holy Ghost for wise purposes . . . permitted the sacred writers to express themselves in language which was literally true as understood by them, but was figurative in the highest degree as intended by Him" (ib.).

The reviewer moreover contends that, although all Catholics were bound to assent to the decrees, they were not thereby obliged to hold the geocentric theory as an article of divine faith—i.e. with an assent excluding all doubt. To maintain the contradictory of this proposition would be absurd, since the heliocentric theory was allowed to be proposed hypothetically, but the Church would never for a moment allow even the hypothetical maintenance [1] of an opinion contrary to an article of faith. For instance, what impossibility is greater than that, since 1854, the Church should allow any Catholic theologian to maintain, as a hypothesis, that the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception is untrue? But that the heliocentric theory might be hypothetically propounded after the decree of 1616 is indisputable. For, first, Galileo deposed before the Holy Office in 1633 [2] that in 1616 Cardinal Bellarmine spoke approvingly, both as to him and Copernicus, of their holding the opinion of the movement of the earth "ex suppositione and not absolutely." Secondly, the same Bellarmine declared in 1620, "that if a scientific proof of Copernicanism were discovered, Scripture should then be Copernically interpreted" [1]; and the theologian Amort, writing in 1734, expressed himself to the same effect.[2] Thirdly, the report of Melchior Inchofer speaks of "the reasons by which Galileo assertively, absolutely, and not hypothetically . . . maintains the motion of the earth"; whence it may be inferred that to maintain it hypothetically would not have been censurable.[3]

II. The meaning and effect of the decrees being what we have described, the question arises, Was there any urgent, and at the same time justifiable, motive for issuing them at all? After all, it may be said, the opinion condemned by the decrees has come to be universally believed; was it not therefore a mistake, to say the least, to attempt thus to suppress it? Has not the logic of events proved that course to be wrong? Such questions as these will be differently answered according to the varying estimates which people may form of the value of a stable religious conviction. The Pope and the cardinals believed in 1616 that if everyone might freely teach, at universities or by printed books, that the earth revolved round the sun, a great weakening of religious faith would ensue, owing to the apparent inconsistency of such teaching with a number of well-known passages in the Bible. They might remember that Giordano Bruno, an ardent Copernican, had also taught pantheism with equal ardour. The standing danger on the side of Protestantism was, they might think, sufficiently formidable, without the addition to it—while it could still be staved off—of a danger on the side of physical science. At the present day the youth of Italy listen to infidel lectures and read bad books without restriction; one single book of this kind, Renan's Vie de Jésus, is said to have caused loss of faith to innumerable readers in Spain and Italy. Few Catholics would hesitate to say, even now, that it would have been to the unspeakable advantage of European society and individual souls if the bad book by Renan just adverted to had been summarily suppressed at its birth, and the writer imprisoned, at least "formally." Far be it from us so to disparage the honoured name of Galileo as to suggest for a moment that the two cases are parallel. Galileo was a Christian all along, and could no more have written the sentimental impieties of the Vie de Jésus than could Urban VIII. himself. Still there can be no doubt that the Pope and cardinals—besides thinking his personal behaviour censurable, because he had broken a distinct promise and disregarded a solemn warning—believed that the interests of religion required that Copernicanism should be no otherwise taught than as a scientific hypothesis. The decrees, it is true, say nothing as to a hypothetical propounding; to them the Copernican theory is simply false. But this is the usual style of all disciplinary tribunals. The words of Bellarmine before quoted leave no doubt as to the Church's mind, and an important step towards their realization was taken when in 1757—the Newtonian philosophy which involves the centrality of the sun having been favourably received at Rome—Benedict XIV. suspended the decree of the Congregation of the Index above described.[1]

III. One more question remains—whether Galileo was or was not tortured in the course of his examination. It is extremely painful to read of torture being even threatened to a man so warmly loved by a host of friends, and to whom science was under such profound obligations. However, one may feel reasonably confident that it was no more than a threat. M. l'Epinois (La Question de Galilée, p. 104) enters fully into the question, and shows (1) that no one in the seventeenth century ever said or thought, so far as appears, that Galileo had been actually tortured; (2) that a special "interlocutory sentence" of the judge must have been given before the application of the torture, and that of such sentence there is no trace; (3) that even if such sentence had been given, Galileo might have legally appealed against it on the ground of age and ill-health, and that his appeal must have been allowed. For these and several other reasons which we have not space to analyse, L'Epinois considers that it is scarcely possible to doubt that the torture, though threatened, was not actually administered. (There is abundant literature on the subject. The article in the "Cath. Enc." by Father Gerard gives a good summary account of the case by one who was a scientist as well as a theologian; De Vregille in DAp; Müller, "Galileo-Galilei"; Vacandard, "Rev. du Clergé Français," October 1904, and, above all, his admirable article in DThC.)

GALLICAN LITURGIES. [See LITURGIES, p. 531.]

GALLICANISM. The tendency to enlarge the prerogatives of a national church—in the particular case, of the church of France—and to restrict proportionately the authority of the Holy See. It was this tendency which was exemplified alike in the Harlays and Le Telliers in France, and the Gardiners, Heaths, and Bonners of our own country. The habit of thinking of Rome as a power to be kept in check rather than loved and obeyed, produces a desire to restrict its authority in all directions, in regard to doctrine no less than discipline. Hence a secondary phase of Gallicanism was—the tendency to exalt the authority of a general council, and to depress correspondingly that of the Pope.

Gallicanism in the first sense is the natural growth of a state of things in which despotic kings and corrupt metropolitans play into each other's hands, in order to dispose of the Church property, patronage and influence as they please. For three hundred years after the death of Charlemagne, such kings and such metropolitans were but too common, both in France and Germany. The wealth of the metropolitan sees being very great, princes used often to contrive that their brothers or their illegitimate sons should be appointed to them; often, too, they would sell the nomination for a large sum; and in that turbulent age the simoniacal intruder was generally able for many years, perhaps for a lifetime, to set the canons at nought and retain the benefice. The bishops, less exposed to corrupting influences than the metropolitans, maintained discipline as well as they could; but episcopal decisions were often referred by appeal to metropolitans, and were reviewed—when these had been appointed in the manner above described—in no equitable or conscientious spirit. A metropolitan decided a cause, perhaps for money, against a bishop; what was the bishop to do? Appeal to Rome, of course, whence he might hope to obtain a final and overriding sentence, quashing the unjust judgment of the metropolitan. Against such appeals the latter, and his prince also, would naturally protest. Why should not the bishop be content with a decision given in the highest ecclesiastical court in the country, and approved by the civil power? Why should he go to Rome? Here we have Gallicanism at its fountain head. The opposite view—that which makes Rome the mother and mistress of all churches, and persists in regarding her as qualified to review all causes and redress all wrongs in matters ecclesiastical—though sometimes called Ultramontane, has been adopted by all the saints, and all clear-sighted Catholics, in every age of the Church. It comes out forcibly in the pseudo-Isidorian compilation [FALSE DECRETALS], a work of the ninth century, and it dictated the celebrated Concordat of Worms (1122) (Hefele-Leclercq, v. 602 sqq.), where the right of the Pope to intervene in the appointment of all bishops was distinctly recognized.

For many generations those ecclesiastics in France who desired to uphold the royal power, and strengthen the prerogatives of the national church, were content to appeal to the old canonical practice (usus canonum, observantia juris antiqui) against what they regarded as Roman encroachments. Gradually—as a consequence, partly of the contest between Boniface VIII. and Philip le Bel, partly of the declarations made in the Councils of Constance and Basle—two principles began to be enunciated by the national party: one, that the King of France was absolutely independent of the Pope in all temporal matters; the other, that the Papal power was not absolute, must be exercised within the limits of the canons, and was inferior to that of a general council. By the Pragmatic Sanction of 1438, passed at Bourges, the Gallican church, in union with the king, adopted the decrees of the Council of Basle abolishing Papal reservations and expectatives, and restricting appeals to Rome to the causae majores. Many Popes protested against the Pragmatic Sanction; but it was maintained till the date of the concordat (1516) between Leo X. and Francis I., and although it was then abolished, several of its provisions continued to be in force. On the whole, there was in the sixteenth century a large body of customs and privileges, more or less ancient, which the courtly portion of the clergy delighted to speak of as the "Gallican liberties." A crisis came in the seventeenth century. Through the arbitrary extension by Louis XIV. of the royal right called Regalia [see that article], a collision occurred between the Crown and two bishops, those of Aleth and Pamiers. The bishops excommunicated the Crown nominees; the metropolitans of Toulouse and Narbonne, on being appealed to, cancelled the sentences of the bishops; these last then appealed to Rome, and Innocent XI. annulled the decisions of the metropolitans. In these circumstances an assembly of the French clergy was convened. Bossuet, just elected to the see of Meaux, was requested to preach the opening sermon; he delivered the celebrated discourse "On the Unity of the Church," concerning which there is nothing more remarkable than that the man who defended so eloquently the rights of the chair of Peter should a few days afterwards sign the Gallican Articles.

[1] There need be no question as to the sincerity of the Pope and cardinals in repudiating Copernicanism. So far as was then known, the appearances of nature might be equally well explained on either theory, and Scripture in its obvious meaning agreed with one and not with the other. Neither Bacon, nor Tycho Brahe, nor Descartes, accepted the Copernican theory. Milton, in the Paradise Lost, wavers between the two systems.

These articles, four in number, were drawn up in March 1682, and are to the following effect:—

The first denied that Peter and his successors had received any power from God extending to civil and temporal affairs, declared that kings were subject to no ecclesiastical power in temporals, and denied the deposing power of the Pope. [DEPOSING POWER.]

The second ratifies the third and fourth sessions of the Council of Constance [see that article] concerning the authority of the council relatively to that of the Pope, and denies that these sessions refer only to the time of the schism.

The third asserts the force and validity of the laws, customs, and constitutions of the realm and of the Gallican church.

The fourth is as follows: "The Pope has the principal share in questions of faith; his decrees regard all the churches and each church in particular; nevertheless his judgment is not irreformable, unless the consent of the Church be added." [1]

The question of the Regalia fell into the background after the publication of the Articles of 1682; besides, the bishops would not oppose the Court, and the Pope could not successfully vindicate the rights of the French church without some help from its leaders. It will be observed that the two tendencies of Gallicanism—that which would limit the action of Rome in discipline, and that which would place its authority below that of a general council in doctrine—were both broadly affirmed in these articles. The Spanish, Flemish, and Italian clergy repudiated them; Alexander VIII. (1690) pronounced them null and void; Clement XI. (1716) and afterwards Pius VI. renewed the condemnation. Louis XIV. withdrew in 1692 the edict by which he had approved the four articles; but he did so, not on the ground that they were condemned by the Holy See, and unsafe for Christians to hold, but because the particular conjunction of affairs which gave rise to them had passed away.

Far from ushering in a period of greater freedom for the French church, the declaration of 1682 was merely another link in the chain which politicians and lawyers had long been forging for the enslavement of the Church to the laity. Fénelon wrote: "In practice the King of France is more the head of the Church than the Pope. Liberty towards the Pope: servitude towards the king. The king's power over the Church has fallen into the hands of the civil tribunals. Laymen lord it over the bishops. Secular judges go so far as to examine even those Papal bulls which relate only to matters of faith." Jansenism, in so far as it fostered insubordination towards the Holy See, co-operated with Gallicanism. When the Revolution came, and the doctrinaires of the Convention produced the Civil Constitution of the Clergy (see CONSTITUTIONAL CLERGY), they were only pushing the worst side of Gallicanism to its logical outcome. But the great majority of the French clergy saw and recoiled from the snare, and from the day that they did so Gallicanism was doomed. In our own day, there has, indeed, been a party among the French clergy which has been less Ultramontane than the rest; hence the "inopportunist" opposition at the Vatican Council. But the definition of the Infallibility of the Pope has made the doctrinal basis of Gallicanism formal heresy; and the breach made by the Revolution in the ecclesiastical traditions of France, the suppression of the old tribunals, and the generally deepened apprehension in Catholic society of the rights and divinely founded authority of the Papacy, combine to render it unlikely that even the Gallican temper in relation to the supreme ecclesiastical authority on the one hand and the civil power on the other will ever reappear on any large scale in the Church. (See Bossuet, "Defensio Declarationis Cleri Gallicani"; Marca, "De Concordia Sacerdotii et Imperii"; Picot, "Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire Ecclésiastique pendant le XVIIIe siècle"; De Maistre, "Du Pape," "De l'Église Gallicane"; Degert in "Cath. Enc.")

GANGRA, COUNCIL OF. We possess twenty-one canons of this council, which was held at Gangra, the capital of Paphlagonia, but its precise date is unknown. The chief intention of the canons is that of condemning the false asceticism of Eustathius of Sebaste, or rather of his followers [see EUSTATHIANS]. Eustathius no longer held the see of Sebaste in 380, and some have thought that he was deposed by this Council of Gangra; if that were so, its date would probably be 379 or 380—not earlier, because St. Basil, who died in 379, makes no mention of it. It anathematizes those who out of spiritual pride and a false conception of purity blamed marriage, and despised those who were married; at the same time it guards itself from being supposed not to honour and admire virginity and continence when embraced with humility and charity. (Fleury, "Hist. Eccles." book xvii.; Hefele-Leclercq, i. 1029; Smith and Wace, "Christian Biography," art. Eustathius.)

GAUDETE SUNDAY. The third Sunday of Advent, so called from the first word of the Introit, Gaudete, "rejoice." On this day cardinals are required to wear pale-rose dresses, and the organ and flowers, forbidden on the other Sundays of Advent, are permitted. Rose-coloured vestments are used at high Mass, and the deacon and subdeacon wear the dalmatic and tunicle. (Martène.)

GENERAL (of an Order). From the foundation of the orders of friars it became usual for religious orders and congregations of men to be under the rule of a general superior, usually elected in general chapter for three years, or some other fixed term. In the Society of Jesus the general is elected for life. In the Benedictine order a precedency of rank is accorded to the abbot of Monte Cassino, who is styled "Abbas abbatum," and there is an Abbot Primate at Rome. [See ABBOT.] Most, if not all, of the congregations that have sprung from the Benedictine order, or grown up within it (e.g. the orders of Cluny and Cîteaux, and the congregation of St. Maur), have established generalates. In such cases the general has been usually the abbot of the mother house, as at Cluny; hence the title "Abbas generalis."

The prelates of regular orders enjoy special powers and privileges. A general has ordinary spiritual jurisdiction over his subjects in utroque foro. Generals and provincials have the same power of absolution in reserved cases, in relation to their subjects, which bishops have in relation to their diocesans. Generals can reserve to themselves eleven cases (specified in the decree of Clement VIII., 1593), but not more, without the consent of the chapter general. Although neither abbots nor superiors of orders were summoned to the first six general councils, yet from the date of the seventh onwards, exemptions from episcopal control having been freely granted to religious orders by the Holy See, the custom was gradually established that not only abbots with quasi-episcopal jurisdiction, but also the generals of orders, "should be present at a general synod as judges, and subscribe its decrees, having a decisive vote, and the right of defining."[1] Seven generals of religious orders subscribed the decrees of Trent, and a much larger number attended the Vatican Council.

These powers and privileges of regular prelates are shared in part by the Superiors General of regular and secular clerks, such as the Theatines, Barnabites, Redemptorists, Passionists, &c. Several modern congregations of women have also general superiors, but their canonical position is of course quite different.

Generals are forbidden by the law to enter without necessity the convents of nuns subject to them; their visitations of such convents are, as a rule, to be made not oftener than once a year. Nor can they hear the confessions of such nuns without the approbation of the bishop. Nor can they, on pain of excommunication, grant any office or dignity, or remit any punishment, to one of their subjects at the instance of any person outside the order, whatever the rank of that person may be.

(Ferraris, Regularis Praelatus, Religiones Regulares; Tamburini, "De Jure Abbatum," Rome, 1629.)

GENERAL CONFESSION. A confession of sins committed by the penitent since Baptism, so far as they can be remembered. Such a confession is of course necessary in the case of those who have made no previous confession, or whose previous confessions have been invalid—e.g. because they wilfully concealed a mortal sin or were wanting in true and supernatural sorrow. It is advisable if the validity of the past confessions is very doubtful. But sometimes persons repeat in a general confession sins for which they have already received absolution, although there is no reason to consider this absolution invalid. Moral theologians and ascetical writers admit the utility of this practice in certain cases. Thus a person may reasonably desire to make such a confession in order to obtain direction when he proposes to enter on a new state of life; or, again, to acquire deeper humility and a better knowledge of himself. Hence it is common to make a general confession before first Communion, ordination, religious profession, &c. But the practice of frequently making general confessions leads to great loss of time, occasions scruples, and is strongly discouraged by spiritual authors and prudent confessors. (See the moral theologians in the treatise on the sacrament of Penance, e.g. Lehmkuhl, "Theol. Mor." ii. p. 251 sqq.; and the ascetical writers, e.g. St. Ignatius, "Spiritual Exercises," on General Confession and Communion.)

GENUFLEXION (the bending of the knee) is a natural sign of adoration or reverence. (Lk. xxii. 41; Acts ix. 40; Phil. ii. 10, &c.) It is frequently used in the ritual of the Church. Thus the faithful genuflect in passing before the tabernacle where the Blessed Sacrament is reserved; the priest repeatedly genuflects at Mass in adoration of the Eucharist, also at the mention of the Incarnation in the Creed, &c. Genuflexion is also made as a sign of profound respect before a bishop on certain occasions. A double genuflexion—i.e. one on both knees—is made on entering or leaving a church where the Blessed Sacrament is exposed.

The early Christians prayed standing on Sundays, and from Easter till Pentecost, and only bent the knee in sign of penance; hence a class of penitents were known as Genuflectentes. A relic of this penitential use of genuflection survives, according to Gavantus (P.I. tit. 16), in the practice enjoined by the rubric of genuflecting at the verse "Adjuva nos," in the Tract of Masses during Lent. (Leclercq, "Man. d'Archéologie Chrétienne"; Hefele-Leclercq, i. 618; Bergh in "Cath. Enc.")

GHOST. Among the ancient Greeks, Romans, and Germans, the belief in apparitions of departed spirits was widely spread. In the Old Testament there are many allusions to necromancers, who professed to summon up the spirits of the dead; possibly in 1 Kings xxviii. we have the account of a real apparition. Some of the Fathers (e.g. Justin and Origen) suppose that Samuel's ghost really did appear to Saul when he consulted the witch of Endor; others (e.g. Tertullian and Jerome) regard the supposed appearance of Samuel's spirit as a diabolical imposture. Many apparitions of saints after death are recorded in the history of the Church.

The theological principles on the matter are stated by St. Thomas, "Summ." Sup. q. 69, a. 3. According to the natural course of things, no soul can leave heaven or hell even for a time, or quit purgatory till its purification is completed. But God may permit departed souls to appear on earth for many wise reasons—e.g. that the saints may help men; that the sight of lost souls may warn them; that the spirits in purgatory may obtain prayers. St. Thomas even thinks that God has communicated to the saints a permanent power of appearing on earth when they please. [See VISION; SPIRITUALISM.]

GILBERTINES. [See SEMPRINGHAM, ORDER OF.]

GILDS, GUILDS (A.-S. gildan, to pay). The history of the word is obscure; in the Anglo-Saxon poems ascribed to Cædmon—Genesis and Daniel—gild or gyld is used in the sense of "sacrifice," and also of "idol." Among the Teutons of the north its original meaning is said to have been "sacrificial feast." [1] Yet so early as the time of Ina it is used in one of three allied senses attached to it by Christian civilization—namely, that of a society of contributing members associated for mutual help and assurance. By the laws of Ina, no were, or compensation for blood, was due to the guildsmen (gegyldan) of a stranger whom some one might have slain in the honest belief that he was a robber. [2] At a later period we meet with these Frith-gilds under the names of Frith-borg and Frank-pledge, when their relation to the existing system of public justice, and responsibility for the good conduct of their members, is the single point in their association considered. The passages in the Laws of Ina which mention gegyldan, if carefully weighed, seem to point to a general system of association for the exacting and payment of were-gilds due from or in respect of any of the members, which was probably common to all Teutonic communities, and dated back to the times of paganism. The conjuratores of the Salic and Ripuarian laws may be regarded as the Frankish equivalent to the gegyldan of Ina. [3] On this ancient foundation were grafted the religious rites and kindly customs, gradually developed in a hundred beautiful ways, of the mediaeval gilds, which in no country of Europe flourished so much as in England.

The geldoniae or confratriae of the Carolingian times [CONFRATERNITY] were gilds to all intents and purposes, but the imperial legislation discountenanced them, and their precise rules and constitution are little known. The first extant charter of a gild is that by which, in the reign of Canute, Orcy gives the guild-hall (gegyld-healle) at Abbotsbury in Dorset, "for God's love and St. Peter's," to the gyldscipe of the place. [4] Every gildsman (gegylda) was to pay annually, three days before St. Peter's Mass, one penny, or a pennyworth of wax. On the eve of the feast every two gildsmen were to bring one large loaf, well sifted and raised, for the common almsgiving. Five weeks before the same festival each member had to bring a measure of clean wheat, and within three days afterwards a load of wood. On the death of any member, each of his fellows was to pay "one penny at the corpse for the soul." These were the "Mass-pence," of which we hear so much in later times. Other rules provided for an annual feast, for almsgiving, the nursing of sick members, the decent burial of the dead, &c. The ends of the gild appear here to be purely religious and social; yet, in the somewhat later charter of a Cambridge gild, the old principle of mutual assurance against crime and its penalties receives marked illustration. Gradually this feature disappears, and the gild assumes the aspect of "a voluntary association of those living near together, who joined for a common purpose, paying contributions, worshipping together, feasting together periodically, helping one another in sickness and poverty, and frequently united for the pursuit of a special object," [1] usually a religious one. These objects the gilds continued to promote down to the Reformation, when they were destroyed and plundered.[2]

The Frith Gilds, as we have seen, came first; out of them grew what some have called the Religious, some the Social gilds. In Norfolk alone there were 909 gilds of this class. Out of these proceeded in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries the Trade Gilds, divided into Gild-merchants and Craft-Gilds.

Every gild had its distinct livery; hence the name of the "Livery Companies" of London. Five of the Canterbury pilgrims, the Haberdasher, Carpenter, Weaver, &c., are described as—> clothed in oo [one] lyveré

> Of a solempne and gret fraternite, or religious gild. The Craft-Gilds of a city would often combine together, and each undertake to represent one scene in a great religious drama or miracle-play. Hence came the "Chester Plays," written by Dan Randal of Chester Abbey, and exhibited by twenty-four trades or craft-gilds of the city.[3] (See the interesting volume "English Gilds," containing the original ordinances of more than a hundred of them, and edited by Mr. Toulmin Smith for the Early English Text Society [1870], with a preface by Dr. Luis Brentano; Rock, ii. 319 sqq.)

GIRDLE (cingulum, balteum, ζώνη). A cord with which the priest or other cleric binds his alb. It is the symbol of continence and self-restraint, as is said by Innocent III., and implied in the prayer which the priest about to celebrate Mass is directed to use while he ties the girdle round his waist. The Congregation of Rites (January 22, 1701) lays it down that the girdle should be of linen rather than of silk, though it may also be (S.R.C., December 23, 1862) of wool. Usually it is white, but the use of coloured girdles, varying with the colour of the vestments, is permitted (S.R.C., January 8, 1709).

As to the origin of the girdle, its use was common among Greeks and Romans in their daily life, and thence took its place, as a matter of course, among the liturgical vestments. It appears to have been employed at the outset merely for the sake of convenience, first by ministering deacons, later by priests and bishops. Hence at ordinations it is not given as part of the liturgical apparel, nor is it worn over the shortened alb which we know as a surplice or cotta. It is not till the beginning of the Middle Ages that we meet with liturgical girdles richly adorned. Anastasius, in the ninth century, mentions muraenulae—i.e. jewelled girdles in the shape of lampreys or eels. We also read of girdles variegated with gold, and of others (zonae literatae) with letters or words woven in. The Greek girdle is shorter and broader than ours, and often richly adorned. (See Benedict XIV. "De Miss."; Le Brun; Hefele, "Beiträge"; Braun, "Die Liturgische Gewandung," p. 101; Rock, i. 399.)

GLEBE (gleba). Land permanently devoted to the sustentation of the incumbent of a particular parish. The word gleba is used for a farm or estate in the Theodosian code. In the body of the canon law it means the land which, along with a house, constituted the ecclesiastical mansus of right appertaining to a benefice. Mediaeval charters present many instances of this use of the word; thus Simon Islip, archbishop of Canterbury, in a charter dated about 1360, says "Item habebit vicarius duas acras terrae arabilis de dote sibi de gleba ipsius ecclesiae juxta ipsam ecclesiam jacentes" (The vicar shall have as his endowment two acres of arable land adjoining the church, out of the glebe of the church itself).[1] The fee-simple of a glebe was in abeyance; the freehold was in the incumbent. A glebe could not be alienated without the bishop's permission. The canon law recognizes only four justifying causes for such alienation—(1) necessity, as when the church is overburdened with debt; (2) an opening for an advantageous exchange; (3) to redeem captives or feed the poor in time of famine; (4) incommodity—e.g. when the land is so far off that its produce cannot be gathered without great expense. (Ferraris, Alienatio; Phillimore, "Ecclesiastical Law.")

[2] Mr. Toulmin Smith, who looks with indulgence on the dissolution of the monasteries, is indignant at the spoliation of these lay institutions: "a case of pure wholesale robbery and plunder; . . . no page so black in English history," &c. &c.—Eng. Gilds, p. xlii.

GLORY. [See Beatific Vision.]

GLOSSA ORDINARIA and INTERLINEARIS. Originally the word "gloss" (γλῶσσα) was used—e.g. by Aristotle—to signify a hard word in the text of an author, the explanation being called glossema (γλώσσημα). However, as early at least as Quintilian, we find the difficult word called "glossema," and the interpretation of it "gloss," and the latter use continued during the Middle Ages, and has passed into the languages of modern Europe. A Glossarium was distinguished from an ordinary lexicon by the fact that it contained only the difficult words of the language. Hesychius, an Alexandrian grammarian of the fourth century, published such a Glossarium, though he calls it a lexicon in the preface. The glosses which illustrate the language of Scripture were collected by Ernesti from the works of Hesychius, Suidas (an author otherwise unknown, of the tenth century), Phavorinus (an Italian Benedictine, died 1537, a pupil of the Greek Lascaris), as well as from the "Etymologicum Magnum" (a work compiled by an unknown author of the eleventh century), and published at Leipzig in 1785–6 under the title "Glossae Sacrae Hesychii," &c.

There are two celebrated Glosses on the Vulgate. The former is the "Glossa Ordinaria," by Walafrid Strabo, a German born in 807. He had some knowledge of Greek and made use of many patristic authors, especially of Origen, Augustine, Jerome, Ambrose, Gregory the Great, Isidore of Seville, Bede, Alcuin, Rabanus Maurus, &c. His object is to give the literal meaning, though he adds sometimes the mystical, and here and there the moral, sense. This Gloss is quoted as a high authority by St. Thomas and other schoolmen, and it was known as "the Tongue of Holy Scripture." Indeed, from the ninth to the seventeenth century it was the favourite commentary on the Bible. The "Postillae" of Nicolas of Lyra (died 1340) and the "Additiones" of Paulus Burgensis were merely appended to it.

The second Gloss, the "Interlinearis," by Anselm, Scholasticus and dean of Laon (died 1117), derived its name from being written over the words in the Vulgate text. Anselm had some acquaintance with Hebrew, as well as with Greek, and his Gloss also had a great reputation. Very often the "Glossa ordinaria" was inserted in the margin, at the top and at the sides; the Gloss of Anselm was placed between the lines of the Vulgate; while from the fourteenth century onwards the "Postillae" of Nicolas of Lyra and the "Additiones" of Paulus Burgensis were placed at the foot of each page. A fine edition of the Vulgate, "cum glossis, interlineari et ordinaria, Nic. Lyrani postillis et moralitatibus, Burgensis additionibus et Thuringi replicis," was printed at Venice in 1588. The Douay theologians published an improved edition in 1617. The last and best is that edited by the Benedictine Leander a Sto. Martino, Antwerp, 1634. Each of these three editions is in six folio volumes.

GLOSSATOR (a barbarous word formed from the Greek γλῶσσα, tongue). The writer of a "Gloss" or explicative commentary on the text of some authoritative document, legal or theological. The early gloss-writers only pretended to clear up difficulties connected with the words used, not those of the subject-matter.

On the writers of glosses on the Vulgate see Glossa Ordinaria. In the twelfth century a school of interpreters of the Roman or civil law [Civil Law] arose at Bologna. The first of these, Irnerius, was a native of that city; besides lecturing on jurisprudence, about 1120 he enriched the law books which he used with a gloss, or short running interpretation. Many other jurists took up the same business of glossing the Roman law, an occupation thoroughly practical and useful in an age when politics and trade and every sort of civic activity flourished among the free Italian commonwealths. In the next century the celebrated Accursius, or Accorso, who, though a native of Florence, taught in the university of Bologna, selecting from among the glossers those whose works he thought most suitable for his purpose, compiled his great "Corpus Juris Glossatum," in which, with great acuteness and extraordinary acquaintance with the whole body of Justinian law, he labours to solve difficulties and reconcile apparent inconsistencies. Accursius died in 1260. "His great compilation," says Hallam, "made an epoch in the annals of jurisprudence. It put an end in great measure to the oral explanations of lecturers, which had prevailed before. It restrained at the same time the ingenuity of interpretation. The glossers became the sole authorities, so that it grew into a maxim—No one can go wrong who follows a gloss; and some said a gloss was worth a hundred texts." Yet the writings of Accursius and his forerunners are full of ridiculous philological and historical blunders (such as deriving "Tiber" from "Tiberius," supposing that Justinian lived before Christ, &c.), which, though they have little to do with their value as jurists, appear to have been the cause why, after the revival of learning, they were so much discredited. In the fourteenth century, Bartolus and Paul of Castro rose to eminence as leaders among the "scholastic jurists"; they were thinkers of great power, who invented innumerable distinctions, and imagined and solved every sort of case which the law-text suggested.

After the publication of the "Decretum" of Gratian, gloss-writers began to deal with the canon law as they had with the civil, the great object always being to make it consistent with itself, and workable in the courts. The glosser Paucapalea gave his name to the well-known gloss or commentary called Palea. The Decretals were glossed, among others, by Sinibaldo Fieschi, afterwards Innocent IV. Andrea did the same service for the Sext, and Zabarella for the Clementines. Of all these early jurists and their writings, a connected account was given by Pancirolo († 1599) in his "De Claris Juris Interpretibus." (Hallam, "Lit. of Europe," part i. ch. i.)

GLOVES (CHIROTHECAE). A bishop's gloves are blessed and put on his hands at his consecration by the consecrator. Episcopal gloves are mentioned by Hugo of St. Victor, Honorius of Autun ("Gemma Animae," i. 215), and Innocent III. In a monument of the tenth century, the "Missa Vetus ex Codice Ratoldi," the rubric after the bishop has washed his hands says: "Tunc ministrentur ei manicae . . . postea detur annulus in dextra manu desuper manica" (PL, lxxviii. 241). And in an "Ordo Sacramentorum" there is a prayer to be said by the bishop whilst drawing on his gloves (Martène, t. i. c. iv. a. 12). Though there is no positive mention of gloves in our Anglo-Saxon evidences there can be little doubt that they were in use among the A.S. hierarchy. After St. Osmund's time we have abundant proof of their use. In the Eastern liturgies gloves are never used. In the West they are worn only at pontifical High Mass, and are removed at the washing of the hands at the Offertory. They would seem to have been introduced for the purpose of ornament rather than for practical considerations of warmth or cleanliness. (Rock, ii. 132; Braun, "Die Liturgische Gewandung," 359 sqq.)

GNOSTICISM (γνῶσις) is a name given to the doctrine held by a large number of sects which flourished towards the close of the first and during the whole of the second century after Christ. These bodies differed from each other in many important respects, but the words "Gnostic" and "Gnosticism" indicate the common characteristic which united them in a certain sense to each other, and mark the common principle of their opposition to the Catholic Church. In itself, of course, γνῶσις, or Gnosticism, means no more than "knowledge"; but even in the Epistles of St. Paul (1 Cor. xii. 8, xiv. 6) it begins to acquire a technical significance, and implies a peculiar insight into the depths of Christian doctrine. St. Clement of Rome (1 Ep. 36 and 40, PG, i. 280, 288), the author of the Epistle ascribed to St. Barnabas (c. 2, PG, ii. 729), and St. Justin Martyr ("Dial. c. Tryph." c. 112, PG, vi. 733), use γνῶσις to describe the gift of understanding the Old Testament typology; and of these the Epistle of Barnabas expressly distinguishes between faith and "knowledge." It is the object of the letter to assist Christians in adding to "faith perfect knowledge (γνῶσιν)." Clement of Alexandria gives the word γνῶσις or knowledge, and its derivative γνωστικὸς, or Gnostic, a still more special and technical meaning. The greatest of his extant works is meant to show that a Christian may do more than believe and keep the Commandments. Beyond the "ordinary faith," he says, we may reach by instruction and the perfect observance of God's law a knowledge [1] which is "the perfection of man as man." [2] The "Gnostic" is his ideal Christian. He is free from the disturbance of passion,[3] contemplates divine things,[4] knows truth with a peculiar accuracy,[5] and can "demonstrate" the things received by faith.[6] He can penetrate the hidden meanings of Scripture,[7] and use all sciences as a means of raising his mind to God. He uses learning as a means of confuting error, and conveying to others exact notions of the truth.[8] He is the champion of "truth and orthodox knowledge," [9] to which faith is as needful as air to natural life,[10] and which is never separate from the practice of Christian virtue.[11]

So far, it is plain, the esteem for superior knowledge is consistent with a loyal adherence to Christianity; it was the fruit of reason exercising itself on the things of faith, and it grew, as a matter of course, with the growth and progress of the Church. But this holds good only of the knowledge which starts with an acceptance of revealed truth. The spirit of speculative inquiry may strike into another path. Reason may set itself above faith; it may criticize and alter the contents of revelation, till it comes to look on faith as a gift for the simple, with which a man of cultivated mind may dispense. This was the line which heathen philosophers had taken with the popular mythology: they were far from denying that it contained some measure of truth; nay, they thought it necessary for the multitude, who were unable to receive truth in its pure and philosophic form. Now, the allegorical method of interpretation which was associated to some extent with this superior knowledge among Christians was very apt to be perverted till it led to a false and heretical assumption of knowledge. It was by this very method that the philosophers had refined the gross notions of popular heathenism. Philo, at the beginning of the Christian era, had chosen the same expedient for adapting Judaism to Greek philosophy. Even in the "Epistle of Barnabas" we may discover the germs of this dangerous tendency, for the author, not content with giving a typical sense to the ceremonial precepts of the old law, denies that they ever bound in their literal meaning at all.[1]

Only one step was wanting to turn this "higher knowledge" into the formal principle of heresy. Let the allegorical interpretation be applied to the New Testament, and let its literal sense be put aside as false or worthless, and then, under the plea of higher knowledge, Christianity might be changed at will. A man had but to suppose himself possessed of this higher gift, and then, on the plea of allegorizing, he might explain away every fact and doctrine in the traditional belief. Nor need he even trouble himself about explaining it away. He might, in the confidence of his insight into higher truth, distinguish between elements of truth and falsehood in the received doctrine; he might mutilate the text of the Gospels; he might mix tenets borrowed from the heathen philosophy or religions with Christianity; he might end by treating the moral law as he had treated Christian doctrine, and invent a new code of ethics. All this he might do, and all this the Gnostics actually did. In fact, when the way was once opened, the motives for pressing into it were strong enough. The age of the Gnostics was eager for novelties in religion, and addicted to fantastic superstitions. It was the fashion of the time to mingle philosophy, mythology, and magic. There was the more inducement to amend Christianity by the introduction of foreign elements, because, while it showed a life and power to which neither philosophy nor heathenism could pretend, its teaching on creation out of nothing, on the resurrection of the body, on salvation through the sufferings and death of Christ the Son of God, ran counter to every prejudice of the heathen world. There was not a sect among all the countless sects of Gnosticism which did not deny each one of these doctrines. Above all, the central idea of Gnosticism made it welcome to many who were half-converted from heathenism. It was a knowledge superior to and independent of faith. Faith was for the multitude, knowledge for the few. The aristocratic instinct which was the very soul of Greek and Roman culture revolted at the authority of a Church which imposed the same belief on all, and exacted the same submission from the philosopher and the barbarian slave. In a system of compromise, like Gnosticism, it escaped from this ignominy.

Such, then, was the nature of Gnosticism. It was a false knowledge which threw off the trammels of faith and ecclesiastical authority. It subjected everything, as St. Irenaeus[2] declares, to the caprice of the individual, and made any fixed rule of faith impossible. It "abandoned the faith which the Church proclaimed, and cavilled at the simplicity of the holy presbyters."[1] It destroyed, as Clement puts it, the efficacy of Baptism[3] —that is, it set at naught faith, the gift conferred in that sacrament. The Gnostic professed to impart a knowledge "greater and deeper"[3] than the ordinary doctrine of Christians, a knowledge which forgot the limits of reason and scorned to believe what it could not understand.[4] This knowledge, to those who were capable of it, was the means of redemption; indeed, in most of the Gnostic systems it was the one and sufficient passport to perfect bliss.[5] It is, however, important to observe that Gnosticism was not a philosophy. True, it was as unfettered and unstable as any philosophy could be, and it addressed itself to the same kind of questions. But it kept the semblance of Christianity, for in nearly all the Gnostic systems Christ occupied a central place, and, as a rule, Gnosticism answered the speculative questions which it raised, not in the abstract language of metaphysics, but by the invention of an elaborate mythology. Without its Christian elements, it could not have entered into such close conflict with the Church; without its mythological garb, it would have missed the popularity which made it dangerous.

It was in the East that Gnosticism began, and in its rudimentary form it appears very early in the history of the Church. The Fathers in the latter half of the second century speak of Simon Magus as the first Gnostic. Both Simon and his successor, Menander, were Samaritans;[6] while Saturninus, the disciple of the latter, taught at Antioch in the time of Hadrian (117–138).[7] All three taught that the world was made by inferior powers more or less in antagonism with the supreme God. Either the highest God, or else some aeon (a name the Gnostics gave the spiritual beings who play so large a part in their systems), appeared on the earth in the person of Christ and redeemed man by the "knowledge" He gave from the dominion of matter and of the angels who ruled the world. Menander, however, made important contributions to the development of Gnosticism. He was at least more emphatic than his predecessors in denying that Christ took a real body or degraded Himself by contact with the impurity of matter. Further, he maintained that the angels had made two kinds of men, our Saviour having come that He might overcome the evil men and the demons who helped them, and might save the good.[1]

There were two other forms which Gnosticism assumed while still on Asiatic soil. Whereas Simon Magus attributed the Hebrew prophecies to the inspiration of the same lower powers which had made the world, and Saturninus held that the Saviour descended to destroy the god of the Jews; yet Cerinthus, a contemporary of St. John the Evangelist, and the Gnostics who are denounced in the Ignatian Epistles, united a leaning to Judaism with their Gnostic speculations. With strange inconsistency they advocated Jewish rites and denied the fundamental doctrine of Judaism—viz. the unity of God.[2] Besides those Judaizing Gnostics, we find a cluster of Oriental sects known as Ophites, or worshippers of the serpent. They betray their Eastern origin by the use they make of Chaldee names, and it is generally supposed that they represent one of the oldest varieties of Gnosticism. To them belonged the Naasseni (from the Hebrew word for serpent), the first of those "who dared to celebrate with hymns the serpent which was the cause of transgression," and boasted that they "knew the depth" of truth: [3] the Peratae, who professed to impart the secret by which the initiated could "pass through the corruption" of matter.[4] If we inquire what was meant by this mysterious knowledge, we find Judaism, Christianity, and heathenism mixed together in the wildest confusion. They held that an aeon descended on Jesus and made Him the prophet of the truth. But they also appealed to Moses, Hercules, Homer, Orpheus, Linus, to astrology and to heathen mysteries.[5] Probably Baur is right in regarding the Ophitic doctrine as a mere phase of Oriental heathenism, which ranks as a heresy only because it adopted some Christian terms.[6]

In Origen's time scarcely thirty of Simon's sect were left,[7] and we hear little from early writers about Menander, Cerinthus, or Saturninus. But in Alexandria the Gnostic tendencies gathered life and strength. There Gnosticism learned to clothe the ideas of Greek philosophy in a religious garb; there it formed its elaborate aeon systems—partly Christian, partly Platonic, partly mythological. Basilides was the first of the great Alexandrian Gnostics. He had been a companion of Saturninus in Syria,[8] but it was in Alexandria that he began his public life, and the Basilidians were largely indebted to the schools of Greek philosophy in that city. By comparing the original teaching of Basilides, as given by Irenaeus, with the later development of his doctrine as reported in the "Philosophumena," we can note the increasing influence which the physical theories of the Stoics exercised on the Basilidians.[1] The Alexandrian Valentinus made a fusion of Christianity with Platonism, much as the Neo-Platonists united the latter with heathenism. Valentinus went to Rome about 141 and stayed there till 157. He had numerous disciples, who formed two great divisions of Valentinianism, known as the Eastern and Western. Many of his followers could boast of fame and influence: one of them, indeed, Heracleon, will be remembered while history lasts, for he wrote the first commentary on St. John's Gospel. Evidently St. Irenaeus considered Valentinianism the most formidable heresy of the day.

The Valentinians set out from the Platonic principle that the ideal or heavenly world—the "Pleroma," as they called it—alone possesses reality. God dwelt for countless ages alone with His thought (Ennoea), then after long silence produced two aeons, who became the parents of others. Just as Plato pictures the supreme God as dwelling in eternity with the ideas or archetypes of things ever present to Him, so the Valentinians peopled their celestial world with a long series of aeons, which are the Platonic "ideas" [2] translated into the language of mythology. The aeons are arranged on the Pythagorean and Platonic principles that certain numbers have a mystic efficacy. Some of the names given to them were suggested by the Catholic doctrine of the Trinity or by the divine attributes; others, such as "man," "the church," &c., point to the theory, also Platonic, that things below are shadows cast from a higher world.

So much for the nature of God and the aeon world. But how did the material world with its attendant evils come to be? It could not, of course, on Valentinian principles, be attributed to the supreme God. They supposed that the aeons were less perfect the further they were removed in the long line of generation from the Father of all. The lowest of them was overcome by desire to comprehend God, and by this fruitless desire gave birth to another aeon, Hachamoth (חָכְמוֹת—i.e. wisdom), who wandered outside the aeon world in helpless misery. Higher aeons freed her from her sufferings, and these sufferings thickened into matter, and out of this pre-existent matter men and things were moulded by the demiurge, the "God of this world." This demiurge (here, again, we have both a notion and a name borrowed from Plato) was the God of the Jewish religion, a being imperfect, ignorant, and, indeed, incapable of spiritual ideas. Of men some were earthly (χοϊκοὶ), made from the worse kind of matter, and necessitated to evil. Others were "animal" (ψυχικοὶ), capable of receiving the ordinary Jewish or Christian religion. They were endowed with free will, and would obtain a partial happiness hereafter if they led virtuous lives. But there was a third class, of "spiritual" men, in whom there were certain germs which had fallen from the aeon world. They were destined, whatever their actions might be, to enter the higher world, but meantime they were enslaved by the demiurge and by matter. An aeon, called Christ, clothed Himself in a body which looked like ours, and communicated to these aeons the "knowledge" of their higher destiny, teaching them to slight the god of this world and his law. The Valentinians held that it was not deeds, but the possession of a spiritual nature, which led to the higher world, and they made little account of Christ's death. Some of them held that only the body which He had formed for Himself could suffer; others, that Christ had descended on a man, Jesus, and abandoned Him at the crucifixion.[1]

Another Gnostic, Marcion as great as Valentinus, came to Rome a little later and made great changes in Gnosticism. He surrendered the fantastic aeon-systems,[2] but, on the other hand, he represented the demiurge god of this world as actually cruel and wicked.[3] He showed the bitterest hostility to the Old Testament, and in the New admitted only ten Epistles of Paul and the single Gospel of Luke, mutilating even these books and interpolating passages according to the requirements of his theory.[4] Marcion gave greater prominence than the Valentinians to moral ideas and to the death of Christ,[5] and apparently did not make salvation depend on an original difference in the natures of men.

In the preceding sketch an attempt has been made to note the principal features of Gnosticism; and though the division adopted —viz. into the Oriental Gnostics, the philosophical Gnostics of Alexandria, and the Marcionite Gnostics with their more practical and Christian religion, which presents many points of contact with modern Protestantism[6] —is not altogether satisfactory, it is perhaps as simple as any other which has been proposed. Some of the Gnostics were led by their belief in the impurity of matter to asceticism, others to unbridled licence; but we cannot classify the Gnostics on this principle, for we find the two opposite tendencies appearing in the same sect. At least we know that while Basilides respected the moral law, the Basilidians set it at naught.[1]

After Marcion the development of Gnosticism came to an end, though the heresy held its ground more or less for centuries, and the like tendencies reappear in the Manichees and in the Manichaean heretics of the Middle Ages. But Gnosticism has left an enduring mark on the history of the Church. It was in opposition to this heresy that Irenaeus wrote the earliest treatise which we possess on Catholic dogma. It was the conflict with this heresy from which the need arose of formulating with greater precision and stating with greater fulness the Catholic doctrines on the Incarnation, on the sacraments, and above all on the authority of the teaching Church. The Arian heresy itself did not produce a greater crisis in the Church's history, or contribute more to the development of Catholic doctrine.

(This account of Gnosticism has been made with some care from the sources, of which Irenaeus and the "Philosophumena" are the chief. But great use has also been made of Massuet's dissertations "De Gnosticorum Rebus"; Neander in the last edition of his "Church History"; Möhler's essays collected by Döllinger, 1839; Baur, "Christliche Gnosis," 1835, and "Kirchengeschichte der drei ersten Jahrhunderte," 3rd ed., 1863; Lipsius, "Gnosticismus," 1860; see also Arendzen in "Cath. Enc."; Duchesne, "Hist. Ancienne de l'Église," i. ch. xi. and in DAp. In the article MODERNISM the resemblance between the ancient Gnosticism and the modern heresy is pointed out.)

GOANESE SCHISM. [See MISSIONS TO THE HEATHEN, p. 592.]

GOD. In the Apostles' and in the Nicene Creed we begin by professing our belief in one God, Creator of heaven and earth, and the Fourth Lateran Council explains more fully what we know by reason and revelation of His nature and attributes. The Vatican Council, although to a great extent it merely reiterates the Lateran definition, adds at least two important truths concerning God's relation to us and ours to Him. For, after stating that there is one true and living God, Creator and Lord of heaven and earth, almighty, eternal, immense, incomprehensible, infinite in intellect and will and in every perfection, concerning Whom, seeing that He is one, singular, altogether simple and unchangeable spiritual substance, we must assert that He is in reality and essence distinct from the world, most blessed in Himself and of Himself, and infinitely exalted above all that is or can be thought of besides Himself,—the council adds that God "by His most free counsel," constrained by no necessity of any kind, created the world; and then, in the next chapter, that we can, by the natural light of reason, and from the consideration of created things, attain a "sure" knowledge of God, Who is the beginning and end of all. It is the object of this article to explain the Vatican definition, and to show its perfect consistency with reason and with the previous teaching of theologians. It is obvious that we cannot attempt, in the space at our command, anything like a full and philosophical treatment of the subject, or even try to explain many of the difficulties which are often urged. The utmost which we hope to do consists in indicating the general line which Catholic philosophers and theologians have taken in proving the existence of God, and treating of His attributes.

We begin with a definition sufficient to explain the sense we give to the word "God," and which would be accepted probably both by theists and atheists, at least in civilized countries. By "God" we understand the one absolutely and infinitely perfect spirit who is the creator of all; and, taking this definition for granted, we proceed to state the following propositions:

I. It is certain from mere reason, apart from revelation, that God exists; and this may be proved, according to the council, from a consideration of created things. "His invisible things," St. Paul says (Rom. i. 20), "from the creation of the world, are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made. His eternal power also and divinity: so that they" (i.e. the heathen, who did not believe in the true God) "are inexcusable." Everyone knows the popular form in which the argument is put, and has been put from the time of the Fathers of the Church. There are, it is said, plain marks in the mechanism of created things which show that they are the work of an intelligent being. The laws, for example, which govern the physical world must come from an intelligence of some kind, for they display a high degree of wisdom united to immense power. Plainly this intelligence does not reside in the things themselves. The world, therefore, was created and is supported and governed by an intelligent being whom we call God. Nor does there seem to be any valid answer to this argument. True, there are many things in the world which are not, so far as we can see, arranged to wise ends, and others which even seem to contradict the supposition that they come from a wise and benevolent Creator. All this may be admitted, but it cannot do away with the fact that we do on every side discern unmistakable traces of intelligent design. When these traces abound, it is not only humility but common sense which prompts us to acknowledge a wise Creator and to believe that all is created for a good end, though in many cases our ignorance prevents us from discerning it. A man who does not understand the mechanism of an engine is still within his rights when he concludes that it is due to an intelligence possessed of understanding which he himself lacks, and would most certainly transgress the plainest rules of common sense if he attributed all the parts of the machinery which he could not understand to mere chance, or, again, to a want of knowledge or power on the part of the constructor. Accordingly, we may fairly conclude that the argument from design will always keep its place among the proofs of God's existence. It has the great advantage of being easily grasped, and no valid objection can be urged against it.

While, however, St. Thomas gives this argument, he places it last among the five which he adduces at the beginning of the "Summa," 1ª, q. 2: "Cont. Gentes," I. xiii., and though it is the most popular it does not seem the most cogent. His other arguments are more metaphysical and subtle, but they have the advantage of leading the mind more directly and more conclusively to the belief in an absolutely perfect Being. His first argument is from motion, and it assumes no more than the patent fact that movement exists. Whence does it come? Not simply from the things themselves, for nothing can in the same respect be at once the cause and the subject of motion. Motion implies passivity: in other words, the thing moved must be under the influence of some thing distinct from itself which causes the movement or change. Life offers no instance to the contrary, for though, no doubt, we say, and rightly, that living things have the cause of motion in themselves, this only means that one part in living organisms communicates movements to other parts. The heart sends the blood through the frame, but the heart itself receives the first impulse from the parent to whom life is due. Nor are even intellectual beings the independent cause of their own movements. The will is influenced by the thoughts, the mind cannot think unless objects are proposed or have been originally proposed to it from without. Hence, even if we assume an infinite series of created things, still, so long as they all are subject to motion and change, this motion and change calls for explanation, and we are forced to the belief (a sublime one, truly) of a first mover, Himself immovable, of a Being who is at once the perfection of activity and life and the perfection of rest, the cause of movement and change, while He Himself changes not.

In modern scientific language St. Thomas's principle is evidently that known as Newton's First Law of Motion: "Every body continues in a state of rest or of uniform motion in a straight line, unless it be compelled by impressed forces to change that state." In other words, any beginning, ceasing or change of motion in a material entity postulates the existence and action of a cause external to itself. To the current objection that all bodies move of themselves by gravitation one towards the other independent of the action of any external cause, it may suffice here to reply that they so move in virtue of the external force which placed them at a distance the one from the other.

The second proof is taken from the activity, as the former from the passivity, of things. Certain causes in the world produce certain effects, and we find these causes existing in a regular series or order. Causes are themselves the effects of other causes; the parent is the cause of his child's being, and, he himself owes his being to his own parents. Here again, if we prolong the series to infinity, we cannot escape from the conclusion that there is a God. Even in such a series, there is no cause which is not itself the effect of another cause—which does not require a cause outside of itself as the origin of its being. No explanation can be devised except that of a first cause, who is Himself uncaused.

The third argument is drawn from the contingency of things. Existence does not belong to the essence of things; they are not in their own nature determined to be, for most of them fade and die: of all of them it may be said, once they did not exist. Besides, then, the series of contingent entities (and here again we may, without prejudice to the argument, multiply the series to infinity) there is a necessary and absolute being.

We cannot do justice in the space at our command to the fourth argument of St. Thomas, taken "ex gradibus bonitatis"—i.e. from the degrees of perfection in things. It is perhaps the most subtle and difficult of all, and the commentators are not agreed about its meaning. The following account, however, may be given as the substance of the reasoning. We find by observation that creatures are more or less wise, noble, good, and the like. These qualities do not belong to their essence, for if so, there could be no question of more or less. Socrates and Plato were both men: humanity constituted their nature, and in the strict sense neither could be more truly and perfectly a man than the other, since the definition of man may be predicated of each. The very fact, then, that one man or angel is more wise, noble, powerful than another proves that wisdom, nobility, power, do not belong to the human or angelic natures as such or in themselves. As they are not wise, &c., in themselves, or in virtue of their mere existence, their perfection must come to them from without, and we end with the idea of a Being absolutely and perfectly wise, holy, strong, &c., because wisdom, holiness and strength are in Him more than mere attributes—are, in short, identical with His nature. Thus St. John says, not merely that God is charitable or loving, but that He is charity. Such a statement is untrue of any being except God. Summed up, the four arguments urge that finite being cannot explain its own definite limitations.

This argument involves the cogent proof drawn from the definite quantity of existing matter in the Universe, which in no conceivable manner can be either increased or diminished. Theoretically the masses of sun, moon, earth and stars could be weighed and the amount in myriads of tons expressed mathematically. The reason why the total is just what it is, not an ounce more nor an ounce less, cannot be in the mass itself but must perforce be as Scripture teaches, because an external agent has "ordered all things in measure and number and weight" (Wisd. xi. 16).

St. Thomas's fifth argument, viz. from design, has been already stated.

The reader will find another from conscience—i.e. from the fact attested by experience, that man has by nature a sense of right and wrong altogether distinct from the knowledge that certain actions are hurtful to others, hurtful to or unworthy of himself, drawn out with surpassing genius by Cardinal Newman, in his "Grammar of Assent." This argument has the advantage of leading us more directly than any of those given from St. Thomas to a true conception of God's character as a just, holy, and merciful God (cf. Rom. ii. 14–16).

Such are the chief arguments by which Catholic theologians prove God's existence. But are any arguments necessary? Have we not an intuitive perception of God's existence? Or again, can we not be sure of His existence the moment we understand the meaning which the word "God" is intended to convey? The great majority of theologians answer this question in the negative. St. Thomas holds that the mode of cognition corresponds to the nature of him who knows. Our soul, he says, informs a material body. By nature, therefore, it can only know directly things which are themselves, partly at least, material. It recognizes the existence of purely spiritual beings only by a process of inference. But instead of explaining and developing this Thomist (or rather Aristotelian principle), we will take the simpler course of pointing out the flaw in the reasoning of those who have advocated the theory that the knowledge of God's existence is self-evident, or, as the thesis is often formulated, can be proved a priori. St. Anselm, who has been followed in modern times by Descartes, began with the assumption that all men, theists and atheists alike, understand the name of God to denote the most perfect being that can be conceived, and so far we may allow that he was right. When, however, he goes on to argue that the idea of the utmost perfection implies existence, he confuses, as St. Thomas justly objects, between the real and the imaginary. The mere fact that we can form a notion of a being the most perfect that can be conceived cannot prove that such being has existence except in our imagination. Nor have the attempts of ontologists in our own day to show that the belief in God is intuitive been more successful. We begin, they say, with the notion of being, and this notion of existence, without which we can understand nothing, is nothing else than the divinity. The obvious answer is, that although we do begin with the vague and abstract notion of existence, the existence which we predicate of the things around is wholly distinct from the self-existent and all-perfect spirit whom we call God. In 1861 the Roman Inquisition decided that ontologism as it has just been expounded could not be "safely taught" ("tuto tradi").

II. The Nature of God.—All human conceptions of God's nature are of course imperfect; still, since reason enables us to ascertain God's existence, it also enables us to know something of His nature.[1] We learn what God is, partly by removing from the idea we form of Him all perfections which belong to creatures, partly by attributing to Him, in a more excellent form, all the perfection we find in them. The schoolmen set out with the notion of God as "pure actuality," which notion is immediately derived from the proof given for the divine existence. Creatures have potentiality, or the power of becoming what they are not, in different modes and degrees. There was a time when they were not, and merely had the capacity of existence: once existing, they are capable of further perfections, which determine their nature; and again, they are subject to the possibility of falling away from the perfection of their nature, or of ceasing to exist altogether. All these capacities are expressed by the Aristotelian word "potentia," which is opposed to "actus," or actuality. Now because capacity can be reduced to act only by something which is already in act, God as the first cause, as the mover of all, Himself immovable and changeless, as the necessary and self-existent being, must be pure actuality. He is infinite in all perfection, for otherwise He would be subject to the capacity of change and improvement. His essence, as we have already seen, is one with His existence. His attributes also, such as goodness, justice, and the like, are identical with His nature. Goodness, justice, &c., perfect an intellectual or rational creature, but nothing can perfect the infinite and perfect nature of God. His justice is really one with His mercy and love; and although we rightly distinguish the one from the other, this is only because He, notwithstanding the absolute simplicity of His nature, produces in His government of the world a variety of effects equivalent to those which would be produced by distinct attributes in creatures. All the pure perfections of creatures are found in Him, and though certain qualities of creatures, such as bodily form, are wanting in God, who is a pure spirit, this is because these qualities involve imperfection. Lastly, all these perfections belong to the one true God. If there were more gods than one, there must be something to constitute the individuality, to distinguish the one deity from the other. Either, then, the distinguishing attribute must be a defect or else a perfection proper to the one deity and absent in the other. Each alternative is inconsistent with infinite perfection.

III. An important conclusion results from the principle that God by natural reason can be known as the author of the world. Men can be excused on the plea of invincible ignorance, if they in good faith reject certain truths of faith. But all men who have come to the use of reason are bound to know, love, and obey God. (The Catholic philosophers treat of God in natural theology; the theologians in the treatise "De Deo," e.g. Franzelin, Billot; the patristic teaching will be found summarized in Petavius "De Deo" and Thomassinus, "De Deo"; Wilhelm and Scannell, "Cath. GOLDEN ROSE. An ornament blessed by the Pope every year on Laetare Sunday (fourth Sunday in Lent), and sent occasionally to Catholic sovereigns, to churches and sanctuaries, to generals, and to Catholic cities or republics. Originally, it was a single flower of wrought gold, coloured red; afterwards the golden petals were decked with rubies and other gems; finally, the form adopted was that of a thorny branch, with several flowers and leaves, and the principal flower at the top, all of pure gold. The practice appears to have arisen in the thirteenth century, but by what Pope it was instituted in its present form is uncertain.

[1] Here is the radical difference between the view of Catholic theologians and that propounded with great ability by Mansel in his famous Bampton Lectures.

That Popes used to send presents in very early times to princes who had deserved well of the Church is well known: Gregory the Great was accustomed to send with this intention golden keys containing filings of St. Peter's chains, and Boniface V. sent to Edwin, king of Northumbria, in 626, a camisia, or shirt with a gold ornament, and to Ethelberga his queen a gilded ivory comb and a silver mirror.[1] Urban V. sent a Golden Rose in 1366 to Joanna of Naples. Among the recipients of the Rose have been Gonzalo de Cordova, Napoleon III., Isabella II. of Spain, and Queen Marie Amélie of Portugal. Morone records a large number of instances in which this favour has been conferred: a few of the most noteworthy are the following. Henry VIII. received the Rose from three Popes, the last time from Clement VII. in 1524. It was sent to his daughter, Queen Mary, by Julius III., in 1555. The republic of Lucca was thus honoured by Pius IV., in 1564; the Lateran Basilica by Pius V. three years later; and the sanctuary of Loreto, by Gregory XIII., in 1584. The Queen of France, Maria Theresa, received it from Clement IX., in 1668; and the Queen of Poland, Mary Casimir, from Innocent XI., in 1684, in recognition of the recent deliverance of Vienna by her valiant husband, John Sobieski. Benedict XIII. (1726) granted the Golden Rose to the cathedral of Capua; and in 1833 it was sent by Gregory XVI. to the Basilica of St. Mark's, Venice. (Morone, "Dizionario Ecclesiastico.")

GOOD FRIDAY. [See HOLY WEEK.]

GOOD SHEPHERD, SISTERS OF THE. The full title of the institute is: "Sisters of our Lady of the Good Shepherd of Angers." A society called the Sisters of "Our Lady of Charity of the Refuge" was founded by B. John Eudes in 1641, for the care and reformation of fallen women. This still exists in a flourishing condition. Out of it has grown the order of the Good Shepherd, founded by Mary Euphrasia Pelletier (d. 1868; declared Venerable in 1897). The objects are the same as those of the parent institute, but instead of each community being independent, all are subject to the mother-house at Angers. Good Shepherd convents have been established in all the quarters of the globe and have been the means of rescuing countless souls.

Many of the penitents received into the homes wish to remain there for the rest of their lives. For these an institute has been founded, distinct from, but under the direction of the Sisters of the Good Shepherd. These "Magdalens" form a strictly contemplative Order under the rule of the Third Order of Mt. Carmel. GOSPEL (LITURGICAL USE OF). The practice of reading the Gospels in the Christian assemblies is mentioned by Justin Martyr, and prescribed in all the liturgies. The First Council of Orange, in 441, and that of Valentia in Spain (Hefele-Leclercq, II. 444, 1067) order the Gospel to be read after the Epistle and before the offertory, in order that the catechumens might listen to the words of Christ and hear them explained by the bishop. We give here, first of all, the ceremonies with which the Gospel is sung at High Mass according to the Latin rite, adding illustrations from history and the other liturgies. We conclude with an account of the way the Gospel is read at Low Mass.

I. The Gospel at High Mass.—The deacon places the book of the Gospels on the altar, kneels and prays that God may purify his lips, as He purified those of Isaiah, takes the book of the Gospels, asks the priest's blessing, and then goes to a place in the sanctuary on the right hand [1] of the altar, where the Gospel is to be sung. The deacon is accompanied by acolytes bearing lights; he announces the title of the Gospel, the choir singing "Glory to Thee, O Lord"; he makes the sign of the cross on the book, then on his forehead, lips and breast; he incenses the book, the incense having been previously blessed, and sings the Gospel, which the priest has previously read in a low voice on the right side of the altar. Finally, he incenses the priest, to whom the book is presented open, and who kisses it, saying "By the words of the Gospel may our sins be blotted out."

The singing of the Gospel was not always reserved to the deacon, as has been shown in the article under that word. In ancient times the book of the Gospels was carried in procession to the altar at the beginning of Mass, a custom noted in the liturgies of St. Basil and St. Chrysostom, and observed for a long time in the West. This procession fell into disuse when Missals containing all that is said or sung at Mass replaced the old Gospel book, sacramentaries, lectionaries, and antiphonaries, which contained different parts of the Mass, each in a separate form. All the ancient liturgies recognize the use of incense at the Gospel. It signifies the "good odour of Christ." The lights at the Gospel were familiar to St. Jerome, and St. Isidore, who says they were carried in sign of joy, and to signify that Christ is the light of souls. In the old churches, which were usually turned to the east, the south side was occupied by the men, and down to the middle of the ninth century the deacon turned towards them when he reached the "ambo" or place where the Gospel was sung. On the other hand, Remi of Auxerre, who wrote about 882, assumes that the Gospel is read towards the north, the region of darkness, in order to signify the power Christ's words have to annul evil influences. Le Brun thinks that this mystical reason was commonly adopted; that then a similar evil signification was attributed to the left side of the priest (i.e. his left when he faces the altar), and that hence it became usual to move the Missal which the priest uses to his left, before he reads the Gospel. In the older Ordines, the Missal is not changed to the left till the offertory,[1] when convenience obviously requires the moving of the book. The people stand at the singing or reading of the Gospel, to indicate their alacrity in obeying Christ's words; and for a like reason members of military orders stand with drawn swords. In the earliest of the Roman Ordines, all the clergy kiss the book of the Gospels, and Jonas, bishop of Orleans in the ninth century, speaks of this rite as an ancient one even in his day. It appears from Remi of Auxerre that the people made the sign of the cross at the end as well as at the beginning of the Gospel.

II. At Low Masses the book is moved to the Gospel side at the end of the Gradual, the priest says the prayer "Munda," &c., in the middle of the altar, and begs a blessing from God, saying "Jube, Domine, benedicere," "Pray, Lord, a blessing," whereas the deacon uses the form "Jube, domne," &c., "Pray, Sir, a blessing." He then signs the book, &c., as has been described above, the server saying "Gloria tibi, Domine." At the end the server says "Praise be to thee, O Christ," and the priest kisses the book, with the prayer "By the words of the Gospel," &c. The old custom was to say "Amen" at the end of the Gospel, as is still done in the Mozarabic Mass and by the Benedictines after the reading of the Gospel at Matins. Alexander of Hales tells us that some in his time said "Amen," others "Deo gratias," but his words imply that "Laus tibi, Christe" had already become the prevalent form. (See Le Brun, and Benedict XIV. "De Miss.")

III. The reading of the Gospel of St. John (i. 1–14) at the end of the Mass is a late development made compulsory by St. Pius V. in 1570. Till lately it was still not printed in the Ordinary of the Mass. Whenever an office is commemorated whose Gospel is begun in the ninth lesson at Matins, that Gospel is read instead of Jn. i. (Duchesne, "Christian Worship," 58, 167, 196; Fortescue "The Mass," 257–261, 280; Baudot, "Les Evangéliaires")

GRACE. I. Definition and Divisions of Grace.—All that we receive from God—our existence, our natural powers, the good things of this life—are God's free gift and may therefore be rightly called graces or favours received from Him. But God has been pleased to call man to a supernatural end—i.e. to a destiny out of all proportion to the exigencies of his nature, and which cannot be attained by the use of his natural powers. Man has been created that he may see God face to face in His glory, and God, who calls him to eternal life, also furnishes the means by which it may be secured. Hence the Scriptural writers and the theologians of the Church distinguish grace from nature; and grace in this stricter and narrower sense may be defined as a supernatural gift freely bestowed by God on rational or intellectual creatures in order that they may attain eternal life. We say that it is freely given, apart, at least in the first instance, from all merit or claim of ours; otherwise, as the Apostle argues, it would not deserve the name of grace. We call it supernatural in order to distinguish it from gifts which come to us in the natural order, although the definition is not meant to exclude those special providences which dispose even natural events for the furtherance of our salvation. We speak of it as bestowed on intellectual and rational creatures, for angels and men are the only creatures capable of knowing and loving God, and consequently the only recipients of grace. All grace since the Fall has been given to man on account of Christ's merits. Whether the grace of the angels or of Adam in his innocence was due to the same cause is a question freely discussed in the theological schools.

Grace thus understood is divided into external and internal grace. The former term includes such external gifts as the preaching of the Gospel, the examples of Christ and the Saints, occasions of good actions, the removal of exterior temptations—in a word, all the effects of supernatural providence by which the cause of our salvation is promoted. Internal grace directly affects the understanding and the will, either inhering in the soul as a permanent quality, or merely moving and aiding the soul at the time to acts of supernatural virtue. Internal graces may be conferred for two great ends. They may be given in order that the recipient may promote the spiritual good of others among whom he labours, and in this case the schoolmen speak of graces as "gratis datae," and infer from 1 Cor. xii. 8 that they are nine in number—viz. the word of wisdom, the grace of healing, &c. Or, on the other hand, graces may be given with the direct object of bringing the subjects of the grace nearer to God, and such graces are called "gratum facientes"—graces which make man pleasing to his Creator. We have already explained that internal graces may be actual (i.e. passing movements of the soul by God) or habitual (i.e. permanent qualities residing in the soul or its faculties). Habitual grace may inhere in the substance of the soul, which it sanctifies and renews by the very fact of its presence there. It is then called sanctifying grace, and is, says the Council of Trent (sess. vi. can. 11), shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost, who is given to us. This sanctifying grace makes us the friends of God and partakers of the divine nature (2 Pet. i. 4), it creates within us new hearts and spirits (Ezech. xxxvi. 26), and its existence in the soul is incompatible with mortal sin (1 John iii. 9). The infused virtues are another form of habitual grace. They inhere in the faculties of the soul; they do not directly sanctify, but they complete and perfect sanctification and make the soul capable of supernatural acts. Actual grace also is subdivided into grace of operation (gratia operans) and of co-operation—the former exciting the mind to action, the latter working with it and assisting it in operation already begun—into prevenient and subsequent, into sufficient and efficacious grace, &c. This last subdivision will be explained in the account which we have to give of the doctrinal systems of grace maintained in the Church.

II. Catholic Doctrine on Grace.—The Church teaches, in opposition to the Pelagians, not only that the grace of Christ is absolutely necessary for justification before God, but also that without the prevenient inspiration of the Holy Ghost and His assistance a man "can neither believe, hope, love, or repent, as it is necessary he should do, in order that the grace of justification may be conferred upon him" (Concil. Trid. sess. vi. De Justif. can. 3). In no case can a man merit the first grace by natural good works. "No man," says our Blessed Saviour, "can come to Me except the Father who hath sent Me draw him" (Jn. vi. 44); and the Apostle, "It is God who worketh in us to will and to do" (Philipp. ii. 13). The very wish to believe or to rise from sin comes, according to the definition of the Council of Orange (can. 3, 4, 5), from the grace of God. Moreover, although we can by our own strength do good actions in the natural order, and although our nature is not wholly depraved and corrupt, even after the Fall and before it is healed by the grace of Christ, still so great is the weakness left by original sin, and by the disorder consequent on the very fact that a man destitute of grace is necessarily turned away from his last end—viz. God apprehended by supernatural means—that we need grace in order to resist grievous temptations against natural virtue, nor can we fulfil the whole natural law of God without its help. Hence Scripture constantly attributes triumph over temptation to the grace of God, who with temptation makes a way of escape that we may be able to bear it (1 Cor. x. 13).[1] Finally, even a person who is in a state of grace and friendship with God needs a new impulse of actual grace before he can think a good thought or perform a good deed;[1] while a special grace, which cannot be merited, is required in order that he may persevere to the end. "In the case of those who are regenerate and holy there is always need to implore God's help that they may come to a good end or persist in a good work" (II. Council of Orange, can. 10). In short, the world of grace is like the world of nature, which is not only created but also sustained at each instant by the hand of God.

As the Pelagians and Semipelagians erred in the estimate they formed of man's natural powers, so the Calvinists fell into another and much more pernicious error in denying the freedom of the will altogether and making grace irresistible; and the Jansenist doctrine on these points is substantially identical with that of the Calvinists. The Council of Trent (sess. vi. De Justif.) condemns under anathema those who maintain that the will of man is merely passive under the action of grace, and has not the power of resisting it. It also defines that a state of grace is not, as the Calvinists supposed, the mere external favour of God, but that it is a gift inherent in the soul, in virtue of which the sinner is not only accounted just, but really becomes so, and that the gift of sanctifying grace is forfeited by any single mortal sin. We discuss these points more fully under the articles CALVINISM, FINAL PERSEVERANCE, JUSTIFICATION, MERIT, only remarking here that the very essence, not only of Christianity, but of natural religion, is at issue in the dispute between Catholics and Calvinists. That God will accept no man as just except he really be so; that nothing else, neither ritual nor sacrifice, nor imputed merit, can be taken as a substitute for personal holiness—that is the central truth of all religion; it is the very truth which the prophets of God maintained against the priests of Baal or Moloch. We are of course well aware that there are many excellent Christians who profess Calvinism, and do not dream of holding the consequences which may fairly be deduced from their tenets. But this should not blind us to the fact that the Calvinistic theories on imputation, irresistible grace, the impossibility of falling from a state of grace, &c. are in themselves not only irreligious but immoral.

III. Theological Systems on Grace.—All Catholics, as we have seen, believe in the necessity of grace for all supernatural acts, and therefore also, since God desires the salvation of all, they hold that He offers to all grace, really and abundantly sufficient for their salvation. They further maintain that the will always remains free to reject grace or to correspond with it. But when we inquire into the nature of the distinction between efficacious and sufficient grace, Catholic theologians give different answers. We begin with a general definition which may suffice for the understanding of the question in dispute. A sufficient grace is one which merely enables the soul to perform a supernatural act; an efficacious grace is one which does really effect the purposes for which it is given. Thus Judas received sufficient, Peter efficacious, grace for conversion: in other words, grace was given capable of converting Judas, but to Peter grace which actually did convert him. The question is, whence does the efficacity of grace proceed?

[1] On this part of the subject, see the Second Council of Orange, anno 529, confirmed by Pope Boniface II. (Hefele-Leclercq, ii. 1085 sqq.)

The Dominican theologians defend what is usually called the Thomist system of grace, because those who hold it allege that it is in substance to be found in the writings of St. Thomas Aquinas.[1] This theory may be stated in the following propositions:—

(1) Second causes act only so far as they are determined to act by the first cause—i.e. God. Hence it is not enough to say that the power to work out our salvation comes from God. He also moves to the good action itself, and the existence of two kinds of grace must be admitted—viz. sufficient, which merely enables the recipient to act; and efficient, which is always followed by, and, indeed, produces the action ("dat non solum posse sed agere").

(2) God sincerely wishes all men to be saved, and offers to all the means of salvation. But He wishes some to be saved absolutely, and considering all the circumstances; others, only on certain conditions which are not realized. To the latter He gives sufficient, to the former efficacious, grace.

(3) In either case grace is given without any claim or merit on man's part.

(4) There is an intrinsic difference between sufficient and efficacious grace—i.e. between the graces in themselves—so that it is always true to say that a man consented to grace given because it was efficacious: never true that the grace was efficacious because the man consented.

(5) Man always remains free and capable of merit under efficacious grace: free and responsible for his demerit with merely sufficient grace For God as the first cause in no way interferes with the agency of second causes, but, on the contrary, moves each second cause according to its nature, so that beings with free will do not cease to be free because efficaciously moved by God. Sufficient grace gives full power to act, so that a man is perfectly responsible if he does not exert the power; while efficacious grace leaves perfect power of resistance. The reader will perceive the extreme difficulty, or, as the adversaries of Thomism would say, the impossibility of reconciling this last with the foregoing propositions; but the fact that the Thomists do honestly hold this last proposition places a wide gulf between Thomism on the one hand, and Calvinism and Jansenism on the other.

The first three of the Thomist propositions are admitted[1] by that large number of Jesuit theologians known as Congruists, but they make the efficacity of grace depend, not on anything in the grace itself, but on the fact that it is given under circumstances which, as God foresees, are suitable to the disposition of the recipient. He foreknows what all creatures would do in all possible circumstances—in what combination of circumstances they would accept or reject grace (the famous scientia media). If He decrees their predestination absolutely He gives them grace in circumstances under which they will certainly correspond to it; otherwise He confers grace which is in itself perfectly sufficient, but which they will certainly reject. Congruism has the advantage of admitting the full force of scriptural texts which attribute the whole difference between sinner and saint to the grace of God, while at the same time, there is no difficulty in reconciling it with belief in the freedom of the will.

The Molinists (so called from Louis Molina, a celebrated Jesuit) hold that the efficacy of grace depends simply on the will which freely accepts it. The difference is not in the graces in themselves, nor even in the circumstances under which they are given. A powerful grace given at the most favourable juncture may be rejected, and so remain merely sufficient; a much less powerful grace may be given with much less favourable circumstances, and the consent of the will may make it efficacious. God predestines those who, as He foresees, will correspond to that grace which He offers to all.

The Augustinians advocate a third system. Like the Thomists, they admit an intrinsic difference between efficacious and sufficient grace, but they maintain this position on purely theological, not on philosophical grounds: on the weakness of man's will since the Fall, not on the general principle that all second causes must be moved to action by the first cause. Hence they propound a Molinist theory for the period before, a Thomist theory for that after, the Fall.

A singular theory, adopted, however, by St. Alphonsus in his treatise on prayer, was devised by Tournely, a doctor of the Sorbonne, and author of a "Dogmatic Theology" justly held in high esteem. Tournely supposed that God gave men first of all sufficient grace, in the Molinist sense, for certain initial works, especially prayer, which grace, if rightly used, was followed by grace efficacious in the Thomist sense. The obvious objection is that prayer, if it fulfils the conditions necessary for obtaining the requests made, is one of the most excellent and difficult of all good works, so that either there is no need at all of grace efficacious in its own nature, or else such grace would be imperatively demanded for prayer.

[1] An allegation, however, by no means admitted by their antagonists.

[1] So at least Billuart puts the case in his treatise De Gratia, but probably the Jesuit theologians would demur to the form at least of the first proposition.

The controversy on grace and predestination between the Dominicans and Jesuits began in Spain about the year 1580. Bañez, a Dominican professor at Salamanca, maintained the intrinsic efficacity of grace as explained above. Setting out from the notion of God as the first cause and the first mover, he represented efficacious grace as determining the free consent of the will by "physical premotion," and this premotion which was infallibly followed by the consent of the will came, as he alleged, from God's absolute decree that the person so moved by grace should correspond to it. The Jesuit college at the same university met this doctrine of intrinsic efficacity of grace and physical premotion on the part of God with vigorous opposition. As early as 1581, a Jesuit, Prudentius de Monte-Mayor, defended in public disputation a doctrine which had already been propounded by another member of his order, Fonseca, in 1566—viz. that God knew, apart from any decree except the general one of concurring with free agents in this determination, where and when the will would correspond to or reject grace, and that efficacious grace was simply that which, as God foresaw, would be accepted. This doctrine was eagerly defended in the Society of Jesus. Suarez maintained it at Coimbra, Vasquez at Alcalà, Gregory of Valentia at Ingolstadt, Lessius in the Netherlands, Toletus at Rome. But it was Molina, professor at Evora, in Portugal, and a disciple of Fonseca, who carried out the principles of his master to their utmost consequences. His famous book, "Liberi Arbitrii cum gratiae donis, divina praescientia, providentia, praedestinatione et reprobatione concordia," was published at Lisbon in 1588. It made an epoch in theology, and roused the keenest controversy amongst Catholics for more than a century. The controversy turned on predestination as well as grace, for Molinists held[1] (1) that sufficient grace became efficacious simply by the free consent of the will which corresponded to it; (2) that God predestined those who He foresaw would consent to grace, so that predestination was an effect of God's prevision that His creatures would consent, not vice versa.[2]

[1] We say Molinists in deference to usage, though the name is really inaccurate. Lessius held proposition (2). Molina, on the contrary, "doctrinam gratiae congruae una cum praedestinatione ante praevisa merita et bonorum operum praedefinitionem adumbravit." Schneemann, Controversiarum de divinae gratiae liberique arbitrii concordia initia et progressus, p. 237.

[2] On the Congruist and Thomist theories, God, apart from all prevision of merit or demerit, determines who are to be saved, and then gives to the elect efficacious grace by which they freely merit their salvation.

In 1594 Clement VIII. intimated that he reserved the decision of the controversy to himself, and in November 1597 the famous Congregations de Auxiliis—i.e. concerning the helps or assistance of grace—were instituted for the examination of the question. The congregation consisted of eight consultors (of these eight two were absent, and were replaced by three new members), of whom all except two condemned Molina's book after considering it for little more than two months. They repeated this adverse sentence after a second consultation. Molina begged to be heard in his own defence, and accordingly the Pope ordered that conferences should be held, in which the generals of both orders and the great Cardinal Bellarmine took part. The limits of the question were seriously narrowed in these conferences, for the Jesuits refused to commit themselves to the opinions of Molina and Lessius on predestination, and the dispute was confined to the efficacity of grace. In 1600 Cardinal Madrucci, who presided at the conferences, died, and the conferences themselves ended without definite result. Once more Molina's book was submitted to a congregation on which two Jesuits and two Dominicans sat, and twenty propositions contained in it were censured by a majority of the members. From 1602 to 1606 congregations were held in the Vatican before Clement VIII. and Paul V. The Dominicans were represented by Didacus Alvarez and Thomas of Lemos, the Jesuits during the first nine sessions by Gregory of Valentia, and later by Arrubal, Bastida, and De Salas. The Spanish Court pressed for the condemnation of the Jesuits, who had offended Spanish prejudices and selfishness by espousing the cause of Henry IV. in France. It has been alleged that Clement VIII., shortly before his death in 1605, had prepared a bull condemning Molina, but this supposed fact has never been proved. In any case the bull was not promulgated, and the congregations, which met sixty-eight times under Clement, held twelve more sessions under Paul V.. On August 28, 1607, the latter Pope convoked the College of Cardinals (excluding, however, those who had been consultors or secretaries of the congregation), and handed an encyclical to the generals of the Dominicans and Jesuits, which they in turn were to communicate to the provincials. The theologians of each party were allowed to hold and teach their respective opinions, provided they did not stigmatize their opponents with theological censures. Urban VIII. and Clement XII. declared themselves in the same sense.

In 1613 Aquaviva, general of the Jesuits, required the members of his order to teach the doctrine on grace known as Congruism, and defended by Bellarmine, Suarez, and others as distinct from the doctrine of Molina, Lessius, Becanus, &c., known as Molinism

(but see Schneemann, p. 302 seq.). It is scarcely necessary to add that the Molinist and Congruist theories are held by many theologians who are not Jesuits, just as the so-called Thomist doctrine is accepted by many besides the Dominicans.

All the large courses of dogmatic theology published during the seventeenth and earlier part of the eighteenth century enter fully into the controversies on grace. Santamour and other writers inclined to Jansenism published acts of the Congregations de Auxiliis, attributing them to Pegna, Coronell, and De Lemos, along with a constitution said to have been drawn up, but never promulgated, by Paul V., in condemnation of Molinism. The Pope is said to have abstained from promulgating this constitution because the Jesuits at the time were suffering for their obedience to the interdict issued by Paul V. against Venice. But in 1654 Innocent X. declared that no faith was to be given to these documents. In spite of this, the Dominican Hyacinth Serry compiled a history of the controversy, drawn in great measure from the spurious Acts. It was published at Louvain early in the eighteenth century. In reply, the Jesuit Livinus Meyer, under the pseudonym of Theodore Eleutherius, wrote his "Historia Controversiarum de div. gratiae auxilio sub SS. PP. Sixto V., Clemente VIII., et Paulo V." (Antwerp, 1705.) A Bavarian Carmelite, Alexander a Sto. Johanne, in his continuation of Fleury, repeated the charges of Serry, and was answered in the Latin treatise of the ex-Jesuit Mangold, "Reflexions on Fr. Alexander's Continuation of Fleury." See also Mannhart, "De ingenua indole gratiae efficacis," in Zaccarias "Thesaurus," tom. v., and Schneemann's treatise quoted above. (See St. Thomas, 1a 2ae, qq. 109–114, and the Commentaries thereon. Most of the dogmatic theologians have a separate treatise "De Gratia," and are well known to the student; we may mention however, a small but profound work by Scheeben, "The Glories of Divine Grace" (Eng. tr.). The present position of the controversies on Grace may be studied in Dummermuth, "S. Thomas et Doctrina Praemotionis Physicae" and "Defensio Doctrinae S. Thomae de Praemotione Physica" on the Thomist side; and on the Molinist side, Frins, "S. Thomae Doctrina de Cooperatione Dei cum omni natura creata, praesertim libera, seu S. Thomas Praedeterminationis Physicae Adversarius.")

GRACE AT MEALS. In this expression "grace" represents the Latin gratiae, thanks (see Mt. xv. 36; Mk. viii. 6; Jn. vi. 11); but it also covers the notion of benedictio, blessing (Mt. xiv. 19; Mk. vi. 41; Lk. ix. 16); hence the Italian equivalent to "saying grace" is "benedire la tavola." In the passages above cited, and also in other places, our Lord sets us the example of praying for the blessing of God on the daily bread which He gives us, and giving Him thanks for what He thus provides, both before and after partaking of it. Christians have from the first complied with this teaching. "Whether you eat or drink," says St. Paul (1 Cor. x. 31), "or whatsoever else you do, do all to the glory of God"; and this precept is further developed in Col. iii. 17: "Whatsoever you do in word or in work, all things do ye in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, giving thanks to God and the Father by Him." Compare also 1 Thess. v. 18, and 1 Tim. iv. 3. Many of the Fathers—e.g. Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, St. Cyprian, St. John Chrysostom, and St. Basil—enjoin the punctual performance of this duty. St. Basil says[1] "Let prayers be said before taking food, in meet acknowledgment of the gifts of God, both of those which He is now giving and of those which He has put in store for the future. Let prayers be said after food, containing a return of thanks for the things given and request for those promised." A variety of specimens of early graces are given in the Gelasian Sacramentary, which dates from the end of the fifth century. In the Apostolical Constitutions as given in Bunsen's "Hippolytus" (§ 21), meals in the church are spoken of, of which the bishop is always to be ready to partake along with the faithful, and at which he is to distribute a portion of the bread among those present, "for a blessing," before they begin to eat. This custom still prevails in the East, and a relic of it survives in the eulogies or pain bénit of certain French churches [see EULOGIA]. The Constitutions also say "Everything which they shall eat they shall give thanks to God for."[2] (Smith and Cheetham, art. by Scudamore.)

GRADUAL (gradus, a step). An antiphon sung after the Epistle, and so called either because it used to be sung on the altar steps, or because it was sung while the deacon ascended the steps of the ambo to sing the Gospel. It is also called "responsory," because it answers to the Epistle, or because sung antiphonally, or because in some places it had the form of a Matins' Responsory. Such a Gradual is that still sung at the Blessing of the Psalms. The "Liber Pontificalis," in the Life of Celestine I., attributes its origin to that Pope; others refer its introduction to Gregory the Great. (Benedict XIV. "De Missa.") But Tertullian mentions the psalms between the lessons ("De Anima," ix., PL, ii. 660), and St. Augustine says "We have heard first the lesson from the Apostle . . . . Then we sang a psalm . . . . After that the lesson of the Gospel," &c. ("Sermo clxxvi." 1, PL, xxxviii. 950.)

[1] Ep. ii. ad Greg. Naz. (quoted in Scudamore's art. in Dict. of Christ. Antiq.).
[2] Apost. Constit., from the Coptic, Tattam, 1848; p. 74.

It is usual to speak of all the chant between the Epistle and Gospel as the Gradual. But this chant really consists of two separate parts, of which only the former is the true Gradual, the latter being the Alleluia (q.v.), replaced on fast days by the Tract (q.v.). In the earlier ages there were two lessons before the Gospel, one taken from the Old Testament and the other the Epistle proper. The Gradual followed the first, the Alleluia or Tract the second. (See Fortescue, "The Mass," 265 sqq.; Duchesne, "Christian Worship," 114; Gihr, "Das Heilige Messopfer," 408–427.)

GRADUAL PSALMS. A title given to Psalms cxx.–cxxxiv. in the Hebrew, cxix.–cxxxiii. in the Vulgate numeration.[1] All these Psalms have much in common. All except Ps. cxxxii. are short; the same tone of joyful trust in God's protection runs through them all; and although some of them (viz. Ps. cxxii., cxxiv., cxxxi., cxxxiii.) are ascribed to David, cxxvii. to Solomon, it is pretty plain that they all belong to the early period of the return from the exile.

I. The Latin "canticum graduum" is a translation of the Hebrew שִׁיר הַמַּעֲלוֹת (in cxxi. לַמַּעֲלוֹת), which occurs in the inscriptions. The LXX have ᾠδὴ ἀναβαθμῶν. But it is impossible to say for certain what the title means. The following are the chief attempts at solving the problem:—

(1) The oldest explanation given by Jewish and Christian scholars, and implied perhaps in the LXX translation, is that the psalms were so called because sung on the fifteen steps which led from the court of the men to that of the women. According to the Talmud, two priests were stationed on the evening of the first day of the Feast of Tabernacles at the top of the steps with trumpets, while the Levites sang the psalms on the steps (according to a later tradition one psalm on each step). We have no historical evidence apart from the Talmud for such a custom; the steps most likely did not exist till Herod's time; and there is strong reason to suspect that the custom was imagined to account for the title of the psalms.

(2) Others have suggested that the psalms were sung by the exiles in returning or "going up" from Babylon, so that the word translated "graduum" would answer to the Greek ἀνάβασις. This explanation was adopted, partially at least, by the Syriac translator, and seems to have been in the mind of Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion when they used ἀναβάσεις to render מַעֲלוֹת. This view was advocated by Chrysostom and Theodoret among the Fathers, as well as by modern scholars of name. No doubt the words מַעֲלֵה מִבָּבֶל do occur in Esdras vii. 9, in the sense of return, or ἀνάβασις, from Babel. But the plural number in מַעֲלוֹת retained in the Vulgate "graduum" is against this interpretation; and, besides, Ps. cxxii. implies that the exile was over some considerable time, and the Temple and city rebuilt.

(3) Closely allied with the foregoing is another explanation adopted by many great scholars—e.g. by Eichhorn, Maurer, Hengstenberg, Keil, Hupfeld, Kuenen, &c.—and which has very much to recommend it. They suppose that these psalms were sung during the "goings up" or pilgrimages to Jerusalem for the great annual feasts. This account satisfies the laws of grammatical usage (e.g. it accounts for the use of the plural), and is perfectly consistent with the contents of the psalms in question. We may reasonably conjecture that some of the psalms were actually written for the pilgrims, while others were placed in this collection because they dealt with subjects or expressed feelings which had a powerful attraction for the pious Israelite in general, and so for the pilgrim in particular. "Thus Ps. cxx.–cxxii., Ps. cxxxiii., cxxxiv. (i.e. the first and the last songs in the collection) point directly to the pilgrimages; Ps. cxxiv., cxxvi., cxxviii., cxxix., cxxxii., treat of subjects more or less connected therewith; lastly, Ps. cxxiii., cxxv., cxxvii., cxxx., cxxxi., are more general, but at the same time contain nothing which makes their incorporation in a 'petit psautier des pèlerins du second temple' inexplicable or even strange."

(4) We add, for the sake of completeness, two other explanations. Gesenius, followed by De Wette, Winer, Delitzsch, &c., suggested that the name described the ascending rhythm of the psalms, for the sense goes on progressively, and the first or last words of a preceding are often repeated at the beginning of a subsequent sentence. It is scarcely fair to urge against this view that the same rhythm is found in the song of Deborah, and in Isa. xxvi. 5, 6. It is, however, a strong objection that this ascending rhythm is not found at all in Ps. cxxvii.–cxxxiv.; and is, to say the least, not strongly marked in Ps. cxxv. Besides, this explanation will not suit the inscription of Ps. cxxi.—viz. a song "for ascents," not "of ascents": "gradibus," not "graduum" (לַמַּעֲלוֹת).

Fürst's theory, given in his Concordance and in his Lexicon (sub voc. מַעֲלָה), may be dismissed in a single sentence. He translates the titles "songs of excellence," a meaning which is not justified by usage, which is unlikely on the face of it, and which leaves the plural number unexplained. (Chiefly from the essay in Hupfeld's "Commentary on the Psalms," vol. iv. p. 274 seq., and from Kuenen, "Historisch-kritisch Onderzoek naar het Onstaan en de Verzameling van de Boeken des Ouden Verbonds," vol. iii. p. 218 seq.:

[1] The Hebrew numeration is followed in the rest of this article.

the words in inverted commas are from the latter author.)

II. We may now pass on to the use of the Gradual Psalms in the Christian Church. The Fathers, as well as later Catholic writers, found various mystical meanings in the number fifteen, and regarded these Psalms as marking the steps by which the soul ascends to God. The Breviary divides the Gradual Psalms into three sets of five each, the first five ending with the common conclusion "Requiem aeternam dona eis, Domine," and with a prayer for the dead, while each of the remaining psalms ends with the "Gloria Patri," and each of the remaining sets with a collect. This arrangement and the practice of reciting these psalms before matins are mentioned by Radulphus, a contemporary of Innocent III. At one time the Gradual Psalms were said before matins every day in Lent, but Pius V. limited the recitation to all Wednesdays in that season, excepting Wednesday in Holy Week, and days on which an office of nine lessons occurs. Moreover, Pius V. made the private recitation a matter of devotion, not of precept. He attached an indulgence of fifty days to the devout repetition. (From Gavantus, sect. 9, cap. 2.) The obligation of reciting the Gradual Psalms in choir was abolished by Pius X. (Divino Afflatu, tit. viii).

GRAFFITI (γράφω, write). Rude inscriptions or pictures scrawled or scratched with charcoal on the walls of ancient monuments. The custom of scribbling on famous buildings was as prevalent in olden days as it is now. Much as we may lament the practice at the present time, we cannot but be grateful to the pilgrims who wrote their names and dates and prayers and confidences in the catacombs. The Latin indeed is bad and full of misspelling, but the information is of highest importance and interest. The great Christian archaeologist, De Rossi, made a special study of these inscriptions, and the results are truly marvellous. (See CATACOMBS; Northcote and Brownlow, "Roma Sotteranea," i. 287–290, &c.; Leclercq, "Manuel d'Archéologie Chrétienne," i. 22; Barnes, "The Early Church in the Light of the Monuments," 159 sqq.)

GRAIL, THE HOLY. The legendary sacred vessel used by Christ at the Last Supper, either the chalice or more properly the dish for the Paschal Lamb. It was also said to have been used by Joseph of Arimathea to collect our Lord's blood while He was on the cross. The etymology of the original Latin word, gradale, is doubtful. The Grail legend is closely connected with the Perceval (Parsifal) legend as well as with that of King Arthur. It is a matter of controversy as to whether the legend is of purely Christian or of pagan origin, with Christian elements added. We have not space to trace it through its various modifications. We may note, however, its connection with Glastonbury through Joseph of Arimathea, the legendary founder of that abbey. The Church never looked kindly upon the legend. Everyone knows how magnificently it has been worked up in Tennyson's "Idylls of the King," and in Wagner's "Parsifal." (See Nutt, "Studies on the Legend of the Holy Grail" and "The Legend of the Holy Grail"; Jessie L. Weston, "The Quest of the Holy Grail"; Wechssler, "Die Sage vom heiligen Gral in ihrer Entwicklung bis auf R. Wagners Parsifal"; Hägele in "Kirchenlex." Gral; Remy in "Cath. Enc.")

GREAT SCHISM. [See ANTIPOPES, p. 37.]

GREATER TITHES. [See TITHES.]

GREEK [SCHISMATIC] CHURCH. THE SO-CALLED ORTHODOX CHURCH. Under this title we include all those Christians who, being separated from the communion of the Pope, acknowledge the primacy of the Patriarch of Constantinople. The Russian Church, however, which is really Greek in the sense of the above definition, we put aside for the present, reserving our account of it for another article. At one time, as everybody knows, the Greek Churches were in full communion with the Holy See. We begin, therefore, with the history of the schism and of the origin of the Greek Church as an independent body.

Ignatius, a member of the imperial family and a monk, was made Patriarch of Constantinople in 846 or 847, during the reign of Theodora. When Theodora's son Michael III., known as Michael the Drunkard, began to reign, he fell entirely under the influence of his uncle Bardus, a profligate of the most abandoned character, who lived in sin with his own stepdaughter. On the feast of the Epiphany 857 Ignatius refused to give Bardus communion, and further offended him by declining to clothe Theodora and her daughters against their will with the religious habit. Accordingly Ignatius was banished, and in 858 Photius was consecrated Patriarch in his place. Photius was the most learned man of his time, among the most learned of any time—as his Bibliotheca (or Μυριοβίβλιον, as he entitled it, consisting of extracts from 280 books which he had read) still remains to testify. But he was ambitious and unscrupulous. His consecration was utterly uncanonical. For, first, Ignatius, a pious and virtuous man, was the lawful patriarch; next, Photius, who was a layman at the time of his election, was promoted to the episcopate within six days; and, lastly, he was consecrated by a bishop who was himself under sentence of deposition.

This violent change in the government of the Church caused discontent among the clergy and people, and in order to quiet them the Emperor Michael sent ambassadors with costly presents to Pope Nicholas I., in order to secure his approbation. In spite of false statements made by the ambassadors, the Pope refused to decide till he had investigated the matter, and for this purpose despatched two legates to Constantinople. Those legates, yielding to bribery or to threats, confirmed the deposition of Ignatius on the ground that he had been elected through the undue influence of Theodora, and acknowledged the jurisdiction of Photius. This took place in a synod at Constantinople, held in 863, but the Pope remained inflexible. He sent word to the Eastern bishops that he condemned both the deposition of Ignatius and the usurpation of Photius, and in the same year, 863, he deposed the latter from the office into which he had intruded.

Three years later Bardus was murdered by the army, but the schism which he had originated still continued; nay, fresh causes of quarrel arose. The Bulgarians, a Slav people, had been converted in the middle of the ninth century by the Greek teachers St. Cyril and St. Methodius. Some time later, when Cyril and Methodius had gone to the Moravians and Bohemians, the Bulgarian king, Michael, sent envoys to Pope Nicholas desiring information on various points. Nicholas sent Latin missionaries to the country, and the Roman missionary bishops re-confirmed all those who had received Confirmation from Greek priests, denying that Photius, who was himself without real jurisdiction, could empower his priests to confirm. In 867 Photius, now more embittered than ever, convoked a council in the imperial city, and delivered sentence of deposition and excommunication against the Pope. Further, he accused the Latin Church of heresy for adding the words "Filioque" to the Nicene Creed, and attacked the discipline and usages of the Latins, particularly their practice of fasting on Saturday, their use of milk and cheese on fasting days, and the enforced celibacy of their clergy.

Scarcely had Photius issued his pretended deposition of the Pope, when he himself was removed from office by the new emperor, Basil, who had murdered Michael; and Ignatius was reinstated. The new pope, Hadrian II., worked zealously for the restoration of peace; the Eighth General Council met at Constantinople in 869, and then the excommunication of Photius was recognized, though his followers were admitted to the communion of the Church if they consented to express their sorrow for the past. Thus Greeks and Latins were again united; but Bulgaria was still the cause of strife, and in 872 Pope John VIII. threatened Ignatius with excommunication if he insisted on regarding it as subject to his see. Peace was not actually broken till 878, when, after the death of Ignatius, Photius again ascended the patriarchal throne of Constantinople. John VIII. would not acknowledge him, except on condition that he begged pardon for his offences and renounced his claim to jurisdiction in Bulgaria. Once more Photius circumvented legates sent from Rome. At a Council of Constantinople in 879 he contrived to evade the Pope's demand for apology, and those who made any addition to the Nicene Creed were anathematized. The Pope, however, was not to be deceived. He despatched the Roman deacon Marinus (afterwards Pope) to Constantinople, and he annulled the acts of the late synod. The excommunication of Photius was reiterated by Marinus, John's successor, as well as by Pope Hadrian III. Things took a new turn under Pope Stephen V. (885–891). The Emperor Basil died in 886, and his successor, Leo VI., "the Philosopher," banished Photius, who died in 891. The schism was healed after a fashion, but the ashes of the old dissension were still smouldering, and it only needed a new Photius to kindle them into flame.

This new Photius was found in Michael Cerularius, also Patriarch of Constantinople, who in 1053, under Pope Leo IX., wrote to the bishop of Trani, in Apulia, reproaching the Latins with their use of unleavened bread in the Mass, their habit of eating flesh with the blood (πνικτόν; see Acts xv. 23), their custom of omitting Alleluia during Lent, &c. The Pope wrote a reply which made a good impression on the Emperor Constantine Monomachus, and in 1054 the Papal legates went to Constantinople. The Patriarch, however, would not hear of peace, and the legates left the document containing his excommunication on the altar of St. Sophia. Michael succeeded in withdrawing the Oriental bishops from communion with the West—a task which he did not find difficult, for the Greeks generally were averse to the addition of the "Filioque" and to the use of unleavened bread in the Eucharist. Since then the Greeks have as a body been severed from Catholic communion, although the separation of the Russo-Greek Church from Rome was not effected till the twelfth century.

Many attempts were made to repair the breach, but without lasting results. In 1098 Urban II. convoked a synod at Bari, in which St. Anselm of Canterbury defended the doctrine of the Holy Ghost's procession from the Son. Negotiations were carried on between Alexander III. and the Emperor Manuel Comnenus, and the latter assembled a council at Constantinople in 1168 to promote the reunion of the Greeks, but the resistance of the Greek Patriarch defeated the Emperor's intentions. The presence of the Crusaders in the East only served to aggravate the schism. Latin patriarchates were established in Antioch and Jerusalem. On the capture of Constantinople by the Latins, a Latin empire and patriarchate were set up there (in 1204); the Greek Patriarch of Alexandria returned to Catholic communion; and learned Greeks, such as Nicholas, archbishop of Thessalonica, the monk Nicephorus Blemmidas, and John Beccus, archivist of the church at Constantinople, were courageous advocates of the union; but the cause which they had at heart was ruined by the selfishness of the Emperor, the fanaticism of the Greek monks, and the cruelty and avarice of the Crusaders. The Greek Patriarchs of Constantinople settled at Nicaea, where Theodore Lascaris had founded a kingdom on the ruins of the Byzantine empire. In 1262 the Latin empire fell, the Greeks recovered possession of Constantinople, and the schism continued in full force. The union effected at Lyons (1274), when the Greeks acknowledged the primacy of the Pope and the procession of the Holy Ghost from the Son, did not last six years, and the Decree of union at Florence (1439) was repudiated in 1443 by the Patriarchs of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem. In Constantinople it was only the Patriarch and the prelates of the Court who adhered to the union; and when (in 1453) this city fell before the Turks, its Patriarch fled to Italy, and Gregory Scholarius, a schismatic, was chosen in his place by command of the Sultan Mahomet II. Peace was at an end between Rome and Constantinople. In the Russian empire proper, the decree of Florence had never been accepted. The Greek exarchs, however, subject to the Metropolitan of Kiew among the Lithuanians and Poles, and the Greek Churches in Italy, Illyria, Hungary, Slavonia, &c., were faithful to the union effected at Florence. They are known as "United Greeks," or Catholics of the Greek rite.

II. The Present State of the Greek Schismatic Church.—The Patriarch of Constantinople is superior in rank to the three other Patriarchs —viz. of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem. His direct spiritual jurisdiction extends over all the Greeks of Turkey in Europe, and over all the Greeks of Turkey in Asia who are not subject to the other Patriarchs. His power has been greatly lessened within the last three centuries. The Russian Church was emancipated in a considerable degree by the erection of a patriarchate at Moscow in 1589, and completely by the institution of the Holy Governing Synod in 1721. The bishops in the kingdom of Greece asserted their independence in 1833, and it was acknowledged in 1868 by the Patriarchs themselves. In 1870 the Bulgarian Church placed itself under an exarch or primate who is independent of Constantinople. Still the Patriarch retains under his rule a large population. He inflicts spiritual penalties, including excommunication, on any of the clergy or people in his patriarchate. He nominates and deposes archbishops and bishops. He has also ample civil jurisdiction, for he can summon criminals before his court and inflict punishment; he has his own police and his prison, and he is the supreme arbiter in all civil disputes between Greeks and Greeks. The council of the Patriarch is the Holy Synod—a body which consists of twelve metropolitans, though the Patriarch may reduce the number to ten. The metropolitans of Heraclea, Cyzicus, Nicomedia, and Chalcedon are ex officio members; the rest are nominated by the Patriarch, but all bishops who happen to be in Constantinople at the time are entitled to take part in the deliberations and decisions of the synod, if matters of great import are at issue. The Patriarch needs the synod's consent for matters which concern the general good of the Church, whether these affairs are spiritual or temporal, and for the nomination of bishops. When the patriarchate is vacant, the synod chooses three candidates, who, according to the present rule, must all be metropolitans. The names are announced to the "community," composed of dignitaries, lay and cleric, belonging to the patriarchal palace, of notables from the merchants, and of heads of corporations. The "community" then elect one of them by acclamation, and the Porte grants the Berat, or diploma of investiture. The day after, the Grand Vizier presents the new Patriarch with a pastoral staff, a white horse, and rich ornaments. The Patriarch may be tried by the synod, and if he is found guilty the Porte is requested to depose him. The Patriarch is assisted by the officials of his household. Of these the principal are—the Oeconome (μέγας οἰκονόμος), who manages the revenues and presents candidates for ordination; "Visitors" (σακελλάριοι), who inspect the monasteries and convents; the Chartophylax, who superintends ecclesiastical causes; the Protonotary, who has charge of wills, contracts, and the patriarchal correspondence; the Great Logothete (μέγας λογοθέτης), a layman who represents the Patriarch at the Porte; and the Protecdicos (πρωτέκδικος), who, with twelve assistant judges, forms a court of minor instance.

The other patriarchates are mere shadows of former greatness. That of Alexandria comprises Egypt, Libya, Nubia, and Arabia. Next comes the Patriarch of Antioch, ruling over the schismatic Greeks in Syria, Cilicia, Mesopotamia, Isauria, &c. There are some 15,000 Greeks with thirteen metropolitans in Palestine subject to the Patriarch of Jerusalem. These Patriarchs have their synods, officials, &c. The Berat of their investiture is obtained from the Porte by the mediation of the Patriarch of Constantinople.

There are few ecclesiastical provinces in Turkey, and the title of archbishop is merely honorary. As bishops are necessarily celibate, they are selected by the Patriarch and Holy Synod from the monks, a Berat being required to confirm the appointment. The bishops appoint the parish priests, and no monastery can be erected in their dioceses without their leave. Collections are made for them in the parishes; they receive dues from their priests, besides honoraria for dispensations, marriages, burials, Masses, &c., so that their revenues are sometimes large. They also wield considerable political influence. They, like the Patriarchs, have their officials, such as the Protosyncellus, answering to the Latin Vicar-General; the Proto-Presbyter, who visits the churches, instals the new parish priests, and executes episcopal sentences; the Chartophylax or chancellor. There is, moreover, in every diocese a commission consisting of three members: one of them examines candidates for orders; another watches over the administration of the sacraments and the publication of books, to which he gives his imprimatur in case of approval; a third superintends the schools.

In large parishes, there is a Proestos, who baptizes, marries, and buries; a Pneumaticos, who is approved by the bishop to hear confessions; and an Ephemerios, who says Mass and recites the canonical hours; but poor parishes have only one priest, with a deacon or lector to assist him. The clergy are usually ill paid. As a rule they are married.

The religious men and women generally follow the rule of St. Basil, for houses of St. Antony's order are only found on Sinai and Lebanon, and by the shores of the Red Sea. Most of the monks are laymen; if priests, they are called ἱερομόναχοι. The monks never taste flesh, and are bound to the recitation of the hours. The superior of a monastery is called Hegoumenos, or, in the case of the great monasteries, Archimandrite. The name for the superioress of nuns is Hegoumenissa. The monks wear a long robe of coarse cloth, a belt, cloak, scapular, and a hood with five crosses. Some of the religious houses are subject to the bishop, others are placed immediately under the Patriarchs. On Mount Athos there are still anchorites, or solitaries, and the Greeks have preserved the old custom according to which pious virgins and widows lead an ascetic and quasi-religious life in the bosom of their families.

The Greeks reject the words "Filioque" in the Creed, and they do not use the word "Purgatory," but they teach that there are two hells, from one of which there is no redemption; and they pray for the dead. "In all other points of doctrine," says Hefele, "they are in full agreement with the Latin Church," though we ought to add that they consider the marriage tie to be dissolved by adultery. In 1576 the Patriarch Jeremias of Constantinople sent a document to the Protestant theologians of Tübingen, in which he asserted the belief of his Church in the saving efficacy of good works, the seven sacraments, the change of the bread and wine into Christ's Body and Blood, the necessity of detailed confession to a priest, the veneration due to the saints, the utility of prayers for the dead, and the sanctity of the monastic life. The Greeks offered a stubborn resistance to Cyril Lucar, Patriarch of Alexandria, and afterwards of Constantinople, who endeavoured to introduce among his own people the doctrines which he had learnt in Geneva. He was driven repeatedly from his see, and finally murdered by the Janissaries in 1638. During the controversy of Arnauld and Nicole with the Calvinist Claude on transubstantiation, the most distinguished Greek theologians were asked for their opinion, and gave it in the most decided way for the Catholic doctrine.

There are, however, great differences on points of ritual and discipline between Latins and Greeks, whether united or schismatic. The Greek Church retains its ancient and beautiful rites. Mass is celebrated throughout Turkey in Greek, except where the "orthodox" community is Slav or Roumanian. The liturgy of St. Chrysostom is used all the year round, that of St. Basil only on certain fixed days. Leavened bread is consecrated at Mass. During Lent, except on Saturdays and Sundays, there is no Mass in the proper sense, but only a "Mass of the Presanctified," corresponding to our office on Good Friday. The liturgies for Mass, and the forms for the administration of the sacraments, are contained in the "Euchologion," of which an excellent edition by the Dominican Goar was published at Paris in 1647. The canonical hours are given in the "Horologion," the office for Lent in the "Triodion," that from Easter Sunday to the octave of Pentecost in the "Pentecostarion." The Heortologion is a calendar of the feasts, fasts, and ferias; the "Typicon," an Ordo which marks the order of prayers in the office, while the "Menaea" contains lives of the saints honoured in the East. The greater feasts of our Lord and the Blessed Virgin are nearly the same as with us, except that their Epiphany or Theophany on January 6 merely commemorates the baptism of Christ, and that the greater solemnities are preceded by a Proeortia or Ante-feast. Sunday is sanctified by hearing Mass and resting from servile work, and holidays of obligation are observed in the same manner, the number of these holidays being different in different nations.

Every Wednesday and Friday, and the vigils of the great feasts, are fasting-days. In addition to Lent, the Greeks keep the fast of "the Mother of God," from August 1 to August 15; the fast of Christmas, from November 15 to December 24; the fast of the Apostles St. Peter and St. Paul, from the first Sunday after Pentecost to June 28. On Wednesdays and Fridays, and during Lent, the use, not only of meat, but of fish, eggs, milk, cheese, wine, beer and oil is strictly forbidden.

The Greek canon law is based on the Apostolic canons and constitutions, the canons of the Councils of Nicaea, Constantinople, Ephesus, Chalcedon, in Trullo; on the canons of the particular councils held at Gangra, Laodicea, and Antioch; on the canonical letters of the bishops; on the council of Photius, and the synodal decrees of the schismatic Patriarchs. Mgr. Pap-Szilagyi has made a methodical compendium of these documents in his "Enchiridion Juris Ecclesiae Orientalis."

GREEK CHURCH, UNITED. [See UNITED GREEK CHURCH.]

GREGORIAN ALTAR. An altar in the church of St. Gregory in Rome specially privileged; historically the first to be enriched with a plenary indulgence for the relief of the souls in Purgatory gained without other conditions by a celebration at it of a Mass. Altars in other places have from time to time been privileged ad instar—that is, in the same degree as that of St. Gregory in Rome. All indulgences for the dead are imparted ad modum suffragii: that is, they are no longer the direct application by the Church to a soul of the merits of Christ, of our Lady and the Saints, in satisfaction for the debt of temporal punishment due for sin, but are a supplication to that effect made to God by His Spouse the Church. In the case of the Gregorian Altar indulgence, holy Church, as it were, is more instant in this prayer, and in particular has recourse to the intercession of St. Gregory, regarded as a special patron of the souls in Purgatory. So great has become the reliance of the faithful on the certainty that God will hear the prayer of the Church on behalf of souls for whom Mass is said at a Gregorian altar that the delivering by every one of these Masses of at least one soul from Purgatory has become a popular belief. By a decree of December 12, 1912, no further concession of Gregorian altars, or of altars ad instar, will be granted. (Moccheggiani, "De Indulgentiis"; "Acta Ap. Sedis," vol. v. p. 32.)

GREGORIAN MUSIC. [See CHANT.]

GREGORIAN SACRAMENTARY. [See LITURGIES.]

GREMIALE. A piece of cloth, often adorned with gold or silver lace, which is placed on the bishop's lap when he sits in celebrating Mass or conferring orders. Probably its original purpose was to keep his vestments from being soiled. It must be distinguished from a similar vestment, the "subcinctorium," which is used by the Pope only. (Meratus on Gavantus, tom. i. p. ii. tit. 1.) The use of the Gremiale was not confined to bishops in mediaeval times: the celebrant, deacon, and subdeacon had each their "Lap-cloth" at High Mass. (Rock, i. 334 sqq.; Braun, "Die Liturgische Gewandung," 123.)

GREY FRIARS. Franciscan Friars were so called on account of the original colour of their habit, which was slate-coloured. They now wear a brown habit [see FRANCISCANS], except the Conventuals, whose habit is black. The latter are not to be confounded with the Black Friars, i.e. the Dominicans, so called from the black mantle which they wear over their white habit. The General of the Conventuals wears grey, and his Friars are returning to the use of that colour. Franciscan Cardinals have their robes of this hue.

GUARDIAN. I. A person responsible in the eye of the law for the proper bringing up of children whose father is dead or incapable. Under the ancient discipline, a cleric might not act as guardian, lest he should be too much entangled in worldly business; and e converso, a Council of Carthage decreed that a guardian should not be ordained to any ecclesiastical function till the period of his responsibility had come to an end. (Smith and Cheetham.)

II. The superior of a Franciscan convent (in mediaeval English, called "Warden"). He is elected for three years, and cannot hold the guardianship of the same convent twice, though he may be chosen head of another convent. [ABBOT, FRANCISCANS.]

GUARDIAN ANGEL. [See ANGEL, p. 24.]

GUILDS. [See GILDS.]

GUNPOWDER PLOT. [See ENGLISH CHURCH, persecution period.]

GYROVAGI (lit. "circuit-wanderers"). There was a class of spurious monks in the early Christian centuries—nor were they unknown even to the Middle Ages—who were without real piety, and, like the tramps of modern times, preferred a lazy rambling life to one of steady regular activity. St. Benedict mentions them by this name in his Rule, and describes them as the fourth, last, and worst kind of monks—men who "spend their life in travelling up and down the different provinces, lodging in each cell [= monastery] some three or four days; always wandering, never stable; enslaved to their own pleasures and to gluttony; and worse in all respects than the Sarabaitae" (the third class of monks, those who lived in twos and threes). More than a hundred years later, the Synod in Trullo (691) (Hefele-Leclercq, iii. p. 568), when regulating monastic discipline, orders that a man who wishes to be recognized as a true monk shall pass three years at least in the same monastery, and that "the vagabonds calling themselves hermits, clad in black, and with long hair," be driven away from the cities into the desert. This is evidently the same class of persons as those whom St. Benedict calls "Gyrovagi."

H

HAIL, MARY. [See AVE MARIA.]

HALO. [See AUREOLE.]

HEARSE. The word is now understood to mean the car in which a coffin is carried at a funeral. Formerly, however, it meant a framework for holding candles, and was used at funerals and at Tenebrae [HOLY WEEK, p. 418]. "Hearse" (hericia, herice) is a corruption from herpex, a harrow. "It would seem that the idea of a harrow was suggested by the spiky points of the prickets upon which the candles were fixed. It is the same word as that still used in connection with arrangements for funerals. The body as it lay in state was wont to be canopied in former times with some sort of an erection in wood or iron provided with prickets for a multitude of tapers. This also suggested the idea of a harrow, and the word was gradually transferred from the construction above the coffin to any receptacle, fixed or movable, in which the coffin was placed" (Thurston, "Lent and Holy Week," 258).[1] It is still used at the funeral service of the Pope, and sometimes of other distinguished personages. (See Rock, ii. 399, where evidence of its favour in England in Catholic days is given. It was in use in London as late as fifty years ago.)

HEART OF JESUS (SACRED HEART). The special and formal devotion to the Heart of Jesus owes its origin to a French Visitation nun, the Blessed Margaret Mary Alacoque, who lived in the latter part of the seventeenth century. Her biographers relate that our Lord Himself appeared to her and declared that this worship was most acceptable to Him; and her director, the famous Jesuit, Father de la Colombière, preached the devotion at the Court of St. James's, and zealously propagated it elsewhere. The most popular book in defence of the new devotion was that of Father Gallifet, S.J., "De Cultu SS. Cordis Jesu in variis Christiani orbis partibus jam propagato." It was published with a dedication to Benedict XIII. and with the approval of Lambertini (afterwards Benedict XIV.); the French translation appeared in 1745, at Lyons. On February 6, 1765,[2] Clement XIII. permitted several churches to celebrate the feast of the Sacred Heart, which was extended in 1856 to the whole Church. It is generally kept on the Friday (or on the Sunday) after the Octave of Corpus Christi. In England, Ireland, Italy, France, Netherlands, Germany, Spain, and Portugal, indeed throughout the Catholic world, the devotion and the feast found a ready and enthusiastic acceptance. However, the worship of the Sacred Heart encountered keen opposition, particularly from the Jansenists. They who practised it were nicknamed "Cardiolatrae" or "Cordicolae," and charged with Nestorianism, as if they worshipped a divided Christ, and gave to the created humanity of Christ worship which belonged to God alone. The Jansenist objections were censured as injurious to the Apostolic See—which had approved the devotion, and bestowed numerous indulgences in its favour—by Pius VI. in his condemnation of the Jansenist Synod of Pistoia. This condemnation was issued in the bull "Auctorem fidei," bearing date August 28, 1794. A further approval of the devotion was implied in the beatification of Margaret Mary Alacoque in 1864.

The bull "Auctorem fidei" contains the following explanation of the principle on which the devotion rests—an explanation which is at once authoritative and clear. The faithful worship with supreme adoration the physical Heart of Christ considered "not as mere flesh but as united to the Divinity." They adore it as "the Heart of the Person of the Word to which it is inseparably united." It is of course absurd to speak of this principle as novel; it is as old as the belief in the hypostatic union, and it was solemnly defined in 431 at the Council of Ephesus. All the members of Christ united to the rest of His sacred humanity and to the Eternal Word are the object of divine worship. If it be asked further why the heart is selected as the object of special adoration, the answer is that the real and physical heart is a natural symbol of Christ's exceeding charity, and of His interior life. Just as the Church in the Middle Ages turned with singular devotion to the Five Wounds as the symbol of Christ's Passion, so in these later days she bids us have recourse to His Sacred Heart, mindful of the love wherewith He loved us "even to the end." Nothing could be made of the fact, if it were a fact, that the devotion actually began with Blessed Margaret Mary, for though the doctrine of the Church cannot change, she may, and does from time to time, introduce new forms of devotion. But the special devotion to the Heart of our Saviour is as old at least at the twelfth century, while early in the sixteenth the Carthusian Lansperg recommended pious Christians to assist their devotion by using a figure of the Sacred Heart.[1]

[1] "The French herse also acquired the meaning 'portcullis,' the pointed bars of which were naturally likened to the blades of a harrow; and it seems probable that it is to this latter sense that we owe the older English meaning of hearse." (The Romance of Words, by E. Weekley, p. 75.)

[2] The Congregation of Rites had refused to sanction the feast in 1697 and 1729.

[1] See F. Ryder's quotations (Catholic Controversy, pp. 148-9) from the Vitis Mystica, a series of meditations printed among the works of St. Bernard, c. iii. 8, and from Lanspergius, Divini Amoris Pharetra, ed. 1572, p. 78.

(An account of the theology of the devotion will be found in Card. Franzelin, "De Incarnatione," and of the propagation of the devotion in the admirable Life of Blessed Margaret Mary by F. Tickell, S.J.; Bainvel, Cœur Sacré de Jésus, in DThC; Dalgairns, "Devotion to the S. Heart of Jesus." Both the doctrine and the history are exhaustively treated by Nilles, "De Rationibus Festorum Sacratissimi Cordis Jesu et Purissimi Cordis Mariae," 1873.)

HEART OF MARY IMMACULATE. The principles on which the devotion rests are the same (mutatis mutandis) as those which are the foundation of the Catholic devotion to the Sacred Heart. Just as Catholics worship the Sacred Heart because it is united to the Person of the Word, so they venerate(with hyperdulia, see CULTUS) the heart of Mary because united to the person of the Blessed Virgin. In each case the physical heart is taken as a natural symbol of charity and of the inner life, though of course the charity and virtues of Mary are infinitely inferior to those of her Divine Son.

The devotion to the Immaculate Heart was first propagated by Blessed John Eudes, founder of a congregation of priests called after him Eudists. [See that art.] Eudes died in 1680. The Congregation of Rites in 1669, and again in 1726, declined to sanction the devotion. However, a local celebration of the feast was permitted (but without proper Mass and office) by Pius VI. in 1799; and in 1855 Pius IX. extended the permission to the whole Church. The Arch-confraternity of the Immaculate Heart established some twenty years earlier at the church of Notre Dame des Victoires, in Paris, did much to spread the devotion and make it popular.

HEAVEN. An account of the joy which constitutes the essential happiness of heaven has been given in the articles on the BEATIFIC VISION and on BEATITUDE. In these articles, particularly in the former, it has been shown that all the blessed see God face to face, some, however, more perfectly than others, according to the degree of their merit, and that the soul's entrance into perfect bliss is not deferred till sentence has been passed at the day of judgment. Here, however, it is as well to point out that heaven is not only a state but a place of beatitude. It is the place where God manifests His glory to the blessed, and clearly shows Himself to them. This appears from the fact that Christ has ascended to heaven in that body which He took from Mary, and that the body of Mary herself is, according to the belief of the Church, already reunited to her soul, so that she is, body and soul, with her Divine Son. Since, then, the sacred humanity is not omnipresent, heaven is a definite place in which Christ and the Blessed Virgin exist, and in which the angels and blessed souls are gathered together. After the general resurrection heaven will also be the home in which the bodies of the just will live for ever. Where the place is we do not know, but Scripture clearly indicates that it is beyond this earth. (See Jungmann, "De Novissimis," a. viii.)

We may here add a few words on "the third heaven" of which St. Paul speaks, 2 Cor. xii. 2-4. Catholic commentators are not agreed about the meaning of the words "caught up," and it is of course lawful to hold, as St. Thomas appears to do (1^a, q. 68, a. 4), that St. Paul was simply raised to the highest kind of supernatural vision. But in any case the metaphor implies belief in a corresponding reality, and hence St. Thomas maintains (loc. cit.) that there are three heavens, viz. the sidereal, the crystalline, and the empyrean, the last of which is heaven in the proper sense. Further, it is generally taken for granted that St. Paul identifies this third heaven with paradise. There is a difficulty, however, in supposing that the Apostle alludes to this triple division, for the statement of Grotius, that the Rabbins recognised three heavens, is unsupported by good evidence. There is some Rabbinical authority for the belief in two heavens, but the Jewish doctors almost unanimously taught that there were seven, and we find this belief recognized in a Christian document of the second century—viz. the "Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs," iii. § 3. The probability, therefore, is that St. Paul alludes to this belief without necessarily asserting its truth. We may, then, reasonably distinguish "the third heaven" from paradise. The former was a resting-point on the journey upwards, whether that journey was local or merely spiritual: the latter marks the end of the journey, the "Paradise of God," or heaven in the usual acceptation of the word. This distinction between "the third heaven" and paradise is in keeping with St. Paul's own language. "I know a man . . . . caught up . . . . even to the third heaven . . . . and I know of such a man . . . . that he was caught up into paradise." This distinction is made by several Fathers as well as by Estius and others among modern commentators.

HEBDOMADARIUS. A name used in churches and monasteries for the cleric or monk who takes his turn for presiding in choir during the week (ἑβδομάς, a week). The word is found in the Roman Breviary in the rubrics at Prime and Compline. (Ducange.)

HELL may be defined as the place and state in which the devils and such human beings as die in enmity with God suffer eternal torment. In this article we have to consider the proofs for the existence of hell, the nature of the punishment there inflicted, and the eternity of these torments. This triple division of the subject arranges the difficulties attached to it in an ascending scale. No one who accepts the Christian revelation at all, no one perhaps who believes in a God at all, is likely to find much difficulty in believing that obstinate and unrepented sin will be punished in the next world. It is much harder to ascertain the nature of the torments which God reserves for those who die in rebellion against Him; while the dogma of eternal punishment is undoubtedly one of the most awful and mysterious truths taught by Scripture and the Church.

1. The Existence of Hell.—The Hebrew Bible contains few direct and clear announcements of a life beyond the grave, so that it is not the place to which we should naturally turn for the proofs that hell exists. Three passages are most commonly quoted as decisive on the point—viz. Isa. xxxiii. 14; Isa. lxvi. 24; Dan. xii. 2. The first of these must, we think, be put aside, for it has no real connection with the matter before us. Isaiah, writing probably at the close of his life, foretells the judgments of God which are to fall both on the Assyrians and on the immoral and irreligious part of the Jewish nation. This judgment, by a metaphor familiar in the Hebrew Scriptures, he describes as fire which is, like God Himself, eternal. "Sinners shudder in Sion: trembling seizes unholy men. O who will dwell in devouring fire? O who will dwell in eternal burnings? A man who walketh in justice, and speaketh upright things, who rejecteth the gain of oppression, who shaketh his hands, so that they lay not hold of a bribe, who stoppeth his ears so that they hear no deeds of blood, and closeth his eyes so as not to look on evil—he shall dwell on heights; fastnesses of rocks are his fortress; his bread has been given to him, his waters are sure. The king in his beauty shall thine eyes behold; they shall see a land that stretches far." In other words, the fire which consumes the wicked will leave the just man unharmed: he will be secure from the sword and the famine. Then, when the Assyrian is destroyed, he will see the King of Judah in the fulness of his royal splendour, the city no longer beleaguered, the land no longer held by the foe, but peacefully inhabited by its rightful owners and stretching to its ancient limits.

The second passage (Isa. lxvi. 24) comes near the point, if it does not actually touch it. It clearly refers to the Messianic age. "All flesh" is to come and worship at Jerusalem, "from new moon to new moon, from sabbath to sabbath." "And they shall go out and look on the corpses of the men who rebelled against me, for their worm shall not die, and their fire shall not be quenched, and they shall be an abomination to all flesh." Immediately, of course, the prophet only mentions the dead bodies of the wicked, but we may reasonably suppose that the prophet is depicting punishment in the future world in imagery borrowed from that in which he lived. For it is impossible to take his words literally. "All flesh" could not gather in Jerusalem; worms cannot live in fire, or dead bodies continue to burn for ever. The heavenly Jerusalem and the eternal sufferings of the lost are the real object of his prophecy. Such is the interpretation found in the Targum, and so, as we shall presently see, the words of Isaiah are applied in the deutero-canonical books, and by our Lord Himself. We say applied, for neither the deutero-canonical books nor our Lord give an authoritative explanation of the prophet's actual meaning.

The words of Daniel xii. 1, 2, are more definite. A time of trouble such as has never been known is to come. Michael, however, is to stand up for the people of God, and everyone whose name is written in the book is to be delivered. "And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth" (literally, "earth of the dust," i.e. grave) shall awake, some to eternal life, and some to shame and to everlasting contempt." Here we have an explicit statement that some will meet with eternal punishment. We must beware, however, of pressing the words further. Even if the word רַבִּים which in all other places means "many," could be regarded here (cf. Romans v. 15, οἱ πολλοὶ ἀπέθανον, with Romans v. 12, εἰς πάντας ἀνθρώπους ὁ θάνατος διῆλθεν) as equivalent to "all," this sense is absolutely excluded in the passage before us by the construction (i.e. by the partitive מִן which follows). To say that "many from or out of those who sleep in the dust" means "all who sleep," &c., is not to interpret language, but to abuse it.

There are two passages in the deutero-canonical books, in which the language of Isa. lxvi. 24 is evidently borrowed, but at the same time applied more definitely to the future sufferings of the wicked. "Humble thy soul exceedingly," says the book of Ecclesiasticus vii. 17; "remember that wrath will not tarry, and that fire and worm take vengeance on the impious." And in Judith xvi. 17 we read "Woe to the nations that rise up against my people: the Almighty Lord will take vengeance on them in the day of judgment, appointing fire and worms for their flesh, and feeling it they will weep for ever." The last passage is very important from an historical point of view. It is well known that the Talmudical doctors disputed whether immortality and resurrection were common to the bad and the good, or reserved for the latter; and, again, whether any but Israelites partook in the future life. The book of Judith speaks clearly on this question.

No one doubts that the New Testament teaches the existence of hell; and here it is enough to refer to such passages as Mt. xviii. 8, xxv. 41 sqq.; Mk. ix. 48, &c. The New Testament has a special name for hell, viz. Gehenna (γέεννα), which occurs repeatedly in St. Matthew (v. 22, 29, 30, x. 28, xviii. 9, xxiii. 15, 33); three times in St. Mark (ix. 43, 45, 47); once in St. Luke (xii. 5); and once in St. James (iii. 6). The name, which is taken from the Hebrew Bible (גֵּי הִנֹּם Jos. xv. 8, or more fully גֵּי בֶן־הִנֹּם בְּנֵי ה״), simply means "the valley of [a man called] Hinnom." It was a deep and narrow glen to the south of Jerusalem, in which from the time of Ahaz Jews offered their children to Moloch. Josiah in consequence of these abominations polluted the valley (4 Kgs. xxiii. 10), and into it the dead bodies of criminals and every kind of filth were cast, and, if we follow late and somewhat questionable authorities, were burned. Thus it became the image of, and gave a name to, the place of punishment for the wicked after death—a usage which is common to the Targums and to Rabbinical literature generally.[1] It would be useless in this place to produce evidence from Christian traditions and from the definitions of the Church, since we shall have to discuss them in considering the eternity of punishment.

2. The Nature of the Punishment.—Theologians divide the punishments of the damned into that of loss and that of sense. The former of these ("poena damni") is indicated in our Lord's words "Depart from me, ye cursed," and consists in the deprivation of the vision of God, which each human soul was intended to enjoy. It is from the knowledge of the bliss which they have forfeited that the chief suffering of the lost arises. It is the loss of the kingdom of heaven, as St. Chrysostom explains at length ("Ad Theodor. laps." i. n. 10, 12; PG, xlvii. 289, 290), which is the most bitter torment of all. "So great a punishment," says St. Augustine ("Enchir." c. 112, PL, xl. 285), "that no torments known to us can be compared to it."

The "punishment of the sense" ("poena sensus") comprehends all the suffering and torment inflicted in hell, except that which springs from the loss of the sovereign good. The origin of this term is uncertain. Suarez ("De Angel." lib. viii. c. 12, quoted by Jungmann) supposes that this class of torture is so called because it arises chiefly from a sensible substance, viz. fire. This explanation is not accepted by all, but of course the term cannot mean punishment inflicted on the senses, for separated souls who have no senses are still undoubtedly subjected to the "poena sensus."

However this may be, it is certain that the devils and disembodied spirits of the damned suffer from material fire. True, Origen ("De Princip." ii. 10 seq., PG, xi. 236) distinctly teaches that the fire of hell is merely figurative, while St. Ambrose (in Luc. xiv.) and Theophylact (in Marc. ix.) express the same opinion. Petavius, however ("De Angel." iii. 5), has shown that the preponderating weight of tradition is on the other side, and sums up this part of the question in the following words: "At present all theologians—nay, all Christians—are agreed that the fire of hell is corporeal and material, though, as Vasquez rightly observes, the matter has not been settled as yet by any decree of the Church." To those who ask how material fire can affect spirits no certain answer can be given. St. Thomas ("Suppl." q. 70, a. 3) thinks that God gives to the fire as the instrument of His justice a preternatural power of constraining the spirit and impeding its action, so as to cause intense suffering. Other theories have been propounded—e.g. by Suarez, who argues that just as God elevates and ennobles the soul by grace, so He may use the fire of hell to deform and disfigure it. But it is really impossible to understand much about a question which is above our reason and on which revelation is silent.

Though the fire of hell is the chief it is by no means the only cause of the positive punishment. The lost are afflicted by "the worm which never dies"—i.e. by the anguish of remorse. They are doomed to endure the society of others reprobate like themselves and they know that all hope is over. Their will is entirely depraved because entirely averted from God, the end to which each thought and action should be directed. After the resurrection the body also is subjected to torment.

Further, it is certain from Scripture and tradition that the torments of hell are inflicted in a definite place. But it is uncertain where the place is. According to the common opinion of Fathers and theologians, it is in the centre of the earth, but many other theories have been propounded, and St. Thomas ("Suppl." q. 97, a. 7), quoting St. Augustine ("De Civ. Dei," xv. cap. 16) and St. Gregory the Great ("Dial." iv. cap. 42, PL, lxxvii. 400), admits that no one can know where hell is unless he has had a special revelation on the point. St. Thomas himself thinks it "more probable" that hell is under the earth.

3. The Eternity of Punishment in Hell.—Here, as we have already said, we reach the most awful and mysterious part of the subject, and one which, at a time when the Catholic doctrine of eternal punishment is rejected and attacked by so many and with such vehemence, it is necessary to treat carefully and in detail. We begin with the teaching of Scripture.

(a) Our Lord's words are plain enough to make reasonable doubt impossible. He speaks of "the eternal fire," Mt. xviii. 8; of "hell," where their worm dieth not and their fire is not quenched," Mk. ix. 48. He tells us that

He will say to the wicked at the last day "Depart from me, ye cursed, into the eternal fire, prepared for the devil and his angels." Daniel, long before Christ, had held similar language (see xii. 2, quoted above), and so do the Apostles after Christ (2 Thess. i. 9; Jude 13; Apoc. xiv. 11).

Now, it may be admitted that the word translated "eternal" (αἰώνιος) is not in itself decisive. Thus in Titus i. 2 St. Paul mentions the hope which God, who cannot lie, promised "before eternal times," where the Greek πρὸ χρόνων αἰωνίων is very happily rendered by the Vulgate "ante tempora saecularia." The promise of salvation had not, of course, been made from all eternity; it had been made long ages before by the prophets who are said in Lk. i. 70 to have been ἀπ' αἰῶνος (Vul. "a saeculo")—i.e. from of old or since the age of the prophets first began. Again, the word αἰώνιος in the LXX and the Hebrew noun to which it corresponds (עוֹלָם) are still more loosely used: e.g. (to quote the strongest instance which occurs to us), Isa. lviii. 12 predicts that the children of Israel "will build up the eternal ruins" (חָרְבוֹת עוֹלָם, αἱ ἔρημοι αἰώνιοι), though the ruins present to his mind had only been ruins for some fifty years. So much may be freely granted. But the fact that Christ sets eternal fire in sharp antithesis to eternal life assures us that He did mean to warn men that there was no hope in hell and no escape from it. Moreover, He speaks of fire which will never be quenched; of an undying worm; He declares it would have been better for Judas not to have been born; and He does not breathe a syllable which can be urged on the other side or applied to qualify His language about eternal fire. The celebrated Protestant commentator Meyer fully admits that the words "eternal fire" must be taken in their strict and absolute sense. Nobody will accuse Meyer of ignorance on the one hand, or on the other of prejudice in favour of the dogma. Nobody, we may be sure, would doubt Christ's meaning who considered it with a really unbiassed mind. The fact is, men persuade themselves that the doctrine is untrue and inhuman, and therefore that Christ, being the eternal truth, could not have taught it. Their exegesis will scarcely find acceptance either with Christians prepared to accept the doctrine or with non-Christians who come with purely historical interest to the study of the Gospels.

Here we turn for a moment to two passages alleged against the doctrine which we are maintaining from the dicta of the Apostles. One is from 1 Cor. xv. 24 seq. "Then is the end when He [Christ] shall give up the kingdom to the God and Father, when He shall bring to nought every princedom and authority and power; for He must needs reign, until He has put all His enemies under His feet. The last enemy that shall be brought to nought is death . . . . and when all things have been subjected to Him, then even the Son Himself will be subjected to Him [God] who subjected all things to Him [Christ], that God may be all in all." There are dogmatic and exegetical difficulties in this text which do not concern us here, but the last clause, "that God may be all in all," presents no difficulty to believers in eternal punishment. All are to be subject to Christ. Christ as man is and will be recognized as subject to God, and "God will be all in all"—i.e. will be seen to be the one source of every blessing in all the subjects of the kingdom of heaven. The context clearly limits the meaning of the word "all." God is not to be "all in all" to Christ's enemies. On the contrary, Christ is to put them under His feet.

The second passage is Acts iii. 20, 21, when St. Peter tells the Jews that the heavens must receive Christ "until the times of restoration of all things." The Apostle seems to mean that Christ will remain in heaven till the people of God are converted and renewed and their due and original relation to God restored; and this is the motive for penance which St. Peter urges. Our Lord's words, Mt. xvii. 11, "Elias indeed cometh and will restore all things," and the prophecy of Malachi iv. 6 (Heb. iii. 23), "Behold I send to you Elijah the prophet before the day of the Lord comes, the great and terrible [day]. And he will turn the heart of fathers to sons, and the heart of sons to their fathers, lest I come and smite the earth with a curse," probably supply the key to the sense. Anyhow, St. Peter has in mind a renewal and restoration which is to take place on earth and not in hell: before the judgment, not after it.

(β) Tradition.—The historical objections to the doctrine of eternal punishment may really be reduced to one head—viz. the views of Origen. In his "De Principiis," i. 6 (PG, xi. 169) this great man gives it as his opinion that even the devils will undergo a long course of purification and be saved at last; and in his commentary on Joshua (Hom. viii.) he asserts the same thing of men who have been condemned at the day of judgment. In "Princip." iii. 6 (PG, xi. 334) he puts forward the interpretation of St. Paul's words, "God will be all in all," which we combated a little back. Origen's piety, genius, and learning, and his reputation as a commentator on the Bible, gained for him a wide and an enduring influence in the Church, so that we cannot be surprised to find that other Fathers followed him in his hopes of a universal restoration. Petavius ("De Angelis," iii. 7) shows that St. Gregory Nyssen did so, that St. Gregory Nazianzen entertained the hope that the punishment of sinners in the next world would not last for ever—a hope which St. Jerome limits to such sinners as had died in the Catholic faith. St. Ambrose, as quoted by Petavius, says that men may, though angels will not, be purified and restored, even after an adverse sentence has been passed upon them at the judgment. Carefully to be distinguished from this error is the opinion of Augustine and other Fathers, viz. that the sufferings of lost souls may be mitigated by the prayers and good works of the faithful. "Concerning this amelioration of the condition of lost men at least" (so Petavius writes in words which Cardinal Newman has made familiar to all) "the Church as yet has laid down nothing as certain, so that for this reason this opinion held by Fathers of high sanctity is not to be dismissed offhand as absurd, though it differs from the common feeling of modern Catholics."[1]

We have tried to give as fairly as possible the patristic evidence for the view that the torments of hell will come to an end. But the whole stream of tradition runs in the contrary direction. There is no real trace of such a view within the Church before Origen's time. Theophilus of Antioch ("Apol." 1, ad fin.) contrasts the eternal joys of heaven with the eternal woes of hell. St. Irenaeus (iv. 28, 2, PG, vii. 1062) and St. Cyprian, ("Ad Demetrianum," cc. 24, 25; ed. Hartel, p. 368) express themselves in a way which puts their meaning beyond all possibility of misapprehension. "Those," says the former, "to whom Christ addresses the words 'Depart into everlasting fire' (perpetuum, not aeternum) will be always condemned, and those to whom He says 'Come, ye blessed,' &c., always obtain the kingdom." "Hell ever burning," says St. Cyprian, "will consume those who are given over to it, nor will there be any means by which their torments can ever rest or cease."

Petavius has collected a catena of passages from later Fathers, some of them expressly reprobating the error of Origen. It is doubtful whether or not his error was condemned at the Fifth General Council. Certainly his name stands in the present text of the eleventh anathema, which is levelled at "Arius, Eunomius, Apollinarius [sic], Nestorius, Eutyches, and Origen, together with their impious writings," and Hefele-Leclercq (iii. 121) defend the authenticity of the text as we have it against Garnier and many other critics. But no particular doctrine of Origen is mentioned in the anathema. Cardinal Noris and the Ballerini in their edition of his works tried to show that part of the Acts of the Council have perished, and that a special investigation and specific condemnation of Origen's errors took place. There are plausible grounds for this opinion, which is, however, rejected by Hefele (loc. cit. p. 71) after an elaborate discussion. He thinks that the Church historian Evagrius, one of the chief witnesses cited by Cardinal Noris, confused the general council of 553 with another held ten years earlier at the same place. But whether or no Origen was expressly condemned by a general council, it is a plain matter of fact that a council has defined that the punishment of hell lasts for ever. The Fourth Council of Lateran (anno 1215) speaks of the "everlasting punishment" (poenam perpetuam) which awaits the reprobate, and the force of the word "perpetuam" cannot be evaded even by those who explain away the word "eternal." And, apart even from this definition, the question is closed by the constant teaching of the Church through her pastors.

(γ) If we turn from the history of the doctrine to the doctrine itself, and ask "Is it reasonable or credible?" the difficulties are unquestionably great and terrible enough, and never have they been felt more keenly than in the present age. We must of course put aside erroneous or even unwarranted presentation of the Church's belief. God condemns no single soul unless He has first bestowed upon it full opportunity of securing a life of eternal happiness with Himself. Moreover, He desires the salvation of all, whether Catholics or Protestants, Christians or heathen, and will judge all according to the advantages or disadvantages they have had. "Thou sparest all, because they are Thine, O Lord, Thou lover of souls." Again, He remembers the frailty of our nature and condemns to eternal banishment from His presence those only who die separated utterly from Him by mortal—i.e. by deliberate and grievous—sin. Nor can we say who these persons are, or guess with any degree of probability what proportion they bear to the whole race of man. Sins which seem grievous to us may be excused by ignorance or want of deliberation, and even men who appear to end evil lives with evil deaths may nevertheless be enlightened by God's mercy at the last—perhaps just as their souls are passing out of their bodies—and so die in peace with Him. Even after these and other abatements have been made, the awful and mysterious character of the doctrine remains. Why does not God, who holds all hearts in His hand, turn the hearts of sinners to Himself? It is no answer to say that He chooses to confer the gift of free will on men with its attendant responsibilities, for it is the common doctrine of theologians that God could soften the heart of each and every sinner, and yet leave the freedom of the will in its integrity; and one who seriously reflects on the meaning of omnipotence as a divine attribute will scarcely venture to contradict the proposition. The only safe reply is that God so acts for reasons inscrutable to us, and that if reason cannot penetrate God's designs, it is at the same time unable to show that the conduct which the Scripture attributes to God is unjust. "Retributive justice," Cardinal Newman writes ("Grammar of Assent," p. 420), "is the very attribute under which God is primarily brought before us in the teachings of our natural conscience." If, then, God will by no means clear the guilty, it is not at any rate inconceivable that He should punish a man who ends the period of trial in utter rebellion against Him who is at once his sovereign and his loving benefactor, by the most extreme punishment which can be conceived. "The great mystery," to continue our quotation from Cardinal Newman—"the great mystery is. not that evil should have no end, but that it had a beginning." From this latter mystery there is no escape to those who believe in a God at all.

[1] Zaccaria, in his notes on Petavius, has shown that both in the East and West prayers were said in Mass for the damned. He cites, e.g., an ancient Latin Missal which contains a touching prayer for a person taken away without time for penance, beseeching God, if the dead man's crimes make it impossible for him to "rise to glory," at least to make his torments endurable.

Some other arguments have been adduced for the Catholic doctrine, but we have preferred to rest our belief on the words of merciful warning spoken by Christ Himself. For it is not surely without significance that it is from Christ Himself rather than from the Apostles that we have the plainest statements of the doctrine.

> Christ on Himself, considerate Master, took
> The utterance of that doctrine's fearful sound;
> The fount of love His servants sends to tell > Love's deeds; Himself proclaims the sinner's hell.

(The subject is treated by the dogmatic theologians in their commentaries on Peter Lombard, Sent. iv., dist. 44–50 and St. Thomas, 1ª, q. 64, and Suppl. qq. 97–99; also in their treatises "De Deo Creatore," and in special treatises "De Novissimis" or "Eschatologia," e.g. Palmieri, Billot, Atzberger; Oxenham, "Eschatology"; Wilhelm and Scannell, "Cath. Theol." ii. 546; for the teaching of the Fathers, Petavius, "Dogmata Theol." De Angelis, lib. iii. cc. 4–8; Richard in DThC, Enfer.)

HENOTICON (ἑνωτικὸν, instrument of union). The Emperor Zeno, wishing to put an end to the controversies between Catholics and Monophysites, published his famous Henoticon, which both parties were to sign. In it both Nestorius and Eutyches were condemned, and St. Cyril's anathemas were approved; but a creed other than that of Nicaea-Constantinople was inserted, and both of the expressions "one nature," "two natures," were studiously avoided. Instead of bringing about re-union it satisfied neither party, but rather produced further dissension. (See MONOPHYSITES, p. 600; PL, lviii. 963–1096; Hefele-Leclercq, ii. 865 sqq.; Duchesne, "Hist. Anc. de l'Église," iii. 503 sqq. Gibbon (c. xlvii.) and his editor, J. B. Bury, applaud the statesmanlike character of the edict.)

HEORTOLOGY (ἑορτή, a feast). The study of the origin, meaning, and development of the Church's feasts. (See FEASTS OF THE CHURCH; Kellner, "Heortology," Eng. tr.; Guyet, "Héortologie.")

HERESY (αἵρεσις, from αἱρεῖσθαι, to choose) is used in a later Greek (e.g. by Sextus Empiricus) to denote a philosophical sect or party. In the Acts of the Apostles (e.g. v. 17, xv. 5) it is applied to the parties of Sadducees and Pharisees, who were divided from each other in religious and political views. But in the New Testament we also find the word employed in a distinctly bad sense. In 1 Cor. xi. 18, it indicates an aggravated form of division (διχοστασία) among Christians—i.e. of division grown into distinct and organized party. We find St. Paul (Gal. v. 19) placing "heresies" on the same level with the most heinous sins, and St. Peter (2 Ep. ii. 1) speaks of false teachers among Christians, who will bring in "heresies [or sects] of perdition." St. Ignatius in his epistles also uses the word as a term of bitter reproach, and Tertullian ("Praescript." 5 and 6, PL, ii. 17, 18) accurately draws out the meaning of the term. The name, he says, is given to those who of their own will choose false doctrine, either instituting sects themselves, or receiving the false doctrine of sects already founded. He adds that a heretic is condemned by the very fact of his choosing for himself, since a Christian has no such liberty of choice, but is bound to receive the doctrine which the Apostles received from Christ.

The nature of heresy is further explained by St. Thomas, 2ª 2æ, q. 11. Heresy implies a profession of Christian belief, so that persons who have never been Christians, or who have utterly renounced Christianity, are infidels and apostates, but not heretics. The heretic, he says, is right in the end which he proposes or professes to propose to himself—viz. the profession of Christian truth—but he errs in his choice of the means he takes to secure this end, for he refuses to believe one or more of the articles of faith, "determined by the authority of the universal Church." St. Thomas adds that this rejection of Catholic dogma must be deliberate and pertinacious, so that his teaching, which is that of all theologians, may be summed up in the following definition. Heresy is error pertinaciously held and manifestly repugnant to the faith, on the part of one who professes the faith of Christ. It is clear from this that such Protestants as are in good faith and sincerely desirous of knowing the truth are not heretics in the formal sense, inasmuch as they do not pertinaciously reject the Church's teaching. Their heresy is material only—i.e. their tenets are in themselves heretical, but they are not formal heretics: i.e. they do not incur the guilt of heresy, and may belong to the soul of the Church.

Formal heresy is a most grievous sin, for it involves rebellion against God, who requires us to submit our understandings to the doctrine of His Church. This guilt, if externally manifested, is visited by the Church with the greater excommunication, absolution from which, except in the article of death, can only be given by the Pope, although the power of imparting it is communicated to bishops, under certain restrictions, in their quinquennial faculties, and to priests, in missionary countries, such as England. Ecclesiastics who fall into heresy are liable to irregularity, perpetual deprivation of their offices and benefices, and to deposition and degradation. The sons of an heretical mother, the sons and grandsons of an heretical father, need a dispensation from the Holy See for entering the clerical state.[1] (Ferraris, Haeresis; Taunton; for the different heresies see ARIANS, DONATISTS, &c., Choupin in DAp.)

HERMAS. The author of a book entitled "The Shepherd," one of the collection known as the "Apostolic Fathers" (q.v.).

HERMENEUTICS (ἑρμηνεύω, interpret). The principles of the right interpretation of the Bible. These are generally dealt with in General Introductions to Holy Scripture and also in special treatises under the titles of "Hermeneutica Sacra, Biblica," &c., e.g. Szekely, "Hermeneutica Biblica Generalis"; Gigot, "General Introduction to the Study of the Scriptures," part iii. [See BIBLE (3).]

HERMESIANISM. The name is given to principles on the relation of reason to faith which were propounded by George Hermes, a German priest and professor (1775–1831). These principles were accepted with enthusiasm by many German Catholics, were vehemently attacked by others, and were finally condemned by the Holy See.

Although his writings and lectures excited great opposition, particularly during the last six years of his life, no authoritative condemnation of them appeared till 1835, when Gregory XVI. censured his "Introduction to Theology," parts 1 and 2 (Münster, 1819 and 1829), and the first part of his Dogmatic Theology (published after the death of Hermes, Münster, 1834). The same Pope, by a decree of the Congregation of the Index, declared that the second and third parts of the Dogmatic Theology were included in the previous condemnation. The chief error of Hermes lay in his theory that Christians ought to begin by doubting everything which was not self-evident, and hold themselves loose in theory from the faith they had been taught till it had been demonstrated to their satisfaction by reason. Some of his disciples held obstinately to their master's doctrine, and the former condemnations were repeated by Pius IX. in 1847. Finally the Vatican Council (sess. iii. ch. iv.) defined the freedom of the act of faith and its supernatural character. (Franzelin, "De Divina Traditione et Scriptura," p. 686; Kleutgen, "La Philosophie Scolastique" (French tr.), i. 432; Vacant, "Études Théologiques sur les Constitutions du Concile du Vatican," i. 124 sqq., ii. 67 sqq.; Schulte in "Cath. Enc."; Kessel in "Kirchenlex."; Fortescue in "Enc. of Religion and Ethics.")

HERMITS. Eremita (from the Gr. ἐρῆμος, desert), a dweller in the desert. Anchorite (ἀναχωρητής, one who has retired from the world) has the same meaning. On the life of St. Paul the first hermit, who was born in the Thebaid about 230, and died in 342, after ninety years spent in solitude, see Alban Butler for Jan. 15, and the "Acta Sanctorum." Though the lives of the hermits are not proposed by the Church for the imitation of ordinary Christians, she holds them up for our admiration, as men who, committing themselves to the might of divine love, buoyed up by continual prayer, and chastened by life-long penance, have vanquished the weakness and the yearning of nature, and found it possible to live for God alone. "They appear to some," says St. Augustine,[1] "to have abandoned human things more than is right, but such do not understand how greatly their souls profit us in the way of prayer, and their lives in the way of example, though we are not allowed to see their faces in the flesh." St. Paul fled to the desert during the persecution of Decius, when he was twenty-two years old, and never afterwards left it. He was visited in his cell by St. Anthony shortly before he died (see his Life by St. Jerome). Experience soon proved that it was seldom safe for a man to essay the life of a solitary at the beginning of his religious career. The prudent plan was found to be, to spend some years in a monastery, in rigorous conformity to all the ascetical rules of the coenobitic life, and then, the spiritual strength being tested and the passions subdued, to pass on to the hermit's cell. Thus we read in Surius ("Vita Euthymii Abbatis") of an abbot Gerasimus, who presided over a great monastery near the Jordan, round which there was a Laura consisting of seventy separate cells. Gerasimus kept everyone who came to him for some years in the monastery; then, if he thought him fit for solitary life, and the disciple himself aspired to it, he allowed him to occupy one of the cells, where he lived during five days in the week on bread and water, in perfect solitude, but on Saturday and Sunday rejoined his brethren in the monastery and fared as they did.

On the Hermits of St. Austin, and those instituted by St. Romuald, see AUGUSTINIAN HERMITS and CAMALDOLI. Among the more famous English hermits were Bartholomew of Farne, St. Godric of Finchale, and St. Wulfric of Haslebury; all these flourished in the twelfth century. St. Cuthbert lived an eremitical life on Farne Island for nine years, from 676 to 685. Hélyot, in his history of the monastic orders, mentions a Spanish order of Hermits of St. John of Penance and two Italian orders, one called Coloriti, the other, of Monte Senario. (Rosweyde, "Vitae Patrum," PL lxxiii. lxxiv.; Hélyot, iii., iv., viii.)

HEROIC ACT. It will be best to explain what is meant by this expression by quoting the words of the S.C. of Indulgences (Dec. 18, 1885). "The Heroic Act of Charity in favour of the souls detained in purgatory consists in this, that a member of the Church militant, either using a set formula or simply by an act of his will, offers to God for the souls in purgatory all the satisfactory works which he performs in his lifetime, and also all the suffrages which may accrue to him after his death. Many Christians devoted to the B.V. Mary . . . . make it a practice to deposit the said merits and suffrages as it were into her hands that she may distribute these favours to the souls in purgatory according to her own merciful pleasure." Of this latter devotion the great apostle is the Venerable Grignon de Montfort. The Act is not properly a vow, as it is revocable at will. It is called "heroic" because it involves the readiness to undergo the pains of purgatory oneself in order that others may escape them. The Heroic Act has been enriched with many indulgences and privileges. (J. Wilhelm in "Cath. Enc."; Thalhofer in "Kirchenlex." Liebesact, heroischer.)

HEROIC VIRTUE. [See CANONIZATION.]

HESYCHASTS (Gr. ἡσυχος, quiet). So called because they held the opinion, shared by the Quietists of later times [QUIETISM], that the absolute repose of all the faculties both of mind and body was the best preparation by which the soul was made fit to receive divine communications. The monks of Athos in the fourteenth century endeavoured to reduce this quietism to a system, adopting the principles of a certain abbot Simeon, who, in a work written about three centuries before, had taught that if the body was kept motionless day and night, the mind raised above transitory things, the eyes steadily fixed on the contemplative's own navel, and the thought searching for the place of the heart within the frame, the result would be, if the monk persevered long enough, that he would find himself enveloped in a wonderful light and full of discernment. Barlaam, a Calabrian abbot, returning from Italy about 1340, where he had been negotiating for the termination of the Greek schism, met some of these monks at Thessalonica and fell into controversy with them. He called them "omphalopsychi" on account of the singular tenet above mentioned. They maintained that the light which Simeon spoke of was none other than the uncreated light which the disciples saw on Mount Tabor, during the Transfiguration of Christ. Barlaam took up the expression "uncreated light," and charged them with believing in two Gods, one visible, the other invisible. A synod held at Constantinople in 1340 condemned Barlaam, who was supported, however, in his dispute with the Hesychasts by the monk Gregory Akindynos, and Nicephorus Gregoras the Byzantine historian. (Fleury, xcv. 9; Möhler, "Kirchengeschichte.")

HEXAHEMERON (six days). The history of the six days of creation as described in the first chapter of Genesis. [See CREATION.]

HIERARCHY (ἱεράρχης, a president of sacred rites, a hierarch: whence ἱεραρχία, the power or office of a hierarch). The word first occurs in the work of the pseudo-Dionysius (a Greek writer of the fifth century) on the Celestial and Ecclesiastical Hierarchies. This author appears to mean by it "administration of sacred things," nearly in accordance with its etymology. The signification was gradually modified until it came to be what it is at present: a hierarchy now signifies a body of officials disposed organically in ranks and orders, each subordinate to the one above it. Thus we speak of the "judicial hierarchy" and the "administrative hierarchy." However, when the hierarchy is spoken of, what is meant is the organization of ranks and orders in the Christian Church. In a wide and loose sense, when the whole Catholic Church is considered as existing in the midst of heretics, schismatics, and the heathen, even the laity may be considered as forming a portion of the hierarchy. With this agrees the expression of St. Peter, calling the general body of Christians in the countries to which he is sending his epistle "a kingly priesthood" and "a holy nation" (1 Pet. ii. 9). St. Ignatius, writing to the Smyrnaeans,[1] salutes "the bishop worthy of God, and the most religious presbytery, my fellow-servants the deacons, and all of you individually and in common." So at the Mass, the priest, turning to the people, bids them pray that "his and their sacrifice" may be acceptable to God; and at the incensing before the Sanctus, the acolyte, after the rite has been performed to all the orders of the clergy within the sanctuary, turns towards and bows to the laity, and incenses them also. But, according to its ordinary signification, the word "hierarchy" only applies to the clergy—with varieties of meaning which must be clearly distinguished.

I. There is a hierarchy of divine right, consisting, under the primacy of St. Peter and his successors, of bishops, priests, and at least deacons or, in the language of the Tridentine canon, "ministers." "If any one shall say," defines the council,[2] "that there is not in the Catholic Church a hierarchy established by the divine ordination, consisting of bishops, presbyters, and ministers, let him be anathema." The term "ministers" comprehends those inferior orders of ecclesiastical institution which, as occasion arose, were, so to speak, carved out of the diaconate.

[1] Ad Smyrn. xii., PG, v. 857.
[2] Sess. xxiii. can. 6.

II. There is also a hierarchy by ecclesiastical right, or a hierarchy of order. This consists—besides the Roman Pontiff and the three original orders of bishops, priests, and deacons—of the five minor orders (two in the East) of subdeacons, acolytes, exorcists, lectors, and porters (ostiarii), which, as was said above, were in the course of time severed from the diaconate.

III. There is also the hierarchy of jurisdiction. This is of ecclesiastical institution, and consists of the administrative and judicial authorities, ordinary and delegated, which, under the supreme pastorate of the Holy See, are charged with the maintenance of the purity of the faith and of union among Christians, with the conservation of discipline, &c. These authorities exercise powers conferred on them by delegation, expressed or implied, from the order above them: thus the powers of cardinals, patriarchs, exarchs, metropolitans, and archbishops proceed from the Pope, either expressly or by implication; again, the powers of archpriests, archdeacons, rural deans, vicars-general, vicars-forane, &c., are derived to them from bishops. (Thomassin,[1] I. iii. 23; Phillips in "Kirchenlex." with the note appended; Petavius, "De Ecclesiastica Hierarchia"; and the theologians and canonists in the treatises "De Ecclesia" and "De Ordine.") On the restoration of the Hierarchy in England in 1850 see English Church, p. 299.

HISTORY, CHURCH. [See Church History.]

HOLIDAYS or HOLY DAYS. [See Feasts.]

HOLINESS, as a title of the Pope. [See Pope.]

HOLOCAUST (ὅλος, καυστός, "whole," "burnt"). A sacrifice in which the victim was wholly consumed by fire. The subject does not come within the scope of the present volume, but properly belongs to a Bible Dictionary, e.g. Vigouroux, "Dictionnaire de la Bible." [See Eucharist; Sacrifice.]

HOLY CHILD, SOCIETY OF THE. Founded in England (Derby) in 1846 by Mrs. Connelly (formerly Peacock), who was a native of Philadelphia, U.S.A. The primary object of the society is the education of girls of all classes; and subsidiary to this, the instruction of converts and visiting the sick and poor. The constitutions are based on those of St. Ignatius Loyola so far as they are applicable to women. The society has been very successful in England and in the United States. (M. Mary of St. Peter in "Cath. Enc.")

HOLY COAT. [See Coat, Holy.]

HOLY FAMILY. Our Lord, His Mother, and His foster-father St. Joseph, together formed one family which should be the model and veneration of all Christian households. An archconfraternity under the invocation of the Holy Family has this devotion for its special object. It was founded at Liège in 1844 by Henry Belletable, a non-commissioned officer of engineers. He used to assemble a number of workmen on one night in each week for the sake of joining in prayer and pious reading, and encouraging each other in the practice of Christian virtues. The good work was taken up by the Redemptorists and approved by the Bishop. In 1847 Pius IX. enriched it with many indulgences and raised it to the dignity of an archconfraternity, with the power of affiliating to itself other confraternities with the same name and object. Women now benefited by this approval. Their numbers soon began to rival those of the men. At present the confraternity has branches in almost every country in the world. We cannot here give a full account of the constitution and rules. They were considerably modified by Leo XIII. (For further information see the "Directory of the Archconfraternity of the Holy Family.")

HOLY GHOST. [See Trinity, p. 821.]

HOLY GHOST, CONGREGATION OF THE, AND OF THE IMMACULATE HEART OF MARY. This congregation, as its name might suggest, arose out of the fusion into one, in 1848, of two pre-existing institutes—the Congregation of the Holy Ghost, and the Missioners of the Immaculate Heart of Mary. The former was founded at Paris in 1703 by a poor Breton student, Claude Desplaces; the latter by Francis M. P. Libermann about 1841. In 1848, it having been long observed that the aims of the two societies were to a great extent similar, a fusion was effected between the congregation of Libermann and that of the Fathers of the Holy Ghost, whose superior, Father Monet, had seen the missioners of the other society at work in Bourbon. The rule of the Congregation of the Holy Ghost (which had been lately approved at Rome) was to be retained, and the constitutions of the missionaries were for the most part incorporated in it.

Père Libermann, the first superior of the united congregation, died in 1852. A process has been commenced for his canonization, and he was declared "Venerable" in 1875, no other Jewish convert having ever been so distinguished.

The constitutions, as finally settled at a general chapter held in 1875, have been approved at Rome without change or addition. "The society . . . is governed by a superior-general elected for life. Its missions are directed by bishops or vicars-apostolic chosen from its own body. All the members—fathers and brothers—consecrate themselves to God by the three simple vows of religion, at first temporary, afterwards perpetual; and they bind themselves to the congregation by their act of profession, which contains an engagement of perseverance. Besides the professed members there are the oblates, who, from the age of fourteen, after a trial of at least six months, are received into the congregation as its children, are clothed with its habit, and take the engagement to persevere till their profession." The novitiate is ordinarily for two years. The congregation always pursues as its main and direct object, after the perfection of its members, the evangelization of the blacks, especially of the blacks in Africa itself.

Indirectly the congregation pursues the same end by founding institutions primarily devoted to different objects. A house at Rome being found to be necessary, they established there a French seminary, canonically erected in 1853, which was treated with remarkable favour both by Pius IX. and by Leo XIII. Again, it was thought desirable to encourage vocations in Ireland, and as a means to this end two colleges for secondary education have been established by the congregation, at Blackrock and Rockwell (near Cashel), and have achieved in a few years, owing to the skill and ability with which they have been conducted, an extraordinary success. At the present time about half of the professed members are engaged in the African missions. They are steadily forming a native clergy and sisterhood there. Already a dozen negro priests and about one hundred negro sisters are at work (Gopfert, "Life of Ven. Father Libermann"; J. T. Murphy in "Cath. Enc.")

HOLY PLACES, THE. The spots rendered sacred to Christians by the birth, death, resurrection, and ascension of our Saviour, as well as by events in the life of the Blessed Virgin, have been visited by pilgrims and travellers at least since the third century, when we hear of Alexander, the friend of Origen, and Origen himself as going to Palestine to explore them. Constantine, early in the fourth century, after the removal of the earth and rubbish which had long encumbered the site of the Holy Sepulchre, caused a magnificent church to be built over it. His mother, St. Helena, erected and richly adorned a basilica over the grotto of Christ's nativity at Bethlehem,[1] and a portion of her work is believed to be still preserved in the existing structure. She also built a church on the top of Mount Olivet, over the cave which was traditionally believed to mark the scene of the Ascension. Towards the end of the fourth (?) century the noble pilgrim Etheria (Sylvia) refers to the three sacred buildings at Jerusalem: (1) the Anastasis, or Sanctuary of the Resurrection, where was the Holy Sepulchre; (2) the Sanctuary of the Cross, where the true cross and other relics were preserved; (3) the Martyrium, or great basilica of Constantine, situated "behind the Sanctuary of the Cross." Arculfus, a French bishop, visiting the Holy Land about the end of the seventh century A.D., saw a church built over the rock of Golgotha, the place of the Crucifixion.

To the consideration of the sites here named the present article will be confined. The Abbé Michon, in his work on the Holy Places, gives a list of twelve localities more or less identified by tradition with religious events: among these are Cana, Tiberias, Nablous, &c. To examine the value of the tradition in each of these cases would be a task much exceeding our limits Narrowing the problem to the necessary degree, we ask this question, Is the traditional belief which has connected for many centuries, and does still connect, certain sites in Palestine with the conception, nativity, crucifixion, resurrection, and ascension of our Lord reasonably trustworthy, or is it not?

Holy places, considered as supports and encouragements to faith and virtue, are in the same category with miracles and relics. "Movemur nescio quo pacto locis ipsis, in quibus eorum quos diligimus et admiramur adsunt vestigia." As Dr. Johnson says: "That man is little to be envied, whose patriotism would not gain force upon the plain of Marathon, or whose piety would not grow warmer among the ruins of Iona." As miracles reassure and quicken faith, so the touch of relics, and visits to holy places, seeming to bring us palpably nearer to those to whom God was very near, or even to the very Author and Founder of our religion, tend to the consolation and softening of the hearts of men, and to the revival of their courage under the trials of life. Not sharing the faith, and regarding the consolation as illusory, Protestants and agnostics are disposed by a natural instinct to reject miracles, scoff at relics, and deny the authenticity of holy places. All such supports to a faith and a morality which they accept only in part find with them no easy credence. In the case of holy places, the multiplication of traditions—some spurious, others doubtful, many ridiculous—affords a plausible ground for incredulity. The objector urges that tradition supplies no valid evidence. But there are traditions and traditions. A perfect or adequate tradition as to a holy place is one which identifies by the unvarying testimony of many generations of Christians living on the spot—who therefore could not have been deceived—a place which, as connected with some event of high religious importance, must have been interesting to them from the very time of its occurrence. Imperfect or inadequate traditions are those in which these conditions are not fulfilled; and they are imperfect in the ratio of their non-fulfilment. The tradition as to the site of the Resurrection is one of the first kind; that as to the "prison of Christ" of the second. To stand at the spot where death, the common enemy, was effectually vanquished, could not but be profoundly interesting to everyone bearing the name of Christian. The Apostles and the women from Galilee "saw where he was laid," and certainly made true report of what they saw. But no such eager memory or universal interest attached itself to the place where Christ was confined while waiting for His trial; and the identification of the spot, since it may have arisen out of the desire to carry out with a dramatic completeness the localization of the entire story of the Passion, may well be classed among imperfect traditions.

1. We may now proceed to the consideration of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem, under the roof of which, it is alleged, may be seen the two most holy places in the world—Golgotha, or the scene of the Crucifixion, and the garden-tomb from which Christ rose to die no more. Under the pressure of motives such as have been described above, many non-Catholic writers have formed conclusions adverse to the authenticity of the entire site. Prominent among these are the American Dr. Edward Robinson,[1] the German Tobler, and our own countrymen Clarke, Fergusson, G. A. Smith, and Conder. A much larger number of names may be appealed to in support of the authenticity of the site. Among these the most prominent are—Chateaubriand, Schulz (the Prussian consul at Jerusalem, 1845), Williams,[2] Tischendorf, Finlay, De Vogüé, and Clermont Ganneau, the discoverer of the Moabite Stone.

The slight diagram given below will help to explain, so far as that can be done in a brief popular essay, the main difficulties of the question.

The theory of Fergusson[3] may be at once disposed of. He identifies the sepulchre of Christ with the "dome of the rock," commonly called the Mosque of Omar, in the middle of the Temple area. This extravagant notion has found few supporters, and the latest researches have entirely exploded it. Lieut. Warren (now Sir Charles Warren), who laboured three years in Jerusalem (1867–1870) for the Palestine Exploration Fund, after passing under review all the known facts, came to the conclusion that the Jewish temple stood in the middle of the Temple area; "where, in fact, Jewish, Christian, and Mohammedan tradition all unite in placing it."[4] Col. Conder, a well-known worker in the same field ("The City of Jerusalem," p. 53 sqq.), and G. A. Smith ("Jerusalem from the Earliest Times," i. 230 sqq.) come to the same conclusion. But if the site of the Temple be identified with that of the Mosque of Omar, it is obvious that the sites of Golgotha and the Holy Sepulchre—which Scripture tells us (Jn. xix. 41) were close together—must be looked for elsewhere.

Conder himself in 1878 proposed another site—not indeed for the Sepulchre, which he declares to be unknown—but for Calvary. It is at a knoll, north of the Damascus Gate, or the cliff on the south side of this knoll, called the Grotto of Jeremiah. This view was adopted by Gen. Gordon in 1882; and he further, quite in opposition to Conder, thought that a tomb in this cliff—now known as the "Garden Tomb"—must be the true site of the Holy Sepulchre. "This identification," says Sir C. Wilson ("Enc. Brit." Jerusalem, 1902), "rests on no evidence and no tradition, and is simply a guess." Nevertheless it has been much believed by English-speaking Protestants, especially Americans, mainly on Gordon's authority.

Coming now to the traditional site (see diagram), we may confidently affirm that it is that which Constantine and Macarius, the bishop of Jerusalem in his day, believed to be the true one. They had far better opportunities than we have of finding the site, and they were of course familiar with the fact that the Scripture plainly stated (Mt. xxvii. 32, Mk. xv. 20, Jn. xix. 17, 20, Hebr. xiii. 12) that the place where Jesus was crucified was outside the gate of the city. In fixing upon the present site they must have been assured that it was outside the wall, as the wall existed in our Lord's time. No intelligent traveller supposes that the present distribution of the buildings of the city is not very different from what it was. The city has naturally been attracted to the north-west, round the principal object of interest. The modern wall was of course erected many centuries after our Lord's death. But Robinson argues that the language of Josephus is almost incompatible with the assumption that the traditional site was outside the wall as it stood at the date of the Crucifixion. At the time of the siege of Jerusalem by Titus three walls protected the city on the north side. About the course of the first there is little difference of opinion; it ran from the tower of Hippicus on the west nearly in a straight line across to the Temple enclosure on the east. It is about the course of the second wall that the main controversy is waged. Josephus says that it left the first wall at the gate called Gennath, and, "encircling the northern quarter" of the city, reached as far as the tower of Antonia.[1] The position of Gennath is uncertain, but it is generally believed to have been near Hippicus, and not far from the Jaffa gate. If it ran nearly straight thence to the tower of Antonia, at the north-west corner of the Temple area, the second wall would have excluded the received site of the Holy Sepulchre. Robinson and Conder maintain that it must have been considerably curved, so as to include the large suburb which had gradually sprung up to the north of the first wall. It would in that case have included within its sweep the ground on which stands the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. But Sir Charles Warren and Mr. Williams maintain that the second wall (see diagram) ran in such a manner as clearly to leave the traditional site outside of it. Anyhow, the traditional site still holds the field; no conclusive argument has been brought against it. "My own conclusion," says G. A. Smith in his elaborate work quoted above (i. 249), "after a study of the remains, so far as they are still visible, and of the literature of the subject, is that we do not know how the Second Wall ran from the First to the Tyropoeon; we do not know whether it ran inside or outside the site of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre." And Sir Charles Wilson (l.c.) says: "In the absence of any precise indication of direction in the Bible there can be no certainty; but if excavations ever show that the Church of the Holy Sepulchre is outside the second wall, it will be difficult to dispute the authenticity of the sites it covers."[1]

The third wall of Josephus[2] was built about eleven years after the Crucifixion, by Herod Agrippa; no one doubts that it included the traditional site within it.

Assuming now that the Church of the Holy Sepulchre may correspond with the true sites of the Passion and Resurrection of Christ, we have still to trace its history, so as to ascertain the degree of firmness with which one may hold the belief that it is the true site, and then to give a brief description of what the church contains.

That from the very first the places where Jesus was crucified and rose again were visited and reverenced by many, if not the majority, of the Christians of Jerusalem it is impossible to doubt. There may have been some among them who, like the Puritans and Quakers of later times, found or fancied their faith so firm as to be independent of external aids. But to the majority the tomb, the pillar, the inscription, the fixed feast, the annual rite, were powerful helps to that devotion which aimed at bringing the facts of the Passion and the lives of the martyrs more vividly before the mind, and arousing for these last an imitative enthusiasm. "His sepulchre is with us to this present day."[3] This meant much to the Jews, whom

[1] The testimony of a scholar so eminent as Tischendorf is worth citing. He wrote to Mr. Williams (Holy City, i. p. x.): "I think it will be in future difficult to dispute that authenticity [viz. of the traditional site of the Holy Sepulchre] upon reasonable grounds."

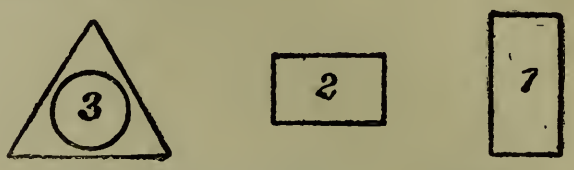
[3] Acts ii. 29.

St. Peter reminded of it, and considerations of the like order, in spite of Puritanism, mean much to us to-day. Some forty years after the Crucifixion occurred the siege and destruction of Jerusalem. During the siege the Christians in the city withdrew to Pella, on the other side of the Jordan; but the time was not long enough to cause a break in their recollections. Moreover, in spite of the hideous devastation and destruction which followed the collapse of the Jewish resistance, we must remember that no rapine or violence could injure the rock of Golgotha, nor the tombs in the neighbouring garden. The Jewish revolt under Barcochebas, in the time of the Emperor Hadrian, was the occasion, when suppressed, of an order prohibiting all Jews from entering the city; but this did not extend to the Christians, whom, up to a certain point, Hadrian was disposed to favour. He was resolved, however, to make Jerusalem a completely Roman city; he renamed it Aelia Capitolina, after himself and the Capitoline Jupiter; and we may reasonably accept the testimony of Sulpicius Severus—writing towards the end of the fourth century—to the effect that Hadrian profaned by pagan statues both the site of the Temple and the sacred localities of Christ's Passion.[1] It is therefore to the reign of Hadrian that the origin may probably be referred of the state of things described by Eusebius. The Bishop of Caesarea, in his "Life of Constantine," tells us that when the first Christian emperor resolved to build a church at Jerusalem on or near the site of the Passion, that site was found to be covered over by a huge mound of earth, which "impious and godless men," desiring to efface the memory of all that is most precious to Christians, had heaped up over it, crowning this mound with a statue of Venus. Constantine caused the earth to be removed; the rock tomb from which Jesus had risen was found uninjured beneath it; architects were engaged; and by the year A.D. 335 "the entire site"—including the place where Helena found the cross, the Golgotha, and the cave of the Sepulchre, with the intervening ground—"was occupied by a symmetrical mass of building."[2] But the place of the Resurrection, surrounded on three sides by porticoes, and having the Basilica of the Saviour on the east side, was left open to the air. In 614 Jerusalem fell into the hands of the Persians, who set the basilica on fire, and committed every sort of devastation. When they had retired, Bishop Modestus at once undertook the task of rebuilding; but now, instead of the vast pile of Constantine, three edifices arose, which the description of Arculfus, a French bishop who was at Jerusalem towards the end of the seventh century, and was questioned on the subject by the Irish Adamnan, brings very clearly before us.



1. The Church of Constantine, or Martyrium.
2. The Church of Golgotha.
3. The Church of the Resurrection.

Nearly in this condition the three churches remained till the era of the Crusades. After Jerusalem was taken by Godfrey de Bouillon, great building works were undertaken, and the result, speaking generally, is the Church of the Holy Sepulchre as we now see it; the three churches mentioned by Arculfus being now, so to speak, fused into one spacious basilica, containing both Golgotha and the Holy Sepulchre beneath its roof.

A fire in 1808 destroyed the rotunda of the Holy Sepulchre. The Greek architect, who rebuilt it in a debased style, also completely transformed the fine mediaeval choir into a modern Greek church. The new cupola lasted only fifty years. In 1869 it was renewed at the joint expense of France and Russia.

Aided by the diagram here given, the reader may easily understand the mutual topographical relations of the chief sites. The general slope of the ground is from west to east; twenty-nine steps lead down from the Greek church into the Chapel of Helena, at the south-eastern end of which twelve more steps descend to the place where Helena found the cross. The rock or "monticulus" of Golgotha, now encased in masonry, rises considerably above the floor of the Greek church; it therefore has to be separately shown on the diagram. Eighteen steps, beginning at the point marked (7), lead up from the floor of the basilica to the chapels of Golgotha. In one of these chapels is shown a hole in the rock, in which the cross which bore our Saviour is said to have been fixed.

In the portion of the church which is called the Rotunda, from the semicircular row of columns round it—placed in the middle of the pavement—is the small Chapel of the Holy Sepulchre. It is about twenty-six feet long by eighteen broad, and contains two small chambers, to which the only approach is by a door on the east side. The outer chamber is called the "Chapel of the Angel," the inner one is the Sepulchre. The "Chapel of the Angel" is regarded as the place where the angel appeared to the women who were coming to the sepulchre on the morning of Easter-day. All that it contains is a portion of a marble slab, said to be the very stone which closed the sepulchre, and on which, after he had rolled it away (Mt. xxviii. 2), the angel sat. A narrow low door leads out of the chapel into a sort of grotto, only seven feet by six, and eight or nine feet high. More than half of this confined space is occupied by "a kind of altar or pedestal," not quite three feet high, "which covers and protects the real sepulchral couch where the body of our Lord was laid." [1] The whole of this inmost chamber, this penetrale of the Christian religion, is now cased with marble; but there can be no reasonable doubt that the marble slabs veil and screen the actual natural rock of the "new tomb" in which Jesus, after the deposition from the Cross, was laid.

2. Nazareth lies in a basin of gently rounded hills, near the northern edge of the great plain of Esdraelon, about half-way between the lake of Gennesareth and the sea.

1. Holy Sepulchre. 2. Pillar of Flagellation. 3. Chapel of Helena. 4. Place where the Cross was found. 5. Altar of the Franks. 6. Place of the Cross. 7. Stairs to Golgotha. 8. Place where Christ appeared to Mary Magdalene.

"It is a rich and beautiful field in the midst of these green hills—abounding in gay flowers, in fig trees, small gardens, hedges of the prickly pear; and the dense rich grass affords an abundant pasture" (Stanley's "Palestine," 357).

It was at Nazareth that the annunciation of the future birth of her Divine Son was made to our Lady by the angel Gabriel (Lk. i. 28-38). But the exact place is disputed between the Greeks and Latins. The former maintain that it was near the well at the eastern end of the village, whence the women of Nazareth draw water to this day. They support their opinion by reference to the apocryphal gospel of St. James ("Protevang. Jacobi," cap. ii.), where it is said that the angel saluted Mary as she was drawing water from the spring near the town. But the belief of the Latins in the genuineness of their site rests upon a stronger and fuller tradition. Whether the statement of Nicephorus (a Byzantine writer of the fourteenth century [1]) be correct or not, that Helena built a stately church at Nazareth over the house of Mary, it is certain that pilgrimage was made to the spot from an early period. The same Arculfus whose report of the Holy Sepulchre given to Adamnan we have quoted above says that he found two churches at Nazareth, and that one of them was "at the place where the house had been built in which the archangel Gabriel, finding her alone," had addressed the Blessed Virgin. After the first crusade, the brave Tancred, to whom the government of Galilee had been committed, is said to have enriched the church at Nazareth with many donations (Kenrick, p. 20). What Phocas saw here in 1185 is related in the article LORETO; where also is given the later history of the church, down to the removal of the Santa Casa in 1291.

A grotto within the church of the Franciscan convent at Nazareth is believed by the Latins to have been the scene of the Annunciation. This convent, "the most prominent building" in Nazareth, "stands on a spur of the hill which projects some little distance into the green plain" (Murray). Through the great gate the stranger is admitted into a square court, on the opposite side of which is the church. The interior of the church forms nearly a square of seventy feet. From the pavement a broad marble staircase of fifteen steps leads down to the grotto. First there is a vestibule, twenty-five feet by ten, where, it is believed, the house of Mary formerly stood, and whence it was removed in 1291 [LORETO]. From the vestibule "a low arched opening, opposite the stairs, admits to the sanctum, about the same dimensions as the vestibule" (Murray). Here is an altar of white marble with a fine picture of the Annunciation over it; below it is a marble slab on which are carved a large cross, and the words "Verbum caro hic factum est." Not far off is a large pillar, said to mark the spot where the angel stood during the Annunciation; and another pillar, broken in the middle, where Mary is said to have stood at the same time. Many other interesting localities are pointed out by the Franciscan fathers, respecting which we must refer to the works of Fathers Geramb [1] and Meisterman [2]; the chief facts are also given in Murray's "Handbook for Syria and Palestine."

[1] Williams' Holy City, ii. 160.

[1] Quoted in Archbishop Kenrick's work on Loreto; see that article.

3. The place of the Nativity of Jesus Christ was already reported by Justin Martyr, [3] in the middle of the second century, to have been "a cave near Bethlehem." The apocryphal gospels uniformly adhere to the tradition of a cave; and it is further confirmed by the reference of Eusebius ("Vit. Const." iii. 43) to the "places renowned by two mystical caves," the sites of the Nativity and the Ascension, which Constantine and his mother took especial care to adorn with all the splendour that the resources of architecture could supply. Bethlehem is on high ground about seven miles south of Jerusalem. "The Convent of the Nativity is an enormous pile of buildings, extending along the ridge of the hill from west to east, and consisting of the Church of the Nativity, with the three convents (Latin, Greek, and Armenian) abutting respectively on its north-east, south-east, and south-western extremities." [4] The nave of the church, which is the common property of Catholics, Greeks, and Armenians, still remains to a great extent as Helena's architect left it. But the impression of the noble building, with its marble columns and mosaics, is marred, says Schulz,[5] by a whitewashed wall by which the Greeks in 1842 cut off the transept and apse (which belong to them exclusively) from the rest of the church. There are five aisles, of which the chief and central one leads up to the apse; the others end at the wall above mentioned. "Under the high altar before the apse belonging to the Greeks . . . is the sanctuary proper, the place of the Nativity, to which two marble staircases, north and south, lead down from the choir. It is a cave under the transept, about three metres high, twelve long, and three-and-a-half broad, lighted with thirty-two lamps; its pavement and walls are covered with white, black, and red-veined marble slabs. At the eastern end is a recess, and under the altar thereof there sparkles in the light of fifteen lamps a star, set close to the ground, with fourteen rays, and several inlaid glittering stones. It bears the inscription 'Hic de Virgine Maria Jesus Christus natus est.'" Near the foot of the southern staircase "one descends by three steps into the Chapel of the Manger (praesepe). The manger is now of marble; the earlier [or original] wooden one was taken by Sixtus IV. to Rome in 1486," and may now be seen in the Church of Santa Maria Maggiore. "In the same chapel is also the altar of the 'Adoration of the Magi,' and from the west end of the principal cave a narrow passage leads" to the place where St. Joseph is said to have received the command to flee into Egypt, to the Chapel of the Innocents, the tombs of Paula and Eustochium, and the cell where St. Jerome laboured at the translation of the Bible. Some way off is the "Grotto of the Shepherds," said to mark the place where the shepherds on Christmas night saw the great light and the angelic company.

4. Mount Olivet, the scene of our Lord's Agony and Ascension, formerly possessed three primitive churches: one in the garden of Gethsemane, and two on the high ground above, Eleona and the Church of the Ascension. The exact sites of the Agony and the Ascension have not been fixed in the Gospels or in the Acts; hence in early times the piety of the faithful was satisfied by venerating the memory of the one at the foot of the mount and the other at the summit. The first of the three churches in the order of time was Eleona (Mt. of Olives), built by the Empress Helena, and described by Etheria as "very beautiful," satis pulchra. It was situated at the cave where our Lord discoursed with His disciples on the destruction of Jerusalem and His final coming. While the memory of the churches within the city has been carefully retained, the very site of Eleona was lost until it was discovered by the White Fathers quite recently (1911). The church of the Ascension (Imbomon), the work of Poemenia (before 378), marked the spot from which our Lord ascended into heaven. It was a rotunda, like the church of the Resurrection, and stood in the same relation to Eleona as the Anastasis to the Martyrium. The present chapel is the work of the Crusaders, with some of the earlier portions preserved, and the whole modified by Mahometan additions. It is a small octagonal structure within a paved court. In the chapel is shown the rock said to be imprinted with the footsteps of Christ—His last on earth. There is now no resemblance to a foot. This rock was venerated by St. Jerome (In Zach. xiv. 4) and St. Paula.

Robinson ("Bibl. Researches," ii. 77) thinks that the Christian tradition which places the scene of the Ascension on the top of the Mount of Olives is certainly wrong, because inconsistent with Lk. xxiv. 50, "He led them out as far as Bethania." The village of Bethany is about one mile farther from Jerusalem than the top of the Mount of Olives, to the eastward; and in its immediate neighbourhood Robinson, Stanley, and others would look for the scene of the Ascension. But there is another important passage, viz. Acts i. 12, which tells us that, immediately after witnessing the Ascension, the disciples "returned to Jerusalem from the mount called Olivet, which is nigh Jerusalem, within a Sabbath day's journey." What other conclusion can be drawn from these words but that the Ascension took place on Mount Olivet? What would have been the sense of specifying the distance of Olivet from Jerusalem if in fact the Ascension had not happened on the Mount of Olives at all, but somewhere "among the retired uplands immediately overhanging the village" [1] of Bethany? Everything being taken into consideration, the probability in favour of the traditional site being the true and Scriptural one, as well as the one accepted by Helena, appears to be overwhelming. In the passage from Luke xxiv. "Bethany," as Lightfoot long ago suggested, must be understood to mean "the district of Bethany," which might very well have commenced on the summit of Mount Olivet.

5. Etheria relates that on Maundy Thursday night the pilgrims came down from the Imbomon to the place where the Lord prayed. "There is in that place a graceful church (elegans)." St. Jerome also speaks of it as built "in the place where the Lord prayed before His passion." After being destroyed thrice and rebuilt twice, the very site of it was lost. Recently the Franciscans have re-discovered it at the southern extremity of the present "Garden." (There is an immense mass of literature, ancient and modern, on the Holy Places. Some works have already been mentioned in the course of this article. But all have been superseded by the magnificent volumes now in course of publication by the Dominican Fathers Vincent and Abel: "Jérusalem, Recherches de Topographie, d'Archéologie, et d'Histoire" (two vols.), and "Bethléem, le Sanctuaire de la Nativité" (one vol.).

HOLY SEPULCHRE, CANONESSES OF THE. This order derives its name from a tradition connecting it with the Empress Helena, the foundress of the church of the Holy Sepulchre. The earliest authentic foundation dates from 1276 at Saragossa. A great revival and reform took place at Charleville in Belgium, and was approved by Urban VIII. in 1631. Susan Hawley, an English exile, founded a community of these Canonesses at Liége in 1652. This house flourished until the Revolution, when the nuns returned to England, and, after sojourning in various country houses, finally settled at New Hall, Essex, in 1799. Communities of Canonesses still exist in Bavaria, Belgium, and Spain. (See CANONESS; Hélyot; "History of the New Hall Community"; Steele, "Convents of Great Britain"; Guilday, "English Catholic Refugees," ch. xii.; B. Ward, "Dawn of the Catholic Revival," ii. ch. xxv.)

HOLY WATER (aqua benedicta). Washing with water is a natural symbol of spiritual purification. "I will pour out upon you," says God by the prophet Ezechiel (xxvi. 25), "clean water, and you shall be clean." In the tabernacle a laver was placed in the court between the altar and the door of the tabernacle for the priests to wash their hands and feet before offering sacrifice; and the later Jews, as may be inferred from Mk. vii. 3, developed the frequent washing of the hands into a matter of ritual observance. If we look into a modern Jewish prayer-book, we find the same importance attached to ritual ablutions, and in particular washing of the hands is prescribed before prayer. The use of the "aqua lustralis" with which the Romans sprinkled themselves or were sprinkled by the priest shows that the same symbolism existed among the heathen.

A like custom, beautiful and natural in itself, though of course it may degenerate and often has degenerated into superstition, has been adopted by the Church. Water and salt are exorcised by the priest and so withdrawn from the power of Satan, who, since the Fall, has corrupted and abused even inanimate things; prayers are said that the water and salt may promote the spiritual and temporal health of those to whom they are applied, and may drive away the devil with his rebel angels; and finally the water and salt are mingled in the name of the Trinity. The water thus blessed becomes a means of grace. Even common water, if devoutly used as a memento of the purity of heart which God requires, might well prove useful for the health of the soul. But as the Church has blessed holy water with solemn prayers, we may be sure that God, who answers the petitions of His Church, will not fail to increase the charity, contrition, &c., of those who use it, and to assist them in their contests with the powers of evil. The reader will observe that we do not attribute to holy water any virtue of its own. It is efficacious simply because the Church's prayers take effect at the time it is used.

Holy water is placed at the door of the church in order that the faithful may sprinkle themselves with it as they enter, accompanying the outward rite with internal acts of sorrow and love. Before the High Mass on Sundays the celebrant sprinkles the people with holy water; and holy water is employed in nearly every blessing which the Church gives. And at all times, on rising and going to bed, leaving the house or returning home, in temptation and in sickness, pious Catholics use holy water.

The use of holy water among Christians must be very ancient, for the Apostolical Constitutions (viii. 28, ed. Lagarde) contain a formula for blessing water that it may have power "to give health, drive away diseases, put the demons to flight," &c. But there does not seem to be any evidence that it was customary for the priest to sprinkle the people with holy water before the ninth century. [See ASPERGES.]

HOLY WEEK. The week in which the Church commemorates Christ's death and burial, and which is spoken of by ancient writers as the Great, the Holy Week, the Week of the Holy Passion (τῶν ἁγίων παθῶν, τοῦ σωτηρίου πάθους, πάσχα σταυρώσιμον), the Penal Week, the Week of Forgiveness (hebdomas indulgentiae). The observance of Holy Week is mentioned by Irenaeus (apud Euseb. "H.E." v. 24) towards the end of the second century; while Eusebius (ii. 17) evidently believed that the custom of keeping Holy Week dated from Apostolic times. In the East, Holy Week was distinguished from the rest of Lent by the extreme strictness of the fast. Thus Dionysius of Alexandria, in his Epistle to Basilides, tells us that some Christians kept an absolute fast the whole week, others did so for one, two, three, or four days.[1] Etheria, in her "Peregrinatio," says the same. Epiphanius, in his exposition of the orthodox faith, says much the same. In the Latin Church (according to Thomassin, "Traité des Jeûnes," p. 50) it is difficult to discern any proof that the fast of Holy Week exceeded the strictness of the ordinary Lenten fast.

We have said that in Holy Week the Church commemorates Christ's Passion, and it may be objected that the definition is incomplete, since on Palm Sunday, the first day of Holy Week, it is Christ's triumphant entry into Jerusalem which is chiefly contemplated. But, in fact, Holy Week begins with the Monday, not with the Sunday. At least this is the reckoning of St. Cyril, Theophilus, and St. Epiphanius, quoted by Routh in his "Reliquiae Sacrae" (tom. ii. p. 52). We therefore reserve our account of Palm Sunday for a special article, and confine ourselves here to the ceremonies of Holy Week.

The Tenebrae.—This is the name given to the matins and lauds of the following day, which are usually sung on the afternoon or evening of Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday in Holy Week. The "Gloria Patri" at the end of the Psalms and in the responsories, the hymns, antiphons of the Blessed Virgin, &c., are omitted in sign of sorrow. The lessons of the first nocturn are taken from the Lamentations of Jeremiah, the Hebrew letter which begins each verse in these acrostic[2] poems being retained in Latin. At the beginning of the office fifteen lighted candles are placed on a triangular candelabrum, and at the end of each psalm one is put out, till only a single candle is left lighted at the top of the triangle. During the singing of the "Benedictus" the candles on the high altar are extinguished, while at the antiphon after the "Benedictus" the single candle left alight is hidden at the Epistle corner of the altar, to be brought out again at the end of the office. The number of the candles and the order of their extinction has much varied during the centuries the custom has existed. (See Thurston, "Tenebrae.") This extinction of lights (whence probably the name tenebrae or darkness) is best explained by Amalarius Fortunatus, who wrote in 820. It figures, he says, the growing darkness of the time when Christ the Light of the world was taken. The last candle, according to Benedict XIV., is hidden, not extinguished, to signify that death could not really obtain dominion over Christ, though it appeared to do so. The clapping made at the end of the office is said to symbolize the confusion consequent on Christ's death. But see Thurston, "Tenebrae," p. 22, where a more prosaic explanation is suggested.

Holy Thursday.—On this day one Mass only can be said in the same church, and that Mass must be a public one. The Mass is celebrated in white vestments because the institution of the Eucharist is joyfully commemorated, but at the same time there are certain signs of the mourning proper to Holy Week. The bells, which ring at the "Gloria," do not sound again till the "Gloria" in the Mass of Holy Saturday, and the Church returns to her ancient use of summoning the faithful or arousing their attention by a wooden clapper. Nor is the embrace of peace given. The celebrant consecrates an additional Host, which is placed in a chalice and borne in procession after the Mass to a place prepared for it. In ancient times this procession occurred daily, for there was no tabernacle over the altar for reserving the particles which remained over after the communion of the faithful. Mediaeval writers connect the procession of the Blessed Sacrament on Holy Thursday with our Lord's journey to the Mount of Olives after the Last Supper. The "Pange lingua" is sung during the procession, and the place to which the Blessed Sacrament is removed—often called the Sepulchre, but properly the altar of repose—is decked with flowers and lights. Afterwards the altars are stripped. This used to be done, according to Vert in his explanation of the ceremonies of the Mass, every day after the celebration of the sacrifice, and is retained on Holy Thursday to remind the Christians of the way in which their Master was stripped of His garments. In St. Peter's the chief altar is washed with wine, and a similar custom prevails among [1] This strictest form of fasting, which implied a total abstinence from food till the dawn of the next day, and even till after the Sacred Mysteries had been celebrated on that second day, was called ὑπέρθεσις or superpositio.

[2] I.e. acrostic in the original Hebrew. No attempt is made to preserve the acrostic in the Vulgate.

the Dominicans and Carmelites, and in some churches of France and Germany.[1] It may be witnessed in our day at Westminster Cathedral.

The stripping of the altars is followed by the washing of the feet, called "Mandatum" from the words of the first antiphon sung during the ceremony—"Mandatum novum," &c., "A new commandment I give unto you, that you love one another" (Jn. xiii. 34); whence our English word Maundy Thursday. The principal priest or prelate of the church, assisted by deacon and sub-deacon, washes the feet of twelve poor men. The Pope washes the feet of thirteen priests, and some churches follow the Papal custom. The observance of the "Mandatum" is mentioned as a recognized custom, and is enforced under penalties, by the Twenty-second Council of Toledo in 694.

Since the seventh century the holy oils, formerly consecrated at any time, have been blessed by the bishop in the Mass of this day. Twelve priests and seven deacons assist as witnesses of the ceremony. The bishop and priests breathe three times upon the oil of the catechumens and the chrism, meaning by this action that the power of the Holy Spirit is about to descend on the oils; and after the consecration is complete they salute the oils with the words "Hail, holy oil; hail, holy chrism." Another rite proper to Holy Thursday, now passed into disuse, was the reconciliation of penitents. This reconciliation on Holy Thursday is mentioned by Pope Innocent I. and St. Jerome. The Mass now celebrated is one out of three which used to be said, the other two being for the consecration of the chrism and the reconciliation of penitents.

Good Friday (πάσχα σταυρώσιμον, parasceve, or παρασκεύη—i.e. the day of preparation for the Jewish Sabbath—coena pura, dies absolutionis, dies salutaris). On this day the Church commemorates the Passion of Christ, so that it is the most sad and solemn of all the days in Holy Week. The officiating clergy appear in black vestments,[2] and prostrate themselves before the altar, which still remains stripped. Nor are the candles lighted. After a short pause, the altar is covered with a white cloth, and passages of the Old Testament, followed by the history of the Passion from St. John, are read. Next the Church prays solemnly for all conditions of men, for all the members of the hierarchy, for the prosperity of Christian people, for catechumens, heretics, Jews, and Pagans. Before each prayer the sacred ministers genuflect, except before that for the Jews, when the genuflection is omitted in detestation of the feigned obeisance with which the Jews mocked Christ. When the prayers are ended, the cross, which has been up to this time covered with black, is exposed to view, "adored" [see CROSS] and kissed by clergy and people. During the adoration the "Improperia" are sung, each improperium being followed by the Trisagion in Greek and Latin. Improperium is a barbarous word used by Latin writers of a late age, meaning "reproach," and these "reproaches" are addressed in dramatic form by Christ to the Jewish people. They begin with the touching words, "My people, what have I done to thee, wherein have I vexed thee? Answer me." The Trisagion is so called because the word "holy" occurs three times in it: "Holy God, holy [and] strong, holy [and] immortal, have pity on us." It was first introduced at Constantinople, and it is probably because of its Greek origin that it is recited in the Good Friday office in Greek as well as in Latin, though the old Latin Sacramentaries show that the intermingling of Greek with Latin forms was very frequent as late as the eighth and ninth centuries.

We have now to speak of the most striking and singular feature in the Good Friday ritual. From very ancient times, as appears from the Council of Laodicea, canon 49, and the Synod in Trullo, canon 52, the Greek Church abstained from the celebration of Mass in the proper sense of the word during Lent, except on Saturdays and Sundays, and substituted for it the Mass of the Presanctified, in which the priest received as communion a Host previously consecrated. The Greeks still observe this ancient use, but the Latin Church contents herself with abstaining from the celebration of Mass on Good Friday, the day on which Christ was offered as a bleeding victim for our sins. This Mass of the Presanctified on Good Friday is mentioned by Pope Innocent I. in his letter to Decentius. The Blessed Sacrament is borne in procession from the chapel where it was placed the day before while the choir sing the hymn "Vexilla Regis." The priest places the Host on the altar, the candles of which are now lighted. The Blessed Sacrament is elevated and adored while the wooden clapper is sounded; it is divided into three parts, one of which is put into a chalice containing wine and water. Finally the priest receives the portions of the Host which remain on the paten, and then takes the wine with the third portion of the Host. According to a Roman Ordo written about the year 800 and quoted by Thomassin ("Traité des Festes"), the ceremony ended with the silent communion of the faithful; but the present discipline of the Church forbids communion to be given on Good Friday except in the case of sickness.

Holy Saturday.—Before entering on the history of the ceremonies for this, the last day of Holy Week, it is necessary to say something about the time at which they are performed. We learn from the epistle of Pope Innocent already quoted that in his time no Mass was said during the day hours of Holy Saturday. The office began at the ninth hour, i.e. at three o'clock P.M.; the faithful kept vigil in the church, and the Mass celebrated at midnight belonged rather to the morning of Easter Sunday than to Holy Saturday. This state of things lasted till late in the Middle Ages. Hugh of St. Victor (died 1140) mentions the custom, then creeping in, of anticipating the vigil office; but the old mode of observance is spoken of as still subsisting in some churches by Durandus (lived about 1280) and Thomas Waldensis (after 1400). Though the time is changed, the words of the office remain as they were. This explains the joyous character of the Mass, the fact that the history of the resurrection is sung in the Gospel and the allusion to the night time in the Preface, the "Communicantes," and the majestic language of the Collect, "O God, who didst illumine this most holy night with the glory of the Lord's resurrection."

[1] So says Benedict XIV., speaking of his own time.

At present the ceremonies begin early in the morning with the blessing of the new fire struck from the flint. This blessing was unknown at Rome in the time of Pope Zacharias (anno 751), though it is recognized about a century later by Leo IV. Apparently it was the custom in some churches daily to bless the fire struck for the kindling of the lamps, and about the year 1100 this benediction was reserved exclusively for Holy Saturday, when the fire is an appropriate image of the Light of light rising again like "the sun in his strength." From this fire a candle with three stems, and placed on a reed, is lighted and carried up the church by a deacon, who three times chants the words "Lumen Christi." The same symbolism reappears in the paschal candle, which is blessed by the deacon, who fixes in it five grains of blessed incense in memory of the wounds of Christ and the precious spices with which He was anointed in the tomb, and afterwards lights it from the candle on the reed. The use of the paschal candle goes back very far—as far at least as the time of Zosimus, who was made Pope in 417—and the sublime words of the "Exultet," a triumphant hymn of praise which the deacon sings in the act of blessing the candle, can scarcely be less ancient. Martène attributes it to St. Augustine, but the modern critics deny that he is the author, though some place it as early as the fifth century.

The blessing of the candle is followed by the twelve prophecies, and after they have been read the priest goes in procession to bless the font. This last blessing carries us back to the days of the ancient Church in which the catechumens were presented to the bishop for baptism on Holy Saturday and the vigil of Pentecost. The water in the font is scattered towards the four quarters of the world, to indicate the catholicity of the Church and the world-wide efficacy of her sacraments; the priest breathes on the water in the form of a cross and plunges the paschal candle three times into the water, for the Spirit of God is to hallow it, and the power of Christ is to descend upon it; and lastly a few drops of the oil of catechumens and of the chrism are poured, in order, says Gavantus, to signify the union of Christ our anointed king with His people. At this point the baptism of the catechumens took place. On the way back from the font the Litanies of the Saints are begun, they are continued while the sacred ministers lie prostrate before the altar, and, as they end, the altar is decked with flowers and the Mass is begun in white vestments. At the "Gloria" the organ sounds and bells are rung, and the joyful strains of the "Alleluia" peal forth after the Epistle. The vespers of the day are inserted in the Mass, after the Communion.

The reason for the jubilant character of the Mass has been given above, but there are some other peculiarities which need explanation. The kiss of peace is omitted, because in the ancient rite the faithful kissed each other in the Church as day was breaking, with the words "The Lord is risen"; there was therefore a natural objection to anticipating the ceremony in the Mass at midnight. The "Agnus Dei," which was introduced by Pope Sergius towards the end of the seventh century, was never added to this Mass. The Communion and Postcommunion are simply replaced by vespers. But why is there no Offertory? Liturgical writers give many different answers, none of which is satisfactory. Gavantus alleges that the celebrant alone communicated, and that hence there was no oblation of bread and wine on the part of the faithful. The faithful deferred their Communion until the later or Easter Mass properly so called. By a recent decree, it is permissible to give Communion either in the Mass itself or after the Mass. (Chiefly from Gavantus, Meratus, Thomassin, "Sur les Festes"; Benedict XIV. "De Festis"; Thurston, "Lent and Holy Week.")

HOMICIDE. The violent slaying of one human being by another. The modes are various—e.g. shooting, stabbing, strangling, causing abortion, drowning, throwing from a height, the denial of food, &c. Homicide may be either intentional or accidental. If intentional, it may be so either directly or indirectly: directly, as when one man kills another with the full intention of killing him; indirectly, as when a man, without actual intention to kill, does that which he knows is dangerous to life—e.g. kicks a fallen man violently about the head. Intentional homicide may be either just or unjust. The cases when it may be justly done are these four: the command of God; the execution of public justice; a just war; and necessary defence either of oneself or others. For the first case the canonists cite the command of God to Abraham to slay his son, and the putting to death by the Israelites of the women and children whom they found in Jericho. The second case is that of judges, civil or military, who justly condemn men to death,[1] and of executioners or soldiers putting their mandates in force. For the third case, see the article on WAR. The case of life justly taken in necessary defence is one that requires a careful examination of the surrounding circumstances. Homicide is only lawful in this case if it be done "cum moderamine inculpatae tutelae," "under the limitation of an unblamable defensiveness." A defence of oneself which exceeds the measure of the assault made upon one (as, if a man were to kill an unarmed footpad, or an assailant whom it was in his power to disarm or get rid of in some other way) does not comply with the condition just mentioned. Nor is that defence of oneself "unblamable," and therefore justifiable, which would make a criminal who was being led to execution rise up against the officers of the law and kill them in order to effect his own escape: for in such a case there would be no justa causa for defending his life, and so it would be blamable. Nor, thirdly, is that a lawful self-defending homicide which takes away the life of the aggressor, not at the moment of the assault, but after some time has elapsed, and by way of revenge. But if the condition "cum moderamine inculpatae tutelae" be duly observed, a man may lawfully kill an unjust aggressor, not only in defence of his own life, but in defence of the life of a parent or a wife or any of his kindred, or even of an innocent stranger. It is lawful also to kill an unjust aggressor in defence of temporal possessions, if they are of great value to their possessor, and cannot otherwise be protected or recovered. But it is not lawful, even in defence of honour and reputation, to kill a man in a combat offered or accepted on private authority. [See DUEL.] Several other forms of unlawful homicide are enumerated among the Condemned Propositions.

In unjust intentional homicide a man may be either a principal, an accomplice, or an accessory. If a principal, it is by one of the various ways of killing specified at the beginning of the article. If an accomplice, he is so either by counsel (inflaming the wrath of another, exaggerating his wrongs, &c.), or by co-operation (supplying the principal with weapons, hindering the person assailed from defending himself, &c.). If an accessory, it is in one of three ways—by precept, by protection, by permission. An unjust judge knowingly condemning innocent persons to death is an accessorial homicide by precept; the executioner in such a case would incur no blame. A master ordering his servants to kill his private enemy falls under the same category; the servants are also guilty, because they should not have obeyed an unlawful command: Bothwell's ordering some of his retainers to murder Lord Darnley is a case in point. Persons who shelter, maintain, and favour homicides are accessory to homicide by protection. Lastly, magistrates who neglect to enforce the law against murderers and highwaymen, and so allow them to practise upon other men's lives with impunity, are accessory to homicide by permission. (Ferraris, Homicida, Homicidium, and the moral theologians when dealing with the fifth commandment.)

HOMILY (from ὁμιλία, intercourse) is used by ecclesiastical writers to signify a familiar discourse on Holy Scripture. The word ὁμιλήσας occurs in Acts xx. 11, where it is applied to St. Paul's lengthy discourse, which is called λόγος a few verses earlier. The homily differs from the λόγος, or discourse, because the homily does not, like the oration or discourse, set forth and illustrate a single theme. It sacrifices artistic unity and simply follows the order of subjects in the passage of Scripture to be explained. On the other hand, a homily is distinct from a mere exegesis or exposition, because the latter is addressed to the understanding, while the homily is meant to affect the heart also and to persuade those who hear to apply the lessons of Scripture for the reformation of their lives. The word "homily" in the sense of discourse first occurs in the Epistle of St. Ignatius to Polycarp, c. 5. The earliest homilies on Scripture which we possess are those of Origen, though for the most part they only survive in a Latin version. Jerome calls the homilies of Origen "tractatus," so that this word may be fairly regarded as the equivalent of the Greek ὁμιλία. Homilies were written in abundance by later Fathers, and early in the Middle Ages Homiliaria or collections of homilies were compiled. The famous Homiliarium of Paul Warnefried was made at the command of Charlemagne, and contains homilies for the Sundays and festivals of the year. Wherever the lesson in the matin office of the Breviary is taken from the Gospels, a homily by one of the Fathers is appended to explain and apply the words of the sacred text. (See Probst, "Lehre und Gebet in den ersten drei Jahrhunderten," p. 203; Beecher in "Cath. Enc." Homiletics.)

HOMOEANS (ὅμοιος, like). A sect known also as Semiarians, who held that the Son was only "like" the Father. [See ARIUS AND ARIANISM, p. 50; ACACIANS.]

HOMOOUSION (of one essence, or, as it is usually translated, of one substance), a word used by the Fathers of Nicaea to express the truth that the Son is one God with the Father. The heretical party, starting with the notion common to their heresy in all its varying shapes, that the Father and Son were of distinct essence, confessed at most that the Son was of like essence with (the ὁμοιούσιον) or even only "like" (ὅμοιος) the Father. "Here, then," says Cardinal Newman, "the word 'one in substance' did just enable the Catholics to join issue with them, as exactly expressing what the Catholics wished to express, viz. that there was no such distinction between them as made the term 'like' necessary, but that their relation to each other was analogous to that of a material offspring to a material parent, or that as material parent and offspring are individuals under one common species, so the Father and Son are persons under one common individual substance."[1] The history of the words "homoousion" and "homoeousion" will be found in the article ARIUS AND ARIANISM.

HONORARY CANONS. Besides the residentiary Canons there are, in connection with all the cathedral chapters of France, Austria, and Prussia, a certain number of honorary canons, who are not bound to residence. These are nominated by the bishops, and selected from among the higher clergy—deans, curés cantonaux, and priests who have rendered eminent services to the Church—and many of them become in time titular canons, with all the privileges attaching to that position; but they cannot claim this succession as a matter of right. They usually receive a small emolument. In England a canon is allowed to retire with the rank of "Honorary Canon"; but the number of such honorary canons in each diocese must not exceed three. (Taunton.)

HONORIUS. The condemnation of Pope Honorius by the Sixth General Council (III. Constantinople) is a fact so remarkable in itself, and possesses so much additional interest from the discussion which it has occasioned in modern times, that it seems best to give some account of the facts and the inferences to be drawn from them in a separate article. There is a vast literature on the question, for it was for a long time a matter of contention between Gallicans and Ultramontanes, while the definition of Papal infallibility in our own day has served to bring Honorius once more before the bar of history, and to re-open the controversy on the sense of his famous letters and the precise meaning of the anathema which the council hurled at his head.

We will first of all remind the reader of the points at issue in the Monothelite controversy to which the letters of Honorius relate. The Monothelites (q.v.), who were really Eutychians or Monophysites in disguise, held that there was in Christ only one will (viz. the Divine Will) and one operation. The Catholic doctrine, on the other hand, is that, as Christ had two natures, there were in Him two operations, or modes of acting, viz. the Divine and human; for each nature, from the very fact that it is a living nature, must needs act, must needs have an energy proper to itself; and again, since Christ is man, He must have a human will, for human nature without a human will is not human nature at all.

Honorius became Pope in 625, and in 633 or 634 Sergius wrote asking his help in the following difficulty. Cyrus, Patriarch of Alexandria, had succeeded in bringing certain Monophysites (viz. the Theodosians) to the Church by admitting that, as in Christ there was but one person, so there was but one operation proper to the God-man Christ (μία θεανδρικὴ ἐνεργεία). Sophronius, monk in Palestine, and about 634 Patriarch of Constantinople, justly objected to this term of union as a betrayal of the faith defined at Chalcedon. The doctrine of St. Leo and the Church is, two natures, therefore two operations. The doctrine of Cyrus was one person of the Word, therefore one operation; so that in reality he was joining the Monophysites, not the Monophysites the Church. The compromise, however, was warmly espoused by Sergius, and he was naturally anxious to prevent the Pope from interfering on the side of Sophronius, and so undoing the work of reunion already effected. But let the reader observe that Sergius did not put his doctrine honestly and fairly before the Pope.[1] He did not ask him to accept the doctrine of a single operation, but he expressed his desire that peace should be secured and scandal saved by avoiding either expression, one operation or two operations. The former, he said, though found in the Fathers, might cause surprise to the simple; the latter had no support in tradition, and might lead to the false doctrine that in Christ there were two contrary wills (δύο θελήματα ἐναντίως πρὸς ἄλληλα ἔχοντα). Accordingly Honorius addressed two letters to Sergius; the earlier of the two exists entire in a Greek translation, but this version may be accepted as an accurate one, for it was compared with the Latin original in the archives of Constantinople by John de Prato, Papal deputy at the Sixth Council. Of the second letter we have fragments only, which are preserved in the Acts of the Sixth Council, Session xiii.

In his former letter the Pope praises Sergius for his moderation and prudence. He teaches that Christ wrought both as man and God, which is equivalent to a confession of the two operations, but he expresses his strong wish that neither formula, "one operation" or "two operations," should be used, and adds contemptuously that such formulae should be left to the vain disputes of cavilling grammarians. Moreover, after speaking about the union of the natures in a single person, he proceeds to say "Whence also we confess one will of the Lord Jesus Christ" (ὅθεν καὶ ἓν θέλημα ὁμολογοῦμεν τοῦ Κυρίου Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ), "since plainly our nature was taken by the Godhead, and that nature sinless, as it was before the fall."[2]

[1] Newman, Treatises of St. Athanasius. Edition of 842, 144.

[1] He had, however, already modified his language before he wrote to Honorius.

In his second letter, so far as we can judge from the fragments of it which remain, Honorius does not reassert his belief that Christ had but one will, and on the other hand he puts forward still more strongly the doctrine of two operations. For he confesses two natures in Christ, "unmixed, undivided, unchanged," operating what is characteristic [of each] (ἐνεργούσας τὰ ἴδια), though he again repudiates, as inexpedient, the formula "two operations."[2]

It is certain that Honorius found orthodox advocates, who maintained that he had written with good intentions, and that his words had been misconstrued. Thus Pope John IV. in a letter to the Emperor Constantine, dated 641, defended Honorius on the ground that when he said "we confess one will of the Lord Jesus Christ," he meant one human will, and the Roman abbot, John Symponus, whose services Honorius had used in writing to Sergius, takes the same line of defence. But in the Sixth Council (III. Constantinople) Honorius met with harder measure. In Session xiii., held March 28, 681, the fathers declare that after reading the letter of Honorius to Sergius they found that it was "altogether alien from the Apostolic dogmas, and followed the false doctrine of the heretics." They anathematized the Monothelite leaders, and with them Honorius, who "in all things followed his mind [i.e. the mind of Sergius] and confirmed his impious doctrines" (κατὰ πάντα τῇ ἐκείνου γνώμῃ ἐξακολουθήσαντα καὶ τὰ αὐτοῦ ἀσεβῆ κυρώσαντα δόγματα).

In the acclamations of Session xvi., the bishops shouted "Anathema to Honorius the heretic!" and in the decree of faith, Session xviii., Honorius is spoken of as a tool in the hands of the devil. This decree was signed by the whole council, including the Papal legates, and by the Emperor. In a letter to the Emperor confirming the conciliar definition, Pope Leo II., after anathematizing Cyrus, Sergius, &c., "the discoverers of new error," continues thus: "Also Honorius, who did not endeavour to sanctify this Apostolic church by teaching of Apostolic tradition, but permitted the spotless one to be defiled by unholy betrayal."[1] The anathema of the Sixth was repeated in the Eighth General Council (IV. Constantinople), its justice was recognized by Pope Hadrian II., and for a time each Pope at his election swore that he acknowledged the Sixth Council, which pronounced eternal anathema against Sergius, Pyrrhus, &c., and also against Honorius, "because he fostered the perverse statements of the heretics" ("quia pravis haereticorum assertionibus fomentum impendit").

The reader is now in possession of the chief facts, and the following questions naturally rise out of them—viz. (1) What is the independent judgment which would be fairly passed on the letters of Honorius, apart altogether from the fact of their condemnation by Pope and council? (2) What is the judgment of the Church on the matter? (3) Were the letters of Honorius ex cathedra? Catholic writers of great name have given very different answers to each of these questions. Pighius, Baronius, and in modern times Damberger, have maintained that the documents and particularly the Acts of the Sixth Council have been falsified. This view is not likely to find a respectable defender in the future, and may be here summarily dismissed. But admitting that the documents alleged are genuine, some writers, like Dupin and Bossuet in his defence of the Gallican declaration, have asserted that the letters of Honorius were heretical, and as such condemned. Others—e.g. Garnier, Peter Ballerini, and a multitude besides—strenuously maintain the orthodoxy of Honorius. Finally, though most Ultramontane authors deny that his letters were ex cathedra, some (and notably a recent Italian author, Pennachi) admit it. In developing our own view, we shall briefly note how far we are supported by the judgment of Catholic critics.

(1) The Orthodoxy or Heresy of Honorius.—At first sight, no doubt it seems difficult to excuse from heresy letters which repudiate the Catholic formula, "two operations," and infer the unity of Christ's will from the unity of His person. But, we think, only at first sight. We have seen that the Pope distinctly admits that each nature in Christ was operative, which implies two operations. Further, the Pope evidently did not understand the precise sense in which Sergius used the word "operation,"[2] for he (the Pope) asserts that Christ's operation was manifold (πολυτρόπως ἐνεργεῖ).[1] As for the "unity of will," we must remember that Sergius drew the false consequence, "if two wills in Christ, then there are two contrary wills," so that the words of Honorius on the unity of the will admit of an interpretation which makes them perfectly orthodox. He argues thus. Because Christ's humanity was united to, and perfectly controlled by, the Word, and because He assumed a sinless humanity, therefore "we confess one will"—i.e. his will, though not physically, is still morally one; there can be no opposition of human and divine will in Him. But while Honorius was free from heretical error, and did not teach heresy, he neglected the only means by which the new heresy could be met. He prohibited and contemptuously dismissed the formula "two operations," which exactly summed up the orthodox faith,[1] and though he meant only to assert a moral unity in the two wills of Christ, he did so in language which lent itself easily to abuse on the part of the Monothelites, and he abstained from stating the existence of two wills in Christ, just when the occasion imperatively demanded this statement. Thus he fomented the heresy which it was his duty to check, and his exalted position made his conduct doubly mischievous, and therefore doubly reprehensible. For all that, his position is separated by a very wide gulf from that of the heresiarchs Sergius and Cyrus. This first part of our thesis may claim the support of many Catholic critics, and among them of the learned Jesuits, Garnier and (in recent times) Schneemann, of Ballerini, and of Hefele.

[1] And so in Leo's letter to the Spanish bishops, "flammam haeretici dogmatis, non, ut decuit apostolicam auctoritatem, incipientem extinxit, sed negligendo confovit."

[1] I.e. the Pope takes "energy" for a single act, not for the whole class of operations proper to one nature.

(2) The Judgment of the Church.—Peter Ballerini, in his famous treatise "De Primatu," and many others, hold that it was only in the sense given above that the council condemned Honorius. It was, they say, for negligence, not for heresy, that the Pope was anathematized. We confess that we cannot see how the words of the council, taken by themselves, are capable of this sense;[2] and here again we have great authorities on our side, and these far from Gallican. Pennachi allows that Honorius was condemned as a formal heretic, and Hefele's view in his second edition is substantially the same. But, how, it may be asked, can we defend the orthodoxy of letters which the Church has branded as heretical? We answer that it was the council, not the Church, which did so, for the Church consists of head as well as members. The decisions of the council, on Catholic principles, are binding only so far as confirmed by the Pope, and Leo II. approved the Pope's anathema on Honorius as far as it implied the assistance which his neglect had given to heresy, not so far as it implied the formal heresy of Honorius himself. Whether we say with Schneemann that the Pope confirmed the decrees of the council under this reserve, or, with Hefele, that he determined the precise sense which the words of the council were to bear ("Il est certain que le pape Léon a précisé très nettement la faute d'Honorius et indiqué dans quel sens il fallait entreprendre la sentence prononcée contre lui par le concile") does not appear to make any essential difference. (Hefele-Leclercq, iii. p. 523.)

(3) Were the Letters of Honorius ex Cathedra?—Hefele, even in his second edition, answers this question in the affirmative, and we follow him in believing that Honorius exercised his apostolic authority, and did implicitly address the whole Church. He addresses Sergius, but he lays down rules to be observed everywhere. Nor is there, so far as we can see, any reasonable doubt that Honorius issued a doctrinal pronouncement. True, he will not define that the words "one operation" or "two operations" express the truth, and it is plausibly argued that his refusal to define was the very head and front of his offending. But though he does not define the Monothelite doctrine, he most distinctly teaches that it is vain and foolish to talk of "one operation" or of "two operations," and that such subtleties of language should be left to the grammarians. If Honorius had imposed his own belief with regard to this point on the Church, and threatened to sever from his communion all who did not believe that the phrase "two operations"[1] was frivolous, we do not see how such a fact could be easily reconciled with the Vatican definition. Such a proposition would be so closely connected with faith as to amount to nothing less than an error in dogmatic fact. But this imposition of his own belief on others is just what Honorius abstained from. He wished to impose the disciplinary law, that the form "two operations"[1] was to be avoided, but he stops short of requiring anyone to believe that the expression is idle and unmeaning. For this reason, as we think, Honorius did not teach ex cathedra, and there is nothing in his letters or in his condemnation, fairly considered, which can be justly urged against the doctrine of Papal infallibility as defined in 1870.

(The different opinions on this question are given with tolerable fulness by Schneemann, "Studien über die Honoriusfrage," 1869, and by Hefele-Leclercq, iii. 343 sqq., 501 sqq. Pennachi's treatise "De Honorii I. Romani Pontificis Causa" appeared at Rome in 1870, and was sent to all the bishops of the Vatican Council. Cabrol in DThC; Chapman, "The Condemnation of Pope Honorius," and "Cath. HOOD. [See ALMUCE; COWL.]

HOPE. One of the theological virtues [see that article]. It may be defined as a supernatural gift of God whereby we trust that God will give us eternal life and all the means necessary thereto if we do our part. Hope is made up of two elements, desire and expectation, involving, however, the consciousness of difficulty of attainment.

[1] Observe, however, that, as has been already said, Honorius did not clearly apprehend the meaning of the word "energy" as the heretics employed it.

[2] No doubt the council made an emphatic distinction between Honorius and the heresiarchs, Cyrus, Sergius, &c., but only, if we understand it rightly, because it looked on Cyrus, Sergius, &c., as the inventors of the heresy, on Honorius as their dupe.

Salvation and the means of obtaining it are the objects of our desire. Our expectation of obtaining these is based upon the fact that God is both able and willing to grant them, and that He has promised to do so. "With God all things are possible" (Mt. xix. 26). God "will have all men to be saved and to come to the knowledge of the truth" (1 Tim. ii. 4). "Let us hold fast the confession of our hope without wavering, for He is faithful that hath promised" (Heb. x. 23). At the same time, we must co-operate with God's work in us. "He who made us without our help will not save us without it"; yet "to him that does what in him lies God denies not grace." Hence our expectation is not absolutely certain. "With fear and trembling work out your salvation" (Phil. ii. 12); "Man knoweth not whether he be worthy of love or hatred" (Eccl. ix. 1). There is no room for hope in heaven: the blessed already enjoy eternal life. The damned in hell cannot hope, for they can have no expectation of salvation. It is on earth that this virtue finds place. In consequence of the twofold element of hope there are a number of vices opposed to it. The defect of desire for salvation belongs to the vice of worldliness (sloth, acedia). We can hardly sin by excessive desire. Want of confidence is called despair. The heinousness of this sin arises from the fact that it is a virtual denial of God's power, or goodness, or truth. Too great confidence is called presumption. This may be due to excessive self-reliance or to a distorted idea of God's goodness. The sins of Judas and St. Peter are familiar instances of these opposite vices. (See St. Thomas, 1^a $2^{æ}$, q. 40; 2^a $2^{æ}$, qq. 17–21.)

HOSANNA (ὡσαννά). A Hebrew word taken from Ps. cxviii. (Vulg. cxvii.) 25: "O Lord, we beseech thee, save now: O Lord, we beseech thee, send now prosperity." The words of the Psalm, הוֹשִׁיעָה נָּא, "save, we pray," were shouted by the Jews at the most joyful of their feasts, that of Tabernacles, while they waved their branches of palm and willow. So closely was the feast associated with this shout of joyful prayer that it came to be called the "Hosanna" (הוֹשַׁעְנָא or הוֹשַׁעְנָה), the last or great day of the feast being known as "the great Hosanna" (הוֹשַׁעְנָה רַבָּה).[1] It was with this joyful shout that the crowds met our Lord as He entered Jerusalem on Palm Sunday. "Hosanna in the highest" is possibly only an intensification of the jubilant supplication, and is parallel to the Roman "Io triumphe, ter quaterque!" on occasion of triumphal processions.

The word is retained in the "Sanctus" at Mass, and in the hymn in the service of Palm Sunday.

HOSPITAL. The term is at present restricted to institutions for the treatment of the sick, and in this sense only we shall use it in the present article. For a general account of early hospitals (Nosocomia, from νοσοκομεῖον, the term first occurs in the fourth century) see the article on CHARITY, WORKS OF. Hospital attendants are called in the language of the canon law parabolani. The infirmary (infirmaria) with which every large monastery was provided (see the Rule of St. Benedict, c. 35, 36) appears to have furnished the model for the hospitals of later times. The synod of Aix in 816 ordered that every ecclesiastical foundation, whether of canons or monks, should provide accommodation for the poor, the sick, widows, and strangers. As a rule, hospitals were in early times under the jurisdiction of the bishop. Even at the Council of Trent[1] large powers of visitation and supervision of the accounts of hospitals were assigned to the bishops; but in practice these powers were greatly limited from the first by the existence of contrary customs and privileges, and at present they are hardly exercised at all. The special endowments which in course of time were founded for the support of hospitals came to be much diverted from their original destination; in consequence of which the Council of Vienne (1312) forbade that the charge of a hospital, unless it was expressly so ordered in the original foundation, should be conferred titulo beneficii on any secular clerk, but ordered that their government could be committed to prudent and capable men of good character, who should make periodical reports to the ordinaries or their delegates.[2] From this decree the lay administration of hospitals may be said to date.

The earliest distinct record of the establishment of a hospital in England connects it with the name of Archbishop Lanfranc, who built wooden tenements outside the west gate of Canterbury (about 1080) for the reception of persons afflicted with the king's evil.[3] The priory and hospital of St. Bartholomew's, Smithfield, were founded by one Rahere, a minstrel, in 1102. The hospital of St. Thomas, in the Borough, was founded by the prior of Bermondsey in 1213; it was removed to its present site in Lambeth in 1871. The priory and hospital of Bedlam (a corruption of "Bethlehem") were founded in 1247. These three institutions were given up or sold to the citizens of London by Henry VIII. after the dissolution of monasteries, and have continued to be flourishing hospitals down to the present time. A great movement in the building of hospitals took place in the eighteenth century; the writer in the "Enc. Brit." gives a list of forty-nine erected in England and Ireland between 1719 and 1797. Of late years the Catholics of Ireland have shown a most laudable and fruitful energy in this direction, especially in the dioceses of Dublin and Cork. The Mater Misericordiae hospital in the first-named city is a splendid monument of their zeal and humanity.

HOSPITALLERS. (Hospitales; Knights of the Hospital of St. John of Jerusalem; Knights of Rhodes; Knights of Malta.) This celebrated order, which in its palmy days had vast possessions in every country in Europe, and enjoyed immunities which almost rendered them independent of the lex loci, grew up out of humble beginnings. Some merchants of Amalfi founded at Jerusalem about the middle of the eleventh century a convent, church, and hospital, for the benefit of poor pilgrims visiting the Holy Places. At the date of the siege of Jerusalem by the Crusaders (1099), the hospital was in charge of Abbot Gerard, a Provençal. The intrepid devotion with which Gerard, before and after the city fell, sought to relieve human suffering, without distinction of creed or class, drew forth the admiration of Duke Godfrey, who authorized the separation of the hospital from the convent, and gave to it one of his own manors. Others among the princely and noble Crusaders followed his example, and the "Brothers of the Hospital of St. John the Baptist" soon became a wealthy fraternity, and founded dependent hospitals in various places. Gerard died in 1118; his successor, Raymond du Puy, took the title of Master, and drew up a rule for the order, which Calixtus II. confirmed in 1120. The rule was exceedingly austere; all the brothers, laymen as well as clerks, were required to take the three vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience; abstinence was to be kept on all Wednesdays and Fridays, and from Septuagesima to Easter; all faults were sternly punished; gross sins visited by expulsion. Knights began to join the brotherhood; Raymond himself was one; and the members were divided into three classes—knights, who were all of noble birth; priests or chaplains; and brothers servants, who were not noble. The revenues of the order being by this time very considerable, and Jerusalem being in a settled condition, new views presented themselves to the more aspiring among the members. Of the religious fervour of the first knights who joined the order it is impossible to doubt when one considers the rigour of the life which they voluntarily embraced; still they did not cease to be knights; and the critical condition of the little Christian kingdom, planted as an outpost in the midst of a swarming population of infidels, might naturally suggest to them that they would bear the sword in vain if they did not wield it as occasion arose in support of the Christian cause. They therefore joined, then initiated, expeditions against the Moslems; returning from which, they laid aside their arms and resumed the care of the sick in the hospital. By degrees their military duties assumed the first place in their own minds, and in the thoughts of other men; and they became, with the Templars, one of the chief bulwarks of the Christian power in the East. Dissensions arose, and were of long continuance, between them and the Templars; on one occasion (1259), the forces of the two orders fought a pitched battle on the soil of Palestine. When, in 1187, Jerusalem fell before the arms of Saladin, the tenth Master of the order transferred the convent and hospital to Markab, in Phoenicia, whence, on the retaking of Acre by the Christians in 1193, they were removed to that city. Acre, the last stronghold of Christian power, fell in 1291, and the Hospitallers withdrew to Cyprus, whence they carried on a naval war for some years against the Saracenic nations of the Levant. After the suppression of the Templars (1310), their lands were made over to the Hospitallers; but the latter "had to purchase the surrender from the King [of France] and other princes at such vast cost of money, raised at such exorbitant interest, that the Order of St. John was poorer rather than richer from what seemed so splendid a grant."[1] The sojourn in Cyprus is said to have witnessed a great moral declension among the Knights, and a departure from the spirit and letter of their rule. In 1310 they seized the island of Rhodes, and maintained themselves there for more than two centuries, in spite of all the efforts of the Turks. But in 1522, the Grand Master (this title had been used since 1268) being then Villiers de l'Isle Adam, Solyman the Magnificent sent an immense fleet and army against Rhodes, and though the defence was valiant, and great numbers of the besiegers were killed, yet, being assisted by treachery within the walls, the Sultan at length compelled l'Isle Adam to capitulate. Some years later, in 1530, the Emperor Charles V. granted to the dispossessed order the island of Malta. Here, after repelling a vigorous attack made by Solyman in 1565, they remained undisturbed till, in 1798, under the Grand Master Ferdinand d'Hompesch, a German, some of the French knights having previously been won over by the bribes and promises of the French Government, the island was tamely surrendered to Napoleon Bonaparte, then on his way to Egypt. It was soon after blockaded by an English fleet, and the garrison was compelled by hunger to capitulate in 1800, since which time Malta has been held by England. The Grand-Master Hompesch, in 1799, resigned his office in favour of the Czar of Russia, Paul I. In that and following years the order was suppressed in several European States where it still had possessions. Paul was assassinated in 1801; Hompesch died in 1803; the headquarters of the order were then, with Papal sanction, fixed at Catana, and afterwards at Ferrara. An order of knighthood, designed apparently for the purpose of decorating members of the nobility with crosses and ribands, was founded in Prussia in 1812, under the same name—Johanniter-Orden—by which the Hospitallers had always been known in Germany.

After the order had attained its full development, it was divided into eight "languages," Provence, Auvergne, France, Aragon, Castile, England, Germany and Italy. The Grand Commander was always a Provençal, because that was the nationality of Raymond du Puy; the chief of the language of Auvergne was Grand Marshal; that of France, Grand Hospitaller; of Italy, High Admiral; of Aragon, Grand Guardian; of Germany, High Bailiff; of Castile, Grand Chancellor; and of England (before that "language" was suppressed on account of the national adoption of Protestantism), General of Infantry. Each language was divided into grand priories and bailiwicks, which again were subdivided into commanderies. The ordinary knights, "chevaliers de justice," were required to prove noble birth; but a certain number of knights by favour, "chevaliers de grâce," were also admitted, though not noble, in consideration of distinguished valour or other merit. The dress of a Knight in time of peace was a long black mantle, with a white cross of eight points (the "Maltese" cross) upon it; in the field he wore a red coat with similar crosses in front and on the back. The banner displayed a similar cross on a field gules. (Hélyot, "Ordre de Malte"; "Conversations-Lexicon," Johanniter-Orden; Vertot, "Hist. des Chevaliers Hospitaliers de S. Jean"; Jurien de la Gravière, "Les Chevaliers de Malte.")

HOST (from hostia, a victim). It is used in the Vulgate both of Christ the victim of expiation for our sins, Eph. v. 2, and also of spiritual sacrifices, such as almsgiving, Phil. iv. 18. In the liturgies and ecclesiastical writers, the word is used (1) of Christ present on the altar under the appearances both of bread and wine: thus, the Mozarabic Missal mentions the "Host of bread and wine"; (2) of Christ present under the form of bread: this use is recognised by the three earliest Roman Ordines, which were drawn up between the seventh and nine centuries; (3) of the bread before its consecration: so the word is employed in the ordinary language of Catholics at the present day, and the word in this sense occurs in the Offertory of the Roman Missal, when the priest prays "Receive, O Holy Father, this unspotted Host," &c., taking the bread, not for what it is, but for what it is to become after consecration. Le Brun ("Explic. de la Messe," p. iii. a. 6) says that this prayer was borrowed from the Spanish liturgy, and inserted in the Roman Missal towards the end of the eleventh century The writer of the article Host in Smith and Cheetham maintains that in the Spanish liturgy the words were used of the consecrated Host, the unconsecrated elements being known in early times as "oblata." Hence the old liturgical name for the pre-anaphoral prayer, now known as the "Secret." In the Roman Sacramentaries it is always entitled "Oratio super Oblata," which last word is still of frequent occurrence in the course of the prayer itself.

The form and material of the altar-breads, the offertory, the consecration and elevation of the Host, are explained in separate articles, but this is perhaps the most convenient place to speak of the breaking of the Host.

All liturgies, following the example of our Lord at the Last Supper, require the Host to be broken. The Greeks break the Host into four parts, of which one is received by the celebrating priest, another by the other communicants, while a third is reserved for the sick, and a fourth put into the chalice. In the Mozarabic rite the Host is divided into nine parts. In the Roman Mass the Host used to be divided into three parts, one for the celebrant, another for the communicants present and for the sick, while a third was placed in the chalice. Traces of this ancient usage still remain in the Papal Mass, when the deacon and subdeacon communicate from the same Host as the Pope, and in the Mass of episcopal consecration, in which the consecrator and the new bishop receive portions of the Host consecrated jointly by both. Moreover, in the ancient Roman Mass the celebrating bishop put into the chalice the consecrated Host sent from another church in sign of peace and unity, saying, as he placed this Host in the Precious Blood, "The peace of the Lord be always with you." The Pope, according to the two oldest Ordines, performed the same rite of mixture with the Host which had been reserved from a previous Mass, and which was placed on the altar and adored by him before his own Mass began. At present it is only from the Host consecrated at the Mass that a part is taken and dropped into the chalice. Just before the celebrant puts this portion in the chalice, he says "Pax Domini," &c., words originally intended for the portion consecrated at another Mass and reserved to symbolize the unity of the Church and of the sacrifice. The words "Haec commixtio," "May this mixture of the Body and Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ keep my soul into everlasting life," are said after the portion of the Host is placed in the chalice, and have kept their original reference.

This custom of mixing the Host and the Precious Blood is very ancient. It occurs in the Liturgy of St. James, and is mentioned by a Council of Orange in 441. Liturgical writers tell us that it figures the reunion of Christ's Body and Blood after His resurrection. But if we ask what was the historical origin of the rite, the question is not easily answered. Le Brun suggests that the Host sent from another church would become hard and dry (for altar-breads were thicker in those days), and that this led to the practice of moistening them with the consecrated wine. He supports this explanation by analogies from the discipline of the early Church, and it seems at least very probable. As to the portion of the Host consecrated in the same Mass and dipped in the chalice, Pouget and Vert suppose it sprang from an old custom connected with Communion. If the consecrated wine did not suffice for the number of communicants, ordinary wine was poured into a chalice, and the liquid was sanctified by contact with a portion of the Host. Benedict XIV. justly rejects this theory as destitute of any solid foundation, so far at least as it involves the strange view that a consecrated Host dropped into unconsecrated wine (cum intentione consecrandi) consecrates the latter. There is no proof that the custom alleged is older than the practice which still continues of placing part of the Host in the chalice; and the theory is open to other objections. We are not aware, however, that any better explanation has been devised. (Le Brun and Benedict XIV. on the Mass; Lucas, "The Holy Mass," p. 76; Fortescue, "The Mass," p. 366.)

HOURS, CANONICAL. The portions of the Divine office appointed to be recited at different hours of the day. [See BREVIARY.]

HOUSEL. For many centuries this was the English name for the Blessed Eucharist: it had not become obsolete even in the time of Shakespeare, who makes the Ghost in Hamlet lament that he had been hurried "unhouselled" out of the world. The Anglo-Saxon form was husel; compare the Gothic hunsl, which in the version of Ulfilas is the translation of προσφορά, "offering," in Eph. v. 2, and is seen in the rendering hunsljada of σπένδομαι, "I am being offered up," in 2 Tim. iv. 6. It is found in Mt. ix. 13, and Mk. ix. 4, 48, as the translation of θυσία, and in Jn. xvi. 2 for λατρεία. Skeat, "Etym. Dict." sub voce, says "The original sense is sacrifice." Grein[1] connects the word with the Gr. καίνω and Sanskr. khan, "to kill." Husel to our forefathers expressed the highest good and absolute enjoyment; thus Cynewulf (about 700 A.D.), writing of the happiness of the blessed in heaven, says, "him bið lenge husel," "housel shall be their portion." Robert of Gloucester (1270) says that the Normans made their shrift before the battle of Hastings, "and amorwe hom let hoseli"—in the morning caused themselves to be houselled.[1] The word does not occur in either of the Wycliffite versions of the Bible. (See ANGLO-SAXON CHURCH, p. 27; Lingard, "Hist. and Antiquities of the Anglo-Saxon Church," ed. 2, i. 298; Rock, i. 134–5.)

HUGUENOTS. [See REFORMATION, p. 717.]

HUMERAL VEIL. An oblong scarf of the same material as the vestments, worn by the subdeacon at High Mass, when he holds the paten, between the Offertory and Paternoster; by the priest when he raises the monstrance to give benediction with the Blessed Sacrament; and by priests and deacons when they remove the Blessed Sacrament from one place to another, or carry it in procession. It is worn round the shoulders, and the paten, pyx, or monstrance is wrapped in it. According to Le Brun ("Explication de la Messe," i. p. 319), this veil was introduced because in many churches it was the ancient custom for an acolyte to hold the paten at High Mass, and he, not being in holy orders, could not lawfully touch the sacred vessels with bare hands. But the true explanation would seem to be the following: The earliest use of the veil in connection with the Blessed Sacrament was that of covering the pyx when carried to the sick, to preserve it from dust and rain. So, too, in solemn processions of the Blessed Sacrament the veil would be used, and would be retained when the ceremony closed with a Benediction. In recent times, when Benediction was instituted as a separate ceremony without a previous procession, the use of the veil was retained because it was found already existing. (Braun in "Cath. Enc."; Rock, i. 329–334; iv. 218, 225.)

HUMILIATI. A penitential order founded in the twelfth century. It adopted the rule of St. Benedict and was approved by Innocent III. After flourishing through the Middle Ages it became relaxed. St. Charles Borromeo, acting under the orders of St. Pius V., attempted to reform its abuses. As is well known, one of the monks made a murderous assault upon him, and in punishment for this crime the whole order was suppressed in 1571.

A female branch was founded about the same time as the other, and from their care of lepers became known as Hospitallers of the Observance. There are still in Italy five independent houses of the nuns. (See Hélyot; Rudge in "Cath. Enc.")

HUSSITES. The followers of the Bohemian John Huss or Hus, rector of the university of Prague, who was burnt for heresy at the Council of Constance. His countrymen, or a large proportion of them, rose in arms in 1418 against the imperial government, and during a war which lasted thirteen years inflicted many defeats on the German armies and laid many churches in ashes and many cities waste. Their principal leaders were John Ziska, who died in 1424, and the blind Procopius, an ex-priest. Terrible excesses were committed on both sides, the war being to a great extent one between two hostile nationalities, the Slavonian and the German. Bohemia was at that time celebrated for the grandeur and beauty of the churches and other religious edifices which met the eye in every part; but the Hussites destroyed most of these; in Prague alone may still be seen evidence of the ancient architectural glory of the land. Several crusades were preached against them, but with little result. After the victory of Taus (1431), which dissipated the forces of the fifth Crusade, the war ceased; and the bishops of the Council of Basle, which met in that year, laboured earnestly to bring about a peaceful arrangement. The council conceded to that section of the Hussites called Utraquists the Communion under both kinds, besides certain reforms on points of discipline; the sect was thus divided; and when war broke out again in 1434, the insurgents sustained a crushing defeat at Lepan from the imperial forces. The legate, Philibert, bishop of Coutances, succeeded at last in negotiating a peace; and by the treaty of Iglau (July 1436) the Bohemian and Moravian nations returned to the unity of the Church. Nevertheless, heretical opinions continued to be rife, until the preaching of St. John Capistran, the glory of the Church in the fifteenth century—between 1451 and 1453—wrought a great and sudden change. Eleven thousand Hussites are said to have renounced their errors before him. (See BASLE, COUNCIL OF; CONSTANCE, COUNCIL OF; Salembier, "Le Grand Schisme," p. 323 sqq.; Wilhelm in "Cath. Enc."; Kroess in DAp.)

HYMN. I. In the wider and ancient sense, including Psalms and Canticles: ὕμνος meant originally a song of praise in honour of gods or heroes. It had a religious character, and was distinct for this reason from the ἐγκώμιον (sc. ἔπος), or laudatory ode in honour of a mere man. In the LXX the word is adopted as a translation of several Hebrew terms,[1] and here the word hymn keeps its old classical meaning, except, of course, that it is used of songs in honour of the true God. The use of the New Testament is the same as that of the LXX. Thus we read in Mt. xxvi. 30, Mk. xiv. 26, that Christ and His disciples sang a hymn (ὑμνήσαντες) at the close of the Last Supper. This hymn, no doubt, was the latter part of the Hallel (הַלֵּל), or ascription of praise, consisting of Ps. cxiii.–cxviii., which was sung on the feast of the new moon, the dedication, and the three great solemnities of Passover, Pentecost, and Tabernacles. The former part of the Hallel (Ps. cxiii. cxiv.) was sung before beginning the Paschal meal; the latter (Ps. cxv., cxvi., cxvii., cxviii.), after the assembled company had drunk of the fourth and last cup,[1] over which the "blessing of the song" was said, beginning with the words "Let all thy works praise thee, O Lord," and including the beautiful and solemn ascription "Blessed is he who createth the fruit of the vine." In the gospels, then, the word hymn is not distinct from psalm. St. Paul, however, does make a distinction. He tells the Ephesians (v. 19, cf. Coloss. iii. 16) that they are not to imitate the drunken revelry of the heathen, but to express their joy in a different way. They are to "speak to each other in psalms and hymns and spiritual odes." Probably by psalms the Apostle meant poems in the style of the Hebrew psalter; by hymns, songs in praise of God and Christ (see v. 19); while spiritual odes (ᾠδαὶ πνευματικαὶ) is perhaps a generic term including both psalms and hymns. In the first part, then, of this article we shall continue to use the word in the wide sense with which we set out, including under it any composition in praise of God which is adapted to be chanted or sung.

We do not believe (though the authority of Probst, "Lehre und Gebet in den drei ersten christlichen Jahrhunderten," p. 256 seq., may be quoted against us) that St. Paul in the passage just quoted refers to the use of psalms and hymns in public worship. The context appears to show that he has in view the private intercourse and social meetings of Christians, and desires to point out the kind of joy and mirth which should accompany them. But it is certain that from the earliest times psalms and hymns were sung in Christian assemblies. Pliny, in his famous letter to Trajan, written about 104, mentions the Christian custom of singing a hymn (carmen) to Christ as God in their assemblies. Christian hymns are spoken of by Justin Martyr ("Apol." i. 13, PG, vi. 345), and it would be useless to multiply citations on the use of the psalms in the primitive Church. In them the Church of the first three centuries found the most natural expression of her own sorrow and hope when persecution weighed hard upon her; of her joy in the midst of tribulation. There, too, she found the most natural expression of her faith, for "nearly all the psalms," Tertullian says ("Adv. Prax." 11, PL, ii.167), "are spoken in the person of Christ" ("Christi personam sustinent").[2]

The psalms still form the bulk of the Breviary office, and portions of them constantly occur in the Mass. They are sung

[1] Often the Hebrew word does not answer at all closely to the Greek ὕμνος—e.g. in Ps. lxxi. 20 the LXX have ὕμνοι for "prayers" (תְּפִלּוֹת) and the Vulgate translates ὕμνοι into "laudes."

[1] All present must taste the four cups, and after the fourth no more wine could be drunk that night, to both of which points our Lord seems to allude (Mt. xxvi. 27, 29). The student interested in such matters may be referred to the fascinating article in Buxtorf's Chaldee and Rabbinical Lexicon, sub voc. הַלֵּל.

[2] There is, however, some doubt about the reading. Oehler reads "omnes psalmi qui Christi personam sustinent."

antiphonally—i.e. alternate verses of the psalms are chanted by each side of the choir. A legend given by Socrates attributes the introduction of the antiphonal chant to St. Ignatius. Theodoret, with better reason, says that it was begun at Antioch by the two monks Flavian and Diodorus, in Constantine's reign. This mode of singing came to the West some time later. Justina, the Arian empress, sought to imprison St. Ambrose. His people gathered round him in his church, and passed their time in the singing of psalms and hymns antiphonally. This was the earliest instance of the custom in the Latin Church.

Besides the hundred and fifty psalms, the Roman Breviary contained seven canticles taken from the Old and three from the New Testament. Their use in the offices is far more ancient than Amalarius, who wrote in 820,[1] since St. Benedict prescribes their recitation at Lauds by his monks: "sicut psallit Ecclesia Romana." In the new Breviary (1911) seven more have been added from the Old Testament. The following is a list of the canticles in question:—

1. "Benedicite," from the book of Daniel (the deuterocanonical portion), with abbreviations and ascription of praise to the Trinity inserted at the end. This addition, though not quite in the present form, is mentioned by Amalarius. This canticle is fitly said on Sunday, the first day of the creation, at Lauds.

2. "Benedictus es, Domine" (Dan. iii. 52–57). Sunday at Lauds from Septuagesima to Palm Sunday.

3. Canticle of David (1 Paral. xxix. 10–13). Monday at Lauds.

4. Canticle of Isaiah (Is. xii. 1–6). Monday at Lauds in the ferial office of Advent and Lent, and in the office of vigils.[2]

5. Canticle of Tobias (Tob. xiii. 1–10). Tuesday at Lauds.

6. The Canticle of Hezechiah (Is. xxxviii. 10–20). Tuesday at Lauds II.

7. The Canticle of Judith (Jud. xvi. 15–21). Wednesday at Lauds.

8. The Canticle of Hanna (Anna) (1 Kings (Samuel) ii. 1–10). Wednesday at Lauds II.

9. The Canticle of Jeremiah (xxxi. 10–14). Thursday at Lauds.

10. The Canticle of Moses (Exod. xv. 1–19). Thursday at Lauds.

11. The Canticle of Isaiah (xlv. 15–26). Friday at Lauds.

12. The Canticle of Habakkuk (Habacuc) (iii. 1–19). Friday at Lauds II.

13. The Canticle of Ecclesiasticus (xxxvi. 1–16). Saturday at Lauds.

14. The Canticle of Moses (Deut. xxxii. 1–43). Saturday at Lauds II.

The three New Testament canticles are the "Benedictus" or Song of Zachary, at Lauds; "Magnificat," called by Amalarius the "Hymn" of the Blessed Virgin, at Vespers; and the "Nunc Dimittis," or Song of Simeon, at Compline. At the chanting of these last all stand, out of reverence for the Incarnation, to which they directly refer.

Further, the Roman Church uses other canticles which are not to be found in Scripture—viz. the "Te Deum" and the "Trisagion," of which an account is given in separate articles, and the "Gloria in excelsis" and "Gloria Patri," of which we have spoken in the article DOXOLOGY. The Greek Church is rich in canticles. A beautiful evening hymn or canticle still used by them, and as old probably as the beginning of the third century, is given by Routh in the "Reliquiae Sacrae," vol. iii. p. 515. It belongs to the first division of our subject, for it is not metrical, and may be rendered thus:—"O joyful light of the immortal Father, who is heavenly, holy, blessed, O Jesus Christ, having come to the setting of the sun, and having seen the evening light, we hymn the Father and the Son, and the Holy Spirit of God. Worthy art thou at all times to be hymned, with holy voices, O Son of God, who givest life: wherefore the world glorifieth thee."[2]

II. Hymns in the modern and more restricted sense.—Hymn is now generally used for a religious poem adapted to be sung, and written in metre. The earliest hymn of this kind which we possess is by Clement of Alexandria. It occurs at the end of his "Paedagogus," and is entitled ὕμνος τοῦ σωτῆρος Χριστοῦ. We have hymns by other Greek Fathers—e.g. by Gregory Nazianzen and Synesius—but the hymns actually used in the Greek offices are by later authors, St. John Damascene, Joseph of Constantinople, Cosmas and Theophanes. Hilary of Poitiers is the first Latin hymn-writer whose hymns survive; he was followed by Ambrose, Prudentius, Fortunatus, Paul the Deacon, Sedulius, Gregory the Great, Venerable Bede, St. Bernard, St. Thomas of Aquin, &c. &c. The Council of Agde, can. 30 (anno 506); that of Tours, can. 23 (anno 567); that of Toledo, can. 13 (anno 633), approve the use of hymns in the office; though it is plain from the words of the canon cited last that many felt an objection to using even the hymns of Hilary and Ambrose on the ground that they were not Biblical. It was, however, very late (not, according to Grancolas, till the thirteenth century) that the Roman Church admitted hymns to a place in her Breviary offices.

Hefele, "Beiträge," ii. p. 302, thus traces the origin of the hymns which occur in the Breviary and Missal. The list is in alphabetical order.

[1] His remarks on the canticles as used in the office are quoted by Gavantus, tom. ii. § 5, cap. 9.

[2] Called Lauds II. in the Breviary.

Breviary Hymns.

1. "A solis ortus cardine." Used at Christmas. This hymn is called Abecedarius; because the first verse begins with A, the second with B. In the unrevised version, used still in many churches, the alphabet is gone through at Christmas, and is resumed at the Epiphany at the letter H, "Hostis Herodes impie," now changed into "Crudelis Herodes, Deum." By Caelius Sedulius, a poet of the fifth century. Country unknown.

2. "Ad regias agni dapes." Used on Low Sunday. By a very ancient imitator of St. Ambrose.

3. "Ad sacros virgo thalamos." For the Feast of St. Gertrude. Author unknown; of the mediæval period.

4. "Adoro te devote." In the thanksgiving after Mass. By St. Thomas of Aquin († 1274).

5. "Aeterna Christi munera." For feasts of Apostles. Ascribed by the Benedictines to St. Ambrose. Mone doubts whether it is St. Ambrose's, but ascribes it to the fifth century.

6. "Aeterna coeli gloria." Friday at Lauds. By an ancient imitator of St. Ambrose.

7. "Aeterne rector siderum." For the feast of Angel Guardians. By Cardinal Bellarmine (d. 1621).

8. "Aeterne rerum conditor." Sunday at Lauds. St. Ambrose.

9. "Aeterne rex altissime." For the Ascension. St. Ambrose, but altered.

10. "Ales diei nuntius." Tuesday at Lauds. By Prudentius (born in Spain, 348).

11. "Alma Redemptoris Mater." Antiphon from Advent to the Purification. [See Antiphon.]

12. "Alto ex Olympi vertice." Dedication of churches. A continuation of "Coelestis urbs." See below.

13. "Antra deserti." For feast of St. John Baptist. By Paulus Diaconus, eighth century.

14. "Aspice infami." Feast of the Passion. Unknown author, sixteenth to eighteenth century.

15. "Aspice ut verbum Patris." Feast of Our Lord's Prayer. Author unknown, sixteenth to eighteenth century.

16. "Athleta Christi nobilis." Feast of Venantius. A continuation of "Martyr Dei Venantius."

17. "Auctor beate saeculi." Sacred Heart. Author unknown, sixteenth to eighteenth century.

18. "Audi, benigne conditor." For Lent. By Gregory the Great (d. 604).

19. "Audit tyrannus anxius." Holy Innocents. By Prudentius. See No. 10.

20. "Aurora coelum purpurat." Sundays after Lent. Old imitator of St. Ambrose.

21. "Aurora jam spargit polum." Saturday, lauds. Same as preceding.

21a. "Aurora soli praevia." A modern hymn for the Office of Our Lady of Lourdes (February 11).

22. "Ave, maris stella." Ascribed by Cardinal Thomasi to Fortunatus, bishop of Poitiers (d. about 600), but certainly much later. Daniel places the date of its origin between the sixth and ninth centuries. Mone considers even this date much too early.

23. "Ave, Regina coelorum." Antiphon at compline and lauds. Author unknown. [See Antiphon.]

24. "Beata nobis gaudia." For Pentecost. According to Daniel, by Hilary of Poitiers (d. 379); but this is very doubtful.

25. "Beate pastor Petre." Feast of St. Peter and St. Paul, &c. By Elpis, the first wife of Boethius, the famous minister of Theodoric. Boethius was executed at Pavia in 524.

26. "Christe, sanctorum decus angelorum." On the feasts of Gabriel, Michael, and Raphael. By Rabanus Maurus, archbishop of Mayence (d. 856).

27. "Christo profusum sanguinem." Common of Martyrs. Except that the initial words are altered, this hymn is taken from the "Aeterna Christi munera." See No. 5.

28. "Civis beatae patriae." Feast of Holy Relics. A modern hymn.

29. "Coelestis agni nuptias." Feast of St. Juliana Falconieri. By her biographer, Lorenzini (anno 1719).

29a. "Coelestis aulae nuntius." The Dominican Rosary hymn, attributed to Eustace Serena, and introduced into the Roman Breviary by Leo XIII.

30. "Coelestis urbs Jerusalem." Dedication of churches. Author unknown. Date from tenth to fifteenth century.

31. "Coeli Deus sanctissime." Wednesday at Vespers. By an old imitator of St. Ambrose.

32. "Coelitum Joseph decus." Feast of St. Joseph. Sixteenth to eighteenth century.

36. "Corpus domans jejuniis." A continuation of "Gentis Polonae gloria." See No. 54.

37. "Creator alme siderum" (in the original text "Conditor alme siderum"). Imitated from St. Ambrose, but at least 200 years later.

38. "Crudelis Herodes." Epiphany. Altered from Sedulius. See No. 1.

39. "Crux fidelis." Passion Sunday. A part of the "Pange, lingua, gloriosi lauream certaminis." By Venantius Fortunatus. See No. 22.

40. "Custodes hominum psallimus angelos." Guardian Angels. By Bellarmine (d. 1621).

41. "Decora lux." St. Peter and St. Paul. By Elpis (see No. 25), but much altered.

42. "Deus, tuorum militum." Common of a Martyr. By an old imitator of St. Ambrose.

43. "Domare cordis impetus." Feast of St. Elizabeth of Portugal. By Urban VIII. (d. 1644).

44. "Dum nocte pulsa lucifer." A continuation of "Martyr Dei Venantius." See No. 89.

45. "Ecce jam noctis tenuatur umbra." Saturday at Lauds. By St. Gregory the Great (d. 604).

46. "Egregie doctor Paule." St. Peter and St. Paul (June 29, 30), and Conversion of St. Paul. By Elpis (see No. 25).

47. "En clara vox redarguit." For Advent. By an old imitator of St. Ambrose. Altered from the original text.

48. "En ut superba criminum." Sacred Heart. Sixteenth to eighteenth century.

49. "Ex more docti mystico." Sunday Matins in Lent. Attributed by Mone to St. Gregory the Great. Daniel puts it in seventh to ninth century.

50. "Exite, Sion filiae." Crown of Thorns. Sixteenth to eighteenth century.

51. "Exultet orbis gaudiis." Feasts of Apostles. Tenth to fifteenth century.

52. "Festivis resonent." Precious Blood. Sixteenth to eighteenth century.

58. "Hominis superne conditor." Friday Vespers. Ambrosian.

59. "Hujus oratu, Deus alme, nobis." Commune non Virginum. A part of "Virginis proles." See 171.

60. "Jam Christus astra ascenderat." Pentecost. Ambrosian, and, according to Mone, actually by St. Ambrose.

61. "Jam fasces lictor ferat." Feast of St. John Nepomuc. Eighteenth century.

62. "Jam lucis orto sidere." At Prime. By an old imitator of St. Ambrose.

63. "Jam noctis umbras lucifer." Feast of St. Catherine of Ricci. Eighteenth century.

64. "Jam sol recedit igneus." Trinity Sunday, and Saturday at Vespers. Imitated from Ambrose, hymn 11. Thomasi gives a similar hymn by Ennodius, bishop of Pavia (d. 521).

65. "Jam toto subditus." Seven Dolours. Sixteenth to eighteenth century.

66. "Jesu, corona celsior." Common of Confessor not a bishop. By an imitator of St. Ambrose.

67. "Jesu, corona virginum." Common of Virgins. As preceding.

68. "Jesu, decus angelicum." Feast of the Holy Name. A part of "Jesu, dulcis memoria." See No. 70.

69. "Jesu, dulcis amor meus." Feast of the Winding-sheet. Sixteenth to eighteenth century.

70. "Jesu, dulcis memoria." Feast of the Holy Name. Attributed to St. Bernard, but by an unknown writer in the thirteenth century.

71. "Jesu, redemptor omnium." Common of Conf. Pont. Tenth to fifteenth century.

72. "Jesu, redemptor omnium, quem." Christmas. By an old imitator of St. Ambrose.

73. "Jesu, rex admirabilis." Feast of Holy Name. A part of the hymn, "Jesu, dulcis memoria."

74. "Immense coeli conditor." Monday at Vespers. Imitated from St. Ambrose. Regarded by Mone as probably the work of St. Gregory the Great.

76. "Invicte martyr." Common of Martyrs. Tenth to fifteenth century.

77. "Invictus heros." Feast of St. John Nepomuc. Eighteenth century.

78. "Ira justa conditoris." Precious Blood. Eighteenth century.

79. "Iste confessor." Common of Confessors. Mediaeval, but in the manner of St. Ambrose.

80. "Iste quem laeti colimus." Feast of St. Joseph. Sixteenth to eighteenth century.

81. "Legis figuris pingitur." Crown of Thorns. As preceding.

82. "Lucis creator optime." Sunday at Vespers. Ambrosian, and older than St. Gregory.

83. "Lustra sex qui jam peregit." Passion Sunday &c. A part of the "Pange, lingua, gloriosi lauream certaminis." See No. 108.

84. "Lux alma, Jesu, mentium." Feast of Transfiguration. Urban VIII.

85. "Lux ecce surgit aurea." Thursday at Lauds. Slightly altered from Prudentius. See No. 10.

85a. "Lux O decora." In honour of SS. Cyril and Methodius, attributed to Leo XIII.

86. "Magnae Deus potentiae." Thursday at Vespers. By an old imitator of St. Ambrose.

87. "Maria castis oculis." Feast of St. Mary Magdalen. According to some, by Gregory the Great; according to others, by Odo of Clugny (d. 942).

88. "Martinae celebri." For Jan. 30. By Urban VIII.

89. "Martyr Dei Venantius." Feast of St. Venantius. Sixteenth to eighteenth century.

HYPERDULIA. [See CULTUS.]

HYPOSTATIC UNION. The union of Christ's human nature to the hypostasis or person of God the Word. [See CHRIST.]

I

ICONOCLASTS ("Image-breakers"). A name given to the powerful party which set itself against the religious use of images, and disturbed the peace of the Church during the eighth and the former half of the ninth century.

1. First Stage of the Controversy (726–775).—Leo III., known in history as "the Isaurian" (717–741), published an edict against images. Both the exact date (Hefele places it in 726) and the purport of this edict are uncertain. The Emperor is said to have acted by the advice of Constantine, Bishop of Nacolia, in Phrygia, and it is certain that shortly before the Khalif Jezid II. had set the example—natural, of course, in a Mohammedan—of destroying images. Possibly Leo may have believed that he was removing a cause of scandal to Jews and Saracens, and taking away an occasion of superstition from ignorant Christians. Leo, however, met with immediate and strenuous opposition. The destruction of a famous image of Christ over the brazen door of the palace led to an uproar among the people. Leo was resisted by Germanus, the Patriarch of Constantinople, and condemned by Pope Gregory II. St. John of Damascus, who was living under the rule of the Khalifs, published three discourses in defence of images, entitled λόγοι ἀπολογητικοί. The Emperor threatened to destroy St. Peter's image at Rome, and to take the Pope captive; and his rage was further inflamed by the rebellion of Cosmas. The suppression of the rebellion was followed by a new edict against images, in 730, and by fresh acts of violence. A fleet was sent to Rome, in order to revenge Gregory's anathema published in a Roman synod of the year 732; and, although this attack failed, Illyria was torn from the Holy See, and its possessions in Lower Italy seized. Leo's successor, Constantine V. (Copronymus), continued his father's work. Once more the Emperor's zeal against images caused a rebellion, but this, too, was quelled, and in 754 Constantine convoked a council of 338 bishops—with which, however, neither the Pope, nor the Patriarchs of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, would have anything to do. This Council of Constantinople, which pretended to be oecumenical, anathematized those who venerated images, and this anathema was the excuse for additional severity. Monasteries were destroyed, and many monks—among them John of Monagria and the abbot Stephen—died as martyrs for the faith and traditional usage of the Church.

2. Second Stage of the Controversy (775–842).—The persecution abated, though it did not cease, under Leo IV. (775–780). His wife, Irene, who held the regency after her husband's death, set herself to restore the veneration of images and was supported by Tarasius, the new Patriarch. Irene and Tarasius convoked a general council, to which Pope Hadrian I. was invited, and to which he promised to send legates. The soldiers made it impossible to hold the assembly in the imperial city, but the Fathers met in 787 at Nicaea. The Papal legates—viz. the archpriest Peter and the abbot Peter—presided, their names being always mentioned in the Acts before those of the other members, but the business was mainly conducted by Tarasius. The decrees were signed by at least 308 bishops, or proxies for bishops, but it appears from the Acts that besides the bishops a large number of monks and clerics, not entitled to vote, were present at the deliberations. It was on October 13, and in the seventh session, that the definition of faith was issued. In it the council teaches that the figure of the cross, and "holy images, whether made in colours or of stone (mosaic ?), or of any other material," are to be retained. They are not to become objects of "adoration in the proper sense (τὴν ἀληθινὴν λατρείαν), which is to be given to God alone," but they are useful because they raise the mind of the spectator to the objects which they represent. It is right to salute, honour, and venerate them (ἀσπασμὸν καὶ τιμητικὴν προσκύνησιν), to burn lights and incense before them, not only because this is in accordance with the tradition of the Church, but also on the ground that such honour is really given to God and His saints, of whom the images are intended to remind us. The council uses the word "worship" (προσκυνεῖ) of the veneration due to images, but, as we have seen, carefully explains the sense in which the word is employed. This decision was approved by Pope Hadrian, as he himself declares in a letter to Charlemagne (Hefele-Leclercq, iii. pp. 741 sqq.).

The Iconoclast spirit revived in Leo V., "the Armenian" (813–820), Theodore, abbot of the monastery of Studion, at Constantinople, being the champion of the orthodox cause. Michael II., "the Stammerer" (820–829), tried to reconcile the friends and enemies of images, but his son Theophilus (829–842) persecuted the monks who adhered to the Nicene definition. On February 19, 842, his widow, Theodora, brought the images back in triumph to the chief church at Constantinople, and this day, which marks the close of a long and dreary strife, is still kept by the Greeks as the "Feast of Orthodoxy."

3. The Controversy in the West.—Pope Hadrian sent a very unfortunate translation of the Acts of the Nicene Council to Charlemagne. The latter stated his objections in a document sent to the Pope, and known as the "Libri Carolini."[1] He rejects both synods—the Iconoclast one at Constantinople in 754, and Second Council of Nicaea—and asserts that God alone is to be adored (adorandus) and worshipped (colendus), while the saints are only to be venerated (venerandi). A certain "adoration" (adoratio) may, indeed, be given to men—e.g. by bowing reverently before them, or by kissing, but even this is to be withheld from images, because they are lifeless, and it is foolish to burn incense or lights before them. Moreover, although images may lawfully be used in churches, their use is by no means necessary. The great Council of Frankfort, in 794, also rejected the Nicene decree, evidently misled, as Charlemagne had been, by the faulty translation, which made no distinction between supreme worship (λατρεία) and secondary and relative veneration. Indeed, this synod attributes to and condemns in the Nicene council a doctrine which it had expressly, and in set terms, rejected. (Hefele-Leclercq, iii. pp. 1240 sqq.)

(See IMAGES. The principal ancient authority on the Iconoclasts is Theophanes (d. 818). His "Chronographia" is published among the Byzantine historians (Bonn, 1839). Later authors—e.g. Cedrenus (sec. xi.), Zonaras (sec. xii.), Constantine Manasses (sec. xii.), Glycas (sec. xv.)—draw from him. In modern times, the whole or part of the history has been investigated by the Protestants, Goldast, "Imperialia Decreta de Cultu Imaginum," 1608; Dallaeus, "De Cultu Imaginum," 1612; Spanheim, "Restituta Historia Imaginum," 1686; and by the Catholics, Maimbourg, "Histoire de l'Hérésie des Iconoclastes" (not always trustworthy), Paris, 1683; Marx, "Bilderstreit der Byzantinischen Kaiser," Trier, 1839; Fortescue in "Cath. Enc." Iconoclasm; and by Hefele-Leclercq, iii.—which last has been chiefly followed here.)

ICONOSTASIS (ἰκονόστασις). A wooden wall which in Byzantine churches separates the choir from the nave. It is so called because icons or images of Christ, the Blessed Virgin, &c., are placed upon it. The iconostasis is found in Greek and Russian churches, but it is doubtful whether it was known before the Middle Ages. (Fortescue, "Orthodox Eastern Church," 403.)

IDIOMS, COMMUNICATION OF. [See COMMUNICATIO IDIOMATUM.]

IDOLATRY. [See IMAGES; SAINTS.]

IGNORANCE. St. Thomas (1ª 2æ, q. 76 a. 2) distinguishes ignorance from mere nescience. The latter he explains to mean the simple absence of knowledge; the former implies absence of knowledge in one who is capable of acquiring it. He proceeds to show that ignorance may easily involve sin, since a person is bound to use all reasonable means in order that he may have the knowledge necessary for the performance of his duties. Thus all men are bound to learn, so far as they can, the general principles of religion and morals; and a man sins grievously who remains from his own negligence in the belief that a false religion is true, or that an unlawful course of action which he is pursuing is really lawful. The degree of his sin will differ according as the obligations which he does not fulfil through ignorance are more or less serious, and according to the amount of negligence or malice which his ignorance implies. Thus, while a man is never excused from sin of omission or commission on the plea of ignorance which he can be fairly expected to overcome, this vincible ignorance, as it is called, admits of subdivisions, representing different grades of guilt. A man may use some but not enough industry in removing his ignorance, which in that case is said to be "simply vincible"; he may take scarcely any pains to remove it: then his ignorance is "crass"; he may positively wish to be ignorant, in order that he may sin more freely: then his ignorance is known as "affected." The reader must understand that up to this point we have been speaking of the sin which lies in the ignorance itself, not in the evil act to which the ignorance leads; and the conclusion which we have reached is that all vincible ignorance of the things a man's duty requires him to know is in itself sinful. A physician who practises his profession, without the knowledge which he can and ought to have, sins, even if as a matter of fact he happens to prescribe what is really best for his patients.

[1] Petavius (De Incarnat. xv. 12, 3, 8) thinks that only extracts from the "Libri Carolini" were sent to Pope Hadrian; and so Hefele-Leclercq, iii. 1086. The authenticity of the "Libri Carolini" was denied by Bellarmine, for reasons abundantly refuted by later Catholic scholars—e.g. Sismond and Natalis Alexander. An unsuccessful attempt to attack the authenticity was made once more by Dr. Floss, De Suspecta Librorum Carolinorum . . . Fide, Bonn, 1860.

With regard to the guilt of sins ignorantly committed, invincible ignorance altogether excuses from sin, because no man can incur moral guilt without any intention direct or remote to transgress God's law. A Protestant who thinks the Catholic religion idolatrous, and cannot reasonably be expected, considering his education, circumstances, &c., to think otherwise, is guiltless so far in the sight of God. So, again, if a person is aware that he sins but is invincibly ignorant of circumstances which aggravate or change the nature of his crime, he is responsible only so far as he knows or may know what he is about. A man, for example, who, meaning to kill his enemy, kills his father unawares, is of course a murderer, but he is not a parricide. We pause here to observe that although every man may know the first principles of the moral law and the most obvious deductions from them, he may be invincibly ignorant of certain precepts which belong to the natural law of right and wrong. This point is profusely argued and illustrated by St. Alphonsus, "Theol. Moral." lib. i. § 170.

Supposing that a man is responsible for his ignorance, it may still diminish the guilt of the sins which he ignorantly perpetrates. Such is the case with ignorance "simply vincible," and even, though in a less degree, with "crass" ignorance. When, however, a man remains ignorant in order to sin more freely (ignorantia affectata) St. Thomas (loc. cit. a. 4) holds that "such ignorance seems to increase the voluntary character of his act and its sin" ("videtur augere voluntarium et peccatum").

Censures are not incurred by those who are invincibly ignorant of their existence, though they may be aware that the action forbidden under censure is wrong. If the censure is imposed only on those who sin knowingly, it is held by some theologians that even a person whose ignorance is "affected" escapes the censure. The other opinion is better supported; but "crass" ignorance undoubtedly would serve to save a person from a censure promulgated in these or similar terms.

We may mention in conclusion that St. Thomas (1^a $2^æ$, q. 6 a. 8) and other theologians also divide ignorance into that which is "antecedent"—i.e. which precedes all action of the will; "consequent" or voluntary ignorance; "concomitant," when a man acts in ignorance, but is so minded that he would act in just the same manner if he understood the nature of his deed. We need not, however, dwell on this distinction, since "antecedent" coincides with invincible, "consequent" with vincible ignorance, while "concomitant" ignorance has no influence on moral action.

IHS. A monogram for the Holy Name Jesus. It was originally formed from the Greek letters, ΙΗσοῦΣ, ΙΗΣ, latinized into IHS. It has been erroneously explained as the first letters of "Jesus Hominum Salvator." Other forms are IC (the old Greek form), and IH. These are often combined with the monogram XP (Χριστός).

IMAGE OF GOD. We read, in Genesis i. 26, that God said "Let us make man to our image and likeness, and let him rule over the fishes of the sea and the birds of the air," &c. Petavius, "De Opificio Sex Dierum," lib. ii. cap. 2–4, elaborately discusses the meaning of these words and the history of their interpretation. We select the most important points from his account, adding a few remarks drawn from other sources.

1. Although the text quoted speaks of Adam only as created in God's image, it is plain that neither this likeness itself (see Genesis v. 1–3) nor the dominion over the beasts which flows from it (see Genesis ix. 3, and cf. Ps. viii. 6) has been wholly forfeited by the Fall. At the same time it has been partially lost, and thus St. Paul, Coloss. iii. 10, speaks of the likeness to God as restored in Christ.

2. We may at once dismiss the anthropomorphite error mentioned by Epiphanius, that the likeness to God consists primarily in the bodily shape. Such an interpretation is contrary to the principles of the Mosaic as well as of the Christian religion. God has no body, and no bodily form as such can be like Him (see Exod. xx. 4, Deut. iv. 15 sqq., Is. xxxi. 3). Here we may observe that though many parallels to the expression with which we are concerned may be quoted from heathen writers (e.g., Knobel and Dillmann, ad loc., quote εἰκὼν θεοῦ from Lucian, "De Imag." 28, "Ad effigiem moderantum cuncta deorum," from Ovid, "Met." i. 83, and also refer to Juvenal xv. 142), the force of the passages is blunted by the fact that the heathen had much less perfect notions than the Jews of God's spiritual nature.

3. We may also set aside the beautiful explanation of Tertullian, who makes the likeness refer to the Incarnate Word, who made man in the likeness of that bodily form which He was to take. "So runs," he says ("Resurr. Carnis," 6, PL, ii. 802), "the speech of the Father to the Son, 'Let us make man,' &c. . . . He made him to the image of God, i.e. Christ. Thus that slime, even then taking the image of Christ who was to come in the flesh, was not only a work of God, but also a pledge." Even if the plural number indicates the mystery of the Trinity, there is no hint in the text that man was made in the image of one Divine Person rather than in that of another.

4. Petavius distinguishes that which was made like to God and that in which the likeness resides. The whole man, he says, with his double nature (bodily and spiritual), was made in the likeness of God. But he maintains following the general teaching of the Fathers, that the reason or foundation of this likeness resides chiefly in the soul. The essential point of the resemblance lies in man's possession of intellect and will, which separates him specifically from the beasts and makes him like God. This essential likeness is perfected by accidental qualities —viz. by the natural and supernatural virtues —and in consequence of these accidental perfections one man may be more like God than another. In man, who is the head of the woman, this accidental likeness is more perfect than in woman (1 Cor. xi. 7).

5. He goes on to say that this likeness overflows (redundat) from the soul to the body, and no doubt his erect carriage, the perfection of his form, the way in which his intelligence manifests itself in his features, mark man out as like God and fit to rule over the lower creation. This seems to be the view adopted in the recent edition of our English Catechism, where man's likeness to God is said to reside "chiefly" in his soul.

6. From the time of St. Ambrose (Petavius quotes "De Dignitate Conditionis Humanae," cap. xi.), it has been common to see the image of the Trinity in the three powers of the one soul—viz. memory, understanding, and will. Different writers, however, have fixed upon different powers of the soul as representing the Persons of the Trinity.

7. Still older is a distinction made between "image" and "likeness." Irenaeus (v. 6, 1, PG, vii. 1137), whose view has been largely accepted in the Church, supposes that man was made in the image of God by nature, and became like God by the gift of the Holy Spirit. A similar distinction has been defended by so good a scholar as Delitzsch, but Petavius is surely right in rejecting it. The Hebrew (literally "in our image, according to our likeness") shows more clearly than the Greek or Latin, which insert the copula "and," that the two words are practically synonymous.

IMAGES. The idolatrous worship of images is vehemently condemned in the Scriptures, and in the Old Testament two forms of idolatry are specially reprobated. First, we find denunciations of worship paid to images of false gods, such as Moloch, Astarte, &c. Here the whole meaning and intention of the religious act was bad. No respect was due to such a divinity as Baal; to worship him was an act of treason against the living God, so that there could be no possible excuse for venerating his image. But besides this, the law and the prophets condemn worship given to images of the true God. It seems clear that the calf-worship begun at Mount Sinai, and continued in the northern kingdom at Bethel, &c., was meant as the worship of the true God set before Israel in this symbolical form.[1] But this worship also is denounced—e.g. by Amos and Hosea—and was really idolatrous, because it conveyed false notions of God, who is a pure spirit, so that although, e.g., Jeroboam professed to worship Jehovah, he was really serving a god of his own imagination. To prevent such idolatrous errors, to which the Jews were constantly tempted by the example of the surrounding heathen, the Hebrew worship was regulated in each detail by God. Images they had in the tabernacle and the Temple, for the cherubim were placed in the holy of holies, and the walls and pillars were adorned with figures of palms, pomegranates, &c. But these figures were placed in the tabernacle from which the pattern of the temple was taken by the express ordinance of God, and the Jews were by no means left to their own discretion in the use of sacred images and symbols.

The prohibition of idolatry conveyed in the first commandment continues, it is needless to say, in full force. Idolatry is evil in its own nature, and necessarily a sin of the deepest dye, by whomever it may be committed. Moreover, it is possible to commit this sin without falling into the gross and brutal error of identifying a lifeless image with the Divinity. Therefore the Council of Trent (sess. xxv., De Invocatione &c.) not only reprobates the delusion that the Godhead can be really portrayed by material figures; it also states that in images there is no divinity or "virtue on account of which they are to be worshipped, that no petitions can be addressed to them, and that no trust is to be placed in them."

At the same time the Tridentine Fathers, following the Second Council of Nicaea, advocate the true use of images. The danger of idolatry has to a very great extent passed away at least from Christian nations. Further, God Himself has taken a human form which admits of being represented in art. So that the reasoning of Moses in Deut. iv. 15 no longer holds,[1] and on the whole matter the liberty of Christians is very different from the bondage of Jews. Images, according to the Tridentine definition, are to be retained and honoured, but abuses and all occasion of scandal to the rude and ignorant are to be removed. The object of images is to set Christ, His Blessed Mother, the saints and angels before our eyes, while the council adds that "the honour which is given to them is referred to the objects (prototypa) which they represent, so that through the images which we kiss, and before which we uncover our heads and kneel, we adore Christ and venerate the saints, whose likenesses they are." "The council," says Petavius, "De Incarnat." xv. 17, "could not have declared more expressly that the cultus of images is simply relative (σχετικόν): that they are not in themselves and strictly speaking (per se et proprie) adored or honoured, but that all adoration and veneration is referred to the prototypes, inasmuch as images have the dignity or excellence to which such honour properly appertains."[1] We cannot imagine any better exposition than that of this great theologian, who, among many other merits, is always distinguished for his sobriety and his avoidance of useless subtleties. His words explain the doctrine of the Church and remove all possibility of scandal, when we find the Church in the Good Friday Office inviting the faithful to adore the cross. It is the suffering Saviour, not the dead wood, which Catholics adore. [See CROSS.]

[1] See Exod. xxxii. 5, where Aaron calls the idolatrous feast a feast to Jehovah; and 3 Kings xxii. 6, from which it appears that prophets who sanctioned the calf-worship were still considered prophets of Jehovah.

[1] "Ye did not see any likeness on the day that the Lord spake to you on Horeb from the midst of the fire, lest ye should act wickedly and make for yourselves a graven image," &c.

The use of images in the Church dates from the earliest times. The Church no doubt was cautious in her use of images, both because the use of them in the midst of a heathen population might easily be misunderstood, and also because the images might be seen and profaned by the heathen persecutors. It is, as Hefele and De Rossi maintain, for this latter reason that the Council of Elvira, in the year 306, forbade the placing of "pictures in the churches, lest what is worshipped and adored should be painted on the walls." But see the art. ELVIRA and Hefele-Leclercq, i. 240, where another explanation is given. Certainly the Church of that time did not reject the use of Christian art—witness the numerous sacred pictures recently brought to light in the Roman catacombs. Many ancient works of art which have come down to us from the old Spanish church—e.g. the beautiful sarcophagus of Saragossa—prove that there was no difference of feeling or opinion on this matter between Spanish and Roman Christians.

We can trace the veneration of images and the Tridentine doctrine concerning it through the whole history of the Church, but here a few instances must suffice. The early Christian poet Prudentius speaks of himself ("Peristeph." ix. 9 seq.) as praying before an image of the martyr Cassian. We read that at a conference held between St. Maximus and the bishop Theodosius the Fathers present bent the knee to the images of Christ and the Blessed Virgin.[1] The principles of Gregory the Great on the respect due to images are well known. When Serenus, bishop of Marseilles, removed images from the church on the ground that they had proved an occasion of idolatry, Gregory tells him (Ep. ix. 105) that he ought not to have broken images placed in the church as means of instruction, not objects of adoration. In sending Secundinus images of Christ, the Blessed Virgin, and St. Peter and St. Paul, Gregory writes (Ep. ix. 52): "I know you do not ask for the image of our Saviour to worship it as God, but that, being reminded of the Son of God, you may be inflamed anew with love of Him whose image you long to see. And we on our part do not prostrate ourselves before it as a divinity, but we adore Him whom by means of the image we bring to mind, in His birth, in His passion, or as He sits on His throne."[2]

Two qualifications must be made to the doctrine stated in a previous part of this article. We have said that no images can really resemble the divine nature which is immaterial. But there is no harm in symbolical representations of the Holy Trinity, or of the divine Persons singly. The contrary proposition was condemned by Pius VI. (Synod of Pistoia, prop. 69), in the bull "Auctorem fidei."[2] Again, though images have no virtue in themselves, God may be pleased to give special graces at particular shrines. This is taught in the same bull, and the words of St. Augustine (Ep. 78) are aptly quoted: "God, who divides special gifts to each according as He wills, was not pleased that these [marvels] should take place in all the shrines of the saints."[2] (See ICONOCLASTS; CULTUS; St. Thomas, $2^a\ 2^{ae}$, q. 94; Rock, i. 244 sqq.)

IMITATION OF CHRIST. Also known as "The Following of Christ." The title in the original Latin is "De Imitatione Christi." It is divided into four books: I. "Admonitions useful for the Spiritual Life"; II. "Admonitions leading to the Interior Life"; III. "Of Interior Consolation"; IV. "A Devout Exhortation to Holy Communion." Though addressed chiefly to monks, it is applicable also to persons living in the world. It appeals particularly to the affective side of our nature, and so is a useful corrective for the dry scientific treatment of some ascetical writers. Objection has been raised to the insistence on the cultivation of one's own sanctification; but zeal for souls, and even for the temporal welfare of others, is by no means excluded. The book was issued anonymously in 1418. The well-known words: "Inquire not who said this, but attend to what is said" (i. v.), show that the author wished to remain unknown. But as it began to be ascribed to various great writers (e.g. St. Bernard, St. Bonaventure, Innocent III.) the real author, Thomas a Kempis (b. 1379–1380 at Kempen, in the diocese of Cologne, d. 1471), signed his name into a codex still extant containing the four books and other minor treatises. The original is in the Royal Library, Brussels; a facsimile was published in London in 1879. The best edition is that of Pöhl. Of the many translations into English, that published by Kegan Paul, founded on Challoner and revised by Cardinal Newman, is perhaps the best. A word of warning should be given against certain Protestant versions, in which the sense of the original, especially in Book IV., has been distorted. In some Protestant editions Book

IV. is omitted altogether. It is interesting to note that the original is for the most part written in rhyme. The discovery of this fact is due to Hirsche. An edition giving his Latin text and an English translation was published by Kegan Paul in 1892. (Scully, "Life of the Ven. Thomas a Kempis," and art. Thomas a Kempis in "Cath. Enc."; Cruise, "Thomas a Kempis"; Waterton, "Thomas a Kempis and the Imitation of Christ.")

IMMACULATE CONCEPTION OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN. 1. The Meaning of the Doctrine.—Benedict XIV. ("De Fest." clxxxvii. seq.), quoting Frassen, a Scotist theologian, distinguishes between active and passive conception. The former consists in the act of the parents which causes the body of the child to be formed and organised, and so prepared for the reception of the rational soul which is infused by God. The latter takes place at the moment when the rational soul is actually infused into the body by God. It is the passive, not the active, conception which Catholics have in view when they speak of the Immaculate Conception. For there was nothing miraculous in Mary's generation. She was begotten like other children. The body, while still inanimate, could not be sanctified or preserved from original sin, for it is the soul, not the body, which is capable of receiving either the gifts of grace or the stain of sin. Moreover, from the fact that Mary sprang in the common way from Adam our first father, it follows that she was the daughter of a fallen race and incurred the "debt" or liability to contract original sin. Adam was the representative of the human race: he was put on his trial, and when he fell all his descendants fell with him, and must, unless some special mercy of God interposed, receive souls destitute of that grace in which Adam himself was created. In Mary's case, however, God's mercy did interpose. For the sake of Him who was to be born of her and for "His merits foreseen" grace was poured into her soul at the first instant of its being. Christian children are sanctified at the font: St. John the Baptist was sanctified while still unborn. Mary was sanctified earlier still—viz., in the first moment of her conception. She received a gift like that of Eve, who was made from the first without sin, only the immaculate conception is rightly called a privilege, and a privilege altogether singular, because in the ordinary course of things the Blessed Virgin would have been conceived and born in original sin. We beg the reader to remember that what we have written up to this point is the universal teaching of theologians, and we have carefully abstained from entering on scholastic disputes (e.g. as to the remote and proximate debt of sin), because we believe that the mere statement of the doctrine is enough to remove many prejudices from the minds of candid Protestants. So far from derogating from, the Catholic doctrine exalts, the merits of Christ. He who redeemed us redeemed her. He who sanctified us in Baptism sanctified her in her conception. Nor could any Catholic dream of comparing Mary's exemption from sin, we do not say with the sinlessness of the Divine nature, for such a comparison would be insane as well as blasphemous, but with the sinlessness of Christ as man. Sin was a physical impossibility in the human soul of Christ, because it was hypostatically united to the Divinity. Mary, on the other hand, was sinless by the grace of God. "Thou art innocent," says Bossuet, addressing Christ, "by nature, Mary only by grace; Thou by excellence, she only by privilege; Thou as Redeemer, she as the first of those whom Thy Precious Blood has purified" ("Sermon pour la fête de la Conception de la Sainte Vierge"). No better summary could be given of the Church's doctrine.

2. History of the Controversy on the Doctrine.—The controversy, so far as we know, began in the twelfth century. The church of Lyons had adopted the custom, which already prevailed elsewhere (see the article on the feast), of celebrating the feast of Mary's conception. St. Bernard (d. 1153) remonstrated sharply with them, in great measure because the feast had not been approved at Rome. The authenticity of this letter has been disputed, but on grounds, as Benedict XIV. implies, absolutely insufficient. Besides, little would be gained even if the letter were spurious, for Petavius ("De Incarnat." xiv. 2) has proved, from other passages in his works, Bernard's opinion to have been that the Blessed Virgin was not conceived immaculate, but was sanctified in the womb like Jeremiah and St. John the Baptist. Benedict XIV., following Mabillon, declines to accept the theory that St. Bernard had the active, not the passive, conception in his mind. At the same time it must be remembered that the saint refers the whole matter of his dispute with the canons of Lyons to the judgment of the Roman Church. The quotations in Petavius from St. Peter Damian, St. Anselm, Peter Lombard, and others abundantly prove that St. Bernard's opinion was the prevalent one before and during his own age. In the following century St. Thomas (3^a, q. 27, a. 2) held that Mary was only sanctified in the womb after her body was already informed by the soul (post ejus animationem), and he argues that if the Virgin "had not incurred the stain of original guilt," she would have stood in no need of being saved and redeemed by Christ, whereas Christ, as the Apostle declares, is the Saviour of all men.[1]

[1] Cardinal Lambruschini, in a polemical dissertation on the Immaculate Conception (Romae, 1842), declared that here, as in other places, the MSS. of St. Thomas had been corrupted. But this position does not admit of serious defence.

But the strongest evidence to the prevalence of the belief that the Virgin was not conceived without sin is supplied by Scotus ("In Lib. III. Sentent." d. iii. qu. 1, n. 4). He gives his own opinion in favour of the immaculate conception with a timidity which clearly betrays his consciousness that the general opinion was on the other side. After maintaining that God might, had He so chosen, have exempted the Blessed Virgin from original sin, and might on the other hand have allowed her to remain under it for a time, and then purified her, he adds that "God knows" which of these possible ways was actually taken; "but, if it is not contrary to the authority of the Church or of the saints, it seems commendable (probabile) to attribute that which is more excellent to Mary."

Scotus, however, farther on in the same work (d. 18, qu. 1, n. 4), expresses a more decided view, and he inaugurated a new state of opinion, though the change did not come at once, and the story told by Cavellus, an author of the seventeenth century whom Benedict XIV. quotes, is probably a mere legend. According to this story, Scotus defended the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception at Cologne and Paris, and a disputation which he held in the latter place induced the Paris University to adopt the doctrine, and won for Scotus himself the title of the "Subtle Doctor." Scotus died in 1308, and events which happened in 1387 show how rapidly the Scotist opinion had spread and how deeply it had struck root, at least in France. A Dominican doctor, John Montesono, had publicly denied the Immaculate Conception, whereupon he was condemned by the University and by the Bishop of Paris, and though he appealed to the Avignon Pope Clement VII., he did not dare to appear, and was condemned for contumacy. The Fathers of the Council of Basle begged Cardinal Torquemada (Turrecremata) to prepare a treatise on the question, and so he did; but circumstances prevented him from laying it before the council, and his treatise, which was adverse to the doctrine, was practically unknown till it was published by the Master of the Sacred Palace with the consent of Paul III., then Pope. The decree of Basle, which defined that the doctrine asserting Mary's immunity from original sin was "to be approved, held, and embraced by all Catholics, as being pious and consonant to the worship of the Church, to Catholic faith, right reason, and Holy Scripture," was passed in 1439, when the council had become schismatical, so that it in no way bound the consciences of Catholics. It serves, however, to mark the general feeling of the time; and other signs of the hold the doctrine had obtained are not wanting. It was asserted at a provincial synod in Avignon in 1457. Forty years later the University of Paris required an oath to defend the doctrine from all who proceeded to the doctor's degree, and the tenet was embraced with ardour by the Carmelites, the different branches of the Franciscan order, and by men of the highest distinction among the secular clergy.

The matter gave rise to keen discussion at Trent, and although most of the bishops held the doctrine, the council contented itself with a declaration that in defining the truth that the whole human race fell under original sin it did not intend to include in the decree "the blessed and immaculate Virgin Mary," but desired that the Constitutions of Sixtus IV. (a Franciscan) should be observed. These Constitutions had been issued in 1476 and in 1483. In the former the Pope granted indulgences to those who said the Mass and office which he had approved for the feast of the Conception. In the latter he condemned those who accused persons who celebrated the feast of mortal sin, or those who maintained that the doctrine itself was heretical. Pius V., in 1570, forbade all discussion of the doctrine in sermons, permitting, however, the question to be handled in assemblies of the learned. Paul V., in 1617, prohibited attacks on the doctrine in public assemblies of any kind, while Gregory XV., in 1622, strictly forbade anyone to maintain, even in private discussions, that the Blessed Virgin was conceived in original sin. He made an exception, however, in favour of the Dominicans, to whom he granted leave to maintain their own opinion in discussions held within their own order, and he was careful to add that he in no way meant to decide the theological question, but, on the contrary, forbade anyone to accuse those who denied the Immaculate Conception of heresy or mortal sin. Benedict XIV., writing about the middle of the eighteenth century, sums up the whole state of the question in his day thus: "The Church inclines to the opinion of the Immaculate Conception; but the Apostolic See has not yet defined it as an article of faith."

So matters stood, when on February 1, 1849, Pius IX. wrote from Gaeta to the bishops of the Catholic world. He asked them for an account of their own opinion and of the feeling entertained in the churches subject to them on the expediency of defining the doctrine that the Blessed Virgin was immaculate in her conception. The Italian, Spanish, and Portuguese bishops, about 490 in number, were nearly unanimous in their wish for the definition. On the other hand, there were bishops of great eminence in France, Germany, and Switzerland who were of a different mind. Some of these last thought that the doctrine was not prominent enough in Scripture or tradition to be made an article of faith; others deprecated a definition which would put fresh difficulties in the way of Protestants or timid Catholics; others, again, were afraid to pronounce at all on so hard a matter. Nearly six years later the question was closed. On December 8, 1854, Pius IX., in the presence of more than 200 bishops, issued his solemn definition that the Immaculate Conception of Mary was a truth contained in the original teaching of the Apostles and an article of divine faith. The definition was accepted by Gallicans as well as by Ultramontanes, for it was notorious that the entire episcopate gave full assent to the doctrines of the Papal bull. Indeed, the opposition made within the Church to the new definition was of the most insignificant kind.

3. The Doctrine in its relations to Scripture and Tradition.—A Catholic is bound to hold that the doctrine recently defined was contained in the faith once delivered to the saints by the Apostles. On the other hand, he is under no obligation of believing it possible to produce cogent historical proof (over and above the Church's decision) that the doctrine was so contained. It is enough to show that no decisive argument can be brought against the Apostolic origin of the Church's present belief, and there are at least probable traces of its existence in the Church from the earliest times. Petavius—justly, as we think—dismisses many passages from the Fathers, which have been cited in support of the doctrine. He points out that if the Fathers speak of Mary as "stainless," "incorrupt," "immaculate" (ἄχραντος, ἄφθαρτος, ἀμίαντος), it by no means follows that they believed her to have been conceived immaculate. Still tradition does supply solid arguments for the belief in question.

First, from the earliest times and in every part of the Church, Mary in her office at the Incarnation was compared and contrasted with Eve before the Fall. We find the parallel between the two drawn by Justin Martyr ("Trypho," 100, PG, vi. 700), by Irenaeus (iii. 22, 34, v. 19, PG, vii. 958, 961, 1175), by Tertullian ("De Carne Christi," 17, PL, ii. 781), not to speak of later Fathers; indeed, the doctrine that Mary is in some sense the second Eve is a commonplace of primitive theology. This comparison enters into the very substance of the theology of St. Irenaeus. He urges the parallel between Mary and Eve, just as he insists on the resemblance between Adam and Christ, the second Adam. As Eve was married and yet a virgin, so Mary, "having an appointed husband, was yet a virgin." Eve listened to the words of an angel: so also Mary. Eve's disobedience was the cause of our death: Mary, "being obedient, became both to herself and all mankind the cause of salvation." "The knot of Eve's disobedience was loosed by Mary's obedience." The Virgin Mary became "the advocate of the virgin Eve." It is true that whereas Eve of course when made was immaculate, yet this is just the point where Irenaeus fails to draw the parallel between Eve and Mary. It must be remembered, however, that in Irenaeus, as in the Ante-Nicene Fathers generally, there is no explicit statement of the doctrine of original sin, so that we cannot expect an explicit statement that Mary was exempt from it. There is further a presumption that if Irenaeus could have had the question "Was Mary conceived in sin?" proposed to him he would have answered in the negative. His whole theory of the Incarnation turns on the proposition "Man could not break the bonds of sin, because he was already bound fast by them." He, in Adam, had been already worsted by the devil. When, therefore he tells us that Mary untied the knot of Eve's disobedience, we may infer that she never had been bound by it in her own person.

The tradition that Mary was the second Eve was familiar to great Fathers of the later Church. But one of these, St. Ephrem (A.D. 379), gives much more explicit evidence—the most explicit evidence, so far as we know, to be found in patristic writings—of belief in the Immaculate Conception. Not many years ago the famous Syriac scholar Bickell edited, with a Latin version of the Syriac, the "Carmina Nisibena" of the saint. There is no doubt as to the authenticity of these poems. In hymn 27, strophe 8, St. Ephrem speaks thus: "Truly it is Thou and Thy Mother only who are fair altogether. For in Thee there is no stain, and in Thy Mother no spot. But my sons [i.e. the members of the Church of Edessa] are far from resembling this twofold fairness." Elsewhere Ephrem places first among fallen men infants who die in baptismal innocence; so that it must be freedom from original, not actual, sin which he ascribes to Mary. So (ii. 327 a.), "Two were made simple, innocent, perfectly like each other, Mary and Eve, but afterwards one became the cause of our death, the other of our life." It is most important to appreciate this testimony at its real value. It is not only or chiefly that it proves the existence of the belief which we are discussing, in the fourth century. This no doubt it does, and it enables us summarily to dismiss the confident assumption of many Protestant scholars that the belief arose for the first time in the Middle Ages. But besides and above this, St. Ephrem supplies an authentic commentary on the meaning of the tradition that Mary was the second Eve. We may well believe, considering how early and in what various quarters it appears, that this tradition was Apostolic. And just at the time when the doctrine of original sin becomes prominent in Christian theology, St. Ephrem assumes without doubt or question that this tradition implies Mary's entire exemption from the cause, and supplies us with reasonable grounds for believing that the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception is coeval with the foundation of the Christian Church.

A word or two must be said about St. Augustine. Undoubtedly his theory on the transmission of original sin by the act of generation drove him to believe that Mary, being conceived in the ordinary way, must have been conceived in sin. So Petavius understands him, and the Saint's own language seems to be clear and decisive on this point. Thus ("De Nuptiis et Concep." i. 12, PL, xliv. 121), he teaches that all flesh born "de concubitu" is "flesh of sin," and ("In Genesim ad lit." x. 118, PL, xxxiv. 422), he expressly affirms that on this ground Mary's flesh was, while Christ's was not, "caro peccati." Again, in "Contr. Julian." v. 15, PL, xliv. 814, his language is still more definite, for he says that original sin passes to the child from the "concupiscentia" of the parents, and that therefore original sin could not infect the flesh of Christ, since his Virgin Mother conceived Him without concupiscence. It may, we think, be affirmed without irreverence to so great a doctor, that this language about sin passing to the flesh involves confusion of thought, and probably very few nowadays would maintain that "concupiscentia" in itself natural and innocent, though caused as a matter of fact by the Fall, can possibly be the cause of original sin. The fact that St. Augustine is driven to the position he takes with regard to Mary by the exigencies of a theological theory, probably mistaken, and certainly never approved by the Church, diminishes, if it does not altogether destroy, the force of his testimony. On the other hand, great weight belongs to the testimony which St. Augustine bears to the Immaculate Conception, because in giving it he speaks, not as a theologian, but as a Christian. He is impelled in this latter case by Catholic instinct and tradition, not by any theory of his own. His testimony is as follows. He is arguing ("De Natura et Gratia," cap. 36, PL, xliv. 267) against the Pelagian theory that some of the saints had been wholly exempt from actual sin. He denies the truth of the statement altogether. All have sinned, "excepting the holy Virgin Mary, concerning whom, for the honour of the Lord, I would have no question raised in treating of sin. For how do we know what excess of grace to conquer sin on every side was bestowed on her whose lot it was (quae meruit) to conceive and bring forth Him who certainly had no sin?" We fully admit that it is actual, not original, sin which St. Augustine is thinking of directly. But on his own principles he was bound to hold that exemption from actual implied freedom from original sin. Thus he asserts categorically ("Contr. Julian." v. 15, PL, xliv. 815) that if Christ had been conceived in sin He must needs have committed actual sin ("peccatum major fecisset, si parvulus habuisset"). Let the reader observe that this theory, unlike that referred to above on the transmission of sin, is supported by the tradition and subsequent decision of the Church. It is of course conceivable that Mary might have been conceived in sin and then enabled by a special and extraordinary grace to avoid all actual trespass. In any case we may safely say that St. Augustine might easily have accepted the Church's present doctrine. It would have satisfied most fully this inclination to believe that Mary "for the honour of the Lord" was enabled to "overcome sin on every side." The freedom from actual would have followed suitably upon her preservation from original sin, and the progress of her life would have been consonant with its beginning.

Finally, the rapid acceptance of the doctrine within the Church, when once it came under discussion, might of itself dispose individual Christians to believe it and prepare the way for definition. The one positive objection was that, if Mary was conceived immaculate, Christ could not have been her Saviour and Redeemer. When once the truth was apprehended that Mary's exemption from original sin was due to the merits of her Divine Son, and magnified instead of detracting from them, the belief in this exemption grew and spread throughout the Catholic world. We cannot expect Protestants to appreciate this argument. But to a Catholic, who believes that the Holy Spirit directs the minds of the faithful, and specially those of the saints, the very fact of the doctrine's acceptance affords a strong presumption of its truth. He would naturally be loath to believe that God allowed the Christian people to cling so zealously to a doctrine which had no solid foundation, and which, if untrue, would be an error of a very serious kind. He would recognize in the belief of so many saints a judgment superior to his own, and a greater quickness to discover the "analogy of the faith." The solemn definition of the Church would but enable him to hold with greater security what he already held as a certain and pious opinion.

(The evidence for and against the doctrine is given by Petavius, "De Incarnat." xiv. 2. Perrone published his treatise "De Immaculato B.V.M. Conceptu: an dogmatico decreto definiri possit," at Rome in 1853. Still better known is the work of Passaglia, also at that time a Jesuit, "De Immaculato B.V. Conceptu," Romae, 1854. A collection of ancient documents relating to the doctrine was made by a third Jesuit, Ballerini. The dogmatic theologians generally deal with the Immaculate Conception in connection with Original Sin, or else in treating of the Mother of the Redeemer. There is a useful little book in English, by Bp. Ullathorne, "The Immaculate Conception of the Mother of God.")

IMMACULATE CONCEPTION, FEAST OF. The Greek emperor Manuel Comnenus

(died 1180), in a Novel quoted by Balsamon, mentions the feast of the Blessed Virgin's Conception as one to be observed by the people on December 9. In the West it is kept on December 8. England, it is said, was the first among the countries of Western Europe to keep this feast, and a Council of London, held in 1328, attributes its introduction to St. Anselm; but an Epistle of the Saint which begins with a formal notice on the subject is probably spurious.

From England the celebration seems to have passed to Normandy, and then south to Lyons. St. Bernard reproved the canons of that city for introducing a custom which had not the sanction of the Roman Church. St. Bonaventure (died 1274) ("In Lib. III. Sentent." d. iii. qu. 1) mentions the custom of keeping the feast, and says he does not dare either to approve or disapprove it. It is certain, however, that the feast had established itself in the calendar of the Roman Church before the middle of the fourteenth century. Sixtus IV., towards the close of the fifteenth century, sanctioned an office and Mass proper to the day; for which, however, a new office was substituted by Pius V. Clement VIII. made the feast a greater double, Clement IX. added an octave; Clement XI. made it a holiday of obligation. Under Pius IX. the office was again changed, and the feast was entitled that of the "Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary." Leo XIII. raised it to a double of the first class. (Benedict XIV. "De Festis.")

IMMORTALITY OF THE SOUL. [See SOUL.]

IMMOVEABLE. [See FEASTS.]

IMMUNITY. Ecclesiastical immunity is defined to be "the right by which churches and other sacred places, as well as ecclesiastical persons and their property, are free and discharged from secular functions and burdens, and from acts repugnant to the sanctity and reverence which are due to them."[1] It is of three kinds—local, real, and personal. On local immunity, which is of ecclesiastical institution, see SANCTUARY and ASYLUM. Real immunity is the right whereby it is claimed that the property of the Church and the clergy are exempted from secular jurisdiction and from all fiscal and other burdens imposed by secular authority. Personal immunity is the right of the clergy to be exempted from all lay jurisdiction [see JURISDICTION].

The real and personal immunity of the clergy are generally held by canonists to be of divine right. Several passages are adduced from the Old Testament, among which the most striking is 1 Esdr. vii. 24, where the emperor Artaxerxes, addressing through Esdras the "keepers of the public chest" beyond the river, gives them to understand that "concerning all the priests, and the Levites, and the singers, and the porters, and the Nathinites, and ministers of the house of this God,"[2] they, the keepers, "have no authority to impose toll or tribute or custom upon them."[2] The words of Christ (Mt. xvii. 24, 25) form an important text bearing on the subject. Earthly kings exempt from tribute their own children and their servants; Christ, therefore, as the Son of God, is rightfully exempt from the payment of the didrachma, which was destined for the support of the divine worship in the Temple. Moreover, the words "that we may not scandalize them"[2] show that Peter and the other Apostles, as Christ's servants, are included under the same exemption. In Peter it is held that the clergy of the Catholic Church of every age is included by representation. Christ and His servants the clergy are therefore by right exempt from tax or tribute; nevertheless, sooner than cause scandal by availing Himself of this exemption, Christ bade Peter pay the sum demanded for them both; and the pastors of the Church have generally acted similarly in later times.

Political reasoning on general grounds might be employed in support of the claim of the clergy to an exemption from taxation. As kings do not tax their own children, so governments, in a natural state of things, do not tax their own servants or officials. The officials of a government constitute the agency by which it fulfils its duty of protecting and regulating society; and taxes are raised in order that it may have the means of supporting these officials while so engaged. To make the officials themselves pay taxes is, theoretically, an absurdity; it is giving them money with one hand and taking it away with the other; though of course there may be sound reasons of practical convenience why this should be done. So it is with the Catholic clergy; regarding them as the moral police of society, a wise State would recognize them as its children and its servants, and assume that, as a general rule, they would spend their own money in such a way as to promote peace, order, and well-being more effectually than would be the result if the State were to tax them to the same amount, and spend the money for them.

The early history of clerical immunity is given in great detail by Thomassin.[1] Constantine exempted from all tribute his private property and "ecclesias Catholicas"; he also ordered that no public functions of a lay character should be imposed on the bishops.[2] Constantius, early in his reign, passed edicts highly favourable to this immunity, but revoked them after the Council of Ariminum (359), except in the case of clerics who were very poor, and whose temporal business was of trifling value. By a law passed shortly before his death he replaced things nearly on their old footing. These vacillations in the policy of the emperors were of continual occurrence; thus while Julian the Apostate abolished all clerical immunities, Valentinian restored them. The great bishops of the fourth century took patiently the imperial demands on their temporalties, and complied with them; but on the spiritual side they were inflexible. Writing of his refusal to grant one of the Milan churches to the Arians, at the request of Valentinian II., St. Ambrose said "If he asks for tribute, we do not refuse it. . . . We pay to Caesar the things which are Caesar's, and to God the things which are God's. A church belongs to God, and ought not certainly to be assigned to Caesar." Thomassin argues that St. Ambrose was quite aware that immunity was the Church's right, but that he preferred to pay taxes rather than cause offence. "Ambrose knew that from Christ—the Church—the Clergy—tribute was not due, but yet was paid; and paid all the more nobly because it was not owed."

In the feudal ages, when fiefs and manors were granted to the Church to be held on feudal terms, the question of ecclesiastical immunities became much complicated. As a bishop who held a fief under some secular prince had to do homage to him for it, kneeling before him, placing his hands between the lord's hands, and swearing to become his "man"—a spectacle which moved grief and indignation in the breast of many a zealous pontiff and saint—so, as to all other services (rent, corvées, troops, &c.) which the vassal was bound to render to his lord by the condition of his tenure, he could not, if a churchman, plead the ecclesiastical immunity, though it still subsisted in full force as to lands held in frank-almoigne. (Choupin, in DThC.)

The Council of Trent[1] entreated all Catholic princes not to allow their servants and officials to violate, through cupidity or carelessness, "the immunity of the Church and of ecclesiastical persons which had been established by the ordinance of God and canonical sanctions." At the present day, through the continual encroachments of the lay power, immunity as regards taxation exists nowhere in Europe; and even that shred of privilege by which the burden of military service was taken off the necks of aspirants for the priesthood has been swept away by the so-called Liberals in France and Italy.

The exemption of the clergy in England from all liability to serve on juries or as representatives in Parliament is a vestige of their one-time absolute immunity. (Ferraris, Immunitas Ecclesiastica; Thomassin, iii. 1, 33; Boudinhon in "Cath. Enc.")

IMPANATION. An heretical doctrine concerning the mode of our Lord's presence in the Holy Eucharist, according to which the substance of bread remains whole and entire together with the substance of Christ's body. The word is founded on the analogy of the Incarnation: Christus panis factus est. Another name for the heresy is Consubstantiation (see EUCHARIST, p. 326; BERENGARIUS; Franzelin, "De SS. Euch. Sacramento," thes. xv., scholion; Scannell in "Cath. Enc." Consubstantiation).

IMPEDIMENTS OF MARRIAGE. The contract of marriage between certain persons and in certain cases is null and void by the law of God, natural and revealed. So far Protestants are at one with us, for they would not dream of holding that marriage between father and daughter or brother and sister was valid. But Catholics further maintain with the Council of Trent (sess. xxiv. De Matrimon. can. 4) that the Church may institute impediments which nullify the contract of marriage. The principle on which this tenet rests is a very simple one. Marriage between baptized persons, according to the Catholic doctrine, is a sacrament, and therefore this contract falls under ecclesiastical authority. Just as the State may pronounce certain natural contracts, which are lawful in themselves, null and void—just as, for example, it may for the general good nullify certain engagements made by minors or at play—so the Church may interfere with the freedom of the marriage contract. The State, on the contrary, has no power to nullify marriage, because the sacrament of marriage does not fall under civil jurisdiction, although, as the formalities of marriage affect the public order, the State may regulate them—e.g. provide that persons about to be married should have their names registered, &c.

Impediments are of two kinds. They may render marriage unlawful merely, in which case they are called "mere impedientia"; or they may nullify it, in which case they are known as "dirimentia." We shall treat of these impediments as settled by the existing law, adding historical notices.

1. Impedimenta mere Impedientia:—

(a) Time. The solemnities of marriage must not take place between Advent Sunday and Epiphany, or between Ash Wednesday and Low Sunday. So the Council of Trent, sess. xxiv. De Reform. Matr. cap. 10. Marriage, solemnly celebrated, is forbidden in these times because they should be devoted to penance or else to a joy purely spiritual. Marriages in Lent were generally prohibited in ancient times: marriages in Advent and Christmas time only in certain places, though Gratian inserts this latter prohibition in his "Decretum." Some provincial councils forbade marriage on Sundays, from three days before the Ascension to the first Sunday after Pentecost, &c.[1]

(β) Ecclesiastical Prohibition.—This includes the marriage of a Catholic with a baptized person not a Catholic, which marriage is valid, but, unless a dispensation has been obtained, unlawful. Such marriages are forbidden by the Councils of Elvira (anno 306) cap. 16, and of Laodicea, can. 10 and 31. The Council of Chalcedon, can. 14, forbids "readers and singers" (ἀναγνῶσται καὶ ψαλται) to marry an heretical girl. The reason of this prohibition has always been the same, viz. the danger that the children will not be brought up Catholics [see MIXED MARRIAGES]. Hence in some of the rules just quoted exception is made in favour of marriage with heretics who promise to become Catholic. Marriages without previous proclamation of banns are also forbidden by the Church.

(γ) Simple vow of chastity, such as is made privately or in congregations like the Sisters of Mercy, &c., which are not religious orders in the canonical sense.

(δ) Previous engagement to another person, unless the engagement has been lawfully annulled—e.g. by mutual consent. This impediment, like (γ), depends on the natural law.

2. Diriment Impediments :—

(α) Error and conditio affecting the substance of the contract. Thus a man who goes through the form of marriage with one woman, mistaking her for another, really marries neither. This impediment comes from the natural law. If a person marries a slave unawares, the marriage is null. For the Roman and early Church law on this subject see Döllinger, "Hippolytus and Callistus," Engl. transl., p. 147.

(β) Vows of chastity, if solemn, and holy orders. The reader will find under the article CELIBACY an account of the gradual process by which holy order came to be a diriment impediment. The ancient Church did not expressly distinguish between simple and solemn vows, but Chardon quotes a letter of Pope Innocent I. to Victricius of Rouen in which a very similar distinction is recognized. The Pope divides nuns who have made the vows of continence into two classes—viz. those who have and those who have not received the veil publicly from the Church. The former, if they marry, he treats as unfaithful to Christ their Spouse, and excludes from communion till the person they marry is dead. On the latter he merely imposes penance for a time. Moreover, the Council of Elvira, canon 13, forbids virgins consecrated to God, in case they break their vows, to communicate even on their deathbeds, unless they have done penance and ceased to cohabit ("abstineant a coitu").[1] So again the First Council of Toledo (anno 400), canon 16, only admits a nun ("devota") to penance if separated from the man she has unlawfully married ("caste vivere coeperit, recesserit et poenituerit"). So the Second Synod of Orleans, canon 17, with respect to deaconesses and many other ancient authorities. The Trullan Synod, canon 44, treats the marriage of a monk as an act of unchastity.

(γ) Consanguinity and affinity. [See the articles so entitled.]

(δ) Public decorum ("publica honestas"). If A is or has been betrothed to B, A cannot validly marry a third person related in the first degree of kindred to B. He cannot, e.g., marry B's mother, daughter, or sister. A similar rule, of course, binds B. So the Council of Trent, for in the older canon law the impediment from betrothal extended to the fourth degree. Again, if A has been married to B, but has not consummated the marriage, he cannot afterwards marry anyone related to B, in the first, second, third, or fourth degree. This impediment was adopted from the Roman law, and is not referred to by the Fathers.

(ε) Crime. (1) Adultery between two persons accompanied by a promise of marriage when they are free to contract it. (2) Successful conspiracy to murder a husband or wife in order that the conspirators may marry. (3) Adultery and murder with the intention of marriage combined, even if there be no conspiracy or previous promise of marriage, are diriment impediments. Also from the Roman law.

(ζ) Difference of religion ("disparitas cultus") makes the marriage of a baptized and unbaptized person null. In the early Church, such unions, though often prohibited, were not regarded as invalid, and nearly all theologians, according to Chardon, are agreed that custom only has made the impediment a diriment one.

(η) Grave fear, if unjustly caused with a view of bringing marriage about. Probably this cause nullifies marriage by the natural law.

(θ) Another marriage tie still existing ("ligamen"). If one of the parties has been previously married, there must be a moral certainty that his or her previous partner is dead. In any case in which the priest or the parties themselves doubt, recourse must be had to the bishop, who will judge whether the moral certainty exists.

(ι) Defect of age. Boys cannot marry before completing their fourteenth, girls before completing their twelfth year, "nisi malitia suppleat aetatem."

(κ) Clandestinity. No one doubts that from the earliest times marriages, wherever it was possible, were contracted in the face of the Church; indeed Tertullian ("De Pudic." c. 4, PL, ii. 987) tells us that marriages contracted otherwise were thought extremely disreputable. Chardon quotes a declaration of Charlemagne, Capitularies of French kings, and decrees of Eastern emperors, which prove that marriage without the ecclesiastical ceremonies was treated as absolutely null, and such was the discipline both in East and West till the twelfth century, for Ivo of Chartres quotes the False Decretals to this effect. But, soon after, the discipline changed in the West. The validity of clandestine marriages was fully recognized by the Church, and the common opinion of the mediaeval doctors made the essence of marriage consist in the free consent of the contracting persons. The Council of Trent (sess. xxiv. cap. 1, De Reform. Matrim.) introduced a new condition for the validity of the contract, and therefore of the sacrament. It declared all marriages null unless contracted before the parish priest, or another priest approved by him for the purpose, and two or three witnesses. But in order to avoid the difficulties which would otherwise have arisen, the decree of Trent was not promulgated in Great Britain, Scandinavia, Denmark, several German States—indeed, in Protestant countries generally; so that the marriages of Protestants or Catholics made before the Protestant clergyman or magistrate or without any functionary in these countries were valid. In 1741 Benedict XIV. declared clandestine marriages in the Low Countries valid unless both of the parties were Catholics. Pius VI. in 1785 made a similar declaration with regard to Ireland.

[1] Even then only in case this fall has been a single act of weakness atoned for by a life-long penance.

It is interesting to note that, two centuries after the Council of Trent, Lord Hardwicke's Act (1753) assimilated the law of England to that of the Church by declaring all marriages null and void unless celebrated by a Church of England clergyman in the presence of two witnesses, after three consecutive publications of the banns.

Important changes were made in the Tridentine law by the Decree "Ne temere" (August 2, 1907), which came into force on Easter Sunday, 1908. (See NE TEMERE.) As far as clandestinity is concerned, it is no longer the parish priest (or Ordinary) of the parties, but the rector (or Ordinary) of the place where the marriage is celebrated who is now the valid assistant. But permission should be obtained from the parish priest (or Ordinary) of one of the parties, unless that party has lived for one month in the place of the marriage. This law is binding even in mixed marriages.

(λ) Impotentia (antecedens et perpetua).

(μ) Raptus. If a man carries off a woman from one place to another with the view of marrying her, the Church nullifies any marriage between them so long as the woman is in the man's power. The impediment still exists even if the woman consents to the marriage. The Church will accept no proof of freedom on the woman's part short of her removal from her suitor's power. Severe laws were made against the crime of raptus by the Roman emperors, beginning with Constantine. Justinian absolutely prohibited marriage between the raptor and the woman he had carried off. So did Charlemagne in his Capitularies; and the Greek Church maintained a similar discipline. "It is," says Chardon, speaking of the Western Church—"it is specially in the ancient councils of France that raptus has been expressly declared a diriment impediment." The councils he quotes range from the sixth to the eighth century, and they certainly prohibit subsequent marriage between the raptor and his victim, though it may be doubted whether they meant to pronounce it null. However, in the anarchy towards the end of the ninth and during the tenth centuries these canons fell into disuse. Pope Lucius III. decided that, when a girl was carried off, her marriage with the man who had seized her was valid, provided she consented to it freely. Innocent III. followed the same principles. The Council of Trent introduced the present rule at the request of the French king. The reader will observe that it is less strict than the prohibitions of the old French canons. The Council of Trent permits marriage between the raptor and the raptee, provided the latter is out of the former's power when she gives her consent.

3. Dispensations from Impediments.—If the impediments arise from the natural or divine law, no human power can dispense from them. The Pope may dispense from such as are of ecclesiastical origin; while bishops, in virtue of their ordinary power, can only set aside the "impedimenta mere impedientia."[2] Bishops, however, may often dispense from certain diriment impediments as Apostolic delegates. The facility with which dispensations are given has increased enormously since the thirteenth century. Gregory the Great granted marriage dispensations in favour of the English who were just converted to the faith. So Gregory II. in favour of the Germans. But in numerous instances dispensations, such as would easily be granted nowadays to ordinary Catholics, were refused even to crowned heads. It was in vain that the Council of Trent tried to restore the ancient rigour. (See MARRIAGE; Chardon, 1058 sqq.; Gibert, "Histoire ou Tradition de l'Église sur le Sacrement du Mariage." The moral theologians and the canonists deal with Impediments in their treatises "De Matrimonio," e.g. St. Alphonsus, "Theol. Moralis," lib. vi. tract. vi.; Ballerini, "Theol. Mor." vol. vi. p. 398 sqq.)

IMPOSITION OF HANDS even in the old dispensation (Gen. xlviii. 14, Deut. xxxiv. 9) symbolized the conveyance of grace and power. The rite has been retained under the new law, and in two instances (the imposition of hands in ordination and confirmation) it has received a sacramental efficacy. The following are the most noteworthy instances in which the Church employs or once employed the rite.

(1) As Christ blessed the children, laying

His hands on them (Mt. xix. 13), so the bishop laid his hands on the catechumens as they made the first step towards reception into the kingdom of God. Thus Eusebius ("Vit. Constant." iv. 61, where see the note of Valesius) tells us that Constantine, when preparing shortly before his death for Baptism, first received the imposition of hands accompanied with prayer (τῶν διὰ χειροθεσίας εὐχῶν ἠξιοῦτο). This ceremony was repeated during the catechumen's course of preparation, at the renunciation of the devil (Tertull. "De Coron." 3, PL, ii. 79) and at the exorcisms (Orig. "In Jos." Hom. xxiv. 1, PG, xii. 940). Probably it is this imposition of hands which is intended in can. 39 of the Council of Elvira and can. 6 of the Council of Arles (see Hefele-Leclercq, i. 242 sqq.), and it is still retained in our baptismal rite.

(2) As Christ laid His hands on the sick, so did the Church's ministers ("Constit. Ap." ii. 41; Cyprian, "De Laps." 16, ed. Hartel, p. 248) on those who were spiritually sick—viz. on penitents. In early ages the imposition of hands was so notable a feature in the administration of the sacrament of Penance as to give it one of its most usual names. The usage is still perpetuated in the ceremonial raising of his hand by a priest when giving absolution: he recites the sacramental formula with the right hand outstretched over the penitent.

(3) Hands were also laid on heretics when reconciled to the Church. "Let no change be made" [or, nothing fresh be done], such are the words of Pope Stephen (apud Cyprian, Ep. 74, ed. Hartel, p. 800), "beyond the traditional usage of laying hands on them unto penance."

(4) Imposition of hands was also used in blessing marriages (Clem. Al. "Paed." iii. 11, p. 291, ed. Potter; PG, viii. 637), in miraculous healing of the sick (Irenaeus, apud Euseb. "H.E." v. 7), in consecrating virgins and ordaining deaconesses. These last customs do not exist in the modern Church, except that in the ceremonies which precede Extreme Unction the priest holds his hand over the sick man.

(5) The imposition of hands in Confirmation and Order is treated of in the articles on these sacraments, but it may be convenient to notice here a rite which occurs in the Roman Mass, just before the consecration, though it does not, strictly speaking, form part of our present subject, since it is an extension and not an imposition of hands. It is, however, connected with an imposition of hands in the Old Law. Then he who offered sacrifice put his hand on the head of the victim (see Levit. i. 4, iii. 2, 8, 13, iv. 5, 15), whether the sacrifice was a holocaust, eucharistic, or expiatory. This rite indicated the "personal and intimate relation between the worshipper and the victim" (Kalisch on Levit. i. p. 176). It is with the same intention that the priest holds his hands extended at the prayer "Hanc igitur" over the gifts of bread and wine "which are soon to be changed into the victim of our peace." The rite does not appear to be ancient, for the Ordo Romanus down to the fifteenth century simply prescribed the extension of the hands at this prayer, and Le Brun ("Explic. de la Messe," part iv. a. 5) does not seem to have found our present rubric in any missal older than 1481.

IMPRIMATUR. ("Let it be printed.") The technical term for license to print. It does not imply any direct approval of the work, but merely certifies that the limits of Catholic orthodoxy have been observed. [See INDEX OF PROHIBITED BOOKS.]

INCARDINATION and EXCARDINATION (cardo, hinge). These terms are used for the full and perpetual transference from the jurisdiction of one bishop to that of another. Excardination is the going out from the old diocese; incardination is the entry into the new diocese. Cardinare is used by St. Gregory the Great; and incardinare is found in the "Diurnus Romanus" in the sense of inscribing on the list or matricula of a church.

The transference from one diocese to another may take place for the purpose of ordination [see DIMISSORIALS] or may be the transfer of an already ordained priest. The conditions of the former are laid down by a decree of the S. Cong. of the Council (July 20, 1898). As regards priests, special rules have been enacted for those ordained ad titulum missionis, and for emigrants to N. America and some other countries. (See Taunton; Dunford in "Cath. Enc.")

INCARNATION. The Catholic doctrine of the Incarnation has been already explained under the word CHRIST. Here we confine ourselves to an account of the word and its synonyms.

The history of the word and its synonyms is given with great fulness by Petavius, "De Incarnat." ii. 1. In St. John's gospel we are told that the Word "was made flesh," where, as Maldonatus remarks, "flesh" (like the Hebrew בָּשָׂר: e.g. in Gen. vi. 12, "all flesh had corrupted its way") is only another word for "man," though the word is fitly chosen to mark the extreme condescension of God the Word. St. Justin, "Apol." i. 61, combines the two words "became flesh" into the single verb "flesh-made" (σαρκοποιηθείς[1]); while in the Latin version of Irenaeus, v. 1, 3, PG, vii. 1122, we meet with the technical term which has been so familiar ever since, viz. Incarnation (incarnatio). The Greek Fathers use a word nearly equivalent, viz. σάρκωσις. They also employ ἐνανθρώπησις, "being made man," for which St. Ambrose has the word humanatio in order to express the truth that the Word took perfect human nature, that He had a human intelligence as well as a human body and animal soul, and so to exclude the heresy of Apollinaris. The Fathers also use other words which are less plain and explicit. Most commonly they call the Incarnation the "economy" (οἰκονομία), meaning that Christ took flesh in order to provide for our salvation. They often substitute for the bare word "economy" fuller expressions, such as "the economy according to the flesh," "according to man," and the like. They also speak of the Incarnation as the "condescension" (συγκατάβασις), the "taking," "assuming," "clothing Himself in flesh," as the "mingling" (viz. of the two natures), incorporation (incorporatio); &c. &c. [Authorities are given in the article CHRIST.]

INCENSE. It is certain from Tertullian, "Apol." 42, PL, i. 493, and from many other early writers down to St. Augustine, that the religious use of incense was unknown in the primitive Church. Le Brun quotes St. Ambrose to prove that incense was used in the churches of his day, but the quotation can scarcely be said to prove the point. On the other hand, Dionysius the Areopagite—whose works were first quoted in 532, but may have been written a good deal earlier—distinctly mentions ("Hierarch. Eccles." iii. § 2), the censing of the altar by the chief priest. The use of incense is also mentioned in the first Ordo Romanus, which may belong to the seventh century, and in the liturgies which go by the names of St. James, St. Basil, and St. Chrysostom. Possibly also the fourth (al. third) canon of the Apostles which forbids anything to be placed on the altar at the oblation except "oil for the lamp and incense" may refer to the incense as liturgically used. If so, we should be justified with Le Brun in supposing that incense was introduced into the Church services when the persecution of the heathen ceased and the splendour of churches and ritual began.

Some authors believe that incense was at first introduced to sweeten the air, and certainly a "Benediction of Incense" used in the time of Charlemagne and given by Martène points in this direction. But the mystical significations of incense are obvious. It symbolizes the zeal with which the faithful should be consumed; the odour of Christian virtue; the ascent of prayer to God (Ps. cxl. 2; Apoc. viii. 3, 4). It is used before the introit, at the Gospel, offertory, and elevation in High Mass; at the Magnificat in Vespers; at funerals, &c. In the symbolism of the Liturgy incense has two distinct uses:

(1) Persons or things are perfumed with it for the purpose of justifying or hallowing them, following as a rule on their being sprinkled with holy water. Thus ashes, palms, &c. &c., are incensed, as are the priest who is about to celebrate Mass, the faithful who assist at the Divine Offices, the altar itself and the unconsecrated bread and wine placed upon it. And in such case the incense before being used is previously blessed with a special prayer.

(2) The offering of incense is (as in the Old Law and among heathen nations) made the expression of an act of adoration, or of veneration. Hence the Blessed Sacrament, the Holy Cross, the pictures and statues of saints are incensed. For this use incense requires no previous blessing and the interdicting of such blessing is yet in force when incense is offered at Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament and at the Elevation during High Mass and in some other similar circumstances. (Rock, "Hierurgia," ii. 332 sqq.)

INCLUSI, INCLUSAE. A monk or nun might, with the permission of the superior, be shut up permanently in a cell, either near to or within the precincts of the monastery, whence he or she could not come forth but by licence of the bishop. Cassian describes the inclusi of his day; as a class, they were not then held in great esteem. The manner of life of a female recluse in the twelfth century may be clearly seen from the treatise "De Institutione Inclusarum" (PL, cxcv.), ascribed to St. Ælred of Rievaulx. The writer addresses his counsels to his own sister, who had retired into a cell; he earnestly warns her to shun idleness and frivolous conversation; from the general tone of his remarks it is plain that the life of a female recluse was beset by great and peculiar dangers and temptations. INDEX OF PROHIBITED BOOKS (INDEX LIBRORUM PROHIBITORUM ET EXPURGANDORUM). The perception of the influence for good or evil exerted by books has induced the authorities of every strongly constituted State to control their circulation. Not to search for other instances, the speech which Livy[1] puts in the mouth of the consul Postumius (B.C. 186) shows the sternness of Roman feeling on the subject. Addressing the assembled people in the forum, and about to denounce the foul Bacchic rites of which he had discovered the trace, "How often," he says, "in the time of our fathers and grandfathers, was the duty imposed on the magistrates of forbidding the practice of foreign rites; of driving away [foreign] priests and prophets from every corner of the city; of searching for and burning books of magic; of putting a stop to every system of sacrificing that was not according to the custom of Rome!" In Christian times the danger of bad books was recognized from the first. The converts at Ephesus (Acts xix. 19) voluntarily brought their magical books to

St. Paul and cast them into the flames. One of the Apostolic Canons (lx.) orders the deposition of any one in the ranks of the clergy who should publish in the Church as holy "the falsely inscribed books of the impious." The practice of the primitive Church in condemning and suppressing heretical or dangerous books was uniform. The erroneous writings of Origen were brought to the Roman Pontiff, Pontianus, to be condemned by him; Leo the Great by letter suppressed and prohibited the books of the Priscillianists.[1] Descending to the Middle Ages we find Leo IX. in a synod at Vercelli (1050) condemning and ordering to be burnt the writings of Erigena and Berengarius on the Eucharist.[2] The Council of Constance (1415) ordered all the books of John Hus to be publicly burnt at the council, and that all bishops should make diligent search for copies and burn them wherever found. Leo X. in the bull Exsurge, Domine (1520), condemned the earlier heretical writings of Luther. The invention of printing, and the extension of facilities of communication between State and State, made it evident to the hierarchy that if the influence of books was to be kept under control, new methods must be adopted. When copies of books were slowly multiplied by the labour of scribes, it was sufficient to await their publication before examining them, and trust to being able, if they were to be suppressed, to call in, get hold of, and cancel the few copies in circulation. But when the printing-press could turn out a thousand copies of a work in a few days everything was changed. It then became necessary that the books should be examined before they were printed; censors were appointed, and a system of licensing came into force. "The first known instance of the regular appointment of a censor on books is in the mandate of Berthold, archbishop of Mentz, in 1486"; and a few years later, in 1501, "a bull of Alexander VI., reciting that many pernicious books had been printed in various parts of the world, and especially in the provinces of Mentz, Cologne, Treves, and Magdeburg, forbade all printers in these provinces to publish any book without the licence of the archbishops or their officials."[3]

In the movement of what is called the Reformation, a deluge of books containing doctrine more or less erroneous was poured over Europe, and it became evident that if booksellers were to know with certainty what they might sell and the Christian faithful what they might read, it would not do to trust to an "imprimatur" on the title-page, which might be forged, or come from Protestant censors; but that a list or catalogue of books condemned by the Church must be drawn up and published. The matter was taken up by the Council of Trent (sess. xviii.), which appointed a commission of some of its members to consider and report on the steps which it was advisable to take about books generally. This commission compiled an Index of Prohibited Books accordingly, but the council in its last session (1563) remitted the whole matter to the Pope. In conformity with this reference, St. Pius V., a few years later, erected the Sacred Congregation of the Index. Sixtus V. confirmed and enlarged their powers.

"The Congregation of the Index of Prohibited Books consists of a competent number of Cardinals, and has a secretary taken from the Order of Preachers, and a great number of theological and other professors who are called Consultors, the chief of whom is the Master of the Apostolic Palace [Curia Romana], the primary and official Consultor of this Congregation."[1]

A Constitution of Benedict XIV. (1753) gives minute instructions as to the principles and methods to be observed by the Congregation in its work of examining and judging books. Some idea of these principles may be gained from the following paragraph: "Let them know that they must judge of the various opinions and sentiments in any book that comes before them, with minds absolutely free from prejudice. Let them, therefore, dismiss patriotic leanings, family affections, the predilections of school, the esprit de corps of an institute; let them put away the zeal of party; let them simply keep before their eyes the decisions of Holy Church, and the common doctrine of Catholics, which is contained in the decrees of General Councils, the Constitutions of the Roman Pontiffs, and the consent of orthodox Fathers and Doctors; bearing this in mind, moreover, that there are not a few opinions which appear to one school, institute, or nation to be unquestionably certain, yet nevertheless are rejected and impugned, and their contradictories maintained, by other Catholics, without harm to faith and religion—all this being with the knowledge and permission of the Apostolic See, which leaves every particular opinion of this kind in its own degree of probability."[2]

The ten rules sanctioned by the Council of Trent have in course of time been modified by the various Pontiffs. At length in our own day a fresh set of rules was drawn up by Leo XIII. (Officiorum et Munerum, January 25, 1897). They deal first with the prohibition, and secondly with the censorship of books. As the regulations are of a highly technical character, reference should be made to their exact wording in the document itself. Here it may be sufficient to say that they forbid all books defending heresy or schism, or attacking the foundations of religion; and all books by non-Catholics treating expressly of religion, unless it is clear that they contain nothing contrary to the Catholic faith. Editions, published by non-Catholics, of the original text of Scripture, or of versions in any dead language, are allowed only to those engaged in theological or biblical studies. Vernacular versions by non-Catholics are not allowed (except to students as above); nor even those by Catholics, unless expressly approved by the Holy See or by the Bishops. Obscene books are absolutely forbidden, except "classical authors, ancient or modern . . . on account of the elegance and beauty of their diction," but are not to be used in teaching boys, unless expurgated. There are also rules as to books treating of the various kinds of superstition, and also those narrating new visions, prophecies, and miracles; and rules as to sacred pictures and indulgences, liturgical books, and prayer-books. Newspapers and periodicals which designedly attack religion or morality are forbidden, and Catholics must not write in them without reasonable cause. Then follow the rules concerning permission to read forbidden books, and the denunciation of bad books. This leads to the second part of the constitution, the censorship of books. The instructions issued by Benedict XIV. (see supra) are confirmed. All the faithful are bound to submit to censorship all works of a religious or moral character; and the clergy, "out of respect for their ordinaries," ought not to publish books on any subject without their knowledge. Printers and publishers are also subject to certain regulations.

The same constitution also ordered a revised edition of the Index of Prohibited Books. Further, Pius X., when reconstituting the Roman Congregations ("Sapienti Consilio," June 29, 1908), laid down that "henceforth it will be the task of this S. Cong. (of the Index) not only to examine carefully the books denounced to it, to prohibit them if necessary, and to grant permission for reading forbidden books, but also to supervise, ex officio, books that are being published and to pass sentence on such as deserve to be prohibited. Its further task is to remind the bishops of their sacred duty to oppose the publication of pernicious writings and give information about them to the Apostolic See." [See MODERNISM.] (There is a good account of the whole subject in Lehmkuhl's "Theol. Moral.," ed. 10ª, ii. pp. 807–820; Ferraris; Forget in DAp; Périès, "L'Index.")

INDICTION. A fiscal term, meaning the proclamation of a tax, "quicquid in praestationem indicitur." After the reorganization of the empire under Diocletian and Constantine, it was customary to proclaim the taxes yearly, and the name of the notice thus given, indictio, was transferred to the year itself. Every fifteen years there was a re-valuation of property, which would lead to material alterations in the terms of the tax-notices. To one of these quindecennial periods the name of "circle of indictions," and then briefly "indiction," was given. This came to be used as a means of denoting the date of a transaction; a thing was said to happen "indictione V." or "X."—that is, in the fifth or tenth year of the circle of indictions then current. Of course the denotation of time was incomplete, for it included no statement of the number of such circles which had elapsed since the epoch from which the computation started. This mode of reckoning the years, which makes its appearance about the middle of the fourth century, continued to be used even into the Middle Ages, after all notions connecting it with taxation had disappeared. The first indiction is supposed to have commenced on September 24, 312, on which day Constantine gained a great victory over Maxentius. The rule for finding the indiction of any year is as follows: to the given year A.D., reckoning it to commence on January 1, add 3; divide the amount by 15; the remainder is the number of the indiction; if there is no remainder, the indiction is 15. The number 3 must be added, in order to make the portion of the date A.D. which is anterior to the commencement of the indictions (312 years) divisible by 15 equally with the portion subsequent to that date. Suppose we wish to know the indiction of A.D. 595: $\frac{595 + 3}{15} = 39$, with rem. 13; the indiction number for this year is therefore 13. "Indict. XV." applies only to the portion of the year from January 1 to September 24; from the latter date to the end of the year it is Indict. I.

INDUCTION (CANONICAL). [See INSTITUTION.]

INDULGENCE. Indulgentia is a technical term in the Roman law, meaning amnesty or pardon; and in much the same sense it occurs in the Latin of the Vulgate, where it is synonymous with remissio, as may be seen by comparing Isa. lxi. 1 with Lk. iv. 18. In the language of the Church it has acquired a much more definite and restricted meaning, and an indulgence in the theological sense of the word is defined by Amort, in his classical work on the subject, as "a remission of the punishment which is still due to sin after sacramental absolution, this remission being valid in the court of conscience and before God, and being made by an application of the treasure of the Church on the part of a lawful superior."

I. The Catholic Doctrine on Indulgences, as given in the preceding definition, implies several points of Catholic belief which need elucidation.

(a) An indulgence does not remit either the guilt or the eternal punishment of sin, much less are the authorities of the Church wicked and blasphemous enough to give permission to commit sin for the future. The guilt of sin is forgiven chiefly by the sacraments of Baptism and Penance, and even these are of no avail unless the sinner turns to God with sincere and supernatural sorrow and with firm purpose of amendment. An indulgence cannot be obtained for unforgiven sin. Before anyone can obtain for himself the benefit of an indulgence the guilt must have been washed away, and the eternal punishment, if his sin has been mortal, must have been forgiven. Thus, instead of being an encouragement to sin, the desire to obtain an indulgence is a powerful motive to repentance. If the phrase "remission of sin" occurs in the grant of an indulgence, the Church, after the example of Scripture (e.g. 1 Pet. ii. 24), uses the word to denote the remission of punishment. Benedict XIV. ("De Syn. Dioec." xiii. 18, 7) holds that indulgences granted "from punishment and guilt" ("a poena et culpa") are spurious. Others (see Ferraris, art. Indulgentia) understand the form as conveying to the confessor power to absolve sacramentally from reserved cases.

(β) Even when the guilt of sin and the eternal punishment sometimes due to it have been removed by repentance and absolution, a temporal punishment may still remain. Even after Nathan told David his sin was forgiven, it was nevertheless punished by the death of his child. Baptism, it is true, annuls both the guilt and all the penalty due to sin. The absolution accorded in the sacrament of Penance is less efficacious (Concil. Trid. sess. xiv. De Poen. can. 15). St. Paul made the incestuous Corinthian suffer in this world that his soul might be saved. The Church of all ages, in giving sacramental absolution, has imposed penances on the sinner. Usually speaking, the sacramental penance, at least in the present mild discipline of the Church, leaves a debt of temporal punishment, and this debt is cleared by grant of an indulgence. The grant of this indulgence is an act of jurisdiction, not of order, and it is quite distinct from sacramental absolution. Of course, this indulgence cannot free the repentant sinner from temporal punishments involved in the very fact of repentance —e.g. from restoring stolen goods, retracting calumnies, taking the necessary means, however painful, to avoid future falls; or, again, from the natural consequences of sin, such as shame, sickness, and the like. Nor, again, does the Church ever excuse a sinner from all sacramental penance; nay, more, a person most enlightened on the real value of indulgences, and most eager to gain them, is of all others the most likely to afflict himself with voluntary mortifications, recognising in them powerful helps to overcome himself, to obtain that perfect aversion from sin which is required before a plenary indulgence can be gained, and to avoid future falls. Heaven helps those who help themselves. We have seen that indulgences are a powerful incentive to repentance; now we see that they encourage strictness of life and, indeed, all Christian virtue.

(γ) Indulgences are not merely a remission of canonical penances (this error is condemned by the Church, Thes. Lutheri, prop. 19; Synod. Pistoi. prop. 40), but they also avail before the justice of God. Otherwise, as St. Thomas argues ("Suppl." q. 25, a. 1), the indulgence would be a loss and not a gain, and the Church would excuse her children from canonical penances, and abandon them to more grievous sufferings in Purgatory. The error of Luther and the Jansenist Synod of Pistoia on this part of the subject really springs from misconceiving the nature of canonical penance. This will appear more fully when we discuss the history of indulgences. Here it is enough to say that just as in imposing canonical penance the Church acts in the name of God and exercises a power of binding given by Him for the profit of souls, so in remitting it she exercises a power of loosing by the same divine authority. The power of the keys (Mt. xvi. 19, xviii. 18; cf. Jn. xx. 22, 23) enables her not only to forgive sins, but to open the kingdom of heaven. Thus St. Paul (1 Cor. v. 4) imposed penance "with the power of the Lord Jesus" and relaxed it (2 Cor. ii. 10) "in the person of Christ." Penalty so relaxed was no longer due, either here or hereafter, so that the doctrine of indulgences exhibits at once the justice of God and His infinite mercy.

(δ) An indulgence does not only remit, but also satisfies the justice of God for, the temporal punishment of sin. The Church has recourse to the infinite merits of Christ, which suffice to satisfy for all guilt and all penalty, and to the merits of saints who have done penance more than sufficient to pay the temporal punishment due to their own sins. They obtained an abundant reward for their own good deeds, but many of their actions had a penitential character which availed for others if not needed for themselves. Theologians express this characteristic of an indulgence when they say it is solutio as well as absolutio, both payment and remission; or, again, that it is "a juridical absolution," including a payment of the debt from the treasure of the merits of Christ and the saints.

We may end this explanation by quoting the words of the council, which anathematizes those who "assert that they [indulgences] are useless, or deny that the power to grant them exists in the Church."

II. The History of Indulgences confirms the teaching of the present Church, because it shows that the difference between ancient and modern practice is to be explained by change of circumstances, not of principle.

(α) In primitive times many years of heavy penance were exacted for great sins, but these penances were curtailed if the penitent had displayed great contrition (Cyprian, Epp. 15–17 and 33, ed. Hartel, 513, 568), and this indulgence was usually granted when persecution was impending or begun (Cyprian, Ep. 57, 1, ed. Hartel, 648). We read of one case (Euseb. "H.E." v. 32) in which the canonical penance, which had, as a rule, to be performed before absolution, was wholly remitted. The way in which this indulgence was most commonly granted deserves particular notice. A confessor in prison and expecting death for Christ sent a letter of peace ("libellus pacis") to the bishop in favour of some brother who was under penance—e.g. for apostasy—and the bishop, if satisfied of his contrition, restored him to the peace of the Church. Here we have the modern doctrine of indulgence in full operation among the Christians of the third century. We find the belief in the "treasure of merits," for Tertullian ("De Pud." 22, PL, ii. 1027), when he had become a Montanist, reproaches the Catholic Church on this very ground. "You give," he says, "even your martyrs this power. Who permits man to grant the things which must be reserved for God? Who pays for another's death" (i.e. the death due to sin) "save only the Son of God?" The indulgence was given by ecclesiastical authority, as has been already shown. Lastly, it availed before God, and was no mere remission of canonical penance. For Cyprian (Ep. 18, ed. Hartel, p. 523) speaks of those "who have received letters from the martyrs, and can be assisted by this prerogative before God." "He [the Lord] can mercifully pardon him who repents, labours, prays; He can set down to his account whatever the martyrs have asked, and the bishops (sacerdotes) have done for such persons" ("De Laps." 36, ed. Hartel, 263). No modern theologian could put the Church's doctrine better.

(β) From the Seventh Century to the Crusades. As public was gradually replaced by private penance (though canonical penance was still very severe), indulgences were often granted in the form of commutation—i.e. a lesser work was supplemented from the "treasure of merits" and made equivalent to a greater one. Alms to churches, monasteries, or the poor, the pilgrimages—greatly in vogue from the tenth century onwards—to Jerusalem, Rome, and Compostella, were substituted for so many days, years, &c., of canonical penance. This commutation is said to have begun in England and then to have spread south; and we may notice here the origin of the terminology still in use, when indulgences are granted for forty days, seven years, &c. After the eleventh century plenary indulgences, though rare, are met with. Thus Urban II., in the famous assembly at Clermont to promote the Crusades, gave a plenary indulgence to the Crusaders ("iter illud pro omni poenitentia reputetur") by the authority of St. Peter and St. Paul. At the First General Council of Lyons, Innocent IV. gave a plenary indulgence to those who went on the Crusade at their own cost, provided they were contrite for their sins; and an indulgence proportioned to their zeal to those who helped the Crusaders by money or advice.

(γ) Later History of Indulgences.—The period of the Crusades marks a turning-point in the history of indulgences, for they were given more and more freely from that time onwards. In the first place it is to be noted that indulgences were given for wars analogous to the Crusades. For example, at the Council of Siena, in 1425, a plenary indulgence was offered to those who took arms against the Hussites; while wars against the Waldenses, Albigenses, Moors and Turks, were stimulated by the same means. From the eleventh century indulgences were given at the dedication of churches and on the anniversaries of such dedications. Innocent III., in 1215, at the Fourth Lateran Council, limited these spiritual favours to the grant of a year's indulgence at the dedication and one of forty days at the anniversary. The great indulgence of the jubilee was given first in 1300. Urban IV., Martin V., Eugenius IV., granted indulgences to those who assisted at the divine office on Corpus Christi. The canonization of saints was accompanied by grants of indulgence, the first known instance being an indulgence given by Honorius III. at the canonization of Lawrence, Archbishop of Dublin. Since the Dominicans made the use of the rosary, and the Franciscans that of the crucifix, popular in the Church, it became customary to attach indulgences to such objects of devotion, and at last indulgences were so freely given that there is now scarcely a devotion or good work of any kind for which they may not be obtained. This common use of indulgences led theologians to draw out more fully the theory on which the doctrine of indulgences rests, and thus, just at the beginning of the eleventh century, the phrase "treasure of merits" occurs. The attacks of Wyclif, Hus, Luther, and the Jansenists served to develop the teaching of the Church on this head still more perfectly. The Council of Trent, however, energetically prohibited the "disreputable gains" made from those who desired to obtain indulgences ("pravos quaestus pro his consequendis"), "from which a most plentiful cause of abuses had flowed into Christian nations" (sess. xxv. Decret. de Indulg.).

III. Application of Indulgences to the Dead. In the ninth century Pascal I. and John VIII. bestowed such indulgences on the souls of those who had fallen fighting for the Church, and it is evident from the language of St. Thomas ("Suppl." q. 71, a. 10) that such indulgences were common in his day. No doctrinal difficulty will be felt on the matter if the real intention of the Church be apprehended. Sixtus IV., in his Constitution of Nov. 27, 1477, lays down the principle that indulgences of this kind are only given "by way of suffrage." His meaning is that the Church has no direct power over the souls of the departed. She can but humbly entreat God to accept the merits of Christ, and, having respect to them, mercifully to remit the whole or a portion of the pains due to the souls suffering in Purgatory. The Church has reprobated the error of those who maintained that indulgences could not profit the dead (Prop. Lutheri, Prop. 22; Synod. Pistoi. Prop. 42).

IV. Indulgences may be given by the Pope throughout the Church; by primates, metropolitans, and bishops within the limits of their jurisdiction. By bishop must be understood a bishop actually ruling a diocese; bishops in partibus, and even coadjutors with the right of succession, have no such power; nor again have vicars general or capitular, abbots, generals of orders, &c., &c. The power, however, may be delegated to any cleric. Moreover, the Fourth Lateran Council, can. 62, confined the bishop's power in the matter to an indulgence of a year at the dedication of a church, and of forty days on other occasions. Nor can a bishop add another forty days for an indulgence already given for the same good work by his predecessor (see the decree of Clement IX., Nov. 20, 1668). Archbishops may give the same indulgences as bishops, not only in their own dioceses, but also in those of their suffragans, and this even if they are not engaged in visitation (cap. "Nostro; De Poen. et Rem.," v. 38). Cardinals, even if not bishops, may give an indulgence of 100 days in their titular churches; the Great Penitentiary exercises the same power; while legates and nuncios may give an indulgence of 100 days and more (not, however, of a year) within the territories committed to their care, and may also grant an indulgence of seven years and seven periods of forty days to those who visit a particular church or chapel, provided they worthily confess and communicate and pray according to the intention of the Pope. By a rescript of 1903, enlarging their powers, bishops can now grant indulgences of fifty days, archbishops of one hundred days, and Cardinals of two hundred days. All persons who grant indulgences are bound to do so only for reasonable causes, and to take care that there is some proportion between the work done, or at least between the object in view, and the grace accorded. Thus the Council of Constance orders persons suspected of heresy to be asked "if they believe the Roman bishops can grant indulgences for reasonable causes."

V. The conditions on which indulgences may be obtained are that the person desirous of gaining them be a member of the Church; that he should perform the good work exactly as prescribed; and that he should be, at least before concluding the work prescribed, in a state of grace. Whether this last condition is necessary to obtain indulgences for the dead is uncertain; it can hardly be so in the case of indulgences applicable only to the dead—e.g. in the case of a Requiem Mass at a privileged altar. In order to gain the whole of a plenary indulgence, it is further necessary to detest and have the purpose, at least implicitly, of avoiding so far as possible even the last venial sin. If an indulgence is granted for a particular day, the day is reckoned from midnight to midnight, unless the day be a feast with a vigil, for then the time for gaining the indulgence extends from first to second vespers. For plenary indulgences, it is usual to prescribe confession, communion, and prayer for the Pope's intention. Those who are accustomed to confess every eight days may, without further confession, gain all indulgences which are offered during the week. But by a concession of Pius X. those who, living in a state of grace, are in the habit of receiving Holy Communion daily are dispensed from the obligation of going to Confession, so far as their doing so would otherwise be a requisite for gaining a plenary indulgence. Communion may be made the day before the feast on which the indulgence is given.

VI. Divisions of Indulgences.—Plenary remit all, partial a portion, of the temporal punishment due to sin—e.g. an indulgence of forty days, as much as would have been atoned for by forty days of canonical penance. "Indulgentiae pleniores" convey to the confessor faculties to absolve from reserved cases: "plenissimae" further faculties to commute vows. Indulgences may be temporal—i.e. granted only for a time; or again perpetual or indefinite, which last till revoked. Even indulgences granted by delegated power continue in force after the death of the cleric who bestows them. If a feast on which an indulgence is given is transferred, the indulgence remains attached to the original day, unless the celebration in foro—i.e. the abstinence from servile work, &c.—is transferred also. Personal indulgences are those granted to particular persons—e.g. to an order, confraternity. Local indulgences may be gained only in a particular place. Supposing a church is pulled down to be re-erected under the same title, or if it is replaced under competent authority by a church with the same title in another place, the indulgences may be gained in the new building. But a church which possessed indulgences as the church of a religious order, forfeits them if it passes into the hands of seculars; however, French churches which belonged to Franciscans before 1789 and are now Franciscan no longer, still have the indulgence of Portiuncula. Real indulgences are those attached to crucifixes, medals, &c. It is only the original owner of these objects (i.e. the first owner after the indulgence was attached) who can gain the indulgences, and the indulgence is lost if the object is sold or given away. A person, however, may get objects indulgenced with a view of distributing them to others. In that case the indulgences remain good, even if they pass through the hands of any number of persons, provided that they have not been appropriated to use by the intermediate persons. The owner must have the object with him, though not necessarily in his hands, unless this condition is expressed in the grant.

Among the most famous of plenary indulgences are that of the jubilee already mentioned; the indulgence given by priests (who receive power from the Pope to confer it) to the dying; the indulgence given with the Papal blessing [see the article BLESSING]. The most celebrated local indulgences are gained by visiting the seven chief churches and privileged altars at Rome; by pilgrimages to the holy places in Palestine; or visiting the stations mentioned in the Missal. The Popes (especially Clement XII., in 1731) gave all the indulgences to be gained at the holy places to those who make devoutly the Way of the Cross at the "Stations" erected by Franciscans. Faculties similar to those of the Franciscans are now granted to others. An account of other indulgences, such as that of the Portiuncula and the Sabbatine indulgence, will be found under special articles. Indulgences without number have been given to confraternities, persons who wear scapulars, medals, &c. Large and often plenary indulgences are attached to the recitation of short prayers (though usually confession and communion are required, if the indulgence is plenary), and to the use of blessed crosses, medals, &c. Sixtus V., at the close of the sixteenth century, introduced the custom of blessing objects, and so attaching indulgences to them. A priest with the necessary faculties has only to make a sign of the cross over the rosary, medal, &c., by which sign of the cross he communicates, according to a concession of 1914, all the indulgences it is in his power to grant. Other acts of piety—e.g. examination of conscience, hearing sermons, visiting the Blessed Sacrament, reading the Scriptures—are also largely indulgenced.

VII. Indulgences which have been abrogated or declared apocryphal.—(a) According to a supposed decree of September 18, 1669, and Benedict XIV. ("De Syn." xiii. 18, 8), no partial indulgence of 1000 years or upwards is authentic. But the decree cannot be found in the Archives of the Congregation of Indulgences, and its existence is disputed. (β) The Council of Trent (sess. xx. cap. 9) lays down the principle that indulgences must be given everywhere gratis, and the bull "Etsi dominici" of Pius V., issued in 1567, annuls the indulgences of the quaestors and collectors of alms. (γ) Clement VIII. and other Popes have abrogated indulgences said to be given in the form of a jubilee, as also (δ) the indulgences given to rosaries, images, &c., before the rescript of Clement VIII. "De forma indulgentiae" (anno 1597). (ε) All indulgences given before the Constitution of Clement VIII. "Quaecunque" (March 7, 1604), "Romanus Pontifex" (May 13, 1606), and before the Constitution of Paul V. (November 23, 1610), to orders, confraternities, colleges, or chapters, are revoked unless these indulgences have been renewed. (ζ) The indulgences said to have been given by Alexander VI. to the Bridgettine rosary are apocryphal, though to this devotion many authentic indulgences are attached; so are those which Urban VIII. is said to have given to the crosses of St. Turibius, and Pius V. to the crosses of Caravaca in Spain. A long list of apocryphal indulgences is given in the decree of Innocent XI. "Delatae saepius" (March 7, 1678).

(The chief authorities on the subject are the decree of the S. Cong. of Indulgences, Aug. 10, 1899; Bellarmine, "De Indulg. et Jubilaeo libri duo"; Amort, "De Orig., Progressu, Valore ac Fructu Indulg.," Aug. Vind. 1735; Theodorus a Spir. S. Enc." and Galtier in DAp; Lea (Protestant), "A History of Auricular Confession and Indulgences," has been answered by Baumgarten, "Lea's Historical Writings," and by Boudinhon.)

INDULT (indultum, something granted by favour). A licence or permission granted by the Pope, whether to a corporation or to an individual, authorizing something to be done which the common law of the Church does not sanction. A familiar instance is that of the Lenten indults, by which the Pope authorizes the bishops, according to the circumstances of different countries, to dispense more or less with the rigour of the canons as to the Lenten fast. In former times indults chiefly related to the patronage of church dignities and benefices. (Taunton.)

INFALLIBILITY. [See CHURCH OF CHRIST and POPE.]

INFIDEL. One who is not among the fideles, the faithful of Christ. Popularly, the term is applied to all who reject Christianity as a divine revelation. In order to reject it, they must have heard of it; those, therefore, who have never heard of Christianity are not in popular language called infidels, but heathens, though they are included under the theological term "infideles." Nor are heretics, perhaps not even Unitarians, to be called infidels, for they do accept the religion of Christ as divinely revealed, however erroneous or fantastic their notions as to the nature of the revelation may be.

INFRALAPSARIANS (infra lapsum, after the Fall). In the article CALVIN AND CALVINISM, we have already shown that, according to that heresy, God ordains some to everlasting punishment. To mitigate the awful rigour of this doctrine, certain of Calvin's followers taught that this reprobation was the consequence of the fall of all mankind in Adam. Calvin's own teaching is clearly supralapsarian, i.e. God's decree of reprobation is precedent to, and entirely independent of, Adam's fall, which indeed is the consequence of the divine decree. [See ORIGINAL SIN; PREDESTINATION.]

INITIATION, CHRISTIAN. [See BAPTISM.]

INNOCENTS, HOLY, FEAST OF, is celebrated in the Latin Church on December 28, in the Greek on December 29. Among the Greeks the feast is known as that of the "14,000 holy children" (τῶν ἁγίων ιδ' χιλιάδων νηπίων).

From the earliest times the Church has regarded the children whom Herod slew, in his desire to make sure of killing Christ, as martyrs. Irenaeus (iii. 16, 4, PG, vii. 924) asserts this clearly, and so does St. Augustine ("De Symbolo ad Catech." iii. 4; PL, xl. 655). But it is uncertain when this feast began to be kept. A homily, attributed to Origen, in which this feast is mentioned is certainly spurious, and although in an ancient catalogue of St. Augustine's discourses we find two "tractatus" "De Octavis Infantium," Thomassin ("Traité des Festes," p. 275) explains this as referring to Low Sunday, the octave of Easter Sunday, on the vigil of which children were in those times commonly baptized. However, a separate festival of the Holy Innocents is mentioned in the "Calendar of Carthage," the date of which may be approximately fixed from the fact that the latest martyrs whose names it gives died in 484. In the rule of Chrodegang (d. 766) the feast is placed among the "chief solemnities." The Mass is said in purple vestments, probably because the Innocents did not enter heaven immediately after their martyrdom. They had to wait till Christ at His Ascension opened it to "those who believe." On the Octave, Mass is celebrated in red, the usual colour of martyrs.

St. Thomas (2^a 2^{ae}, q. 124, a. 1) mentions the opinion of some who thought that the use of reason was accelerated in the case of the Innocents, so that they were able consciously to embrace death for Christ. But he himself dismisses the opinion as without warrant in Scripture. "The shedding of blood," he says, "for Christ takes the place of baptism. Whence, as in children, the merit of Christ operates through the grace of baptism, and obtains glory for them, so in those slain for Christ the martyrdom of Christ operates and obtains for them the palm of martyrdom."

In the Middle Ages it was usual for children to keep a time of festivity in honour of the Holy Innocents, which lasted, according to Durandus, from St. Stephen's Day to the Octave of the Epiphany. Boys used to sit in the canons' stalls; one of them, who was vested in episcopal robes, gave his blessing pontifically. The Council of Basle (sess. xxii.) condemned the extravagances of this celebration, which was accompanied by the celebration of the Feast of Fools. But the feast of children is still innocently observed in some monasteries and convents, and Thomassin surely errs by excess of rigour when he speaks of it as impious.

IN PARTIBUS INFIDELIUM. [See BISHOP IN PARTIBUS INFIDELIUM.]

IN PETTO. (Ital. for in pectore, in the breast, in the heart.) At times the Pope declares that in addition to those whom he has publicly made cardinals, he has made one or more others whose names he reserves in petto. When these are subsequently made known, they take rank from the date of their original nomination. Boudinhon states that in 1875 Pius IX. endeavoured to make "posthumous" cardinals by appointing and reserving them in petto, and publishing them by a letter to be opened after his death. But the canonists threw such doubt on the validity of this action that the Pope published the names at the next consistory. [See CARDINAL.]

INQUISITION (HOLY OFFICE). In no age of Christianity has the Church had any doubt that in her hands, and only in hers, was the deposit of the true faith and religion placed by Jesus Christ, and that, as it is her duty to teach this to all nations, so she is bound by all practicable and lawful means to restrain those who would corrupt the message or resist the teacher. Some have maintained that no means of coercion are lawful for her to use but those which are used in the internal forum [FORUM ECCLESIASTICUM] and derive their sanction from anticipated suffering in the next world. The power of the Church, according to Fleury,[1] is "purely spiritual," and he held with Marsilius that the Pope could employ no coactive punishment of any kind unless the emperor—i.e. the civil power—gave him leave. From such a view it logically follows that St. Paul ought to have asked the permission of Sergius Paulus before striking Elymas the sorcerer with blindness. The overwhelming majority of the canonists take the opposite view—namely, that the Church can and ought to visit with fitting punishment the heretic and the revolter; and since the publication of the numerous encyclical letters and allocutions of Pope Leo XIII. treating of the relations between Church and State, and the inherent rights of the former, the view of Fleury can no longer be held by any Catholic.

[1] Fleury, Dernier Discours, ch. 14.

For many ages after the conversion of Constantine it was easier for the Church to repress heresy by invoking the secular arm than by organizing tribunals of her own for the purpose. Reference to ecclesiastical history and the codes of Justinian and Theodosius shows that the emperors generally held as decided views on the pestilent nature of heresy, and the necessity of extirpating it in the germ before it reached maturity, as the Popes themselves. They were willing to repress it; they took from the Church the definition of what it was; and they had old-established tribunals armed with all the terror of the law. The bishops, as a rule, had but to notify the appearance of heretics to the lay power, and the latter hastened to make inquiry, and, if necessary, to repress and punish. But in the thirteenth century a new race of temporal rulers rose to power. The emperor Frederick II. perhaps had no Christian faith at all; John of England meditated, sooner than yield to the Pope, openly to apostatize to Islam; and Philip Augustus was refractory towards the Church in various ways. The Church was as clear as ever upon the necessity of repressing heretics, but the weapon—secular sovereignty—which she had hitherto employed for the purpose seemed to be breaking in her hands. The time was come when she was to forge a weapon of her own; to establish a tribunal the incorruptness and fidelity of which she could trust; which in the task of detecting and punishing those who misled their brethren should employ all the minor forms of penal repression, while still remitting to the secular arm the case of obstinate and incorrigible offenders. Thus arose the Inquisition. St. Dominic is wrongly said by some to have first proposed the erection of such a tribunal to Innocent III., and to have been appointed by him the first inquisitor.[1] Other writers trace the origin of the tribunal to a synod held at Toulouse by Gregory IX. in 1229, after the Albigensian crusade, which ordered that in every parish a priest and several respectable laymen should be appointed to search out heretics and bring them before the bishops.[2] The task of dealing with the culprits was difficult and invidious, and the bishops ere long made over their responsibility in the matter to the Dominican order. Gregory IX. appointed none but Dominican inquisitors; Innocent IV. nominated Franciscans also, and Clement VII. sent as inquisitor into Portugal a friar of the order of Minims. But the majority of the inquisitors employed have always been Dominicans, and the commissary of the Holy Office at Rome belongs ex officio to this order.

The Congregation of Cardinals of the Holy Inquisition was first erected by Paul III. (1542), and remodelled by Sixtus V. about forty years later. "It is composed of twelve cardinals; of a commissary . . . who discharges the functions of a judge ordinary; of a counsellor or assessor, who is one of the presidents of the Curia; of consultors, selected by the Pope himself from among the most learned theologians and canonists; qualificators, who give their opinions on questions submitted to them; an advocate charged with the defence of persons accused, and other subordinate officials. The principal sittings of the congregation are held under the immediate presidency of the Pope." This supreme court of inquisition proceeds against any who are delated to it, and in former times used to hear appeals from the sentences of similar courts elsewhere, and to depute inquisitors to proceed to any place where they might appear to be needed. The duties and powers of inquisitors are minutely laid down in the canon law, it being always assumed that the civil power will favour, or can be compelled to favour, their proceedings. Thus it is laid down that they "have power to constrain all magistrates, even secular magistrates, to cause the statutes against heretics to be observed," and to require them to swear to do so; also that they can "compel all magistrates and judges to execute their sentences, and these must obey on pain of excommunication"; also that inquisitors in causes of heresy "can use the secular arm," and that "all temporal rulers are bound to obey inquisitors in causes of faith."[1] No such state of things as that here assumed now exists in any part of Europe; nowhere does the State assist the Church in putting down heresy; it is therefore superfluous to describe regulations controlling a jurisdiction which has lost the medium in which it could work and live.

The canon law also assumes that all bishops, being themselves inquisitors ex vi termini into the purity of the faith in their respective dioceses, will co-operate with the official inquisitors. Each may inquire separately, but the sentence ought to proceed from both; if they disagree, reference must be made to Rome. The proceedings taken against the Lollard followers of Wyclif by Archbishops Arundel and Chichele between 1382 and 1428,[2] illustrate both the points noticed above: 1, that the civil power in pre-Reformation times was wont to give vigorous aid to the bishops themselves in extirpating heresy; 2, that the bishops themselves could and did exercise stringent inquisitorial powers apart from the appointment of special inquisitors.

It does not appear that Papal inquisitors were ever commissioned, eo nomine, in England. In France the Inquisition was established in pursuance of the decrees of the synod of Toulouse (1229) already referred to. Its tribunals were converted into State courts by Philip the Fair, who made use of them to condemn and ruin the Templars. In this condition they remained till the Reformation. In 1538 the Grand Inquisitor, Louis de Rochette, was convicted of Calvinism and burnt; soon afterwards the powers of these courts were transferred to the parliaments, and finally to the bishops (1560). In Germany, Conrad of Marburg, a man of a harsh and inflexible temper, the confessor of St. Elizabeth, attempted to establish an inquisition in the thirteenth century: he was assassinated, and the tribunal never gained footing in the country. On the Spanish Inquisition, see the next article. (See Guiraud, in DAp, an admirable article with copious bibliography; Vacandard, "L'Inquisition"; Douais, "L'Inquisition: ses Origines, sa Procédure"; Lea, "History of the Inquisition in the Middle Ages"—a bitter Protestant account, answered by Baumgarten, "Lea's Historical Works," Eng. tr.)

INQUISITION, SPANISH, THE. It was founded by Ferdinand and Isabella at Seville in 1481, the first judges of the tribunal being two Dominicans. The clergy and many of the laity of the Castilian kingdom had for some time pressed the adoption of some such measure in order to check the profanations and frauds which the sham conversion to Christianity of a large number of Jews and Moors had occasioned. Even the episcopal thrones of Spain are said to have been not always preserved from the intrusion of these audacious hypocrites. Torquemada, another Dominican, appointed in 1483, was Grand Inquisitor for fifteen years. Under him three new tribunals of the Holy Office were erected, at Cordova, Jaen, and Villa Real; afterwards a fifth was added at Toledo. These tribunals were always popular with the lower orders and the clergy in Spain, but terrible in the eyes of the nobles and the rich middle class, who believed that they were often used by the government as engines of political repression in order to diminish their influence. Ranke calls the Spanish Inquisition "a royal tribunal, furnished with spiritual weapons." In 1492 an edict was issued for the banishment from Spain of all Jews refusing to embrace Christianity, chiefly on account of their alleged incorrigible obstinacy in persisting in the attempt to convert Christians to their own faith and instruct them in their rites.[1] About a hundred thousand went into banishment, and an equal or greater number are supposed to have remained in Spain, where their merely nominal Christianity and secret addiction to their ancestral doctrines and usages gave employment to the Inquisition for centuries.

The history of the Spanish Inquisition was written by Llorente, who was secretary to the tribunal of Madrid from 1790 to 1792. Hence he has been supposed to have possessed great opportunities for obtaining exact information; and his statement, that during its existence of 330 years the Spanish Inquisition condemned 30,000 persons to death, has been quoted with credulous horror in every corner of the civilized world. Hefele, bishop of Rottenburg, has examined with great care and ability[1] the worth of the above statement, and the question of the credit due to Llorente. First, there is the general fact of the greater relative severity of penal justice in all countries alike, till within quite recent times. The Carolina, or penal code in force under Charles V., condemned coiners to the flames, and burglars to the gallows. Burying alive and other barbarous punishments were sanctioned by it, none of which were allowed by the Inquisition. In England, in the sixteenth century, persons refusing to plead could be, and were, pressed to death. The last witch burnt in Europe was sentenced in the canton Glarus by a Protestant tribunal as late as 1785. Secondly, Llorente omits to draw attention to the fact that the Spanish kings obliged the Inquisition to try and sentence persons charged with many other crimes besides heresy—e.g. with polygamy, seduction, unnatural crime, smuggling, witchcraft, sorcery, imposture, personation, &c. A large proportion of criminals of this kind would, down to the last century, have been sentenced to death on conviction in any secular tribunal in Europe. Thirdly, Llorente does not pretend to base the above statement as to the number executed by the Inquisition on written documents, but on calculations of his own making, in some of which he can be proved to be inexpert and inexact. Fourthly, Hefele gives a list of palpable misstatements and exaggerations which he has detected in Llorente's volumes. Fifthly, the man's career, when closely examined, does not invite confidence. At the end of the last century he was a liberal ecclesiastic, imbued with French ideas and on intimate terms with Freemasons. In 1806, at the instigation of Godoy, he wrote a book against the fueros, or ancient privileges, of the Basque provinces. He accepted employment from the usurping government of Joseph Bonaparte. Banished from Spain on the fall of Joseph, he escaped to Paris, and published his "History of the Inquisition" in 1814. He next translated the abominable novel "Faublas" into Spanish; and, being exiled from France in 1822, died at Madrid the next year.

"The celebrated Autos-da-Fé (i.e. Acts of the confession of the faith)," says Möhler,[2] "were as a rule bloodless. But few inquisitorial processes terminated with the death of the accused." The auto, speaking generally, was a form of reconciling culprits to the Church. Nevertheless, the severities practised by the tribunals were such that Rome frequently interfered. The Spanish Inquisition was abolished by the Revolution in 1820. The foundation of the Spanish Inquisition is admirably told by Pastor ("Hist. of the Popes," Eng. tr., vol. iv. p. 98 sqq.). He maintains that it was "a mixed, but primarily ecclesiastical, institution. The fact that the condemned were handed over to the secular arm testifies to the correctness of this view. Had the Spanish Inquisition been a state institution, a royal court of justice, there would have been no necessity for this" (p. 403). A good bibliography will be found in the note on this page. See also Newman, "Present Position of Catholics in England," p. 210 sqq.

INSPIRATION OF SCRIPTURE. The word "inspiration," like many other theological terms, comes to us from the Latin version of the Bible. Thus St. Paul's words, 2 Tim. iii. 16, πᾶσα γραφὴ θεόπνευστος, "Every Scripture breathed by God," is rendered "omnis Scriptura divinitus inspirata," and again when St. Peter, 2 Ep. i. 21, speaks of the prophets as ὑπὸ πνεύματος ἁγίου φερόμενοι, "moved by the Holy Ghost," the Latin has "Spiritu sancto inspirati." Just as God is said in Genesis ii. 7, and Wisdom xv. 11, to have breathed man's soul into his body; just as in Job xxxii. 8, the "inspiration of the Almighty" ("inspiratio omnipotentis") is said to "give understanding," so the sacred writers are described as inspired because God breathed into them or, to drop the metaphor, suggested the thoughts which they wrote down. Inspiration, therefore, may be defined as a supernatural impulse by which God directed the authors of the canonical books to write down certain matter predetermined by Him. Inspiration is a grace gratis data—i.e. it was bestowed upon the writers for the edification of others, and, like all graces, it is specially attributed to God the Holy Ghost.

To a certain extent the Old Testament claims to be inspired. Thus the prophets constantly represent their own words as being in reality the oracles of God. Our Lord and His Apostles confirm this claim. Christ, for example, in Mt. xxii. 43, declares that David spoke "in the Spirit," while St. Peter, Acts i. 16, and St. Paul, Acts xxviii. 25, use similar language. Ecclesiastical writers, from the time when the New Testament canon was first recognized in the Church, speak in just the same way of the books which went to make it up. St. Irenaeus regards ("Adv. Haer." iii. 14, 2) the influence of the Holy Ghost as extending to the least word in the gospels, for he maintains that the divine Spirit directed St. Matthew in i. 18 to write the "generation of Christ" instead of the "generation of Jesus." "The divine Scriptures," "the divine oracles," "the Scriptures of God," "the Scriptures of the Lord," are the usual phrases by which the Fathers express their belief in inspiration. The actual term apparently is of rare occurrence in the early ages. However, in the Acts of the Martyr Speratus (Acta SS. Jul. 17, p. 214) we are told that when the proconsul asked him what the books were which Christians "read with adoration" (quos adoratis legentes), the saint replied that they were the four Gospels, St. Paul's Epistles, "and all the divinely inspired teaching" (omnem divinitus inspiratam doctrinam). In the "Symbol of Faith" which was approved by Leo IX., and which is still used in the consecration of bishops as a test of orthodox belief, God is affirmed to be the "one author" of the Old and New Testaments. The same words (unus auctor) are repeated in the definitions of Florence (Bull "Cantate Domino"), and of Trent (sess. iv. Decret. de Can. Scr.). On the other hand, the Vatican Council (sess. iii. cap. 2) comes nearer to the actual word "inspiration," for it defines that the Bible was written "Spiritu sancto inspirante."

Moreover, the Vatican Council made the idea of inspiration more precise, and settled a question once debated among Catholics. The great Jesuit theologian Lessius, a man who has many titles to respect, was charged with maintaining that a book might justly claim to be inspired, although it had been written by mere human industry, provided the Holy Ghost had afterwards declared by the mouth of the Church that the book in question was free from error. His enemies said he looked upon the second book of Machabees as a possible instance of such a book, and Bonfrère in his "Praeloquia" maintained that such a case was at least possible. The view was condemned by the chief theological faculties of the day, and surely with good reason; for how can we call a book inspired if the Holy Ghost had no special connection with its origin and merely approved it when already written? This theory is now distinctly proscribed. The Church, according to the Vatican Council (loc. cit.), does not count books canonical because they were written naturally and afterwards approved by her, or because they contain revelation without error, but because they were inspired in the first instance and have God for their Author and as such were committed to the Church.

The common teaching of theologians helps us to understand the definitions which have just been given. They distinguish first of all between inspiration and the mere "assistentia" or assistance of the Holy Ghost, the latter conveying a merely negative, the former a positive idea. General councils have the "assistentia" of the Holy Ghost because He protects them from error in their decrees, although the Pope, in convoking the council and proposing to it the subjects, may have been guided only by the ordinary motives of faith and reason. Inspiration implies, over and above this protection, a special impulse of the Holy Ghost to write, and to write on particular subjects. Next, a clear line must be drawn between revelation and inspiration. God reveals to the soul truths which it did not know before, without necessarily prompting the recipient to commit the revelation to writing; an inspired author has received the impulse to write, and is directed from above in his work, but it is not necessary that any new truths should be communicated to him. There is no reason to suppose that the author of the book, e.g., of Esther, received any revelation.

In an inspired book there are evidently two factors—the natural powers of the writer on one side, and the impulse and direction of the Holy Ghost on the other. The Church has not decided where the one factor ceases and the other begins to operate. In our own time Schegg, a priest and commentator of high repute among German Catholics, maintained the existence of trifling error in Scripture. Thus, in his commentary on the Gospels, vol. iii. p. 552 seq., he discusses the famous difficulty in Mt. xxiii. 35, "Zacharias, the son of Barachias," and explains it on the supposition that Jesus mentioned Zacharias merely, while the Evangelist, in adding the father's name, made a mistake from defect of memory. Cardinal Newman was of opinion that "obiter dicta" in Scripture were not inspired ("Nineteenth Century," Feb. 1884). In Jan. 1893, Mgr. d'Hulst drew attention to two schools of apologists: "those who consider as true history, infallible by reason of its being inspired, every narrative not manifestly a parable; and those who, after having first put aside all that is dogmatic and moral, consider that a sifting process (triage) may be made of the remainder according to the methods of historical criticism." This latter "broad" (large) school would restrict inspiration to matters of faith and morals, and would admit the possibility of error in the uninspired portions. In the Encyclical "Providentissimus Deus" (Nov. 18, 1893), Leo XIII. condemned both of these latter positions; he declared that it "would never be lawful to restrict inspiration to certain parts of the Holy Scriptures, or to admit that the sacred writer himself could have made a mistake. Nor may the opinion of those be tolerated who, in order to get out of difficulties, do not hesitate to suppose that divine inspiration extends only to what touches faith and morals, on the false plea that the true meaning is to be sought for less in what God has said than in the motive for which He has said it." On the other hand, the sacred writer must adapt himself to the circumstances of those whom he is addressing. As St. Jerome says: "Many things are related in the Scriptures according to the opinion of the day in which the facts occurred, and not according to what in reality took place (et non juxta quod rei veritas continebat)." ("In Jerem. Proph." xxviii., PL, xxiv. 855). And St. Thomas (1^a, q. 70, a. 1) tells us that Moses, talking down to the rude intelligence of the people, "went by appearances" (Moyses, rudi populo condescendens, sequutus est quae sensibiliter apparent). Further "we have to consider that the sacred writers, or more accurately, the Holy Ghost Who spake by them, did not intend to teach men those things (i.e. the essential nature of the things of the visible universe)—things in no way profitable to salvation" (Leo XIII., ib., quoting St. Augustine, "De Genesi ad Lit." ii. 9, 10, PL, xxxiv, 270). Others (and this opinion, which seems to find some support in the Fathers, found wide acceptance among the older Protestant theologians) have believed in what is known as "verbal inspiration"; they have argued as if the authors of the Biblical books were no more than scribes who wrote down the words which the Holy Ghost had dictated. But this view certainly sins against the most patent facts.[1] Evidently, the style and method of the sacred writers are coloured throughout by their own individuality, and the differences in thought and language between Isaiah and Ezechiel are utterly inexplicable if we regard them as passive agents under a mechanical inspiration. St. Augustine in well-known words formulizes the prevailing belief of the Church, without falling into the exaggerations of the theory that inspiration is mechanical. "To those books," he says, "which are already styled canonical, I have learned to pay such reverence and honour as most firmly to believe that none of their authors has committed any error in writing. If in that literature I meet with anything which seems contrary to truth, I will have no doubt that it is only the manuscript which is faulty, or the translator who has not hit the sense, or my own failure to understand" (Ep. 82, PL, xxxiii. 277). (From Kaulen, "Einleitung in die heilige Schrift.," part I., pp. 12 sqq., The nature of Inspiration has been keenly discussed, especially since the Vatican Council, and there is a vast literature on the subject. We can mention only a few works: St. Thomas, 2^a 2^{ae}, qq. 71–74; Franzelin, "De Divina Trad. et Script." 321–405; Vacant, "Etudes Théologiques sur les Constitutions du Concile du Vatican," i. 458 sqq.; Billot, "De Inspiratione S. Scripturae"; Lagrange, "Historical Criticism and the O.T." (Eng. tr.), p. 83 sqq.; Durand in "Cath. Enc." and in DAp.)

[1] Kleutgen cites some of the greatest theologians of the Church against the theory that the Holy Spirit dictated the material words to the sacred author. Thus he quotes Suarez, De Fide, disp. 5, § 3, n. 3, 5, who maintains it is enough to believe that the Holy Spirit "specially assisted him (the author of the inspired book, while writing) and kept him from all error and falsehood, and from all words which were not expedient." To the same effect Bellarmine, De Verbo Dei, lib. v. 15; Melchior Canus, De Loc. Theolog. lib. ii. 17 et 18.

INSTALLATION (Low Lat. stallum, a stall). The actual visible establishment (institutio corporalis) in the possession of an ecclesiastical dignity or benefice. In early times money often passed on such occasions; in one of the Novels, Justinian forbids that any payment should be made on installation to the clergy of any church excepting only the great church at Constantinople. In another place he says that the custom, though intrinsically a bad one, is too firmly rooted to be destroyed; he therefore decrees that twenty pounds of gold may be paid on installation by the patriarch of any one of the five sees—Rome, Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem—if the custom is to that effect, but no more. The sum to be paid by a metropolitan or a bishop he limits to 100 shillings for enthronisation, and 300 shillings given to notaries and other officials. In spite of his apparent zeal for purity of election, Justinian was the first emperor who exacted payment for confirming the election of the Roman pontiffs; this abuse was not removed till the time of Constantine Pogonatus.

Installation, in the case of a bishop, is called enthronization; it is the solemn entry into possession of his cathedral and episcopal residence on the part of the newly consecrated bishop, who wears all his pontifical insignia on the occasion. When a bishop is consecrated in his own church, the enthronization becomes identified with the consecration; but when the latter rite has been performed in another diocese, then, according to the ancient tradition, the bishop, dressed in the garb of a pilgrim, with his crozier in his hand, and the pastoral hat on his head, is received on arriving at the boundary of his diocese by the chapter and clergy of the cathedral city and district; by them he is escorted to some neighbouring church, where, after a short prayer, he is presented with the episcopal ornaments and insignia, and then conducted in solemn procession to the sound of bells into his cathedral, where he is welcomed with the anthem Ecce sacerdos magnus and the Te Deum, while he takes his seat on his throne, from the raised dais of which he imparts to the assembled throng his episcopal benediction. After this he is escorted to his palace, the cross being borne before him.

The installation of a canon is his solemn reception into a cathedral or collegiate chapter. In presence of the dignitaries and canons seated in the chapter-house the new titular, after being chorally vested, makes his profession of faith and takes the capitular oath. He is then admitted to his seat in chapter, and afterwards conducted into the church, and installed in his proper stall in the choir.

In the case of a simple parish priest the installation is usually effected by a delegate from the bishop, who admits the new incumbent both to the spiritual and temporal rights of his benefice. In some countries a commissary attends on the part of the civil government, and admits him with certain formalities into the possession of his temporals. (Thomassin, iii. 1, 56; Taunton, Institution.)

INSTITUTE OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN MARY. ("Dames Anglaises," "English Ladies," or "English Virgins.") The foundress, Mary Ward, the eldest daughter of Marmaduke Ward, of Givendale, near Ripon, a gentleman of good estate and ancient lineage, was born in 1585. Her parents were steadfast Catholics, and dedicated the child to the Blessed Virgin from her cradle. She was very beautiful, and projects were formed with a view to her marriage, but she resisted all solicitations, and left England and her father's house in 1606, and passed over to St. Omer. At first she entered the convent of Colettines, at St. Omer, as a lay sister. In May or June 1607, with the advice of the novice-mistress, and after having experienced, while in prayer on St. Gregory's Day, a strong inward impulse, prompting her to found a convent of the order for English women exclusively, Mary quitted the Colettine convent. With the help of her confessor, Father Roger Lee, and the good bishop Blaise, of St. Omer, she obtained access to the Archduke Albert and his wife Isabella, and obtained from them the grant of a vacant piece of ground at Gravelines, and permission to build a house of English Poor Clares upon it. Many English ladies (for the persecution at home at that time caused numbers of Englishwomen to seek freedom and security in Catholic countries) joined her, and the new community was begun at Christmas 1607, in a large hired house at St. Omer, pending the erection of a convent at Gravelines. Being, however, more and more convinced that she was called to another way, she left the Poor Clares in the spring of 1609, having first made a vow of perpetual chastity before her confessor, and also one of obedience to his directions. Her conduct drew upon her censure from many quarters, and she was for a long time in great perplexity, but her confidence in God never wavered. Gradually the conception of a teaching order, recruited from the ranks of her Catholic countrywomen, not cloistered, nor under obedience to any other order, but living under the rule of the Society of Jesus, and bound by terminable, not perpetual, vows, took form within her mind. She returned to England and founded the first community of the "English Virgins" at Spitalfields in 1611. A year or two later she returned to St. Omer, and there also succeeded in establishing a community. Before his death in 1616, Father Lee had come round to her views and laboured effectually to procure the confirmation of her institute from Rome. A letter addressed to her by order of the Archduke in May 1613 sets forth the precise nature of her work. He says he has heard with pleasure that she and her companions are established at St. Omer, "where you receive and teach a number of young girls of your nation, in order that, after they have been well instructed in all that belongs to our holy faith, Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman, and carefully trained to virtue, they may be sent back to their parents, to be married and bring up their children in the fear of God, unless they prefer to stay in our countries and become religious." In 1616 a letter came from Rome signed by Cardinal Lancelotti, the president of the Sacred Congregation of the Council, recommending the new community to the care of Bishop Blaise, and speaking of the probability of a formal confirmation at a future day. In the years between 1613 and 1627 Mary paid several visits to England, during one of which she was arrested and imprisoned by order of Archbishop Abbott, who said that "she did more harm than six Jesuits." Details are wanting; we are only told that "sentence of death was passed upon her for religion, but that there was no execution, for fear of odium." In 1617 she opened a second house at Liège; and about the same time the Bishop of St. Omer wrote to Mary a "public letter of approval of the Institute, by which he constituted its members as religious." Pope Gregory XV. (1621–3) gave her permission to found houses of her Institute at Rome and in other Italian cities. In 1627 she established a house at Munich. Charges being brought against the purity of her faith, Urban VIII. ordered, in 1630, that she should be examined, and that her houses should be (provisionally) closed. Through the intercession of the good Maximilian, elector of Bavaria, the nuns were still allowed to continue the common life, under certain restrictions. The result of the examination was favourable to her, and Mary succeeded in obtaining a decision from Rome that the bull of 1630 closing her houses should be regarded as tacitly abolished; but it was only in 1703, many years after her death (which happened in 1645), that the Institute was again formally confirmed by Clement XI. Since that time the succession in her community has never failed; and at this day her order is a very flourishing religious institute, largely instrumental in the education of girls of all classes, in Bavaria, Hungary, Roumania, Italy, and other parts of the Continent, and is commonly known as the Institute of the "English Virgins." During her lifetime Mary Ward established two communities in England, one in London and the other at Heworth Hall in Yorkshire. The latter did not long survive her; but the London community continued until about 1689, when they joined a community sent to England from Munich, under the protection of Catherine of Braganza. They settled at Hammersmith. After doing good work for many years, especially as a teaching order, this community gradually declined; but an offshoot, planted once more in Yorkshire, has continued to flourish until the present day. In 1686 a house outside Micklegate Bar, York, was purchased, where the convent now stands. [For the Irish branch see the art. Loretto Nuns.]

The foundress imprinted the seal of perpetuity even on the community which she abandoned. The English Poor Clares, after she left them, prospered greatly at Gravelines, and sent forth several filiations. In the French Revolution the nuns "had their full share of suffering, though they escaped the guillotine." Banished from France, they took refuge in England, and finally established themselves at Clare Abbey, near Darlington, "which now represents the Gravelines foundation and those of its three daughter-houses." Revival in England," i. 35 sqq.)

INSTITUTION. An ecclesiastical act by which a person who already has a right to a benefice is put into actual possession thereof. It must be carefully distinguished from collation (q.v.) and presentation [see Patron]. The subject is also treated under the articles Investiture and Installation. (Ferraris; Taunton.)

INTENTION. [See Sacraments, p. 745.]

INTERCALARY YEAR. [See Calendar.]

INTERCESSION OF SAINTS. [See Saints, Intercession of; Mediator.]

INTERDICT. 1. The interdictum of a Roman praetor was a decree pronounced between two litigants, ordering, or (more commonly) forbidding, something to be done. A banished man was also said to be interdicted from the use of fire and water in Italy (aqua et igne ei interdictum est). Something of each of these notions—e.g. the prohibition of saying Mass, and the interdiction of the guilty, and often of the innocent also, from approach to the sacraments—appears in the ecclesiastical interdict, which is defined to be "an ecclesiastical censure, by which persons are debarred from the use of certain sacraments, from all the divine offices, and from Christian burial." [1]

Interdicts are divided into local, personal, and mixed. In the first kind a place is interdicted, so that no divine office may be celebrated or heard in it, either by the inhabitants or by strangers. By the second kind, persons are interdicted, so as to be debarred from using the sacraments or exercising the functions prohibited, in whatever place they may be. By the mixed kind both place and persons are directly interdicted—e.g. a city and its inhabitants. Again, each of the first two kinds may be either general or particular. A particular local interdict strikes a single locality—e.g. a church; a general one comprehends many localities, being pronounced against a kingdom, a province, or a city. A particular personal interdict strikes a single person; a general one of the same class is extended to a number of persons—e.g. to all the people in a province, all the members of a university, all the monks in a convent.

A general interdict of the clergy in a country does not touch the religious orders in that country unless it be so expressed, or unless the intention to include them can be clearly inferred from the circumstances, and the same holds good vice versa. Nor does a general interdict of the clergy include bishops unless it be so expressed.

When a city is laid under an interdict its suburbs are understood to be included, even though they belong to a different diocese; otherwise the interdict might be rendered nugatory through the citizens being able to hear Mass, &c., in the suburban churches. In the same case the cathedral church no less than others is interdicted, and also the churches of regulars.

Interdicts are either imposed per modum poenae, as a punishment for a particular offence, in which case they last for a prescribed period, and then cease—or per modum censurae, as a weapon to beat down contumacious resistance to the laws and discipline of the Church. In this last case they ordinarily last till the resistance ceases, and the offender makes amends, and are then relaxed.

Interdicts proceed either a jure or ab homine, that is, either by operation of law or by the act of someone competent to impose them. Everyone who can excommunicate or suspend can also interdict, except the superiors of monasteries, both because their jurisdiction is not local but personal, and also because, if they had the power of interdicting, the effects of their action would extend to and damnify lay persons who are not in any sense their subjects (subditi).

The law declares persons or places interdicted in a great variety of cases. As instances may be given: hindrance of a Papal legate or nuncio from discharging his duty, in which case all the dominions of the prince or State so hindering are interdicted; the burial of a heretic, knowingly, in a church, in which case the church is interdicted; appeal from the Pope by any university chapter or college to a future general council, the result being the interdict of the offending corporation; and the illegal alienation of Church property by bishops or abbots.

In order that innocent persons might suffer as little as possible from the effects of an interdict the canon law gradually introduced mitigations. Baptism and Confirmation might be administered to persons in danger of death; the sacrament of Penance was open to all but those guilty of having caused the interdict (who could not approach it before having made satisfaction); marriage might be celebrated, but without solemnities; ordinations might be made if there was a deficiency of priests; ecclesiastics who had observed the interdict might be buried in the churchyard, but in silence; one Low Mass might be said every week, and High Mass might be sung on the five great festivals of Christmas, Easter, Whitsunday, Corpus Christi, and the Assumption, the persons guilty of the interdict being carefully excluded.

General interdicts are rarely mentioned in ecclesiastical history before the eleventh century, and for this three causes are assigned: (1) the comparatively stronger sense of religion in the Christian society of the earlier times, restraining a whole people from themselves falling into, or conniving at in their rulers, any notorious transgression; (2) the salutary dread of excommunication everywhere prevailing, so that that form of censure was sufficient of itself to restrain offenders; (3) the general readiness of temporal princes in those times to aid the Church in maintaining her discipline.

Non-Catholic writers are prone to judge a Papal interdict according to the measure of what they deem its success. If the contumacy of the prince whom it strikes is overcome, the firmness and policy of the Pope are usually commended; but if, as has sometimes happened, it be not overcome, the inference drawn by such writers is that the increasing intelligence and civilization of the age have deprived the "Papal thunders" of their terrors, and that the time has come for disowning and abandoning the use of them for evermore. Such language shows an ignorance of the deep foundations on which the interdict, with other Church censures, rests. Our Lord gave the power of binding, as of loosing, to His Apostles, and He has never withdrawn it. But Jesus Christ did not tell them that whatever they should "bind on earth" should also be punished on earth, but that it should be "bound also in heaven." Through the dwindling of faith and the decay of virtue a people may sink so low as to countenance its rulers in resisting the Church; the rulers themselves may be atheists and disregard ecclesiastical censures; and all this may pass with apparent impunity. What then? If the interdict or other censure be just, there is no real impunity; the sin of the offender is "retained" in heaven as the priest has retained it on earth, and if he make not amends in this life he will have to make all the more amends in the next. Nevertheless the Church has with good reason suspended for a long time past the proclamation of these general censures; lest, if the contumacious were to contemn them with impunity, and so gain an apparent triumph, the faith of the common people, already weak and assailed from many quarters, might be still more shaken and impaired.

2. In canon law the term "interdict" is also used of a judicial order, in the sense familiar to the civil law, from which the threefold distinction into interdicts for restoring, obtaining, and retaining, and numerous other provisions, are also borrowed. (Ferraris, Interdicta, Interdictum; Taunton.)

INTEREST. [See USURY.]

INTERIM. A temporary arrangement in religious matters entered into with those outside the Church. It is applied especially to the Interim of Ratisbon (July 29, 1541) and that of Augsburg (June 30, 1548). The object of these interims was to bring about reunion of the Protestants with the Catholic Church by conceding to them some important points, e.g. the marriage of the clergy and Communion under both kinds, and the postponement of the decision of disputed matters until the meeting of a general council. (See REFORMATION; Janssen-Pastor, "Hist. of the German People," Eng. tr., vi. 140, 389; Pastor, "Hist. of the Popes," Eng. tr., xi. 420, xii. 409; Kaulen in "Kirchenlex.")

INTERNAL FORUM. [See FORUM ECCLESIASTICUM.]

INTERNUNCIO. A papal diplomatic agent in countries where for various reasons regular diplomatic intercourse has not been established or has been suspended. His powers vary according to the conditions of the country to which he is sent. At present Apostolic Delegates are usually appointed instead of Internuncios. [See LEGATE.]

INTERSTICES (interstitia). The intervals which canon law requires between the reception of the various degrees of orders. The Council of Trent recommends that even minor orders be conferred at intervals, so that the candidate should have time to perfect himself in the theory and practice of each, before proceeding to the next; this, however, it leaves to the discretion of the bishops. After taking the last grade of minor orders, the Council requires the interval of a year before the candidate proceeds to the sub-diaconate, "unless necessity or the good of the Church should in the bishop's judgment dictate a different course." (Sess. xxiii. c. xiv., De Ref.) With the like salvo, it is provided that a full year must elapse between the sub-diaconate and the diaconate, and the same period between the diaconate and the priesthood. This full year need not be the solar year of 365 days, but may be the ecclesiastical year, as from one Lent to another, or from one Pentecost to another. A bishop cannot dispense with the interstices in ordaining candidates coming to him from another diocese, unless in their dimissorial letters [DIMISSORIALS] this privilege is allowed them. The members of religious orders can be ordained in many cases by virtue of special concessions obtained from the Holy See, without observing the interstices; this is notably the case with regard to the Society of Jesus. The non-observance of the interstices on the part both of the ordinans and the ordinand is a sin; but no penalty is affixed to it in the law. (Ferraris, Interstitia.)

INTROIT. Words said in the Mass when the priest has finished the Confiteor and has ascended to the altar. Le Brun and Benedict XIV. attribute the introduction of introits to Gregory the Great. The name refers either to the fact that it is said at the beginning or "entrance" of the Mass, or else to the practice of having the introit sung by the choir as the priest "entered to" the altar.

The introit consists of an antiphon, Gloria Patri, and usually of a psalm, which it was once the custom to sing entire. But some introits, called by Durandus irregular, are taken from other parts of Scripture. Such are the "Puer natus" on Christmas Day, "Spiritus Domini" on Pentecost, "Viri Galilaei" on the Ascension. Some few in our present Missal give verses from uninspired writers. Such are the "Salve Sancta Parens," "Gaudeamus omnes in Domino," "Benedicta sit Sancta Trinitas." On Whit Tuesday the verse of the introit is taken from the fourth (apocryphal) book of Esdras, and on the Sunday within the octave of the Epiphany from the similarly uncanonical book of Enoch. The version of Scripture used in the introits is usually the Old Latin, not the Vulgate.

The word for introit in the Ambrosian Mass is "Ingressa"; in the Mozarabic, Carthusian, Dominican, Carmelite Missals it is called "Officium." No Eastern rites have an introit in any form. (Fortescue, "The Mass," p. 216.)

INVESTIGATION, COMMISSION OF. A body of priests appointed by the bishop in synod to inquire into the circumstances concerning the final deprivation of a rector. [See RECTOR; Taunton, Commission of Investigation.]

INVESTITURE (Low Lat. investire, to put in possession). This, according to Ducange, answered nearly to what English lawyers call "livery of seisin." It was the putting in possession of a person entitled to property; the delivery of possession being symbolized by the passing from hand to hand of some tangible token, such as a rod, a staff, a fish, or a bird. Ducange enumerates one hundred and twenty-nine forms of investiture. In the eleventh and twelfth centuries, great temporal possessions having accrued to the Church all over Europe, and the patronage of the sees and abbeys being largely in the hands of princes, a tendency arose on the part of the latter to usurp the whole affair of episcopal or abbatial nomination and installation into their own hands. Nor was this tendency wholly blameable; for when a bishop, as often in Germany, was the ruler over extensive territories, or when an abbot possessed plenary jurisdiction and the power of life and death within the broad conventual domains, it was both the interest and the duty of the sovereign to take care that those administering such weighty functions should be men of loyalty, capacity, and energy. This control may be exercised directly—as by the acclamations of the clergy and faithful at elections in early Christian times—or through the intervention of princes and magistrates. A joint control over ecclesiastical elections on the part of Church and State seems to be the happiest and the best compromise in all cases in which the bishop or other prelate becomes by the election not only a pastor of souls but also a public officer of the State having civil duties to perform. A temporal government, uncontrolled, would never place a St. Charles Borromeo in the see of Milan; on the other hand, the ecclesiastical authority, unchecked by lay power, may easily make such mistakes as the elevation of Pietro Morone to the supreme pontificate.

In the eleventh century St. Gregory VII. (1075) published a decree absolutely prohibiting the lay investiture of bishoprics. By this he could not have meant that bishops should not be put in possession of the temporalities of their sees in due legal form, nor that they should not be responsible to princes for their management of those temporalities. His prohibition had reference to an encroachment and an abuse, then prevalent both in Germany and in England, by which the sovereign pretended to give investiture to a newly-appointed bishop, "per annulum et baculum," by ring and crosier. These symbols were held to indicate spiritual and ecclesiastical power, and the delivery of them to be tantamount to the transmission of the whole episcopal authority. To stop this abuse, Gregory VII. claimed the rights of canonical election by the chapters, and free consecration. The decorum with which the unchecked control of the State over the Church of England or the Russian Church is exercised blinds us to the depth of degradation really involved. The bishops are wealthy —have social influence—the State is undisturbed; but at what cost? At the cost of exclusion from the Catholic Church, and loss of communion with the see of Peter. The Gregories, Celestines, and Innocents resisted this consummation; the noblest Christian men in Germany and England aided them; and the fatal breach was postponed for four centuries. St. Anselm fought the battle for England, and in 1106 Henry I. resigned the claim to investiture by ring and crosier, while stipulating that, on being admitted to their temporalities, bishops and abbots should, in compliance with the rules of the feudal system, swear fealty and do homage to the sovereign. A similar compromise was effected for the Empire by the Concordat of Worms, concluded between Henry V. and Calixtus II. in 1122. It was in the form of a double declaration; the Pope granting that the elect bishop or abbot should receive the regalia [REGALIA] from the Emperor by the sceptre, excepting what belonged to the Roman Church, and should discharge the duties thereof as he was legally bound to do; the Emperor renouncing all investiture by ring and crosier, and granting in all the churches of his empire canonical elections and free consecrations. In fact, Henry V. had come to see that in battling for the objectionable form of investiture he was almost contending for a shadow. When he was in France, in 1121, he had conversed with French bishops, and had learnt from them that investiture by ring and crosier had never been the custom in France, and yet the bishops had been loyal to the French kings, and the legitimate influence of the latter in important appointments had not been nullified.

Thus the particular contest about investitures was settled; but of course the general contention as to the respective shares which the Church and the State should have in the appointment of bishops still went on. In France the Concordat of 1516 between Leo X. and Francis I. gave all the episcopal appointments to the French crown; whence the rise of Gallicanism. [GALLICANISM.] In England, for a long time before the Reformation, an understanding prevailed between Rome and the English kings, and they filled up the vacant sees in concert. (Lingard, "Hist. of England," ii. 14 sqq.; Hefele-Leclercq, iv. 1026 sqq., where a résumé will be found of Scharnagel, "Der Begriff der Investitur"; Lesne in DAp.)

INVITATORIUM. (Invitatory Psalm.) The invitatory psalm, i.e. Ps. 94, "Come, let us rejoice before the Lord," is said at the beginning of Matins on all days except the Epiphany and the last three days of Holy Week. The invitatorium has an antiphon, the whole of which is repeated six times, and the half three times, in the recitation of the psalm. The recital of the invitatory psalm at the beginning of the divine office is prescribed in the rule of St. Benedict. Amalarius (anno 822) tells us that in his time the invitatory was used by the Romans in the dominical but not in the ferial office, so that the present practice on the last three days of Holy Week is a relic of the ancient use. The invitatory psalm, with its antiphon, is omitted on the Feast of the Epiphany simply because Ps. 94 occurs in the third nocturn. Mystical reasons, e.g. detestation of Herod's calling together the scribes, and again because the Magi came to adore Christ without invitation, are suggested by mediaeval writers. INVOCATION OF SAINTS. [See SAINTS, INTERCESSION AND INVOCATION OF.]

IRISH CHURCH. In the fifth century Ireland was divided, as it was for centuries afterwards, into several small kingdoms.

Some unknown preachers must have found their way into the country even before the mission of Palladius, and converted some of the natives to the faith of Christ, for St. Prosper in his chronicle (published about 434) writes that Palladius was sent by Pope Celestine in 431 "ad Scotos in Christum credentes," to the Scots believing in Christ. No one now doubts that by Scots Prosper meant the natives of Ireland. This mission of Palladius, who was deacon of the Roman Church, did not last long, and bore little fruit. So much we learn from the Book of Armagh (written before 700), with the additional fact that Palladius died in Britain on his return from Ireland.

The general conversion of the Irish nation was reserved for St. Patrick, who was probably born at the place now called Kilpatrick on the Clyde,[1] whence he was carried as a slave into the north of Ireland while still a youth. The degradation and darkness of the inhabitants profoundly impressed his pure and generous heart, and from the time when he regained his liberty, at the age of twenty-one, he devoted himself to the divine service, and the task of spreading the doctrines of salvation. After going through a course of study at Marmoutier and Lerins, he repaired to Rome. We next hear of him as accompanying St. Germanus and St. Lupus on their anti-Pelagian mission to Britain. Being selected by St. Germanus to preach the faith in Ireland, he went first—if we may accept the testimony of Probus [2]—to Rome to obtain the apostolic blessing. Celestine dying soon after, Patrick left Rome and journeyed towards Ireland. Hearing on his way of the death of Palladius, he went to St. Amatorex, who ordained him bishop. Landing in Ireland in 432, he attended the assembly of the Irish kings and chieftains held on the hill of Tara in that year. His reception was not very encouraging; however, he converted several, and among others the father of St. Benignus, his immediate successor in the see of Armagh.

St. Patrick fixed his principal residence at Armagh, which became the primatial see of the island. In the course of his long career, extending beyond sixty years, he visited and converted the greater part of Ireland, and established bishoprics in all the provinces. Among his chief companions and assistants were Auxilius, Isserninus, and Secundinus. The Irish people received the Gospel with extraordinary readiness. St. Patrick left few writings behind him; his "Confession," a kind of autobiography, is his chief work. We have also his circular letter against Coroticus, and the canons of a synod which he held with Auxilius and Isserninus, about 453, to regulate Church discipline. In his "Confession" he does not mention the Pope or the Holy See, and Bede, in his "Ecclesiastical History," is silent about St. Patrick's mission. Hence Protestant writers have inferred that he had no mission from Rome, and preached a Christianity of his own, distinct from that of the Popes; in short, that he was a kind of Protestant. This hypothesis has been exploded by Dr. Lanigan, Card. Moran, and others, who show that although St. Patrick, having a special object in view when he wrote the "Confession," says nothing in it about Rome, yet the history of the early Irish Church is unintelligible unless we assume a close and filial relation to the Holy See to have existed from the first. Within a century after St. Patrick, St. olumbanus, the great Irish missionary of the sixth century, said to the Pope "The Catholic faith is held unshaken by us, as it was delivered to us by you, the successors of the holy Apostles." [1] Another theory was put forward by the learned Ussher, the Protestant Archbishop of Armagh; it was that Ireland did not owe her Christianity to Rome, nor even to St. Patrick, since she already possessed a hierarchy at the time when the saint arrived. But when the names of the bishops supposed to have belonged to this hierarchy—Ailbe, Declan, Ibar, Kieran, &c.—came to be examined, Dr. Lanigan was able to prove that they were all posterior in date to St. Patrick.[2]

With respect to Bede, although it is true that he does not mention St. Patrick in his "Ecclesiastical History," the circumstance—singular as it must be admitted to be—may perhaps be explained on the ground that he chose to confine himself strictly to the religious concerns of the Angles and Saxons. It is impossible to infer from it that Bede passed over the conversion of Ireland in silence, because he, a zealous adherent of Rome, disapproved of a work effected independently of Rome. Had he so felt, he would have studiously avoided speaking of St. Patrick in his other writings, as well as in his history. But the fact is that in both his "Martyrologies" Bede does give the name of St. Patrick. In the prose one, under March 17, he says "In Scotia, the birthday of the holy Patricius, bishop and confessor, who first in that country preached the gospel of Christ." In his metrical martyrology, under the same day, he says "Patricius, the servant of the Lord, mounted to the heavenly court."

The death of the apostle of Ireland occurred in 493. The present sketch of the history of the Church in Ireland from that time to our own day will be divided into three periods: 1, that of sanctity, learning, and missionary energy (493–800); 2, that of invasions and usurpation (800–1530); 3, that of persecution (1530–1829). The period commencing at the last-named date will be regarded by our descendants, if present appearances may be trusted, as an era of restoration.

1. The Irish saints are divided by the national hagiographers into three classes. In the first, which consists of those of the earliest Christian age down to about 530, the principal figures are those of St. Patrick himself, St. Brigid of Kildare, St. Ibar, St. Declan, and St. Kieran. The second class, from 530 to 600, contains St. Coemgen or Kevin, the two Brendans, Jarlath of Tuam, and the great St. Columba or Columbkill. The third class, whose period is from 600 to about 660, contains St. Maidoc the first Bishop of Ferns; St. Colman of Lindisfarne, Ultan, Fursey, &c. The first class, in the words of the ancient authority quoted by Dr. Lanigan,[1] "blazes like the sun, the second like the moon, the third like the stars . . . the first most holy, the second very holy, the third holy."[2]

That learning, in all the branches then known, was eagerly followed by Irish students from the time of the conversion, is a fact of which there is abundant evidence. A copious literature sprang up, consisting of monastic rules, tracts on ritual and discipline, homilies, prayers, hymns, genealogies, martyrologies in prose and verse, and lives of saints. This literature, as was to be expected, was partly composed in the vernacular and partly in Latin; but the bulk of it was in the Gaelic. The extant remains are still considerable; that they are not yet more copious is explained by Professor O'Curry in a remarkable passage, which will be cited in a different connection further on.

The English Bede bears ungrudging testimony to the high character of the Irish missionaries who had laboured in Northumbria, and to the general belief in the excellence of the Irish schools. "The whole solicitude of those teachers," he says, "was to serve God, not the world; their one thought was how to train the heart, not how to satisfy the appetite."[2] The special excellence of the Irish schools was the interpretation of Scripture; thus, about 650, Agilbert, a French bishop, resided a long time in Ireland "for the sake of reading the Scriptures."[3] Some years later (664) it became a common practice with the Northumbrian thanes to visit Ireland, either with a view to greater advance in the spiritual life, or for the sake of biblical knowledge, "divinae lectionis." These last would go from place to place attending the cells of the different masters; and so generous were the natives, that they provided for them all "their daily food free of cost, books also to read, and gratuitous teaching."[4]

The missionary energy of the Irish church, commencing with a little island off the coast of Mull, which it made a basis for further operations, ended by embracing France, Switzerland, and Italy within the scope of its charity. St. Columba, of whom Montalembert in his "Monks of the West" has given to the world a graphic portraiture, founded the monastery of Hy (or Iona) in 563, chiefly with a view to the conversion of the Picts dwelling in the north of Scotland. For more than 230 years Iona continued to flourish, and was a centre of pure religion, education, art, and literature to all the surrounding countries. Here, as in a "sacred storehouse,"[1] rest the bones of not a few Irish, Scottish, and Norwegian kings. It was devastated by the Danes in 795, and the monks were dispersed a few years later. From Iona the monk Aidan, at the invitation of king Oswald, came into Northumbria, the Angles of which were still mostly Pagans, and founded in 633 a monastery on the isle of Lindisfarne, of which he became the first bishop. To him and his successors the conversion of the northern English was chiefly due. Lindisfarne in its turn became a great school of sacred learning and art, and its bishopric ultimately grew into the palatine see of Durham. In East Anglia the Irish St. Fursey assisted Felix the Burgundian in the conversion of the natives; in Wessex the Irish Maidulf founded the great convent of Malmesbury. In the sixth and seventh centuries Irish missionaries were active in France: Fridolin restored religion at Poitiers, and recovered the relics of St. Hilary; St. Fursey founded a monastery at Lagny; St. Fiacre settled at Paris; and Columbanus founded in Burgundy the historic monastery of Luxeuil. In Switzerland the name of the town and canton of St. Gall perpetuates the memory of an Irish anchorite, who in 613 planted a cross near a spring in the heart of a dense forest, south of the lake of Constance, and by despising the world drew the world to him. Bobbio, in Italy, was the last foundation and resting-place of St. Columbanus. In Germany, the Irish Fridolin, the hero of many a tender Volkslied and wild legend, was probably the first apostle of the Alemanni in Baden and Suabia.[2]

The well-known controversy respecting the right observation of Easter, which raged in the seventh and eighth centuries between those who had received a Roman and an Irish training respectively, turned on the fact that the Irish Church, from its isolation in the far west, and the difficulties of communication with the centre of unity, had fallen somewhat behindhand in ecclesiastical science, and not adopted the improved methods of calculation which had come into force in Latin Christendom generally.[3] After there had been time for a full discussion and comparison of views, the Irish gradually came round to the better practice. At a synod held at Old Leighlin, in 630, a letter having come from Honorius I., the Roman cycle and rules for computing Easter were adopted in all the south of Ireland.[1] At Iona and in the north of Ireland the necessary change was deferred for many years. Adamnan, Abbot of Hy, laboured hard between 701 and 704 to introduce the Roman Easter, and met with considerable success. But the decisive adoption of it at Iona is said to have been due to the persuasions of St. Egbert, about 706.[2]

[3] The erroneous practice was not that of the Quartodecimans [CYCLE, EASTER], for the Irish always waited for Sunday before celebrating the feast; it consisted in keeping Easter from the fourteenth to the twentieth day of the first month, instead of from the fifteenth to the twenty-first; the consequence being that when Sunday fell on the fourteenth, Easter began to be kept on the evening of the thirteenth day, that is before the occurrence of the Paschal full moon.

2. Period of Invasions.—The Danes (called "Ostmen" by the Irish) appeared on the Irish coasts about the end of the eighth century. Wherever they came they desecrated churches, burnt monasteries, destroyed books, pictures and sculptures; murdered priests, monks and poets. To the ferocity of the wild beast they joined the persevering energy of the Teuton; their arms were better than those of the Irish, and perhaps they had more skill in handling them. Confusion and lamentation were soon in every part of the island. Men, after a while, seeing the continued success of these odious Pagans, began to doubt of Providence, and to grow slack in faith. Sauve qui peut became the general feeling, and the generosity towards the Church of the converts of the age of St. Patrick underwent a selfish but not unnatural reaction in their descendants. "When foreign invasion and war had cooled down the fervid devotion of the native chiefs, and had distracted and broken up the long-established reciprocity of good offices between the Church and the State, as well as the central executive controlling power of the nation, the chief and the noble began to feel that the lands which he himself or his ancestors had offered to the Church, might now, with little impropriety, be taken back by him, to be applied to his own purposes, quieting his conscience by the necessity of the case."[3] The beautiful Glendalough, founded by St. Kevin about 549, being near the sea, was peculiarly exposed to Danish assault; but not one of the principal monasteries—Armagh, Kildare, Clonmacnoise, Slane, &c.—escaped destruction at one time or other. Dublin—of which the Irish name is "Ath-cliath"—became a Danish city. From time to time the invaders were heavily defeated—as in the battle of Clontarf (1014), when the victorious Brian Boru fell in the hour of victory. Gradually they adopted Christianity, lost their national language, and were blended with the natives, never having, as in England, succeeded in subjecting the whole island to their rule.

In the course of the twelfth century, the power of the O'Neils of Ulster, who had for a long period been over-lords of the whole of Ireland, declined, and the O'Connors of Connaught attempted to take their place. But it was a weak and wavering sovereignty, and the kings of the five petty kingdoms were continually plotting, combining, and making war one against another. A state of general insecurity and lawlessness was the natural result; and though the faith of the people remained intact, moral disorder in every form was rampant, and the discipline of the Church was often set at naught. The clergy, probably for the sake of greater stability and safety, tended to cluster together under some monastic rule; and the laity, abandoned to themselves, fell a prey to gross superstitions and excesses. The Popes, by sending legates, and writing admonitory letters from time to time, attempted to reform the state of society. In the first half of the twelfth century a powerful influence for good was exerted by the admirable sanctity of St. Malachy, who died at Clairvaux under the eyes of St. Bernard, in 1148, and whose life was written by his great friend. The state of things at Armagh, when Malachy was elected to the primacy in 1125, is a good illustration of the disorder which pervaded the Irish Church. A certain powerful family had for more than two hundred years claimed the primatial chair as a hereditary possession; for fifteen generations they had made good their claim; and of these fifteen occupants of the see only six were in holy orders, the rest being married laymen, who, though they did not presume to exercise the episcopal functions, enjoyed the title and emoluments of the bishopric.[1] Celsus, the last of the series, being a good man, procured the election of St. Malachy as his successor; but the family resented this intrusion on their "rights" and presented to the see one of themselves, Maurice by name, upon the death of Celsus. For the sake of peace, St. Malachy waited five years before entering Armagh; on the death of Maurice, in 1133, he was peaceably installed. In 1138 the saint visited Rome, where the Pope, Innocent II., received him with the highest honour, and appointed him his legate in Ireland. His zeal, but still more his saintly example, effected a salutary change in the northern parts of Ireland, where, having obtained leave to resign the primacy, he spent the last ten years of his life as bishop of the small see of Down.

At the beginning of his reign, Henry II. is said to have obtained the approbation of Pope Adrian IV., an Englishman, for his project of entering Ireland, ostensibly with a view to extirpating vice and ignorance among the natives, and attaching the island more closely to the see of St. Peter.[2] Of this bull Henry made no use for many years, and the actual invasion of Ireland by Strongbow and other Norman knights was in a manner accidental. For several generations things went on much as before; the English power was confined to the "Pale," or strip of country on the eastern coast; in the rest of Ireland the native princes, though they often recognized an ill-defined over-lordship in the English kings, reigned practically after their own fashion. Outside the Pale, Brehon, not feudal, law prevailed. One benefit, at least, resulted: the Normans were great builders; and noble churches of stone soon covered the land. It is true that in this reform they were preceded by St. Malachy, who had built a church of stone at Bangor, near Carrickfergus, to the great amazement of the natives, who till then had seen only their own ingeniously constructed edifices of timber and wickerwork.

Three great Irish synods were held in the twelfth century. At the first, that of Kells (1152), at which a Roman cardinal presided, the metropolitan dignity of the three sees of Cashel,[1] Dublin, and Tuam was solemnly recognized; but the primacy over the whole island was still reserved to Armagh. At the second, that of Cashel (1172), held immediately after the invasion, Church property was declared to be exempt from the exactions of the chieftains, the regular payment of tithes was enjoined, and it was ordered that all matters of ritual should be arranged in future "agreeably to the observance of the Church of England"—in other words, according to Roman usage. The third synod, that of Dublin (1186), passed several canons of ritual; it is chiefly noted for a sermon, preached before it by Gerald de Barri, or Cambrensis, in which, while praising the orthodoxy and the continency of the Irish clergy, he lamented that too many of them were addicted to intemperance.

Many of the English and Normans who settled in Ireland after the invasion adopted by degrees the dress, customs, and laws of the natives, and became no less intractable than they in their attitude towards the English government. An effort was made to stop this process by the Statute of Kilkenny (1367), which made it treasonable for those of English descent to marry, or enter into the relation of fosterage, or contract spiritual affinity with the natives; and forbade to the same class, on pain of forfeiture of property, the adoption of an Irish name, or the use of the Irish language, dress, or customs. But this statute was to a great extent inoperative, and from the date of its enactment to the time of Henry VIII. there were two parties in continual opposition to the government, the "English rebels," and the "Irish enemies." The demarcation between English and Irish, which the civil government thus did its utmost to maintain, was partially introduced, and with the most unhappy results, into the administration of Church affairs. In the counties of the Pale it was scarcely possible for an ecclesiastic of Irish race to obtain preferment. The invasion by the Scots under Edward Bruce in 1315, though ultimately defeated, caused great confusion, and called forth during its continuance many tokens of sympathy from the Irish clergy. This, says Malone, was made a pretext for "throwing off the mask," [1] and under colour of disloyalty Irishmen were excluded from all the higher dignities and benefices. Yet it would appear that this exclusion could not have extended much beyond the Pale; for if we examine the lists of bishops occupying the Irish sees in 1350, we find that out of thirty-three names, eighteen are certainly Irish, thirteen English, while two may be doubtful. All through this time of confusion and disunion a strong religious feeling was abroad, animating the men of both races alike, and directing them to common objects. In the thirteenth century we hear of 170 monasteries being founded; about 55 in the fourteenth; and about 60 in the fifteenth. Two unsuccessful attempts were made to found universities: one at Dublin (1320) by Archbishop Bicknor; the other at Drogheda, by the Parliament which sat there in 1465.

3. Period of Persecution.—By the aid of Brown, the Archbishop of Dublin, an Englishman who had embraced the Lutheran opinions, Henry VIII. had some success in imposing his doctrine of the royal supremacy on the Irish clergy.[2] Under Mary all progress in this direction was reversed. Soon after the accession of Elizabeth, in 1560, a packed Parliament was convened at Dublin which passed an Act of Uniformity, declaring the royal supremacy over the Church, and imposing the Protestant Prayer-book. By many Protestant writers [3] it has been maintained that the bishops, with the exception of two, either approved of, or acquiesced in, the new order of things, and that the people for many years frequented the churches where the English service was performed. The falsehood of all such statements has been exposed by Cardinal Moran.[4] The real state of the case appears to have been this. The Archbishop of Dublin, Curwin, conformed to Protestantism, and O'Fihel, Bishop of Leighlin, did the same. The conduct of four bishops (Ossory, Ferns, Cork, and Clonfert) is more or less suspicious.

[1] Cashel was already regarded as a metropolitan see as early as 1111, and its bishops exerted corresponding powers to some extent; in 1140 it was formally recognized as such by Innocent II. at the request of St. Malachy (Lanigan, iv. 20).

The remainder of the Irish hierarchy, viz. the Archbishops of Cashel and Tuam (the see of Armagh was vacant), two bishops holding sees in the Pale (who were deprived by the government), and sixteen other bishops of suffragan sees, remained faithful to their canonical obligations. As these bishops died, or as, in the course of the Elizabethan wars, the government was able to consolidate its power in the remoter parts of Ireland, the cathedrals, Church lands, and other Church property were made over to Protestant bishops and ministers appointed under the Act of Uniformity. The Catholic Bishop of Kilmore, Richard Brady, was expelled from the see so late as 1585. The Holy See did all that it could to support the oppressed Church of Ireland, and animate the clergy to meet their sufferings with an unbending fortitude. A nuncio was sent to reside at Limerick, money and arms were liberally provided, the intervention of Spain solicited, and Irish ecclesiastics visiting Rome welcomed and assisted. Except in the case of Dublin, the seat of the Anglo-Irish government, where the see was left vacant for many years from the absolute impossibility of any prelate residing there in safety, the successions of bishops in all the Irish sees appear to have been regularly maintained through all the period of persecution.

The cause of learning, to which the Irish Church had been ever devoted, could not but suffer in this prolonged conflict. Before the change of religion in England there had been some encouraging signs of progress in the reconciliation of the races through the influence of a common interest in intellectual pursuits. Among the distinguished Oxford students of the first thirty years of the sixteenth century, a considerable proportion were Irishmen,[1] and it is impossible to doubt that had peace and religious unity been preserved, this resort to the English universities would have gone on increasing until it bore its natural fruit in the establishment of a great university on Irish soil. The change of religion in England cut off the supply of Irish students; Catholicism became a persecuted creed; and the effect on learning—its professors, seats, implements, and productions—may be understood from the following vigorous passage. "From about the year 1530, in the reign of the English king Henry VIII., to the year 1793, the priests of Ireland were ever subject to persecution, suppression, dispersion, and expatriation, according to the English law; their churches, monasteries, convents, and private habitations were pillaged and wrested from them; and a Vandal warfare was kept up against all that was venerable and sacred of the remains of ancient literature and art which they possessed. When, therefore, we make search for the once extensive monuments of learning which the ecclesiastical libraries contained of old, we must remember that this shocking system continued for near 300 years; and that during all that long period the clergy—the natural repositories of all the documents which belonged to the history of the Church—were kept in a continual state of insecurity and transition, often compelled to resort to the Continent for education, often forced to quit their homes and churches at a moment's notice, and fly for their lives, in the first instance to the thorny depths of the nearest forest or the damp shelter of some dreary cavern, until such time, if ever it should come, as they could steal away to the hospitable shores of some Christian land on the Continent of Europe." [1]

Under James I. and Charles I., the Catholic clergy having been now stripped of all their property, and the laity of a considerable portion of theirs, some toleration was extended by the government to Catholic worship. The terrible rising of 1641 was the commencement of a war of eleven years, ending with the surrender of Galway in 1652. Innocent X. sent the Archbishop of Fermo (Rinuccini) as his nuncio to Ireland in the autumn of 1645, with considerable supplies of arms and money. Unfortunately dissension arose in the national ranks; a moderate section of the clergy, with most of the Catholic gentry and laity, were for aiding the King against the Parliament and not exacting from him very stringent conditions; but the bulk of the population, supported by the nuncio and the inferior clergy, were for turning the war into a struggle for complete religious freedom and national independence. Cromwell transported his victorious army to Ireland in 1649, and by several successful sieges, followed by bloody military executions, broke the strength of the resistance. The conquest of the island was completed by his lieutenants. The sufferings of the Irish clergy during, and still more after, the war were indescribable. Bishop O'Brien of Emly was executed by Ireton's order (1651) after the fall of Limerick. Bishop Egan of Ross was murdered by Ludlow's soldiers in 1650. In the same year Bishop McMahon of Clogher, being in command of a body of Irish troops, fell into the hands of the Puritans, and, though quarter had been promised, was hanged. A letter of Dr. Burgatt, afterwards Archbishop of Cashel, written in 1667, says that in the persecution begun by Cromwell "more than 300 [clergy] were put to death by the sword or on the scaffold . . .; more than 1000 were sent into exile, and among these all the surviving bishops," except the bishop of Kilmore, who was too old to move.[1] The Puritan soldiers put every priest to death whom they fell in with; and yet so close a tie of affection bound the clergy to their native land and their people that even in 1658, about the worst time of all, there were upwards of 150 priests in each province.[2] The regular clergy were no better off; the Acts of the General Chapter of the Dominican Order held at Rome in 1656 mention that out of 600 friars who were in the island in 1646 not a fourth part were left, and of forty-three convents of the order, not one remained standing.[3] All these horrors the Puritans pretended to justify, as done in retaliation for the massacre of Protestants in 1641. That a great number of persons were cruelly put to death at the time of that rising is undeniable; but, as Lingard points out,[4] the main object pursued was not the murder of Protestants, but the recovery of the confiscated lands. He significantly adds "That they [the Irish] suffered as much as they inflicted cannot be doubted."

The exiles, both priests and laity, were cast on the French coast in a state of such utter destitution that, but for prompt and ample relief, many must have perished. Happily, a saint was at hand to help them. St. Vincent of Paul, filled with compassion for these victims of war and fanaticism, collected money and clothing for them, and provided them all with homes and shelter; he even sent considerable supplies to Ireland.[5] Card. Moran also gives detailed proof of the unwearied solicitude of the Holy See, for many years after the Cromwellian invasion, in procuring succours of every kind for the Irish Catholics, and itself aiding them with money to the utmost of its power.[6]

The Act of Settlement (1660) legalized a great part of the Cromwellian spoliations; but the Catholic worship was tolerated all through the reign of Charles II. At the Revolution, the Irish espoused the cause of their king, who, whatever quarrel the English might have with him, had done Ireland no wrong. Neither the letter nor the spirit of the constitution enjoined that the Irish Parliament and people should change their king whenever it might suit the English people to change theirs. But, in the absence of effectual aid from abroad, the superior resources of the stronger nation crushed the resistance of the weaker; and a period commenced for the Irish Church and people sadder than any that had preceded it. The writings of Burke, and—among recent publications—Lecky's "History of the Eighteenth Century," paint in detail the picture of Ireland ruined and outraged by the penal laws. Whatever iniquitous law and crafty administration could devise to destroy the faith of the people was tried during the gloomy century which began at the Revolution, but all to no effect. The ill-success of the American war compelled the English government to propose the first relaxation of the penal laws in 1778. From that time the Irish Church has been step by step regaining portions and fragments of the rights of which she was deprived in the sixteenth century. Mainly through the efforts of the great Liberator, Daniel O'Connell, the chief remaining disabilities were removed by the Catholic Emancipation Act (1829).[1] The Protestant Church was disestablished in 1869. The last fifty years have seen the island covered with beautiful religious edifices—cathedrals, parish churches, convents, colleges &c. Of such a people it may be justly said "In much experience of tribulation they have had abundance of joy, and their very deep poverty hath abounded unto the riches of their simplicity."[2]

On February 12, 1915, Benedict XV. signed the introduction of the Cause of Beatification of two hundred and fifty-seven martyrs (including six women) during the penal times.

[6] About 1688, 72,000 francs a year were supplied by Rome for the support of the Irish secular clergy and laity. In 1699 the Pope sent to James II., at St. Germains, 58,000 francs for the Irish ecclesiastics exiled that year. From about 1750 to 1800 the Popes sent the Irish bishops a hundred Roman crowns a year in aid of Catholic poor schools.

IRISH COLLEGE (ROME). The munificent Pontiff to whom the English College owed its foundation—Gregory XIII.—contemplated a similar institution for Ireland; but on mature consideration he judged that whatever portion of the Papal revenues could be spared to aid that injured people would be better spent in sending them money and arms, at a time when they were engaged in a deadly struggle with their heretical oppressors, than in any other way. His original desire was, however, carried out by his nephew, Cardinal Ludovico Ludovisi, who in 1628 founded a college near the Piazza Barberini for Irish theological students, who were afterwards to return to their own land and do their best to keep alive the flame of religion among their persecuted countrymen. Eugene Callanan, archdeacon of Cashel, was the first rector, with Fr. Luke Wadding, the celebrated Irish Franciscan historian, as a sort of supervisor. The college opened with six students, and a donation of fifty scudi per month. Cardinal Ludovisi by his will bequeathed to it a large vineyard at Castel Gandolfo, and a thousand scudi of annual rent; he further directed that its management should be transferred to the hands of the Society of Jesus. A permanent site for the college was found near the convent of the Dominican nuns of the Annunziata. The students attended lectures at the Collegio Romano [Roman College].

The college remained under Jesuit management till 1772, when it was removed from their control; from that time to the date of the French invasion—when it shared in the general ruin which fell on all Roman colleges—it was governed by an Irish rector, assisted by three or four secular priests of that nation. In 1826 it was restored by Leo XII., who placed it in a suitable building near the church of S. Lucia de' Ginnasi, with Mgr. Blake for its first rector. Soon afterwards it was arranged that the Cardinal Prefect of Propaganda pro tem. should always be the protector of the college. Cardinal Cappellari, afterwards Gregory XVI., who thus became protector, conceived a singular affection for this Irish community and loaded it with favours. In 1836 he paid a formal visit to the college, while Paul Cullen, afterwards Cardinal Archbishop of Dublin, was rector; and in the same year he made over to it the monastery and church of S. Agata alla Suburra. As another proof of his regard, he granted to the students the privilege of carrying in the annual procession of Corpus Christi the staves of the baldacchino under which the Pope carries the Blessed Sacrament, from the end of the colonnade in the piazza of St. Peter's to the great gate of the Accoramboni palace. Among the famous students of the college (which was formerly known as "Seminarium Episcoporum") may be mentioned the martyrs Philip Cleary and Oliver Plunket; Peter Creagh, archbishop of Dublin, Hugh Mac Mahon, archbishop of Armagh; Dr. Lanigan, the historian; Francis Mahony ("Father Prout"); Archbishop Croke, and Cardinal Moran. Daniel O'Connell, as is well known, left his heart to Rome; it is now in the college chapel. (O'Riordan in "Cath. Enc."; "Archives of the Irish College, Rome.")

IRISH COLLEGES (CONTINENTAL). Besides the college in Rome there are or were many other Irish colleges in various European countries. It is not possible for us to give an account of more than a few of the best known.

1. The most important of all was the college in Paris, founded in 1605 by John Lee, and still existing in our own times. The original building proving too small for the numbers, the Collège des Lombards, then in a ruinous state, was assigned to the Irish students by Louis XIV. in 1677. It was rebuilt and extended, and in 1776 a second college for juniors was opened. The majority of the students were priests already ordained who attended the university lectures for the purpose of obtaining degrees in theology or canon law. In 1792 both of the colleges, together with all the other Irish colleges in France, were closed. During the Consulate the Paris college was restored, and to it were assigned the scanty remnants of the property of the other Irish colleges in France. In 1858 the government of the college was handed over to the Irish Vincentian Fathers. Massingham, author of the "Florilegium Insulae Sanctorum," the Abbé Mageoghegan, Sylvester O'Halloran, Martin Haverty, Miley, author of a "History of the Papal States," and Archbishop Croke were alumni of the college. Cardinal Logue was professor from 1866 to 1874. There were also Irish colleges at Douay, Lille, Bordeaux, Toulouse, Nantes, and Poitiers.

2. The college at Salamanca was founded by Philip II. in 1592, at the instigation of Fr. Thomas White, S.J. It remained under the management of the Jesuits until 1767, since when the rectors have been Irish secular priests nominated by the Irish bishops and confirmed by the King of Spain. The students formerly attended lectures at the famous university of Salamanca. Many eminent Irish bishops were alumni, among whom may be mentioned Dr. Curtis, of Armagh; Dr. Murray, of Dublin; Dr. Kelly, of Tuam; and Dr. Everard, of Cashel. Dr. Curtis may be said to have owed his appointment to the services which he rendered to Wellington during the Peninsular war.

There are at present about thirty students.

Other Irish colleges were established at Seville (1612), Madrid (1629), Alcalà (1590), Santiago de Compostela (1605), and Lisbon (1593).

3. Flanders, under the rule of Spain, had also its Irish colleges for the secular and regular clergy, the chief of which were at Louvain. It is calculated that during the two centuries of their existence these colleges gave to the Church in Ireland 32 bishops and 300 priests, of whom 200 were graduates of the university. (Guilday, "English Cath. Refugees," 28 sqq.)

Besides the continental colleges there were many Irish convents and monasteries in the different countries.

"At the present day the colleges in Ireland are sufficient to supply the needs of the Church in Ireland, but the colleges on the Continent are still useful as a witness of the past, and they serve to bring a large section of the clergy of Ireland into contact with the life and thought and work of the Church in the ancient Catholic nations and the Continent." (P. Boyle, in "Cath. Enc.," Irish Colleges, from which the present article has been condensed. The story of the fate of the funds paid by the French government in compensation for the property of the Irish colleges is told by B. Ward, "Eve of Catholic Emancipation," ii. 254 sqq. and iii. 128 sqq.)

IRREGULARITY is defined as a "canonical impediment, which prevents a person from entering the ranks of the clergy, from rising to a higher order, or from exercising the order which he has received" (Gury). The term "irregular," according to the eminent canonist Phillips, first occurs in the decretals of Innocent III. An "irregularis" is one who does not fulfil the "rules" imposed upon, or the requirements which the Church makes of, those who seek to be tonsured or ordained. The same Pope distinguishes between the "nota defectus" and the "nota delicti," and this is the basis of the division of irregularities which still prevails among canonists and theologians, viz. into such as proceed from defect ("ex defectu"), and from crime ("ex delicto"). This arrangement is a convenient one, but it is not strictly scientific. In reality irregularity is always "ex defectu." It is not a penalty, and so is quite distinct from censure, deposition, or degradation. It may arise, no doubt, from crime, but only indirectly—so far, that is to say, as crime constitutes a defect in the reputation which is desirable in a clergyman. Hence repentance, sacramental absolution, and amendment do not in themselves remove the irregularity "ex delicto." We observe before going further that, though the term "irregular" is of mediaeval origin, the idea is ancient. From early times "bigamy" (in a sense to be explained presently), bodily defects, ignorance, recent reception of baptism, military service, servile condition or entanglement in worldly business, and crimes which subjected a man to public penance, have been regarded as impediments to ordination.

I. Irregularities ex Defectu.

(1) Ex Defectu Animi.—Lunatics, &c., are irregular, so are persons without sufficient knowledge. Ignorance is mentioned as a bar to ordination by Popes Hilary (Ep. 2, Mansi, tom. vii. 928) and Gregory the Great (Ep. lib. ii. 37, PL, lxxvii, 575). The Council of Trent (sess. xxiii. De Ref. c. 4) requires for the tonsure ability to read and write, with elementary religious knowledge; for minor orders acquaintance with Latin; further instruction in letters and ability to fulfil their respective duties is exacted from those who desire to be subdeacons and deacons, while a priest must have proved himself on examination fit to instruct the people, administer the sacraments, &c. Provincial synods are to provide a careful form of examination and inquiry into the knowledge and other qualities of one who is to be consecrated bishop (sess. xxiv. De Ref. c. 1). Neophytes are excluded from ordination. This defect, called "defectus fidei confirmatae," is recognized by Pope Siricius (Mansi, iii. 669), and has its justification in 1 Tim. iii. 6.

(2) Ex Defectu Corporis.—Defect which may arise either from some horrible mutilation or the like, which might cause horror in the people, or else from the want of some sense, member, &c., necessary for the performance of clerical duty. Thus one who has lost his left eye, called the "eye of the canon," because chiefly used in reading the canon of the Mass, cannot receive the priesthood. Bodily mutilation is mentioned in this connection by Popes Hilary and Gregory (Ep. 2, Mansi, vii. 928) ("in qualibet corporis parte vitiatum," Ep. lib. ii. 37). The prescriptions of the old law seem to have weighed here.

(3) Ex Defectu Natalium.—Which excludes children born out of wedlock, unless their parents have subsequently married, or unless the illegitimate person has made his profession in a religious order. Otherwise the bishop may dispense for minor orders, the dispensation for Holy Orders being reserved to the Pope, and a fresh dispensation being needed in case of promotion to the episcopate. This impediment, Phillips says, was not distinctly recognized till the eleventh century. It arose partly because in the German nations illegitimate children were without civil rights, partly because the prevalence of clerical concubinage and the frequent promotion of priests' sons to their fathers' office threatened to bring the spirit of caste into the clerical ranks. As early, however, as A.D. 845 we find a Council of Meaux (Can. 64, Hefele-Leclercq, iv. 124) prohibiting the ordination of children born before marriage to "raptores virginum aut viduarum."

(4) Ex Defectu Aetatis.—The older rule admitted very young people to the minor orders, of which then the sub-diaconate was one, but the diaconate was reserved for the thirtieth, the priesthood for the thirty-fifth, and the episcopate for the completion of the fortieth year. The decretals prescribe for the tonsure the seventh year complete, for the sub-diaconate the eighteenth year, for the diaconate the twentieth, for the priesthood the twenty-fifth year begun, for the episcopate the thirtieth year complete. The Council of Trent (sess. xxiii. De Ref. c. 12) has partially altered the rules, requiring for the sub-diaconate the twenty-third begun, and for the diaconate the twenty-fourth year similarly begun.

(5) Ex Defectu Libertatis.—Pope Leo I. (Ep. 4, PL, liv. 611) excludes slaves, and generally those under the power of others, and Innocent I. (Ep. 2, Mansi, iii. 1035)—"curiales vel quibuslibet functionibus publicis occupatos." These rules still subsist, and married persons are only excluded at least from Holy Orders, until they obtain their wife's consent, and she, if young, enters religion.

(6) Ex Defectu Sacramenti.—This irregularity affects those who have been married twice, or, having married once, were wedded to one who was not a virgin. The former part of the rule is found, as many think, in 1 Tim. iii. 2; Tit. i. 6, and certainly obtained in the Church at a very early date (see, e.g., Tertull. "De Monog." 12, PL, ii. 947). The second part of the rule was in force from the fourth century (see Ep. Siric., Mansi, iii. 670; Innocent I. Ep. 2, Mansi, iii. 1034; Hilary, Ep. 2, Mansi, iii. 928; Gregory, Ep. lib. ii. 37, lxxvii. 575). The canon law extends the prohibition to one who has continued to live with an adulterous wife, or has gone through the form of marriage after religious profession or the sub-diaconate. All such unions fail in the "sacramentum" or mystical resemblance to Christ's perfect union with His Church.

(7) Ex Defectu Lenitatis.—The early Church (see, e.g., Council of Rome 387, Hefele-Leclercq, ii. 69) would not allow soldiers to be ordained, and the canons forbid the ordination of any who, although justly, have concurred "willingly, actively, efficaciously, and proximately" in the death or mutilation of another by an action tending in its own nature to that end.

(8) Ex Defectu Famae.—This applies to persons notoriously guilty of some enormous crime, to those who are well known to have committed a crime stigmatized as infamous by the law, and to those who have been sentenced in a public court, even if they are innocent. Infamy which simply comes of notorious crime, without any judicial sentence, may cease of itself without the need of any dispensation. When a court has passed sentence, the sentence may be reversed, and the consequent irregularity disappear.

II. Ex Delicto.—It was a constant principle of the ancient Church not to admit to orders persons who had been under or had become liable to public penance (see, e.g., August. Ep. 185, § 45, PL, xxxiii. 811; the ancient collection known as "Concil. Carthag. IV.," Hefele-Leclercq, ii. 102; Greg. Magn. Ep. lib. ii. 37; Isidor. "Eccl. Offic." ii. 9). The modern law, after the disuse of the penitential system, limited irregularity ex delicto to the following cases: (1) The reception of baptism without necessity by an adult from a declared heretic; reiteration of baptism with solemn rite; receiving baptism in such circumstances; assistance thereat by a cleric. (2) Pretending solemnly to exercise a holy order never received; receiving orders in various unlawful ways—e.g. by stealth, from the bishop of another diocese without dimissorials, from a suspended, schismatical, simoniacal, or heretical bishop; receiving more than one holy order on the same day. (3) Solemnly exercising an order while bound by a censure. (4) Crime—i.e. the special crimes of public heresy and apostasy from the faith. The sons of heretics are also irregular. (5) Murder and mutilation.

III. Dispensation.—Certain irregularities—e.g. total blindness, hopeless lunacy, &c.—cannot be removed. Others—such as the defect of age and infamy (see above)—may cease of themselves. For the rest, the rule is that all irregularities which flow from any secret crime, except murder, may be removed by the bishop or by the prelates in a religious order. The Pope only and his delegates can remove those ex defectu or ex homicidio. The exceptions to these rules have been noted above. (Ferraris; Taunton.)

ITALA VETUS. [See VULGATE I.]

ITE, MISSA EST. The meaning of the word "Missa" is discussed under MASS. Here it may suffice to say, that after the Gospel the catechumens were dismissed by the deacon with the words "Ite, Missa est"; Go, you are dismissed—literally "a dismissal is made." [1] The same formula was repeated at the end of the whole Mass. In the liturgies of St. James, St. Basil, and St. Chrysostom, we find the form "Let us go in the peace of Christ," the people answering "In the name of the Lord." "Benedicamus Domino" is substituted in Masses of ferias and Sundays in the penitential seasons, "Requiescant in pace" in Masses of the dead, because these Masses were followed by penitential prayers, and by the absolution at the tomb, for which the people waited. (Benedict XIV. "De Miss."; Hefele, "Beiträge"; Fortescue, "The Mass," p. 291.)

[1] But this is denied. The formula was rather: "Si quis non communicat, det locum" (St. Gregory, Dial., ii. 23, PL, lxvi. 178); or "Si quis catechumenus est, recedat" ("Ordo Rom." i. 38).

ITINERARIA. The mediaeval books of travel, chiefly of pilgrimages to the Holy Land, are generally known as Itineraries. The earliest of these is the "Itinerarium Burdigalense," the story of the "Pilgrim of Bordeaux," who visited the Holy Land in 333–4. His description of Jerusalem is of value for the study of the topography of the city. Of far greater value and interest is the "Peregrinatio Etheriae" (Silviae ?) about fifty years later (q.v.). Arculf, a French bishop, made the journey about 670, and was wrecked on the English coast on his return. St. Adamnan, of Iona, hospitably entertained him, and received from him the account of his travels, which the saint incorporated in his work "De Locis Sanctis." Passing over other itineraries, we come to the time of the Crusades when books of this kind naturally became numerous. (See the "Library of the Palestine Pilgrims Text Society"; "Early Travels in Palestine," ed. Wright; Geyer, "Itinera Hierosolymitana saec. iv.–viii.")

ITINERARY (Itinerarium). A form of prayer consisting of the canticle Benedictus, with an antiphon, "preces," and four collects, intended for the use of clerics when setting out on a journey, and placed for their convenience at the end of the Breviary. Two of these collects are found in the Gregorian Sacramentary. The itinerary is not inserted in the older Breviaries. But Gavantus refers to an ancient Pontifical which contains an itinerary for prelates rather longer than ours, but very similar. (Gavant. tom. 11, § 69, cap. 6.)

J

JACOBINS. The Dominicans had before the Revolution three convents in Paris, of which the chief was that of St. James (Lat. Jacobus), in the Rue St. Jacques. This was considered the principal house of their order in France, and from it French preaching friars were called Jacobins. The second of their houses in Paris was in the Rue St. Honoré, between the church of St. Roch and the Place Vendôme; before the Revolution it had a noviciate and a library of thirty-two thousand volumes. The Club Breton, containing the ablest and most dangerous men in the National Assembly, began to hold its sittings in the library of the convent in the Rue St. Honoré in 1789; hence their name was soon changed to Club Jacobin. Later on, the church (of which now only the tower remains) was used as a place of meeting, and many of the worst infamies and atrocities of the Revolution were there debated and decided on.

JACOBITE CHRISTIANS. A name given to the Monophysites in Mesopotamia, Syria, Kurdistan, and East India, who are subject to the heretical Patriarch of Antioch. They have never been more than a comparatively small, poor, and scattered sect.

They call themselves Surigani, or Syrian Christians; the name Jacobite, by which they are commonly known, is derived from Jacob or James, a monk of Phasilta near Nisibis, and a disciple of the Monophysite Severus of Antioch. This monk, who was zealous in resisting the authority of the Fourth General Council held at Chalcedon and in denying the two natures in Christ, was ordained Metropolitan of Edessa by heretical bishops, and with the consent of Severus. When Severus died, in 539 (?), James consecrated his successor, and so the line of Monophysite Patriarchs of Antioch has been continued to this day. In 736 the Jacobites entered into communion with the Armenians, who also deny that there are two natures in Christ, but the peace between the two sects did not last long. On the other hand, the Jacobites, although a distinct and independent body, are in communion with the Monophysite Copts of Egypt. Though they are Monophysites in faith they are less rigid than other holders of that heresy. Their liturgy is the old rite of Jerusalem-Antioch, called the Liturgy of St. James in Syriac with Greek and Arabic additions.

The Jacobite clergy are divided into singers, readers, sub-deacons, deacons, archdeacons, priests, chorepiscopi, periodeutai, bishops, metropolitans, and patriarch; but of these the archdeacon, chorepiscopus, and periodeutes are merely nominated by the bishop without special ordination.

The Patriarch is chosen in the following manner. Three names are selected by the assembled bishops and placed in an urn beneath the altar. After Mass has been said, he whose name is first drawn is chosen Patriarch. He holds office for life, but may be deposed by the bishops if he falls away from the tenets of the Jacobite Church. He is enthroned with the title "Patriarch of the City of Antioch, and of the whole dominion of the Apostolic chair." He has the right to name and consecrate the other bishops and metropolitans, and the blessing of the chrism is reserved to him; but before he can exercise jurisdiction, his appointment must be confirmed by a firman of the Sultan. The ancient rule, observed down to 1222, forbade anyone already a bishop to be chosen Patriarch. Now, generally speaking, it is a bishop who is chosen, so that no further consecration is needed. Since 878 it has been the custom for the Patriarch to take a new name on election, and since 1293 that of Ignatius, the martyred Bishop of Antioch, has always been adopted. At first the Patriarch had no fixed residence; in 1166 Amida, the modern Diarbekir, became the patriarchal residence, and at the close of the fifteenth century it was transferred to the monastery of Zapharan or St. Ananias, near Mardin. The Patriarch is supported partly by the monastery, partly by a contribution of grain from all the Jacobite congregations.

Next comes the Maphrian,[1] a dignity which arose in the seventh century, when the Jacobites gave the title of Katholikos or Primate of the East, held since Justinian's time by the Metropolitan of Seleucia and Ctesiphon, to one of their own bishops. The first Maphrian, Maruthos, appointed in 629, had twelve bishops in Arabia and Persia subject to him, and over them he had quasi-patriarchal power, though he himself was nominated by the Patriarch. At present the dignity is merely titular.

The metropolitans are distinct in name only from the other bishops. The bishops, who are usually taken from the monks, are very ignorant, rarely preach, and, though they read, scarcely understand the Syriac of their ritual. The archdeacon, as syncellos, is the chief representative of the bishop in settling disputes between the clergy, &c. Formerly there were twenty metropolitans and 103 bishops. The number has fallen since to eight metropolitans and three bishops, the Metropolitan of Jerusalem being Maphrian.

The secular priests have to recite the prayers of their Beth-gaza or Breviary daily, and to administer the sacraments, but they support themselves in part by agriculture, trade, &c. They may be married men, but cannot contract a second marriage. The Jacobite monasteries, once exceedingly numerous, are now comparatively few. The rabban or abbot is chosen by the monks of his house, but the election must be confirmed by the bishop. The religious observe perpetual abstinence from meat, and, except in sickness, from wine. They keep four fasts besides Lent: viz. fifty days in honour of St. Peter and St. Paul, fourteen days in honour of the Blessed Virgin's Assumption, twenty-five in honour of Christ's birth, and the Niniviticum, or fast of three days, at the beginning of the third week before Lent. In other respects their mode of life is most severe.

In a quarter of their own at Mardin, a curious community of about 100 families are loosely attached to the Jacobite Church. They are descendants of the Shemsiel, or worshippers of the sun, and in 1762 the pasha inquired about their religion, and told them no toleration was granted except to those who possessed divine books—i.e. to Mahometans, Jews, or Christians. Thereupon some embraced the faith of Islam, the rest were about to be executed, when the Jacobite bishop interceded for them, and afterwards induced them to join his church. They are baptized Christians and conform to the Jacobite rites, but they only intermarry among themselves and have customs and ceremonies of their own. JAMES, ST., LITURGY OF. [See LITURGIES, p. 529]

JANSENISM. It is very difficult to define Jansenism, or even to describe it in general terms, and therefore still more difficult to give a compendious history of the movement. Properly speaking, it was a heresy which consisted in denying the freedom of the will and the possibility of resisting divine grace. But from the very beginning Jansenius and his followers had many objects in view, quite distinct from their opinions on the efficacy of grace. Perhaps the best description of Jansenism is that it was a professed attempt to restore the ancient doctrine and discipline of the Church. The Reformers professed to restore apostolic doctrine and discipline by making new churches; the Jansenists wished to remain in the Catholic Roman Church, and to reform it from within. The Reformers appealed to Scripture and made light of tradition. To the Jansenists the Fathers were all in all, though, practically, St. Augustine, and Western Fathers under his influence, were taken as the sole representatives of the Church's doctrinal tradition, and Jansenist contempt was reserved for the mediaeval Schoolmen. This position of the Jansenists within the Church occasions fresh difficulty in treating of their history. They called themselves Catholics, and treated the existence of a Jansenist sect as a mere phantom, invented to trouble consciences and calumniate pious Catholics. Nobody admitted he was a Jansenist, and the Jansenist tendency displayed itself in so many ways, in attempts to correct doctrines, devotions, discipline, more or less established, that it is often no easy matter to decide where the reproach of Jansenism was deserved. Undoubtedly, some Catholics were far too ready to narrow the limits of orthodoxy, and to charge their opponents with Jansenism. Thus the "Bibliothèque Janséniste," which appeared in 1722 and 1735, was placed on the Index in 1744, and, ten years later, the new edition, entitled

[1] "Mafryânâ means 'fructifier.' Maruthâ, the first Mafrian, made Tagrith a fruitful soil of Jacobitism. The name, first given to him as a compliment, became a regular title." (Fortescue, Lesser Eastern Churches, p. 340, note 2.)

"Dictionnaire des Livres Jansénistes," met with the same fate. This book, ascribed to the Jesuit Colonna, stigmatizes even the great Augustinian theologians, Noris and Berti, and others, as Jansenists. In this article we propose to trace the different manifestations of Jansenism in chronological order, paying special attention to the authoritative condemnations of the Church.

1. Jansenius and his Book.—Cornelius Jansen (Jansenius) was born in 1585, at Accoy, in the Dutch province of Leerdam; studied at Utrecht, Louvain, and Paris; became connected with several disciples of Baius (e.g. James Baius and James Jansen), and, from 1604, was the intimate friend of John du Verger de Hauranne, born in 1581, and better known as the Abbé de St. Cyran. Jansen, who taught for some time at Bayonne, till, in 1617, he became professor at Louvain, devoted himself to the study of St. Augustine, while his friend Hauranne, now Abbé of St. Cyran, near Poitiers, took on himself the task of depicting the ancient constitution of the Church. Jansen made several journeys to the Spanish Court, as representative of the Louvain University, was promoted to the see of Ypres in 1635, and died May 6, 1638. Two years after his death, Frommond published Jansen's posthumous work, "Augustinus, seu Doctrina S. Augustini de Humanae Naturae Sanitate, Aegritudine, Medicina, adversus Pelagianos et Massilienses," Lovanii, 1640, tom. 4. Jansen had studied St. Augustine for twenty years. He submitted the book to the Pope's judgment, though he could not believe that it contained doctrinal error, but this declaration was suppressed by the editor. The work falls into three great divisions, treating (1) of the history of the Pelagian heresy; (2) of reason and authority in theological matters, the grace of Adam and the angels, of fallen nature, of mere nature (natura pura); (3) of redeeming grace, and the errors of the Semipelagians and some moderns. The following is a sketch of the doctrinal system maintained in the book.

Since the Fall, man's will is entirely dominated by a double attraction, viz. the heavenly attraction, or pleasure (delectatio), which leads to good, the earthly attraction, which induces to evil, and the will necessarily follows the attraction which is stronger at the moment. Jansenius did not deny the freedom of the will in express terms, but he utterly rejected the Catholic notion of freedom, viz. the power to choose at the time good or evil (libertas contradictionis), and asserted merely the existence of freedom from external constraint (libertas a coactione). He also destroyed all belief in grace merely sufficient, as Catholic theologians understand it: i.e. there was, according to him, no grace which enabled a man to perform a good action, and which failed, or could fail, to produce its effect from defect in correspondence on the part of the agent. The grace which a man did not follow might have been sufficient in other circumstances, viz. if the impulse to evil had not been so strong; but it was insufficient relatively to the force on the other side. If grace, or the impulse to good, be represented by 6, the temptation, or impulse to evil, by 6½, the agent must needs sin; if the proportions were reversed, he necessarily did the good proposed to him. Hence even the just are not always able to fulfil God's commandments (see Prop. i. below); interior grace is irresistible (Prop. ii.); there is no freedom from interior necessity, but only from exterior compulsion (Prop. iii.). Further, he held that the error of the Semipelagians lay in making grace resistible (Prop. iv.), and in maintaining that Christ died for all.

2. The History of Jansenism down to the Constitution of Innocent X. in 1653.—The book excited great attention in the Low Countries and in France when a second edition was issued in 1641. In the same year it was condemned by the Roman Inquisition, and, in the year following, by Urban VIII., in general terms, as renewing the errors of Baius. The authenticity of Urban's bull was disputed; Flemish bishops, headed by Boonen, archbishop of Malines, and the University of Louvain, resisted its publication for a considerable time; and, although the French king and the Sorbonne ranged themselves on the side of authority, "the disciples of St. Augustine"—as the Jansenists styled themselves—were numerous and powerful. The learned Antoine Arnauld, born in 1612, and after Richelieu's death doctor of the Sorbonne, was especially active. He signalized himself in the early stage of the controversy by attacking Isaac Habert, a Sorbonniste and champion of the Catholic doctrine on grace.

In 1649 Nicolas Cornet submitted Five Propositions from the "Augustinus" to the Sorbonne, and a commission was nominated to examine them. Friends of the Jansenist doctrine, among whom Louis de St. Amour was most prominent, appealed to the Parliament, of which body also many favoured Jansenism. The Parliament prohibited the Sorbonne from taking any further step, and committed the inquiry to the assembly of the clergy. On April 12, 1651, eighty-five bishops wrote to Innocent X., begging him to pronounce judgment on the Five Propositions, although eleven bishops protested against this immediate appeal to Rome, as subversive of the Gallican liberties. The Pope appointed five cardinals and thirteen theologians to decide the question, and after two years had been occupied in this task, during which the Jansenists were heard at length in their own defence, a bull appeared (May 19, 1653), in which a definite sentence was given. Prop. I.—"Some commandments of God are impossible to just men, wishing and striving (to observe them) according to the strength which they have at the time; moreover they lack grace, which would make them (the commandments) possible." Prop. II. — "No resistance in the state of fallen nature is ever made to interior grace." Prop. III.—"For merit and demerit in the state of fallen nature, man does not need freedom from necessity, but only freedom from compulsion." Prop. IV. — "The Semipelagians admitted the need of interior prevenient grace for each act, even for the beginning of faith; and they were heretical on this account, viz. because they held that grace to be such that the human will could resist or correspond to it"—were condemned as heretical. Prop. V.—"It is Semi-pelagian to say that Christ died, or shed His blood for all men together," as false, rash, &c., and, if meant in the sense that Christ died only for the elect, as heretical. Shortly after it was issued, an edict of the French king commanded the reception of this bull; the French bishops, assembled at Paris, thanked the Pope for it, and it was registered by the Sorbonne and the Louvain University. The famous Franciscan Wadding, formerly an advocate of the Five Propositions, submitted to the judgment of the Church.

Meanwhile the Jansenist spirit had been active in other directions. St. Cyran ("Lettres Chrétiennes et Spirituelles," Paris, 1645), recurring, as he said, to the primitive practice, held it inadvisable to confess venial sins, or the number and circumstances altering the species of mortal sins, while he required the utmost perfection and purity of conscience for communion, or even for assisting at Mass. Under his direction, some of the nuns belonging to the Convent of Port Royal, near Paris, actually died without the sacraments. St. Cyran also published a "Brief Explanation of the Mysteries of Faith," and an edition of "St. Augustine on Virginity," with notes inimical to vows. He was imprisoned by Richelieu on suspicion of false teaching, was liberated on that statesman's death, and died, revered as a martyr by his followers, in 1643. A large number had come under his influence —Singlin, his successor in the direction of Port Royal, Antoine Arnauld, his no less gifted sister Angélique, &c. Of these, Antoine Arnauld published his famous book "De la fréquente Communion" (Paris, 1643) in the year that St. Cyran died. The object of the book was to mend the relaxed discipline of the Church. It urged the duty of imposing public penance for mortal sins, even if secret, and of preparing sinners for absolution and communion by a long course of rigorous discipline. It was approved by sixteen bishops and twenty doctors of the Sorbonne, who, however, had not read the preface with which it appeared, and which gave special offence. Some ecclesiastics, e.g. Du Hamel, in the diocese of Sens, ventured to reduce the Jansenist theology to practice, and restored public penance.

3. Jansenism from the Bull of Innocent X. in 1653 to the Death of Arnauld in 1694.—The condemnation of the Five Propositions by the Pope necessitated a change in Jansenist tactics, for the Jansenists resolved to remain in external communion with the Church. Some appealed to a general council, but Arnauld was now the real leader of the party, and he hit upon a device which became the main point of contention for many years. He was willing to reject the Five Propositions, but he denied that they were to be found in Jansenius, or, if so found, that they bore the sense imputed to them in the Papal Constitution. Bishops and theologians disproved Arnauld's assertion, and the Pope reprobated it September 29, 1654. This only led Arnauld to develop his views more thoroughly. The Duke of Liancourt was refused absolution in the parish of St. Sulpice, because of his connection with the Jansenists, and Arnauld addressed two letters to the peer. In his second letter ("Seconde Lettre de M. Arnauld, docteur de Sorbonne, à un Duc et Pair de France, pour servir de réponse à plusieurs écrits qui ont été publiés contre la première lettre sur ce qui est arrivé à un seigneur de la cour dans une paroisse de Paris." Paris, 1655) he distinguished between the question of law (question de droit) and that of fact (question de fait); in other words, between the question whether the Five Propositions as condemned by the Church were erroneous, and the question whether the book of Jansenius contained them in the sense condemned. On the former question he admitted the Church's infallibility and the duty of entire submission; the latter, he said, was a question of historical fact on which the Church might err, and it was enough if the faithful received her decision upon it with "respectful silence." We may remark in passing that nobody claims infallibility for the Church in facts merely historical, but here was a question intimately, nay, indissolubly, connected with doctrine. Of what avail would the Church's infallibility be if she were liable to error in interpreting the natural sense of books and propositions submitted to her, and so of mistaking truth for error, error for truth? We say the natural sense, for again it must not be supposed that the Church professes to read the heart of an author. He may have used words in a non-natural sense, he may have suffered from some mental confusion or aberration, and on all this the judgment belongs to God alone, to God who searches the heart. But the Church can judge of the natural and obvious sense which words bear in a book, nor could she execute her divine commission to feed the flock of Christ if she had no power to distinguish between wholesome and poisonous pasture.

Generally speaking, the Jansenists accepted the means of escape which Arnauld had suggested. The nuns of Port Royal, however, did so with difficulty, and only when overpersuaded by the Abbess Angélique Arnauld. Among the distinguished men of the party who took up their abode in the Convent of Port Royal des Champs after the nuns had moved to Port Royal de Paris, Pascal utterly refused to accept the compromise. This did not hinder him, however, from accomplishing a mighty work in the Jansenist interest. In his "Provincial Letters" (Paris, 1656), published under the pseudonym Louis Montalte, he attacked the Jesuits for relaxed morals and defended the Jansenist doctrine of grace with a refinement of style and delicacy of wit which have never been surpassed in any literature. There were many members of the party more learned than Pascal, but he had no equal in genius. Nothing can be more amazing than the interest with which he invests the dry controversies on grace, and although no doubt he was often unfair to the casuists whom he held up to scorn and detestation, and although many of his charges were rebutted—e.g. by the Jesuit Father Daniel—the charm of his book led his readers captive, and the answers were read by few. No one who has read the "Provincial Letters" is likely to lose the impression which they make; it may be said without exaggeration that they touch every chord of the human heart, and the sudden transitions from logic and wit to sublime and pathetic eloquence produce an effect which can neither be resisted nor effaced. Pascal's "Pensées, Fragments, et Lettres" are a lasting monument of deep and subtle thought, and have done good work for religion, though even these are marred here and there by Jansenist tendencies. Pascal died young, in 1662. His friend Nicole, also one of the solitaries of Port Royal, wrote chiefly on moral subjects in French which is still esteemed as a model of correct writing. It must be remembered that the work of the Jansenist writers was very far from being wholly evil. Arnauld and his friends defended many Catholic doctrines against the Calvinists, and the elaborate work "Perpétuité de la Foi," by Arnauld and Nicole, is perhaps the very best, as it certainly is the most learned and exhaustive, defence of the Catholic doctrine on the Eucharist. Everyone knows what important contributions the Port Royal Jansenists made to the sciences of logic, grammar, and philosophy, nor is it the least among their many titles to enduring fame that the great historian Tillemont was their pupil.

The Jansenists were not left long in peace. Arnauld's thesis on the distinction between the "question de droit" and the "question de fait" was condemned by the Sorbonne, and he, with sixty other doctors, was expelled from that society. "To-day," he writes to his beloved sister Angélique, "they are erasing my name from the list of doctors, but I hope our Lord will not erase it from the number of His servants." In a Constitution of October 16, 1656, Alexander VII. declared that the Five Propositions were condemned "in the sense of the author," and in 1665 imposed on all ecclesiastical persons the subscription of a "formulary" consisting of a solemn profession so to accept the Papal condemnation. Four bishops,—those of Alet, Angers, Beauvais, and Pamiers—refused to sign except with the evasive distinction between "droit" and "fait." After nearly two years of strife and much intrigue, Clement IX., early in 1669, restored the bishops to his favour, and this step, known as "the peace of Clement," was hailed by the Jansenists as a triumph for themselves and a revocation of past censures. In reality the Pope was led to believe that the bishops had made an unqualified submission. The Jansenists were jubilant again when Innocent XI. in 1679 censured a large number of propositions extracted from the lax casuists. Nobody certainly who reads them will wonder at the scandal and the reaction which lax theology created. What, e.g., is to be said of a writer professedly Christian who held that "frequent confession and communion, even in those who live like heathen, is a mark of predestination" (Prop. 56)?

But the peace of which the Jansenists dreamed did not last. The Flemish bishops, in their zeal against error, had required the "formulary" to be signed with additions of their own. These additions, as well as vague accusations of Jansenism, the Pope forbade in a brief of 1694, but at the same time he did strictly require subscription to the original "formulary," and the condemnation of the Five Propositions "in the obvious sense which they bear." A few months later "the great Arnauld," as his disciples loved to call him, died in the Low Countries, and his friend Nicole followed him the year after. Arnauld's sister Angélique was gone more than thirty years before; the Society of Port Royal des Champs had been scattered, while the nuns had been forbidden to take novices and ordered to dismiss their pupils. It was during our next period, in 1709, that the nuns were all expelled; the convent itself was utterly destroyed in 1710.

4. Jansenism under Quesnel, down to the publication of the Bull Unigenitus in 1713.—Pasquier Quesnel was born at Paris in 1634, and ordained priest in 1659. At an early age he had entered the Oratory founded by Cardinal Bérulle, in which Jansenist principles had become dominant, and devoted himself to learned pursuits. In 1671 he published "Moral Reflexions on the Gospels," and in 1675 a learned edition of St. Leo, which was censured by Clement X. On account of his refusal to sign the formulary he was first banished to Orleans, then in 1684 expelled from the Oratory, and finally fled to Brussels, whither Arnauld had gone in 1679. Here he extended his "Moral Reflexions on the Gospels" to Reflexions on the whole of the New Testament. This enlarged work appeared in two editions more and more Jansenist than those of 1687 and 1692. It was in Quesnel's arms that Arnauld died, and to him he entrusted the care of the party. Gerberon, a Benedictine of the Congregation of St. Maur, was Quesnel's companion in prison and exile, and laboured long and zealously in the same cause.

Clement XI. (Pope from 1700 to 1721) issued two bulls against Jansenism, each of which marks an epoch in the controversy. The former of these, the "Vineam Domini," was occasioned by the "Cas de Conscience." In 1701 a Jansenist consulted the Sorbonne on the lawfulness of absolving a dying ecclesiastic who was not convinced that the Five Propositions as condemned by the Church were to be found in the book of Jansenius. Forty doctors, among whom were Dupin and Natalis Alexander, signed a document affirming that absolution should be given. Bossuet's influence led nearly all these doctors (not, however, Dupin) to retract their opinion, and Noailles, archbishop of Paris, ranged himself, after some wavering, on Bossuet's side. Dupin was banished; Quesnel, who had addressed a violent letter to Noailles, was imprisoned by the Archbishop of Malines, but escaped to Amsterdam. In 1705 the Pope, at the instance of the French Court, gave a fresh decision on the matter. In the "Vineam Domini" he renewed the Constitutions of Innocent X. and Alexander VII. and the Briefs of Clement IX. and Innocent XII., and again insisted that Catholics were bound to give full and undoubting assent to the Church's decision on the matter of fact, a "respectful silence" being by no means sufficient. In 1711, after difficulties and delays occasioned chiefly by Colbert, archbishop of Rouen, the Pope was satisfied that the French episcopate had accepted the decree.

Worse troubles were in store. Quesnel's "Moral Reflexions" had been proscribed by the Pope in 1708, but the Parliament of Paris objected to any prohibition of French books except by their own authority, and Noailles the weak-minded Archbishop of Paris was swayed by the Jansenist Renaudot (now remembered chiefly for his admirable translation and edition of the Oriental Liturgies, still the classical work on the subject), De la Tour, general of the Oratory, Le Noir, Boileau, and Duguet. The king, however, and many French bishops were waiting anxiously for the Pope to speak out more fully. Fénelon informed him of the way Jansenism spread in France and in neighbouring States. In 1713 the expected answer came from Rome. The bull "Unigenitus" condemned 101 propositions from the later editions of Quesnel's book, and furnished a more complete exhibition of the Church's mind on the controversy than any which had hitherto appeared. Forty-three of the condemned propositions concern grace and predestination; twenty-eight treat of the theological virtues; thirty deal with the Church, with discipline, and with the sacraments. The errors of the first class need not detain us here. As regards those of the second, Quesnel was condemned for holding that all love except the supernatural love of God was evil, that without this love there could be no true hope, observance of the law or religion, that every prayer made by a sinner was sinful. The errors of the third class consisted in Quesnel's assertion that the Church was made up of the elect alone, and that the chief pastors must not excommunicate except with the consent of the whole body; that all without exception should read the Bible; that the faithful at Mass should join their voice to that of the priest;[1] that sinners should not hear Mass at all; that absolution should be deferred till penance had been done. No note was affixed to the particular propositions, some of which plainly are not positively heretical, while others, apart from their context and the spirit by which they are animated, are capable of a good sense. But they are condemned in mass (in globo), as respectively false, captious, ill-sounding, scandalous, impious, &c., and even as heretical.

5. The last Struggles of the Jansenists.—Quesnel was a very old man when the "Unigenitus" appeared, and he died but a few years later, in 1719. With him the significance of Jansenism as a great theological and literary movement came to an end, for no intellectual leader arose to replace the great men who had passed away. Partly, no doubt, Jansenism lost its youthful vigour by the same law of decay which seems to affect all religious and political parties. Enthusiasm dies out, and with it, to a certain extent, self-sacrifice: men of genius leave no successors. But, besides, it had become very hard for a man of sense to join the Jansenist ranks. It had grown clearer and clearer that the whole teaching authority of the Church had uttered itself against the Jansenist doctrine. Those who had already committed themselves might be content with the evasions to which the later Jansenists had recourse; they might agree that Papal decisions were worthless because a few bishops had not assented to them, or because the vast majority of the episcopate which had assented were deficient in learning, were corrupted by their belief in Papal infallibility, had forgotten to consult the clergy of the second order, &c., &c. They might require an absolute unanimity on the part of the episcopate, or make the Church's infallibility depend on an assent of the laity which could not possibly be ascertained. Scarcely anyone, we say, could accept these evasions except under stress of circumstances, and more logical minds were sure to reason more boldly and consistently, and to reject the Church's authority altogether. Jansenism in its sincere form ended in fanatical superstition. Miracles were supposed to be worked at the tomb of a Jansenist deacon, François de Paris, who died in 1727, and was buried in the cemetery of St. Médard. Accounts of his life and miracles were printed at Utrecht, Brussels, Paris, and Cologne. Crowds made pilgrimages to his grave, and many fell into ridiculous ecstasies and horrible convulsions which gained for the Jansenists the name of "Convulsionnaires." Louis XV. closed the cemetery in 1732. A melancholy end, surely, for the party of Pascal and Arnauld.

But we have been anticipating. Louis XIV., always a determined foe of Jansenism, died in 1715; his great-grandson, Louis XV., was a child of five, and under the Regency freer rein was given to the opponents of the Roman decisions. In 1717 the Bishops of Mirepoix, Montpellier, Boulogne, and Séez notified to the Sorbonne their appeal against the "Unigenitus" to a future council. The "Appellants," as they were called, were supported by the Universities of Rheims and Nantes, by the Sorbonne, although it had previously accepted the Papal bull, by the bishops of Verdun and Pamiers, by Noailles, Archbishop of Paris, and practically by the Regent. In 1721 the Bishops of Séez, Boulogne, Montpellier, Pamiers, Macon, Auxerre, Tournay, addressed a letter to the new Pope, Innocent XIII., which he condemned in the following year as schismatical and full of the heretical spirit. In 1723 the assembly of the French clergy besought the king to declare the two bulls, "Vineam Domini" and "Unigenitus," binding laws of Church and State; and in 1727 Soanen, bishop of Séez, was suspended with the Pope's sanction by the provincial council of Embrun and banished. But confusion and strife still prevailed in the French Church. Twelve bishops, headed by Noailles, protested against the sentence of Embrun. However, the beginning of the end was now near, so far as episcopal opposition to the bull went. Noailles recanted in 1728, shortly before his death, and the next year the Sorbonne again accepted the "Unigenitus." These steps were followed in 1730 by a vigorous declaration on the part of the king against the Jansenists.

Here we may close the history of Jansenism as a theological system, for an account is given in separate articles of the Jansenist Church in Holland, and of the council of Pistoia. Unhappily, the spirit of opposition to the Church which Jansenism had aroused was powerful for evil long after Jansenism itself had ceased to be dangerous. From 1731 down to about 1757, the Parliaments inflicted a long series of persecutions on the clergy who, faithful to their duty, refused the sacraments to the Appellants. De Beaumont, archbishop of Paris, was banished from his see because he would not abandon Catholic principles on this point. And even at the beginning of the Revolution which swept the ancient Church and Monarchy of France away, the Jansenist Camus undertook the thankless task of justifying the notorious "Civil Constitution of the Clergy" on theological principles.

(The dogmatic theologians deal with Jansenism in their treatises De Deo Creante et Elevante and De Gratia. On the subject generally see De Becdelièvre in DAp. (good bibliography) and Forget in "Cath. Enc." The facts in this article are taken from Cardinal Hergenröther's "Church History," vol. iii., which contains a very full account of the enormous literature on the Jansenist controversies.)

JANSENIST CHURCH OF HOLLAND. The revolt of the Dutch Provinces from Spanish rule led to measures of repression against the Dutch Catholics. The Church property was confiscated and the hierarchy overthrown. The first and last Archbishop of Utrecht died in 1580, just before even the public worship of the Catholic religion was forbidden by William of Orange; two successors nominated by Spain could not reach their sees, and, except at Utrecht and Haarlem, the members of the ancient chapters were nearly all dead. Accordingly, in 1583, Gregory XIII. appointed a Vicar Apostolic for the Dutch mission, and in 1597 this dignitary, who of course possessed only a delegated authority, which could be withdrawn at the mere will of the Pope, was subjected to the supervision of the nuncio at Brussels. A step which afterwards led to important results was taken by Philip Roven van Ardensal, Vicar Apostolic of Holland and Archbishop of Philippi in partibus. In 1631 he formed the remaining canons of Utrecht, along with certain parish priests and other ecclesiastics, into a collegiate body. We shall speak of this body for the sake of brevity as the Utrecht Chapter, but it must be remembered it had no just claim to the rights and privileges of a cathedral chapter. Later on in the same century, French Jansenists fled to Holland and imbued many of the Dutch Catholics with their principles. Even a Vicar Apostolic, Peter Kodde, consecrated at Brussels in 1689, supported the Jansenist cause, and was suspended by Clement XI. in 1702. Jansenist intrigues led to the banishment of Van Kock, whom the Pope had named Pro-Vicar, from Holland.

Kodde organized a schism, and, when

Rome deposed him altogether, declared that he had been elected Archbishop of Utrecht by the chapter of that see. He refused to sign the formulary of Alexander VII., and died without recantation in 1710. Fifty-two missions and eighty priests fell from Catholic communion, while Quesnel, Gerberon, Petitpied, and other French Jansenists were allowed to labour in the interests of their party by the Protestant government. The Chapter of Utrecht refused obedience to successive Vicars Apostolic, and joined the French Appellants in their resistance to the "Unigenitus." They were able to keep up a supply of schismatical priests by sending their candidates with dimissorials to French Appellant bishops.

In 1723 the Chapter of Utrecht chose Steenhoven, formerly Vicar General, Archbishop of Utrecht, and he was consecrated by Varlet, suspended Bishop of Babylon in partibus. Two years later the Pope excommunicated all who took part in this act, and the great canonist Van Espen, who defended its legality, had to leave Louvain in consequence. Altogether, Varlet consecrated no fewer than four Archbishops of Utrecht, all of them excommunicated by Rome, and when he himself died, Meindarts, the last archbishop whom he consecrated, established the schismatical bishopric of Haarlem in 1742, and that of Deventer in 1752. In 1763 Meindarts held a synod at Utrecht and sent the acts to Rome, where of course they were rejected. Meindarts' successor was consecrated by the schismatical Bishop of Haarlem, and so the succession of bishops and priests has been maintained down to our own day. But the schismatics have been constantly diminishing, and the Bishop of Deventer is obliged to officiate as a parish priest, not having any Jansenists in his diocese. The Dutch Jansenists, who call themselves "Old Roman Catholics of Holland," now number about 8000 souls. They protested against the definition of the Immaculate Conception in 1854, and the Papal Infallibility in 1870, and they attracted some notice when Loos, so-called Archbishop of Utrecht, consecrated Dr. Reinkens bishop for the German "Old Catholics."[1] They are completely overshadowed by the great and flourishing Catholic Church of Holland. Since 1851, when Pius IX. restored the Dutch hierarchy, there has been a real Archbishop of Utrecht, with Bishops of Haarlem, Hertogenbosch, Breda, and Roermond.

The Dutch Jansenists are in many ways an interesting body. Unlike most other sects, they remain just where they were on their separation from Rome. They have retained valid orders, the celibacy of the clergy, the Mass and other services in Latin. They are known in Holland as old-Roman (oud-Roomsch), for they profess to be not only Catholics but Roman Catholics, and they acknowledge the Pope as the visible head of the Church, out of which there is no salvation, and one of their synods condemned the doctrine that the schismatic Greeks are part of the Church of Christ. The Blessed Sacrament is reserved in their churches. The writer of this article has carefully read recent editions of their prayer-book, corresponding to our "Garden of the Soul," their popular catechism and their hymn-book, procured for him by the kindness of a friend, and has found them to be exactly, or almost exactly, like English Catholic books of the same sort, or, to speak more accurately, like what our English Catholic books were some fifty years ago, before many modern devotions were introduced. Thus, in a short summary of belief appended to a sort of layman's Missal, published at Utrecht in 1879, the unity of the Church under the Pope, the seven Sacraments, the duty of prayer for the souls in Purgatory, the Invocation of Saints, and especially of the Blessed Virgin, Mother of God and of all Christians, are taught just in the language familiar to us. The "Hail Mary" occurs in the morning and evening devotion, and two hymns are addressed to the Blessed Virgin in the hymn-book. The Ordinary of the Mass is given in Dutch, though of course the priest recites it in Latin. We have been unable to discover any trace of heresy in these books. The Jansenists, we believe, as a rule, practise their religion by hearing Mass, going to confession, &c., and are under strict discipline, absolution being sometimes deferred for a very long time. The friend already referred to was told by the Catholic Archbishop of Utrecht that conversions of Jansenists to Catholicism are very rare. He himself had known of only one instance at Utrecht during a ministry of nearly fifty years in that city. (See Allmang, "L'Église Janséniste d'Utrecht"; Malet "L'Église Vieille-Catholique d'Utrecht"; Van Aken, "Le Schisme Janséniste de Hollande.")

JANUARIUS, ST., MIRACLE OF. Januarius, Bishop of Benevento, was beheaded for the faith near Puteoli (Pozzuoli) in the persecution of Diocletian, and his relics after a time were removed to Naples. In the great church there are preserved his head and some of his blood, which, as his Acts relate, was gathered up from the ground by a poor woman at the time of the martyrdom, and enclosed in two small glass phials (ampullae) of peculiar construction. On several occasions it is recorded that his relics were carried in procession during eruptions of Vesuvius, and that danger was averted from the city. The celebrated standing miracle of the liquefaction of the blood of St. Januarius consists in this: that when the dried-up, congealed blood in the phials, which is ordinarily hard and solid and in several pieces, is brought near to the head (the phials, or one of them, being placed on the altar, and prayer being made to God), the blood, after a longer or shorter interval, is usually seen to become liquid and flow, and bubbles to arise on its surface. Among many other eye-witnesses, the learned and gifted Picus of Mirandola says: "I saw that blood with my own eyes . . . when the head was brought near to it, grow red, melt, and bubble up as if it had been newly shed from the veins." (See the "Commentarius Praevius" in the Acta SS., vol. vi., of September, where the whole question is fully discussed; "Catholic Magazine," July, 1831; Thurston in "Cath. Enc."; Cavène in DAp. and "Le Célèbre Miracle de S. Janvier à Naples et à Pozzoles.")

JERONYMITES (HIERONYMITAE). The example of St. Jerome, who spent four years in the Syrian desert, wrestling with the powers of evil and his own irregular thoughts, was followed by great numbers of holy men in the Middle Ages, who passed under the general name of Hermits of St. Jerome or Jeronymites. Hélyot, the historian of the Monastic Orders, distinguishes four Congregations of Jeronymites, of which the firstw as incomparably more important than the others. These are—

1. The Hermits of Spain. Disciples of the Blessed Thomas of Siena, a brother of the third order of St. Francis, passing into Spain about the middle of the fourteenth century, lived at first like hermits, but, afterwards deciding for the coenobitic life, were approved in 1374 by Gregory XI., who gave them the rule of St. Austin. Ferdinand de Guadalajara was their first prior; his convent at St. Bartholomew de Lupiana in Castile was always regarded as the principal house of the order. Another division of these hermits from Italy settled in Valencia, adopted the life in common about the same time as their brethren in Castile, and in the course of time founded several convents, the fame of which spread through Europe. These were (1) Our Lady of Guadalupe in Estremadura (of which we shall speak presently); (2) that commonly called St. Just, but more accurately the convent of St. Jerome at Yuste, near Placencia, to which Charles V. retired after his abdication; (3) St. Laurence of the Escorial, near Madrid, built and adorned on a majestic plan by Philip II.; and (4) Belem, near Lisbon, the burial-place of the royal family of Portugal. Of the magnificent convent of Our Lady of Guadalupe, famous for its wonder-working image, Hélyot, writing early in the eighteenth century, says: "The house is so large and spacious that when Philip II. passed by it in 1560 on his way to the war of Granada with the Archduke Rodolph, afterwards Emperor . . . these princes resided there for twenty days with all their court, without causing the least inconvenience to the monks, who are a hundred and twenty in number . . . The alms received are very considerable, and serve for some portion of the maintenance of the large number of religious, of a seminary of forty clerical students, who are here taught the humanities and the exercises of a clerical life, of two hospitals for men and women adjoining the monastery, and of a great number of servants and workmen in all kinds of trades. The hospital for men is served by more than forty attendants, and that for women by an equal number of Oblates; and without counting the pilgrims, of whom as many as two thousand sometimes arrive in a day, and who are entertained during three days in the convent, the establishment feeds more than seven hundred persons daily."

In 1415, when the first chapter general was held, there were twenty-five houses of Jeronymites in Spain and Portugal.

2. The Hermits of the Observance, or of Lombardy. This branch of the Jeronymites was founded by the prior Lope de Olmedo, who, not being able to persuade his monks at Guadalajara to give up certain relaxations, went to Rome (1424), and, being cordially received by Martin V., ultimately established in Lombardy and other parts of Italy a flourishing congregation of Jeronymites, whose chief house was at Ospitaletto, near Lodi. In Hélyot's time this Congregation had seventeen houses in Italy. It still exists, and in 1910 had eight houses, of which the chief is S. Onofrio, near St. Peter's in Rome. (See the "Annuario," and other official catalogues of religious.)

3. The Hermits of the Blessed Peter of Pisa. Pietro Gambacorti, born in 1355 of a noble Pisan family, quitted the world about 1377, and lived as a hermit at Montebello in Umbria. Many joined him; he made his followers practise a very austere rule, and formed them into a congregation under the patronage of St. Jerome. When Hélyot wrote, there were forty houses of this order in Italy, besides a few in Tyrol and Bavaria.

4. The Hermits of Fiesole. The founder of this branch, Carlo di Montegraneli, was born about 1340. They were suppressed by Clement IX. in 1668, along with the Jesuats.

JERUSALEM. [See HOLY PLACES.]

JERUSALEM, LITURGY OF. [See LITURGIES, p. 529.]

JERUSALEM, PATRIARCHATE OF. The first bishop of Jerusalem was James the Less, who was appointed by the Apostles (Euseb. "H.E." ii. 23). After his death the Apostles and disciples of Christ chose Simeon, son of Clopas, a relation of our Lord, to fill the vacant see (Euseb. "H.E." iii. 11). It is a natural inference from the words of Hegesippus (Euseb. "H.E." iii. 32) that Jerusalem at that time had a prominence over all the churches in Palestine, which were, like the church of Jerusalem itself, mostly composed of Jewish Christians. Things were entirely altered when Hadrian punished the Jewish revolt by the destruction of the holy city, and replaced it (A.D. 130) by Aelia Capitolina. The old Judaeo-Christian community was scattered; Hadrian made it an offence for a Jew to enter the new city built on the site, or rather part of the site, of Jerusalem, so that there was no hope of fresh converts from Judaism, and a series of gentile bishops began, of whom Mark was the first (Euseb. "H.E." v. 12). The church of Aelia Capitolina was subjected to that of Caesarea, partly because of the civil prominence which belonged to the latter, partly because it could claim a connection with the Apostles (there St. Peter had baptized Cornelius) and an antiquity to which the new church of Aelia Capitolina could not pretend. The very name of Jerusalem fell out of use till after the Nicene Council.

Still it was impossible to ignore entirely the associations connected with Jerusalem. Towards the end of the second century Eusebius ("H.E." v. 23) tells us that the bishop of Aelia presided along with (and no doubt as second in rank to) the bishop of Caesarea at Palestinian synods, and we can see how near the two sees stood in rank from the fact that Eusebius, in giving a list of bishops, mentions the bishop of Aelia once before ("H.E." v. 25) and once after (ib. 22) the bishop of Caesarea. The letter of the Synod of Antioch in 269 is subscribed first by Helenus of Tarsus, next by Hymenaeus of Jerusalem, while the name of Theotecnus of Caesarea holds only the fourth place. (Euseb. "H.E." vii. 30; cf. 22.)

The interpretation of the seventh Nicene canon, which treats of the ecclesiastical rank of Jerusalem, has given rise to much discussion, and it is impossible to be certain about its meaning. These are its words: "Since a custom has prevailed and an ancient tradition that the bishop in Aelia should be honoured, let him have the next place of honour (τὴν ἀκολουθίαν τῆς τιμῆς), its proper dignity being secured to the metropolitan church (τῇ μητροπόλει)."[2]

There can, we think, be no reasonable doubt, though a question has been raised on the point, that the metropolitan church is that of Caesarea. But what are we to understand by the words ἐχέτω τὴν ἀκολουθίαν τῆς τιμῆς? The "next place," De Marca replies, after the three great sees of Rome, Alexandria, and Antioch, mentioned in the previous canon, the precedence, however, being one of honour merely, and the bishop of Aelia remaining subject in actual jurisdiction to the metropolitan of Caesarea. Beveridge, on the other hand, will not hear of an honorary patriarch subject to a metropolitan, and supposes the meaning to be that the bishop of Aelia is to rank next the metropolitan of Caesarea. He is to be the first of his suffragan bishops, just as in the Anglican Church the bishop of London holds the first rank as dean of the province after his metropolitan of Canterbury.

Beveridge is probably right, and his theory is confirmed by the fact that for some time afterwards the two bishops struggled for pre-eminence with alternate success. Soon after the Nicene Council Maximus of Jerusalem held a Palestinian synod in favour of Athanasius, without reference to the authority of Caesarea, though he was blamed for this assumption of power (Socrat. ii. 24). At the Second General Council Cyril of Jerusalem signs before Thalassius of Caesarea. On the other hand, Eulogius of Caesarea presided in 415 at the Synod of Diospolis, although John of Jerusalem was present. Moreover, although Juvenal of Jerusalem took a very prominent part at Ephesus in 431, and signed immediately after the bishop of Alexandria (the bishop of Caesarea was absent), still Cyril resisted Juvenal's attempt to obtain conciliar recognition of his authority over Palestine, and begged the Pope to interfere (Leo, Ep. 62). At the seventh session of Chalcedon (October 26, 451) Maximus of Antioch declared that after long strife with Juvenal he had at last consented to cede the three Palestinian provinces to Jerusalem—an arrangement which was approved by the council and the Papal legates.

The patriarchate of Jerusalem was severed like the other Eastern patriarchates from the unity of the Church by the Greek schism. The city was rescued from the Mahometans by the Crusaders in 1099; a Latin ecclesiastic—Dagobert, archbishop of Pisa—was appointed patriarch, and the hierarchy was reorganized. After the Christian defeat at Gaza in 1244, and the consequent capture of Jerusalem by the Sultan of Egypt, the Latin patriarchate became little more than a nominal dignity, and Nicolas de Anapis, a Dominican and Roman penitentiary, appointed by Pope Nicolas IV. in 1288, was the last Latin patriarch down to our day who resided in Palestine (Fleury, livr. lxxxviii. c. 49). In the Decree of Union (Florence, 1439), the Greek patriarchate of Jerusalem was again united to the Church and recognized as holding the fifth place after Rome, but the union only lasted a few years. Pius IX. gave Jerusalem a resident Latin patriarch, Joseph Valerga (1847–1872). The present patriarch is Mgr. Camassei. There is no Greek Catholic patriarch of Jerusalem. The United Greeks or Melchite Catholics of this patriarchate are subject to the patriarch of Antioch. He is represented by a vicar who is a bishop in partibus and resides at Jaffa.[1] (Le Quien, "Oriens Christianus,"

JESUATS. A congregation founded by St. John Colombini, and confirmed by Urban V. in 1367. Colombini was a native of Siena, and had held the highest offices in that republic; but being converted entirely to God by accidentally reading the Life of St. Mary of Egypt, he, with his wife's consent, embraced a life of continence, turned his house into a hospital, preached frequently, and delighted to humble himself to the condition of the poorest and most miserable. He soon had a ring of fervent disciples around him. Proceeding to meet Urban V., who was coming from Avignon to Rome, in 1367, the new society is said to have been called the "Gesuati" by children, who noticed how, as they walked, they continually repeated "Viva Gesù!" Alexander VI. obliged them to add to the name Jesuats, "of St. Jerome." Urban V. confirmed them in 1367, and gave them a white habit and hood, with a large brown mantle, and wooden shoes. For more than two centuries it was a strictly lay order, but Paul V. (1606) permitted them to receive Holy Orders. In many of their houses they practised pharmacy and distillation, and sold the alcoholic liquor which they manufactured; hence they came to be known as the "Aquavitae Fathers." For this and other reasons Clement IX., in 1668, deemed it advisable to suppress the order. (Hélyot.)

JESUITESSES. Isabel Rosella, a pious lady of Barcelona, assisted St. Ignatius greatly with her alms when he was studying at that city in preparation for a university career. She, with two companions, came to Rome, where the saint then was, in 1545, and entreated him to take the direction of them, and allow them to live by the Jesuit rule. St. Ignatius thought himself bound, in gratitude for her former kindness, not to refuse her request; but he soon found that the direction of these three women took up an unduly large proportion of his time, and he obtained from Paul III., in 1547, an order that the Company should not undertake the direction of nuns. "When certain women in Flanders and Piedmont afterwards assembled in houses under vows [1] and this rule, and called themselves Jesuitesses, their institute was abolished by Urban VIII., in 1633, the end and exercises of this society not suiting that sex." (Alban Butler, July 31.) (See INSTITUTE OF THE B.V. MARY.)

JESUITS. The annals of this great order, and the life of its founder, have been so frequently written that the general outlines of both are familiar to most persons. St. Ignatius Loyola, born in 1491, of a noble family in Biscay, and trained to the military profession, received a severe wound in the leg while defending Pampeluna against the French in 1521. During his slow recovery he called for books to amuse him; romances were brought, and also a volume of "Lives of the Saints." Reading this last, at first carelessly, but afterwards with ever-increasing interest, Ignatius recognized the heroism of the true servants of God, and saw how much their glory, being founded on the abasement of the Cross, transcended what till then he had been accustomed to call so. When he had sufficiently recovered, he broke with his former life, embraced poverty and mendicancy, confessed himself to a Benedictine of Montserrat, and passed a novitiate of sublime but terrible trial in the cave of Manresa. Gradually the thought of founding an order, which should support the Chair of Peter, menaced by the German heretics, sustain, by example, preaching, and education, the cause of the Gospel and Catholic truth, and carry the light of Christ to the heathen, rose into clearness in his mind. But to carry out all this he must become a priest; the soldier must turn himself into a clerk. With unfailing patience he laboured to obtain the necessary knowledge. After being driven from two Spanish universities, because his efforts to influence the students caused him to be esteemed a mischievous fanatic, he went to the University of Paris, and there completed his studies. Here it was that he made the acquaintance of a number of remarkable men, chiefly Spaniards, with whom being made one in heart and spirit, he understood that it was now possible to carry out the project which he had long cherished. He conducted them first through the "Spiritual Exercises," which he had composed at Manresa. [See EXERCISES.] On the feast of the Assumption, in 1534, in the church of Montmartre at Paris, Ignatius and his companions,[1] after they had all received Communion from Peter Faber, who was then the only priest among them, pronounced the vow which constituted the order. Its tenor was, "to renounce the world, to go to preach the gospel in Palestine, or, if they could not go thither within a year after they had finished their studies, to offer themselves to his Holiness to be employed in the service of God in what manner he should judge best."[2] Ignatius then passed into Spain, partly on medical advice, to recruit his wasted health by breathing the air of his native hills, partly to transact some necessary business for those of his companions who were Spaniards. It was agreed that they should all meet at Venice in January 1537. Before that time three others had joined the society—Claude le Jay of Savoy, Codure of Dauphiné, and Pasquier Brouet of Picardy. His followers travelled on foot from Paris, in the winter of 1536, and through much danger and hardship made their way to Venice at the appointed time; Ignatius had come from Barcelona by sea. While at Venice, they occupied themselves in preaching and serving in the hospitals. In the summer, after sending the others to preach and labour in various towns of North Italy, Ignatius, taking with him Faber and Laynez, set out for Rome. At La Storta, not far from the Eternal City, while praying in a wayside chapel, he fell into an ecstasy; he seemed to see the Almighty Father, who commended him to His Son; Christ at the same time said to him "I will be favourable to you at Rome."[1] Before the parting he had told his followers that, if asked to what congregation they belonged, they should say that they were of the Company of Jesus. The Pope (Paul III.) gave Ignatius a cordial reception and commissioned Faber and Laynez to lecture on divinity at the Sapienza, the Roman University. The Holy Father doubtless felt the full significance of the adhesion of such a band at such a crisis. The huge fabric of the German empire was in wild confusion; the king of England, saluted by his predecessor, not twenty years before, as "defensor fidei," had just destroyed six hundred monasteries, and stopped all intercourse between his kingdom and Rome; France was unquiet; Sweden lost. At this moment a company of devout combatants, disciplined alike in mind and will, serving under a leader every lineament of whose face bespoke force and majesty, but all under the strictest control, offered themselves to the Pope, to do service of whatever kind and against whatever adversary he might appoint. The encouragement which he received led Ignatius to set earnestly to work at framing the constitution of the new order. As might be expected from the man and the times, a military and monarchical spirit pervaded them. He resolved to establish in his order "a general whom all, by their vow, should be bound to obey, who should be perpetual, and his authority absolute, subject entirely to the Pope, but not liable to be restrained by chapters."[2] He also determined to prescribe a fourth vow—that of going, without question or delay, wherever the Pope might think fit to send them for the salvation of souls. As to property, he resolved that the professed fathers of the society should possess no real estates or revenues, either individually or in common, but that colleges might enjoy revenues and rents, for the maintenance of students of the order and the advancement of learning. He summoned all his followers to Rome, and at last, in 1540, was able to lay the programme and constitutions of the new order before the Pope, who, after the opposition raised by some of the cardinals had been overcome, solemnly confirmed them by the bull (dated Sept. 27, 1540) "Regimini militantis ecclesiae." The bull recites and approves the "form of life" which had been devised by the founder for those who should join his institute. Preaching, spiritual exercises, works of charity, teaching the catechism, and hearing confessions were to be their employments. The general or prelate to be chosen was to decide on the work to be done by each individual member, and to frame any new constitutions that might be needed, with the consent of his associates. Before admission, all were to undergo a long probation.

The Society being thus confirmed, the members met for the election of a general, and Ignatius was unanimously nominated. He refused at first, but afterwards yielded, and entered upon the office in April 1541. The constitutions, which were wholly composed by the saint, and in his native tongue, were translated into Latin by Polanco, his secretary, and first published in 1558. In them his aims and ideas, and the chief methods by which he hoped to realize them, are clearly set forth. He desired to "stand on the ancient ways," to teach men that they could not safely do otherwise, and thus prevent new defections. Novelty, curiosity, ambition, and self-indulgence were all on the side of Protestantism; if they were to be resisted effectually, it could only be by using the same weapons of which the temper had been tried against the Caesarism of the Romans, and the idolatry of the barbarians. This weapon was the personal sanctification of the defenders of Catholic truth. The holiness of St. Anthony and the hermits won the battle for Christ in the third century. When St. Aidan began to convert the Angles of Northumbria, he established himself and his monks in a remote island, so that monastic piety might not be interrupted in its daily duties and sanctifying discipline, never relax its hold on those who were preaching Christ to the heathen. Similarly St. Ignatius, instead of writing a great book, settles a round of spiritual exercises which he and his followers are to go through before attempting anything serious. His aim is to sanctify the soldiers, that by them he may sanctify the world. The rules which he prescribes are partly drawn from the contemplative life (e.g. mental prayer, examination of conscience, pious reading, frequentation of the sacraments, retreats), partly suited to form men of action. He gives no particular habit to his followers, because he designs them to live in the world and to be continually mixing with it, that they may overcome its evil, while remaining interiorly separate from it. None are to be received who have worn the habit of another order. The postulant must renounce his own will, his family, and all that men hold most dear on earth. The vows could not be taken before the age of thirty-three. A Jesuit must canvass for no office, and take no ecclesiastical dignity unless constrained by the Pope on pain of mortal sin. Six grades of membership are described: (1) novices, (2) formed temporal coadjutors, (3) approved scholastics, (4) formed spiritual coadjutors, (5) the professed of the three vows, (6) the professed of the four vows. These distinctions are observed to this day, but the professed of the four vows form only a small class; the professed of both grades and the spiritual coadjutors form not quite one half of those whom the world calls "Jesuits."

It should be observed that the name by which they are commonly known was given to them by their enemies, or by the people, not assumed by themselves. Till 1600 they never called themselves anything else but the "Company of Jesus."

Among the generals there have been Spaniards, Italians, Germans, Poles, and Belgians, but never a Frenchman.

Already in 1563 the usefulness of the new society must have been signally manifest, for the Council of Trent in that year, while laying down general rules about novices, declares that it intends not to make any change which should prevent "the religion of the clerks of the Society of Jesus from being able to serve the Lord and His Church according to their pious institute approved by the holy Apostolic See." [1]

St. Ignatius, after having founded the German College at Rome, and assisted in founding the great "Collegio Romano," having lived to see the fruit of his labours—his order being solidly established in many countries of Europe, and engaged in successful missions among the heathen in Asia, Africa, and America—passed to his reward in 1556. The following brief sketch of the subsequent history of the Society arranges events under the names of the generals down to the death of Aquaviva; and, from that point to the suppression of the Society, under the principal countries and missions in which its influence was exerted. Some of the more prominent successes and reverses which it has experienced since 1814 are all that our limits will allow us to give of its history subsequent to the re-establishment.

1. Father James Laynez, who had assisted as a theologian at the deliberations of the Tridentine Council, succeeded St. Ignatius in 1558. The chief event of his rule was his visit to Paris in 1561, on which occasion he confronted the representatives of the Huguenots at the Conference of Poissy, and did much to overcome the opposition which the Paris parliament had hitherto made to the admission of the Society. The parliament did in fact ratify in 1562 the royal edicts of Henry II. and Francis II., granting permission to the Company to erect a college in Paris. During this and the two following generalates the progress of heresy in Germany was stopped, and much lost ground recovered, by the labours of the Jesuits, among whom the Blessed Peter Canisius was pre-eminent. This great man won the affection of the powerful archbishop of Augsburg, Otto Truchsess, who made over to the Society the University of Dillingen. They had already, in 1556, obtained a firm footing in the Bavarian university of Ingolstadt, whence they extended their efforts to other parts of Germany. The favourite calumny of the German Protestants, that the Catholic Church was hostile to learning, received an effectual practical refutation through the Jesuit colleges, in which all subjects—humanities, philosophy, the sciences, &c.—were taught according to the newest methods, and more skilfully and energetically than elsewhere.

Meantime missions to the heathen were carried on with much success. The first Jesuit mission in India had been founded by St. Francis Xavier, who landed at Goa in 1542, and by his preaching and miracles converted great numbers of the inhabitants of Travancore, the Fishery Coast, and Madura. Afterwards he carried the Gospel to Celebes and the Spice Islands, and (1549) established a flourishing church in Japan. The saint died on the island of Sancian, near Macao, in 1552, while endeavouring to penetrate into China. The field of the missions was tilled by many different orders, among which the Company certainly was not the least zealous. Father de Nobrega had been sent to Brazil by St. Ignatius himself, and had made a good commencement; we shall presently see by what a strong and holy hand the work was continued. By 1560 the Society had extended its activity in every direction; Melanchthon, as he lay on his deathbed in that year, is reported to have said "Alas! What is this? I see the whole world being filled with Jesuits." Laynez died in 1565.

Under the rule of St. Francis Borgia, the third general, a relation of the Emperor Charles V. (1565–1573), the advance of the Society was uninterrupted. St. Pius V. was dissatisfied with the exemption from the obligation of saying the office in choir which the order possessed under the constitutions, and was inclined to insist on a change. But the fathers presented a memorial in which it was shown that the existing regulation was the result of profound meditation on the end and means of his institute on the part of the founder; St. Francis himself, with a respectful firmness, supported this view, and the Pope gave way. Affairs prospered in Germany; Austria and Bavaria, where heresy had nearly got the upper hand, remained on the whole true to the ancient faith. Canisius founded colleges at Würzburg, Olmütz, and Wilna. The Duke of Bavaria, in the decree founding a Jesuit college at Landshut, declared that "certainly it was to this Society that Bavaria owed the re-establishment of the faith of her ancestors, that had been shaken by the calamities of the times." The present church of the Gesù at Rome was begun in 1567. St. Charles Borromeo warmly befriended the Society in his archdiocese of Milan, founding (1572) a novitiate for them at Arona at his own expense. How dangerous the order was felt to be to the progress of Protestantism was shown by a terrible event in 1570. A Portuguese ship bound for Brazil, in which were F. Azevedo, of the Society, and thirty-nine companions, mostly novices, was attacked by a French privateer commanded by the Calvinist Jacques Sourie, of Dieppe. After a brave resistance the Portuguese vessel was overpowered; the sailors who were left alive were spared, but the Calvinists put all but one of the Jesuits to death. A somewhat similar incident happened the next year, and resulted in the murder of twelve Jesuits, of whom the chief was F. Francis de Castro, by the Huguenot captain, Capdeville, and his crew.

Under the fourth general, F. Mercurian, a Belgian (1573–1580), the genius of the great Bellarmine began to show itself; he was engaged for several years before 1577 in combating the errors of Baius, a doctor of Louvain. The members of the Society, who in 1565 had numbered 3500, distributed among 130 houses, in eighteen provinces, amounted in 1580 to upwards of 5000, divided among twenty-one provinces.

Under the prudent but energetic rule of Aquaviva (1581–1615) the prosperity and reputation of the Society were at their height. Enterprises formerly begun developed themselves now with great rapidity and brilliancy, and new undertakings, the fame of which still resounds through the world, were commenced. The Roman College, which in 1555 had but 200 students, in 1584 had grown into a flourishing university, with more than 2000 students, in which all the faculties but those of law and medicine were worthily represented. The ideas of St. Ignatius on the methods of instruction were worked out by Aquaviva into a systematic ratio studiorum, of which the chief feature was the thorough mastery which it aimed at giving to all their scholars over the Latin language. In the mission field, we find that extraordinary progress was made in Japan, where the Christians, who numbered but 200,000 in 1588, were 750,000 in 1612, most of these being Jesuit converts. In Brazil the work of F. de Nobrega was carried on for forty-four years by the Ven. Joseph Anchieta, of the Society, who instituted native settlements much resembling the later and more celebrated Paraguayan "reductions," and has been called the Apostle of Brazil. The Jesuit missions in India, which had languished or been retarded for a time, passed into a new phase on the arrival of F. Robert de' Nobili, in 1605. Nobili thought [MISSIONS TO THE HEATHEN] that ideas of caste, being grounded in the very structure of Hindoo society, should be temporarily complied with, so far as was lawful, by the ambassadors of Christ. Accordingly he assumed the dress and manners of a Brahmin, and kept aloof from the inferior castes, making after a time many conversions. He died many years later (1656), and his tomb, near Madura, is still an object of popular veneration. A breach was made about this time in the heathenism of China by the success of F. Ricci and his followers. Ricci was a sound mathematician, and skilled in mechanics; and when, after twenty years' residence in China, he succeeded (1601) in making himself known to the emperor at Pekin, he soon obtained his confidence, and made the favour extended to him on account of his scientific acquirements contribute more or less to the spread and protection of Christianity. Ricci died in 1610, but was succeeded by missioners not less able and zealous—Schall, Verbiest, Gerbillon, and Bouvet. Of the differences which arose between the Jesuit and Dominican missionaries in China, something will be said in the next section. F. Valdivia carried the gospel to the Indians of Chili in 1593; a harbour, a city, and a peak of the Andes immortalise the name of the intrepid missionary. The first Paraguayan "reduction" was made in 1610, but of this great civilising enterprise a connected view must be reserved for the article on MISSIONS TO THE HEATHEN.

In Europe generally the progress of the order was maintained in peace; but complications arose at three principal points. The Venetian oligarchy, enraged against the fathers because they observed the interdict laid by Pope Paul V. upon the republic in 1606, banished them from Venice; and, although the rupture with the Holy See was repaired soon afterwards, would not readmit the order for fifty years. In France, where the Parliament of Paris was always hostile to the Society, the members of the latter, being charged with complicity in the attempt of Châtel to assassinate the king, Henry IV., were expelled from Paris in 1595. Henry, however, recalled them in 1601, and on that occasion administered a telling reproof to the officials of the Parliament, who had, under the influence of the jealousy which has too commonly actuated French lawyers in regard to ecclesiastics, laid before him a paper full of ridiculous calumnies against the Company. In England, where Jesuits first arrived in 1580, their pastoral work was attended by greater danger than even in Japan. The Protestant government put to death, under Elizabeth, Fathers Campion, Briant, Southwell, Walpole &c.; and, under James, Father Oldcorne, the two Garnets, and F. Page. These martyrdoms, though unable to produce their full natural effect on account of the terrorism practised by the Government, undoubtedly led to numerous conversions, sustained the wavering faith of many, and powerfully contributed to keep alive the flame of Catholicism in the breasts of a down-trodden but unconquerable minority.

The Company numbered in its ranks at this time some of the finest and strongest minds in Europe: such were Cardinal Bellarmine, Emanuel Sa, Maldonatus, Suarez, Clavius, and Canisius. The saintly life of St. Aloysius Gonzaga, who died in 1591 at the age of twenty-three, reflects a yet purer lustre on their annals. The series of "Lettres Édifiantes et Curieuses," sent by the Jesuit missioners to Europe, commences from this period.

II. 1615–1773. In this section—after a brief survey of the Jesuit missions—the history of the order in Europe, the circumstances which led to its expulsion from various kingdoms and its suppression by Clement XIV. will be related.

In India, De' Nobili, whose method of extending the gospel was approved by a bull of Gregory XV. in 1623, was succeeded by Fathers Fernandez, De Andrada, Blessed John de Britto, Beschi, Bouchet, &c. De Britto was beheaded by the king of Marava in 1693. The question of the Malabar Rites (q.v.), which arose about the beginning of the eighteenth century, caused an agitation unfavourable to the progress of the missions. Still, if Southern India and Ceylon are to a great extent Christian countries, it is to these unwearied labours of the Society that the result is chiefly due. The last provincial, Father Anthony Douarte, after the suppression of the order, did not desert his converts, but, dying at a great age in 1788, bequeathed to them a box of papers relating to the mission, which he charged them to give to the future Provincial of the Jesuits in India.

In China, the establishment of the Tartar dynasty at Pekin in 1644 threatened to injure the missions, but the new rulers were at first not unfriendly. The Dominicans had come to China in 1633; they found that the Jesuits tolerated in their converts the continued adherence to certain customs and ceremonies which appeared to savour of idolatry; a protracted controversy arose, which spread from China to Europe. [For an account of these ceremonies see CHINESE RITES.] Clement XI. sent out De Tournon, the patriarch of Antioch, in 1703, to India and China as his legate. Soon after his landing at Goa, De Tournon issued a pastoral in which he unconditionally condemned the Malabar rites. The Jesuits, fearing the effect of the prohibition on the native mind, resolved on appealing to the Holy See, and De Tournon gave his verbal consent to their doing so. From India the legate passed to China, and in 1706 condemned the ceremonies as unfit for Christians to use. The emperor Kang Hi, who had always maintained that they had only a civil meaning, was extremely angry, and gave up De Tournon into the hands of the Portuguese at Macao, by whom he was imprisoned and ill-treated, dying in consequence in 1710. A brief of Clement XI. in 1710, followed by the bull "Ex illa die" in 1715, confirmed the legate's condemnation, first of some, then of all the obnoxious ceremonies. The indignation of Kang Hi was extreme, and the new legate, Cardinal Mezzabarba, perceiving the great difficulty of the case, authorized the Jesuit fathers to make a fresh application to Rome and in the meantime to suspend their obedience to the briefs. The application was vain; Clement XII. confirmed the bull "Ex illa die," and Benedict XIV., by his bull in 1742 (before which the Jesuits are said to have submitted unreservedly), confirmed the decisions of his predecessors, and finally settled the question.

Kang Hi, after a reign of sixty years, died in 1722, and was succeeded by Yung Tchin, who immediately ordered a persecution of the Christians. His son, Khianloung, was a man of singular character; political and personal motives prevented him from embracing Christianity, but he respected and loved the Jesuit fathers, whom he drew to his Court at Pekin, and was especially gratified by the skill with which they ministered to his scientific and artistic tastes. Father Benoist constructed a fountain to please him; other Jesuits made wonderful clocks and automata, or prepared charts, or painted the halls of his palace. Yet he was afraid of allowing Christianity to become powerful in the empire, lest it should open the door to an ascendency on the part of some European nation, similar to what was taking place before his eyes in India. While, therefore, the Jesuits at Pekin were safe and honoured, the Christian communities in many provinces were cruelly persecuted. Eight Jesuits were strangled at Nankin in 1748. The decree of suspension became known at Pekin in 1774. The fathers Amiot, Cibot, Dollières, and others, though wounded to the heart by the ruin of their beloved Society, remained at their posts and there died, Amiot not till 1794. The benevolent dispositions of the emperor towards them were never changed.

In Japan, where the prospects of Christianity had been so bright, all was suddenly overclouded. Taicosama, who seized the supreme power in 1583, commenced a persecution of the Christians, but with no great malignity or fixity of purpose. Hence, at his death in 1598, the native church was more flourishing than ever. Daifusama, who succeeded him as regent, reigned till 1615. In 1612 an English merchant captain, named Adams, is said to have made the regent believe that the real designs of the Jesuits were political, and that his only safety lay in exterminating them. A terrible persecution was then begun, which Xogun, the son of Daifusama, carried on with demoniacal cruelty and persistency. Before 1640, after scores of thousands of Japanese Christians had suffered martyrdom, and great numbers had apostatized, all public profession of Christianity was stopped, and the Jesuit mission—the missioners having been killed or banished—came to an end. From that time Europeans could only land their goods at one port in Japan, and then after trampling on the cross.

The missions of the Society in North America have been described by an American Protestant,[1] in a tone generally fair and almost sympathetic. Samuel de Champlain, a French naval officer, founded Quebec in 1608; in 1625 Jesuit missionaries arrived there, and, after providing for the spiritual wants of the colonists, began to preach to the Red Indians. The Huron nation proved to be the most tractable: most of them became Christians, and showed considerable aptitude for agriculture and other civilizing employment under the guidance of the fathers. The Iroquois from the south, instigated by the settlers in the British colonies, made war on the Hurons and nearly annihilated them. Fathers Lallemand, Daniel, and Brebeuf were put to death with every species of torture in 1649. The Abenakis, a tribe living on the Kennebec river between Canada and New England, asked for and received baptism in a body. The remnant of the Hurons was gathered round Montreal and Quebec. The treaty which in 1760 transferred the French possessions in North America to Great Britain provided for the maintenance of the Catholic religion in the ceded provinces; hence it is that the Indian and half-caste population of British America, among whose ancestors the Jesuits laboured and suffered, are to this day mainly Catholic. In the early part of the eighteenth century, the Abenakis were in the care of Father Rasles; a body of armed colonists from New England (1724) attacked their settlements on the Kennebec, dispersed the Indians, and butchered the unresisting missionary.[2] In 1673 the Jesuit Father Marquette, making his way to the south-west from Lake Michigan, discovered the Mississippi, which Frenchmen soon descended, and founded the colony of Louisiana at its mouth. The French nation, which first opened the valleys of the St. Lawrence and the Mississippi, long ago wrested from them by their rivals, realized to the full—history can show no more striking instance—the bitter truth of the adage, Sic vos non vobis.

Jesuits assisted Sir George Calvert in founding the Catholic colony of Maryland in 1633.

St. Peter Claver († 1654), a Spanish Jesuit, called the Apostle of the Negroes, spent more than forty years in New Granada, assisting corporally and spiritually the poor Africans whom the Spaniards were bringing over in great numbers at that time to work on the plantations.

Of the Jesuit mission in Paraguay—the most remarkable example of a whole people transformed and exalted through Christianity that has been known since the Middle Ages—an account will be found under MISSIONS TO THE HEATHEN. The first "Reduction," or colony, was founded in 1610; in 1717 the Christian Indians in all the Reductions numbered 120,000. A transaction between Spain and Portugal in 1758 caused the transfer of the territory on which the Reductions stood to the latter power; Pombal dispersed the Jesuit teachers; the white settlers, with their selfish greed and indifference to native rights, had everything their own way, and the fair experiment was ruined.

Returning now to Europe, we find that the history of the Society in Italy and Spain in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries was marked by few striking events. In Germany the fathers devoted themselves with great ardour to the mitigation of the miseries caused by the Thirty Years' War. The Emperor Ferdinand III., and also his general, Count Tilly, had received their education in Jesuit colleges; both of them loved and valued the Society. In Poland an ex-Jesuit ascended the throne in 1648 in the person of John Casimir. In Belgium arose in the seventeenth century the great modern school of hagiographers [BOLLANDISTS], Bollandus publishing the first volume of the "Acta Sanctorum" at Antwerp in 1643. He and all his coadjutors, Henschen, Papebroch, &c., were Jesuits, and the resumed work is still in the hands of the Society.

In England the penal laws forbade any freedom of action to Jesuits even more than to seculars; yet in 1634 two hundred and fifty members of the Company are said to have been in the kingdom. Father Arrowsmith suffered in Lancashire in 1628; under Charles II. five Jesuits were executed during the panic at the time of the Popish plot. The favour of James II. inspired them with false hope, and led to an extension of operations; colleges began to rise, but these buds were nipped by the "killing frost" of the Revolution. Yet, the laws being now more mildly executed, the fathers in England in 1700 numbered 131; and this number probably did not vary much down to the suppression.

In Ireland, the barbarous tyranny of the government under Elizabeth and James I. was replaced in the next reign by a somewhat easier state of things. The Jesuits on the mission, who had before 1620 been attached to the houses of the Catholic nobility, after that date were able to live in a more regular way, and in a short time they had eight colleges and residences. But, as the Vandal heretics extinguished civilization in Roman Africa, so the renascent well-being and culture of Ireland were uprooted by the Puritan invaders under Cromwell. Amidst an infinite number of other calamities which then fell on the country, the Jesuit colleges were destroyed and the mission broken up. In 1713 there were but eleven Jesuits in all Ireland, with Father Knowles as their superior; and these could only exercise their ministry in secret. A few continued to labour there till 1773.

The fortunes of the order in France, Spain, and Portugal have still to be noticed. In France the success of the fathers in education was remarkable. The Collège de Clermont, founded in 1562, changed its name to "Collège de Louis le Grand," and towards the end of the seventeenth century numbered 2500 scholars. In the confessional, the fathers were charged with letting off too easily such of their penitents as desired to conciliate the claims of the world and the flesh with those of the Gospel. They were said to be lax casuists; and on this ground Pascal attacked them (1656) in his celebrated "Lettres Provinciales." On the struggle between them and the Jansenists and on the Quesnel controversy see the article JANSENISM. With the declaration of the French clergy in 1682 [GALLICANISM] the French Jesuits had nothing to do; but they incurred the displeasure of Innocent XI. by refusing or neglecting to publish the bull against Louis XIV. on the question of the Regalia, and the Pope forbade them to receive novices. The great preacher Bourdaloue († 1704), and F. de la Colombière, the director of Blessed Margaret Mary Alacoque, flourished at this time. In the middle of the eighteenth century, a league of many parties and persons was formed for the destruction of the order. The Marquise de Pompadour hated them because they would not countenance in any shape the immoral relations subsisting between her and the king, Louis XV. Voltaire, himself one of their pupils, and not averse to doing them justice on occasion, as many passages in his works prove, desired their extinction as the defenders of revealed religion and the upholders of the purity of private morals. The whole party of the Encyclopaedists and freethinkers were naturally their enemies; the remains of the Jansenist party longed to be revenged on them; the Parliament and university were hostile to them, as they had ever been. Lastly, the Minister, the Duc de Choiseul—who by his blundering had just lost Canada for France—being in sympathy with the freethinkers, was disposed to yield to the clamour which the many ill-wishers of the Company raised, and to induce the king also to yield. In April and August 1762 edicts of the Parliament of Paris closed the Jesuit colleges and declared their order to be inadmissible in any civilized State. The archbishop of Paris, Christopher de Beaumont, put himself courageously on their side, and the secular clergy generally took the same line. Nevertheless, Louis XV. confirmed (November 1764) the edict of the Parliament, and about four thousand Jesuits, their colleges having been closed and their property plundered, were compelled to depart from France.

The fall of the order in Spain was a mysterious event. It was the work of the irresponsible despotism which ruled the country, and which, as it had been swift and stern for ages in repressing whatever was against the Church, so now, being itself perverted, dealt sudden blows that none could parry on the great Company—the creation of Spanish genius—which existed only for the Church's defence and glory. D'Aranda, the Minister of Charles III., is said to have induced him to believe that the Jesuit general, Ricci, had boasted of possessing documents showing that the king was an illegitimate child. The wrathful Charles immediately caused a despatch to be written to all the government authorities in Spain and the colonies, requiring that all the Jesuit fathers should be forthwith conducted to the nearest port, and compelled to take ship for some foreign country. Six thousand Spanish Jesuits were ruined and exiled at a blow, by what can only be regarded as the act of a lunatic.

Previously to this, the order had been despoiled and banished from Portugal by the famous Carvalho, Count de Pombal. Pombal was a man of iron determination, and unscrupulous in the choice of means. In 1750 he had been made Secretary of State to Joseph I., and set himself actively and ably to work to revive the languishing trade and industry of Portugal. He had been Portuguese minister in England for several years from 1739. A mind so observant must have been struck by the docility of the Anglican clergy, and the ease with which, being isolated from the rest of Christendom, they were managed by the Government of the day, and it was probably this experience which led him to form plans for a similar national church in Portugal, separated from the Holy See and the hierarchy. The Jesuits, the sworn defenders of Papal rights, stood in his way; they must therefore be suppressed. Into the intricate history of the plot to assassinate the king, and the manner in which Pombal used it against the Jesuits, besides attacking them in other ways, it is impossible here to enter. In the end, their property was sequestrated, the University of Coimbra taken out of their hands, and the fathers themselves (1759), to the number of two hundred and fifty-five, banished from Portugal. Clement XIII. vainly pleaded that they might be treated with ordinary justice. On the death of Joseph I. in 1777 Pombal was disgraced, declared a criminal, and forbidden to live within twenty leagues of Lisbon. A new inquiry being ordered into the alleged conspiracy of 1758, those who by Pombal's management had been condemned to death or imprisonment were exonerated from all criminality. From some of these had been extorted by torture the statement that the Jesuits were concerned in the plot; this statement, of course, if the revising tribunal may be trusted, falls to the ground.

The order had been expelled from France, Spain, Portugal, and Naples, but it was still protected in Austria by Maria Theresa. Her son, afterwards Joseph II., used all his influence against them; he was said to covet their estates. Diplomatic pressure was used by all the Courts which had expelled the order to induce Clement XIII. to decree their suppression, but the aged Pope stood firm. On his death in 1769, the Bourbon sovereigns used every effort to secure the election of a Pontiff who would comply with their views. Cardinal Ganganelli was elected and took the name of Clement XIV. He hesitated long before taking the decisive step to which he was urged. At length (1773) he signed the constitution "Dominus ac Redemptor noster," by which, on the ground of the numerous complaints and accusations of which the Society was the object, without declaring them to be either guilty or innocent, he suppressed the order in every part of the world, and directed that those of its members who were priests should fall into the ranks of the secular clergy.

In 1626 the Society had possessed 15,000 members. At the time of the suppression the total number was about 20,000.

Lalande, the astronomer, said of the suppression, "Carvalho and Choiseul have irretrievably destroyed the finest work of man, unrivalled by any human institution. . . . The human race has lost that wonderful and invaluable assembly of 20,000 men, disinterestedly and unceasingly occupied with functions most important and most useful to man."

III. Frederick the Great, King of Prussia, refused to have anything to do with the suppression; he retained the Jesuits in his dominions, and desired them to exercise their teaching and other functions, so far as was possible, as if nothing had happened. Catherine II., Empress of Russia, supported them with so much zeal that the Pope ultimately exempted Russia from the operation of the bull of suppression; novices were received in that country without interruption during the interregnum. Other attempts were made to keep the order alive. [See BACCANARISTS.] In 1814 Pius VII., by the constitution "Solicitudo omnium Ecclesiarum," derogated from the brief of suppression, and appointed Francis Karen, who was then provincial in Russia, general of the whole order. Since the restoration the fortunes of the Society have varied with the varying strength of the infidel and revolutionary forces which from time to time have been opposed to it. In France, where their colleges had been brilliantly successful, an envious agitation was set on foot against them by the University, to which the government of Charles X. weakly yielded and closed their colleges (1828). Under the Second Empire they enjoyed freedom; the Republican Government again (1880) closed their colleges, and denied them the right of corporate and regular existence. They still continued to live and work precariously till the wholesale expulsion of all religious in 1901. In Switzerland they had a noble university at Fribourg, and their influence was great in the Forest Cantons and the Valais. The anarchic and infidel elements in Swiss society, combining with the Protestants and encouraged by Lord Palmerston, raised in 1846 the war of the Sonderbund; the Catholic cantons were crushed by superior numbers, and the Jesuits banished from the Confederacy.

At the present day the total number of members of the Society is believed to be about seventeen thousand. During the course of the Revolution in Italy 1860–1870 they were successively expelled from the various parts of that country until the fall of the Papal States left them no houses in the peninsula. They manage, however, to carry on many works, though they are formally suppressed and forbidden to keep schools. In Rome itself they have charge of the Gregorian University, the Biblical Institute, and the German and Latin-American colleges. In like manner, though they were driven out of Germany during Bismarck's "Kulturkampf" (1872), the German Jesuits have increased in numbers, and have laboured in many lands. Persecution has only served to extend the field of their labours. The Portuguese Republic has followed the example of these greater countries (1910), but with much violence and cruelty.

(It would not be possible in our limits to mention even a tithe of the works on the Society of Jesus. Many are referred to in the following books: Crétineau Joly, "Histoire de la Compagnie de Jésus," 1846; "The Jesuits, their Foundation and History," by B. N. (a useful compilation); Ferraris, Jesu Societas; Hélyot;

JESUS (Ἰησοῦς, יֵשׁוּעַ). Name and Feast of the Name.—The name means, not, as is often said, "Saviour" or "God the Saviour," but "the Lord [i.e. Jehovah] is help or salvation." It is simply a shortened form of Jehoshua (יְהוֹשֻׁעַ), which in the LXX appears as "Jesus," and, according to Delitzsch ("History of Redemption," p. 182), was a common name in post-exilic times. In our Lord's case it had, however, a pre-eminent fitness, because in Him, through the perfect example of His life and through His death, the salvation of God came to the children of men. This name was announced to the Blessed Virgin by the angel, Lk. i, 31, ii. 21, and actually imposed on our Lord at His circumcision. It was His personal, whereas "Christ" was His official, name.

In all ages of course Christians have spoken with devotion of this holy name, and St. Paul's words in the Epistle to the Philippians (ii. 9 sqq.) will occur to everyone. The devotion received a new impulse and took a tangible form in the fifteenth century. The Franciscan friar St. Bernardine of Siena (d. 1440) used to exhibit before the people to whom he preached a board with the holy name painted on it in the midst of rays, and he persuaded a poor man who used to paint cards and had been ruined by the saint's sermons against gambling to make a living in another way—viz. by painting the holy name. The new devotion was examined before Martin V., prohibited for a time, defended by St. John Capistran, and finally approved by the Holy See. A third Franciscan, Bernardine de Bustis, composed an office of the Holy Name, which he offered for approval to Sixtus IV. and Innocent VIII., but without success. At last Clement VII. approved the office for use in the Franciscan order; permission to use it was extended by subsequent Popes to other churches, and at last Innocent XIII., yielding to the prayers of the Emperor Charles VI., on November 29, 1721, ordered the feast to be celebrated throughout the Church on the second Sunday after Epiphany. According to the new calendar it is now kept on the Sunday after the Circumcision. (Bourasse, "Summa Aurea," Festum nominis Jesu.)

JEWS, CHURCH LAWS RESPECTING. When Christianity became supreme, we find Constantine publishing restrictive edicts against the Jews, in which it was declared penal for them to insult or injure converts to Christianity, and the adoption of Judaism by those not born to it was forbidden. The Theodosian Code brands the desertion of Christianity for Judaism as apostasy, and the blending together the rites and doctrines of the two as heresy. In Spain, where Jews were numerous, a long series of canons regulating the relations between them and Christians may be quoted from the Acts of the early councils. These were severe in their tenor, for, indeed, the Talmudic Jew, with his intense pride of race, and scorn and hatred of other nations, was a difficult person to deal with. The Fourth Council of Toledo (633), over which St. Isidore of Seville presided, ordered that Jews should be no longer coerced to become Christians, but that those who had been so coerced in the reign of King Sisebut should not, since they had received Christian sacraments, be allowed to return to Judaism. (Hefele-Leclercq, iii. 274.) This council also ordered that the children of Jews should be separated from them and placed in monasteries, or in pious Christian families, to be instructed in Christianity. This sweeping measure can only have been partially carried out; for at the Eighth Council of Toledo (653) we find the king undertaking to protect the Catholic faith against Jews and heretics, and it is ordered that the decrees of the fourth council respecting Jews should be observed (ib. 291). Again, a canon of the ninth council (655) directs that baptized Jews be obliged to repair to the cities on the principal festivals, in order that the bishops might be able to judge of the sincerity of their conversion (ib. 294). The Jews in Spain, being through Talmudic influences more in sympathy with Islam than the religion of Christ, assisted the Moors in the eighth century to master the country and destroy the kingdom of the Visigoths.

The Third Council of Orleans (538) made some important canons. It allowed that Christians should be in servitude to Jewish masters; if, however, a Christian slave took sanctuary because his master was tampering with his religion, he was not to be returned to bondage but redeemed at a fair valuation. Jews were not to appear in the streets nor to hold intercourse with Christians on the last three days of Holy Week and Easter Sunday (ib. ii. 1159).

In the later legislation, a constitution of Clement XI. ("Propagandae per universum"), another of Benedict XIV. ("Postremo mense"), and an epistle of the last-named Pontiff, are prominently cited. By the first it is provided that, if a Jew become a Christian, the portion of his father's goods falling to him shall not be withheld by the family on account of his conversion. But he is not allowed to disinherit his other brothers, as in the case of that infamous law of the Irish Parliament, according to which, if the younger son of a Catholic landowner became a Protestant, he could take the whole estate, and reduce the rest of the family to poverty.

The following were some of the prescriptions of the ancient law. The Jews in Rome were bound to observe Church holidays so far as their public occupations were concerned. They were required to live together in a particular quarter (the Ghetto). Some distinction of dress, sufficient to show that they were not Christians, was required from both sexes. The word of God was to be preached to them once a week by a master in theology—if possible, one who was versed in Hebrew. The tribunals of the Inquisition were allowed to proceed against Jews only in case of their having made themselves amenable to their jurisdiction by certain definite overt acts. It was lawful for Christian princes to tolerate Jews, their rites and synagogues, within their dominions; and having been once so received and assured of protection, they could not, except for some just and weighty cause, be expelled.

The children of Jews, not having the use of free-will, ought not to be baptized against the will of their parents. A Jewish boy who asks to be baptized, not having attained to the use of reason, is to be given back to his parents, but not otherwise. Infant children of Jews, baptized validly, though illicitly, by a nurse or some other person, must be educated by Christians, and when they have come to the use of reason must be compelled to perseverance in the Catholic faith. Under the operation of this rule arose the celebrated Mortara case, about fifty years ago. Copies of the Talmud are to be searched for and burnt. In justification of this and other severities the canonists are wont to make copious extracts from that extraordinary compilation, which, with much that is grave and noble, contains also so many puerilities, immoral precepts, and anti-social maxims that Christian courts may well have deemed it right to resort to stringent measures to prevent Christians from being seduced into adhesion to a system so preposterous. For illustrations—not to speak of those given by Ferraris,[1] which may not be entirely trustworthy—the reader is referred to the Abbé Chiarini's translation,[2] and to a recent work by Oort.[3] It must not be supposed that the modern Jews are free to reject any part of the Talmud that may displease them. If the Old Testament is the written, the Talmud contains the oral, law of Jehovah; a consistent Jew believes that God speaks to him through the Rabbins as much as through the prophets.[1] Even the legendary part, the "Haggadah," according to the Jewish editor of "Selections from the Talmud" published in the "Chandos Classics," does not stagger them. "The majority of the [Jewish] people," he says, "clung to it, and regarded the Talmud as a complete whole worthy of their reverence."

"The Talmud," says the Abbé Chiarini,[2] "explains the written law by the oral in the name of the Eternal," and the Jews, he declares, have ever valued it highly as "a wall raised between Jews and non-Jews always and everywhere." ("The Jewish Encyclopaedia," in 12 vols.; Gigot in "Cath. Enc."; Kreutzwald in "Kirchenlex."; Ferraris, Hebraeus.)

JOAN, POPE. [See ANTIPOPE, p. 37.]

JOHN OF GOD, ST., ORDER OF. St. John of God established his Order of Charity for serving the sick at Granada in 1540. Before the Jacobins had shut the doors of its hospitals in France, and the "Liberals" in Spain, the two generalates of Spain and Italy, into which the order was divided, numbered 2914 religious, with 281 hospitals under their care, in which there were more than 10,000 beds, and an average of 85,000 patients were received and attended to yearly. The brothers of this order are said to have been the first to establish the rule in hospitals that every patient should have a bed to himself. From a minute statement of their system of hospital management, printed by the continuator of Hélyot, it would appear that they practised all the regulations which the régime of the best modern hospitals prescribes for the comfort and medical treatment of their patients, and in addition were tenderly solicitous for their souls, urging those to confession who had long discontinued or were disinclined to it, and facilitating the return to God of all the sufferers who passed through their hands. There is a house of the order at Scorton, near Darlington. Pope Leo XIII. made St. John of God patron of hospitals and the dying. (Hélyot, continuation [Migne], iv. 612.)

JOSEPH, ST. St. Joseph occupies a place of his own in the devotion of modern Catholics, such as is given to no other saint.

The Catholic work of Rohling, Der Talmudjude (1877), is severely handled by Delitzsch, Rohling's Talmudjude beleuchtet (1881). A really scientific account of Jewish theology will be found in Weber's excellent work System der Altsynagogalen Palästinischen Theologie (Leipzig, 1880). Wagenseil (Tela ignea Satanae, 1681) and Eisenmenger (Entdecktes Judenthum, 1777) are marred by controversial bias. From them anti-Semitic writers draw their "facts."

[1] The post-Talmudic treatise Sopherim compares the Bible to water, the Mishna to wine, the Gemara to spiced wine. But it would be quite wrong to judge the more educated Jews by the Talmud. A reform was inaugurated by Moses Mendelssohn (d. 1786). A reformed synagogue was founded at Berlin in 1814, in London about 1840, at New York in 1843. The Reformed Jews who reject the divine authority of the Talmud, though they differ much among themselves, many of them being mere Deists, are very numerous in Germany and America. Moreover, the Reform has had great influence on educated Jews who have not openly abandoned the orthodox synagogues. For a history of the Reform, see The Jews, their Customs and Ceremonies, by the American Rabbi Myers (New York, 1877). A recent work, Liberal Judaism, by Claude G. Montefiore (1903), is full of interest.

[2] Op. cit. p. 59.

This, and the fact that the history of the devotion is peculiarly instructive on the one hand, and especially liable to misunderstanding on the other, are the reasons for inserting this article in a work which does not profess to give Lives of the Saints. The devotion to St. Joseph is a striking instance of Catholic usage, modern in itself, and yet based on most ancient and Scriptural principles.

The facts of the gospel history concerning St. Joseph need not be repeated except so far as they exhibit his dignity. He was the true husband of Mary, and as such her head. Moreover, Christ Himself (Lk. ii. 51) was "subject" to him. In consequence of his authority and his provident care, he is honoured with the title of the "Father" of Christ (Lk. ii. 48), although of course Christ had no man for His father in the proper sense of the word. To have been chosen by God Himself as the husband of the Virgin Mother and the foster-father of our Lord—these surely are solid grounds for a singular devotion to St. Joseph. We may notice here that, as he is never mentioned after our Lord's public life began, he is supposed to have died before our Blessed Lord, and is therefore reckoned among Old Testament saints.

At the same time, it was long before there was any general manifestation of this devotion. The Monophysite Christians of Egypt are said first to have assigned a festival to St. Joseph, viz. on July 20, which is thus inscribed in a Coptic almanac: "The rest of the holy old man, the just Joseph, the carpenter, husband of the Virgin Mary, Mother of God, who merited to be called the Father of Christ" (quoted in Smith's "Bible Dictionary" sub voc.). In Western martyrologies of the ninth century the name of Joseph is found, and from the same time the Greeks commemorated him along with the other saints of the Old Testament on the Sunday before Christmas, and along with Mary, David, and James the Less on the Sunday in the octave of Christmas (Bolland, Acta Sanct. 19 Martii, in "Comment. praev. ad S. Joseph." § 2). In the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries several orders in the West celebrated the feast of St. Joseph on March 19. Still "the feast of St. Joseph," Thomassin says ("Traité des Festes," p. 439), was still unknown (i.e. as a feast of the whole Church) in the time of Gerson, who wrote several letters to cause it to be celebrated—one to the Duke of Berry in 1413, another to the cantor of the church of Chartres, another to all the churches. Gemecius, who has written the life of Cardinal Ximenes, testifies that that cardinal "instituted in his church the feast of St. Joseph." St. Theresa and St. Francis of Sales in modern times were zealous in propagating the devotion, and Gregory XV., in 1621, as well as Urban VIII., in 1642, made St. Joseph's day (i.e. March 19) a holiday of obligation. Benedict XIII., in 1726, ordered his name to be inserted in the Litany of the Saints and in the Litany used in the "Commendation of the Soul," after that of St. John the Baptist (Gavant. tom. ii. p. 310). In 1871 Pius IX., confirming a decree of the Congregation of Rites, put the whole Church under the patronage of St. Joseph, chose him as the Church's protector, and made his feast a double of the first class. It was fitting that Christians should appeal to him who once protected the human life of our Saviour, and ask his intercession in behalf of Christ's mystical body. The same Pope had in September 1847 extended the feast and office of St. Joseph's Patronage to the whole Church. The Pope required it to be celebrated on the third Sunday after Easter as a double of the second class ("Manuale Decret. S. Rit. Cong." No. 2168). Pius X. afterwards raised the feast to the rank of a double of the first class. According to the new Calendar, the feast of St. Joseph is a double of the second class, and the feast of the Patronage is no longer kept on the third Sunday after Easter. The "Solemnity of St. Joseph," a double of the first class, with an octave, is kept on the second Wednesday after Easter. In other ways the Church has marked her approval of the growing devotion to St. Joseph. The Creed is now said in the Mass of both his feasts; his name is inserted after that of the Blessed Virgin in the prayer "A cunctis"; he is commemorated after her in the Suffrages of the Saints; and his name comes before that of any other patron except the Angels and St. John Baptist. ("Manuale," 3709; Thomson, "Life and Glories of St. Joseph"; Suarez, "Disp. de S. Joseph B.V. Sponso"; Kellner, "Heortology.")

JOSEPH, ST., ORDERS OF. 1. Josephites. Two communities bear, or have borne, this name. The first was founded by Jacques Cretenet at Lyons about 1640, with the designation of "Priests of the Mission of St. Joseph"; it was governed by a director-general; its members did not take vows; and it devoted itself chiefly to the foreign missions. At the Revolution it was suppressed. The second is a teaching institute, founded in 1817 at Grammont in Belgium by the Canon Van Crombrugghe, for giving a good education to the sons of persons in the commercial and upper classes. Several houses of the institute have since been founded at various places in Belgium. In England there is a flourishing college at Weybridge.

2. Lay Hospitallers, Daughters of St. Joseph. This society, the chief employment of which was the education of orphan girls, was founded at Bordeaux in 1638, under the auspices of the archbishop Henri de Sourdis, by Marie Delpech, who afterwards established a great house of her order at Paris, called "De la Providence." These daughters of St. Joseph were introduced into many large towns in France, but Hélyot's continuator does not mention whether they survived the Revolution.

3. Nuns Hospitallers of St. Joseph. Founded in 1643 at La Flèche, in Anjou, by Mademoiselle de la Ferre. Besides the three vows of religion, these nuns took a fourth vow, to serve the poor. Before the Revolution they had five or six houses, one of which was at Montreal, in Canada.

4. Nuns of St. Joseph of the Good Shepherd. This congregation was founded by the bishop of Puy, Henri de Maupas, at the suggestion of the Jesuit Father Médaille, in 1650. Though dispersed at the Revolution, the religious retained the spirit and the love of their institute, and in 1811 they were reorganized under an imperial decree, the mother house being settled at Clermont, in Auvergne. They are noted for their Magdalen asylums, orphanages, and schools. They shared the fate of the other religious institutions when the Associations law decreed their expulsion (1901). Before that date, however, they had long been established in other countries, notably in the United States and Canada, where they have many flourishing houses.

5. Sisters of Charity of St. Joseph. This community, which devotes itself principally to teaching, was founded at Mount St. Mary, in the State of Maryland (N. America), in 1807, and had the well-known Mother Seton, a convert, for its first superior.

6. Sisters of St. Joseph of Cluny. The first efforts of this community, founded by Anne Marie Javouhey, may be traced back to 1807, but it was first formally authorized in 1819, being then established at Autun. The Reverend Mother Javouhey was superior till her death in 1851. She visited all the French colonies in Asia, Africa, and America, besides several of those belonging to England, and resided for a considerable time in some of them. She established her sisters in nearly all the French colonies; they never spared themselves when teaching, or nursing, or any other good work was required of them, and they have happily paved the way for the eventual reception of Christianity by many an African nation and American tribe. The congregation was confirmed by the Holy See in 1854. The sisters now number about 4000, and are widely spread over the world.

7. Sisters of St. Joseph of Bourg. This institute, founded in 1828 by Mgr. Devie, bishop of Belley, in concert with the Reverend Mother Saint Benoît at Bourg in the department of Ain, and devoting itself to teaching and works of charity, has spread itself in many parts of France, Switzerland, and America.

8. Sisters of St. Joseph of the Apparition. This congregation, founded in the south of France by Mme. deVialard in 1830, for teaching and for nursing the sick, was approved by the Holy See in 1862. It has more than 100 houses in various parts of the world, with 1000 sisters.

9. Sisters or Daughters of St. Joseph. This offshoot of the nuns of the Good Shepherd (No. 4) was established by Bishop Charbonnel at Toronto (Upper Canada) in 1850. They have since prospered and multiplied in the colony, and have ceased to have any connection with the mother house in France.

10. Sisters of St. Joseph of Peace, founded at Nottingham by Bishop Bagshawe in 1884, for the training of girls of the working class for their domestic and industrial duties. The sisters are also employed in teaching and nursing the sick and afflicted. They have houses in England, the United States, and Canada. (See F. M. Steele, "Convents of Great Britain.")

JOSEPH'S, ST., SOCIETY FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS. Founded by Cardinal Vaughan, in 1866, at Mill Hill, near London, for the conversion of heathens in foreign countries. About 170 of the missionaries are engaged in this work in various parts of the world. To the society was added a female branch of Sisters of St. Joseph's Society for Foreign Missions. Their founder (Cardinal Vaughan) intended that they should stand in the same relation to the fathers of the society as the Sisters of Charity to the Lazarists.

JUBILEE. The year of jubilee (שְׁנַת הַיּוֹבֵל) was an institution of the Levitical Law (Levit. xxv. 8 ad fin.). The Jews were to number seven sabbaths of years—i.e. forty-nine years, and the fiftieth (not the forty-ninth, as Petavius and many others have maintained against the plain words of the text, ver. 10, and Jewish tradition attested by Philo, Josephus, and the Talmud) was the year of jubilee. The blast of the trumpet proclaimed the jubilee throughout the land on the tenth day of the seventh month—i.e. on the day of atonement. The land was to rest, as in sabbatical years; land and houses in the open country, or in villages without walls, reverted to their original owners or their heirs: all Hebrew slaves were to go free. The law as a whole has no parallel in any other code, and it had a distinctly theocratic character. The Hebrews were the servants of God, and could not, therefore, be the servants of men; the land belonged to God, and was only lent to the Hebrew tribes and families, who could not, therefore, be driven out by any human arrangement. The original position of affairs was to be restored after the sacred sabbatical period of years and on the day of atonement, when Israel's sins were purged and his communion with God renewed. Various explanations are given of the word "jubilee," which is the English form of יוֹבֵל. Some (e.g. Gesenius and Knobel) suppose that the word means "joyful sound" (from יָבַל); others make it refer to the lengthened blast of the trumpet or the streaming crowds of people (from יָבַל to flow. See Hitzig on Jer. xxxiv. 8). Probably it is an old word for a horn or trumpet (Ewald, "Alterthüm." pp. 417 seq.; Dillmann on Levit., p. 609; cf. Exod. xix. 13, Jos. vi. 4–13). Most likely the "year of setting free," Ezek. xlvi. 16–18, is the year of jubilee. (So Dillmann, against Kuenen; Wellhausen, "Geschichte des Volkes Israel," i. pp. 122 seq.; Smend on Ezek., pp. 382 sqq., who take it to mean the sabbatical year.)

The Church of Christ has adopted the term "jubilee" from the Jewish Church, and proclaims from time to time "a year of remission"—from the penal consequences of sin: she offers to her children, if they repent and make their peace with God and perform certain pious works, a plenary indulgence, and during this year she empowers even ordinary confessors to absolve from many reserved cases and censures, from vows, &c., &c. An ordinary jubilee occurs at Rome every twenty-fifth year, lasts from Christmas to Christmas, and is extended in the following year to the rest of the Church. An extraordinary jubilee is granted at any time, either to the whole Church or to particular countries or cities, and not necessarily, or even usually, for a whole year. If the jubilee, whether ordinary or extraordinary, be granted to the faithful generally, the conditions for gaining it usually are to fast for three days—viz. on a Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday; to visit certain churches, and pray according to the intention of the Pope, to give alms, to confess and communicate.

It was in 1300 that the first jubilee was given. An impression prevailed at that time that a great indulgence was granted in Rome at the beginning of each century, and with this belief many pilgrims flocked to the city. No document in the Papal archives was found to confirm the tradition, but Boniface VIII. granted on February 22, "and for each hundredth year to come, not only a full and more ample, but rather a most full pardon of all sins" to those who repented and confessed, and visited the churches of St. Peter and St. Paul thirty times if Romans, fifteen times if strangers. The contemporary historian Giovanni Villani reckons the number of pilgrims to Rome that year at 200,000. Clement VI., in a bull of 1343, made the jubilee recur every fiftieth year, adding to the previous conditions a visit to the Lateran church. Accordingly the jubilee was kept in 1350, and the number of pilgrims is said to have reached a million. Urban VI., in 1389, reduced the cycle of the jubilee to thirty-three; Paul II., in 1470, to twenty-five years. (Zaccaria, "Dell' Anno Santo"; Thurston, "The Holy Year of Jubilee"; Cadène, "De Jubilaeo Conspectus Historicus"; Hefele-Leclercq, vi. 388 sqq.)

JUDGMENT, GENERAL. The fact that Christ will judge all men and angels together at the last day is taught with such clearness and iteration in the New Testament and in all the Creeds that we need not set about proving it here. It will be more to the purpose if we attempt to give a summary of the common theological teaching and popular belief on the matter, endeavouring to distinguish what is doubtful from that which is certain. We may remark by way of preface that the general judgment is intended to manifest before all intelligent creatures the justice of God, to exhibit Christ in His majesty before their eyes, to glorify the just, and to put the wicked to open shame.

1. The Circumstances of the Judgment. "As to the way in which that judgment will take place, and in which men are to be assembled, much cannot be known for certain." So St. Thomas writes ("Suppl." lxxxviii. 4), and no sober-minded person will hesitate to agree with him. But he goes on to say that there is a probability in the inference from Scripture that as Christ ascended from Mount Olivet to heaven, so He will descend upon it to judge the world.[1] At the sound "of a trumpet"—i.e., according to St. Thomas ("Suppl." lxxvi. 2), either the voice or the mere apparition of Christ—the dead will wake. "The sign of the Son of Man will appear in heaven" (Mt. xxiv. 30). There is nothing in the context to indicate the precise nature of this sign, but as the previous verse speaks of the darkening of the heavenly bodies, the "sign" seems to consist in some luminous appearance following the darkness and ushering in the Messianic glory. The common opinion of the Fathers since Cyril of Jerusalem ("Cat." 15, PG, xxxiii. 899), and of the Schoolmen, is that the "sign" is the sign of the cross, conspicuous in the sky, and this opinion developed in the minds of some into the notion that the fragments of the wooden cross on which Christ died would be united miraculously and exhibited in the sky. Scripture tells us that Christ will appear in His majesty "in the clouds" (Mt. xxvi. 64), "with the angels of his might, in a flame of fire" (1 Cor. iii. 13, 2 Thess. i. 7)—fire which, according to Suarez ("In III. P." disp. 57, quoted by Jungmann), "will precede the Judge on His way to judgment, in order to strike the damned with instant terror and to be the beginning of their torment." Christ will take His seat on His throne, and the just will be placed on the right, the wicked on the left, of Christ (Mt. xxv. 31–33). It is impossible to say how far these expressions are to be taken strictly, and great Catholic authorities have leant, some to a literal, some to a metaphorical explanation (see, e.g., the authors quoted by Maldonatus on the passage in Matthew). Lastly, it has been a popular belief among Christians, as well as among Jews and Moslems, that the judgment will take place in the valley of Jehoshaphat (Josaphat), which has been identified with the narrow ravine of the Kidron on the eastern side of Jerusalem. This belief arose from the words of Joel (iii. 2; cf. 12): "For behold in those days, and in that time, when I will turn again the captivity of Judah and Jerusalem, I will gather together all the nations and bring them down to the valley of Jehoshaphat, and will contend with them there because of my people and my inheritance Israel." It is very doubtful whether the valley of Jehoshaphat was a real place at all; in verse 14 it is called the "valley of decision," and the name Jehoshaphat means "the Lord has judged." If the prophet had a real place in view he may possibly have had the valley in the wilderness of Tekoa (2 Paralip. xx.), where Jehoshaphat won a signal victory over three heathen nations. Anyhow, no valley of Jehoshaphat near Jerusalem is mentioned in the Scriptures or in Josephus, or in any document older than the "Onomasticon" of Eusebius. Remigius, on the strength of Joel's words, asserted, in the middle of the ninth century, that the wicked would be placed for trial in the valley of Jehoshaphat, while the just were caught up in the air to meet their Judge. This, says Merx, in his commentary on Joel (p. 199), is the earliest place in a Christian commentary on Joel "where the final judgment is fixed geographically and topographically at Jerusalem in the valley of Jehoshaphat." In the commentary to which we have just referred an elaborate account of Christian and Jewish opinion on the matter will be found.

2. "The man Christ is the judge, but [He exercises this office] with a power and authority which are not human, but divine" (Petav, "De Incarnat." xii. 16). The saints (1 Cor. vi. 2) act with Him in His judicial functions; though probably this only means that they approve the justice of the sentence. It seems plain from Mt. xix. 28 that the Apostles are to judge the world in a stricter sense, though it is hard to imagine what this sense can be. St. Thomas conjectures ("Suppl." q. 89, a. 1) that the Apostles and "perfect" men will notify the sentence to others.

3. It is certain that all men will be judged (see the Athanasian Creed), and it is commonly held that the word "all" is to be taken quite literally, so as to include unbaptized infants, while it is at least the more approved opinion among theologians that angels also will then be tried. The books will be opened (Apoc. xx. 12)—the books, perhaps, of conscience and of God's remembrance. The examination made will consist in this, that God will enlighten the mind of each concerning his own thoughts, words, and deeds, and those of all others. Nearly all theologians hold (though the Master of the Sentences was of a different mind) that the sins even of the just will be openly declared, in order that the judgment may be complete, and that God's justice and mercy may shine forth.

4. In each individual case sentence will be pronounced. St. Thomas ("Suppl." q. 88, a. 2) deems it more likely that no oral words will be used in the sentence. Many, however, who are at one with him in thinking that no oral words will be used to individuals, still believe that the words in Mt. xxv., "Come, ye blessed of my Father," &c., "Depart, ye cursed," &c., will be orally addressed to the multitude of the saved and of the lost. (St. Thomas, 3^a, q. 59 "Suppl." qq. 88-90, and "Contra Gentiles," iv. 96; Suarez, "In III. Part." dispp. 52, 53, 57; Petavius, "De Incarnatione," xii. 16; Atzberger, "Geschichte der Christl. Eschatologie"; Billot, "De Novissimis," 168; Wilhelm and Scannell, "Cath. Theol." ii. 541; Jungmann, "De Novissimis.")

JUDGMENT, PARTICULAR. The doctrine of the Church on this point is clearly explained in the following words of the Roman Catechism (P. I. a. 7 of the Creed). There are "two occasions on which each and every man must appear before God, and render an account of every thought, action, and word, undergoing finally the immediate sentence of the Judge. Of these occasions the first happens when a man departs this life; for straightway he is set before the judgment seat of God, and there a most just inquiry is made into all that he has ever done, said, or thought, this being called the private" (or, as we usually say in English, the particular) "judgment." The essence of the doctrine lies in the belief that the eternal lot of the soul is determined by the judgment of God immediately after its separation from the body, and so much as this must be considered an article of faith, although there has been no formal and explicit definition on the point. The doctrine, however, is clearly implied in the statement of the Council of Florence, that souls which quit their bodies in a state of grace, but in need of purification, are cleansed in purgatory, whereas souls which are perfectly pure "are at once (mox) received into heaven," and those which depart "in actual mortal, or merely with original, sin," "at once descend into hell"[1] ("Decretum Unionis"). The Fathers of Florence follow in this part of their decree the constitution "Benedictus Deus,"[2] issued by Benedict XII. in the year 1336.

It cannot be said that many testimonies can be produced from Scripture to prove the doctrine as it has just been propounded. Nor need we wonder at this. The books of the Hebrew Bible for the most part speak obscurely of the life beyond the grave, while those of the New Testament are chiefly occupied with the great truths that Christ had risen and that He would come again to judge the world. Still at least one passage from the Gospel of St. Luke, xvi. 29 seq., justifies the belief of the Church and excludes reasonable doubt on the matter. Our Lord represents Lazarus and Dives as receiving their respective rewards immediately after death. The former goes to the "bosom of Abraham"; the latter lifts up "his eyes in Hades, being in torments." He must of course have been sentenced before the general judgment, because the rich man's brethren are spoken of as still alive. It is true that we cannot draw dogmatic inferences from all the details of this or any other parable, and it is often hard to determine how much belongs to the clothing of the narrative, how much is meant to teach a moral or doctrinal lesson. Still we may confidently regard the truth, that judgment follows hard on death, as part of the main teaching which the story conveys, and so, as we shall presently see, St. Augustine understood the passage.

Several other places of Scripture are quoted in proof, but some, as we cannot help thinking, are irrelevant, none cogent. Eccli. xi. 27 seq. may refer to the judgment which God brings on the wicked by the very act of cutting them off in the midst of their prosperity. Eccles. xi. 9, xii. 1, is far too vague to serve the purpose for which it is alleged. Our English Catechism urges the verse in the Epistle to the Hebrews (ix. 27), "It is appointed unto all men once to die, and after that the judgment." The whole passage scarcely encourages us to understand the judgment as the particular one. "As it is appointed unto all men once to die, and after this the judgment, so also Christ, being once offered to bear away the sins of many, will be manifested a second time without sin to those who wait for Him unto salvation." The natural meaning seems to be that as men have to die once only and afterwards to be judged, so Christ had to die once only and afterwards will come, no longer laden with the sins of the world, to judge mankind. At all events, St. Thomas and Estius both think that the writer of the Epistle had the general, not the particular, judgment in his mind.[1]

The tradition of the Church on the particular judgment was for a long time obscured by the Millennarian errors which were held in early times even by many Catholics, otherwise orthodox, and by the uncertainty which long prevailed on the state of souls in the period between death and the general resurrection. St. Augustine, however, speaks clearly and emphatically, and that not for himself only, but for the Church of his time. He is speaking of books on the soul written by Vincentius Victor, and he insists that there is nothing in them except what is vain or erroneous, or else mere commonplace familiar to all Catholics. As an instance of the last, he gives Victor's teaching on the meaning of the parable from St. Luke about which we have already spoken. "For with respect to that," says St. Augustine ("De Anima et ejus Origine," lib. ii. n. 8, PL, xliv. 498), "which he [Victor] most rightly and very soundly believes, viz. that souls are judged when they quit the body, before they come to that judgment which must be passed upon them when reunited to the body, and are tormented or glorified in that very flesh which they inhabited here—was this, then, a matter of which you were actually unaware? Who is there with a mind so encrusted with obstinacy against the Gospel as not to hear, or hearing not to believe, these things, in the story of the poor man, taken after his death to Abraham's bosom, and of the rich man, whose torment in hell is set before us?"

Theologians adduce various arguments to show the reasonableness of belief in the particular judgment. "The time," says Suarez, "for merit and demerit ends with death; that, therefore, is the most suitable time for judging each man's acts, no reason existing for further delay" (Suarez, "In III. P." disp. 52, § 2, quoted by Jungmann, "De Noviss." cap. i. art. 2). St. Thomas meets the obvious objection that there is no need of two judgments, by pointing out that it befits each to be judged both as an individual and as a member of the whole human race; that God's justice must be publicly as well as privately manifested; and that the sentence passed in the particular judgment cannot be completely executed till the body is reunited to the soul ("Suppl." q. 88, a. 1).

The common opinion is that souls are judged at the moment and in the place of death. God manifests to the soul by some interior illumination its state and its future lot, whereupon the soul, to borrow the illustration of St. Thomas ("Suppl." q. 69, a. 2), finds the place which belongs to it in heaven, or purgatory, or hell, just as bodies find their place according to the law of gravity. Popular representations which describe the soul as borne by angels before the tribunal of God, there to be accused by devils and defended by the guardian angels, are innocent in themselves, and are, indeed, sanctioned by Scripture. Still they are popular representations, after all, not intended as accurate statements of the literal truth. (Theologians generally treat of the Particular Judgment in connection with the General Judgment. See above.)

[1] Protestant commentators are also divided on the meaning of the word "judgment." See Lünemann, ad loc. Lünemann himself considers that the μετὰ τοῦτο leaves the time at which the judgment is to follow quite indefinite.

JUDICA PSALM. Ps. xlii. (Heb. 43) is said—preceded and followed by the versicle "Introibo" ("I will enter to the altar of God," &c.) —at the beginning of all Masses except those for the dead and those said during the time of the Passion. On these occasions the psalm is omitted because of its joyful character. St. Ambrose (? "De Sacram." iv. 2, PL, xvi. 437) tells us the verse of the psalm already referred to, "I will enter to the altar of God: of God who maketh glad my youth," was recited by the neophytes as they walked after Baptism and Confirmationfrom the font to the altar in order to receive Communion. The psalm was originally the priest's private Introit, recited by him while on his way to the altar. Other prayers were also recited alternatively. The missal of St. Pius V. finally fixed the priest's preparatory prayers as we now have them. (Le Brun, "Expl. de la Messe," i. 111; Fortescue, "The Mass," 225; Martène, "De Antiq. Eccl. Rit." l. i., c. iv., a. 2.)

JUDICATUM. [See THREE CHAPTERS.]

JUDICES SYNODALES. The judges to whom the Roman Curia commits the trial of causes in different countries are so called. They must hold some dignity in a cathedral church, and must be nominated by the bishop in the diocesan synod. There should be not less than four for each diocese. If a judex synodalis die in the interval between two synods, the bishop nominates some one to take his place until the next synod meets. All nominations, whether in or out of synod, must be reported to the Pontifical Secretary of Petitions (supplicum libellorum). (Ferraris, Judex, § 66; Taunton, Synodal Judges.)

JUDICIUM DEI (ordalia, ordeal, jugement de Dieu). The proof of facts by testimony being attended with many difficulties in an unsettled state of society, it has been commonly believed in many countries that for the protection of innocence and the detection of guilt, the case being doubtful, if the divine justice were solemnly appealed to, the necessary proof would be supplied by a direct exhibition of divine power.[1] All the early barbarian codes, the Salic, Ripuarian, Burgundian laws, &c., allow the appeal to the "judgment of God." The modes were various: among them were walking over red-hot ploughshares or live coals, handling red-hot iron, eating blessed bread [EULOGIAE], the trial by hot water, and the trial by cold water. It was believed that a perjurer could not swallow blessed bread. In the trial by hot water the person whose innocence was in question had to plunge his arm into a caldron of boiling water. In that by cold water, he was bound hand and foot and thrown into a pond, a cord being fastened to him; if he floated, it was held that the water rejected him and that he was guilty; if he sank, that he was innocent. Lastly, there was the trial by combat; it being devoutly believed that the man whose cause was just would not be permitted by heaven to be vanquished by his adversary. To give a few instances—the Empress Cunegunde (about A.D. 1010) is said to have walked unhurt over red-hot ploughshares, when she appealed to the judgment of God in disproof of her alleged unchastity; the champion of the Empress Theutburga (860) passed victoriously through the trial of hot water; a monk, Petrus Igneus, in the eleventh century, to establish the truth of his testimony against the Bishop of Florence, walked between two great fires placed close together, and was not scorched. See the curious article by Kober in "Kirchenlex." (Gottesurtheile) in which the view is taken that the Church permitted these ordeals, the issue of paganism, but without approving of them, and gradually, through the decisions of Popes and the treatises of doctors, assisted to put them down. Most of the ordeals were abandoned in the course of the twelfth century. The trial by combat was abolished by St. Louis (about 1250) within his own dominions; in England it was nominally legal down to 1818: "We find the canon law very early declaring against trial by ordeal, or vulgaris purgatio, as being the fabric of the devil, cum sit contra praeceptum Domini, non tentabis Dominum Deum tuum. Upon this authority, it was thought proper to disuse and abolish this trial entirely in our courts of justice by an act of parliament in the third year of Henry III." (Stephen, "Commentaries on the Laws of England," bk. vi. ch. xxvii.)

(Phillips, "Ueber die Ordalien bei den Germanen"; Vacandard, "L'Eglise et les Ordalies." Hefele-Leclercq give in the third and fourth volumes various regulations made by local councils regarding ordeals; and the fourth Lateran Council promulgated a general decree against them (v. 1318).

JURISDICTION. (Jus dicere, to administer justice, was one of the "tria verba" which denoted the functions of a Roman praetor.) Jurisdiction is defined as "the power of anyone who has public authority and pre-eminence over others for their rule and government."

Jurisdiction is first divided into ecclesiastical and civil. The former is that which is concerned with causes relating to the worship of God and the spiritual salvation of souls; it is exercised either in the forum externum or in the forum internum. Civil or political jurisdiction is conversant with secular causes, and has in view the temporal government of the commonwealth. It is exercised only in the forum externum.

Jurisdiction is again divided into voluntary and contentious. The first is exercised over persons who voluntarily submit themselves to its operation, as in the case of manumissions and adoptions in the civil order, and ordinations, benedictions, absolutions,

[1] Cp. Sophocles, Ant. 264, Virgil, Aen. xi. 787.

&c., in the ecclesiastical order. It must not be supposed that the validity of such acts depends upon the willingness of the parties interested to submit to them; as when a club empowers a president whom it has elected to frame by-laws for them, the validity of which depends upon the voluntary accession of the members. The acts are valid, firstly and chiefly, because done by a power which had the right to do them—i.e. which had jurisdiction. Contentious jurisdiction is that which is exercised over persons even against their will; it implies a dispute, contending parties, and a tribunal.

Thirdly, jurisdiction may be either ordinary or delegated. Ordinary jurisdiction is that which belongs to anyone of his own right, or by reason of his office, in virtue of some law, canon, or custom. Delegated jurisdiction is that which a man has, not of his own right, but by the commission of another, in whose place he officiates. [DELEGATION.]

Ordinary jurisdiction may be acquired in three ways: (1) by commission from the supreme ruler, conceded either to the dignity or to the individual; (2) by law or canon; (3) by custom or prescription. Thus, by the Supreme Pontiff are constituted as ordinary judges, legates, patriarchs, primates, archbishops, bishops, the officials of the Curia, &c. By the supreme lay power are constituted, in the civil order, viceroys, governors, prefects, magistrates, &c., who all enjoy ordinary jurisdiction. By law or canon those are constituted ordinary judges who are elected to office by public bodies according to the statutes of their foundation, and by public functionaries according to law. This is the case with the rectors of universities, the superiors of convents, the provosts of chapters, and the vicars-general of bishops. The third way is by custom; a jurisdiction which has been exercised without challenge for forty years is held to be validated by prescription, and is considered ordinary.

All the Apostles received their jurisdiction, which (except in the case of St. Peter) was personal and extraordinary, immediately from Christ. This jurisdiction they did not transmit; the bishops and their successors receive their jurisdiction from Christ, but through Peter. Such at least is the view now generally held; but even if the bishops be deemed to derive their jurisdiction immediately from Christ, all Catholics agree that it is in such manner subject to the supreme pastorate of the Pope that "it can be restrained by his authority and sovereignty, and, for a lawful cause, altogether taken away."[1]

Confessors belonging to the regular orders have jurisdiction from the Pope over the faithful generally in the tribunal of penance, but must obtain the approbation of the bishop.

[1] Benedict XIV., quoted by Ferraris, § 25.

Every confessor must have jurisdiction in foro interno, otherwise he cannot validly absolve. An absolution given by a priest without jurisdiction is void. Nevertheless, if the penitent be in articulo mortis, or sincerely believed to be so, he may be validly absolved, not only from sins, venial and mortal, but from all ecclesiastical censures, even in reserved cases, by any simple priest, even though the latter be degraded, or an apostate, or irregular [IRREGULARITY], or a heretic.

The jurisdiction of the priest is of ecclesiastical right, so far as its bestowal, enlargement, and restriction are concerned, for it is the Church which confers it, and in such a manner as she deems to be expedient in the Lord; but it is of divine right, inasmuch as the faculty of remitting sin, for the sake of which it exists, is "conferred on the priest in ordination through the power of the Holy Ghost."[1] (Ferraris, Jurisdictio.)

JUS SPOLII (lit. "right of spoil"). By "spolium" is meant the property belonging to a beneficed ecclesiastic at the time of his death which he could not legally dispose of by will. According to the canons a bishop or other ecclesiastic has only a right to such a portion of the diocesan revenues as is sufficient to maintain him and enable him to discharge his functions efficiently. Whatever exceeds this is the property of the Church. If therefore an ecclesiastic at his death be found to be possessed of property, the result of savings from his share of Church emoluments, that property ought to return to the Church; his natural heirs have no right to it. It is recorded of a great number of saints that, penetrated by this feeling, they took care to dispose of their ecclesiastical revenues to the last farthing in almsdeeds and other good works, so that, when death came, they might depart naked out of this world as they had come naked into it. St. Thomas of Villanova on his deathbed, "having commanded all the money then in his possession (which amounted to four thousand ducats) to be distributed among the poor in all the parishes of the city, then ordered all his goods to be given to the rector of his college except the bed on which he lay. Being desirous to go naked out of the world, he gave his bed also to the jailer for the use of prisoners, but borrowed it of him till such time as he should expire."[2] Warham, the last Catholic archbishop of Canterbury, rejoiced to hear as he was dying that only thirty pounds were left in his coffers. St. Francis stripped himself of the very clothes that he wore and gave them back to his father, that neither he nor the world might henceforth have any claim upon one another. Such examples might be indefinitely multiplied. A dim feeling in the popular mind, that such was the more perfect way for the ministers of Christ, may have had something to do with the rise of this singular jus spolii (or, as it was also called, rapite capite, "seize and take"), in virtue of which, in the rude ages following the fall of the Western Empire, anyone who was present when a beneficed ecclesiastic expired thought himself at liberty to seize and carry off whatever property belonging to the deceased he could lay his hands on. Naturally the bulk of this spoil fell to laymen, who were more rapacious and less scrupulous than clerks. The scandalous abuses to which the custom led may be conceived; for ages councils denounced them and legislated against them, but in vain. If, however, we consider the extreme opposite to the jus spolii—what we may call the jus haereditatis et legationis—the right claimed by beneficiaries in non-Catholic communions to transmit and bequeath the savings of their ecclesiastical revenues to their children, we must admit that, while preserving the outward semblance of decorum, this practice is intrinsically far more scandalous than its opposite.

As the power of sovereigns increased in Europe, they began to restrain the indiscriminate plunder just described, and in the case of bishops, to draw the jus spolii to themselves. Innocent III. complained (1207) that the servants of Philip II. had stripped the house and lands of a deceased bishop of Auxerre of property of every description, leaving only the bare walls. The inferior feudal lords claimed the same right over the property of deceased ecclesiastics on their domains. The incessant efforts of councils gradually obtained the renunciation of the right on the part of sovereigns and lay lords. In the thirteenth century it began to be claimed, in a modified form, by the Church herself; and many Constitutions of later Popes confirmed and defined the claim. Thus it came to be a principle of law that the "spoils" of beneficiaries dying without the faculty of devising, or in a foreign country, or which were acquired by illicit trading, belonged of right to the Camera Apostolica or Papal treasury. This right, admitted in Italy for all orders of clergy, and in Castile in the case of bishops, was not allowed in France, Germany, Belgium, or Portugal.

It need hardly be said that this jus spolii does not extend to the patrimonial property of ecclesiastics, nor to personal gifts and other acquisitions lawfully derived to them during life from non-ecclesiastical sources. The law lays down various rules for distinguishing as equitably as possible between the two classes of property, if an ecclesiastic has died possessed of both. From the end of the 16th century the right of spoil was compromised in the kingdom of Naples for an annual payment to the Camera. (Ferraris, Spolium; Sägmüller, in "Kirchenlex." Spolienrecht.)

JUSTICE, in the widest sense, the sense which concerns us here, is not a special virtue, because it includes all the supernatural virtues. According to St. Thomas (1^a 2^{ae}, q.113, a. 1), it "implies a certain rectitude of order, even in the interior disposition of a man, inasmuch, namely, as the highest part of man is subjected to God, and the inferior powers of the soul are subjected to that which is supreme, viz. to reason." Justice in this sense involves subjection to God and therefore the absence of mortal sin, which is rebellion against Him; while perfect justice is identical with the perfection of every virtue. Scripture constantly uses justice צְדָקָה, δικαιοσύνη in this large acceptation—e.g. "Abraham believed God, and he reckoned it to him as justice" (Gen. xv. 6; cf. Galat. iii. 6, James ii. 23, and innumerable other passages). The "authorised version" renders the Greek and Hebrew words in these cases "righteousness," and this has become the familiar name among English Protestants. The change of word does not seem to mark any difference of principle, though, of course, the older Protestants held that the justice of Christ is imputed to us—i.e. reckoned to our account—whereas the Catholic doctrine is that justice or righteousness does indeed come from the grace of God, but that it inheres in the soul and consists in a real change of the moral character. "He who doeth justice is just" (Jn. 1 Ep. iii. 7).

It is this general sense of the word "justice" which is important in theology, and the plan of this Dictionary does not require that we should treat at length of justice as a particular virtue. As such, it is commonly defined in words adopted by theologians from Ulpian as the "firm and abiding resolve (voluntas) to give each his own right." It is subdivided into legal justice—which orders a man's actions to the common good, in which, of course, he himself shares—and particular justice, which orders the duties of man to man. This latter again is subdivided into distributive justice—which inclines superiors to a just distribution of burdens and advantages among their subjects—and commutative justice, which consists in giving to each his strict rights—e.g. paying debts, taxes, &c. Commutative, unlike legal, justice lies solely in the performance of duties to others, whereas the agent's own good is part of the common good; unlike distributive justice, it deals only with strict rights, and is for these reasons justice in the most proper sense of the word. (St. Thomas, 2^a 2^{ae}, q. 57–122; De Lugo, "De Justitia et Jure.")

JUSTIFICATION. The difference of belief on the way by which sinners are justified before God formed the main subject of contention between Catholics and Protestants at the time of the Reformation. "If this doctrine" (i.e. the doctrine of justification by faith alone) "falls," says Luther in his

"Table Talk," "it is all over with us." On this account the Council of Trent was at pains to define most clearly and explicitly the Catholic tradition on the matter, placing it in sharp opposition to the contrary tenets of the Reformers. We confine ourselves here to the process by which adults are elevated from a state of death and sin to the favour and friendship of God; for with regard to infants the Church of course teaches that they are justified in baptism without any act of their own.

Justification, then, according to the council (sess. vi. 5, 6), begins with the grace of God which touches a sinner's heart and calls him to repentance. This grace cannot be merited; it proceeds solely from the love and mercy of God. It is, however, in man's power to reject or to receive the inspiration from above; it is in his power to turn to God and to virtue or to persevere in sin. And grace does not constrain but assist the free-will of the creature. So assisted, the sinner is disposed or prepared and adapted for justification; he believes in the revelation and promises of God, especially in the truth "that a sinner is justified by God's grace, through the redemption which is in Christ Jesus"; he fears the justice, hopes in the mercy, of God, trusts that God will be merciful to him for Christ's sake, begins "to love God as the fountain of all justice, hates and detests his sins." "The disposition or preparation is followed by justification itself, which justification consists, not in the mere remission of sins, but in the sanctification and renewal of the inner man by the voluntary reception of [God's] grace and gifts, whence a man becomes just instead of unjust, a friend instead of a foe, and so an heir according to hope of eternal life." ... "By the merit of the most holy Passion, through the Holy Spirit, the charity of God is shed abroad in the hearts of those who are justified," &c.

We may turn to the views of Lutherans and Calvinists, as they are to be found in their authoritative Confessions. They are at one with Catholics in attributing the beginning of justification to the mere grace of God, and in excluding all merit or title on the part of the sinner. But Lutherans maintained that man "could contribute absolutely nothing to his own conversion," that "faith in Christ, regeneration, renewal," are to be ascribed "solely to the working of God and to the Holy Spirit" ("Solid. Declar. de Lib. Arbitr." § 20, p. 635, quoted in Möhler's "Symbolism," i. p. 125 ed. Robertson). Here the Lutherans follow their master, who compared man under the action of grace to "a trunk or a stone" ("In Gen." xix.; Möhler, p. 124). The Calvinists, on the other hand, did admit that man was active as well as passive under the influence of grace ("Confess. Helvet." cap. ix. p. 21; Möhler, p. 136); but as they held grace to be irresistible they could not, of course, allow the Tridentine doctrine that man is free to accept or reject the invitation of God. Both the Lutheran and Calvinist errors with regard to human co-operation are excluded and condemned (sess. vi. De Justif. can. 4, 5, 6). Secondly, whereas Catholics understand by justification the renewal of man's moral nature by divine grace, the reformers took it to mean "the remission of sins and the imputation of the justice of Christ" (Calvin, "Instit." cap. xi. § 2; Möhler, p. 155; and so "Solid. Declar." iii. De Fid. Justif. § 11; Möhler, p. 155), faith being the condition on which these benefits are given. Here is the hinge on which the whole controversy turns. Catholics regard justification as an act by which a man is really made just; Protestants, as one in which he is merely declared and reputed just, the merits of another—viz. Christ—being made over to his account. With Catholics justification is effected by grace inherent in the soul; with Protestants it is something external to the soul altogether—a sentence which is pronounced by the divine judge. True (and we are bound in fairness to lay great stress on this), Protestants hold that real and interior sanctification follows upon justification, so that change in heart and life is the sure and only test that a man really has been justified by faith, or, in other words, that the merits of Christ have been imputed to him. Still a very important difference between the Catholic and Protestant views remains. To the Catholic, sanctification and justification are the same thing, or at most two aspects of the same thing—viz. of the act by which God makes a soul just and holy in his sight. To the Lutheran or Calvinist, they are distinct, both in themselves and in the order of time at which they take place. For it was the contention of Protestant theologians that a soul is first justified—i.e. accepted as just for the merits of Christ apprehended through faith, and then, as a necessary consequence, sanctified—i.e. really made holy. Lastly, as Protestants believed that concupiscence—i.e. the mere interior temptation to sin, unaccompanied by wilful consent—constituted sin in the strict sense, and since all are liable to such temptations, they held very inadequate notions of sanctification. "God," Calvin writes, "begins this work of interior renewal in his elect, and proceeds with it throughout the whole course of their lives, and that sometimes slowly, so that they always remain subject to the sentence of death before his tribunal" ("Instit." iii. 11; Möhler, p. 165). Very different is the Catholic belief, according to which justification excludes all mortal sin from the soul and makes the love of God and and man sovereign within it, so that the just man is in no way liable to the sentence of death at God's judgment seat. Sin, no doubt remains, more in some, less in others, but it is venial sin, which does not incur the sentence of eternal woe or forfeit God's friendship.

The Protestant doctrine has only an apparent foundation in Scripture. Undoubtedly, the Hebrew word הצדיק, the Greek δικαιόω in the Sept. and N.T., often mean, not to make, but to pronounce just by a legal sentence. The judge may in this sense "justify" a man because his cause is good, or from corrupt motives although his cause is bad. Thus, in Deut. xxv. 1, the judges are directed to justify (וְהִצְדִּיקוּ LXX δικαιώσωσι) the just (i.e. to pronounce him just) and to make the wicked wicked—i.e. to pronounce him to be so. Here the Vulgate has "justitiae palmam dabunt," but in Prov. xvii. 15, "he who justifies the wicked and condemns" (lit. "makes wicked," or as we might say "makes out to be wicked") "the just—an abomination to the Lord are both the one and the other," it represents הצדיק by "justifico." We do not therefore, for a moment, dream of bringing any philological objection to the Protestant view, nor do we deny that the Scriptural idea of justification does imply legal acquittal. But why does God pronounce the sinner just? Not because he comes to trial with clean hands, for by the hypothesis he comes laden with guilt. Not because, being actually unjust, he is pronounced just on the round of a legal fiction by which the merits of another are made over to his account, for such a procedure would be unworthy of a human, much more of divine, justice. The true answer surely is that God purifies the soul by turning it from love of self to divine love, and that thus He at the same moment renders and pronounces the sinner just.

Scripture abundantly confirms the reasonableness of the inference. It describes God as "destroying" and taking away iniquity; it speaks of the blood of Christ, which "cleanses us from all sin." If in Ps. xxxi. (Heb. 32) we read that the man is blessed "whose iniquity is taken away, whose sin is covered, to whom the Lord doth not reckon or impute sin," the blessedness does not consist in mere forgiveness, for the verse ends, "in whose spirit there is no guile." Two passages in St. Paul show that he knew nothing of the spurious distinction between justification and sanctification. After telling the Corinthians that great sinners, thieves, profligates, slanderers, &c., will not inherit the "kingdom of God," he continues "And such were some of you, but you washed yourselves" (Vulg., "you were washed"), "but you were sanctified, but you were justified, in the name of the Lord Jesus," &c. (1 Cor. vi. 11). Here sanctification is put before justification, and if the Protestant theory were correct the whole matter would have been thrown into obscurity and confusion. Again in Ephes. iv. 24, "Put on the new man, who has been created according to God in justice and holiness of truth." (The dogmatic theologians treat of Justification when dealing with Grace: St. Thom. 1ª 2æ, q. 110, and the commentaries thereon; Bellarmine, "De Justif." i.; Suarez, "De Gratia," lib. viii.; Stapleton, "De Univ. Justif." Op. tom. ii.; Wilhelm and Scannell, "Cath. Theol." ii. 246).

K

KINGS AND QUEENS, EMPERORS, ETC., PRAYERS FOR. St. Paul (1 Tim. ii. 1) commands prayers to be made for kings and all in authority, and there is abundance of proof that the early Christians faithfully observed this duty, even if their rulers were heathen or heretical. Two instances out of many will suffice. "We sacrifice," says Tertullian ("Ad Scap." 2, PL, i. 700), "for the health of the Emperor, but to our God and his." So Athanasius prayed publicly for the heretical Emperor Constantius, as we know from his own words ("Apol. ad Constant." c. 10, PG, xxv. 607): "I did but say 'Let us pray for the most pious Emperor (Αὐγούστου) Constantius,' and straightway all the people shouted with one voice 'Christ, help Constantius!' and kept on praying thus." At a later date, however, the names of emperors who formally separated themselves from the Church were left out in the diptychs.

When the diptychs fell out of use the name of the king or emperor was put in the Canon of the Mass, and it is wanting in very few mediaeval missals. Not only did our ancient English liturgies put the names of our sovereigns in the Canon, but many editions of the Sarum Missal have a votive Mass "pro Rege" (Maskell, "Ancient Liturgy of the Church of England." p. 275). The name of the sovereign, however, is left out of the Canon in the modern Roman Missal, and Gavantus ("Thesaur." p. ii. tit. viii.) says that it cannot be added except in virtue of an Apostolic privilege such as that granted to Philip II. of Spain by Pius V.[1] Meratus, in his note, modifies the statement so far as to allow that the name of the sovereign may be inserted by "old and lawful custom," such as prevailed in France and Venice, when the names of the King and the Doge were inserted. The Roman missal, however, contains a Prayer, Secret, and Post-Communion "Pro Rege" to be said as a commemoration in which the name of the sovereign has to be expressed. At present, in English Catholic churches, it is usual to sing a prayer after solemn Mass for our King and the Royal Family. (Le Brun, tom. ii.; Hefele, "Beiträge," vol. i. pp. 299 seq.)

KISS. (A) Kiss of Peace.—Among Jews (Gen. xxxiii. 4, 2 Kings xiv. 33, Job xxxi. 27) and heathen the kiss was used much more frequently than among ourselves as a mere sign of good will and charity. Among the Romans, indeed, the use of the osculum was regulated by custom and law. The custom was naturally adopted and raised to a higher significance among Christians. Thus St. Paul tells those to whom he wrote that they are to salute each other in "a holy kiss" (ἐν φιλήματι ἁγίῳ, Rom. xvi. 16; 1 Cor. xvi. 20; 1 Thess. v. 26), while St. Peter (1 Ep. v. 14) speaks of a "kiss of charity" (ἐν φιλήματι ἀγάπης). Φίλημα ἅγιον, φίλημα ἀγάπης, ἀσπασμὸς, φίλημα μυστικὸν—and in liturgical language εἰρήνη—are the Greek words most used by Christian writers for the holy kiss; the Latins employ osculum sanctum, osculum pacis, pacem dare, offerre, &c. Tertullian ("De Orat." 18, PL, i. 1176) speaks of the "kiss of peace which is the seal of prayer," and Clement of Alexandria ("Paedagog." iii. 11, p. 301, ed. Potter) says the kiss "should be mystical," and enlarges on the purity of intention with which it should be given.

(a) At Mass.—The kiss of peace was given at Mass from the earliest times, as appears from Justin, "Apol." i. 65. To avoid the dangers of abuse to which Athenagoras ("Legat." 32, quoting apparently an earlier writer) refers, the "Apostolic Constitutions" (viii. 11) order a rigid separation of the sexes.

In two striking ways the Roman practice with regard to the kiss of peace at Mass differs from that of other Churches. In all the Eastern, as well as in the Mozarabic and Ambrosian liturgies, the kiss is given before the offertory and consecration. This is the order recognized by Justin (loc. cit.), and probably arises partly from a desire to begin the sacred action in peace, partly because the exhortation of the Apostle, at the close of some of his epistles, led Christians to salute each other at the end of the lections, which came in the Mass of the Catechumens (i.e. in the earlier part of the service). In the Roman Mass, on the other hand, the kiss of peace follows the consecration, and is closely connected with the Communion; an order which Innocent I. defends in his celebrated letter to Decentius, on the ground that the kiss of peace is set as a "seal" on the whole of the sacred action. Again, among the Orientals (see Concil. Laodic. can. 19) the priests gave the kiss of peace to the bishop, then the laity to each other; and so, e.g. in the liturgy of St. James, and in that of St. Chrysostom as used at this day in the Greek Church, the celebrant simply wishes "peace to all," whereupon the deacon says "Let us kiss each other (ἀγαπήσωμεν ἀλλήλους) that we may agree in oneness of mind." In the Roman Mass the kiss of peace, as it were, passes down from the bishop to the priests.

It is plain from the decrees of the Councils of Frankfort (794, can. 50) and Mayence (813, can. 44) that the kiss of peace long continued to be given in the West. It was only at the end of the thirteenth century that it gave way to the use of the "osculatorium"—called also "instrumentum" or "tabella pacis," "pax," "pacificale," "freda" (from Friede), &c.—a plate with a figure of Christ on the cross stamped upon it, kissed first by the priest, then by the clerics and congregation [see PAX]. It was introduced into England by Archbishop Walter of York in 1250. Usually now the Pax is not given at all in low Masses, and in high Mass an embrace is substituted for the old kiss and given only to those in the sanctuary. The Pax is not given on the last three days of Holy Week. (Cf. Tertull. "De Orat." 18, PL, i. 1178.)

(β) At other Sacraments.—The kiss of peace was also given after the Confirmation of the neophyte, which followed immediately upon the Baptism. A relic of this custom is preserved in the words addressed by the bishop to each candidate at Confirmation (Cyprian, Ep. 64, § 4, "Ad Fidum," ed. Hartel, 719); and at absolution of penitents (see Euseb. "H.E." iii. 23, and Martène, "Ord." 13). The kiss given by the other bishops present to a bishop just consecrated is mentioned "Constit. Apost." viii. 5. This custom is still prescribed in the Roman Pontifical. So, too, is another ancient rite, according to which the bishop gives the kiss of peace to a priest at his ordination. In the Greek Ordinal (Goar, "Euchol." p. 298) it is the new priest who kisses the bishop and other priests.

(γ) The kiss at betrothal, in the Roman law, gave the betrothed woman certain rights of inheritance and made her a quasi-uxor. This rite is mentioned by Tertullian ("De Veland. Virg." 6 and 11) and by Greek canonists.

(δ) The habit of giving Communion and the kiss of peace to the dead was forbidden by the Council of Auxerre (anno 585, alias 578), canon 12, but the Greeks still give the kiss to the dead.

(B) The Kiss as a Mark of Honour.—The "woman who was a sinner" kissed (κατεφίλει) Christ's feet (Lk. vii. 38), and the same mark of affectionate reverence is in common use among Catholics.

(a) In early times the Christians used to kiss the altar as a mark of reverence to the place on which the Eucharist is offered. The priest still does so repeatedly in the Roman Mass, out of reverence for the altar and for the relics of saints enclosed there. So the celebrant at Mass signifies his love for the teaching of Christ by kissing the Gospel. This practice is also ancient, being mentioned in the first of the Roman Ordines. Jonas, bishop of Orleans, in the ninth century recognizes the antiquity of the custom. (Le Brun, i. p. 231; and see under GOSPEL.)

(β) The Pope's feet are kissed as a mark of homage immediately after he has accepted office: by cardinals newly created; by those to whom audiences are granted; &c., &c. The kiss is given on the golden cross of the sandal which the Pope wears on his right foot.

It must be remembered that this mark of honour was not originally reserved to the Pope. It was given, as Oriental customs spread throughout the empire, to the emperors, as well as to patriarchs and bishops. "In the Liturgy," says Kraus (art. Fusskuss, in "Real-Encykl."), "the ritual ascribed to Gelasius directs the deacon before reading the Gospel to kiss the Pope's feet. The same mark of honour was given occasionally to the Popes even by the highest personages on earth—e.g. by the emperors Justin and Justinian, by the kings Luitprand, Pepin, by Charlemagne, &c.; but it is also to be observed that the Popes, on the other side, also gave the act of adoration to the emperors. Only late in the Middle Ages the adoration by kissing the feet of sovereigns and bishops fell more and more into disuse, and was confined to the Vicar of Christ, and then a cross was worked on the slipper to show that this honour was done not to the mortal, but to the Son of God." Charles V. is said to have been the last royal personage who did obeisance in this way, for although Benedict XIV. received it from the King of Naples, this is explained by the peculiar relations of the Neapolitan crown to the Pope.

According to present custom, the Pope immediately after his election is divested of his cardinal's dress, puts on the house-dress of the Pope and is led to the altar, whereupon the cardinals kiss his foot and right hand, receiving the kiss of peace in return. Next, when the Pope's name has been proclaimed to the people, his foot is kissed by the Governatore of Rome and by all the "Conclavists" who have accompanied the cardinals. Both of these "adorations" take place in the conclave itself. The third "adoration" is made by the cardinals in the Sixtine chapel, on the altar of which the Pope is placed in Pontifical vestments. The Pope is then carried on a litter to St. Peter's, placed on the high altar, and again receives solemn "adoration." A newly-created cardinal kisses the Pope's foot and then his hand. Patriarchs, archbishops, and bishops kiss the Pope's foot and then his knee. Other ecclesiastics and laymen (except sovereigns) merely kiss the foot.

(A full account of the literature on the "kiss of peace" will be found in Kraus, art. Friedenskuss; Thurston, in "Cath. Enc."; Cabrol, in DACL, Baiser. On the kissing of the Pope's foot there are treatises by Valentini, "De Osculatione Pedum Romani Pontificis," Romae, 1588; by Pougard, "Del Bacio de' Piedi de' Sommi Pontefici," Roma, 1807.)

KNIGHTS. [See CHIVALRY.]

KYRIE ELEISON, CHRISTE ELEISON, &c. Greek words, meaning "Lord, have mercy," "Christ, have mercy," &c., retained by the Latin Church, and used in the Breviary offices, the prayers of the Rituale, the Litany of the Saints, &c., and in the Mass. Immediately after the introit, the celebrating priest and the server say alternately "Kyrie Eleison" three times, "Christe Eleison" three times, and then once more "Kyrie Eleison" three times. Martène ("De Antiq. Eccles. Rit.") and Mabillon (in "Ord. Rom.") show that the number of Kyries to be sung by the choir used to be left to the discretion of the celebrant, and also that the Kyrie was left out altogether in Masses which were to be followed by the Litanies. St. Thomas (3ª, q. 83, a. 4) supposes that the first triplet (Kyrie Eleison, &c.) is addressed to the Father, the second (Christe Eleison, &c.) to the Son; the third (Kyrie Eleison, &c.) to the Holy Ghost.

"Kyrie Eleison" is a formula universal in the Church. The variation "Christe Eleison" is peculiar to the Roman rite. It is unknown in the East, nor does it occur in the Ambrosian rite, as similarly it was wanting in the Mozarabic, Gallican, and other ancient liturgies. It is noteworthy that their insistence on saying "Christe Eleison," as well as "Kyrie Eleison," was made a ground of complaint against some of the old Keltic Saints.

The use of the words at Mass is undoubtedly very ancient. Κύριε ἐλέησον occurs in the Clementine liturgy as part of the prayer for Catechumens ("Constit. Apost." viii. 6), and also as a part of the Mass of Catechumens in the ancient liturgy of St. James. It is certain also that these Greek words have been kept from ancient times in the Latin liturgy. The Second Council of Vaison, in the province of Arles, which met in 529, ordered the Kyrie Eleison to be said at Mass and other services, appealing to the custom of the "Apostolic See, and of all the Italian and Eastern provinces." (Hefele-Leclercq, ii. 1113; Le Brun, "Explication de la Messe," tom. ii.; Benedict XIV. "De Missa"; Duchesne, "Christian Worship," p. 164; Fortescue, in "Cath. Enc.")

LABARUM (derivation uncertain). The banner of the cross, used by Constantine in his campaign. It was an adaptation of the cavalry standard of the Roman army, with Christian symbols instead of pagan emblems. Eusebius, a contemporary writer, in his "Life of Constantine," gives the following account of it: "He [Constantine] kept invoking God in his prayers, beseeching and imploring that He would declare Himself to him, who He was, and stretch forth His right hand over events. While the king was thus praying and perseveringly entreating, a most extraordinary sign from heaven appears to him, which perhaps it were not easy to receive on the report of anyone else, but since the victorious king himself, a long time afterwards, when we were honoured with his acquaintance and friendly intercourse, repeated the story to us who are compiling the record, and confirmed it with an oath, who would hesitate to believe the recital? especially as the ensuing period furnished unerring testimony to the tale. About midday, when the day was now on the turn, he said that he saw with his own eyes in the sky, above the sun, the trophy-like figure of a cross (σταυροῦ τρόπαιον) composed of light, and that a writing was attached to it, which said 'By this conquer'; that astonishment at the sight seized upon both himself and all the troops whom he was then leading on some expedition, and who became spectators of the portent." That same night, Constantine went on to say, "the Christ of God" appeared to him in a dream with the same sign which he had seen in the sky, and bade him have an imitation of it made, and use it in war. Constantine sent for goldworkers and jewellers, and had a costly banner made [see BANNER], surmounted by a crown, on which was the monogram formed of the first two letters of the name of Christ (☧). With this borne at the head of his army, he crossed into Italy, defeated Maxentius in several battles, and became master of Rome. Fifty men of his guards were selected to have charge of the Labarum, and victory was the unfailing attendant of its display.[1] (Kraus, "Real-Encykl."; Venables in "Dict. Chr. Antiq.")

LACTICINIA. A late Latin word meaning milk, or food made of milk. St. Thomas (2^a $2^{æ}$, q. 147, a. 8) distinguishes lacticinia from flesh and from eggs. The Greek Church (Council in Trullo, can. 56) forbade the use of eggs and lacticinia on all fast days, even at the one permitted meal. The Latin Church forbade their use on the fasting days of Lent, and Alexander VII. condemned the proposition that the obligation of abstaining from eggs and lacticinia in Lent was doubtful. With regard to other fasts, St. Thomas (loc. cit.) says the obligation of abstaining from eggs and lacticinia varies in different places, and that individuals are bound to conform to the custom of the country. St. Alphonsus ("Theol. Moral." iv. 1009) lays down the same principle. Even in Lent the use of eggs and lacticinia has been allowed, especially in Northern countries, by Papal dispensation, or else by custom, which the Popes have tolerated till in course of time it became a perpetual privilege. Moreover, the bishops in their quinquennial faculties receive power to dispense on this point. In England, as in other countries, the extent to which lacticinia may be used in Lent is determined by the indult published in each year. A recent Papal dispensation made it lawful to take lacticinia on most fasting days, even at collation. [See FAST.]

LADY-DAY. The feast of the ANNUNCIATION (q.v.).

LAETARE SUNDAY. The fourth Sunday in Lent, so called from the first word in the antiphon of the introit, "Rejoice, O Jerusalem, and gather together, all ye who love her," &c. (Is. lxvi. 10). This day is also known as Mid-Lent or Refreshment Sunday On that one Sunday in Lent the altar is decked with flowers, the organ is played, and at the principal Mass rose-coloured vestments are worn instead of violet ones.

LAMENTATIONS. Parts of the five elegiac poems at the end of the prophecies of Jeremiah (the four Lamentations and the Prayer) occur in the first nocturn of Matins (Tenebrae) of Thursday, Friday, and Saturday in Holy Week. [See HOLY WEEK.]

LAMMAS-DAY. [See PETER'S CHAINS.]

LAMPS have been from very early times used in Christian churches, and have had a sacred character attributed to them (Acts xx. 8). Thus the fourth Apostolic Canon forbids anything to be offered at the altar except "oil for the lamp, and incense at the time of the holy oblation." The controversy of Jerome with Vigilantius, who objected to the practice, shows that lamps were not only used to give light, but were burned before the tombs of the martyrs in their honour. Again, Cyril of Jerusalem (referred to in "Kirchenlex." Licht) notices the practice which still continues among us, of relighting the lamps on Holy Saturday in token of joy. The "Caerimoniale Episcoporum" favours

[1] Eusebius, Vit. Const. i. 28–37, ii. 7–9.

(suadet) the practice of burning a lamp before each altar, several before the high altar. (Gavant. par. i. tit. xx.)

Universal custom requires that a lamp should be kept burning before the Blessed Sacrament, wherever it is reserved. The oil in the lamp must be made of olives, or, if it cannot be had, the bishop may permit the use of other oils, not, however, of mineral oils, except in case of absolute necessity (Decret. S.R.C. 9 Julii, 1864). Authors speak of the practice of burning a perpetual light before the tabernacle as very ancient, but do not, so far as we can find, furnish early evidence of it. [See CANDLES AND LIGHTS.] (Leclercq, "Man. d'Arch. Chr." ii. 509 sqq.; 557 sqq.)

LANCE, THE HOLY. St. John tells us (xix. 34) that after our Lord had given up the ghost "one of the soldiers with a spear (λόγχη, lancea) opened his side." In 1492 the sultan Bajazet presented Pope Innocent VIII. with a lance-head purporting to be the very weapon with which our Lord was pierced. The relic has since been preserved in St. Peter's at Rome. (Pastor, "Hist. of the Popes," tr., v. 316.)

In the middle of the sixth century, both Cassiodorus (in Ps. lxxvi., PL, lxx. 621) and Gregory of Tours (PL, lxxi. 712) assure us that the Holy Lance was preserved at Jerusalem. When the city was taken by the Persians in 615, the relics of the Passion fell into their hands. The point of the lance was broken off and taken to Constantinople, and afterwards given to St. Louis. This portion was lost during the Revolution. The larger portion, which is said to be that now in Rome, can be traced back to Mandeville, who saw it at Constantinople in 1357; and further to various earlier pilgrims. It would seem to have been brought there some time before the tenth century. It was seen at Jerusalem by Arculphus about 670. Benedict XIV. has shown that the two portions mutually completed each other ("De Canoniz." lib. ii. p. ii. cap. 31).

Doubt was cast upon the genuineness of the Turkish relic from the fact that another "Holy Lance" was already venerated at Nuremberg. This is probably the so-called lance of Constantine, into which a portion of the Holy Lance or Nails was worked.

A feast of the Lance and Nails was until recently kept on the Friday after the first Sunday in Lent. Originally granted to the Passionists, it was extended to various dioceses by Gregory XVI., but has been withdrawn in the recent reform of the Roman Breviary. As long ago as 1353 Innocent VI. granted to Germany and Bohemia a feast of the Lance and Nails, to be kept on the Friday after the octave of Easter. The Pope's decree is in the second nocturn of the office. (De Mely, in "Exuviae Sacrae Constantinopolitanae," vol. iii.; Rohault de Fleury, "Mémoire sur les instruments de la Passion"; Thurston, in "Cath. Enc."; Schrod. in "Kirchenlex.")

LANCE (ἁγία λόγχη). A small knife used in the Prothesis or early part of the present Greek liturgy to divide the parts to be consecrated from the rest of the holy loaf. The action commemorates the piercing of our Lord's side. The priest makes four cuts in these parts and stabs them more than once, accompanying each action with texts of Scripture—"He was led as a lamb to the slaughter," &c.

The rite is probably not a very ancient one. It is wanting, not only in the Oriental liturgies of other families, but also in that of St. James, and is not mentioned by St. Germanus. It is observed, however, in the monastery of Mount Sinai, where all the new rites of the present Greek Church have not been admitted. Martigny gives a drawing of a "Culter Eucharisticus," said to have belonged to St. Thomas of Canterbury, and to have been used for a similar purpose. (See Goar, who gives a drawing of the liturgical lance; Le Brun, tom. iii. vi. 4; and Fortescue, "Orthodox Eastern Church," p. 413.)

LANGUAGE OF THE CHURCH. This title is used for want of a better to denote the Church's practice of celebrating Mass, administering the sacraments, and generally of performing her more solemn services in dead languages. For the Church cannot be said to use, or even to prefer, any one language. She requires some of her clergy to use Greek, Syriac, Coptic, Armenian, Slavonic, in the Mass, just as strictly as she requires others to employ Latin. Latin no doubt is far more widely used than other ancient languages in the offices of the Church, but this has arisen chiefly from the fact that those who would naturally use Greek, &c., in their offices have fallen away from Catholic communion. We will begin with an historical account of the discipline observed, and then give the principal reasons adduced to justify it.

Benedict XIV. ("De Missa," lib. ii. cap. 2) mentions the opinion of those who held that the Apostles said Mass in Hebrew, or that originally Mass was said only in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, the three languages on the title of the cross; and he continues, "Those who are skilled in ecclesiastical history have shown sufficiently that the Apostles and their successors did, not only preach, but also celebrate the divine offices in the vulgar tongue of the people in whose land they preached the Gospel." He quotes Bona, Le Brun, and Martène in support of his own statement, which surely does not need support. Mass, then, and the other offices, were said originally in the vernacular, because it was the vernacular; but the Church, so far as we know, has never once allowed a change in the language of the liturgy when the language in which it had been originally written had become unintelligible to the people. Nor at present is Mass ever said in a tongue still generally spoken and understood. Latin, Coptic, and Ethiopic, are, and have long been dead languages, while the ancient Greek, Syriac, Armenian, and Slavonic, used in the liturgies, are quite distinct from the modern languages which bear the same names. Even schismatical and heretical bodies which have preserved the true priesthood, and therefore the true Mass, have not ventured to substitute translations into the vulgar tongue for the ancient language of their liturgies. Indeed, Mass said in such a language as Coptic is much less understood than Mass in Latin, not only because Coptic has no affinity with the Arabic spoken by the people, but also because many of the Coptic priests can hardly read the Coptic words of their church books, and do not understand the meaning of a single sentence. One exception may here be mentioned, the only one with which we are acquainted, to the general rule, that all schismatical and heretical bodies preserve the ancient language of their liturgies, and clearly it is an exception which proves the rule. Le Brun (tom. iii. diss. vi. a. 6) notices that the Melchites—i.e. schismatic Greeks in the Patriarchates of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, who are in communion with the "orthodox" Greek Church of Constantinople—sometimes say Mass in Arabic, because it is often hard to find deacons and other assistants who can even read Greek. A friend versed in liturgical science and in the Oriental languages informs us that this exceptional usage still occurs, e.g. at Jerusalem.

On the other hand, the Church has not pursued the same uniform policy in dealing with nations newly converted to the Christian religion, and therefore destitute of a liturgy. In the middle of the ninth century the Oriental monks St. Cyril and St. Methodius introduced, not a Latin or Greek, but a Slavonic or vernacular liturgy among their Moravian converts. This measure of theirs was approved by Pope Hadrian II., and tolerated by John VIII. on condition that the translation was faithful, and the Gospel read first in Latin, then in Slavonic. But in 1061 the legate of Alexander II. in a council of Croatian and Dalmatian bishops prohibited the use of the Slavonic liturgy—which must not be confounded with the Slavonic versions of the Greek liturgies still used—and the prohibition was repeated by Gregory VII. in a letter of the year 1080 to Ladislaus, King of Bohemia. However, even as late as 1248 Innocent IV. allowed a Slav bishop to use it by special dispensation. In 1615 Paul V. gave the Jesuit missionaries leave to celebrate Mass and the divine offices in Chinese, but the brief never reached those to whom it was addressed. The Jesuits renewed their petition, and a Chinese version of the Missal was presented to Innocent XI.,[1] but nothing came of the negotiation. In the "Propylaeum" of the Bollandist Lives for May a summary is given of the reasons urged for a vernacular Chinese liturgy by Father Couplet, Procurator-General of the Jesuit missions.

Such, then, is the rule of the Church. She never allows an ancient liturgy to be altered because the language in which it is written has been altered or displaced by a modern one, and she is unwilling, though she does not always absolutely refuse, to allow the use of vernacular liturgies among nations newly converted. The Council of Trent declares (sess. xxii. cap. 8, De Sacrific. Missae) that the Fathers of the council thought it inexpedient to have Mass "celebrated everywhere in the vulgar tongue," and condemns those who affirm "that Mass ought only to be celebrated in the vulgar tongue" (ib. can. 9). We must beware, however, of pressing these statements too far. Benedict XIV. defends Colbert, bishop of Rouen, who taught in a pastoral that the ancient mode of celebrating Mass in the language of the people was the fittest means to prepare the minds of the congregation for participation in the sacrifice; or at least argues that this conviction is not condemned by the Council of Trent. The Church may have had good and weighty grounds for forgoing a usage which in itself would tend to the greatest spiritual edification.

These reasons seem to consist, first of all, in the jealousy with which the Church guards her ancient rites, and her unwillingness to face the danger of constant change in them to meet the changes in modern languages. Such changes might seriously endanger the purity of doctrine, or at least the reverence of the faithful for the rites of the Church. Let the reader only consider how much of the reverence which Protestants feel for the Book of Common Prayer is due to the fact that its pure and noble language has been preserved unchanged for centuries. A new edition in modern English would certainly be better understood, but how much of its power to soothe the heart and to inspire a sober and rational devotion would be lost in the process? Again, the preservation of the ancient forms enables priests to celebrate and the faithful to follow Mass in all lands, and thus impresses upon us, in a way which no one who has experienced it can forget, the unity of the Church. Lastly, the words of the Missal, admirably fitted as they are for the use of the priest, are by no means fitted for the use of uneducated persons, and this difficulty would not be met by a translation.

Protestant objections arise to some extent from misunderstanding the nature of Catholic worship. The Mass is a great action in which Christ's sacrifice is continued and applied. Those who are present bow their heads at the consecration, and unite themselves in spirit, if they do not actually communicate, with the communion of the priest. Christ crucified is set forth in their midst, and they know that they, on their part, must offer their souls and bodies in constant sacrifice to God by a life of purity, labour, and self-denial. It is the expressed wish of the Tridentine Fathers that the meaning of the Mass and its rites should be constantly explained to the people by their pastors; and surely the most ignorant peasant who follows Mass in the way just described, and accompanies the priest's action with prayers which come from his own heart, offers to God a reasonable service. A life of self-sacrifice and devotion—that is a great lesson taught by the sacrifice of the Mass, and it is a lesson independent of the language in which Mass is said.

The texts quoted from 1 Cor. xiv. against the Catholic usage are not to the point. "I would rather," says St. Paul, "speak five words in the church through my intelligence, that I may instruct others, than ten thousand words in a tongue." We believe St. Paul is referring to ecstatic utterances—sighs, exclamations, broken sentences which were unintelligible to others, and in which the tongue of the speaker was not controlled even by his own intelligence. Be this as it may, no parallel can be drawn between "speaking in tongues" and the use of Latin in the Mass. Strangers would not think a priest "mad" (v. 23) if they heard him reading the Latin Missal. The priest prays with "his understanding" (v. 14), for he knows Latin: others are "edified" (v. 17); and no extraordinary gift of interpretation (v. 13) is needed, for our English prayer-books give translations of the Mass. Moreover, St. Paul was familiar with a custom closely analogous to ours, and with this neither he nor any other Apostle finds fault. The services of the temple and the synagogue, like those of the synagogue at this day, were in a dead language, with the difference only that more pains are taken to diffuse the knowledge of Hebrew among poor Jews than of Latin among poor Catholics. (See Fortescue in "Cath. Enc." Rites, v.)

LAPSED (LAPSI). A name given to those who fell away from the faith under heathen persecution. The name comes into special prominence in the persecution of Decius (249–251), which exceeded all previous ones in method and severity. Some Christians fell away by actually offering sacrifice to the false gods (thurificati, sacrificati); others bought a certificate that they had sacrificed (libellatici); others allowed their names to be enrolled on the official lists as having obeyed the imperial edict (acta facientes). Benson (in Smith and Cheetham) argues that the "libellus," or certificate, was of two kinds—either a document coming from the Christian himself to the effect that he had recanted his religion, or from the magistrate, who certified that the Christian had recanted, the Christian himself remaining passive and merely accepting this means of escape.

The "Lapsi" were subjected to long—sometimes life-long—penance, varying according to the degree of their guilt, and, if priests, were reduced to lay communion. But great weight was given to the "libelli pacis"—i.e. documents from confessors or martyrs in prison, begging the restoration, of those who had fallen and repented, to the peace of the Church. (See under INDULGENCES.] [Cyprian's "Letters" and his treatise "De Lapsis" are the chief authorities on the subject; Batiffol, "Études d'Histoire" &c. p. 111 sqq.; Morinus, "De Disciplina in adm. LAST DAY. We have already had to speak of the Last Day, under the articles ANTICHRIST and JUDGMENT, GENERAL AND PARTICULAR. In this place we proceed to note certain points in ordinary Catholic belief not included under these previous articles.

Scripture tells us of certain signs which will precede the Last Day. The Gospel will first be preached all over the world (Mt. xxiv. 14), which, as St. Augustine warns us (Ep. 99, PL, xxxiii. 715), does not mean that all men will be converted, but that the Church will exist in all nations. When the fulness of the Gentiles has come in, then—for the words need not imply more than this (see Estius, ad loc.)—the great mass of the Jews will embrace the Christian belief (Rom. xi. 25). Enoch and Elias, according to the common belief, will appear to preach penance. This idea has an interesting history, which deserves more special mention, but we will begin by introducing the current belief itself in the words of St. Augustine (PL, xxxviii. 1376): "Enoch and Elias," he says (Serm. 299), "live; they have been translated; wherever they are, they live. And if a certain conjecture of faith made from the Scripture of God is not wrong, they will die. For the Apocalypse relates that at a future time two wonderful prophets will both die and rise again, in the sight of men, and go up to the Lord; and they are understood to be Enoch and Elias, although in that passage their names are not given." Let us trace the origin of that belief. Genesis and the Book of Kings tell us that Enoch and Elias were removed from the earth in an extraordinary way. From Malachias iv. 5, and from Mt. xvii. 11—though the inference is precarious—it was inferred that Elias, not only in spirit and power, but in his proper person, would reappear before the end of the world. From the words of Ecclus. xliv. 16, "Enoch pleased God, and was translated into Paradise, that he may give penance to the nations," the same conclusion was drawn with regard to Enoch, though in the Greek the words simply are, "Enoch pleased God, and was translated, [being] an example of repentance to the nations." This belief in the reappearance of Enoch and Elias was connected with, and, as it was thought, supported by, that remarkable section of the Apocalypse, xi. 1-13. The holy city—i.e. Jerusalem (see v. 8)—with the exception of the ναὸς, or temple in the strict sense of the word, is to be trodden under foot by the heathen. Two witnesses of Christ, who are compared with the lamps and olive-trees in Zacharias, are to prophesy for about three years and a half, and to show miraculous power, but at last they are to be killed by "the beast." However, after three days and a half, they are to live again and go up "to heaven in the cloud." The fate of Jerusalem here depicted was taken as an allegory of the fortunes of the Christian Church, and it was commonly supposed that Enoch and Elias were the two witnesses. This belief is expressed clearly by Tertullian ("De An." 50, PL, ii. 733), and was undoubtedly the prevalent and, indeed, all but universal opinion of the ancients. Thilo, on the "Evangelium Nicodemi," c. 25, has treated the whole question elaborately. Bede, however, is said (by Dusterdieck, on the Apocalypse, ad loc.) to have rejected this interpretation; and we are able to quote Maldonatus (on Mt. xvii. 11), for what is, as we venture to think, a far more likely interpretation—viz. that St. John refers to Moses and Elias, who represented the law and the prophets, and had already witnessed to Christ in his transfiguration.

Another sign of the nearness of the last day is "the Apostasy "of 2 Thess. ii. 3, which St. Thomas and Estius, against many other interpreters, take to mean "a defection from the Catholic faith, and that a universal one, by which not only persons, however many (a thing that has often happened in former ages), but also the kingdoms and all, or all but all, provinces will withdraw from the Catholic Church." Signs, too, are the natural portents, famine, pestilence, earthquakes, darkening of the sun, &c., mentioned in Mt. xxiv. and Lk. xxi. But, after all, "concerning that day or hour no man knoweth, not even the angels in heaven, nor the Son, but the Father" (Mk. xiii. 32). The mistakes which even able and pious men have made on this point are well known. "Even some of the Fathers," Jungmann writes ("De Noviss." p. 208), "as St. Cyprian, St. Ambrose, St. Basil, St. Gregory, St. Bernard, and distinguished preachers of the divine word, like St. Norbert and St. Vincent Ferrer, have sometimes expressed the opinion that the day of the Lord was at hand, because of the signs which seemed to them to be present." The persons who have been led away after this fashion in our own time have been of very different intellectual and spiritual calibre, and their warnings have occasioned some amusement but very little panic.

The order of events on the last day is quite uncertain. St. Augustine conjectures ("De Civit. Dei," xx. 30, PL, xli. 708), but merely conjectures, that the appearance of Elias will come first, then the conversion of the Jews, the persecution of Antichrist, Christ's advent, the resurrection, the separation of the good and the wicked, the conflagration and finally the renovation of the world. On the other hand, St. Thomas ("In Sentent. IV." dist. xlvii, q. 2. a. 3), whose opinion is most commonly followed, argues that the action of fire will begin before the judgment. It will, he thinks, kill and destroy the bodies of all upon the earth, torturing the evil, serving as purgatorial torment to the imperfect, and inflicting God's vengeance on the wicked. Further, it will cleanse and renew the earth, not after the judgment, as St. Augustine thought, but before it. This St. Thomas gathers from Rom. viii. 21, which, as he considers, makes the renovation of the world synchronous with the resurrection of the just. (See Jungmann, "De Novissimis"; Billot, "De Novissimis"; Atzberger, "Die Chr. Eschatologie" and "Geschichte der Chr. Eschatologie"; Oxenham, "Christian Eschatology"; Wilhelm and Scannell, "Cath. Theol." ii. 541.)

LAST THINGS. The four Last Things are generally said to be Death, Judgment, Heaven, Hell. These are not all, but the most important, things which happen to men as they leave and after they leave this world. The Germans speak of Eschatology (ὁ τῶν ἐσχάτων λόγος) as a special department of theology, and the name has been adopted by English writers. It includes the consideration of purgatory, the resurrection, the eternal reign of Christ, the destruction and renovation of the world. A very useful treatise "De Novissimis" has been published by Jungmann (Ratisbonae, 1874). Most of the subjects which fall under this head are discussed in separate articles. [See the previous article.]

LATERAN, CANONS REGULAR OF THE. A Congregation of Augustinian Canons who derive their name from the fact that for some centuries (until 1391) they formed the chapter of the great Lateran basilica. Their office for the feast of Pope St. Gelasius (d. 492) states that the pontiff established them at the Lateran. (See AUGUSTINIAN CANONS; Allaria in "Cath. Enc." Canons Regular.)

LATERAN CHURCH AND COUNCILS. The family of the Plautii Laterani had a magnificent house on the Coelian hill—"egregiae Lateranorum aedes," as Juvenal calls it (x. 17). This house, or a house on the same site, was known as the Lateran palace, and belonged to the Empress Fausta (Fleury, "H. E." x. 11). Her husband, Constantine, built close to it the Church of "the Saviour," known as the Basilica Constantiniana, and also—because the Emperor built a Baptistery there, and Baptisteries are associated with St. John Baptist—as the Church of St. John Lateran. It is the chief or Cathedral Church of Rome, and there the "Stations" are held on many solemn days (ib. xi. 36).[1] Bulls of Gregory XI., in 1372, and of Pius V., in 1569, have confirmed its pre-eminence over all other churches, even St. Peter's, and justified the proud inscription which meets the eye at the entrance, "Omnium urbis et orbis ecclesiarum mater et caput." In this church, besides an important council in 649 against the Monothelites, five general councils have been held.

(1) Under Calixtus II., in 1123. More than 300 bishops and 600 abbots were present. This was the Ninth General Council, and the first ever held in the West. The chief object was to end the strife on Investiture [q.v.] between the Emperor Henry V. and the Holy See. The arrangement made at the Concordat of Worms was confirmed. Henry agreed to leave the choice and consecration of prelates free, to resign all claims to invest with ring and staff, and to restore Church goods, while the Pope allowed the elections to take place in the Emperor's presence, gave him the right to decide in contested elections after taking counsel from the metropolitans and provincial bishops, and to confer the regalia with the sceptre. (Hefele-Leclercq, v. 630 sqq.)

(2) The Second Lateran Council (Tenth General Council), held in 1139 under Innocent II., and attended by about 1000 prelates, excommunicated Roger of Sicily (champion of Anacletus II. the Antipope), suspended clerics promoted by Anacletus, and imposed silence on Arnold of Brescia, the great ecclesiastical demagogue of the day. Thirty canons were passed on simony, incontinence, clerical dress, breaking the "Peace of God," and contests dangerous to life. (Hefele-Leclercq, v. 721).

(3) The Third Lateran and Eleventh General Council was convoked in 1179, by Alexander III., was attended by more than 300 bishops, and numbered about a thousand members in all. It ordered that future Popes should be elected by a majority of two thirds, and passed sentence of excommunication on anyone who accepted the Papacy on other conditions, as well as upon those who supported him. Disciplinary enactments were also made against simony, clerical incontinence, intercourse with Saracens and Jews. (Hefele-Leclercq, v. 1086 sqq.)

(4) Innocent III. opened the Fourth Lateran and Twelfth General Synod, the most imposing, probably, of all councils ever held, in 1215, for the recovery of the Holy Land and the reform of the Church. The representatives of Frederick II., of Henry, Emperor of Constantinople, of the Kings of England, France, Aragon, Hungary, Cyprus, Jerusalem, and of other princes, 412 bishops, 800 abbots, many representatives of absent bishops and chapters, were present. The seventy decrees of the council concern most important points of discipline and doctrine. The Bishop of Constantinople was made the first of the Eastern patriarchs; the Greek rites, the jurisdiction of the other patriarchs, were fully acknowledged; while at the same time the Greek practice of rebaptizing children already baptized by Latins, and of washing altars to mark their defilement if they had been used by Latin priests, was reprobated, and the supremacy of Rome insisted on. Regulations were made and indulgences offered for the coming crusade. The duty of annual Confession and Communion was enforced. Definitions were issued on the absolute unity of God. Abbot Joachim had maintained that the three divine Persons were one God only in the same sense as many human persons are all men or Christians one with each other and with Christ. In other words he substituted a specific or moral for that numerical unity in which, with the real distinction of the three Persons, the mystery of the Trinity consists. The council, on the contrary, defined that each of the three Persons is identical with the one divine substance. It also defined the Catholic doctrine on the sacraments, &c., against the Albigenses, and in particular that the bread and wine in the Mass are "transubstantiated" into Christ's Body and Blood. (Hefele-Leclercq, v. 1316–1398; Denzinger-Bannwart, "Enchiridion," p. 188–195.)

(5) The Fifth Lateran Council (Eighteenth General) was opened by Julius II., in 1512, and closed by Leo X., in 1517. The Church was distracted at the time by the schismatic Council of Pisa. The Fifth Lateran was attended by 15 cardinals and 79 (afterwards 120) bishops, mostly Italian. The decrees of Pisa were declared null, the "Pragmatic Sanction" condemned, and the French Concordat was approved, canons passed on preaching, exemption of regulars, monts de piété, &c., &c. Two decrees of the council are of wider interest. It defined (Bull "Pastor aeternus") the Pope's "authority over all councils," and (Bull "Apostolici regiminis") condemned those who held that the intellectual soul is mortal, or only one in all men, or that these propositions were true at least philosophically. (For the French objections to the oecumenical character of the council, see Hefele-Leclercq, i. 90, and the article COUNCILS.)

LATIN. [See LANGUAGE OF THE CHURCH.]

LATRIA (λατρεία) in itself simply means "service," whether rendered to God or man; but the usage of the Church has made it a technical term for that supreme worship which can lawfully be offered to God alone. The word is so used by the Greek Fathers and the Seventh General Council; and St. Augustine ("Contr. Faust." xx. 21, PL, xlii. 385) adopts it on the ground that no one Latin word will do instead. It was probably St. Augustine's influence which made it a familiar term in Latin theology. The sacrifice of the Mass is the principal act of latria, hence it is called in patristic literature λατρεία τῆς οἰκονομίας (Petavius, "De Incarnat." xv. 2).

LATROCINIUM (σύνοδος λῃστρική: "Robber Synod," "Council of Bandits"). A name given by Pope Leo (and current ever since) to the heretical council which met at Ephesus in 449 (Ep. xcv., PL, liv.). Dioscorus, Patriarch of Alexandria, had come forward in defence of the doctrine that there is but one nature of the Incarnate Word, and being discontented with the decision of the bishops who met at Constantinople and affirmed that Christ was one Person in two natures, he used his influence with the Empress Eudocia to have a general council convoked at Ephesus. Pope Leo did not oppose the meeting of the council, although he had clearly laid down the doctrine of the two natures in his letter to Flavian, bishop of Constantinople. Dioscorus presided at the council, the Papal legates, Juvenal of Jerusalem, Domnus of Antioch, and Flavian of Constantinople, being present. Dioscorus tore their papers from all notaries except his own, and is accused of having falsified the Acts; he called in soldiers and fanatical monks, armed with cudgels, Flavian was trodden under foot and imprisoned, and the other bishops, with few exceptions, were forced by violence and starvation to sign a blank paper on which Dioscorus afterwards set the condemnation of Flavian. The Papal legates, however, protested at once. Flavian died shortly afterwards on his way to exile. Theodosius confirmed the decrees of this synod, but it was rejected by the churches of Syria, Asia Minor, Pontus, and the West. Pope Leo of course absolutely refused to acknowledge it. [See CHALCEDON, COUNCIL OF. Hefele-Leclercq, ii. 584–621.]

LATTEN. [See BRASSES.]

LAUDA, SION. [See HYMNS.]

LAUDS. [See BREVIARY.]

LAURA. (Gr. λαύρα, properly an alley or lane.) An aggregation of separate cells, tenanted by monks, "under the not very strongly defined control of a superior." [1] Usually each monk had a cell to himself, but in the laura of Pachomius one cell was assigned to three monks. For five days in the week the tenants of the laura remained in their cells, living on bread and water, and working at basket-making, or some similar employment; on the Saturday and Sunday they took their meals together in the common refectory, and worshipped God in the common church. The discipline of the laura was a kind of intermediate stage between the eremitical life of St. Antony and the monasticism founded by St. Basil and St. Benedict. It flourished in the fourth and fifth centuries in the desert country near the Jordan; St. Euthymius, St. Sabbas, and the abbot Gerasimus were its chief types and promoters. St. Euthymius lived to be ninety-six years old; just before he died he told the person whom the monks had designated as his successor that it was the will of God that the laura should be turned into a monastery, as if foreseeing that this was the discipline of the future for the more perfect souls. (Fleury, livr. xxviii., xxix., xxx.; Smith and Cheetham.)

LAUS TIBI, CHRISTE. [See GOSPEL.]

LAVABO. The first word of verse 6 of Ps. xxv., which the priest recites while the acolyte pours water on his hands shortly before the Canon of the Mass. The rite indicates the perfect purity of heart with which the priest should celebrate those holy mysteries. This washing of the hands (by the deacon, however) is mentioned by St. Cyril of Jerusalem. The psalm is also recited during the washing of the hands in the liturgies of St. Chrysostom and St. Basil. It is not said in the Ambrosian Mass, in which the priest purifies his hands silently just before the consecration. There is a great variety on this point in our old English rites. In that of York the washing is accompanied by a verse of Ps. xxv., the "Veni, Creator," and a prayer; in that of Hereford, by the "Veni, Creator," and a prayer; in those of Sarum and Bangor (?), simply by a prayer. (Le Brun, Benedict XIV., Maskell; Duchesne, "Christian Worship"; Fortescue, "The Mass," 309–311.)

LAW. The word is used in two widely different senses. When we speak of the "law of gravitation," we mean an observed invariable uniformity of co-existence and succession connecting certain effects with certain conditions or causes, so that when the conditions are present the effect invariably follows. The necessity which links the cause to the effect we do not understand, nor can account for: we only know by an unfailing experience that it exists: and as it forms an element in the phenomenal system of motions and changes in the midst of which we live, we call it a physical necessity, and the resulting uniformity we term a law of nature. But when we speak of the law of the Twelve Tables, or of the laws of Lycurgus, or the Mosaic, or the Gospel law, we mean a uniformity which ought to be imposed (assuming the law to be just) on the actions of those subject to it, but which is not always observed in fact, because the subjects of the law are free agents and can refuse to obey it. The necessity which should, but does not always, make the conduct conformable to the precept, we call a moral necessity, or obligation; and the precepts which, being addressed to free agents, enjoin but do not compel their own fulfilment, we term moral laws, and divide into civil, criminal, natural, positive, &c. Of laws in this second sense, the first is the natural law, which we must carefully distinguish from "laws of nature" or physical laws. This natural law is implanted by God in the mind of every one of his reasonable creatures, distinguishing for them good from evil, and bidding them follow the one and shun the other (Rom. ii. 14, 15). But since the will of man has been weakened by the Fall, he is not able to obey the dictates of this natural law without some kind of assistance or reinforcement. This assistance is given, partly by human ordinances, directing, forbidding, rewarding, and punishing, partly by the revealed law of God; through the operation of which it appears to have been His will, first, to educate a single people to a more perfect knowledge and obedience; next, gradually to leaven and transform all the tribes of mankind, as they become one by one incorporated in the Catholic Church. Accordingly the revealed law is divided, historically, into the law of the Old and that of the New covenant. The law of the Old covenant, given on Mount Sinai, prepared the way for the kingdom of Christ, and—except as to that portion of it which was a restoration of the natural law and is perpetually binding—lost its divine authority on the establishment of the Church. The law of the New covenant is that which Christ the king proposes through the Church [see CHURCH OF CHRIST, GRACE, SACRAMENTS] to the human race. Thus every man, besides being subject to the internal or natural law seated in the conscience, is under two external laws. He is first—if not actually and de facto, yet potentially and de jure—under the divine law as interpreted and administered by the Catholic Church. Secondly, he is under the lex loci, the system of human law belonging to the country of his birth or domicile. If a conflict arise between the two external laws—as when the law of the land enjoins idolatry, or forbids the frequentation of the sacraments—it is manifest that the lower law ought to yield to the higher, and that individual Christians are bound, whatever may be the consequences, to "hear the Church," and disobey any contrary injunction. (Aberlé, in "Kirchenlex."; Cathrein, in "Cath. Enc."; St. Thomas, 1ª 2æ, q. 90 sqq.; Suarez, "De Legibus.")

LAX. [See MORAL THEOLOGY.]

LAY BROTHERS AND SISTERS. Persons who take the habit and vows of religion, but are employed mostly in manual labour, and are exempt therefore from the duties of choir, when they exist, or from the studies, &c., incumbent on the other members of religious orders, where there is no choir.

The first instance of a distinction between lay brothers (fratres conversi, frères convers) occurred in the monastery of Vallombrosa, founded in the earlier part of the eleventh century by St. John Gualbert. Afterwards we find lay brothers among the monks of Hirsau, and the Abbot William is said in his Life to have instituted this kind of religious. The Carthusians adopted the new practice, and now lay brothers and sisters are to be found in most religious orders, even among the Benedictines, who knew nothing of such a distinction at first.

Two causes, according to Fleury, contributed to the change. The greater part of the monks (contrary to the old usage) in the eleventh century were ecclesiastics, and it was necessary to provide for those who had the religious but no ecclesiastical vocation. Next, in the eleventh century, Latin was no longer a vulgar tongue, and hence many of the religious, ignorant of Latin and often unable to read, were unfit for the duties of the choir. (Fleury, "H.E." lxi. 4, lxiii. 58; Discours, viii. a. 5.)

LAY COMMUNION is a phrase scarcely used at present among Catholics. But in the language of the early Church it often occurs to describe the state to which a cleric was reduced by forfeiting the right to exercise his functions without being excommunicated and losing the ordinary privileges of a Christian. Thus the Council of Agde (anno 506), canon 50, orders that bishops, priests, and deacons, guilty of certain great crimes, should for the rest of their lives only receive lay communion (communionem laicam). (Hefele-Leclercq, ii. 1000.)

A cleric may be reduced to lay communion in three ways. (α) A cleric in minor orders may lawfully marry, but in this case the canon law deprives him of office, benefice, and the privileges of his state. The Council of Trent, however (sess. xxiii. c. 17, De Reform.), allows the promotion of men already married to minor orders, provided they are not "bigami" and there is a lack of other candidates. They have the privileges canonis et fori if they wear tonsure and cassock. (β) A cleric in holy orders may be dispensed from his obligations—e.g., of wearing the clerical dress, reciting his breviary, of celibacy, &c.—by the Pope. In that case the cleric in question is usually prohibited from exercising the functions of his office. (γ) The old law of the Church reduced to lay communion clerics who were deposed or removed from their office. But, according to the more modern canon law, the loss of clerical privileges is only entailed by degradation.

LAYMAN. One of the people (λαὸς), as distinguished from the clergy. The Septuagint (Exodus xix. 24, Isai. xxiv. 2) used the word λαὸς in contradistinction to the priests. The other Greek versions have the words λαικὸς "laic," and λαικοῦν "to profane"; and so the Vulgate (1 Kings, xxi. 4) has the expression "laicos panes." Clem. Rom., Ep. i. 40, uses laic or layman (λαικὸς) for the first time in Christian literature, but he means by it a Jewish and not a Christian layman. But in the Clementine Homilies, Epist. Cl. § 5; in Clem. Al. "Strom." iii. 12, p. 552, ed. Potter; in Tertullian, "Praescr." 41, PL, ii. 57, we find the modern use of λαικὸς and laicus for Christian layman.

LAZARISTS. This is the popular name for the "Congregation of the Priests of the Mission," founded by St. Vincent of Paul in 1624, and established a few years later in the College of St. Lazare at Paris. St. Vincent, being engaged as a tutor in the family of the Countess de Joigny, was summoned one day to the sick-bed of one of her vassals, a well-to-do peasant held in general esteem, who desired to make his confession to him. Pressing the inquiry firmly into the state of the man's soul, St. Vincent discovered with consternation that he had the burden of several unconfessed mortal sins on his conscience, in spite of which he had been going on for many years making sacrilegious confessions and communicating. Being brought by the saint to a proper sense of the enormity of his conduct the man was very grateful, and declared without scruple his conviction that he owed more than his life to St. Vincent. The countess, hearing what had happened, entreated the holy man to preach in the church of Tolleville (near Amiens), where most of the congregation were her vassals, on the sin and danger incurred by making bad confessions. The consciences of the hearers were aroused, and numbers crowded to the confessional who had hitherto made no use, or a bad use of it. The countess now conceived the idea of founding and endowing an institute for the purpose of preaching missions in country districts. She desired Vincent to obtain if possible the services of Jesuits or French Oratorians; but neither society was able to undertake the work at the time. Finally it was arranged that Vincent, aided by several pious secular priests, who had for some years been associated with him in his various works of mercy and instruction, should commence the missions; that the institute should be established in the Collège des Bons Enfans, offered for the purpose by the Archbishop of Paris; that the countess should endow it with forty thousand livres; but that Vincent should not leave her house while she lived. Thus was the institute founded in the March of 1624; the countess died the same year. The congregation (which was confirmed by a bull of Urban VIII. in 1632) had a threefold end—the sanctification of its own members, the work of the missions, and the training of an exemplary clergy. As a rule, eight months in the year were devoted to missions, which were conducted nearly on the same plan on which Redemptorist and Passionist missions are conducted at the present day. St. Vincent, having lived to see twenty-five houses of the new institute established—in France, Italy, and Poland—died in 1660, being eighty-five years old. It has been already stated that the congregation removed to the College of St. Lazare (which had belonged to the regular canons of St. Victor) in 1632. It was a spacious site, and the third superior-general, Edmond Joly, erected on it the vast range of buildings still seen there. St. Vincent of Paul was beatified in 1729, and canonized in 1737. In the time of Hélyot—that is, early in the 18th century—there were eighty-four houses of the institute in nine provinces, whereof six were in France, two in Italy, and one in Poland. Some of the fathers showed an inclination towards Jansenism; but the firm and prudent government of the general of that day, M. Bonnet, checked in time the evil tendency. At the Revolution St. Lazare was twice plundered by the mob; several of the fathers were massacred in September 1792; and those who would not take the condemned oath were driven out of France. The maison St. Lazare was turned into a prison for women. Under the first Napoleon the congregation was allowed to re-enter France, and under the Restoration the grant was made to it of a house in the Rue de Sèvres. The missions left vacant in China and the Levant on the suppression of the Jesuits in 1773 were transferred to the Lazarists. The Congregation has at present missions in almost every land.

In the time of the Crusades there was a religious and military order of "Lazarists" whose chief duty was the care of lepers (Lk. xvi. 20 sqq.). When the Holy Land fell into the hands of the infidels the members betook themselves to France, and established the famous lazar-house at Paris, known as St. Lazare, originally a house for lepers as its name imports. (Bougaud, "Hist. de S. Vincent de Paul"; Maynard, "Hist. de S. Vincent de Paul"; De Broglie, "S. Vincent de Paul"; Hélyot, "Annals of the Congregation of the Mission.")

LEAGUE OF THE CROSS. The Catholic Total Abstinence League of the Cross was founded in 1873, for the purpose of uniting Catholics in a holy warfare against intemperance, and of thereby raising the religious, social, and domestic state of our Catholic people. "Total abstinence from intoxicating drinks is for all persons the surest safeguard, and for vast numbers the only safeguard, from intemperance. Those, therefore, who abstain from intoxicating drinks for the sake of Christian prudence towards themselves, or of Christian charity towards others, by so doing please Almighty God." The fundamental rules of the League are:—

1. The pledge is of total abstinence, and is taken without limit as to time.

2. Only Catholics can become members of the League.

3. All members, after they have joined the League, must live as good, practical Catholics.

4. No one who is not a practical Catholic can, as long as he fails to practise his religion, hold any office in the League.

The form of the pledge is: "I promise to you, Rev. Father, and to the League of the Holy Cross, by the help of God's grace, to abstain from all intoxicating drinks." To this is usually added: "And I also promise to be faithful in the practices of my holy religion." The pledge is not an oath or a vow, and is not of itself binding under sin. But it would be a sin for those to break the pledge who know that they would thereby expose themselves to the danger of intemperance. Many indulgences have been granted to members by the Holy See. (From the abstract of the Constitution and Rules of the League of the Cross.) [See also the art. TEMPERANCE.]

LECTERN, LECTURN, OR LETTERN. The reading-desk, called also pulpitum or ambo (q.v.), but most frequently legite, in French "jubé." St. Benedict (sixth century) calls it analogium. It is made of wood, stone, or metal, often in the shape of an eagle, whose outspread wings formed the stand for the volume to rest upon. (J. C. Cox, "Pulpits, Lecterns and Organs in English Churches"; Rock, i. 170.)

LECTION OR LESSON (Lectio, ἀνάγνωσις.) Some details on this subject have been given under EPISTLE, GOSPEL, BREVIARY. But something remains to be said now on the history of lections in general, and on the variety of practice which separates the ancient from the modern, and again the Eastern from the Western Church.

There was a far more extensive and continuous use of Scripture in the public services of the early Church than there is among us. Usually speaking, our people only hear the Gospel and Epistle read in the Mass, with the psalms and the little chapter (scarcely more than a verse or two), usually from the Epistle, at Vespers and Compline on Sundays or great feasts. In the primitive Church it was very different. Thus St. Augustine ("Praef. Exposit. in 1 Joann." PL, xxxv. 1977) says that he "was accustomed to handle (tractare) the Gospel according to John in the order of the lessons"; and that, although this order had been necessarily interrupted by lessons for special solemnities, the continuous reading had only been "intermitted, not omitted." In this way Genesis was read in Lent, Job in Holy Week, Acts between Easter and Pentecost, &c., &c. Our Breviary lessons for the first nocturn are no doubt a relic of this custom. But they are only a relic, partly because they are very incomplete, partly because the multiplication of festivals causes many even of the portions given in the office to be left out altogether; above all because the laity, as a rule, cannot assist at those Breviary offices. Chrysostom, says Scrivener, referring to "Hom. x. in Joann.," exhorts his hearers to peruse and mark the passages (περικοπαὶ) of the Gospels which were to be publicly read to them the ensuing Saturday and Sunday. (See his "Introduction to the Criticism of the New Testament," 2nd ed. p. 69 seq.) Those sections, still preserved with little alteration in the modern Greek Church, are very different from our Gospels and Epistles. They contain the whole text of the Gospels, and at least nearly the whole text of the Acts and St. Paul's Epistles. On the other hand, while the Greeks read the Gospel on Sunday mornings in the office as well as in liturgy, their daily offices contain no lessons from Scripture.

It is certain, however, that the custom of introducing lections in the Breviary office, still maintained in the West, was at one time familiar to the Eastern churches. The Council of Laodicea, canon 17, requires a lesson to be read after each psalm, and Cassian ("Coenob. Inst." ii. 4) mentions that the Egyptian monks read two lections, one from the New, one from the Old, Testament, after each series of twelve psalms. This practice was already very ancient even in his time. At the end of the sixth century at latest, as appears from Gregory the Great (Epist. xii. 24, PL, lxxvii. 1234) and from the rule of St. Benedict, not only Scripture but also homilies upon it by Fathers and Doctors of the Church were read in the office. Charlemagne, in a "Constitutio de Emendatione Librorum et Officiorum," of 788, caused these lections from the Fathers to be revised and altered by Paul the Deacon. We have earlier evidence for the custom of reading the Acts of the Martyrs, which had begun before St. Augustine's time (Serm. cccxv. c. 1, PL, xxxix. 1426).

LECTIONARY. The oldest Latin Lectionary was known as the "Comes" (i.e. the cleric's "companion")—the "Comes Major" if it contained the Epistles and Gospels for the year in full, the "Comes Minor" if it merely noted the beginning and end of the portions read. The authorship was attributed to St. Jerome, and although there is no sufficient evidence for this belief, the Comes must have been compiled about St. Jerome's time, for it is mentioned by name in a document dated 471 (Mabillon, "De Re Diplomat." 1, vi. 482 seq., edit. 3, Naples). It has, however, undergone serious alterations. A Gallican Lectionary containing sections from the Prophets, Epistles, and Gospels, was discovered by Mabillon, and edited by him ("De Liturg. Gall." tom. ii.). It is written in Merovingian characters, recognizes among the few feasts which it names that of St. Geneviève, and usually assigns three lections to each Mass, after the manner of the ancient Gallican Liturgy.

In the Greek church the Lectionaries consist of lessons from the Gospels (εὐαγγελιστάρια); from the Acts and Epistles (πραξαπόστολοι); while a few books known as ἀποστολοευαγγέλια have lessons taken both from the Gospels and Apostolic writings. Traces of Church lessons occur in MSS. of the fifth and sixth centuries—viz. in the Alexandrine MS. and in the Codex Bezae. Of Greek Lectionaries in separate volumes, none perhaps are older than the eighth century. The general name for tables of lessons, corresponding to the "Comes Minor" in Latin, is συναξάριον; for tables of week-day lessons ἐκλογάδια (τῶν δ' εὐαγγελιστῶν or τοῦ ἀποστόλου) while tables of lessons for Saints' days are called μηνολόγια. The oldest known Synaxarion is prefixed to the Codex Cyprius (K), of the eighth or ninth century; another is found in the Codex Campensis (M), which is perhaps a little later. An elaborate account of the Greek lessons will be found in Scrivener ("Plain Introduction to the Criticism of the N.T."), from whom the latter part of this article has been taken. (Baudot, "The Lectionary," Eng. tr.)

LECTOR (ἀναγνώστης). A cleric, in minor orders, whose duty originally consisted in reading the Church lessons. The great antiquity of the order—the second of the minor orders among the Latins, the first among the Greeks—is proved by the facts that it is mentioned by Cornelius, Bishop of Rome, in the middle of the third century (apud Euseb. "H.E." vi. 43), and that it is common to sects who differ from each other, and who separated from the Catholic Church in the fifth century—viz. Copts, Syrian Jacobites and Nestorians, not to speak of the schismatic Greeks. The Ethiopians, indeed, ignore this order, but it is mentioned in their ancient canons and councils. (Denzinger, "Ritus Orientalium," tom. i. p. 118.)

The very form of ordination, as it still exists with very slight alteration among us at the present day, is given in canon 8 of the so-called Fourth Council of Carthage, before the close of the sixth century. The bishop is to give the book (codicem) from which the Lector is to read, with the words "Take it, and be a reader of the word of God, to have, if thou fulfil thy office faithfully and usefully, part with those who have ministered the word of God."

The Greeks, according to Chardon, 793, have from ancient times ordained their Readers by imposition of hands, the handing of the book after ordination being among them comparatively modern. As to the other Oriental rites, the Jacobites, Copts and Syrians do not, the Nestorians do, confer this order by laying on of hands: all of them hand the book at the end of the ordination rite, but without any form of words. (Denzinger, tom. i. p. 134.)

Besides reading in church, the Lectors were also employed as secretaries to bishops and priests. They were often younger than the Ostiarii or Porters, for the Lectorate was the first order conferred on young clerics (Chardon, 789). The Roman Pontifical also assigns to them the office of blessing bread and the new fruits, a duty first mentioned in Pontificals of the years 600 and 700. (Lector, in "Kirchenlex.") At present this order is regarded chiefly as a step to the priesthood, and it is only in the office of Good Friday that the Missal recognizes their functions.

Altogether distinct from the Lectors just described are the "Lector Mensae," or reader at table in religious houses; the "Lector dignitarius," who regulated the reading of the lessons in some cathedral churches; and the Lectores—i.e. lecturers or professors—in monasteries and universities. (Morinus, "De Sacr. Ord.")

LEGATE. Among the Romans legati were either ambassadors, or officers of high rank appointed with the sanction of the senate to assist a dictator, consul, or proconsul in the performance of his duties, military or civil. In modern acceptation the term is confined to ecclesiastics representing the Holy See and armed with its authority. Legates are of three kinds—legates a latere, emissaries or nuncios (legati missi, nuntii, internuntii), and legates by virtue of their office (legati nati). The dignity of a legate a latere is, and has long been, confined to cardinals, though in former times it was not so: e.g. Pandulf, the legate sent by Innocent III. to receive the submission of King John, was only a sub-deacon. Legates a latere are either ordinary or extraordinary: the first govern provinces belonging to the Ecclesiastical State—such as were (before 1860) the Romagna and the March of Ancona—in the Pope's name; the second class are deputed to visit foreign Courts on extraordinary occasions, such as a negotiation for a peace, or arrangements for a general council, &c. Legati missi correspond to the ambassadors and ministers maintained by secular States at foreign capitals. Formerly they were called apocrisiarii [APOCRISIARIUS]: now, nuncios or internuncios—the latter being of inferior rank. Legati nati are, or were, archbishops to whose sees by an ancient Papal concession the legatine authority was permanently attached: as was the case with Canterbury in England, and Salzburg and Prague in Germany.

All three classes of legates above mentioned formerly enjoyed an ample, and even an immediate, jurisdiction, as representing the Holy See, in the provinces where they resided. Hence frequent collisions with episcopal authority arose. To put an end to these conflicts, the Council of Trent[1] decreed that legates, even those de latere, nuncios, ecclesiastical governors, or others, were not to presume, on the strength of any faculties whatsoever, to impede the bishops in matrimonial causes or in those of criminous clerks, nor in any way to curtail or disturb their jurisdiction; nor, on the other hand, were they to take proceedings against clerks or other ecclesiastical persons, unless after recourse had been had to the bishop and he had neglected to act. The jurisdiction of legates is now, therefore, chiefly appellate. (Ferraris, Legatus; Taunton; Phillips in "Kirchenlex.")

LEGEND, GOLDEN. A collection of lives of the saints by Jacopo de Voragine (d. 1298). It was entitled by the author "Legenda Sanctorum," but was known as "Legenda Aurea" on account of the high estimation in which it was held. It is divided into five sections corresponding with the seasons of the year, viz. from Advent to Christmas, Christmas to Septuagesima, Septuagesima to Easter, Easter to the octave of Pentecost, and from the octave of Pentecost to Advent. Besides the lives of the saints it contains treatises on the meaning and importance of the great seasons, e.g. Advent, Christmas, &c. From the historical point of view it is valueless; but considered as legendary and parabolic it is admirably adapted to promote the love of God and devotion to His saints. Melchior Canus has severely denounced it ("De Locis Theol." XI. vi.); while on the other hand the Bollandists, usually inclined to be critical, have praised it (Jan. I, 19). The editions in the original Latin and in the translations have been numberless. The best Latin ed. is that by Graesse (Dresden and Leipzig, 1846, &c.). Caxton published an English version in 1483. Longfellow's "Golden Legend" derives its name and much of its matter from De Voragine's work. (Ott in "Cath. Enc."; Nostitz-Rieneck in "Kirchenlex."; Butler, "Legenda Aurea—Légende Dorée—Golden Legend.")

LEGITIMATION BY SUBSEQUENT MARRIAGE. The Civil Law and the Law of the Church agree in ascribing so great efficacy to the marriage tie that it is held to spread itself over, reach back to, and legitimate the birth of children to the same parties before the marriage. The Civil Law recognized this principle somewhat less unreservedly than the Canon, inasmuch as it ascribed a certain measure of relative lawfulness to the relation of concubinage. Against this the Church set its face, refusing to allow that there could be any lawful union between persons of opposite sex except by the way of marriage, and treating the child of a concubine as in no superior position, legally, to the child of a courtesan. However long a time may have passed, even though the father may have had a lawful wife and children in the interval, nevertheless, the first wife being dead, marriage with the mother of his natural children, even although he may be no longer capable of being a father, or be on the bed of death, legitimates the children of the illicit union, and makes them as capable of inheriting as if they had been born in wedlock. The reason is that the Church, like Christ, whom she represents in the world, yearns over her erring children, and desires to leave open for them a locus poenitentiae; and this all the more because the temporal interests and natural feelings of the innocent children are promoted and consulted by such lenity.

All that has been said, however, proceeds upon the assumption that at the time when the natural children were conceived or born the parties were free to marry. It is only in that case that the efficacy of the subsequent marriage can be held to reach back to the illicit union. If either the father or the mother was married at the time of the birth of the child, it is the offspring of adultery, and no subsequent marriage can legitimate it. It has been strenuously maintained by many canonists that if one of the parties was not free to marry at the time of the conception of the child, even though such freedom existed at the date of birth, the child is adulterine, and cannot be legitimated by subsequent marriage. The tendency of opinion, however, has for a long time past been towards the doctrine that the question should be decided simply by the date of birth; and that if at that time either party were so circumstanced that he or she could not possibly, even with the aid of a dispensation, have married the other, the child cannot be afterwards legitimated; but not otherwise.

A letter addressed by Benedict XIV., writing as a private doctor, to the Archbishop of San Domingo, in 1744, discusses this important subject in all its bearings with the utmost lucidity and force.

The Common Law of England, following, it may be supposed, some ancient Teutonic custom, does not allow that children born out of wedlock can be legitimated, or can inherit, through a subsequent marriage between the parties. This was decided so far back as 1236. At a council of the great men of the kingdom held at Merton, the bishops, who had found that collisions were of frequent occurrence between the spiritual and secular jurisdictions on account of their different views on this question—persons being bastardized by the one who were legitimated and held capable of inheriting by the other—"requested that the king's writs should no longer direct them to inquire specially whether the individual in question were born before or after marriage, but generally whether he were legitimate or not. They objected to the practice of the other courts: (1) that it was contrary to the Roman and Canon Law; (2) that it was unjust, because it deprived of the right of inheritance the issue of clandestine marriages, though such marriages were not annulled by any law; and (3) that it was inconsistent with itself, because, while it bastardized the child born, it legitimated the child that was only conceived before marriage, though in both cases the moral guilt of the parents was exactly the same. But their arguments were fruitless. The earls and barons unanimously returned the answer [1] which has been so often repeated and applauded: 'We will not change the old and approved laws of England.'" [2]

This difference continues to exist; and since the marriage law of all countries in continental Europe, Protestant as well as Catholic, is based on either the Roman or the Canon Law, it is a common practice for English parents of natural children to settle, marry, and become naturalized abroad, so that their offspring, under the milder sway of the Canon Law, may cease to suffer from that slur of bastardy from which in England nothing can ever deliver them. (Ferraris, Legitimatio.)

LENT. A fast of forty days preceding Easter, kept, after the example of Moses, Elias, and, above all, of Christ Himself, in order to prepare the faithful for the Easter feast, and also of course on account of the general advantages to be derived from a long period of penance. The Greek and Latin names for the fast (τεσσαρακοστή, Quadragesima) indicate the number of days. The Italian Quaresima and the French Carême come from the Latin; the German Fastenzeit and the Dutch Vasten denote the fast by pre-eminence, like ἡ νηστεία in the Greek calendar; our own word Lent comes from the Anglo-Saxon Lencten, i.e. spring (cf. German Lenz, Dutch Lente, spring).

There is no mention in Scripture of the observance of Lent, or, indeed, of any determined time for fasting among Christians. In Acts xxvii. 9 St. Paul and his companions are said to have put to sea at a dangerous time, viz. "when the fast was already over." But the fast in view was evidently the one Jewish fast commanded in the law, that on the Day of Atonement, the tenth of Tisri. At that time the autumnal equinox was past, and, as a rule, no more voyages were undertaken for the season.

There is, however, proof that Lent, in the general sense of a fast preceding Easter, has been known from, or nearly from, Apostolic times. Thus Tertullian, in his Montanist treatise on fasting, tells us that according to his Catholic adversaries those days were set apart for fasting "under the Gospel dispensation (in Evangelio) in which the Spouse was taken away" ("De Jejun." 2; cf. 13; PL, ii. 955), whereas the Montanists kept additional fasts. An earlier writer, Irenaeus (apud Euseb. "H.E." v. 24), speaks of the fast before Easter, and the different modes of observance which prevailed in different places. The words occur in a letter to Victor, who was Bishop of Rome from about 190 till 202; and it is important to notice that Irenaeus says the difference of observance was no new thing, but had arisen "even long before, in a past generation" (καὶ πολὺ πρότερον, ἐπὶ τῶν πρὸ ἡμῶν). It is plain also that from very early times the Lenten fast, whatever its duration may have been, was considered obligatory. This is clearly implied in the language of Tertullian in the passages quoted above: "dies jejuniis determinatos"; "constituta esse solemnia huic fidei scripturis vel traditione majorum." [3] Passages to the same effect abound in the later literature of the Church. The Council of Gangra, in the middle of the fourth century, anathematizes (Can. 19) those who neglected to keep the fasts "observed by the Church." Jerome (Ep. 41, PL, xxii. 475) lays down the strict obligation of keeping the Lenten fast (see also Ambrose: e.g. "De Noe et Arca," 13, PL, xiv. 381). A number of similar statements may be seen in Thomassin, "Traité des Jeûnes," part i. ch. v. A famous incident, mentioned by Sozomen ("H. E." i. 11), and often alleged against the Catholic practice, is really an exception which proves the rule. There the story is told of a Bishop Spyrido (Spiridion) who, having no other food, not even bread or flour, in the house, gave an exhausted traveller swine's flesh at the beginning of Lent, and bade him eat it without scruple. But the stranger at first refused to eat it, on the ground that he was a Christian; and the bishop before furnishing this food "prayed and begged pardon" of Heaven. All things, as the bishop argued, are pure to the pure, and then, as now, the Lenten rule yielded to charity and necessity.

We have taken Lent hitherto in its widest acceptation, as meaning a fast of some sort before Easter, and in Ante-Nicene Fathers, so far as we are aware, no clear notice occurs of a fast consisting even approximately of forty days. In a very obscure and possibly corrupt passage of Irenaeus (apud Euseb. v. 24) the Benedictine editor Massuet (diss. ii. 23 seq.) sees an allusion to the forty days with which we are now familiar. He understands the saint to say that some kept the fast of extraordinary strictness known as xerophagy for one day, others for two or more, others for all the forty days of Lent. This is a possible and even plausible explanation, but it cannot be considered certain, and many scholars, Catholic and Protestant, believe that Irenaeus refers to an absolute fast from all food during two or more days, or for forty hours. However, from the early part of the fourth century onwards, there are many references to Lent as a period of about forty days. The word τεσσαρακοστή is found in Can. 5 of the Nicene, and Can. 50 of the Laodicean, Council, the latter being held, according to Hefele, somewhere between 343 and 381. Even if the word was originally connected with the forty hours during which Christ lay in the tomb, it was taken in the fourth century at least to mean a period of forty days. St. Gregory Nyssen (tom. ii. p. 253) reckons Lent as a time of rather less than two months; while, in the West, St. Augustine (Ep. lv. c. 15, "Ad Januar."; PL, xxxiii. 217) connects the fast of Quadragesima with the forty days' fast of Moses and Elias. Still in this century, and the next also, the duration of Lent varied very considerably in different churches. Socrates ("H.E." v. 22) expresses his surprise that all used the same name τεσσαρακοστὴ to describe a fast which lasted in different places for seven, six, or only three weeks. There are no doubt inaccuracies in the statement as Socrates makes it, but we see no ground for questioning its correctness as to the main fact. From Sozomen, also a writer of the fifth century, we get more trustworthy information. All Africa, Egypt, Palestine, and the Westerns generally, he says ("H.E." vii. 19), kept Lent for six weeks, the church of Constantinople and the neighbouring provinces for seven. Cassian ("Collat." xxi. c. 24–27) says in general terms that some fasted seven, others six, weeks, but he gives the reason—viz. that some excepted Sundays and Saturdays, others Sundays only, from the fast. St. Ambrose ("De Elia et Jejunio," c. 10, PL, xiv. 708) recognizes the exemption from fasting on both days. The practice, however, of the Roman Church and of most Latins was to fast six weeks excepting Sundays—i.e. for thirty-six days. If the Greeks dispensed the Saturday fast, the older Roman usage appears to have dispensed in its place the Thursdays in Lent. In the older Sacramentaries these Thursdays have no special Mass, and those which were inserted in the seventh century are merely taken from other parts of the book. St. Gregory Nyssen's "rather less than two months" means eight weeks (fifty-six days in all) during which, fasting five days a week, we have a full Lent of forty days. Such a Lent may have begun on Septuagesima Sunday and have terminated on the eve of Palm Sunday—leaving Holy Week as an independent observance. The usage of Constantinople, on the other hand, prevailed in the East, and the Council in Trullo, in 692, ordered (Can. 55) that there should be no fasting on Saturdays in Lent, and no Mass said except on Saturdays, Sundays, and the feast of the Annunciation (Can. 52). Mass and fasting are in the minds of the Greeks incompatible, so that they observed seven weeks or thirty-five days of fasting—all Saturdays except Holy Saturday, the feast of the Annunciation, and all Sundays, being deducted.

[1] "Nolumus leges Angliae mutare."
[2] Lingard, Hist. of Eng. ii. 493.

However, more than a century before the Council in Trullo the Greeks could fairly claim to count forty days in their Lent. True, it is only on the Monday in Quinquagesima week that they enter on the strict abstinence both from flesh meat and lacticinia, and so Quinquagesima is called by them τῆς τυροφάγου, because, according to their way of calculating, it ends the week in which cheese &c. may be eaten. But after Sexagesima Sunday (hence named τῆς ἀπόκρεω) no meat is eaten, and this their present custom was already in force under the Emperor Justinian in 546 (see Fleury, "Hist." livr. xxxiii. No. 23, and cf. Thomassin, part ii. ch. i.).

Various attempts were made in the West to complete the number of forty days. St. Ambrose (Serm. 34) blames the custom of those who began the fast in Quinquagesima week, and the Fourth Council of Orleans (anno 541, Can. 2) likewise enforces uniformity and censures those who began Lent with Sexagesima or Quinquagesima. The Eighth Council of Toledo (Can. 9, anno 653) expresses a feeling then and earlier very common in the Church, when it describes the thirty-six days of Lent as a tithe of the year which Christians dedicated to God. But the monks aimed at greater strictness, for the "Regula Magistri," which Thomassin places at the beginning of the seventh century, enjoins religious to fast three days in Sexagesima and three in Quinquagesima week in order to supply for the six Sundays of Lent which were not fast-days.

At last the Latin Church added the four days of fasting before the first Sunday in Lent, which now began with Ash Wednesday. This new discipline is recognized in Canon 76 of the Council of Meaux (anno 846), and it appears from the words of the monk Ratramnus, who wrote about the same time, that these additional days were observed by the Roman Church and in the West generally. Still in the eleventh century St. Margaret of Scotland (Surius, Junii die 10) had to introduce the habit of beginning Lent with Ash Wednesday among her subjects; and St. Charles Borromeo, in the first council which he held, fully acknowledged the right by which the churches in the city of Milan and in other parts of the diocese which had retained the Ambrosian rite began Lent with the first Sunday and thus maintained their ancient usage.

We can only touch lightly on the other acts of piety by which Lent has been sanctified from early times. It was a season in which the faithful begged God's mercy for themselves, and were therefore expected to show mercy to others. The money spared by fasting was given in alms; the Imperial laws (see the references in Thomassin, part i. ch. xxviii.) forbade criminal processes, and while the Church reconciled penitents at the altar the emperors released prisoners, masters pardoned their slaves, and enemies became friends. It was a season of mourning, and hence the Church has always strongly dis-countenanced festivities of all kinds during Lent. Lastly, the body is mortified, in order that the soul may be invigorated, and so from early times communions, sermons and spiritual exercises generally have been multiplied in Lent. LIBELLI PACIS. [See LAPSED and INDULGENCES.]

LIBER DIURNUS. An ancient collection of formularies used in the Roman church. Garnier supposes that it was compiled shortly after 714. It was divided by him into seven chapters, which are subdivided into "titles." The seven chapters treat of the following subjects: (1) formularies used by the Pope in writing to the Emperor, Exarch, Consul, Patriarchs, Archbishop of Ravenna, &c.; (2) formularies for the election and consecration of the Pope, with the accompanying notice to the Emperor, Exarch, &c.; (3) for the election and consecration of the episcopi suburbicarii; (4) four formularies for giving the Pallium; (5) twenty-one formularies for despatch of business with Italian bishops consecrated by the Pope; (6) on the administration and alienation of the property of the Roman church; (7) on privileges granted by the Popes to monasteries and other ecclesiastical institutes.

The first edition was that of Garnier (Paris, 1680). In our own day there have been editions by Rozière (Paris, 1869), and Sickel (Vienna, 1889). The last-named was printed from the only manuscript then known, preserved in the Vatican: A more complete MS. was afterwards discovered in the Ambrosian Library at Milan, and published by Ratti (Milan, 1891). (Kirsch in "Cath. Enc.")

LIBER PENITENTIALIS. [See PENITENTIAL BOOKS.]

LIBER PONTIFICALIS. The "Book of the Popes" contains the lives of the pontiffs from St. Peter to Stephen VI. (d. 891), with the exception of John VIII., Marinus I., and Hadrian III. It was formerly ascribed to Anastasius, librarian of the Roman Church in the ninth century. Duchesne and Mommsen are, however, of opinion that it is an expansion of certain primitive catalogues of the Popes, some dating as far back as the second century, and that there were two redactions of it, the later of which has alone come down to us. According to Duchesne, the earlier redaction took place under Boniface II. (d. 532), the later under Vigilius (d. 555). Mommsen places the earlier redaction later than Gregory I., and the second redaction later than Pope Conon (686–687). There have been many editions. That of Duchesne (Paris, 1886–92) has superseded all others. Mommsen's edition (Berlin, 1898) only goes down to Pope Constantine (d. 715), and is based upon Duchesne's labours.

LIBER SEPTIMUS. By this name are known two different collections, neither of which is of authority. 1. Pierre Matthieu, of Lyons, made a collection of Decretals from the pontificate of Gregory XI. to that of Sixtus V., and printed them in 1590. They have been included in two or three editions of the "Corpus," but are generally held to have no validity as a collection. 2. It was under contemplation in the time of Clement VIII. (1592–1605) to publish under this name a collection of recent Papal Constitutions and conciliar decrees. The book was actually printed in 1598, but permission to publish it was refused. There is an edition by Sentis (Freiburg, 1870). (Kober, in "Kirchenlex.")

LIBER SEXTUS. The Sext ("Liber Sextus Decretalium"; see art. on CANON LAW) received its name with reference to the five books of Decretals published by order of Gregory IX., but is itself divided, like that earlier collection, into five books and a certain number of titles.

LIBERA ME. A responsory sung by the choir after the Mass of the dead and before the "absolution" of the corpse. [See ABSOLUTION and FUNERALS.]

LIBERA NOS, &c. The embolismus or continuation of the Lord's Prayer in the Roman Mass. It is said secretly by the priest as soon as he has added "Amen" to the "Pater." On Good Friday, however, he sings it aloud. The prayer with slight variation is found in the Gelasian and Gregorian Canons. The principal changes that have been made are in the mention of the saints. At present only the Blessed Virgin, St. Peter and St. Paul (the founders of the Roman Church), and St Andrew, who was the first called to the Apostolate, are mentioned by name. But other names occur in the Gregorian Canon — viz. Dionysius with Rusticus and Eleutherius and Chlodoaldus: Even in the Middle Ages, as appears from the "Micrologus," the officiating priest could add names of saints here at discretion. In the Frankish recensions of the Gregorian Canon, the names of national Saints are interpolated (Denis, &c.). Rome never had any but Peter, Paul, and Andrew.

All the Western liturgies have a prayer, not only corresponding to but resembling our "Libera nos." The prayer in the Ambrosian Mass is merely a form of our prayer with slight variations. The Mozarabic prayer "Liberati a malo" has at least a general resemblance. The old Gallican liturgy is furthest removed from the Roman standard. There the continuation of the Lord's Prayer varies with the Mass. That for Christmas begins "Libera nos, omnipotens Deus, ab omni malo," &c. (Benedict XIV. "De Missa"; Hammond's "Liturgies, Eastern and Western"; Fortescue, in "Cath. Enc.")

LIBERIUS was Bishop of Rome from 352 to 366. Because of the firm support he gave to the Nicene faith, and to Athanasius, its champion, he was banished to Beroea by the Arian Emperor Constantius, some time after the Synod of Milan in 355, the Arian Felix being put in his place at Rome. Liberius was separated even from his companions in exile in order to increase the rigour of his punishment and break his constancy. In 357 Constantius was in Rome, and found that scarcely anyone communicated with the usurper Felix, and that the populace were clamouring for the recall of Liberius. At last, nearly a year later, the Emperor consented to restore Liberius to his see. But on what conditions? Many ancient documents (we shall have to examine their real value further on) testify that Liberius bought his pardon dear—viz. by condemning Athanasius, communicating with heretical bishops, and subscribing a formula which denied, or at least betrayed, the Nicene faith. This is the view, not only of Protestant, but also of many Catholic historians. It is held, e.g., by Baronius; Petavius, "De Trin." i. 9; Bossuet, "Def. Cler. Gall." p. iii. lib. ix. c. 33; Fleury, "Hist." livr. xiii. 46; Döllinger, "Papst-Fabeln"; Hefele-Leclercq (i. 908 seq.); and many others. On the other hand, the Bollandist Stilting, "Acta SS." tom. vi. Sept.; Zaccaria, "De Commentitio Liberii Lapsu"; Palma, "Praelect." tom. i. par. 2; and recently Reinerding, "Beiträge zur Honorius- und Liberiusfrage," 1865; and Hergenröther, "Kirchengeschichte" (vol. iii., 1880, p. 106 seq.), treat the "fall of Liberius" as an Arian fiction. The question has naturally assumed great prominence from its bearing on the Papal infallibility. In this article we treat of the historical fact and of its dogmatic import separately.

Theodoret, Socrates, and Sulpicius Severus are altogether silent on the fall of Liberius, and we may fairly take their silence as proof either that they had not heard of or else did not believe it. But we have, on the other hand, the distinct and contemporary evidence of Athanasius twice repeated: "Liberius, being exiled, later on, after a period of two years, gave way (ὥκλασε) and, in fear of the death with which he was threatened, subscribed (φοβηθεὶς τὸν ἀπειλούμενον θάνατον ὑπέγραψεν). But even this shows their violence, and the hatred of Liberius against the heresy, and his decision (ψῆφον) for Athanasius when his will was free. For things done through torments contrary to the original judgment—these are not acts of will on the part of those who have been put to fear, but of those who inflict the torture" ("Epist. ad Monach. et Hist. Arian." 41; PG, xxv. 741). He speaks to much the same effect in the "Apol. contr. Arian." 89; PG, ib. 409. "O wretched man that you are," says another contemporary, St. Hilary, addressing Constantius ("Contr. Constant. Imper." c. 11; PL, x. 589), "I know not whether there was greater wickedness in your banishing him [Liberius] than in your sending him back" ("nescio utrum majore impietate relegaveris quam remiseris"). This looks like an allusion to the price Liberius had to pay for his recall. Sozomen ("H.E." iv. 15) gives us the details. "Constantius," he says, "united the delegates from the bishops of the East [i.e. from the Semi-Arian Council of Ancyra] to the prelates who happened to be present with him in the Court at Sirmium. They combined the definitions of the Antiochene Council in 269 against Paul of Samosata and those of Sirmium against Photinus with the symbol of the Antiochene Council of 341" (probably Sozomen refers to the fourth of their symbols), "and persuaded Liberius to subscribe the new formula or collection of old formulas in which the word 'consubstantial' was abandoned. They brought him to take this step by telling him that the ὁμοούσιος was a mere cloak for Sabellianism. Liberius, however, insisted that he who did not confess the Son to be in essence and in all things like the Father was to be excommunicate." Lastly, Jerome, in his Chronicle (PL, xxvii. 683), says of Liberius, "overcome by the weariness of exile, setting his name to heretical error, he entered Rome as a conqueror." And again, "Catal. Script." 97, he charges Fortunatianus of Aquileia with compelling Liberius to subscribe heresy.

This surely is a fourfold cord of evidence not easily broken. All the witnesses are of great, two (Athanasius and Hilary) of the greatest conceivable weight. And all the accounts are at once independent of and consistent with each other. Liberius would make no terms with the Anomoeans, or extreme Arians, but he did communicate with the semi-Arians, who condemned Athanasius, and abandoned the touch-stone of orthodoxy—viz. the Nicene term ὁμοούσιος. He subscribed the Semi-Arian formula which was compiled from older documents and is known as the third formula of Sirmium.[1] But he did all this under fear, consented to omit the ὁμοούσιος only when persuaded that it was understood in an heretical (i.e. Sabellian) sense, and he accompanied his subscription with a protest against pronounced Arianism. We can easily understand why Athanasius speaks with such touching gentleness of Liberius in the moment of his infirmity. Moreover, Liberius soon recovered himself from his fall, for we find him confirming the orthodox Council of Alexandria in 362.

Stilting and his numerous followers, who

[1] This is given as highly probable, for historians differ much as to the particular formula signed by Liberius. See Newman's Arians, 2nd ed. p. 332, and Bossuet, loc. cit.

exculpate Liberius altogether, are driven to expedients which we cannot help regarding as desperate. They explain away the words of Hilary, regard Jerome and Sozomen as deceived by Arian rumours, and try to show that the decisive words of Athanasius are interpolations. "Hilary's words," says Hergenröther, "may only mean that on this occasion also [i.e. in the recall of Liberius] Constantius displayed his impiety." But how could he display in recalling Liberius impiety greater or equal to that which he had shown in driving him from his see if he allowed him to return to it without dishonourable conditions? Next, as to the places in St. Athanasius. Undoubtedly it is true that the passage in the "Hist. Ar. ad Mon." did not belong to the original draft sent to the monks, for it was written before the supposed fall of Liberius; but then Athanasius begged them (see the introductory epistle, c. 3) to send the letter back, and afterwards ("Epist. ad Serap." i. 1) he forwarded it to his friend the Bishop Serapion, and there is not the least difficulty in supposing that Athanasius completed his history by adding to it the account of an event which had happened in the interval. The same chronological objection is made to the second passage from Athanasius, and is disposed of by Hefele just in the same way. Besides, it is hard even to imagine what could have led to the interpolation of the passages. Certainly they were not forged in the interests of Arianism. In style and tone they are every way worthy of St. Athanasius, while the statement they make explains, and at the same time is confirmed by, the words of Hilary.

We should have to think much more severely of Liberius if certain Fragments attributed to Hilary (particularly Fragments iv.–vi.; PL, x. 678–681, 689–695) and the letters of the Pope incorporated in Fragment vi. were genuine. In Fragment vi. Liberius is called an "apostate" and a "traitor" (praevaricator) and anathematized three times; while Liberius himself makes a formal and deliberate confession of Arian belief. The Fragment containing these letters was supposed by the Benedictine editor Coustant to belong to a lost work of Hilary against Ursacius and Valens. There is nothing to allege in favour of this supposition except a note in the margin of the MS. "Sanctus Hilarius illi [sc. Liberio] anathema dicit." And there are strong reasons for rejecting the Fragment as none of Hilary's and regarding the letters of Liberius as supposititious. We must refer the reader for the arguments drawn from chronological errors, the barbarism of the style, the clumsiness and unnaturalness of the forgery, to Hefele. He thinks the letters were forged in the name of Liberius and in the Anomoean interest by a "Graeculus" who had but a very slight knowledge of Latin. On the other hand, Leclercq (Hefele-Leclercq, i. 91 n. 2), Hefele's latest translator and editor, following Gwatkin ("Studies of Arianism,"[2] p. 193) and Turmel (Le Pape Libère in "Rev. Cath. des Églises," 1906, t. iii.), looks upon Hefele's arguments as poor. Dom Chapman, however, in "Cath. Enc." stands by Hefele.

It is amazing that anyone, after an impartial consideration of the facts, should have pressed them into the service of Gallicanism. Liberius, at the time of his fall, taught nothing and imposed no belief. Besides, if the Pope is to teach ex cathedra, common sense requires that he should be free. Liberius, on the contrary, subscribed the Semi-Arian formula separated from his friends and counsellors and in terror of death. It is as if, to borrow an illustration of Cardinal Newman, a judge were hurried away by bandits, kept without notes, books, or counsel, and forced under terror of death to decide a legal case in one particular way. Nobody, save from prejudice, would pretend that such a decision was valid. What the case does prove is the extreme importance attached to the judgment of Liberius. They knew his zeal and energy, and "the impious," writes Athanasius, "said to themselves 'If we persuade Liberius, we shall quickly master all'" ("Hist. Ar. ad Mon." c. 35; PG, xxv. 733).

(The literature has been given with tolerable fulness in the body of the article. We ought to add that Newman, even in the second edition of his "Arians" (1871), assumed the authenticity of "Hilary," Frag. iv. and vi., and consequently of the letters attributed to Liberius, but he afterwards (1886, ed. 5) accepted Hefele's view. See "Arians," p. 323.)

LIBRARIES. The two captures of Rome in the fifth century, first by Alaric and afterwards by Genseric, must have been fatal to any large accumulation of books in the Eternal City; but mention is made of a Vatican library in the time of Pope Vigilius (†555), and under Leo IV. (†855) the Cardinal Bishop of Ostia was its librarian (Thomassin, II. i. 95). Gregory the Great had certainly the command of a large library. The famous Alexandrian library—a monument at once of the enlightenment of the Ptolemaic dynasty, and of the high grade of culture which the confluence of the Semitic with the Aryan intellect at that city rendered possible—perished, if we accept the common story, through the bigotry of Omar;[1] but a few years later new libraries began to be formed on northern shores and islands, where barbarism had hitherto reigned supreme. Bede[2] tells us that the abbot Benedict Biscop conveyed to his monastery of Wearmouth, on returning from his numerous Roman journeys, a large and splendid library (bibliothecam nobilissimam copiosissimamque), which, "as [1] But, as Gibbon says (ch. li.), the common story is more than doubtful; it rests on the sole authority of Abulpharagius, a writer of the thirteenth century.

necessary for a completely furnished church, he ordered should be kept entire, and neither damaged through neglect, nor dispersed" in the hands of borrowers. This was about A.D. 680. Archbishop Egbert founded at York a "nobilissima bibliotheca" about 750; the fact is mentioned in one of Alcuin's letters.[1] The library of Glastonbury, for some time after St. Dunstan had been abbot there, was the best in England. William of Malmesbury, to whose sterling literary qualities the student of English history is under such deep obligation, himself actively aided abbot Godfrey in forming a large and well-chosen library at Malmesbury Abbey.[2] That every large Anglo-Saxon monastery had its library there can be no doubt. In Ireland, at all the great monastic centres, such as Armagh, Clonmacnoise, Inisfallen, Boyle, Kells, &c., there were large collections of books—a fact which the number of Irish MSS. still surviving, in spite of the havoc made by war and rapine, and the effects of a damp climate, amply attests. Generally it is true of Europe that all through the mediaeval period a threefold process, of accumulation, loss or dispersion, and re-accumulation of books, was going on. Barbarians from Scandinavia ruined most of the libraries of Anglo-Saxon monasteries, and a large number of those in Ireland. Under St. Dunstan books were again copied and collected; a second dark period ensued till about 1050; after the Conquest a long era of comparative peace and progress began. A glance at the "Philobiblon" of Richard of Bury (†1345), the learned and polite bishop of Durham, shows that the collection, binding, conservation, and utilization of books, everything in short that appertains to the office of a librarian, was already well understood in the fourteenth century. The Kings of France began from about 1370 to form the library of the Louvre. In the fifteenth century, the printing-press having come into use, and ancient learning, especially Greek learning, being held in greater esteem than ever before, new books and editions were multiplied and libraries extended. In this work Italy took the lead. The Vatican library, founded by Nicholas V. (1447–1455) and enriched by later gifts and collections, soon became the best library in Europe. (Pastor, "Hist. of the Popes" ii. 207 sqq.) Even at this day, although in the department of printed books it is probably surpassed by many, there can be few, if any, that can point to so superb a collection of MSS. The Medici family founded the Laurentian library at Florence, which could also boast of the public library of St. Mark, established in 1437. Venice and Ferrara laboured in the same field. Out of Italy, Matthias Corvinus founded, about 1480, a celebrated library at Buda, and stored up in it a large number of Greek MSS. which he had rescued from the Turkish conquerors of Constantinople. Unfortunately, his capital was too near to the still expanding power of the Ottomans, and his literary treasures were in great part dispersed or lost. Heidelberg, Vienna, and Leyden, all founded libraries in the fifteenth century. The great Cardinal Ximenes added a well-stocked library to the university which he founded (about 1500) at Alcalá. In England the views of the early Reformers were not favourable to the interests of learning. It is well known that the commissioners of Edward VI. ordered a large collection of MSS., which had been given to the University of Oxford by the good Duke Humphrey, to be burnt, on the suspicion that they contained matter of Papistry. Sir Thomas Bodley, about the end of Elizabeth's reign, repaired this havoc, built a large portion of the present library, brought into it a fine collection of books and MSS., and endowed it with ample estates. The library of the British Museum, originating in the purchase from Sir Hans Sloane in 1753, lavishly aided ever since by public money, and enriched by the grant of the library of the Kings of England, and the purchase of George III.'s collections from George IV., takes the lead of all similar institutions in England in the number both of books and of MSS. The Bodleian occupies the next place. (Hallam's "Literature of Europe"; Thurston in "Cath. Enc."; Gasquet, "Mediaeval Monastic Libraries" in "The Old Eng. Bible, &c."; Scudamore, in "Dict. of Chr. Antiq.")

LIMBO. The Latin word Limbus (or "fringe") was used in the Middle Ages for that place on the fringe or outskirts of hell in which the just who died before Christ were detained till our Lord's resurrection from the dead. It likewise signifies a place (also supposed to be beneath the earth and on the outskirts of hell) inhabited by infants who die in original sin.

(A) The Limbus Patrum is the Paradise of Lk. xxiii. 43, so called because it was a place of rest and joy, though the joy was imperfect. In Lk. xvi. 23 it is called by the Rabbinical name "Abraham's bosom" (בְּחֵיקוֹ שֶׁל אַבְרָהָם) because there the just remained in loving intercourse with Abraham, the father of the faithful. Estius thinks it was to the spirits in the Limbo of the Fathers as well as to those in Purgatory that Christ is said to have preached (1 Pet. iii. 19, 20). The passage, however, is difficult, and different interpretations are given by Fathers and other Catholic commentators.

(B) Limbus Infantium.—It is an article of faith that those who die without Baptism, and in whose case the want of Baptism has not been supplied in some other way, cannot enter heaven. This is plainly stated, e.g., by the Council of Florence in the Decree of Union (Denzinger-Bannwart, 693). But there was a natural repugnance to the belief that those who had committed no sin should be tortured in hell, and this difficulty led theologians to adopt various theories as by way of escape.

1. Some few theologians thought that God might be pleased to supply the want of Baptism in infants by other means. Thus St. Bernard ("De Baptismo," c. i. n. 4, c. ii. n. 1) thought that possibly such infants might be saved by the faith of their parents. A similar opinion is attributed to Gerson, Cardinal Cajetan and others—viz. that the lack of Baptism might be supplied by the wish for the sacrament on the part of their parents or others; Cajetan requiring in addition the use of some external sign with the invocation of the Trinity. (See Billuart, "De Baptism." diss. iii. a. 1.)

Another theologian, Knoll, i.e. Albertus a Bulsano ("Compend. Theol." vol. ii. § 325, quoted by Jungmann, "De Noviss."), believed that God might commission angels to confer Baptism on infants who might otherwise perish without it.

2. The theologians of the Augustinian order (e.g. Noris and Berti) held an opinion at the opposite pole—viz. that the infants in question were punished both by exclusion from heaven and by positive pain, though much less pain than is inflicted on those who died in actual mortal sin. This undoubtedly is the opinion of St. Augustine (Serm. 294, PL, xxxviii. 1337), where he teaches that unbaptized infants were consigned to eternal fire, though their damnation will be "the lightest of all" ("De Peccat. Meritis et Remiss." i. 20).

3. The great majority of theologians—the Master of the Sentences, St. Bonaventure, St. Thomas, Scotus &c.—teach that infants dying in original sin suffer no "pain of sense" but are simply excluded from heaven. This opinion is no modern invention, for it is found in St. Gregory Nazianzen ("Or. in Sanct. Baptism." 23;[1] PG, xxxvi. 389). But do they grieve because they are shut out of heaven? Bellarmine ("De Amiss. Gratiae," vi. 6, apud Jungmann) answers Yes. St. Thomas answers that they do not, because pain of punishment is proportioned to personal guilt, which does not exist here. He says they do not grieve because they cannot see God, any more than a bird is grieved because it cannot be emperor or king: "nay, they rejoice, because they share in God's goodness and in many natural perfections." The opinion of St. Thomas is the common one in the Church. It is believed that unbaptized infants in Limbo know and love God by the use of their natural powers, and have full natural happiness.

The existence of the Limbo of Infants has never been defined by the Church, although the Jansenist Council of Pistoia was censured by Pius VI. for scoffing at it as a Pelagian fable. The doctrine of the Pelagians was widely different. They denied original sin and obliterated the distinction between grace and nature, and when pressed to explain the need of Baptism replied that it was necessary to secure admittance to the kingdom of heaven, but not to obtain eternal life. "Eternal life," to which the Pelagians admitted unbaptized infants, was of the same order as the Kingdom of Heaven. The happiness obtained in the Limbo of Infants is of a wholly different order, being natural instead of supernatural. (The dogmatic theologians speak of the Limbo of Infants in their treatises on Original Sin and the Last Things. See also the art. BAPTISM.)

LITANIES (λιτανεία, earnest supplication). A form of united prayer by alternate sentences, in which the clergy lead and the people respond: usually of a penitential character. A litany may thus be distinguished from other modern devotions, such as that of the Stations, in which, with much that is alternate, there is also much that is not. There were four forms of litany recognized by the Church as suitable for use in public worship: viz. the Litany of the Saints, that of the Blessed Virgin (usually called the Litany of Loreto), that of the Most Holy Name of Jesus, and that of the Sacred Heart. The Litany of the Saints is chanted on the feast of St. Mark (April 25), and on the three Rogation days; on the former occasion it is called the Greater (litaniae majores), and on the Rogation days the Lesser (litaniae minores). During the devotion of the Forty Hours, the Litany of the Saints is sung with the addition of certain verses; on the other hand, when it is sung on Holy Saturday and Whitsun Eve, a number of verses are omitted. The Litany of the Blessed Virgin—in which titles expressive of the transcendent dignity and privilege of the Mother of God, as well as of the love, trust, and veneration of her children towards her, are woven into a chain of animated supplication—is now usually sung at Benediction. It came into general use from having been observed to be sung in the Santa Casa of Loreto, whence pilgrims carried it into all Christian lands; but a large portion of it is far older than the foundation of the sanctuary, which of course only dates from the thirteenth century. Clement VIII. directs that, whereas a number of unauthorized litanies had lately been published, no one should for the future presume to publish, or to use in public worship, any litany but those in Breviaries, Missals, Pontificals, and Rituals (i.e. the Litany of the Saints in its various forms), and the Litany of Loreto. But it is universally held that the use of the Litany of the Most Holy Name, having been already sanctioned by the Holy See before the date of the bull "Sanctissimus," is in no way affected by its prohibitions. It was formally approved by Leo XIII. (June 16, 1886). The Litany of the Sacred Heart was also approved by Leo. XIII. in 1899. Later still, Pius X. gave his approbation to the Litany of St. Joseph (March 18, 1909). All of the above-mentioned Litanies may be recited publicly and liturgically. Bishops may sanction the printing of other Litanies for private use.

[1] He thinks that infants who die unbaptized "will neither be glorified nor punished by the just judge, as being without the seal [i.e. Baptism] indeed, but without wickedness."

If the Greater Litanies fall on Easter Day they are transferred to the Tuesday following. Priests are bound sub mortali to recite the Litanies both on St. Mark's day and on the three Rogation days. No new names of saints can be inserted without the special permission of the S.R.C.

The earliest and simplest form of litany is the "Kyrie Eleison," which was recited in various ways in primitive times, but in the twelfth century settled down to the form still in use. The first litanies were embedded in the liturgy; later on they were developed independently, chiefly through being used in processions. Under the heading "Litania Romana" there is extant in a Sacramentary of the age of Gregory the Great a Litany of the Saints, evidently intended for use in some Gaulish church;[1] it contains 101 names. There is a manifest connection between such a litany and collections of short metrical lives of saints—such, e.g., as that in a Bodleian MS. (No. 779), which contains 104 lives.

The practice of singing the Litany of the Saints on St. Mark's day is said to have been instituted by St. Gregory. Seven processions, starting simultaneously from seven Roman churches, and singing litanies as they went, all met in the church of St. Mary Major.[2] Their use on the Rogation days was begun by St. Mamertus, archbishop of Vienne, in the year 447, the special intention being the deliverance of the people from wolves, which in that year were more than usually ravenous. [See ROGATION DAYS.]

LITERAE FORMATAE. [See EPISTOLAE ECCLESIASTICAE.]

LITERAE PATENTES. Certain public documents were so called from the form in which the notaries commenced them: e.g. "Per praesens publicum instrumentum cunctis pateat evidenter";[3] "Let it be clearly made known to all by the present public instrument." Canonists speak of the Letters Patent of Louis XI. in 1475 as the earliest instance in France of the application of the doctrine of the royal pareatis ("ye may obey") or placitum regium [see CANON LAW, p. 104] to the reception of bulls, briefs, &c., from Rome. ("Kirchenlex." Placitum Reg.)

LITTLE OFFICE OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN. The authorship has often been attributed to Peter Damian, but Bona ("Divin. Psalm." c. 12) brings strong evidence of its use in monasteries as early as the pontificate of Pope St. Zacharias (741–752). He quotes to that effect Peter the Deacon ("In Reg. S. Bened." c. 64), who indeed goes so far as to make St. Gregory II. (715–731) its originator. Bona further appeals to St. John Damascene as a contemporary witness of its vogue in the East in the eighth century.

It consists of psalms, lessons, and hymns in honour of the Blessed Virgin, arranged in seven hours like the Breviary office, but much shorter. It is not influenced by the course of the Church year, except that the Alleluia is omitted in Lent, and that a change is made in the office from Advent to the Purification. Even the Alleluia is not added to the invitatory antiphons, responsories and versicles in Easter time (S.R.C., 28 Martii, 1626).

The Council of Clermont, under Urban II. in 1096, made the recitation of the Little Office obligatory on the clergy, but secular priests who are not bound to recite the office in choir are now free from all obligation of reciting the Little Office, as has been clearly stated by Pius V. in his bull "Quod a nobis postulat" prefixed to the Breviary (see Maskell, "Mon. Rit." vol. iii. p. lxii.). By the Constitution Divino Afflatu (Nov. 1. 1911) the choral recitation was abolished.

On the other hand, the dispensing of the clergy from the obligation led to the introducing of the peculiar office of S. Maria in Sabbato, arranged by St. Pius V. and made obligatory by Clement VIII., which introduces several characteristic elements of the Little Office.

In many religious orders, and in rules for persons in the world, the Little Office is prescribed instead of the Breviary hours.

LITURGIES. I. Meaning of the Word.—The word λειτουργία means a public service, and especially at Athens a public service which the richer citizens discharged at their own expense. The theocratic constitution of the Jewish commonwealth naturally led the Septuagint translators to use λειτουργία and the kindred forms chiefly of the service of God in the sanctuary. It answers to various words in the original Hebrew (see e.g. Exod. xxviii. 21, Num. xxxviii. 25, 2 Paralip. xxi. 4). In Lk. i. 23 it denotes the service of a Jewish priest, and it is used in the New Testament of any service rendered to God (see, e.g., Philipp. ii. 17). There is no clear instance in the New Testament of λειτουργία or λειτουργεῖν signifying a service performed by the Christian clergy, though in Acts xiii. 2 the words "As they ministered to the Lord (λειτουργούντων αὐτῶν) and fasted " may possibly refer to the action of the " prophets and teachers " in preaching and guiding the devotions of the congregation. Clemens Romanus (Ep. 44, PG, i. 297) does use λειτουργία for the functions of the Christian presbyters. In the fourth century the use of the word for priestly ministrations was fully recognized (see, e.g., the Council of Ancyra, canon 1 ; anno 314), and from that date down at least to the sixth century it was used for any solemn service (e.g. evening prayer, baptism, &c.), but especially for the Eucharistic service. In this sense it has been adopted bythe Greek Church, which speaks of " divine liturgy " where Latins would say " holy Mass." It is in this, its narrowest signification, that we take the word here. Under " liturgies " we include all forms and services in any language and in any part of the church for the celebration of the Eucharist. We may add here that σύναξις (assembly) is another word used by the Greeks for the Mass, and that dominica solemnia (Tertull. " De Fug." 14, PL, ii. 119); dominicum celebrare (Cyprian, " De Op. et Eleem." 116, Ep. 63, ed. Hartel, p. 714); officium (Tertull. " De Orat." 18, PL, i. 1177), besides " sacrifice," " offering," " bloodless and rational sacrifice," are names common among the Fathers. The word " Mass " first appears in St. Ambrose. [For its meaning see MASS.]

II. Liturgical Notices to the Middle of the Fifth Century.—Scripture tells us little or nothing of the way in which the Apostles celebrated the Eucharist, but from the year 150 onwards we have abundant proof that the Church in all parts of the world had a fixed order and, to a certain extent at least, fixed words for this the greatest of all her services.[1] This section of our article is taken from Le Brun, vol. iii. diss. i. a. 5, from whom we borrow the patristic references.

The Mass was said by the bishop, or in his absence by priests assisted by at least one deacon (Cyprian, Ep. 5, ed. Hartel, p. 479).

It began with lections from the Prophets, Apostles, and Evangelists. These lessons from the Old or New Testament are mentioned by Justin in his first Apology, written in 138 or 139. And it was the custom of the East, as attested by St. Chrysostom (" Hom. 19 in Act. Ap." PG, lx. 151), of Gaul (Sulpic. Sever. " Vit. Martin." 7), Milan and Spain, to read the Prophets as well as the Epistles and Gospels. On the other hand, in the Roman and African churches there were usually only two lections—one from the Epistles, another from the Gospels, with a psalm between them (August. " Serm." 176 al. 170, PL, xxxviii. 950). Nevertheless, as regards Rome, many indications (the double Gradual, the Ember Day Masses, &c.) point to the fact of her primitive Liturgy having likewise included a lesson from the Prophets, preceding the Epistle. These lections were not, as now in our Mass, preceded by an introit.

Then followed a sermon, after which certain prayers were said over the catechumens, and they were dismissed (Ambrose, Ep. 14). Here we have the first great division of the Mass into the " Missa catechumenorum " and " Missa fidelium." The Council of Laodicea, canon 19, mentions a prayer for the penitents who were dismissed after the catechumens, but in 390 Nectarius of Constantinople abolished public penance in the East.

The altar was then covered with cloths (Optat. lib. vi.) and the celebrating bishop's hands were washed by a deacon (Cyril of Jerusalem, " Mystagog." 5), and in all the East (Justin, " Apol." 2 ; Concil. Laod. can. 19 ; Chrysost. " De Compunct. Cordis "), in Spain and Gaul, the faithful gave each other the Kiss of Peace ; whereas in Rome and Africa the Pax immediately preceded the Communion. The bread and the mixed chalice (of which latter even Justin speaks) were presented, and in Carthage from St. Cyprian's time verses of the psalms were sung at this part of the Mass. The Offertory rite, both as to position and form, has always greatly varied. The prayer " Super oblata " (or as we call it the Secret) is found in the earliest Roman Sacramentaries.

The " Sursum corda " is mentioned by Cyprian ; and Augustine says the Church over all the world answered " that they lifted up their hearts to the Lord " (" De Vera Relig." 3, PL, xxxiv. 125). The Preface, according to St. Chrysostom and St. Cyril, was followed by the Sanctus. We know very little from the Fathers about the words of the Canon. They tell us generally that the words of institution were accompanied by prayer, the faithful answering " Amen " at the end ; and St. Augustine (" In Symb.") says the sign of the cross was made at the consecration. The fraction of the Host in Africa, and, before the time of St. Gregory the Great, at Rome, took place, as it still does in the Ambrosian Mass, before the Pater Noster. In the ancient use of the Roman and African churches the Pax was given after the Pater Noster. At Jerusalem the celebrant, in other Eastern churches the deacon, said " Holy things for holy persons " (τὰ ἅγια τοῖς ἁγίοις). The veil of the sanctuary, as St. Chrysostom and St. Cyril of Alexandria mention, was partially drawn aside and the faithful received Communion under the form of bread in their hands from the bishop or priest, while the deacons gave them the chalice. In the church of Carthage from the fourth century verses of the psalms were sung, and we know from St. Cyril that they used to sing the verse "Taste and see that the Lord is good" in the church of Jerusalem. The faithful were taught to say "Lord, I am not worthy," &c., as they went to communicate. All ended with thanksgiving and the salutation or blessing from the bishop, "Grace be with you and peace" (Chrys. "Hom. iii. ad Coloss." PG, lxii. 325). These extracts from the Fathers are not, of course, meant to convey the impression that one liturgy or even that all the forms just given were used throughout the Church. What they do prove is that the Church everywhere had certain forms, and with regard to some of these forms the date and the character of the incidental notices which survive show that their origin may be traced almost to Apostolic times and that their reception was universal.

III. When were Liturgies first written?—Very different answers have been given to this question, which would not arise at all if we could assume that the Liturgies of St. James, St. Mark, and St. Clement were rightly named. It is, however, absolutely impossible to suppose that these liturgies, as we have them, came from those whose names they bear. The Clementine Liturgy comes to us under the most suspicious circumstances in the latest book of a notorious forgery, and there is no reason to believe that it ever was actually used in any church. The Liturgy of St. James contains insertions from that of Constantinople which must have been made as late as the fifth—one (the hymn οἱ τὰ χερουβὶμ) as late as the seventh century; words of controversial theology abound in it (see Hammond, "Ancient Liturgies," xliv.); and the very fact that no extant liturgies (except the Clementine) have any form of dismissing penitents points to a time later at least than the abolition of public penance in the East by Nectarius in 390. Doubtless these liturgies contain older elements, but we can only know or conjecture what they are by collecting information from extraneous sources.

These sources are of course the writings of the Fathers and the decrees of councils, and from these it may, we think, be safely inferred that there was no entire written liturgy during the first three centuries of the Church. Tertullian ("De Corona," 3, PL, ii. 78) assumes that various most important liturgical usages (e.g. celebration of the Eucharist early in the morning, oblations for the dead on the feasts of martyrs (pro natalicius), reception of the Eucharist from the hand of the "president") rest simply on "custom" and "tradition." He makes no allusion to a written liturgy. Cyprian (Ep. 63, ed. Hartel, 702) argues against those who used water only, instead of wine mixed with water, in the Eucharist. He argues at length, and is evidently anxious to adduce every possible reason against the novelty; but he, again, appeals simply to "the tradition of the Lord," without the remotest reference to liturgical documents. These, it may be said, are, after all, only arguments from silence. But if we contrast Cyprian's argument with that of the Council in Trullo, between four and five hundred years later, we shall see how strong this argument becomes. The council (canon 32) strictly forbids the Armenian custom of consecrating wine unmixed with water, and in proof that this was wrong appeals to the three Liturgies of St. James, St. Basil, and St. Chrysostom —i.e. to the three liturgies then as now used in the Patriarchate of Constantinople (Le Brun, tom. iii. p. 9). Further, notwithstanding the full information we have about the sacred books which the Christians were required to surrender in the Diocletian persecution, we hear nothing of their liturgies.

We assert, then, that there was no written liturgy in the first three centuries, and this though Probst ("Liturgie der drei ersten Jahrhunderte," ad init.) has tried hard to show that such liturgies existed from 150. Probst's learning and accuracy deserve all respect, but we cannot think equally well of his logical power, and we confess that we are utterly unable to discover anything which approaches proof in his laborious argument. We are disposed, however, to go further and follow Le Brun to the full extent of his thesis—viz. that written liturgies did not exist for the first four centuries. He relies on Basil "De Sp. Sancto," c. 27: "Which of the Saints has left us in writing the words of invocation at the exhibition of the bread of the Eucharist and the chalice of benediction? For we are not content with those mentioned by the Apostle or the Gospel, but we also say other words before and after, as having great force with respect to the mystery, receiving them from unwritten tradition." The reader must judge for himself as to the import of these words. So excellent an authority as Maskell ("Ancient Liturgy of the Church of England," ed. 3, xxvii.) believes that St. Basil only means to deny that the liturgical words were contained in Scripture. Early in the fifth century Pope Innocent I., writing to Decentius, who had applied to him for the Roman Use, reminds him that he had often come to Rome and witnessed the customs observed "in consecrating the mysteries and in the performance of other secret rites" ("in caeteris agendis arcanis"), and that this sufficed. He tells him, however, that the Pax should be given, not (as in the East) before the consecration, but "after all the things which I ought not to disclose." This does not look as if the Canon of the Mass had even then been committed to writing in the Roman Church. Long before this, however, there may have been a fixed, even if there was not a written, Canon of the Mass. The memory of the ancients, who were obliged, before the invention of printing, to use the faculty much more than we are, must not be measured by our modern standard. It was a common thing in the ancient Church for persons to know the Psalter by heart, and priests learned to repeat the Canon without book (even now no surprising feat) long after it had been written.

IV. Families of Liturgies.—The most superficial observer cannot fail to be struck by the difference between the Eastern and Western liturgies. Each of the former can be printed in very narrow space, because it is only in the lessons and subordinate hymns that any variation occurs. It is very different, e.g., with our Roman Mass, with its wealth of collects, Prefaces, &c. Moreover, in the Roman Mass there were at one time a much larger number of variable Prefaces. There is the same variety in the liturgies of Gaul and Spain, and in these last even a great part of the prayers corresponding to the Roman Canon vary also. Thus it comes that a separate volume is needed for each Western liturgy, while all the chief Eastern ones, with slight omissions, can be printed in one manual.

We are able, however, to divide the liturgies on a more exact and thorough system. "It is now thoroughly recognized," says Hammond ("Ancient Liturgies," xvi.), "that there are five main groups or families of liturgies, which are distinguished from each other chiefly, though not solely, by the different arrangement of their parts." Three of these are Oriental, two Western—one purely so, the other Western in respect of the countries where it was used and many of its characteristics, but presenting at the same time certain Oriental peculiarities. These groups are called: 1. the Western Syrian and derivatives; 2. Alexandrian and derivatives; 3. Eastern Syrian and derivatives; 4. Hispano-Gallican; 5. Roman and its derivatives.

(1) The West Syrian Family places the great intercession for the living and the dead (which is common to all liturgies and which is familiar to us as the Mementoes for the living and for the dead) after the invocation of the Holy Spirit—which in Oriental liturgies follows the consecration. The oldest member of this family is the Liturgy of St. James, but this again is, "without doubt, a direct modification of a liturgy nearly if not quite identical with the so-called Clementine." St. Basil's Liturgy is a recast from that of St. James, and St. Chrysostom's an abbreviation of St. Basil's. In its chief characteristics, and even in part of its wording, the Armenian liturgy follows St. Basil's. The Liturgies, then, of St. James, St. Basil, St. Chrysostom, of Armenia, are the members of this family. Palestine, Armenia, the whole territories of the Greek and Russian churches, are, as we shall see, the countries where it prevails.

The Clementine Liturgy never seems to have been actually used in any church. Le Brun places its composition at the end of the fourth century. Hammond thinks it may represent liturgical use in the middle of the third century, at a time when the worship of the Church, though not uniform, still had not been broken up into the separate and developed forms of the later liturgies. It bears unmistakeable marks of great antiquity. Such are the exact agreement with the order of the parts of the liturgy mentioned by Justin; the prayers over catechumens, the possessed, penitents; the prayer for persecuting emperors, &c. Again, the great length of the Preface points to a time when there was no elaborate cycle of feasts to fix the mind on particular grounds of thanksgiving. The eighth book of the Apostolic Constitutions as it stands is probably not older than the fifth century. But the compiler would not have ventured to put an entirely new liturgy into the mouths of the Apostles. The puzzling feature of this liturgy is the absence of the Lord's Prayer.

Liturgy of St. James.—Its antiquity is proved by its correspondence with the description of the Liturgy by St. Cyril of Jerusalem. It was once current throughout the Patriarchates of Jerusalem and Antioch. It exists in two recensions, Greek and Syriac, of which, as Renaudot has shown, the Greek is the original. In its Greek form it is now used only by the Schismatic Greeks at Jerusalem and Zakynthos on St. James's day, October 23. (See Article Liturgy in Smith and Cheetham.) In its Syriac form, it is the chief and prototype of the many liturgies used by the Jacobites or Monophysite Syrians and by the Maronites who are Catholics. The Maronites, however, have changed the words of consecration to the Roman form and reduced the invocation of the Holy Spirit to a prayer for the spiritual benefit of the communicants, who now receive only under one kind.

The Liturgies of Constantinople—viz. those of St. Basil and St. Chrysostom—are now used far more widely than any other Eastern liturgies. The Liturgy of St. Basil may very likely be his in substance, and since the Council in Trullo (i.e. from the close of the seventh century) the "Liturgy of St. Chrysostom" (an abbreviation of St. Basil's) has borne its present name. The Liturgy of St. Basil is said on Sundays in Lent except Palm Sunday, on Holy Thursday and Saturday, the Vigils of Christmas and Epiphany, and on St. Basil's day. In Lent, except on Sundays and Saturdays, the Liturgy of the Pre-sanctified (of uncertain date and authorship) is used; on all other days of the year the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom. The Liturgies of Constantinople are used, not only by all Greeks subject to Constantinople, or again (in Slavonic) throughout the Russian church, by the Bulgarians, Georgians, &c., but also by the Melchites or Oriental "Orthodox" in communion with Constantinople, and by the United or Catholic Greeks in Italy and other parts of the world. A letter of Balsamon shows that Constantinople in the twelfth century had already imposed her liturgies on a remnant in the other Eastern Patriarchates which had not become Nestorian or Monophysite. She had thus secured a barren uniformity at a heavy price. If it had not been for the vitality of Nestorian, Monophysite, and Monothelite heresies, the liturgies of Constantinople might have obtained exclusive possession, and rites no less Catholic and venerable than those of Constantinople might have perished altogether under the influence of bigotry and ambition.

The Armenians use only one liturgy, founded on the Greek one of St. Basil. The United Armenians use the same rite with some modifications. Bartholomew of Bologna, a Dominican missionary, had the Roman Missal (Dominican edition) translated into Armenian, and introduced it in the middle of the fourteenth century among the "United Brethren," an order for converted Armenians. The two most striking peculiarities in the true Armenian rite—the use of unleavened bread and wine without water—are shown by Le Brun (tom. iv. diss. x. a. 10) to have been introduced by an Armenian council about 640, inorder to symbolize the Monophysite doctrine that Christ had only one nature.

(2) The Second or Alexandrian Family is characterized by the occurrence of the "Great Intercession" for living and dead in the midst of the Preface, and by the prominent part assigned to the deacon. The original Church language of the Alexandrian church was Greek, and we possess three Greek liturgies belonging to it: viz. those of St. Mark, St. Basil, and St. Gregory. Originally there were twelve Coptic liturgies, and these are still preserved in Ethiopic by the Abyssinians, who depend on Alexandria; but Gabriel, 70th Patriarch of the Copts, who lived in the twelfth century, limited the Copts to three liturgies—viz. those of St. Cyril, St. Basil, and St. Gregory, all in Coptic. Of course the Alexandrian Liturgy of St. Basil, whether Greek or Coptic, must be carefully distinguished from that of Constantinople.

The Greek Liturgy of St. Mark is in its main features very ancient, for it contains references to persecution as still likely, though it has been altered under the influence of Constantinople. The Coptic Liturgy of St. Cyril exhibits close and often verbal agreement with that of St. Mark, and has the true Alexandrian arrangement of parts throughout. The Coptic St. Basil, on the other hand, is identical with that of St. Cyril up to the Anaphora, but in the Anaphora—i.e. from the "Sursum corda" to the end—it conforms to the Constantinopolitan or West Syrian model. Hammond supposes on very plausible grounds that the Alexandrian St. Basil, whether Greek or Coptic, arose from uniting the Anaphora of St. Basil used by the Greek church to the proanaphoral portion of the original Alexandrian liturgy. Finally, the Liturgy of St. Gregory follows the type of the Coptic St. Basil. The chief Ethiopic liturgy, the "canon universalis," closely follows the Greek St. Mark and the Coptic St. Cyril. It is unique, as Hammond points out, in omitting the "Sursum corda," with its response.[1] Of their three existing liturgies, the Copts ordinarily use that of St. Basil. St. Gregory's is only used in the midnight Masses of Christmas and Epiphany; St. Cyril's, which, as we have seen, is the purest representative of the old national liturgy, only on the Friday before Palm Sunday. (Marquis of Bute, "Coptic Morning Service for the Lord's Day," Introduction.) The Catholic or United Copts have imitated the Latins in several points—viz. Communion under one kind, the use (mostly) of unleavened bread, and kneeling at Communion. (Marquis of Bute, ib.)

(3) The East Syrian Family places the general intercession between the words of institution and the invocation of the Holy Ghost. It includes the liturgies in the Syriac tongue used by the Nestorians and Chaldeans, &c., descendants of Nestorians who abjured heresy and returned to the Church, preserving, however, their ancient rites.

The Nestorians have three liturgies. The most ancient, and also that in ordinary use, is "The Liturgy of the Blessed Apostles, composed by Lord Addaeus [prob. Thaddeus] and Maris, Doctors of the Children of the East." It omits in its present form the words of institution, though Bickell has proved that it originally contained them (see Hammond, lix.) The other two liturgies are called after Theodore (of Mopsuestia) and Nestorius, though there are reasons for believing even this last to be older than the Nestorian schism in 431. The liturgy of Nestorius is the only one of the three which has been corrupted in the interest of heresy (Le Brun, diss. xi. a. 10). Le Brun (ib. a. 11) asserts that the Chaldeans or Nestorian converts of Diarbekir have adopted a Syriac translation of the Roman Missal, using, however, leavened bread. He seems to have been misinformed; at all events this is not the case now. Badger, the learned author of "The Nestorians and their Ritual," whose authority is decisive on such a point, says the Catholics of the Chaldean rite use the same three liturgies as the Nestorians. They have, however, introduced the words of institution in the liturgy of the Apostles, and placed them after the invocation in the other two liturgies. They elevate the Host and chalice, and they give the laity at communion the Host dipped in the Precious Blood. Moreover, the priest reserves the particles over after the communion of the people, instead of consuming them like the Nestorians; priests say Mass daily, and even, if there are several priests in one church, have more than one Mass on the same altar (Badger, vol. ii. p. 241 seq.).

[1] It is true that Renaudot (i. p. 487) omits the "Sursum corda," but he is likely enough in error. Brightman (p. 228) duly gives it; with, however, the peculiarity that it follows instead of preceding the equivalent to our "Gratias agimus." See also Fortescue, Lesser Eastern Churches, pp. 284, 317.

(4) The Kindred but Independent Liturgies of Gaul and Spain.—Here the Great Intercession comes just after the offertory, though the Mozarabic Mass has also a Memento of the living after the Pater Noster. Not only collects, lections, &c., but also the greater part of the prayers which correspond to the Canon are variable. It has been supposed that these liturgies are partly due to the church of Asia Minor, with which the ancient church of Lyons was connected. However that may be, certain it is that this Western family of liturgies has some Eastern peculiarities: such are "Sancta sanctis" in the Mozarabic Liturgy, and, in both the Gallican and Mozarabic rites, the regular reading of a lection from the Old Testament, the various proclamations by the deacon, the "Preces" (i.e. probably a series of intercessions like the ectene, or deacon's litany in Eastern liturgies), and the giving of the Pax early in the service, whereas in the Roman Mass it has always been given, according to the earliest notice extant, after the consecration.[1]

The word "Mozarabic" is from Mozzarab, the participle of an Arabic verb meaning "to adopt the Arab mode of life." It must have been applied to Christians living under the Moors, but the liturgy is much older than its name, for it is substantially the same as that known to Isidore of Seville in the sixth century. It was, indeed, this Saint and his brother, St. Leander, who had the principal share in compiling the Spanish Missal, and St. Isidore presided over a Council of Toledo which imposed it on all Spain and on Narbonne, which did not belong to the Franks till 759. In Charlemagne's time the Mozarabic or Gothic rite fell into some disrepute because of expressions in it supposed to favour the Adoptionist heresy. Early in the ninth century, after much discussion between Rome and Spain, the Missal, from which the incriminated phrases had been removed, was declared orthodox; the Spaniards, however, being required to conform the words of consecration to those in the Roman Missal. But in the next century, Alexander II., Gregory VII., and Urban II., made great efforts to substitute the Roman Missal. In the thirteenth century the Mozarabic rite had disappeared from every cathedral church, and at the end of the fifteenth it had disappeared altogether. In 1500, Cardinal Ximenes published the Mozarabic Missal with some few assimilations to Roman use, and built a collegiate church in which this Missal and the Mozarabic Breviary (printed 1502) were to be used. At present the Mozarabic rite is followed, not only in this church, but in one at Salamanca (?). The most remarkable feature in the Mass to an ordinary observer is the elaborate symbolism of the Fraction. The Host is divided first into two, then into nine parts, each with a separate name, taken from the mysteries of Christ's life. Dom Férotin of Farnborough has recently discovered and published in their entirety the Mozarabic Missal and Rituals. Hence we have now fuller knowledge of the details of the Visigothic Liturgy than (with the exception of the Roman) of any other. (See Jenner in "Cath. Enc." Mozarabic Rite.)

Gallican Liturgy.—This venerable liturgy does not exist in a complete form, since no Gallican "Antiphonarium" (the book containing introits, offertories, &c.) has yet been found. But we have three Sacramentaries printed by Cardinal Thomasi in 1680, and again by Mabillon in his "De Liturgia Gallicana," in 1685. The first is called by Mabillon "Gallico-Gallicanum," and was probably used in South Gaul; the second, "Missale Francorum," used in North-Western Gaul, contains a large admixture of Roman elements—the prayers are Gelasian, the Preface, though retaining its Gallican name, "Contestatio," ends like the Preface in the Roman Mass; the third, "Gallicanum Vetus," seems free from Roman admixtures, except in the office for Good Friday. Besides, we have a Gallican Lectionary edited by Mabillon in his work cited above, and a "Sacramentarium Gallicanum," found by Mabillon in the monastery at Bobbio, and printed by him in his "Museum Italicum." But this last has the Gregorian or Roman Canon. Further, we have a most detailed and valuable exposition of the old Gallican Mass, in an extract from two letters of St. Germanus of Paris, written in the middle of the sixth century. Additional fragments of eleven Gallican Masses have been published by Mone ("Griechische und lateinische Messen," Frankfort, 1850), and a few more by Bunsen ("Analecta Ante-Nicen.") and Mai ("Script. Vet. Vaticana Collect." tom. ii.). From the materials at his command, Le Brun has been able to give a very full and trustworthy account of the Gallican Liturgy, which in the order (though not in the name) of its various parts is almost identical with the Mozarabic Liturgy, which we possess entire. Want of space compels us to refer our reader to Le Brun's clear and interesting account in tom. iii. It was under the influence of Pepin and Charlemagne that the Gallican gave way to the Roman rite. The Caroline books, composed in 790, certify that the Roman was already received in "the provinces of all the Gauls," in Germany and Italy, as well as among the Saxons and "certain nations of the North." It is needless to say that the revision of the Roman Missal made for the use of their dioceses by French bishops in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, and now at last entirely abandoned, must not be confounded with the ancient Gallican Missals. Rome never approved these modern revisions by episcopal authority, while, on the other hand, the ancient Gallican rite, if it had been retained, would have been in no way affected by the decree of Pius V. forbidding any deviation from the Roman Missal as approved by him, except in churches where a prescription of two hundred years could be claimed for the liturgy in use.[1]

(5) The Roman Missal and its Derivatives are characterized by the position of the Pax just before communion; the division of the Great Intercession into a Memento of the living before, and of the dead after, the consecration; and the absence of the invocation of the Holy Ghost to consecrate the oblation (Epiklesis). The early history of the Roman Liturgy is unknown. Writers of great name, Milman, De Rossi, Lightfoot, Westcott, &c., have contended, with great probability, that the original Roman church was composed mainly of persons who spoke Greek. A large proportion of the names in the salutations of the Epistle to the Romans, and nearly all the names of the Roman bishops for the first two centuries, are Greek. So is all the early literature of the Roman church. And it is held by Westcott ("Canon." p. 269) and many others that the early Latin versions of the New Testament were made for Africa, not for Rome. Again, St. Paul wrote to the Roman Church in Greek; for few now will adopt the unfortunate suggestion of the scholiast in the Peshito, that the original of the Epistle was in Latin. If we adopt this view, we shall also be led to the supposition that the liturgy was in Greek. When Justin wrote his "Apology" to the Emperor Pius, he was living in Rome. If in describing the celebration of the Eucharist he draws his picture (as would be most natural) from the Roman church, then, undoubtedly, the Roman Liturgy was Oriental in character. The liturgical order in Justin differs in marked features from the Latin Mass of Rome, as it was when we first hear of it and as it is now, and agrees with the Oriental liturgies of Family I.

The oldest authentic notice of the Roman Mass is in Innocent's letter to Decentius (anno 416). He mentions two characteristics which distinguish the Roman Mass from all other liturgies—viz. the giving of the Pax towards the end of the Mass, and the Memento of the living after the oblation and in the Canon ("Prius ergo oblationes sunt commendandae, ac tunc eorum nomina, quorum sunt, edicenda, ut inter sacra mysteria nominentur"). The Roman order was already ancient, for Innocent attributes it to St. Peter. The Canon of the Roman Mass must have been fixed in every detail in St. Leo's time (440–461); for, according to the ancient author of the "Lives of the Popes," he added the words "Sanctum sacrificium, immaculatam hostiam." We have a Leonine Sacramentary, published by Muratori in his "Liturgia Romana Vetus," but unfortunately it contains merely collects and Prefaces without Ordinary or Canon. The "Lives of the Popes" attributes a more important work of revision to Gelasius (492–496), who, it is there said, composed prayers and Prefaces. Walafrid Strabo adds that Gelasius set in order the prayers composed by himself and others. The Gelasian Sacramentary was edited at Rome from a MS. "copied before the year 700" (so Le Brun, tom. iii. diss. ii. a. 2; Hammond, on the contrary, says "from an early ninth-century MS."), and afterwards from other MSS. by Gerbertus, in his work on the old German Liturgy (1776–79). It agrees closely, and has perhaps been altered into conformity with the Gregorian Ordo and Canon. Pope Vigilius (elected 538) sent the Roman Canon ("Canonicae precis textum") to Profuturus, bishop of Braga, in Spain. He tells him that this Canon was invariable the whole year through (and here let the reader note a distinguishing mark of the Roman as contrasted with all other Western liturgies), except that on the solemnities of Easter, Ascension, Pentecost, Epiphany, and of the Saints, certain "Capitula" appropriate to the day were added. These "Capitula" were most likely, as Le Brun conjectures, short additions similar to those now made in the "Communicantes" and "Hanc igitur." The finishing stroke was put to the work by Gregory the Great (590–604), whose Sacramentary was edited by Pamelius in the second volume of his "Liturgicon Latinum" (Cologne, 1571), by Rocca (Rome, 1597), and by the Benedictine Ménard (in 1642) with learned notes. Gregory made a slight change in the Canon—viz. by directing the words "diesque nostros," &c., to be said in every Mass (see article CANON), and another of far greater moment, by placing the Fraction after, whereas till then it had occurred before, the Lord's Prayer. He abbreviated the rest of the Mass. Thus he substituted verses for entire psalms, and whereas the Gelasian Mass had two or three prayers before the Epistle, one Secret, two Post-communions—of which one was said over the people (" super populum ") —Gregory reduced the ordinary number of these prayers to three: Collect, Secret, Post-communion: and of the Prefaces—very numerous in ancient times—kept only those few which we still have (Muratori, " De Rebus Liturg." p. 14; and Mabillon, " De Lit. Gallican." i. cap. 2, iv. apud Maskell). Since Gregory's day, rubrics have been multiplied, Masses added for new feasts, &c., &c., " but there has been," says a learned Protestant, " no change of importance in the Roman Liturgy. That is to say, the number of prayers composing the Mass, the order in which they occur, and the names of them, have remained unaltered " (Hammond, p. lxxiii).

The Ambrosian Mass is not a daughter but a sister of the Roman or Gregorian Liturgy. In the crucial tests, the position of the Pax and of the Great Intercession, it differs from the Mozarabic and Gallican, and exactly agrees with the Roman Mass. But like the Roman Liturgy before Gregory, it is rich in Prefaces, and has the Fraction before the Pater Noster. It has, however, adopted the " diesque nostros," &c., from the Gregorian Canon; and several introits, and the arrangement of the three Masses on Christmas, have been borrowed from Rome. It has been thought that Greek influence may be traced in the prayers over the corporal (" super sindonem "), the litanies said on Sundays in Lent, the proclamation by the deacon before the Epistle, &c.

We pass over the Liturgy of the Patriarchate of Aquileia, which seems to have been a mere variety of the Roman Use, but of which little is known; and we pass on to a subject of far greater interest to us—viz. the Liturgical Use of the Ancient Church of England down to the Reformation. We take as our guide the admirable works of Maskell —one entitled the " Ancient Liturgy of the Church of England," and the other, " Monumenta Ritualia." It is probable, from St. Augustine's question to Pope Gregory, that the ancient British churches used a liturgy akin to those of Gaul and Spain. But the influence of St. Augustine led to a wide adoption of the Roman Liturgy in its main features. In 747 the Council of Cloveshoe, which may fairly be taken as representing south and middle England—for the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of Rochester, three bishops from Mercia, two from Wessex, one from Lincoln, and one from Sussex were present (Hefele-Leclercq, iii. 903) —decreed that " the holy feasts of our Lord's dispensation in the flesh, in all things duly pertaining to them—i.e. in the office of Baptism, in the celebration of Masses, in the manner of the chant—should be celebrated according to the copy which we have in writing from the Roman Church." These words are clear and express, nor is there room for doubt that as Christianity spread among the Saxons, the Roman replaced the Gallican Canon, and that gradually the whole Missal, in its main features, was modelled after the Roman prototype.

It is true then, in a general way, that our ancestors used the Roman Liturgy. But only in a general way: first, because before the invention of printing, the uniformity which has prevailed since Pius V. issued his authoritative edition of the Roman Missal was a matter of impossibility; and, next, because the power of bishops to regulate public worship in their dioceses was not restrained, as at present, and they used this power in introducing minor differences, though they preserved all the main character of the Roman Mass. Thus different Uses arose. About 1085 Osmund, bishop of Salisbury, promulgated a form for his diocese, which became accepted in the South of England and spread into Ireland and Scotland. Then there were the Uses of York and Hereford, and (in fewer dioceses) those of Lincoln and Bangor. Many of the ancient books were destroyed at the Reformation, and only a fragment of the Lincoln Use remains. It is not certain that we know the Use of Bangor, though Maskell believes that a MS. from which he has printed the Ordinary and Canon contains the Use of that church. Besides, there was a Use of St. Paul's in London (where the Sarum books were not received till 1414), of which we know nothing. And no doubt there were varieties in the Sarum rite which might be, and were, to a certain extent, regarded as separate Uses.

Maskell has placed the Ordinary and Canon of the Mass according to the Sarum, (supposed) Bangor, York, Hereford, and Roman Uses, in parallel columns. To this we must refer the reader, for a complete enumeration of the points in which these Uses differ from each other would be long and tedious, and would, after all, convey a much less vivid impression than any reader familiar with the Roman Mass can gain for himself with little pain by reading the texts. We content ourselves, therefore, with a few general remarks.

There is not only (we need not say) no difference of doctrine between the old and the present rites of the English church, but not even (with one exception) any detail of wording or ceremonial from which any theological argument could be deduced. This exception occurs in a single prayer. After the priest has put a fragment of the Host in the chalice, he prays, in the four English Uses, that this mixture of Christ's Body and Blood may be to himself and to all who partake of it (" omnibusque sumentibus," " et omnibus sumentibus ") health of mind and body. The words italicized are a relic of the time when the faithful communicated under both kinds, retained long after they had ceased to do so. They, of course, are no evidence of change of doctrine, though they do prove change of discipline; but Cranmer, in his answer to the Devonshire rebels, availed himself of them as an argument for communion in both kinds.

The first impression upon a modern Catholic reader made by the reading of these old English Uses will be, we think, one of surprise that he finds himself so much at home in them. They are utterly unlike the "Communion Service" of the church now established, while we are convinced that if they were re-introduced among us to-morrow our people would scarcely feel any difference. In the Ordinary of the Mass, the old English and modern Roman rites agree part for part and, as a rule, word for word. In the Canon, almost every word is the same down to the end of the "Libera nos"—i.e. to the end of the Canon proper. After that, many of the prayers are different. This difference is easily explained, for the prayers which follow the "Libera nos" are later than St. Augustine's time; nay, with the exception of the "Agnus Dei" (added by Pope Sergius, and adopted in all the English Uses), they are later—some of them much later—than the Council of Cloveshoe, which imposed the Roman Missal on England. Indeed, the prayer which the priest says before the Pax ("Domine Jesu Christe") was not to be found in the Roman Missal even in 1090, after St. Osmund's time. We need not wonder, then, that there is in this part considerable divergence between the English Uses and the Missal of Pius V.

What we had, therefore, was not a national Liturgy like that of the Copts or Chaldeans, or even a Liturgy so distinct from the Roman as that of Milan, but English editions or recensions of the Roman Liturgy. Nor must it for a moment be supposed that Rome deprived us of our ancient usages. Rome in no way interfered, or would, so far as can be conjectured, ever have interfered. She has not only tolerated but enforced the ancient Liturgies of the East. She allows the Dominican variety of the Roman Mass, &c., &c. The bull of Pius V., as he expressly stated, did not impose the new edition of the Missal on any church which had rites of its own with a prescription of two hundred years. The Reformers set themselves energetically to destroy the Sarum books; copies became extremely rare, and our clergy, forced to get their education abroad, naturally preferred to say Mass and office from the modern Roman books which were so much more easily procured.

(A full account of the literature will be found in Smith and Cheetham, article Liturgies. Some of the most important works have been noticed in the course of this article. Le Brun, "Explication de la Messe," is a most accurate and convenient repertory of all the results obtained by Renaudot, Mabillon, Ménard, &c. It abounds besides in original research, and gives full accounts of the chief Liturgies, with learned notes. But no student should be without Hammond's reprint of the texts of the Ancient Liturgies, accompanied by an excellent Introduction. Hammond puts the student in possession of a rational classification of the liturgies, and teaches him to fix his attention on the cardinal points in reading larger books. As regards the Eastern Liturgies, Hammond's work is now replaced by Brightman's volume, which is professedly based upon it and is far more complete. The discovery of Bishop Sarapion's Prayer Book has thrown much light on the origin of the Alexandrian rite. The works of Probst; Cabrol, "Les Origines Liturgiques," "Etudes Liturgiques," complete bibliography; Duchesne, "Origines du Culte Chrétien" (Eng. ed. "Christian Worship"); Fortescue, "Orthodox Eastern Church," "Lesser Eastern Churches," "The Mass"; Lucas, "Holy Mass"; Srawley, "Early History of the Liturgy," &c., should also be consulted, together with the articles in DACL.)

LOCI THEOLOGICI. The sources from which theological arguments are drawn. The name has become familiar through the celebrated work of Melchior Canus (1523–1560), a Spanish Dominican, Professor of Theology at Salamanca, employed at the Council of Trent under Paul III., and finally Bishop of the Canaries. In this work, which is written in most elegant and classical Latin, Canus uses the word loci or τόποι exactly as Aristotle and Cicero had done—i.e. in the sense of sedes e quibus argumenta promuntur. It discusses the use to be made by the theologian of Scripture, Councils, Fathers, Philosophy, &c., and forms a scientific introduction to Dogmatic Theology. Canus complains that theologians argued little from the Councils, not frequently enough from Scripture, scarcely at all from History, and he sets himself to guide them into a fuller and more discriminating use of the material which the revival of letters was opening up. Both in style and in method Canus marks a new era. He had a most powerful influence in inaugurating the critical and historical, as distinct from the merely scholastic, theology. LORETO. A few miles south of Ancona, on a hill three miles distant from the sea, there is a stately domed church, the work of Bramante, rising among the houses of the little city of Loreto. On entering the church, the pilgrim or traveller observes under the dome "a singular rectangular edifice, of no great height, constructed apparently of white marble, and richly adorned with statues and sculpture." This is the famous Santa Casa, or Holy House, which tradition asserts to be the very same building in which the Blessed Virgin Mary dwelt at Nazareth, where she heard the message of the archangel, and where the Holy Family resided during the childhood and hidden life of our Lord. Its internal length is about 31 feet; its breadth, 13 feet. The roof is modern. Externally, the original walls cannot be seen; but within the building the coarse stonework of the original masonry is exposed to view. The material is a dark reddish-coloured stone. Towards the eastern end of the house stands an altar, and behind the altar is an image, said to be of olive wood, now blackened by the smoke of the lamps; this is the famous image of our Lady of Loreto.

The legend of the Holy House in its main features runs as follows. The Christian power having been finally expelled from Palestine,[1] the house in which God's Mother dwelt for many years with her Divine Son and St. Joseph was completely at the mercy of the infidels. That it might be removed to a place of safety, and be for the future in Christian hands, angels lifted it from its foundations, and bore it through the air, in the first place to Illyria, where it rested on the top of a hill at Tersatz or Tersatto, near Fiume, in the night of May 10, 1291. But the Holy House did not long remain at Tersatz. After three years and a half, on December 10, 1294, it was removed to the opposite side of the Adriatic. Shepherds near Recanati are said to have seen it borne through the air, and deposited in a wood near the sea called Lauretum, either from the laurels which grew there or because it belonged to a rich lady of Recanati named Laureta. Soon pilgrims visited it in great numbers, but the place being remote, brigands also made their appearance, and to approach the house became a work of danger. In less than a year (August 1295) there was a third removal, to a hill three or four miles from the wood, along which passed a public road. The spot where the Holy House alighted belonged to two brothers, who quarrelled as to their respective rights of property in the site. Again, in December 1295, the house was removed from its place, but only for a very short distance, and was set down in the middle of the public road above mentioned, where it has remained to the present day. The Blessed Virgin, appearing in a vision to a holy hermit who dwelt near Recanati, soon after the final translation, unfolded to him the true character of the house. After a time the people of Tersatz heard where it was, and numbers of them crossed the sea to visit it.

Such being the legend, it remains to inquire by what kind of testimony it is supported, and to consider objections which have been advanced against various portions of it. No contemporary book or record, with the exception of two documents which will be considered further on, can be appealed to as noticing the translation. No extant writing of the fourteenth century directly[1] mentions it. The earliest account of the translation which can be distinctly traced was drawn up by Peter George Teremanus, or Teramano, Guardian of the Santa Casa, in 1460; on this the accounts given by Baptista and Angelita were evidently based. Teremanus put together a narrative which he inscribed on a tablet and hung up in the Santa Casa; this tablet was seen and read by Baptista and Angelita. Two bulls of Paul II., dated 1464 and 1471, speak of the "Domus et Imago" of the Blessed Virgin Mary at Loreto; the later of the two refers in general terms to the translation.

The first writer who, in works still extant, speaks of the translation, seems to have been Baptista Mantuanus, an Italian poet of some note, who joined the Carmelite order (to which the custody of the sanctuary of Loreto was committed by Sixtus IV.) and wrote a history of the church about 1480.[2] He derived his information chiefly from the tablet of Teremanus, whom he calls Neronianus. In his "Agelarii," a poem in Latin hexameters,[3] Baptista enlarges in a florid style on the marvellous translation. After Baptista came the Jerome Angelita already mentioned, who dedicated his circumstantial history of the Santa Casa to Clement VII.; he was followed by the Jesuits Torsellino and Riera, and many others.

There is, however, evidence of earlier date that Loreto was, and had long been, a celebrated shrine of our Lady; and the question suggests itself, on what did that celebrity rest? Flavius Blondus, born in 1388, in his work "Italia Illustrata," of which we may place the date between 1430 and 1440,[1] speaks of the "sacellum" of the Blessed Virgin at Loreto as of a shrine of great celebrity, and notices the number of costly ex-votos, testifying to the gratitude of the offerers, which were hung on the walls of the church. It can hardly be doubted that this "sacellum" was identical with the Santa Casa now at Loreto. The same word is frequently used by Baptista in his history already mentioned, and there it evidently refers to the Santa Casa, the migrations of which he describes nearly in the same manner as in the legend given above. Therefore, if Flavius did not mean the Santa Casa by the "sacellum" of the Virgin (which he distinguishes from the "basilica" to which it was attached), he must have meant some building which in the interval between 1430 and 1480 totally disappeared, and was replaced by a house built of stone brought from Palestine for the purpose,[2] to represent our Lord's abode at Nazareth. Flavius, therefore, when he mentions the "sacellum celeberrimum" of Loreto, is speaking of the present Santa Casa, the antiquity of which is thus traced to within 150 years of the time at which the legend says it was brought to Loreto. But surely his words authorize us to go further; he speaks of this as the most famous shrine of the Virgin "in the whole of Italy"; but the growth of such a fame must have been an affair of many years; we should naturally suppose that the commencement of the devotion could not have been later than the middle of the fourteenth century. Hence by a process of legitimate inference we are led to the conclusion that the present Santa Casa must have been at Loreto within some fifty years of the time which the legend fixes for its arrival.

A further question arises—Can the existence of the Santa Casa be traced before its alleged removal to Loreto? A remarkable passage in a description of the Holy Land by a Greek writer named Phocas[3] throws light on this point. Phocas visited Nazareth in 1185, and says that he found two churches there, one of which contained the house of Joseph in which the Annunciation and Conception were said to have taken place. He says in one place that this house was "transformed into a most beautiful church": but a few lines further on we come to a passage which shows what his meaning was. For after saying that in this church, on the left side, near the altar, there was a cave, he adds: "Proceeding from the mouth within the cave you come down a few steps, and thus gain a view of that which was anciently the house of Joseph, in which, after her return from the fountain, . . . the angel thus saluted the Virgin. Now on the spot where the salutation took place there is a cross of black stone, graven in relief on white marble, and on the right side of the said altar was a small cot (μικρὸς οἰκίσκος), in which the ever Virgin Mother of God had her chamber."[1] It is contended that either the whole house here mentioned, or else the "cot" on the right side of the altar,[1] was the Santa Casa now at Loreto. This much, at any rate is clear, that about 100 years before the date assigned to the first removal of the house to Tersatz, there was a building within a church at Nazareth which tradition named "the house of Joseph." Nothing seems to have been changed at a period nearly seventy years later (1253), when St. Louis visited Nazareth. About 1262 this church as is mentioned in a letter from Urban IV. to St. Louis, dated in the following year, was "levelled to the ground" by the Sultan of Babylon. But it does not necessarily follow that the house was destroyed, for the Christians would be likely to block up and conceal the entrance of the cave. For a specimen of the way in which travellers spoke of the state of things at Nazareth after 1291, we may take the passage cited by Meyrick from Sir John Maundevile, who visited Palestine about 1350. "It [the church] is now all downe; and men have made a litylle resceyt, besyde a pilere of that chirche, for to resceyve the offrynges of pilgrymes." There is no mention here of anything like what Phocas saw. Gradually a new subterranean chapel was fashioned, smaller than the Santa Casa, but partly on the same area; this is now called the "Chapel of the Angel." The original foundations of the "house of Joseph" were explored in the seventeenth century by the Franciscan guardians of the shrine at Nazareth; and they testified that they exactly tallied with the dimensions of the house at Loreto.[2]

Adamnan of Iona, a writer of the eighth century, also speaks of the two churches at Nazareth, and his language has been supposed to imply that the house of Joseph had existed on the site of one of them, but was in existence no longer. But the words need not necessarily be so understood; they are compatible with the actual existence of the house at the time when Arculfus, Adamnan's informant, visited Nazareth.

A few of the common objections to the authenticity of the Holy House call for some remark. Dean Stanley, who gives a glowing and really beautiful description of the environs of the Lake of Gennesareth in his "Sinai and Palestine," was led to treat of the history of the Santa Casa in connection with his visit to Nazareth. No one can be surprised that a man so prepossessed in favour of a non-miraculous and non-clerical Christianity rejected the Loreto legend, though he cannot have been insensible to its beauty. He thought he could show that if the Santa Casa was ever connected with a grotto in the side of the hill at Nazareth, according to the received view, either the house had no door, or there was a dead wall between it and the grotto, and no way of passing from one to the other. His argument is met and shown to be fallacious in the work of Father Hutchison. The Dean thought that the house must have been built of set purpose by some devout person or persons in the Middle Ages, to keep alive devotion to the mystery of the Incarnation, just as the chapels of the Sacro Monte at Varallo were built, and with the feeling that prompted the Pisans to bring home earth from Palestine in their galleys and cover their Campo Santo with it. It is enough to say that this is pure conjecture, and that if such a work had ever been undertaken at Loreto, some record of it could hardly fail to have been preserved.

[1] At the end of the treatise Flavius speaks of Eugenius IV. († 1447) as still living.

[2] The necessity of this inference will be shown further on.

It was for a long time a common Protestant objection that the Santa Casa could not have been the house at Nazareth, because it was of brick, and brick buildings were unknown at Nazareth. It is now well known that the house is built of stone; but it has been maintained that this stone is the common red volcanic stone of the neighbourhood, and "wholly unlike anything in Palestine." The contradictory of this assertion appears to have been established through the exertions of Mgr. (afterwards Cardinal) Bartolini, who sent to an eminent professor of chemistry at Rome four samples of stone—two brought from Nazareth, and two taken (with the Pope's permission) from the walls of the Santa Casa—with a request that he would analyse and report on them. The professor reported that the chemical composition of the four samples was absolutely identical, although in appearance and mechanical characteristics they differed considerably.[1] Father Hutchison concludes that "the stone of which the Holy House is composed is limestone, identical with that of Nazareth, the stone about Loreto being of a totally different character."

Since the above article was written (1883) historical criticism, even by Catholic writers, has thrown grave doubt upon the truth of the legend. The case against the Holy House has been forcibly stated by Chevalier ("Notre Dame de Lorette," 1906). He contends that there was no Holy House standing at Nazareth before the time of the so-called translation; that no change was observed there after the translation; that there was already at Loreto a church dedicated to the Blessed Virgin. As to the evidence produced, he shows that the earliest testimony for the legend is 180 years after the supposed date of the translation. A Catholic would naturally be most influenced by the fact that no fewer than forty-seven Popes and countless saints have expressed their belief in the story. Even as lately as 1894 Leo XIII. said: "The happy house of Nazareth is justly regarded and honoured as one of the most sacred monuments of the Christian faith . . . . No sooner was it, as the annals of the Church bear witness, miraculously translated to Italy and exposed to the veneration of the faithful, on the hills of Loreto, than it drew to itself the fervent devotion and pious aspiration of all, and, as the ages rolled on, it maintained this devotion ever ardent." But, "with regard to Papal pronouncements," says Fr. Thurston ("Cath. Enc."), "it is to be remembered that in such decrees which have nothing to do with faith or morals, or even with historical facts which can any way be called dogmatic, theologians have always recognized that there is no intention on the part of the Holy See of defining a truth, or even of placing it outside the sphere of scientific criticism, so long as that criticism is respectful and takes due regard to place and season."

The legend of "Our Lady's House" at Walsingham almost exactly corresponds with the Loreto legend (see "Month," Sept. 1901).

LORETTO NUNS. The founder of this order, Mary Theresa Ball, an Irish lady, took for her pattern the rule and customs of the Institute of the B.V.M. (see that article), in the York house of which community she had been trained to regular discipline during seven years, and made herself fully acquainted with the excellent system of female education there practised. Returning to Ireland, and supported by the approbation of Archbishop Murray, Mother Ball purchased a large mansion at Rathfarnham, near Dublin, and, in November 1822, commenced the institution which has since become so well known, and so deservedly celebrated, as the convent of "Our Lady of Loretto." In 1841 a colony of eleven sisters went to India, and, with the aid of Archbishop Carew, established themselves in Calcutta, whence they have sent out several branches. In 1845 the order was introduced into Mauritius, and two years afterwards a colony of nuns was planted at Toronto in Upper Canada, whence they have spread to several other places. Mother Ball died in 1861. After her death the constitutions were approved by Pius IX. Since that time the order has been introduced into Australia, where there are a number of flourishing houses. LOURDES, a little town in the department of Hautes Pyrénées, France, the most famous place of pilgrimage in modern times.

1. The Apparitions.—On Feb. 11, 1858, a young girl, Bernadette Soubirous, while praying at the grotto outside the town, had a vision of "a young and beautiful lady, clad in white, with a blue sash, her feet bare, but with a golden rose upon each foot." On eighteen different occasions the vision appeared, the last taking place on July 16. At first the vision did not speak, but on February 18 and again on February 27 it broke silence. On the latter occasion it said: "Go and tell the priests to build a chapel here" (at the grotto). On the feast of the Annunciation, March 25, in answer to Bernadette's persistent inquiries as to her name, the vision said: "Je suis l'Immaculée Conception." Bernadette lived for twenty years after the apparition of July 16, 1858, but never saw the vision again. She became a nun at Nevers, edified all by her humility, and died a holy death on December 12, 1878.

Contrary to what might be expected, the story of the visions was not readily accepted by the ecclesiastical authorities. First the parish priest, M. Peyramale, refused to believe in it. Only after careful inquiry and examination of Bernadette did he report the matter to the bishop of Tarbes, Mgr. Laurence. He also was sceptical, but the popular belief was so strong that he named a committee to inquire into the story. Miracles had already been reported to have taken place at the grotto, and crowds of the faithful had gone there in pilgrimage. It was not until January 18, 1862, that the bishop issued a "mandement" in favour of the truth of the vision. This decision he declared to be subject to the judgment of the Holy See. Although no formal judgment has been given by the Popes, they have clearly expressed their approval by their action. Pius IX., on many occasions, spoke and wrote in favour of it. Leo XIII. authorized a proper office and Mass of the apparition. Pius X. made the feast obligatory. It is kept on February 11, the anniversary of the first occasion on which the vision appeared. A basilica, built upon the rock of Massabielle, was consecrated in 1876. A second church, under the title of the Rosary, was built at the foot of the other, and consecrated in 1901. Leo XIII. delegated the archbishop of Rheims to represent him on this latter occasion.

2. The Pilgrimages.—The story of the apparitions soon excited the curiosity and piety of the people in the neighbourhood of the grotto. Bernadette had said that "the Lady" expressly wished that they should come in pilgrimage there. And wonderfully has that wish been carried out. Not only the neighbours, but pilgrims from all parts of France and from other countries, came in their thousands to the shrine. By the end of the year 1908, fifty years after the date of the apparition, the number of pilgrims reached 5,000,000. This number shows no sign of diminishing. The railway companies calculate that a million travellers are received at the station of Lourdes every year.

3. The Miracles.—Still more remarkable than the apparitions and the pilgrimages are the miracles constantly wrought at the shrine. For some years the marvellous stories were either disbelieved or considered as merely ordinary cases of faith-healing. But now that the evidence has been carefully sifted and the various cases have been thoroughly examined, the ablest medical men have agreed that the facts can no longer be denied: the only question is how they are to be explained. Thus in "Annales des Sciences Psychiques," edited by Dr. Ch. Richet, a well-known infidel, we find a whole number devoted to Lourdes (December 1907). The writer, M. Mangin, reviewing M. Georges Bertrin's "Histoire critique de Lourdes," says: "Sa lecture entraînera chez tous les esprits non prévenus la conviction que les faits sont réels." Anyone who has visited the bureau at Lourdes and conversed with the able director, Dr. Boisserie, will be convinced that every effort is made to arrive at the truth. The utmost publicity is invited. The word "miracle" is not used there; all the marvels are called simply "cures." The only business of the bureau is to ascertain (1) that the pilgrim was diseased when he arrived, and (2) that he was cured when he left. How the cure was brought about is no affair of theirs. "These questions," says Dr. Boisserie, "are extremely difficult. In order to understand them it is necessary to free one's mind from all preconceived opinions, and to ground one's judgment on serious and long-continued observation, and not on fugitive impressions hastily collected, which cannot be tested" ("Annales de Lourdes," Juin 1894). To go into the medical questions would be beyond the scope of the present work. The reader is strongly recommended to consult an article in the volume of "Studies," by Dr. J. R. Gasquet, who spent five weeks at Lourdes in 1894. He came to this conclusion: "The great majority of the cures I witnessed at Lourdes were evidently, in one way or another, due to the influence of the mind on the body; but I saw a few instances which, if they stand further inquiry, I cannot ascribe to any natural agency."

It may be worth while to note that Zola's denial of any real cure at Lourdes rests upon a base distortion of facts. He describes a well-known case of advanced phthisis. The woman's name in real life was Marie Lebranchu, called in the romance "La Grivotte." Zola himself saw her cured, but he makes her have a severe relapse and die on the way home! As a fact, she lived many years afterwards, perfectly cured. When remonstrated with by Dr. Boisserie, Zola replied that he could do as he pleased with his puppets!

The best work on Lourdes is "Histoire critique des Événements de Lourdes—Apparitions et Guérisons," by G. Bertrin; Lasserre's more famous work, "Notre Dame de Lourdes" "in spite of its brilliant literary qualities, or perhaps because of them, was not calculated to satisfy a physician" [Dr. Gasquet]; Boisserie, "L'Œuvre de Lourdes"; Jörgensen, "Lourdes," tr.; R. H. Benson, "Lourdes."

LOW SUNDAY. The first Sunday after Easter. The name given to it in the Missal and Breviary is "Dominica in Albis" (depositis), because then the newly-baptized wore their white robes for the last time. St. Augustine mentions this custom in a sermon for the day, and it is alluded to in the noble Breviary hymn still used in the vespers of Low Sunday, "Ad regias Agni dapes."

The name Low Sunday, like the Greek ἀντιπάσχα, emphasises the contrast between the great Easter solemnity and the Sunday which ends the octave. Another Latin name, "Pascha clausum," is preserved in the Dutch name, "Beloken Paaschen," i.e. "close of Easter." The name "Quasimodo" is taken from the first words of the introit in the Mass (1 Cor. iii. 1, 2), and is the common name for this Sunday in France and Germany.

LUNETTE. A case, fitting into an aperture in the monstrance, in which the Blessed Sacrament is placed for exposition.

LUTHER AND LUTHERANISM. Martin Luther was born at Eisleben, Saxony, November 10, 1483, and died there February 8, 1546. His father was a peasant who afterwards became a miner. Soon after Martin's birth the family removed to Mansfeld, and there the lad received his early education. The public or elementary schools at this time were very numerous in Germany. Martin's gifts were marked from the beginning. He had a fine voice, was admitted to the choir, and, following the custom of the time, sang before the houses of the rich to gain money enough to enable him to prosecute his studies in a higher school. At fourteen he was sent to the school of the Franciscans at Magdeburg, where he remained a year. From Magdeburg he went to Eisenach, where his voice attracted the attention and favour of Dame Ursula Cotta, a wealthy lady, who received him into her house and supported him until he entered the university of Erfurt (1501). Martin's father was now a master-miner and in a position to advance his son. He sent him to Erfurt to study law. There he remained until 1505, when he took his degree of Master of Arts and began a course of lectures on Aristotle. He was of an ardent and impulsive temperament and had strong religious leanings. The sudden death of a friend, who was struck by lightning at his side, seems to have determined his vocation. In spite of the opposition of his father and friends he entered the Augustinian convent at Erfurt to dedicate himself to God (July 17, 1505). There he went through the customary discipline, and in 1507, his father objecting to the last, he was ordained priest. Luther's earnestness and application won the favour of Dr. John Staupitz, the Augustinian provincial of Meissen and Thuringia. Frederick the Wise, elector of Saxony, had opened a university at Wittenberg and was looking for capable professors. At the recommendation of Staupitz, Luther was offered the chair of dialectics (1508) and afterwards lectured in theology. Urged by Staupitz, he undertook, though at first with extreme reluctance, to preach. His abilities were so marked and his zeal so apparent, that in 1510 he, with a brother monk, was chosen to visit Rome on business of the order. The sight of Rome and the memories it called up moved the impressionable young man so deeply that he fell on his knees and cried "Hail, Rome! holy city, thrice sanctified by the blood of martyrs!"

From his coming to man's estate Luther's mind seems never to have been wholly at rest, nor were his convictions wholly clear on certain doctrinal points. At Rome, the Rome of Leo X., he was scandalized to hear that many priests were unbelievers. Returning to his university he resumed his lectures and his studies, was made Doctor of Theology (1512), and studied closely Greek and Hebrew in order to enable him better to expound the Scriptures. About this time Pope Leo X. proclaimed indulgences in Germany, for those who contributed to the completion of St. Peter's basilica in Rome. Albert of Brandenburg, elector and archbishop of Mentz and Magdeburg, was ordered to publish the indulgences, and John Tetzel, of Leipzig, a learned and eloquent Dominican, was appointed by Albert to preach the indulgences among the people.

The proclamation of indulgences was not new in Germany, nor was opposition to it on the part of the people and of both civil and ecclesiastical authorities new. [See INDULGENCES.]

When Tetzel began to preach the indulgences, opposition at once broke out, and

Luther took the lead in the opposition. He drew up his objections in the shape of ninety-five propositions, which he fastened to the door of the castle church at Wittenberg on All Saints' eve (October 31, 1517). In these he attacked the abuse, not the doctrine, of indulgences, pronouncing anathema on whosoever spoke against the truth of Papal indulgences (Prop. 71). He stated, furthermore, that he had no purpose to speak against Holy Writ or the doctrines of the Popes and Fathers of the Church. Nevertheless the propositions contained the germ of his future heresy.

In assailing the abuse of indulgences Luther only gave voice to a widespread feeling in Germany. He at once gained a number of adherents, among them men of influence both in Church and State. The Bishop of Würzburg wrote to the Elector Frederick to protect Luther. A heated controversy arose. There were various replies to Luther, one of the ablest being by Tetzel. A more famous and learned opponent still was Dr. John Eck, vice-chancellor of the University of Ingolstadt. Luther, now wholly roused, replied with heat and haste to his adversaries, and in a style and manner not at all in accord with modern ideas of controversial courtesy. His opponents were asses, pigs, dolts, &c., and were assailed with still viler epithets. Where he failed in argument he took refuge in invective, often of the coarsest kind. As the controversy deepened he struck further away from the doctrinal truths he had hitherto preached and taught. Yet he claimed to be in perfect accord and sympathy with the centre of Catholic doctrine, and in the letter to Pope Leo X. which accompanied his propositions and their defence he wrote: "Most Holy Father, I cast myself at thy feet with all that I have and am. Give life or take it; call, recall, approve, reprove; your voice is that of Christ, who presides and speaks in you."

Probably none of the parties engaged in the controversy had any idea at this time whither it was drifting. The Pope took the matter easily. Nevertheless he appointed a court to try the case and summoned (August 7, 1518) Luther to Rome to defend himself. At the request of the Elector Frederick, the Diet of Augsburg was substituted for Rome as the place of trial, and Cardinal Cajetan, Papal legate, was appointed to represent the Pope at the Diet. Luther appeared (October 1518). The cardinal's instructions were to enter into no controversy, but demand an absolute retractation on Luther's part. Luther claimed that he had said naught against the Scriptures, the doctrine of the Church, the decrees of Popes, or reason. He consented to declare formally his reverence and obedience to "the Roman Church in every word and deed, whether in time past, present, or future," and if he had said aught contrary to this declaration he wished it to be considered as having been never spoken. He fled from Augsburg angry at heart.

The Pope issued a bull explaining clearly the true teaching of the Church on indulgences (November 9, 1518), and sent Charles of Miltitz, himself a Saxon, as nuncio into Germany with a view to reconciling all parties and bringing about peace. Miltitz seemed to side with Luther as against Tetzel. He prevailed upon Luther to write another letter (March 3, 1519) of complete submission to the Pope and to the authority of the Church; but the nuncio was deceived in imagining his mission accomplished.

While the German bishops were preparing to meet and confer on the points of dispute, a public discussion took place at Leipzig between Luther and his friends and their opponents. George, duke of Saxony, presided, and a large and cultivated audience assembled. With Luther were his friend Carlstadt and the Wittenberg professors. Opposed to them was the learned Eck, and the professors of Cologne, Louvain, and Leipzig. The chief matters of discussion were the condition of man after the fall; free-will and grace; penance and indulgences; and the primacy of the Church of Rome, which primacy, Luther maintained, rested only on human authority, claiming that the Pope had no more jurisdiction than the Archbishop of Magdeburg or the Bishop of Paris. Here also Luther gave open expression to his doctrine that faith alone, with or without good works, secures salvation. He furthermore denied free-will in man and the infallibility of the oecumenical councils. Duke George, seeing the danger of these propositions, stopped the discussion.

The universities of Paris, Louvain, and Cologne condemned Luther's propositions (1519). Luther retaliated with abuse of the faculties of those establishments, and on October 11, 1520, wrote to the Pope, sending him his pamphlet on "Christian Liberty," and assailing in virulent terms the whole office and dignity of the Papacy. Meantime he was incessant in defence of his theories, and between 1520 and 1521 he launched out pamphlet after pamphlet, that were eagerly caught up by the German people and spread abroad, creating discussion and tumult everywhere. In these he taught that the Bible was the only source of faith; that human nature was wholly corrupted by original sin; that consequently man was not free, and whatever he did, whether good or ill, was the work of God; that faith alone saves; that the hierarchy and priesthood are unnecessary. and exterior worship is useless; that the sacraments were profitless (a doctrine that he afterwards modified), and that Christian priesthood is universal.

These doctrines, especially the last, caught the hearts of multitudes, the gist of them being an absolute freedom from all restraint and a practical sanctification of sin. Luther appealed strongly to the spirit of nationality and greed. He addressed the emperor, the nobles, and the peoples. He urged the emperor to overthrow the power of the Pope, confiscate the wealth of the Church, abolish feasts and holidays and Masses for the dead. He substituted German for the Latin which was the literary language of the time, and by this means his teachings spread the more readily among his countrymen, while he made use of vile illustrations to caricature the Pope, the monks, and the teachings of the Church.

On June 15, 1520, the Pope issued a bull specifically condemning Luther's teachings and excommunicating him if he refused to retract within sixty days. Luther retorted with a pamphlet in which he held the author of the bull to be Antichrist. He succeeded in winning over the Elector of Saxony, who used his good offices in Luther's behalf with the emperor Charles V. Luther appealed (November 17, 1520) from the authority of the Pope to a general council, and on December 10, 1520, publicly burned the Pope's bull at Wittenberg, consigning the Pope himself to "fire eternal." The emperor, seeing the flame that was being kindled over the land, convoked the German Diet at Worms (1521). Luther appeared before the Diet to answer the charges against him, and refused to retract unless "convicted of error by Scripture proof or by plain reason," he relying absolutely on his own interpretation of Scripture. All efforts to change him being unavailing, he was ordered to quit Worms, and left under a safe-conduct. He was taken to Wartburg, near Eisenach, and there remained from May 1521 to March 1522, living under the name of "Master George" and dressing as a knight. The Diet of Worms placed him under the ban of the empire as a heretic. But the circumstances of the time and the opposition of the German States rendered the edict ineffective.

At Wartburg, which he called his "Patmos," Luther employed most of his time in translating the Bible into German and in issuing more pamphlets.[1] Leo X. died December 1, 1521, and was succeeded by Adrian VI., who took up with great earnestness the subject of reform within the Church. He urged the Diet of Nürnberg (November 1522) to take active and vigorous steps against Luther, for "the revolt now directed against the spiritual authority will shortly deal a blow at the temporal also." The Diet confessed that it was impossible to enforce the edict against Luther for fear of a popular uprising. Adrian died in 1523, and was succeeded by Clement VII.

Clement sent Cardinal Campeggio to the Diet at Nürnberg, but he was as unsuccessful as his predecessors. Most of the princes seemed to favour a break with Rome, and Frederick, the Elector of Saxony, made himself the chief protector of Luther and those who followed him. The States divided: Mecklenburg, Anhalt, Mansfeld, Prussia, and the cities of Brunswick and Magdeburg declared for Luther, under the leadership of John, the new elector of Saxony, and Philip, landgrave of Hesse, an alliance being concluded at Torgau (May 4, 1526). The other side made an alliance at Dessau, and thus began the division between the Catholic and Protestant States of Germany.

Luther's teachings had already taken effect among the people. Many monks renounced their orders and their vows. Carlstadt, Luther's friend, raised a mob at Wittenberg and destroyed the altars and images of Christ and the saints. The same was done elsewhere. Infant baptism was rejected at Zwickau, where Nicholas Storch organized a society that developed into the Anabaptists. These attracted Carlstadt and other prominent Lutherans, and great excesses were committed by them at Wittenberg. Luther took alarm, and leaving Wartburg reached Wittenberg on Good Friday, 1522. All through Easter week he harangued his followers and condemned their violence. More monks left their convents, took wives, and recruited the Lutheran ranks. The teaching of human irresponsibility for sin and disregard of all authority took effect among the masses. The peasants rose in rebellion against their lords, burned convents, and stormed castles of the nobles. Thomas Münster took the lead, preaching human equality. Luther himself was compelled to preach against those whom his doctrines had aroused, and he urged the nobles to slay without mercy these "children of the devil." His advice was taken, and it is estimated that a hundred thousand peasants were slain in the "Peasants' War."

[1] The Church Times of July 26, 1878, speaking of the List of Bibles in the Caxton Exhibition (South Kensington, 1877), published by H. Stevens, says: "This catalogue will be very useful for one thing at any rate, as disproving the popular lie about Luther finding the Bible for the first time at Erfurt about 1507. Not only are there very many editions of the Latin Vulgate long anterior to that time, but there were actually nine German editions of the Bible in the Caxton Exhibition earlier than 1483, the year of Luther's birth, and at least three more before the end of the century." Mr. H. Stevens writes in the Athenaeum of October 6, 1883, p. 434: "By 1507 more than one hundred Latin Bibles had been printed, some of them small and cheap pocket editions. There had been, besides, thirteen editions of a translation of the Vulgate into German, and others in other modern languages. . . . Among the most interesting additions latest made [to the Grenville Library in the British Museum] is a nearly complete set of fourteen grand old pre-Luther German Bibles, 1460–1518, all in huge folios except the twelfth, which is in quarto form." The Athenaeum of December 22, 1883, contains an article on "The German Bible before Luther," in which it is shown that what Geffcken calls "the German Vulgate" was in common use among the people long before Luther's time; that Luther had evidently the old Catholic German Bible of 1483 before him, when making his translation; and that, consequently, "it is time we should hear no more of Luther as the first German Bible translator, and of his translation as an independent work from the original Greek." (From The Bible and the Reformation, by C. F. B. Allnatt.)

Luther called Henry VIII. the "crowned ass, liar, varlet, idiot, snivelling sophist, and swine of the Thomist herd." The learned Erasmus was also drawn into the controversy against Luther, and was answered in similar strain. Luther had now thrown off his monk's habit, and on June 13, 1525, he married Katharina von Bora, an ex-nun of Nimptschen, in Saxony. He had been already famed for his free life even among his own followers, and this final step brought great ridicule on the Reformer. "It was thought," wrote Erasmus, "that Luther was the hero of a tragedy; but for my part I regard him as playing the chief part in a comedy, that has ended, like all comedies, in a marriage."[2]

Luther's adherents had become so numerous that he found it necessary to systematize a form of faith and of ecclesiastical government for them in lieu of that which he had taught them to reject. A synod was called at Hamburg by Philip of Hesse (October 1526). It was there agreed to adopt a synodal constitution which gave each congregation complete control over its own ecclesiastical discipline. This plan, with some modifications to secure outward uniformity, was adopted in the Lutheran States. Preachers were appointed by a commission of ecclesiastics and laymen. The established ecclesiastical foundations were abolished, and the head of the State was made the supreme authority within the State on matters of Church government. To educate the rising generation in his doctrines Luther published a larger and a smaller catechism to be used in the schools (1529). These measures brought the Lutherans closer together, and at the Diet of Spires, held in 1526, the Lutheran States presented a bold and organized front in the persons of their princes. The emperor was at war and consequently not in a position to enforce any demands. The Diet, accordingly, at the dictate of the Lutherans, recognized, until the meeting of an oecumenical council, the right of each State to act for itself in regard to religious matters. The Diet assembled again at Spires in 1529 to determine religious difficulties and take measures against the Turks. The conditions proposed by the Catholic princes were moderate enough, but the Lutherans solemnly protested against them, whence the name of Protestants (April 19, 1529). They claimed to be the exclusive heirs of the true religion, the only members of the one saving Church of Jesus Christ, and pronounced the Mass an idolatrous act of worship which should not be tolerated.

Disputes arose among the Lutherans themselves concerning the Eucharist. Luther denied the Catholic doctrine of transubstantiation, and denied also Zwingli's figurative interpretation of the words "This is my body."[1] He held the theory of consubstantiation. A conference was held at Marburg (October 1, 1529) to settle the dispute, but it only served to widen the dissension and manifest the absurdity of Luther's claim to free interpretation of the Scriptures.

A Diet was held at Augsburg (June 1530), at which the emperor Charles V. presided. The Emperor demanded a written confession of faith from the Protestant princes and a list of the practices of which they complained. Hence originated what is known as the Augsburg Confession, or Symbol of Faith, which was drawn up by Melanchthon and suffered subsequent changes. Luther fully approved of it. The Confession was an embodiment of Luther's teachings in a partially disguised form, and among the pretended abuses were Communion under one kind, private Masses, clerical celibacy, confession, and the ecclesiastical hierarchy. The Catholic theologians drew up a Confutation of the Confession, which met the approval of the emperor and of the Catholic princes, and the Protestants were ordered to renounce their errors and return to the ancient faith. A hopeless attempt to bring about unity was made, but frustrated by Luther and his more resolute followers. The Zwinglian cities drew up a Confession of their own, and Zwingli himself another of his own. The emperor put an end to the profitless discussion, giving the Protestants till the 15th of the following April to determine on their course.

The Protestant princes met at Smalkald on Christmas Day, 1530, and there entered on an offensive and defensive alliance, known as the League of Smalkald (March 29, 1531), to bind them for seven years. Both Luther and Melanchthon now authorized the use of arms for the maintenance of Protestantism. The emperor, needing the Protestant alliance, entered into negotiations with them, conceding at Nürnberg (July 23, 1532) that until the assembly of a general council no action should be taken against the Protestants, but that everything should remain as it was. This is known as the Peace of Nürnberg.

Clement VII. died in 1534, and was succeeded by Paul III., who was anxious to convene a council, that the Protestants might attend. But they rejected all overtures. The League of Smalkald was renewed (1535) for ten years. In 1534 Luther completed his translation of the whole Bible, and in 1537 issued the Articles of Smalkald, which were accepted by the League, and which embodied a spirit of deep hostility to the Catholic Church. "May God fill you with hatred of the Pope!" was his parting benediction to the League, and thenceforth the League refused to attend any council of the Church.

The Swiss joined the Protestant League in 1538, and the Elector of Brandenburg in 1539. The duchy of Saxony also joined, and Luther continued to inflame the minds of princes and people against the Catholic Church and the council. The emperor summoned another religious conference, which finally met at Worms (January 14, 1541). It resulted in nothing. A Diet was next called at Ratisbon (April 5), which proved equally ineffectual.

The Anabaptists, supposed to have been crushed in the Peasants' War, now rose up again and appeared in Münster under John of Leyden and others. Polygamy was introduced, and riot of every kind reigned, until the city, after a siege of eighteen months, was taken by storm (June 25, 1535) and the leaders executed with extreme cruelty. Philip of Hesse, who had been married sixteen years, and, with his wife living, was a notorious free-liver, asked Luther to authorize him to marry a second wife. After much hesitation the Reformer, fearful of losing Philip's assistance, granted the requisite authorization "in order to provide for the welfare of his body and soul, and to bring greater glory to God."

Lutheranism now began to be intruded into various places by force of arms. Luther saw the seeds of religious dissolution already at work. His health was broken and his spirit, save as against Rome. He entertained grave doubts about the efficacy of his work. The reform he saw to be a reform downwards. Public morals were at a lower grade than they had been before. "Since we began to preach our doctrine," he said in his pulpit at Wittenberg in 1532, "the world has grown daily worse, more impious, and more shameless. Men are now beset by legions of devils, and, while enjoying the full light of the Gospel, are more avaricious, more impure and repulsive, than of old under the Papacy. Peasants, burghers, and nobles—men of all degrees, the highest as well as the lowest—are all alike slaves to avarice, drunkenness, gluttony, and impurity, and given over to shameful excesses and abominable passions." "Let us go from this Sodom," he wrote to Katharina in 1545, and quitted Wittenberg in disgust, only returning at the demand of the elector and of the university. At Eisleben he died, shortly after delivering a most violent sermon against the Jews.

Owing to the wars, scandals, and disturbances of the time, Lutheranism spread rapidly over many of the German States and cities, being imposed upon some by force of arms. Albert of Brandenburg introduced it into Prussia, and at his death in 1568 Lutheranism was the predominant religion in his domain of West Prussia. It readily made its way to Silesia, where the Lutherans soon quarrelled among themselves on doctrinal matters. It entered more slowly into Poland, and after a severe struggle its progress was stayed by the exertions of some holy and zealous prelates and the coming of the Jesuits. It made more rapid advances in Livonia, Courland, Esthonia, Hungary, and Transylvania, though in Hungary it was supplanted by Calvinism. In Sweden it was established by Gustavus Vasa, and soon passed into Denmark, Norway, and Iceland. For its introduction into England see ENGLISH CHURCH, Reformation Period. The same causes were at work everywhere to favour its progress: corruption of public morals, wealth of the Church, scandals among the clergy, greed of gain on the part of the princes, nobles, and people. After the first flush of conquest Lutheranism never made any advance in territory. It remained stationary or receded in favour of Catholicity. "The geographical frontier between the two religions," says Macaulay,[1] "has continued to run almost precisely where it ran at the close of the Thirty Years' War; nor has Protestantism given any proofs of that 'expansive power' which has been ascribed to it"; and again: "We think it a most remarkable fact that no Christian nation which did not adopt the principles of the Reformation before the end of the sixteenth century should ever have adopted them." The masses of the Lutheran population in Germany no longer attend church. Lutheranism was first introduced into the North American colonies by a colony of Swedes about 1630, the first church being built in 1637. To-day Lutherans rank about fourth in numerical order among the Protestant denominations of the United States. (The best account of Luther and early Lutheranism is contained in Janssen's "History of the German People"; Denifle-Weiss, "Luther und Lutherthum"; Döllinger, "Die Reformation"; Grisar, "Luther" (Eng. tr.). From the Protestant point of view: Köstlin, "Martin Luther, sein Leben und seine Schriften"; Beard, "Martin Luther.")

LYONS, COUNCILS OF. I. The first General Council of Lyons ended the long strife between the emperor Frederick II. and the Church. The emperor, who was educated under Innocent III., was a man of extraordinary abilities and of a wide culture, most unusual in that age. He was a great statesman, he fostered the schools of Palermo and Naples, encouraged the study of Arabic, philosophy and mathematics, and set in his own person an example of taste in Italian literature. Unhappily, he had a superstitious belief in astrology, he was charged with grave immorality, his temper was cruel and despotic, and his word could not be trusted. He had been crowned emperor in 1220, and his differences with the Church, which had begun under the gentle Pope Honorius III., broke out into open war under Gregory IX., in whom Frederick met an antagonist as determined as himself. In 1227, the Pope excommunicated the emperor for constantly deferring a crusade which he had promised to undertake. The latter replied by seizing Rome and driving out the Pope. When he did go to Jerusalem, he was still excommunicate; he showed that he had undertaken the crusade purely from political motives; stories were circulated of his contemptuous speeches in the Holy City, which gained for him the reputation of an unbeliever; and it was not till 1230 that he was absolved from excommunication. In 1239 he again incurred excommunication for his attacks on the Lombards, and for setting his natural son Enzio on the throne of Sardinia, a fief of the Church. He seized the States of the Church, and in the midst of the strife Gregory IX. died. Celestine IV. reigned only for a few days, and the Holy See was vacant for two years. In 1243, Innocent IV., a former friend of Frederick's, was elected Pope. The new Pope refused to absolve Frederick except on conditions which the emperor would not accept. Frederick promoted sedition and tumult in Rome, and by occupying all roads, bridges, and harbours, cut the Pope off from intercourse with the rest of the world. In this extremity, the Pope fled from Sutri by Cività Vecchia and Genoa to Lyons, whither, on January 3, 1245, he summoned all kings, princes, and prelates to a general council.

The Byzantine emperor, Baldwin II., the Latin Patriarchs of Constantinople, Antioch, and Aquileia, and 140 bishops, besides cardinals, were present at the consultation previous to the council, while the famous jurist Taddeo di Suessa defended the cause of his master, Frederick. At the first session (June 28, 1245), in the cathedral church of St. John, the Pope, in a long speech, enlarged on the five wounds of Christendom—viz. the sins of the higher and lower clergy, the supremacy of the infidels in the Holy Land, the straits of the Latin emperor in Constantinople, the excesses of the Tartars in Hungary and the neighbouring countries, the oppression of the Church by the emperor Frederick. He accused the emperor of perjury, sacrilege, and heresy; of immorality; of maintaining an understanding with the Saracens; of friendship with the Sultan of Babylon. In the third session various decrees were passed on elections to benefices, contributions to be levied for the Holy Land and the Latin Empire in the East, and for help against the Tartars; on the abuse of Church censures, &c., &c. Again Taddeo sought to exculpate his master, and, failing in this, he protested against the proceedings of the council, denied that it was oecumenical, though there were now 250 bishops present, and appealed to a future Pope and true general council. The Pope, at the council's request, solemnly renewed the sentence of excommunication against Frederick, deposed him from his office and absolved his subjects from allegiance, authorized a new election to the empire, excommunicated all who should serve him, whether as emperor or king, and promised that the Holy See would provide for Sicily. The bishops dashed their candles to the ground, in token of assent, and set their seals to the instrument of excommunication.

In 1246, the electors who took the ecclesiastical side raised Henry Raspe of Thüringen, and after his death, in 1247, William of Holland, nephew of the Duke of Brabant, to the royal dignity. Frederick had still a considerable following, but his son Conrad had been defeated at Frankfort in 1246, and he himself met with a decided reverse before Parma in 1248. In 1250 he died in Apulia, 56 years of age. He had made his confession to his friend the archbishop of Palermo, and been reconciled to the Church.

II. Pope Gregory X., who was eager for a new crusade, opened the Second Council of Lyons (the Fourteenth General Council) in May 1274. James I. of Aragon, the Latin Patriarchs of Constantinople and Antioch, ambassadors from England, France, Germany, and Sicily, 500 bishops besides other prelates, met in the cathedral church. St. Thomas of Aquin died on his way to the council; St. Bonaventure was actually present, and died before it was over. A tax was imposed on ecclesiastical benefices in favour of the East. On June 24 the Greek ambassadors arrived, and in the Mass on the feast of St. Peter and St. Paul the Gospel and Creed were sung in Greek as well as in Latin, the clause "Filioque" being repeated three times. In the fourth session, July 6, the documents from the Greek emperor, Michael Palaeologus, from the heir to his throne, and from their prelates were publicly read, and the emperor's representative swore that his master renounced the schism and returned to the obedience of the Pope. The union thus effected was scarcely more than nominal and certainly was of short duration, but it led to an important definition by the council—viz. that "the Holy Ghost proceeds eternally from the Father and the Son," "as from one principle" and "by a single spiration." An important measure was passed to regulate and accelerate Papal elections. The cardinals were to assemble in the town where the last Pope died, ten days after his decease; they were to be strictly secluded "in conclave" from the outer world; their rations were to be diminished after the first three days, and diminished yet further after eight days, if their business still remained to be done. Other decretals (collected in the "Sextus Decretalium") were published by the Pope, partly during, partly after, the council. (Hefele-Leclercq, v. 1633 sqq.; vi. 153 sqq.)

MACCABEES, FEAST OF. [See SAINTS.]

MACEDONIANS (called also Pneumatomachi). Heretics who denied that the Holy Ghost was God, equal to and consubstantial with Father and Son. Macedonius was a Semi-Arian and bishop of Constantinople till his deposition by the Acacians, who were pronounced Arians in 360. After his deposition his influence brought the Trinitarian controversy into a new stage. Confessing that the Son was like the Father in substance, he held that the Holy Ghost was a creature, like the angels, and a servant of the Father and the Son. He was joined by several of the Semi-Arian leaders, Eustathius of Sebaste, Eleusius of Cyzicus, and Marathonius of Nicomedia. This last was a chief support of the party, and from him they were sometimes called Marathonians. The doctrine, owing partly to the strict life of its apostles, was widely accepted, not only in Constantinople, but also in all Thrace, Bithynia, and the neighbouring provinces. Under Julian, the Macedonians held synods, especially at Zele in Pontus. They were condemned in a Roman synod under Pope Damasus in 374, at a great Illyrian synod in 375, and finally in the Second General Council in 381. In 383, Theodosius prohibited all exercise of their religion. (Hefele-Leclercq, i. ii.)

MADONNA [Italian, "MY LADY"]. A name given to representations of the Blessed Virgin in art, and occasionally used as an invocation in devotions to her.

MAGISTERIUM OF THE CHURCH. [See CHURCH OF CHRIST.]

MAGNIFICAT. The Canticle or Song of the B.V. Mary (Lk. i. 46–55); so called from the opening words in the Vulgate: "Magnificat anima mea Dominum."[1] It was sometimes named the "Gospel of Mary."[2] Like the other two evangelical canticles ("Benedictus" and "Nunc Dimittis"), it is recited every day in the Roman Office.

MAJOR ORDERS. The superior ranks of the sacred ministry—bishops, priests, deacons, and subdeacons—are said to have major orders. Before the thirteenth century the subdiaconate was one of the minor orders.

MALABAR RITES. Certain practices of the natives of India tolerated by the Jesuit missionaries, but ultimately condemned by the Holy See. The name is really a misnomer, for the missions concerned were not on the Malabar coast, but situated in inner India—Madura, Mysore, and the Carnatic. The questions at issue were similar to those mentioned in the article CHINESE RITES. Fr. de Nobili (1577–1656), convinced of the impossibility of spreading the Gospel in these territories by the ordinary methods, resolved to act on the Pauline principle of becoming all things to all men, and so to become a Hindu to the Hindus. He cut himself off from his own brethren and lived the life of a Brahmin. While carefully rejecting all practices savouring of superstition or idolatry, he allowed his converts to retain their national customs. In a word, he made them Christians without ceasing to be Hindus. This meant principally the recognition of caste and all that is involved in that custom; e.g. separate churches and separate priests. His brother Jesuit, Fernandez, who had laboured in vain for many years in the same country, now became alarmed, and denounced de Nobili to his superiors. The matter was carried to Rome, and the innovator was severely reprimanded. When, however, his defence was received, the Pope, Gregory XV., gave a qualified approval to his conduct (1623) after mature consideration of the difficult subject. Thus encouraged, de Nobili went on with his system, taking care, however, that the inferior castes and pariahs should be under the charge of certain of his brethren set apart for that work. He died in 1656, after fifty years spent in missionary labours, leaving his work in a prosperous condition. At the end of the seventeenth century there were 150,000 Christians in the mission founded by him.

Early in the next century a dispute between the Capuchin and Jesuit missionaries in Pondicherry led to the re-opening of the question of the so-called Malabar rites. About the same time the question of the kindred Chinese rites was being discussed at Rome. Clement XI. sent Tournon as Apostolic legate to India and China to investigate the matter on the spot. He landed at Pondicherry on November 6, 1703. He remained there eight months, and, on June 23, 1704, gave his decision against the lawfulness of the "rites." At Rome it was at first received with some reserve, but in 1706 it was confirmed by the Pope. Efforts were made with varying success to mitigate the legate's prohibitions during the succeeding pontificates, until Clement XII. in 1734 practically confirmed the condemnation, though with certain modifications. Further small concessions were made by Benedict XIV. in 1744, who, however, bound the missionaries to exact obedience to the Papal decrees. The suppression of the Society of Jesus in 1773 put an end to the question for the time. (See the literature under CHINESE RITES; the Constitution Omnium Sollicitudinum of Benedict XIV., September 12, 1744, containing Tournon's decree and the decisions of Clement XI., Benedict XIII., and Clement XII. in "Juris Pont. de Prop. MANICHEES. Mani or Manes, the founder of this sect, was born at Babylon about the beginning of the third century. From the religion of the Persians he derived the doctrine of the two principles, and from Gnostic sects the notion of the hatefulness of matter. He and his followers must not be regarded as Christians lapsed into heresy, but as heathens who adopted so much of Christian ideas as suited their purpose. Mani was an Oriental philosopher; the notion of a moral fall, and a personal conviction of sin, on which Christianity is built up, were repugnant to him. In his view the soul of man suffered, not from a weak and corrupt will, but from contact with matter. Whatever evils the soul allows itself to commit are on this view physical, not moral—miseries, not sins. Again, the restorative energy must be looked for, not in a religion which reforms the will, and after it the whole nature, but in an enlightening philosophy, which reduces the contaminating contact with matter to a minimum. According to Mani, "two systems stood eternally opposed—God with the kingdom of light and the aeons [see GNOSTICISM], and Satan with his kingdom of darkness and the demons." [1] Light is the animating principle in all nature; and all beings are higher or lower according to the measure of their participation in the light. Woman is the gift of the demons, who impel men to propagate their kind in order that emancipation from matter and darkness may never come to them. The ideal light-clad soul is the Redeemer, or Christ, who descended from heaven in what was a body only in appearance, to teach men to bridle and extirpate their desires, so that they may return to their true home the kingdom of light. The sect observed three seals (signacula)—the seal of the mouth, the seal of the hands, and the seal of the bosom. By the first they were forbidden to eat meat or eggs, or to drink wine or milk; by the second, to kill any animal or tear in pieces any plant; by the third, to marry, or at least to have offspring. The members were divided into the "elect" and the "hearers"; the former were expected to observe the Manichaean doctrine strictly; from the latter less was required. They could gather plants and prepare them for food, and when so prepared, the "elect" took them from their hands. The Manichees rejected the Old Testament altogether, and while accepting the New Testament put aside such passages as did not suit them on the pretence that they were interpolated. They regarded Mani as the Paraclete promised by Christ, and had a hierarchy imitated from that of the Catholic Church. The sect became numerous in the East, flourished in North Africa, and even spread to several countries of Southern Europe. The promises of light, wisdom, and enfranchisement which they held out to their disciples seduced for a time the powerful mind of St. Augustine. Everyone knows how he shook himself free from the Manichees, and wrote eloquent treatises against them. Several Christian emperors, down to and including Justinian, published edicts against them, and little is heard of Manicheeism after the sixth century, although the distinctive doctrines of the sect reappear among the Paulicians, the Cathari, the Albigenses, the Bogomiles, and other mediaeval heretics. (Möhler, "Kirchengeschichte." The literature, patristic and modern, is given by Arendzen in "Cath. Enc."; Tillemont, "Mém." iv. 367–411; Kessler, "Mani: Forschungen über die Manichäische Religion"; Fessler, in "Kirchenlex.")

MANIFESTATION OF CONSCIENCE. This must be carefully distinguished from confession in the sacrament of Penance. The manifestation here spoken of is the laying bare of the state of one's conscience to a superior for the purpose of receiving direction as to vocation and other matters connected with the spiritual life. The practice belongs to the paternal and domestic side of religious government, and in no way involves ecclesiastical jurisdiction. Hence it can be made to a lay (religious) superior, and even to a female. The advantages of the practice to the individual subject and to the order generally are obvious. So, too, are the dangers. These latter have frequently been the matter of papal legislation. By a decree of December 17, 1890, Leo XIII. abolished the compulsory manifestation of conscience in all congregations of women and of laymen. And even in congregations with priests for superiors, the article prescribing manifestation of conscience outside of Confession has been in some cases removed. The papal decree just mentioned must be read in community every year at least once. (Taunton; Fanning in "Cath. Enc.")

MANIPLE. An ornamental vestment worn by subdeacons and by clergy of higher orders at Mass. It hangs from the left arm below the elbow (Gavantus says above the elbow, but he is corrected by Meratus), and is fastened by strings or pins. It is of the same colour and material as the chasuble. Priests put it on before Mass after the girdle. Bishops do not take it till they have said the Confiteor at the foot of the altar. It is supposed to symbolize penance and sorrow, and the prayer which the priest is directed in the Missal to say as he puts it on alludes to this signification: "Be it mine, O Lord, to bear the maniple of weeping and sorrow, that I may receive with joy the reward of toil." And the prayer said by the bishop is much the same. Liturgical writers also see in the maniple a symbol of the cord with which Christ was bound on his capture. Though in origin a handkerchief, it is probable that it was one carried not for use but as a badge of rank. Hence the stress put upon the bestowal of it at ordinations and various prohibitions of its use by certain classes of clerics.

Many writers, following Cardinal Bona, have thought that they could trace the mention of the maniple to Gregory the Great, who wrote to John of Ravenna because the clergy of that see had begun to use mappulae, which, up to that time, had been peculiar to Roman ecclesiastics. It has been shown, however, by Binterim that the mappulae were not maniples but portable baldacchini. The mosaic of St. Vitalis at Ravenna (sixth century) represents the bishop and clergy without maniples, and it is not till the eighth and ninth centuries that any trace of the maniple is found. It was originally a handkerchief (hence the name manipulus) used for removing perspiration and the moisture of the eyes. Mabillon quotes from a document of the year 781, in which "five maniples" are named along with other vestments. In 889, Bishop Riculf, of Soissons, required each church to have at least two girdles and as many clean maniples ("totidem nitidas manipulas"). In the tenth century, Bishop Ratherius forbade anyone to say Mass without amice, alb, stole, "fanone et planeta." The planeta is the chasuble; the fano (Goth. fana, allied to the Greek πῆνος and the Latin pannus and the same word as the modern German Fahne) is the maniple; hantfan or hantvan being the translation of manipulus or manipula in mediaeval vocabularies. [See FANON.]

The following are the principal changes which have occurred in the form and use of the maniple. Originally, as has been said, it was a mere handkerchief, used indeed at Mass, but then for ordinary purposes. But it was richly ornamented. Thus in 908, Adalbero, bishop of Augsburg, offered a maniple worked with gold at the shrine of St. Gallus. In the Basilica of St. Ambrose at Milan there are four figures of saints, constructed in 835, with ornamental maniples on their left arms, much like Gothic maniples of a much later date. Hefele gives a figure (belonging to the ninth century) of a priest with little bells on his maniple, in imitation doubtless of the bells on the coat of the Jewish High Priest. But even as late as 1100 Ivo of Chartres mentions the use of the maniple for wiping the eyes, and it was only gradually that the maniple became entirely of stiff material. The prayer in the Missal, as we have seen, still alludes to the old and simple use.

Again, in 1100 a Council of Poitiers restricted the use of the maniple to subdeacons, and such is the present custom. But only a little before the council Lanfranc speaks of the maniple as commonly worn by monks, even if laymen. A statute of the Church of Liège (1287) directs that the maniple should be two feet long, which is much more than its present length. Moreover, since the chasuble used to cover the entire body, the priest did not put on the maniple till the chasuble was raised after the Confiteor and his arm left free. A memory of the old state of things is preserved by bishops at their Mass. (Gavantus, with Meratus' notes; Hefele, "Beiträge"; Braun, "Die Liturg. Gewandung," 515–561, and in "Cath. Enc."; Rock, "Hierurgia," ii. 220.)

MANSUS, MANSE. In the Capitularies of Charlemagne respecting Saxony (Baluze, i. 183, quoted by Stubbs in "Const. Hist." i. 228) it is ordered that for every church a house with enclosed yard (curtis) and two mansi of land shall be provided. Here and in many other places the word seems to signify merely a measure of land, and is probably equivalent to bovata or ox-gang, the quantity of land—usually about twelve acres—which could be tilled with one ox. Gradually the meaning of the word changed, till it came to signify "a house with land attached to it," a residence. Thus in an agreement made in 1219 between the bishop of Lincoln and the abbot of St. Albans,[1] it is stipulated that the vicar of Leighton shall have a "mansus competens" along with the small tithes and other advantages. As used by Matthew Paris in his Life of Abbot Paul, who lived soon after the Conquest ("terra trium mansuum cum totidem hortis"), the expression seems to be passing from its earlier into its later meaning.[2] In the Chronicle of Brompton (fl. 1200) the term is used simply for mansion or residence.[3]

MANTELLETTA. A vestment made of silk or woollen stuff, open but fastened in front, reaching almost to the knees, without sleeves but with openings for the arms and with a low collar round the neck. It is worn by cardinals, bishops, abbots, and the "prelati" of the Roman Court, as well as by others to whom the privilege is granted by the Pope. It is used to cover the rochet, so that bishops wear it only when they are out of their dioceses, the uncovered rochet being the sign of jurisdiction. The mantellette of cardinals are of three colours—viz. red, violet, and rose-coloured (rosaceo); those of a bishop in Rome are always of the same hue. (Moroni, "Dizionario istorico.")

MARIST FATHERS. This religious Congregation was founded early in the nineteenth century by Father Colin, who was born on August 7, 1790, in the diocese of Lyons.

While he was still a young priest, the Restoration in 1815 offered a favourable opportunity for the revival of religion in rural districts after the ravages of the Revolution. In 1823 he resigned his parochial duties and, with several companions, under the name of the Society of Mary, devoted himself to the work of preaching in the small towns and villages. The blessing of Pius VII. had already been given to the scheme in 1818. About 1835 the attention of the Holy See was seriously turned to the distant missions of the South Sea Islands, a field much in need of labourers. The "Marists" readily embraced the offer made to them to undertake this work. Gregory XVI., to encourage and fortify the new apostles, signed, on April 29, 1836, the brief Omnium Gentium, approving of the "Society of Mary." The final sanction was given by Pius IX. on February 28, 1873. Fr. Colin died on November 15, 1875, and was declared Venerable by Pius X. in 1908.

Progress of the Society. — Before his death he had the consolation of seeing that God had blessed his work. In France the Society of Mary, of which the mother-house was at Lyons, was already divided into two provinces. The infamous Association Act of 1901 scattered the French communities and seized their houses. The members, however, have continued their labours in other lands.

From the beginning the Society of Mary devoted itself to the foreign missions. As stated above, the Congregation of the Propaganda entrusted to it the spreading of the faith in Western Oceania, where no Catholic priest had yet penetrated, and where all the savage tribes, scattered over a great number of islands, had been, or actually were, cannibals. The first departure of missionaries took place in December 1836. Father Bataillon was the first to land in the island of Wallis. In the course of four years of preaching, amid dangers and fatigues, he succeeded in converting the whole island, and since then the Catholic faith has reproduced among that savage people the marvels related of the missions of Paraguay and the first ages of Christianity. Father Bataillon became first Vicar-Apostolic of Central Oceania, and died in his much-loved island of Wallis on March 11, 1877, after forty years of missionary labours. Another of the first band was Father Chanel, who was placed at Futuna, an island inhabited by cannibals of the worst type. The preaching and example of the missionary proved alike ineffectual; the conversion of this people demanded the blood of a martyr. Father Chanel fell a victim to their hatred of the faith on April 28, 1841. Almost instantaneously the whole island, moved by Divine grace, embraced the Catholic faith. Dr. Epalle, at first missionary in New Zealand, and afterwards named Vicar-Apostolic of Melanesia and Micronesia, was not spared to display his zeal in the new field assigned to him by the Holy See. He was massacred on the island of Isabella by the savage tribes to whom he was carrying the gospel of peace. In this same Vicariate Apostolic several Marist missionaries have fallen victims to the cannibals.

Dr. Douarre, bishop of Amata, started for another Vicariate Apostolic in New Caledonia. This archipelago was occupied by tribes engaged in constant warfare with one another, prompted by their appetite for human flesh. The courageous apostle, undaunted by the dangers, made an attempt to carry out his object, but failed. A missionary was killed, and the establishment completely destroyed. Obliged to quit the unfriendly land, the missionaries left, but with the intention of coming back; and at a later period they did return, to recommence and pursue the work of civilization and the salvation of souls. They have now 36 stations in New Caledonia.

In New Zealand Marist missionaries were the first to announce the true faith to the Maories. Since 1889 the mission forms a separate province, with an archbishop, a bishop, and 70 priests. The province of Oceanica, erected in 1898, has five vicariates, besides a house in Sydney and three missions in Australia itself, with 200 priests. The province of the United States has one archbishop and more than 100 priests. Lastly, the Anglo-Irish province has eight houses with about 50 priests.

The work of the Order continues to be what it was at the beginning: missions at home and abroad, the education of youth, and the conduct of ecclesiastical seminaries. ("Life of Ven. Fr. Colin"; Sollier in "Cath. Enc.")

The Society of Mary, besides possessing an order of teaching Brothers [see the preceding art.], and another of Sisters, in virtue of an Apostolic brief, bearing date September 8, 1850, established a third order, for pious persons living in the world.

MARIST SISTERS. This congregation owes its origin to Père Colin (see preceding art.). Founded in 1817, and approved in 1884, it has now convents in England and elsewhere to which boarding-schools for girls are attached.

MARONITES. There has been much dispute on the origin of the name, but the following is probably the true account. Maro, a Syrian monk, contemporary with St.

Chrysostom, settled on Mount Lebanon, and after his death a monastery, called after him the monastery of St. Maro, was founded between Apamea and Emesa, on the Orontes. A monk belonging to this house, and known as John Maro, was named bishop of Botrys in 676 by Macarius, Patriarch of Antioch, who was afterwards deposed as a Monothelite by the Sixth General Council. John Maro thus became the spiritual and temporal head of the Christian population of Mount Lebanon, and contended successfully both against Saracens and Melchites. On the destruction of the old monastery of St. Maro by the Imperialists, another was founded at Kefr-Nay, in the district of Botrys, and thither the head of St. Maro was brought. Partly from the John Maro who died in 707, partly from St. Maro, the patron of the monastery, the Monothelite Christians on Mount Lebanon were called Maronites.

In 1182 a Latin Patriarch of Antioch united them to the Catholic Church. A schism was caused through Greek influence and a Maronite Patriarch fell away. But the rent was healed in 1216, and ever since the Maronites have been steadfast Catholics. Originally the Maronites acknowledged their Patriarch as civil ruler, but after a brief space they were governed on a feudal system by an Emir chosen by the aristocratic families, and he in turn nominated the Sheiks. In 1842 an arrangement was made by which the government of the Lebanon was divided between two Emirs, one chosen by the Maronites, another by the Druses, the former having a Druse, the latter a Maronite, assessor. The terrible massacres of Maronites by the Druses in 1860 (16,000 Maronites were slain, 100,000 were driven from their homes) led to fresh changes. Lebanon was placed under one governor nominated by the Turks; feudal rights were abolished, but each nation has its own Sheiks. In 1913 the number of Maronites was about 330,000.

The Patriarch is chosen by the bishops, the Pope confirming and sending the pallium. He is subject to Propaganda. He appoints and consecrates the bishops. He alone consecrates the holy oils and chrism. No translation from Syriac into Arabic can be made without his approval. Every three years he must summon the bishops to a synod. His title (conferred by Alexander IV. in 1254) is Patriarch of Antioch, and he always adds the name of Peter to his own. His income consists of 100,000 piastres derived from three monasteries, with about 100,000 more from a poll-tax levied on all adult Maronites, a tax of five piastres each levied from the priests, tithes, and a subsidy from bishops and religious houses.

Metropolitan is a mere title of honour. Formerly the faithful of each diocese recommended a candidate for a vacant bishopric. Since 1736 the Patriarch has nominated with the advice of his bishops and also of the clergy and nobles of the vacant diocese. The bishops alone give the sacrament of Confirmation. There are also titular bishops, two of whom are the Patriarch's vicars, another administers his diocese, another is his agent at Rome, &c. The diocesan bishops are supported by lands belonging to the diocese, reserves in the taxes and tithes collected for the Patriarch, and stole fees. Since 1736 there have been only nine bishoprics, counting that of the Patriarch, of which Beyrout, Tripoli, Aleppo, Damascus, Sidon, Cyprus are archiepiscopal, Gibail and Botri (the Patriarch's bishopric) and Baalbek episcopal sees. The archdeacon, oeconomus, periodeutes or bardut, arch-priest and chorepiscopus are the officials of the diocese.

The parish-priests, usually married, are chosen by the people. There are 898 parishes, 1371 secular priests, and more than 300 regulars. The parish-priest is allowed to till land, and his income consists in offerings of corn, oil, silk, &c., and stole fees. There are three lower or minor orders—viz. psaltist, reader and subdeacon, three greater or higher, deacon, priest, bishop. The tonsure is given before the minor orders. There are three general and several diocesan seminaries, the latter of recent origin. There is also a Maronite college at Rome. Education is given in Arabic, the vulgar, and in Syriac, the liturgical, language, and also of course in the theological sciences.

The Maronite religious follow the rule of St. Anthony. Down to 1757 there were only two congregations, one of St. Isaias, another of St. Anthony or St. Elisaeus. The statutes of both congregations were approved by Clement XII. But in 1770 Clement XIV. approved the subdivision of the latter congregation into that of Aleppo and that of the Baladites or "natives" belonging to Mount Lebanon. These Baladites are chiefly laymen. Each of the three congregations has a general superior, chosen for three years and independent of the Patriarch, and a procurator at Rome. Fourteen monasteries belong to the congregation of St. Isaias, four to that of Aleppo, nineteen to that of the Baladites. There are seven nunneries of the strict observance. There are also many irregular monasteries and nunneries where the rule is less strict, and the superior must belong to the founder's family. In one convent of Maronite nuns, a Western rule, that of the Visitation, is observed. The Maronites follow a Syrian rite, in Syriac, of the type of the Liturgy of St. James, but with many modifications in the Roman direction. Thus, they use unleavened bread and receive communion under one kind, and the ancient epiklesis is reduced to a prayer for the spiritual benefit of the communicants [see LITURGIES: Liturgy of

St. James, p. 529]. Many modern Roman devotions are common among the Maronites: Benediction, Stations, Rosary, &c. (See Assemani, "Bibliotheca Orientalis," i. 496 sqq.; the articles of Vailhé in "Échos d'Orient"; Neher in "Kirchenlex."; Labourt in "Cath. Enc." The statistics given by the above writers differ considerably from those of Streit, "Atlas," 123.)

MARRIAGE. I. The Nature of Marriage as such.—Marriage is a natural contract between man and woman, which Christ has raised to the dignity of a sacrament. Heathens may be, and are, united in true marriage, and their union is of course a lawful one, sanctioned and blessed by God Himself, who is the author of nature as well as of grace. But it is only among baptized persons that the contract of marriage is blessed and sanctified in such a manner as to become a means of conferring grace, so that we must distinguish between marriage in itself or according to the natural law on the one hand and the sacrament of marriage on the other. Theologians commonly give the following definition of marriage, taken from the Master of the Sentences. It is "viri mulierisque conjunctio maritalis inter legitimas personas individuam vitae societatem retinens." It is "conjunctio viri et mulieris"—i.e. the union of man and woman, the persons between whom the contract is formed; it is "maritalis"—i.e. it implies the giving to each power over the person of the other, and so is distinct from the union of friend with friend, man with man in business, and the like; it is "inter legitimas personas"—i.e. between those who are not absolutely prevented by lawful impediment from contracting such a union; "individuam vitae societatem retinens," it binds them to an undivided and indissoluble partnership during life, and so is distinct from such unhallowed unions as are contracted for a time or may be ended at will. If we add "gratiam conjugibus conferendam significans"—i.e. being an (efficacious) sign of grace to be bestowed on the persons contracting—we have the full definition of marriage as a sacrament. Of course, the definition gives the bare essentials of marriage, for it ought to include the most perfect union of heart and soul, sympathy and interest.

Two points in the above definition may cause some difficulty, since it assumes that even in the law of nature a man can only have one wife (and of course a woman only one husband), and further that by the same law the marriage tie lasts till death.

With regard to the former point, polygamy according to St. Thomas ("Suppl." q. 65 a. 1) does not absolutely destroy the end of marriage, for it is possible that a man with several wives should protect them and provide for the education of his children. And therefore (as many theologians suppose, from the time of the Deluge) God allowed the Patriarchs and others, whether Jews or heathen, to have more wives than one. But polygamy cruelly injures the perfect union of marriage; it degrades man by sensuality and exposes woman to the miseries of jealousy and neglect; it endangers the welfare of the children, and so may be justly stigmatized as contrary to the law of nature. Moreover, monogamy alone is contemplated in the institution of marriage: Gen. ii. 24, "Therefore a man will leave his father and his mother and will cleave to his wife, and they shall be one flesh." The legislation in Deut. xxv. 5 seq. appears to assume that monogamy was the rule among the Hebrews; so does the book of Proverbs throughout, and particularly the beautiful description of the good wife in ch. xxxi.,[1] and the same idea pervades the noble poetry of Ps. cxxviii. (see also in the Deutero-canonical books, Tob. i. 11; Ecclus. xxvi. 1). It was not till A.D. 1020 that a law of Rabbi Gershon ben Judah in the Synod of Worms absolutely prohibited polygamy among the Western Jews. It was practised by the Jews of Castile even in the fourteenth century, and still survives among the Jews of the East (Kalisch on Exodus, p. 370; on Levit. p. 374). But our Lord Himself expounded and enforced the natural law of marriage, and recalled men to the idea of marriage given in Genesis. It is worth notice that He quotes the Septuagint text, which is more express in favour of monogamy than the Hebrew: "And the two shall be one flesh." (So also the Samaritan, והיה משניהם "and there shall be from the two of them one flesh"; the New Testament invariably, Mk. x. 8; 1 Cor. vi. 16; Ephes. v. 31; and the Vulgate. The Targum of Onkelos, on the other hand, exactly follows the Hebrew.) Again, since Christ spoke generally of all mankind and not simply of those who were to be members of his Church, theologians hold that He withdrew the former dispensation, and consequently that polygamy is unlawful and a violation of natural law even in heathen. (Billuart, "De Matrimon." diss. v. a. 1.)

The same principles apply to the second point of difficulty. Moses, our Lord declares, permitted divorce because of the hardness of men's hearts, i.e. to prevent greater evils; and in consequence of this dispensation it was perhaps lawful for the heathen to imitate the example of the Jews in this respect also. But here, too, Christ has recalled all mankind to the primitive institution. The apparent exception which our Lord makes will be considered below, and certain cases in which marriage may be really dissolved have been explained in the article on DIVORCE.

[1] The estimate of women is high throughout the Old Testament. We need only remind the reader of Mary, the sister of Moses, Deborah, Hannah. See also Prov. xiv. 1: xviii. 22; xix. 14 (even xxi. 9, 19, are not really different in spirit). The most unfavourable judgment is that of Eccles. vii. 28.

II. (a) The Sacrament of Marriage.—A sacrament is an outward sign, and nobody doubts that in marriage, as in all other contracts, some outward sign on the part of the contracting parties is necessary. They must signify their consent to the solemn obligation of living together as man and wife. It is plain, too, that marriage may be called a sacred sign, for it typifies, as St. Paul (Ephes. v.) assures us, the mysterious union between Christ and the Church, which is His bride. But is it an efficacious sign of grace? That is, is the contract of marriage accompanied by signs which not only betoken but necessarily, in consequence of Christ's institution, convey grace to all baptized persons who do not wilfully impede the entrance of the grace into their hearts? This is a question on which Catholics are divided from Protestants, and which was agitated among Catholics themselves late even in the Middle Ages. St. Thomas ("Suppl." q. 42, a. 3), though he assumes that marriage is a sacrament of the new law, inquires whether it "confers grace," and mentions three opinions: first, that it does not do so at all, and this opinion he dismisses at once; next, that it confers grace only in the sense that it makes acts lawful that would otherwise be sins (this opinion he also rejects, but in a less summary way); and thirdly, that when "contracted in the faith of Christ," it confers grace to fulfil the duties of the married state, and this opinion he accepts as "more probable." It is plain that all which the second opinion attributes to marriage may be truly said of marriage as a natural contract, and does not by any means amount to a confession that marriage is a Christian sacrament in the sense of the Council of Trent. What St. Thomas gives as the more probable opinion is now an article of faith, for the council (sess. xxiv. De Sacram. Matr.), after stating that Christ Himself merited for us a grace which perfects the natural love of marriage and strengthens its indissoluble unity, solemnly defines (Can. 1) that marriage is "truly and properly one of the seven sacraments of the evangelical law instituted by Christ."

The same council speaks of Scripture as "hinting at" or "alluding to" (innuit) this truth, and more can scarcely be said. One text, indeed, as translated in our Douay Bible, would certainly seem to settle the question—viz. Ephes. v. 31, 32, "For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother, and shall adhere to his wife; and they shall be two in one flesh. This is a great sacrament, but I speak in Christ and in the Church." But we venture to think that this is not the true sense of the Vulgate "Sacramentum hoc magnum est; ego autem dico in Christo et in ecclesia," which exactly answers to the original Greek, except that "in Christo et in ecclesia"[2] would be better rendered, as in the old Latin of Tertullian ("Contr. Marc." v. 18, PL, ii. 518; "De Anima," 11), "in Christum et in ecclesiam." "Sacramentum" need not mean a "sacrament" any more than the Greek μυστήριον which it represents, and to prove this we need not go beyond the text of the Vulgate itself, which speaks of the "sacramentum" of godliness, 1 Tim. iii. 16; the "sacramentum" of the seven stars; the "sacramentum" of the woman and the beast, Apoc. i. 20, xvii. 7. Indeed, though the word "sacramentum"[3] occurs in fifteen other places of the Vulgate, it cannot possibly mean a sacrament in any one of them. We translate, accordingly, "This mystery is great, but I speak with reference to Christ and the Church"—that is, the words, "For this cause shall a man leave," &c., contain a hidden or mysterious sense,[1] in virtue of which St. Paul regards Adam's words about the union between man and wife as a type or prophecy of the union between Christ and his Church. We have the authority of Estius for this interpretation, which is that generally adopted by modern scholars, and he denies that the ancients appealed to this text to prove marriage a sacrament.

On the other hand, St. Cyril Alex. ("Lib. ii. in Joann.," PG, lxxiii. 223) says that Christ was present at the wedding in Cana of Galilee that He might sanctify the principle of man's generation, "drive away the old sadness of child-bearing," "give grace to those also who were to be born"; and he quotes the words of St. Paul, "If any man is in Christ, he is a new creature; old things have passed away."

St. Augustine ("Tract. 9 in Joann." cap. 2, PL, xxxiv. 1458) holds similar language. This theory, however credible in itself, certainly does not lie on the surface of St. John's narrative.

More may be made of 1 Tim. ii. 11 seq.: "Let a woman learn in quietness, in all subjection. But teaching I do not permit to a woman, nor to have authority over a man, but to be in quietness. For man was first formed, then Eve, and Adam was not deceived, but the woman being deceived hath fallen into transgression; but she shall be saved through her child-bearing,[2] if they continue in faith and love and sanctification with temperance." St. Paul excludes women from the public ministry of the Church, and reserves that for men. But he assigns them another ministry instead. They are to save their own souls by the faithful discharge of their duties as

[1] The formula, "This is a great mystery," is a common Rabbinical one, רזא יקירא. See Schoettgen, Horæ, p. 783 seq., and the same Chaldee word for "mystery" is preserved in the Peshito rendering of the verse.

[2] Ellicott, ad loc., translates "through the child-bearing"—i.e. through the birth of Christ. It seems to us incredible that St. Paul, if he really meant this, should have expressed it by an allusion so obscure and abrupt.

wives, and to be the source of the Church's increase, for it cannot subsist without marriage any more than without the sacrament of order. Women are to be the mothers of children, whom they are to tend and train for the service of Christ. And just as a special grace is given to those whom God calls to the priestly state, so is "the state of marriage placed under the protection and blessing of a special grace, as being dedicated to the Church and subserving its continual growth and expansion." Thus the intercourse of the sexes, which is apt to become a source of fearful corruption, is blessed and sanctified, more even than in its primitive institution, and directed to a still higher end, that of carrying on the Church's life on earth. The natural union is holy and beautiful: Christ perfects the union of heart and soul and makes it still more holy and beautiful by sacramental grace; and, hallowed by a sacrament, marriage becomes the perfect antitype of Christ's union with his Church. He cleansed His Church that He might unite it to Himself. He sanctifies Christian man and woman in their union that it may be "a hallowed copy of His own union with His Church" (see the eloquent passage in Döllinger, in "First Age of the Church," Engl. transl. pp. 361, 362).

The reader must remember that we do not allege this last passage as in any way conclusive from a controversial point of view, though we do think it fits in well with the Catholic doctrine. Many authorities are alleged from tradition, one or two of which we have already given in speaking of the marriage at Cana. St. Ambrose ("De Abraham." i. 7, PL, xiv. 443) says that he who is unfaithful to the marriage bond "undoes grace, and because he sins against God, therefore loses the share in a heavenly mystery (sacramenti coelestis consortium amittit)." St. Augustine ("De Bono Conjugali," cap. 24, PL, xxxvi. 394) writes: "The advantage of marriage among all nations and men lies in its being a cause of generation and a bond of chastity, but as concerns the people of God, also in the holiness of a sacrament (in sanctitate sacramenti)." Here the distinction drawn between natural and Christian marriage, and still more the comparison made between the "sacramenta" of Marriage and Order,[1] seem to warrant our rendering of "sanctitate sacramenti."

(β) The Nature of the Sacramental Grace &c. Marriage, then, is a sacrament of the new law, and as such confers grace. The sacrament can only be received by those who have already received baptism, the gate of all the other sacraments; and marriage is not, like baptism and penance, instituted for the cleansing of sin, so that grace is conferred on those, and those only, who are at peace with God. Christians who are in mortal sin may contract a valid marriage, but they receive no grace, though they do receive the sacrament and therefore have a claim and title to the sacramental grace when they have amended their lives by sincere repentance. Christians, on the other hand, who contract marriage with due dispositions receive an increase of sanctifying grace, and, besides, special graces which enable them to live in mutual and enduring affection, to bear with each other's infirmities, to be faithful to each other in every thought, and to bring up the children whom God may give them in His fear and love. They may go confidently to God for every help they need in that holy state to which He has deigned to call them, for He Himself has sealed their union by a great sacrament of the Gospel. Theologians are not agreed about the time when Christ instituted the sacrament. Some say at the wedding in Cana; others, when He abrogated the liberty of divorce (Mt. xix.); others, in the great Forty Days after Easter.

(γ) If we ask, further, how this grace is conferred, or in other words who are the Ministers of the Sacrament, what are the words and other signs through which it is given, the answer is far from easy. It is evident that there must be a real consent to the marriage on both sides, otherwise there can be no contract and therefore no sacrament. But is the expression of mutual consent enough? The great majority of mediaeval theologians, though William of Paris is quoted on the other side, answered yes. They held that, wherever baptized persons contracted marriage, they necessarily received the sacrament of marriage also. On this theory, the parties themselves are the ministers of the sacrament; the matter consists in the words or other signs by which each gives him or her self over to the other; the form, which gives a determinate character to the matter, consists in the acceptation of this surrender by each of the contracting parties. Hence (apart from the positive enactments of Trent, for which see Clandestinity, under IMPEDIMENTS OF MARRIAGE), wherever Christians bind themselves by outward signs to live as man and wife, they receive the sacrament of marriage. No priest or religious ceremony of any kind is needed. A very different view was put forward in the sixteenth century by Melchior Canus ("Loci Theol." viii. 5). He held that the priest was the minister of the sacrament; the expressed consent to live as man and wife the matter; the words of the priest, "I join you in marriage," or the like, the necessary form. A marriage not contracted in the face of the Church would, on this theory, be a true and valid marriage, but not a sacrament. Theologians and scholars of the greatest learning and highest reputation, Sylvius, Estius,

[1] He says the "sacramentum ordinationis" remains in a clerio deposed for crime, and that so the bond of marriage is only loosed by death. However, cap. 18 proves that St. Augustine did not use the word "sacramentum" in its precise modern sense, for he calls the polygamy of the Jews "sacramentum pluralium nuptiarum," as typifying the multitude of converts to the Church.

Tournely, Juenin, Renaudot, &c. (see Billuart, "De Matrim." diss. i. a. 6) embraced this opinion. In its defence an appeal might be made with great plausibility to the constant usage of Christians from the earliest times, for they have always been required to celebrate marriage before the priest. But it is to be observed that Tertullian ("De Pudic." 4, PL, ii. 987), strong as his language is against marriages not contracted before the Church, says that such unions "are in danger" (periclitantur) of being regarded as no better than concubinage, which implies that they were not really so. Nor does he make any distinction between the contract of marriage in Christians and the sacrament, though it would have been much to his purpose could he have done so. Besides, the language of the Fathers quoted above points to a belief that Christ elevated the contract of marriage to a sacrament, not that He superadded the sacrament to marriage. Moreover, Denzinger ("Ritus Orientales," tom. i. p. 152 seq.) shows that the Nestorians, who have retained the nuptial benediction from the Church and believe in the obligation of securing it, still consider that marriage, even as a sacred rite, may be performed by the parties themselves if the priest cannot be had; and he quotes from Gregorius Datheviensis this dictum: "Marriage is effected through consent expressed in words, but perfected and consummated by the priest's blessing and by cohabitation." Now, at all events, the former of the two opinions given is the only tenable one in the Church. Pius IX. in an allocution, September 27, 1852, laid down the principle that there "can be no marriage among the faithful which is not at one and the same time a sacrament"; and among the condemned propositions of the Syllabus appended to the Encyclical "Quanta Cura" of 1864, the sixty-fourth runs thus:—"The sacrament of marriage is something accessory to and separable from the contract, and the sacrament itself depends simply on the nuptial benediction." Whether, supposing a Christian (having obtained a dispensation to that effect) were to marry a person who is not baptized, the Christian party would receive the sacrament as well as enter into the contract of marriage, is a matter on which theologians differ. Analogy seems to favour the affirmative opinion.

(δ) The Conditions for the Validity of Marriage are mostly identical with the conditions which determine the validity of contracts in general. The consent to the union must be mutual, voluntary, deliberate, and manifested by external signs. The signs of consent need not be verbal in order to make the marriage valid, though the rubric of the Ritual requires the consent to be expressed in that manner. The consent must be to actual marriage then and there, not at some future time; for in the latter case we should have engagement to marry or betrothal, not marriage itself. Consent to marry if a certain condition in the past or present be realised (e.g. "I take you N. for my wife, if you are the daughter of M. and N.") suffices, supposing that the condition be fulfilled. Nay, it is generally held that if a condition be added dependent on future contingencies (e.g. "I take you N. for my wife, if your father will give you such and such a dowry") the marriage becomes a valid one without any renewal of the contract, whenever the condition becomes a reality. The condition appended, however, must not be contrary to the essence of marriage—e.g. a man cannot take a woman for his wife to have and to hold just as long as he pleases. (See Gury, "Theol. Moral." De Matrimon. cap. iii.)

III. Indissolubility of Marriage.—The law of Israel (Deut. xxiv. 1) allowed a man to divorce his wife if she did not find grace in his eyes, because he found in her some shameful thing (עֶרְוַת דָּבָר, literally the "nakedness or shame of a thing"; LXX, ἄσχημον πρᾶγμα; Vulg. aliquam foeditatem), and the woman was free at once to marry another man. The school of Shammai kept to the simple meaning of the text. Hillel thought any cause of offence sufficient for divorce—e.g. "if a woman let the broth burn"; while R. Akiva held that a man might divorce his wife if he found another woman handsomer. (See the quotation from "Arbah Turim Nilchoth Gittin," i., in McCaul, "Old Paths," p. 189.) The Pharisees tried to entangle Christ in these Rabbinical disputes when they asked Him if a man might put away his wife "for any cause." In Athens and in Rome under the Empire the liberty of divorce reached the furthest limits of Rabbinical licence. (For details see Döllinger, "Gentile and Jew," Engl. transl. vol. ii. p. 236 seq., p. 254 seq.) Our Lord, as we have already seen, condemned the Pharisaic immorality, annulled the Mosaic dispensation, and declared: "Whosoever shall put away his wife, except for fornication, and shall marry another, committeth adultery, and he who marrieth her when she is put way committeth adultery" (Mt. xix. 9). The Catholic understands our Lord to mean that the bond of marriage is always, even when one of the wedded parties has proved unfaithful, indissoluble, and from the first Christ's declaration made the practice of Christians with regard to divorce essentially and conspicuously different from that of their heathen and Jewish neighbours. Still it was only by degrees that the strict practice, or even the strict theory just stated, was accepted in the Church. And before we enter on the interpretation of Christ's words we will give a sketch of the history of practice and opinion on the matter.

Christian princes had of course to deal with the subject of divorce, but they did not at once recast the old laws on Christian principles. Constantine, Theodosius the Younger, and Valentinian III. forbade divorce except on certain specified grounds; other emperors, like Anastasius (in 497) and Justin (whose law was in force till 900), permitted divorce by mutual consent, but no one emperor limited divorce to the single case of adultery. Chardon says that divorce (of course a vinculo) was allowed among the Visigoths in Spain till the thirteenth century, in France under the first and second dynasties, in Germany till the seventh century, in Britain till the tenth. (Chardon, 1050 sqq.)

It would be waste of labour to accumulate quotations from the Fathers in proof of their belief that divorce was unlawful except in the case of adultery. But it is very important to notice that the oldest tradition, both of the Greek and Latin Churches, regarded marriage as absolutely indissoluble. Thus the "Pastor Hermae" (lib. ii. Mand. iv. c. 1), Athenagoras, "Legat." 33 (whose testimony, however, does not count for much, since he objected to second marriages altogether), and Tertullian ("De Monog." 9, PL, ii. 940), who speaks in this place, as the context shows, for the Catholic Church, teach this clearly and unequivocally. The principle is recognized in the Apostolic Canons (Canon 48, al. 47), by the Council of Elvira, held at the beginning of the fourth century, Canon 9 (which, however, only speaks of a woman who has left an unfaithful husband), and by other early authorities.

However, the Eastern Christians, though not, as we have seen, in the earliest times, came to understand our Lord's words as permitting a second marriage in the case of adultery, which was supposed to dissolve the marriage bond altogether. Such is the view and practice of the Greeks and Oriental sects at the present day. And even in certain parts of the West similar views prevailed for a time. Many French synods (e.g. those of Vannes in 465 and of Compiègne in 756) allow the husband of a wife who has been unfaithful to marry again in her lifetime. Nay, the latter council permitted re-marriage in other cases: if a woman had a husband struck by leprosy and got leave from him to marry another, or if a man had given his wife leave to go into a convent (Canons 16 and 19). Pope Gregory II., in a letter to St. Boniface in the year 726, recommended that the husband of a wife seized by sickness which prevented cohabitation should not marry again, but left him free to do so provided he maintained his first wife. (Quoted by Hefele, "Beiträge," vol. ii. p. 376.) At Florence the question of divorce was discussed between the Latins and Greeks, but after the Decree of Union, and we do not know what answers the Greeks gave on the matter. The Council of Trent confirmed the present doctrine and discipline, which had long prevailed in the West, in the following words: "If any man say that the Church is in error because it has taught and teaches, following the doctrine of the Gospels and the Apostles, that the bond of marriage cannot be dissolved because of the adultery of one or both parties, let him be anathema." (Sess. xxiv. De Matrim. can. 5.) The studious moderation of language here is obvious, for the canon does not directly require any doctrine to be accepted; it only anathematizes those who condemn a certain doctrine, and implies that this certain doctrine is taught by the Church and derived from Christ. It was the Venetian ambassadors who prevailed on the Fathers to draw up the canon in this indirect form, so as to avoid needless offence to the Greek subjects of Venice in Cyprus, Candia, Corfu, Zante, and Cephalonia. The canon was no doubt chiefly meant to stem the erroneous views of Lutherans and Calvinists on divorce.

Our Lord's utterances on the subject of divorce present some difficulty. In Mk. x. 11, 12, Lk. xvi. 18, He absolutely prohibits divorce: "Whosoever shall put away his wife and marry another committeth adultery against her; and if a woman put away her husband and be married to another, she committeth adultery." But in Mt. xix. 9, 10, there is a marked difference: "Whosoever shall put away his wife, except for fornication, and marry another, committeth adultery; and he who marrieth a woman put away committeth adultery." So also Mt. v. 32. Protestant commentators understand our Lord to prohibit divorce except in the case of adultery, when the innocent party at least may marry again. Maldonatus, who acknowledges the difficulty of the text, takes the sense to be—"Whoever puts away his wife except for infidelity commits adultery, because of the danger of falling into licentiousness to which he unjustly exposes her, and so does he who in any case, even if his wife has proved unfaithful, marries another." He takes St. Mark and St. Luke as explanatory of the obscure passage in St. Matthew. Subsequent scholars, we venture to think, have by no means improved on Maldonatus. Hug, who is never to be mentioned without respect, suggested that Christ first (in Mt. v. 32) forbade divorce except in case of adultery; then (Mt. xix. 9, 10) forbade it altogether, the words "except for fornication" in the latter place being an interpolation—a suggestion perfectly arbitrary and followed by nobody. A well-known Catholic commentator, Schegg, interprets the words "for fornication" (ἐπὶ πορνείᾳ) to mean "because the man has found his marriage to be null because of some impediment, and so no marriage at all, but mere concubinage." In this event there would be no occasion for or possibility of divorce. On Mt. v. 32 (παρεκτὸς λόγου πορνείας, save where fornication is the motive reason of the divorce)

he thinks Christ took for granted that the adulteress would be put to death (according to Levit. xx. 10) and so leave her husband free, an hypothesis which is contradicted by the "pericope of the adulteress" (Jn. viii. 3 seq.). Döllinger's elaborate theory given in the Appendix to his "First Age of the Church" is less ingenious than that of Hug, but scarcely less arbitrary. He urges that πορνεύειν can only refer to "fornication," and cannot be used of sin committed after marriage; but πορνεία and πορνεύειν are used of adultery (1 Cor. v. 1; Amos vii. 17; Ecclus. xxiii. 33), so that we need not linger over Döllinger's contention (which has no historical basis, and is objectionable in every way) that antenuptial sin on the woman's part annulled the union and left the man free, if he was unaware of it when he meant to contract marriage.[1]

IV. The Unity of Marriage.—The unlawfulness of polygamy in the common sense of the word follows from the declaration of Christ Himself, and there was no room for further question on the matter. With regard to reiteration of marriage, St. Paul (1 Cor. vii. 39, 40) distinctly asserts that a woman is free to marry on her husband's death. Still there is a natural feeling against a second marriage, which Virgil expresses in the beautiful words he puts into Dido's mouth (Aen. iv. 28, 29):

"Ille meos, primus qui me sibi junxit, amores Abstulit; ille habeat secum servetque sepulcro."[2]

And this feeling, of which there are many traces among the heathen, was yet more natural in Christians, who might well look to a continuance in a better world of the love which had begun and grown stronger year by year on earth. Moreover, the Apostle puts those who had married again at a certain disadvantage, for he excludes them (1 Tim. iii. 2; Titus i. 6) from the episcopate and priesthood. And the Church, though she held fast the lawfulness of second marriage and condemned the error of the Montanists (see Tertullian, "De Monog.," "Exhortat. Castitatis"), and of some Novatians (Concil. Nic. i., Canon 8), treated such unions with a certain disfavour. This aversion was much more strongly manifested in the East than in the West.

Athenagoras ("Legat." 33) says Christians marry not at all, or only once, since they look on second marriage as a "specious adultery" (εὐπρεπὴς ἐστι μοιχεία). Clement of Alexandria ("Strom." iii. 1, p. 551, ed. Potter) simply repeats the Apostolic injunction, "But as to second marriage, if thou art on fire, says the Apostle, marry." (In iii. 12, p. 551, he is referring to simultaneous bigamy.) Early in the fourth century we find Eastern councils showing strong disapproval of second marriage. Thus the Council of Neocaesarea (Canon 7) forbids priests to take part in the feasts of those who married a second time, and assumes that the latter must do penance. The Council of Ancyra (Canon 19) also takes this for granted, and the Council of Laodicea (Canon 1) only admits those who have married again to communion after prayer and fasting. Basil ("Ad Amphil." c. 4; PG, xxxii. 673) treats this branch of Church discipline in great detail. For those who married a second time he prescribes, following ancient precedent, a penance of one year, and of several years for those who re-marry more than once. (See the references in Hefele-Leclercq, i. 522; "Beiträge," i. p. 50 seq.) Basil's rigorism had a decided influence on the later Greek Church. A Council of Constantinople, in 920, discouraged second, imposed penance for third, and excommunication for fourth marriage. Such is the discipline of the modern Greek Church. At a second marriage the "benediction of the crowns" is omitted, and "propitiatory prayers" are said; and although some concessions have been made with regard to the former ceremony, Leo Allatius testifies that it was still omitted in some parts of the Greek Church as late as the seventeenth century. A fourth marriage is still absolutely prohibited.[1]

The Latin Church has always been milder and more consistent. The "Pastor Hermae" (lib. ii. Mandat. iv. 4) emphatically maintains that there is no sin in second marriage. St. Ambrose ("De Viduis," c. 11, PL, xvi. 254) contents himself with saying, "We do not prohibit second marriages, but we do not approve marriages frequently reiterated." Jerome's words are: "I do not condemn those who marry twice, three times, nay, if such a thing can be said, eight times (non damno digamos, imo et trigamos, et, si dici potest, octogamos)," but he shows his dislike for repeated marriage (Ep. xlviii., "Apol. pro libris adv. Jovin.," PL, xxii. 499). Gregory III. advises Boniface, the Apostle of Germany, to prevent, if he can, people marrying more than twice, but he does not call such unions sinful. Nor did the Latin Church impose any penance for reiterated marriage. We do, indeed, find penance imposed on those who married again in the penitential books of Theodore, who became archbishop of Canterbury in 668. But Theodore's view came from his Greek nationality; and if Herardus, archbishop of Tours, speaks of third marriage, &c., as "adultery," this is probably to be explained by the Greek influence which had spread

[1] Döllinger objects to the instance from 1 Cor. v. 1, because he says there is no Greek word for "incest," so that the Apostle was obliged to use πορνεία. Why πορνεία rather than μοιχεία? As to Amos vii. 17, "Thy wife will commit fornication in the city," he urges that this defilement was not to be voluntary on the woman's part, and therefore was not adultery. This argument proves too much. If it was not adultery because not wilful, no more was it "fornication."

[2] He who first wed me, he took all my love,
And he shall keep it till we meet above.

[1] The Oriental sects (Copts, Jacobites, Armenians) are even stricter than the Greeks. The Nestorians, however, are, as might have been expected, free from any spirit of strictness on this point. Denzinger, Rit. Orient. i. p. 180.

from England to France. Anyhow, this is the earliest trace of such rigorism in the West.

The Latin Church, however, did exhibit one definite mark of disfavour for reiterated marriage. The "Corpus Juris" contains two decretals of Alexander III. and Urban III. forbidding priests to give the nuptial benediction in such cases. Durandus (died 1296) speaks of the custom in his time as different in different places. The "Rituale Romanum" of Paul V. (1605–1621) forbids the nuptial benediction, only tolerating the custom of giving it, when it already existed, if it was the man only who was being married again. The present rubric permits the nuptial benediction except when the woman has been married before.

V. Ceremonies of Marriage.—From the earliest times and in all times Christians have been wont to celebrate their marriages in church and to have them blessed by the priest; nor can they celebrate them otherwise without sin, except in case of necessity. "It is fitting," Ignatius writes ("Ad Polycarp." 5), "for men and women who marry, to form this union with the approval of the bishop that their union may be according to God." "What words can suffice," Tertullian says ("Ad Uxor." ii. 9), "to tell the happiness of that marriage which the Church unites, the oblation confirms, and the blessing seals, the angels announce, the Father acknowledges!"

In the form approved for England the priest in surplice and white stole questions the man and woman as to their consent. Then each party expresses this consent at length and in the vulgar tongue, with joined hands:—"I N. take thee N. to my wedded wife, to have and to hold from this day forward, for better for worse, for richer for poorer, in sickness and in health, till death us do part, [if Holy Church will it permit,][1] and thereto I plight thee my troth." "I N. take thee N. to my wedded husband," &c. Whereupon the priest, "I join you into marriage in the name of the Father, and the Son," &c. The bridegroom then places gold and silver on a plate or on the book which he afterwards gives to the bride, and a ring which the priest sprinkles with holy water and blesses. The bridegroom takes the ring from the priest and gives the money to his wife, saying, "With this ring I thee wed, this gold and silver I thee give, with my body I thee worship, and with all my worldly goods I thee endow"; then he puts the ring on the thumb of his wife's left hand, saying, "In the name of the Father"; on her second finger, saying, "and of the Son"; on her third finger, saying, "and of the Holy Ghost"; and on her fourth finger, where he leaves it, saying "Amen." The Nuptial Mass is then celebrated, and the priest gives the nuptial benediction after the Paternoster and again after the "Ite Missa." Nothing can exceed the grace and tender beauty of these prayers of benediction.

Many of these ceremonies belonged originally to the betrothal. [See Espousal.] The ring, or annulus pronubus, was used to plight troth before Christian times by the Romans. So again, espousing with gold and silver, called arrhae, certainly existed among the Franks previous to their embracing Christianity, also among the Jews, whence it may have passed into the Greek ritual. The joining of hands (once accompanied by a kiss) is alluded to by Tertullian ("De Virg. Veland." 11). St. Isidore of Seville, PL, ii. 904 (1019), quoted by Chardon, says the ring was put on the fourth finger of the left hand, because it contains a vein immediately connected with the heart. This sage reason was the current one in the Middle Ages.

The words of the priest, "Ego jungo" ("I join you into marriage"), are of comparatively recent origin. "Anyone," says Chardon, 1024, "may convince himself of this by looking through the extracts from ancient Sacramentaries and Missals published by Father Martène." They are omitted, the same author continues, in a Pontifical of Sens (only) 300 years old, and they are wanting in the "Ordo ad faciendum sponsalia" reprinted by Maskell from a Sarum "Manuale" of 1543. On the other hand, two striking ceremonies mentioned by Nicolas I. in his answer to the Bulgarians, and both older than Christianity itself, are now unknown among us. These are the solemn veiling of the bride and the wearing of crowns by the married couple. The Greeks have kept this latter rite: indeed, "crowning" among them is a common word for the nuptial benediction. The marriage service according to the old English use of Sarum is substantially the same as the modern Roman one, but more elaborate. The couple stood at the church door till the man had placed the ring on the woman's hand (the right hand, by the way), and certain prayers had been said over them. Additional prayers were said over them at the altar steps: then, before Mass began, they were placed in the presbytery—"that is to say, between the choir and the altar" (rubric of Sarum Manual). The rubric of the Hereford Missal directs them to hold lights in their hands. The Nuptial Mass was "of the Trinity," with prayers for the occasion. After the Sanctus, four clerics in surplices held a veil (pallium) over them while they lay prostrate, and the special benediction was given after the Fraction of the Host. At the "Agnus Dei" the pallium was removed, both rose, the bridegroom received the pax from the priest and kissed his wife. There is nothing in the Sarum Manual which answers to our nuptial prayer after the "Ite Missa est," though the Hereford Missal gives a special form of benediction with the chalice. After Mass, bread and wine, or some other liquor, were blessed and tasted by the newly-married couple. At night the priest blessed the nuptial couch.

It must not be thought that these rites, even so far as they differ from those now in use, were in any way peculiarly English. They occur almost exactly in the same order and form in a Ritual of Rennes and a Pontifical from the monastery of Leri, from which Chardon (loc. cit.) gives copious extracts. But we can find no parallel for the placing of the ring on the bride's right hand.

In the Greek Church the marriage service is known as ἀκολουθία τοῦ στεφανώματος, the office of crowning. After the espousals, in which two rings, one of gold and another of silver, are placed on the altar and given by the priest to bridegroom and bride respectively, the persons to be married enter the church, preceded by the priest with the incense. After Psalm xxxi. and various prayers the priest puts a crown on the head of each with the words, "The servant of God N. crowns the servant of God N. in the name," &c. There is no mention of Nuptial Mass in the modern Greek Euchologies, and Greeks are usually married in the evening. From more ancient MSS., however, Goar found that the bridegroom and bride used to receive Communion from a particle of a Host previously consecrated and placed in a chalice with ordinary wine. The offices of marriage among the other Orientals are given by Denzinger. The nuptial blessing, from the receiving of which widows are debarred, has hitherto been subject to the condition that a Nuptial Mass be celebrated. The Sacred Congregation of Rites now (1914) permits the bestowing of it in a slightly altered form even when no Mass is said. (The sacrament is treated by the dogmatic and moral theologians and by the canonists, "De Matrimonio," e.g. Palmieri, Ballerini (vol. v.), Cardinal Gasparri; for the rites and ceremonies see Chardon, 1016–1034; Duchesne, "Christian Worship," 428–434; Martène, "De Antiq. Eccl. Ritibus," ii.; Thurston in "Cath. Enc.")

MARTYR (μάρτυς, then μάρτυρ, which was originally the Aeolic form). A witness for Christ. In early times this title was given generally to those who were distinguished witnesses for Christ, then to those who suffered for Him;[1] lastly, after the middle of the third century, the title was restricted to those who actually died for Him. The very first records of the Church which we possess tell us of the honours done to the martyrs. It was the martyrs who, first of all, were regarded as saints; the relics of the martyrs which were first revered; to the martyrs that the first churches were dedicated. The name "martyrium" (μαρτύριον), which at first meant the church built over a martyr's remains, was given to churches generally, even if dedicated to saints who were not martyred, though this usage was partly justified by the fact that a church was not consecrated till the relics of some martyr had been placed in it.

Benedict XIV., in his work "De Canonizatione" (lib. iii. cap. 11 seq.), gives the modern law of the Church on the recognition of martyrdom with great fulness. He defines martyrdom as the "voluntary endurance of death for the faith, or some other act of virtue relating to God." A martyr, he says, may die not only for the faith directly, but also to preserve some virtue—e.g. justice, obedience, or the like, enjoined or counselled by the faith. He mentions the dispute among theologians whether a person who died for confessing the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin, which in his time had not been defined, would be a martyr. He gives no decided opinion on the point, but says that "in other cases the safe rule is that one who dies for a question not yet defined by the Church dies in a cause insufficient for martyrdom." Further, he explains that to be a martyr a man must actually die of his sufferings or else have endured pains which would have been his death but for miraculous intervention. (See Allard, "Ten Lectures on the Martyrs," tr.; Leclercq, "Les Martyrs.")

MARTYROLOGY. A list of martyrs and other saints, and the mysteries commemorated on each day of the year, with brief notices of the life and death of the former. It is these brief notices which distinguish a Martyrology from a mere calendar. It is read in monastic orders at Prime after the prayer "Deus, qui ad principium." It is followed by the versicle "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints," and by a petition for the intercession of the heavenly court; and these words are retained even in the secular office when the Martyrology is not actually recited. Maskell has collected many proofs that in England the Martyrology used to be said in the monastic chapter, not, like the office, in the choir. This custom, however, was in no way peculiar to England, as may be seen from the notes of Meratus on the subject (Part II. sect. v. cap. 21). After Prime, or sometimes after Tierce, the monks adjourned to the chapter, heard the Martyrology and said the prayers which now form part of Prime, "Deus, in adjutorium meum"; "Dignare, Domine, die isto," &c., before setting out to their daily labour.

[1] Μάρτυς and the cognate words begin to assume their later technical sense in Acts xxii., Apoc. ii. 13. This technical sense is probably intended in Clem. Rom. 1, Ad Cor. 5; certainly in Ignat. Ad Ephes. 1; Mart. Polyc. 19; Melito (apud Euseb. H.E. iv. 26); Dionys. Corinth. (ib. ii. 25); Hegesippus (ib. ii. 23, iv. 22; Epist. Gall. (ib. v. 1, 2); Anon. Adv. Cataph. (ib. v. 16); Iren. i. 28, 1 &c.; though at the same time the words were also used of testimony which was not sealed by death. The epistle of the Martyrs of Vienne and Lyons just quoted distinguishes between confessors (ὁμόλογοι) and martyrs, but in Clement Alex. (Strom. iv. 9, p. 596) and even in Cyprian the distinction is not observed. The Decian persecution tended to fix it.

Gregory the Great speaks of a Martyrology used by the Roman Church in his day, but we do not know for certain what it was. A Martyrology attributed to Jerome is printed, e.g. in Vallarsi's edition of his works. It has undergone many revisions and later editions. It is quite possible that Jerome may have collected a Martyrology from the various calendars of the Church, and that the Martyrology which goes by his name, as we have it, is the corruption of a book used in St. Gregory's time at Rome. The lesser Roman Martyrology was found at Ravenna by Ado, archbishop of Vienne, about 850. A third Martyrology is attributed (erroneously, Hefele says) to Bede, and the foundation of the work may probably come from him. All Western Martyrologies are based on these three. We have Martyrologies from Florus, Ado, Usuard, in France; from Rabanus and Notker of St. Gall, in Switzerland.

The Roman Martyrology mentioned, as we have seen, by Gregory the Great is mentioned again at the English Council of Cloveshoe. Such a work is of course subject to constant alterations from the addition of new feasts, &c. A revision of the Roman Martyrology was made by Baronius and other scholars in 1584. It was revised again under Urban VIII. (See Laemmer,[1] "De Martyrologio Romano," Ratisbonae, 1878; De Smedt, "Introductio Generalis ad Historiam Ecclesiasticam," 127–158; Delehaye in "Cath. Enc.")

MARY (Μαριάμ,[2] מִרְיָם). The object of this article is to sum up and justify the teaching and practice of the Catholic Church in her devotion to the Blessed Virgin. Catholics do not stand alone in this devotion, for the schismatic Greeks and most of the ancient Oriental sects agree with Catholics in magnifying Mary's dignity and seeking her intercession. Protestants, on the other hand, are all but unanimous in condemning the Church's devotion, and have often denounced it as idolatrous. Some points which concern us here will be passed lightly over, because we have considered them elsewhere. The IMMACULATE CONCEPTION is discussed in a special article. We have endeavoured to show (see BEATIFIC VISION and ASSUMPTION) that Mary and the other saints already see God face to face; we assume further that she and they are able to hear our prayers, reserving the treatment of that question to the article SAINTS.

I. Mary in Scripture.—It may be fairly alleged that the Bible begins with Mary. When God cursed the serpent, He said, "I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed." Of course those who think the serpent was only a serpent will see no prophecy or anything more than a prediction of the strife in Eastern lands between man and the serpent, his deadly and insidious foe, the serpent stealthily aiming at the man's heel, the man aiming at the serpent's head. But Protestants who believe, as the Apocalypse implies, that the serpent was the devil, and that our Lord is the promised "seed of the woman" who was to crush the serpent's head, are logically bound to understand the woman who is to be at enmity with the serpent as Mary. The woman and her seed are put close together—the "enmity" of the one is compared with that of the other, and to what woman is all this applicable except to Mary? She was the virgin[1] (this is not the place to discuss the meaning of the word in the original) who was to bear a child, and that child was to be called Emmanuel, "God with us."

This prediction was fulfilled, and Mary received the highest dignity possible to a mere creature. She was not indeed the mother of the Godhead, but she was the mother of God, for the simple reason that Christ her Son was God and man in one person. True, her Son did not take His divine nature from her, any more than a son who is mere man receives his soul from his mother. The soul is infused by God, but as body and soul are united in one human person we reasonably speak of a woman as the mother of her son, not merely as the mother of a human body. And granting this, it is strange that sincere

[1] This scholar classifies Martyrologies thus: (1) that attributed to Jerome; (2) Martyr. Rom. Parv. published by Rosweyd in 1613, and written in Rome about 740; (3) a genuine Martyrology of Bede, with interpolations from Florus of Lyons; (4) that of Usuard, dedicated to Charles the Bald, used from the ninth century, not only in Benedictine houses, but throughout the West. In the fifteenth century no other was in use except in St. Peter's, and even there the Martyrology was but a translation of Usuard.

[2] The nominative and vocative of Mary, the Mother of our Lord, is always Μαριάμ (Mt. xiii. 55; Lk. i. 27, 30, 34, 38, 39, 46, 56; ii. 34; Acts i. 14), the only exception being i. 19, where the reading is doubtful. Sometimes the genitive is Μαρίας; sometimes it is indeclinable, as in Lk. ii. 5, 16. The word Μαριάμ, or Mary, is of course identical with Miriam, the name of the sister of Moses. The meanings, "bitterness" (from Heb. מָר), "lady" (from Chaldee and Syriac מָרָא, מָרְיָן, the same word which is familiar to all in Maranatha, "our Lord cometh," 1 Cor. xvi. 22), must certainly be abandoned on philological grounds. There can scarcely be a doubt that the derivation generally accepted among scholars from מָרָה, "to rebel," is correct; so that "Mary," or "Miriam," = "rebellion." The mediaeval notion that the word "Mary" was connected with the Latin "mare" is curious. The last syllable "yam," יָם does mean the sea. But how St. Bernard came to think "Mary" meant "star of the sea" we cannot say (מָאוֹר יָם, "light of the sea"?). No part of the word resembles any word for "star" in Hebrew, Syriac, Chaldee, or, so far as we are aware, in any language. It might easily (though, of course, quite wrongly) be taken to mean "Lord of the sea," and perhaps this led to the notion that it meant "star," unless our suggestion in parentheses be right.

[1] Too much is made by some Catholic writers of the article in the Hebrew of Is. vii. 14, "Behold the virgin with child and bringing forth a son." Probably "the virgin" means the virgin standing before the prophet in vision. Besides, the definite article is used in Hebrew where we should not employ it in English. See, e.g., Num. xi. 27, lit. "the lad ran and told Moses," though this is the first mention of any lad (Ewald, Gram. § 277 a):

Christians should stumble on the language in which the Church speaks of Mary. She is exalted above the angels, for surely God's mother is nearer to Him than the angels who stand before the throne. From her Christ took the blood He was to shed for her and for us all. Moreover, whereas the two great dignities of virginity and maternity are, according to God's ordinary law, incompatible, in Mary's case they were united. Joseph "took unto him his wife, and he knew her not until she brought forth her first-born son: and he called his name Jesus" (Mt. i. 24, 25). We do not know where to find more beautiful or more impassioned language used by the Church about Mary than the words which occur in the "Common" of the Breviary office:—"Holy and stainless virginity, with what praise to extol thee I do not know; He whom the heavens cannot contain was contained in thy bosom. Blessed art thou amongst women, and blessed is the fruit of thy womb." Yet these words, strong as they are, simply state a primary tenet of the Christian faith. Her virginity, her divine maternity, her position as the sole parent of Him who had no man for his father—these are the deeply-laid foundations of Mary's glory.

But Mary was not merely the passive instrument of the Incarnation. By the free use of her own will she co-operated in our salvation, and was associated with her divine Son. It depended on her will whether or no the divine economy by which the Incarnation and our redemption were accomplished was to be frustrated, as the first dispensation had been by the disobedience of Adam and Eve. The account in Lk. i. 26–38, and especially Mary's question, "How will this be, seeing that I know not man?" are proof of the deliberate way in which Mary chose her part, and the freedom of the consent is expressed in her words, "Behold the handmaid of the Lord; be it unto me according to thy word." And so her cousin, St. Elizabeth, acknowledges not only Mary's dignity as the Mother of the Messiah—"Whence is this unto me that the mother of my Lord should come unto me?"—but also Mary's personal holiness and share in the work of our salvation. "Blessed is she who believed, because" (or perhaps "that") "there will be an accomplishment of the things spoken to her by the Lord" (Lk. i. 43–45).

Mary maintains and exercises her rights and privileges as the mother of Christ throughout the Gospel history. It is she who bore the Light of light into the world in the stable at Bethlehem. She nourished at her breast and with a mother's love that human life which her divine Son had condescended to take from her. He Himself has told us how grateful He is, how bountiful His reward for a cup of water given in His name. It was Mary's privilege to minister to Him directly and, first by herself, then in union with St. Joseph, actually to support Christ's life during His early years. To her and to St. Joseph He, the Lord of all, "was subject" (Lk. ii. 51). Not less but more "subject" than ordinary sons, because He was "made under the law," and came to give a perfect example of the way that the law which commands filial obedience should be kept. In her company Christ spent thirty out of the three-and-thirty years of His earthly sojourn, At her request He made the water wine, and so inaugurated His public ministry and manifested His glory. When nearly all the Apostles had fled she stood at the foot of His cross, suffering surely as no other mother ever suffered, and drinking, as no other creature ever drank, the chalice of Christ's Passion.

There is no hint in Scripture of any sin or imperfection on Mary's part. No doubt our Lord, when she told Him at the wedding that there was no wine, answered, "Woman, what is there to me and to thee? Mine hour is not yet come." (The translation is that of Dr. Westcott.) The passage is confessedly a hard one. Possibly Christ may have meant that there was nothing in common between His divine and her human nature. She could not fathom the counsels of His omniscience. The hour of full triumph which she naturally and innocently desired had not yet come, was not to come till that hour which St. John again and again calls Christ's own (Jn. vii. 30, viii. 20, xiii. 1), the hour of His weakness, His passion, and His death. Be this as it may, two things are certain: First, in the word "woman" (we quote the same distinguished Protestant scholar) there "is not the least tinge of reproof or severity. The address is that of courteous respect, even of tenderness." Next, Mary cannot possibly have been guilty of fault in asking, or rather suggesting, the very thing that Christ did.

Nor does the New Testament ever imply that Mary ceased to be a virgin; on the contrary, it confirms, though it nowhere states, the Catholic dogma of her perpetual virginity. We read of our Lord's brethren, but the same word is used in Genesis xiii. 8, xxix. 15, for the relationship between Abraham and Lot, Laban and Jacob, and yet we know that they were uncles and nephews, not brothers in the strict sense. Again, those who press the word "brother" against the virginity of Mary must be reminded that St. Joseph is called the "father" of Jesus, and that not only by those who knew no better, but by the Blessed Virgin herself, who knew all (Lk. ii. 48). The evangelist himself calls Joseph the father of Jesus (Lk. ii. 33), and Mary and Joseph (Lk. ii. 41, 43) His "parents," and it is interesting and most instructive to note that later scribes have taken offence and altered the reading in each of the three cases. Another objection to the Catholic doctrine is often drawn from the words of St. Matthew, i. 25: Joseph "knew not" his wife "till she brought forth a son" [the word "first-born" is wanting in the best MSS.); and of St. Luke ii. 7: Mary brought forth her "first-born son." But St. Matthew's evident purpose is to accentuate the fact that Mary was a virgin at Christ's birth; he asserts and implies nothing as to what happened afterwards. In St. Luke the prominent idea is the consecration of the first male child, and this appears from v. 23 of the same chapter, "As it has been written in the law of the Lord, every male opening the womb shall be called holy to the Lord." With him the first-begotten is equivalent to the "male opening the womb," [1] and has nothing to do with subsequent children. St. John furnishes positive evidence, urged, Bishop Lightfoot writes, "with fatal effect," against the view that Mary had other children than Jesus. Our Lord on the cross (Jn. xix. 26, 27) commended His mother and St. John to each other's care. Why, if she had children of her own? Even Meyer admits that it will not suffice to say that Christ's "brethren" did not believe in Him (Jn. vii. 5) for "the speedy overcoming of this unbelief (Acts i. 14) could scarcely be concealed from" Christ. And indeed it is inconceivable that Christ should appear to one of Mary's supposed sons, that this son should be specially entrusted with the administration of the Mother Church of Jerusalem and Mary herself should join in worship with her "sons" (Acts i. 14), and yet all the time live in the house and under the care of a comparative stranger. We may add that this interpretation of Scripture has approved itself not only to Catholics and High Churchmen like Pearson and Mill, but also to recent Protestant scholars who cannot be suspected of undue bias in the matter—viz. to Westcott (see the Commentary on John, ad vii. 3, xix. 26), and to Lightfoot (on Galatians, p. 253).[2]

Mary, then, was the Virgin Mother of God. She remained in perpetual virginity; she was associated with a closeness impossible to other creatures in the work of her divine Son. She was faithful and obedient to her Son and Saviour at the first, faithful and obedient to the end. Scripture is silent about her later life and its close. But Christians believe that life here is a preparation for the better life to come, and from the greatness of Mary's work and dignity on earth they learned to conceive her greatness in power in heaven, where her love is made perfect and she is for ever with her Son. Naturally, therefore, they came to discover in the Apocalypse—the one book of the New Testament which can hardly fail to have been written after Mary's death—a picture of Mary in heaven. "The only passage," says Cardinal Newman—"Development," p. 414—(but see Wisdom, ii. 23, 24)—"where the serpent is directly identified with the evil spirit occurs in the twelfth chapter of Revelation; now, it is observable that the recognition, when made, is found in the course of a vision of 'a woman clothed with the sun, and the moon under her feet:' [1] thus, two women are brought into contrast with each other. Moreover, as it is said in the Apocalypse, 'The dragon was wroth with the woman, and went about to make war with her seed,' so it is prophesied in Genesis: 'I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed. He shall bruise (?) thy head, and thou shalt bruise (?) his heel.' Also the enmity was to exist, not only between the serpent and the seed of the woman, but between the serpent and the woman herself; and here too there is a correspondence in the Apocalyptic vision. There is," then, "reason for thinking that this mystery at the close of the Scripture records answers to the mystery in the beginning of it, and that the woman mentioned in both passages is one and the same, and that she can be none other than" Mary. We need not be at a loss to imagine the way in which Mary exercises her great power in heaven. Once the body of Christ was entrusted to her care, surely in heaven she cannot fail to intercede for his mystical body—for all those who are her children because they are the brethren of her Son. And this Son is her Son still; He hears her prayers with filial love and tenderness, since—as the Scripture, and especially the Epistle to the Hebrews, assures us—Christ has carried his human nature to the right hand of the Majesty on high, and He cannot continue to be man if he has ceased to be a son. When Protestants assert that the relation of son and mother ceased to exist between Jesus and Mary when his earthly years were over, they thereby do away with all claim on our part to the human sympathy of Christ. Yet it is this human sympathy of his in heaven to which great prominence is given in the Epistle to the Hebrews, and to which devout Protestants, who will not hear of devotion to Mary, cling as their comfort and stay.

[1] Not, of course, in so strict a sense as to exclude the integritas carnis post partum.

[2] It would require a treatise to give the reasons alleged for the different views on the "brethren of the Lord," because these reasons depend on a number of details, most of which must be given at length or not at all. Here we can do little more than state the views themselves, with the history of their reception or rejection. (1) Helvidius, who lived at Rome, maintained, about 380, that these "brethren" were the sons of Joseph and Mary. This theory was supported about the same time by Bonosus, Bishop of Sardica, and apparently also by Jovinian, a monk probably of Milan. It was condemned soon after it appeared, in Synods at Rome and Capua. It has no support in antiquity, except perhaps from Tertullian, and is regarded by all Catholic writers as heretical. Thus Petavius calls it "detestable to Christian ears, and sacrilegious, according to the judgment of the ancient Fathers"; nay, heretical, since even general councils call Mary ἀεὶ παρθένος (De Incarnat. xiv. 3). It has, however, been adopted by very many Protestants. (2) "Nearly all the Greeks," according to Maldonatus, besides Hilary and Ambrose, held that the "brethren" were sons of Joseph by a former marriage, and consequently that "James, the brother of the Lord," was a different person from James, the son of Alphaeus, one of the twelve. In reality, as Lightfoot shows, this theory was common to all writers, Greek and Latin (except, of course, those who held the heretical view mentioned first), down to Jerome's time, and after his time to all Greek writers, except Chrysostom in his latest works and Theodoret.* It is incorporated in the Greek offices, which distinguish between James, "the Lord's brother," and the son of Alphaeus. Maldonatus (see Mt. xii. 46) rejects but does not censure this view. Petavius simply says it is "more probable that Joseph had not been previously married." In modern times this hypothesis has found a powerful advocate in Bishop Lightfoot. This older opinion afforded a ready explanation of the term "brethren." All who took Joseph for our Lord's father would look on his sons by a former marriage as our Lord's half-brothers and speak of them as his "brethren." The use of the word is possible, but not nearly so natural, on the view to be mentioned next. At the same time it must be admitted that Catholic feeling, especially during the last three centuries, has attached itself strongly to the virginity of St. Joseph, as most in keeping with his office as the guardian of our Lord and the Blessed Virgin. (3) Jerome advocated and to all appearance started a third view—viz. that the "brethren" were sons of a sister of the Blessed Virgin also called Mary. The "brethren" of Jesus were James, Judas, Joseph or Joses, and Simon (Mk. vi. 3). Now, of these, James, the Lord's brother, is said by St. Paul (Gal. i. 19; this interpretation, however, is doubtful) to have been an Apostle. But the only James in the apostolic lists whom St. Paul can mean and name here is James, the son of Alphaeus, James the son of Zebedee being dead long before the Apostle wrote (Acts xii. 2). Therefore, James the Lord's brother was the son, not of Joseph, but of Alphaeus. But we can also ascertain the name of his mother, since in Mt. xxvii. 56, Mk. xv. 40, we read that Mary the mother of James and Joseph, and therefore the wife of Alphaeus, was present at the crucifixion. This Mary is to be identified with Mary the wife of Clopas and the sister of the Blessed Virgin, who St. John says was present by the cross (Jn. xix. 25). It is very doubtful whether St. John means to say that the Blessed Virgin had a sister also called Mary ("his mother—and his mother's sister, Mary of Clopas—and Mary Magdalene"), or whether he mentions four women at the foot of the cross ("his mother and his mother's sister—Mary of Clopas and Mary Magdalene"). Anyhow, Jerome's theory is rendered still more plausible by the fact, for so it may be fairly regarded, that "Alphaeus" and "Clopas" (this is the true reading in Jn. xix. 25; "Cleophas," in Lk. xxiv. 18, is another name altogether) are two forms of the same Aramaic name "Chalpai" (חַלְפַּי). This view that our Lord's brethren were his cousins became the accepted one in the Latin Church, which in her Mass and office only recognizes two Jameses, one the son of Zebedee, the other the son of Alphaeus, "brother" of the Lord and bishop of Jerusalem. Among Protestants, Dr. Mill, of Cambridge, has defended it with great learning and ingenuity in a treatise entitled The Accounts of our Lord's Brethren in the N.T. vindicated (Cambridge, 1843).

[* Theophylact's opinion—viz. that, Clopas dying childless, Joseph raised up children to him—is obviously only a modification of the common Greek theory.]

II. The Tradition of the Church on Devotion to Mary.—It would be vain to deny that devotion to the Blessed Virgin was far less prominent in ancient than in modern times and we shall have occasion shortly to show how easily this difference may be explained. But it would be a gross mistake to suppose that Catholics at any time doubted her great place in the work of redemption or ignored her dignity, as most Protestants do. The latter have always, and almost universally, shrunk from using the title "Theotocos," or Mother of God. We believe we are not wrong when we say that the use of this expression would serve of itself to mark the person who employed it as a Catholic.[1] Yet "it was familiar to Christians from primitive times, and is used, among other writers, by Origen, Eusebius, St. Alexander, St. Athanasius, St. Ambrose, St. Gregory Nazianzen, St. Gregory Nyssen, and St. Nilus" (Newman's "Development," p. 145). It is the universal doctrine of the early Church that Mary was the second Eve (see IMMACULATE CONCEPTION). St. Irenaeus says that "Mary, being obedient, became both to herself and to all mankind the cause of salvation"; that "the knot of Eve's disobedience was loosed by Mary's obedience"; that "what the Virgin Eve bound by unbelief this the Virgin Mary unbound by faith"; that "as by a virgin the human race had been given over to death, by a virgin it is saved" (Iren. iii. 22, 4; v. 19, 1, PG, vii. 959); thus absolutely excluding the common Protestant notion that Mary was merely a passive instrument in the Incarnation, to whom no special gratitude is due. Further, he says that "she was drawn to obey God, that of the Virgin Eve the Virgin Mary might become the advocate" (v. 19, 1, PG, vii. 1175). In the last place, St. Irenaeus speaks of Mary as "prophesying for the Church" when she uttered her "Magnificat," and it is certain that from the second century at latest Mary was taken as a type of the Church of Christ. Thus, the "Virgin Mother" is a title given to the Church in the letters written by the Christians of Vienne and Lyons in the year 177 (see Euseb. "H.E." v. 1, 45, and by Clem. Alex. "Paed." 1, 6). And this language was adopted by Marcus, a Gnostic heretic of the same period, who made the Virgin hold the place of the Church in his symbolical system (Iren. i. 15, 3). It is important to notice this, for it proves that when Catholics go to Mary as to their mother, a title and office which also belong to the Church, their practice is consonant with the spirit of ancient Christianity. Nor, again, does it by any means follow that because the Fathers take the woman in Apoc. xii. 1 to represent the Church, we are really following an opposite interpretation if we believe the Blessed Virgin to be primarily and directly intended.[1]

We have two instances of Mary's interposition from heaven in favour of Christians on earth, preserved from the scanty literature of the first three centuries. St. Gregory Nyssen, in the fourth age, relates that his namesake Gregory Thaumaturgus, in the third, was pondering theological doctrines shortly before he was made priest; that the Blessed Virgin appeared, and bade St. John disclose to the young man the "mystery of godliness," and that St. John answered, "that he was ready to comply in this matter with the wish of the Mother of the Lord, and enunciated a formula well turned and complete, and so vanished." So, St. Gregory Nazianzen records an incident contemporaneous with that just given—viz. that a Christian woman had recourse to Mary.

[1] Of course we put the Greeks, &c., out of count, and also that modern school in the Church of England which studiously imitates Catholic phraseology. And even among these the popular use of the words "Mother of God" is, we imagine, very recent, if it exists even now.

[1] Erasmus denied that any of the early Fathers understood the woman in Apoc. xii. to be the Blessed Virgin. The passage quoted against him from St. Augustine by Ballerini in his Sylloge of Documents on the Immaculate Conception is not regarded as genuine by the Benedictine editors.

and so obtained the conversion of a heathen who was trying to pervert her by magic. (See Newman, "Development," pp. 417, 418.) We need not defend the truth of these stories. True or false, they prove that in the fourth century devotion to the Mother of God was well established and already regarded as ancient; and in both instances "the Blessed Virgin appears especially in that character of Patroness or Paraclete which St. Irenaeus and other Fathers describe, and which the mediaeval Church exhibits—a loving Mother with clients." (Newman, ib.)

But till the last part of the fourth century there were strong reasons which kept devotion to the Blessed Virgin in the background. There was the danger of scandal to the heathen, who, with their own inadequate notions of worship, might misconstrue the honour paid to Mary; and then there was the long struggle with Arianism, when the Church was contending for the very centre of the faith. When once the belief in the full Godhead of the Son had been fenced round by formal definition, when once it had been decided that no exaltation of the Son would suffice unless He was confessed to be the one eternal God, then there was no longer any danger of confusing Mary's honour with that of her Divine Son. To honour Mary was not idolatry, unless the Arians, who had employed far higher language of Christ than Catholics have ever used of his Blessed Mother, were orthodox in their belief. Nay, it became clearer than ever that the belief in Mary was necessary to a right belief in Christ. Nestorius denied the unity of His Person. He allowed that God dwelt in him, but not that the man Christ Jesus was God; and this was tantamount to denying the Incarnation altogether, and reducing the difference between Christ and his creatures to a matter of degree, since God dwells in the hearts of all the just. In order, therefore, to secure right faith in the manhood of the Eternal Son, the Church defined at Ephesus, what she had held everywhere and from the beginning, that Mary is the Mother of God. Cardinal Newman has collected a catena of patristic passages ("Development," p. 145 seq.) on the Blessed Virgin, which date from the conclusion of the main controversy with the Arians and the rise of that with Nestorius. Augustine will allow no question of sin to be raised when Mary is concerned. Antiochus calls her "the Mother of Life, of Beauty, of Majesty," "the Morning Star"; St. Proclus, "the Fair Bride of the Canticles," "the Stay of Believers," "the Church's Diadem." "Let us make confession," says an early writer, probably one of the Fathers of Ephesus, "to God the Word, and to his Mother . . . Hail, Mother, clad in Light! . . . Hail, all-undefiled Mother of Holiness! . . . With her is the fount of life, and breasts of the spiritual and guileless milk, from which to suck the sweetness we have even now earnestly run to her," &c. We have only taken a few words here and there from Newman's quotations, but surely we have done enough to show that the Church of the fifth century addressed the same language to Mary as the Church of the nineteenth.

It is true that the great Fathers, St. Basil, St. Chrysostom, and St. Cyril of Alexandria sometimes express themselves in a very different tone. Newman has considered these passages in his "Letter to Dr. Pusey" ("Diff. of Angl." vol. ii. p. 128), and we will only venture on one remark. It may sound paradoxical, but we believe it true, that these passages tend to confirm Catholic belief in Mary's spotless sanctity. Some great Father alleges that the sword which was to pierce Mary's heart was doubt in her Son's divinity which took possession of her soul beneath the cross, and again, that Christ reprehended His mother for some fault, of haste or the like, at the Marriage of Cana. We do not think any sober Protestant scholar would approve of such exegesis. And when individual Fathers argued in such a way, the Church was justified in disregarding their opinions, great saints and doctors though they were. Common sense, as well as the sense of the faithful, was against them, and they had neither right nor power to arrest the stream of devotion to Mary. The stream grew, no doubt, in its course through the ages, but its source was in the Eternal Hills.

Evil, indeed, would this devotion be, if it diminished or obscured, ever so little, that supreme devotion to God, who is over all, and to Jesus Christ whom He has sent. But one who dared to put Mary on an equality with God, or to deny that Christ is the "one mediator between God and man"—i.e. the sole author of our redemption, the beginner and the finisher of our faith—would, by that very fact, cease to be a Catholic. Every Catholic child is taught that Mass can be offered to God alone, and the obligation of hearing Mass every Sunday, the adoration paid to the Blessed Sacrament, &c., keep the supreme character of the worship due to God constantly before the mind. We are far, of course, from any wish to defend exaggerated or imprudent language. One of the greatest of the Church's theologians, among whose many virtues a tender devotion to the mother of God was not the least, protests against extravagant and ill-founded praise of Mary. "This kind of idolatry," he writes, "secret, and, as Augustine says, natural to the human heart, is far removed from the grave character of theology—that is, of heavenly wisdom." And he quotes certain "golden words" of Gerson, also a devout client of Mary, in which he (Gerson) "restrains immoderate licence in setting forth the praises of the Blessed Virgin, and confines it within the limits of a sober and manly piety" (Petav. "De Incarnat." xiv. 9).

Admonitions to the same effect may be found in the work of another famous Catholic scholar—highly esteemed by Benedict XIV. and Clement XIV.—Muratori, "De Moderamine Ingeniorum." We would only urge that the effect of Catholic devotion to the Blessed Virgin must not be judged on a priori grounds but tested by experience. It is among Protestants who have repudiated this devotion, not among Catholics, who have retained it, that imperfect and false ideas on the divinity of Christ have struck root.

(There is a vast literature on this subject. We would specially notice, in addition to the works mentioned, the chapters of Petavius in his treatise on the "Incarnation"; Franzelin, "De Verbo Incarn." Thes: xv., xxix:; Cardinal Newman, "Development," and "Letter to Dr. Pusey"; "Jesus, the Son of Mary," by J. B. Morris—a work full, not only of recondite learning, but also of deep thought, and which, marred though it is by eccentricities, will well repay careful study; and a short but masterly rationale of the doctrine and devotion in Father Ryder's "Catholic Controversy:")

MARY, FEASTS OF. Benedict XIV., quoting a note of Mabillon on St. Bernard, says that, even as late as the twelfth century, four feasts only of the Blessed Virgin were celebrated in the Church—those of the Purification, Annunciation, Assumption, and Nativity. At present, the number of her feasts has risen to about twenty. An account has been given, in separate articles, of those which relate to events in the Blessed Virgin's history—viz. to her Immaculate Conception, Nativity, Name, Presentation, Espousals, Annunciation, Visit to St. Elizabeth (Visitation), Purification, Dolours, and Assumption. There are other feasts which commemorate Mary's interest in the Church militant on earth, and these will be mentioned here.

(1) Feast of Mary the Help of Christians, May 24—in the Supplement of the Breviary. The title "Help of Christians" was added to the Litany of Loreto by Pius V. after the naval victory of Lepanto over the Turks. The feast was instituted by Pius VII., who attributed his deliverance from a captivity of five years at Savona and his return to Rome, out of which he had been twice driven by violence, to the intercession of the Blessed Virgin.

(2) Feast of "The Blessed Virgin Mary of Mount Carmel."—For the connection of the Carmelite order with Mount Carmel, see CARMELITES, and for the privileges attached to the Carmelite scapular see SCAPULAR. The feast was approved for the Carmelites by Sixtus V. in 1587. Paul V. inserted new lections in the office, which was revised by Bellarmine. Benedict XIII. extended the feast to the whole Church. A further change in the lections was made by Leo XIII.

(3) St. Mary of Snow (Dedicationis Ecclesiae S. Mariae ad Nives). —The church of this title in Rome is sometimes called, from the Pope who is said to have founded it, the Liberian Basilica; the Sixtine Basilica, because Sixtus III. enlarged, or, as Tillemont thinks, founded it; the Church of St. Mary of the Crib (B. Mariae ad Praesepe), because the relics of the crib in which Christ is believed to have been laid were brought there about the middle of the seventh century; and, most commonly, the Church of St. Mary Major, a name given to it from the eighth century, because of its magnificence and its rank. The name ad nives given in the Martyrology and Breviary is due to the following story. John, a Roman patrician, and his wife, being childless, wished to spend their fortune in honour of the Blessed Virgin. She signified to them and to Pope Liberius in dreams that she wished a church dedicated to her on the Esquiline Hill, and told them that the site would be marked out by snow. Next day it was found that the promised snow had actually fallen, though the month was August and the heat intense. Benedict XIV. collected all the evidence for the story, his oldest authority being Pope Nicholas IV. in 1287. The commission appointed in 1741 for the reformation of the Breviary recommended that the legend should be struck out and the ancient title of the feast, Dedicatio S. Mariae, restored.

(4) Our Lady of Mercy[1] (de Mercede), September 24.—The order of Our Lady of Ransom was founded by St. Peter Nolascus, St. Raymond of Pennafort, and James, King of Arragon, with the object of freeing Christian captives from the Turks. The feast was approved first of all for the order itself, then extended to Spain, next to France, and lastly by Innocent XII. to the whole Church.

(5) Feast of Our Lady of the Rosary. —The victory of Lepanto was won by Don John of Austria, October 7, 1571, while the members of the Confraternity of the Rosary at Rome were making special supplication for the success of the Christian arms, and Pius V., then Pope, ordered that an annual commemoration should be made of "St. Mary of Victory." Gregory XIII. instituted the feast of Our Lady of the Rosary on the first Sunday in October for all churches with a chapel or altar dedicated to the Blessed Virgin under that title. Clement X. extended the feast to all the dominions of the Spanish king. The Emperor Leopold begged Innocent XII. to extend the feast to the whole Church, but the Pope died before he was able to do so. At last Clement XI., after another victory over the Turks had been obtained in 1710 by the Emperor Charles VI., and Corfu been freed from Turkish besiegers in the same year, made the feast of universal observance. The lections of the Second Nocturn, which contain a history of the origin of the feast, were added under Benedict XIII., and were revised by Leo XIII., who also added the invocation "Regina Sacratissimi Rosarii" to the Litany of Loreto. The feast is now kept on October 7, the anniversary of Lepanto.

[1] "Ransom" would, of course, be the natural translation. But "Our Lady of Mercy" is the common rendering in our English Calendars; and so in German "von der Barmherzigkeit." And this appears to be correct, for, according to Ducange, "merces," in mediaeval Latin, is used for "misericordia" (merci, pitié). "One of the commonest titles (given to the Blessed Virgin) is that of Our Lady of Pity, both in England and in Scotland. In Latin it is written 'de Pietate'; but as piety and pity have sometimes the same meaning in old English, I do not think that by Our Lady of Pity our ancestors meant our Lady of Compassion, in reference to her dolours, but simply our Lady of Compassion or Mercy." (Bridgett, Our Lady's Dowry, p. 264.)

(6) Patronage of the Blessed Virgin.—The feast was approved for Spain in 1679, for the States of the Church by Benedict XIII., in order to celebrate the power of the Blessed Virgin's intercession. It is now usually kept in churches which have permission to celebrate it on the second, not, as at first, on the third Sunday in November.

(7) The Feast of Our Lady's Expectation (Expectatio partus). [See EXPECTATION.] (Chiefly from Benedict XIV., "De Festis.')

Other feasts of the Blessed Virgin are celebrated by permission in certain parts of the Church. Such are the feasts of the Divine Maternity and of the Purity of the Blessed Virgin; the Prodigies of the Blessed Virgin, kept at Rome and some other places on July 9; the Mother of the Divine Pastor, kept in Tuscany on the first Sunday in May by leave of Pius VII.; Our Lady of Consolation, on the first Sunday in July; Our Lady of Peace, on the fourth Sunday in October. (See "Manuale Decret. S. Rit. Cong." No. 2139 seq.) But the Constitution "Divino Afflatu" has enjoined that the office of the Sunday should be said in spite of any occurring festival (with certain exceptions); and hence these minor feasts of the Blessed Virgin are not often celebrated.

MARY, FEAST OF THE NAME. The real and supposed meanings of the name have been explained in the article on the Blessed Virgin. The Feast of the Name arose at Cuença, in Spain, and its local celebration was approved by the Pope in 1513. This permission was withdrawn by Pius V. and restored by Sixtus V. Originally the feast seems to have been kept on September 22; afterwards on the Sunday within the Octave of the Blessed Virgin's Nativity (September 8), but now on September 12. Innocent XI., after the victory obtained against the Turks and the consequent relief of Vienna from siege in 1683, extended the feast and office to the whole Church.

MARY, OFFICE OF, SATURDAY. The office of the Blessed Virgin is said on all Saturdays; not, however, when a feast of Nine Lessons falls on that day, nor during Advent and Lent, on ember days, vigils, or ferias on which the lessons of a previous Sunday have to be said at Matins. In this office of the Blessed Virgin the ferial psalms are said, and there are only three lessons, the last, however, being followed by the Te Deum. This rule was authorized by Urban II. at the Council of Clermont in 1096. The office was composed and issued under Pius V. Clement VIII. revised it, and substituted a lesson from St. Jerome instead of the previous one from St. Epiphanius for the month of April. Mystical reasons are given by liturgical writers for this commemoration of the Blessed Virgin on the Sabbath—e.g. that the Eternal Word rested in her. All this question of the office of Our Lady on Saturdays is obscure. It is only Radulphus Tungrensis who asserts that Urban II. made a Decree respecting it at Clermont. The Acts of that Council are practically lost (see Hefele-Leclercq, v. 399), and we have nothing to go upon. Hardouin (quite as good as Mansi) has no such Decree. That in the Middle Ages there was just the tendency there has been in our own day to substitute shorter votive offices for the longer ferial rite is obvious enough. Thus Micrologus says that in many places they had the Holy Cross on Fridays, Our Blessed Lady on Saturdays, and so forth. Some went so far as to do away with the Sunday office in favour of the votive office of the Blessed Trinity. But there was always opposition from the more distinguished churches. The old pre-Tridentine MS. Breviaries did not recognize the office B. Mariae in Sabbato as a substitute for the ferial office, but only as an addition to it. On the other hand, the Sarum and others admit it, and if the Saturday is impeded, direct that it should be said on some free day in the week. Anyway, it was a devotion more than anything else. The present arrangement is due to St. Pius V. and Clement VIII., who probably made it obligatory as a compensation for the doing away with the daily recitation of the Little Office superadded in the Middle Ages to the Canonical Hours. (Gavantus on the Rubrics of the Breviary.)

MARY, SERVANTS OF. [See SERVITES].

MASS. The Catholic doctrine on the sacrifice of the Mass has been explained in the article EUCHARIST [see also SACRIFICE], the general history of the Roman Mass under LITURGY, and the history of the component parts of the Mass under special articles, CANON, COLLECT, INTROIT, KYRIE, and the like. Here we confine ourselves to matters of terminology and special regulation.

I. The Word "Mass."—About its meaning and derivation there is not the least room for reasonable doubt. Attempts have been made to find its origin in Hebrew. Asa (עָשָׂה) means "to do," and sometimes "to perform a sacred action, to sacrifice" (like ἱερὰ ῥέζειν in Homer), and it was suggested that a noun, Misah (מִעְשָׂה), might be derived from the verb. Such a formation is a sheer impossibility in Hebrew, and cannot be thought of without a shudder. Maaseh (מַעֲשֶׂה) is the proper form. A Hebrew word "Missah" (מִסָּה) does occur Deut. xvi. 10,[1] and an attempt was made to derive the Latin word from it, though the Hebrew word in question means "number," "rate," &c., and has nothing to do with sacrifice. It only occurs once, and if the Church had wished to adopt a Hebrew word for "sacrifice," she would have chosen, we may be very sure, one of the numerous Hebrew words which occur times without number in the Old Testament, and one of which, "corban," occurs in the New (Mk. vii. 11; cf. Mt. xxvii. 6), and is frequently used in the Peshito or chief Syriac version for "sacrifice." Besides, if the early Church had adopted the word from the Hebrew, as it did adopt other Hebrew words, such as "Hosanna," "Amen," "Alleluia," "Sabaoth," we should find some trace of it in the Greek and Oriental Churches. We should expect to find it above all in Syriac, a language closely allied to Hebrew, and which has in its New Testament version three words for sacrifice as close to the corresponding Hebrew words as, e.g., the French homme is to homo. But no trace of "Mass" can be found except in Latin, and the languages which are daughters of Latin. Here and there we find μίσσα in Greek, but in such a way as shows at once that it is merely a Latin word written in Greek letters. Thus the "Chronicon Paschale," written about 600, describes Justinian as dismissing the officers of the palaces and bidding them keep their houses. The words are: καὶ ἔδωκεν εὐθέως μίσσας τοῖς τοῦ παλατίου, καὶ λέγει τοῖς συγκλητικοῖς, Ἀπέλθατε, ἕκαστος φυλάξει τὸν οἶκον αὐτοῦ —"and straightway he gave their dismissals to the officials of the palace and said to the senators 'Go away: let each keep his house.'" The word μίσσας is here clearly taken from the Latin, just as "Palatium" is. We are ashamed to linger so long over such a question, but unhappily the class of people who think that any word can be derived from any other word a little like it is not yet extinct.

The word "Missa," then, is of purely Latin origin and comes from "mittere," "to send." St. Thomas (3ª q. 83, a. 4 ad 9)[2], suggests, among other explanations, that "Missa" may mean prayers sent to God; and a similar explanation—viz. that "Missa" means the sending or offering up of the sacrifice to God—has been defended with great learning in recent times by a professor at Würzburg, the late Hermann Müller, in a treatise on "Missa: the Origin and Meaning of the Name" ("Missa, Ursprung und Bedeutung der Benennung," Wertheim, 1873). This writer proves that "mittere" is sometimes used by classical writers in connection with "inferiae," the sacrifices of the dead. But this is not enough to explain why the Church adopted an obscure and scarcely intelligible word for "sacrifice," when plain and familiar terms, "sacrificium," "oblatio," &c., were at hand. Moreover, the history of the word is adverse to any theory which connects it with the notion of sacrifice. We may, then, dismiss this account also and give the accepted explanation.

"Missa" is only another form of "missio," "dismissal." A good instance of a similar form is supplied by "repulsa" (= "repulsio") in the line of Horace (Od. III. ii. 17) "Virtus repulsae nescia sordidae"; and many more examples present themselves from the Latin of a later period—"ascensa" for "ascensio," "collecta" for "collectio," "confessa" for "confessio," and last of all "remissa" for "remissio," &c. About the year 500 Avitus of Vienne, writing to the Burgundian king Gundobald (Ep. 1; PL, lix. 186), who wished for an explanation of the words "non missum facitis" in the old Latin version of Mk. vii. 11, 12, says that in churches and law-courts "Missa fieri pronuntiatur, cum populus ab observatione dimittitur" ("dismissal is announced when the people are let free from [further] attendance"). This derivation of "Missa" from "mittere" was clear to St. Isidore of Seville ("Etymolog." vi. 19). Now, in the liturgy there were two solemn dismissals—first, of the catechumens after the Gospel and sermon; next, of the faithful at the end of the service. The word for dismissal then came to denote the service from which the persons in question were dismissed. The first authority for this use of Missa for the liturgy, putting aside a spurious letter of Pius I., is St. Ambrose (Ep. 20, 4, PL, xvi. 995). He uses the words "Missam facere." More than two hundred years later St. Gregory of Tours uses the modern phrase, "Missam dicere." And it must be remembered that, so far from the word Missa having any necessary connection at the first with the Eucharist, it was employed not only, as we have already seen, in law-courts, but also for church services which had nothing to do with the Eucharist. Matins, as Sirmond in his "Notes on St. Avitus" (Ep. 1) shows, were called "Missae matutinae," Vespers "Missae vespertinae." "Missa" also occurs in a canon of the ninth century in the sense of festival.

This is all very well about the derivation of the word; but the crux

[1] מִסַּת נִדְבַת יָדְךָ. Here מסה comes next a word which does mean "free-will offering," and the Vulgate rendering, "oblationem spontaneam manus tuae," is probably the innocent cause of confusion.

[2] Müller (p. 87) quotes Peter of Clugny (lib. ii. Mirac. 28): "Sacrificium offerimus, quod et usu jam veteri tracto domine, quia Deo mittitur, Missam vocamus."

remains: How can that which was the central and perhaps only object of the gathering be called the "dismissal" of that meeting? There is no proof whatsoever that before the Offertory the words used in dismissing the catechumens contained the word Missa. "Si quis non communicet, det locum," quotes St. Gregory. There was never any greater prominence given to the words "Ite missa est" than there is now. One is tempted by the following theory:

In the sixth and seventh centuries when the word Missa began to be used in its present sense, the number of private Masses was very great, and they appear to have been said, as a rule, at the close of the Canonical Hours (whence our present Missa post Tertiam, post Nonam, &c.). Some of the Missae Vespertinales were said after Vespers, and there are instances of Masses after Compline. These Masses were affairs of ten minutes or so, being reduced possibly to the mere Canon. They finished up a service something like our Benediction does now. Hence, they were a veritable "Dismissal." It is a curious feature in the Rule of St. Benedict made for monasteries when the Solemn celebrations which we call High Masses did not take place, that whereas he is careful in all other details, giving for instance every single Psalm and Versicle of the Divine Office, and again insists on there being priests (not a priest) in each monastery and warns the monks that if they go to Communion they must fast till the Masses at which they communicate are over; in regard to saying or hearing Mass there is no single word in the very voluminous rule. Only after each of the Canonical Hours, having laid down Hymn, Psalms, Little Chapter, Versicle, Prayer, he finishes "Et fiant Missae." The exception is for Matins and Lauds. Then after the Prayer of Lauds, he says simply "Et completum est." The commentators of course explain "Et fiant Missae" as signifying, "The monks are dismissed"; but are they right? A good deal may be urged against the theory that St. Benedict meant Masses, say from the Peregrinatio Etheriae, certain monastic rules in the South of France, and so forth; but it appears to be at least plausible.

II. Customs and Regulations concerning Mass.—Some of these are given in separate articles—e.g. under ALTAR, VESTMENTS, COMMUNION. Others may be mentioned here.

(a) The Frequency of Celebration.—In early times the bishop and priests celebrated together. [See CONCELEBRATION.] This custom seems to have continued in Rome long after it had ceased elsewhere, being mentioned by Amalarius of Metz in the ninth century, and later still by Innocent III. It has not yet entirely died out among us, for at the Mass of Ordination the newly-ordained priests say Mass jointly with the bishop, though they do not partake of the same Host or of the Precious Blood. In churches outside the city, priests celebrated independently; on the other hand, the priests of the Roman tituli, practically equivalent to urban parishes, used the Host consecrated and sent to them by the Pope.

Ordinarily speaking, then (an exception will be noted presently), there was but one Mass each day in the same church, and this is still the custom of the Greeks and Orientals, unless where, as in the case of Uniates, they have been influenced by Western practice. Nor was Mass said everywhere on all days of the week. It may perhaps be inferred from Acts ii. 42, 46, that the Apostles celebrated the Agape ending with the Eucharist daily. Justin, however ("Apol." i. 67, PG, vi. 430), only speaks of the Eucharistic celebration on Sunday. St. Augustine (Ep. 54, "Ad Januar.," PL, xxxii. 200) informs us that in some places there was Mass daily, in others only on Sundays, in others on Saturdays and Sundays. Mass was said daily in Africa (Cyprian, Ep. lviii. ed. Hartel, p. 657), in Rome and Spain (Jerome, Ep. lxxi. "Ad Lucin."), at Milan (Le Brun quotes Ambrose, lib. ii. ep. 14, "Ad Marc."), at Antioch and Constantinople (Chrysostom, "In Ephes." Hom. iii. d.[1]). But at Caesarea St. Basil tells us Mass was said only on Sundays, Fridays, and Saturdays, and the feasts of the Martyrs. Of course, when we speak of Mass every day, we except Good Friday and Holy Saturday in the Roman Church, and all the days of Lent except Saturdays and Sundays in the Church of Constantinople.

On many occasions Mass was reiterated by the same celebrant where now one Mass would be said and a commemoration made or more than one Mass said by different celebrants. We have spoken of this custom in the article on CHRISTMAS DAY, and need not dwell on it longer here. Apart from this, a twofold spirit prevailed in the Middle Ages. Some priests said several Masses daily out of devotion. "Priests were allowed to celebrate," says Meratus (Pars I. in Rubr. Gener.), "several times a day, as often as they thought good, so that one would say Mass twice, another three times, another as often as he pleased on the same day, believing that God was inclined to mercy as often as Christ's Passion was brought to mind"; and he quotes Walafrid Strabo, "De Rebus Eccles." cap. 25, who relates that Pope Leo III. sometimes celebrated nine times in one day. Pope Alexander II. forbade any priest to say Mass more than once in the day, and his enactment is incorporated in the "Decretum" of Gratian. The Pope, however, mentions, and apparently without disapproval, the habit of saying two Masses daily, "one of the day, another for the dead." St. Anselm and St. Albert are said by Meratus to have done so. Maskell ("Ancient Liturgy of the Church of England," p. 158) collects many English canons prohibiting the repetition of Mass on the same day by the same priest. Thus a Provincial Constitution of Archbishop Langton prohibits anyone from celebrating more than once a day except on Christmas and Easter Sunday, and on occasion of a funeral in the church; and one of the last injunctions published among us before the change of religion was that "no priest say two Masses in one day, except Christmas Day, without express licence."

[1] Tillemont has shown that these homilies were delivered there, and Montfaucon is of the same opinion.

Devotion led some holy persons at the same period in quite an opposite direction. St. Thomas of Canterbury did not celebrate daily; and a contemporary, noting this, says the practice of priests on this point varied, that those who celebrated often were to be commended for the purity of their lives; those who acted like St. Thomas, for their humility (Fleury, "H.E." livr. lxx. § 64). Mass was said rarely among the Carthusians, and St. Francis of Assisi, in his "Testament," wished one priest only to celebrate each day in his convents. The other priests were to content themselves with hearing Mass (Fleury, livr. lxxix. 25).

By the present law priests are strictly prohibited from saying Mass more than once on any day except Christmas Day and All Souls' Day (Nov. 2), when three Masses may be said. Bishops, however, have often leave to celebrate, or allow their priests to celebrate, twice on a Sunday or holiday of obligation, if a large number of people would otherwise be unable to hear Mass; and most English priests hold faculties renewed at intervals, to this effect. The ablutions must not be taken at the former Mass. Pope Leo XIII., moved by the necessity of the case, permitted bishops in Mexico to have three Masses celebrated by one priest on the same day. No law requires a priest, as such, to celebrate daily, and it is commonly held that he is not bound to do so except on the more solemn feasts (St. Alphonsus, "Theol. Moral." lib. vi. § 313). A parish priest must say Mass, whenever at least the people are bound to hear it. Modern saints—e.g. St. Ignatius and St. Francis of Sales—strongly encourage priests to celebrate daily, and this is now the common, though by no means the universal, custom.

(β) The Hour of Mass was subject to no special regulation down to the middle of the fifth century, though it was usually said early in the morning. Le Brun thinks that the custom of saying Mass at tierce (i.e. at 9 A.M.) began with the monks. It is mentioned by Cassian, Sidonius Apollinaris, a Council of Orleans in 511, and St. Gregory of Tours. On the stations—i.e. Wednesday and Friday and in Rome on Saturday (all usually fasting days)—it was said at Sext—(i.e. noon); on other fasting days after None—(i.e. three o'clock); at ordinations the fast was continued through Friday or Saturday till the early morning of the day following, when the Mass was said. (See Le Brun, tom. iii. diss. i. art. 9.) According to the present law Mass must not be said before dawn or later than midday, and it is a serious matter notably to transgress these limits except in virtue of Apostolic indult. But in winter the rule as to the earlier limit is not strictly observed. The rule which requires the priest to have said Matins and Lauds previously is not so strict. There are special rules on the relations of Office and Conventual Mass, Mass of Requiem, &c., in the rubrics of the Missal.

(γ) The Application of Mass.—The Mass is a sacrifice of adoration, of praise and thanksgiving; it is also a sacrifice of propitiation for sin, and a means of obtaining all graces and blessings from God. In the Canon of the Roman Mass and all other liturgies the sacrifice is always offered specially for certain persons—e.g. for those present in the church, for those who contributed the bread and wine for the consecration, &c. Theologians, following Scotus, recognize a threefold fruit of the sacrifice. There is the general fruit, in which all the faithful participate, the more special fruit, which belongs to those for whom the priest specially offers the sacrifice, and the most special fruit, proper to the celebrant himself. The Canon of the Mass recognizes this distinction, and so bears witness to its antiquity. The celebrant offers "for thy holy Catholic Church"; again he speaks of those "on whose account we offer to Thee, or who offer to Thee, this sacrifice of praise"; he also calls the Mass "the oblation of our ministry," and in an earlier part of the liturgy offers the Host "for my numberless sins and offences and negligences." Theologians dispute how far and in what way the effect of the oblation is limited, very many denying that there is any such limit except in the capacity of those for whom the offering is made, so that, e.g., Mass said for a hundred persons would profit each as much as if said for one only. Practically, however, a priest has to act on the opinion that the effect of the sacrifice is limited by the ordination of Christ, or in some other manner over and above the limitation already mentioned. Here, then, it suffices to say that in "saying Mass" for a person or persons a priest applies in their interest the more special fruit of the sacrifice. If under an obligation of making this application, he must not extend it to others save with the implied condition that he does not intend to interfere with the rights of those who have the first claim. But of course he always offers generally for the whole Church, and reserves the special fruit of the Mass to himself. The following regulations exist with regard to the application:—

All bishops and priests with cure of souls are bound to say Mass for their people on Sundays and holidays of obligation. If the holiday of obligation has become a day of devotion, the duty of saying Mass for the flock continues. Missionary priests, such as those in England and Scotland, are without cure of souls in the strict sense. They are not therefore bound to offer the sacrifice on these days for the people in their district, though charity makes it fit that they should do so. In all cathedrals and collegiate churches the Conventual Mass (see below) must be said daily for benefactors; and chaplains, &c., are bound to say Mass daily for the founder of the chaplaincy or benefice, unless it appear from the terms of the foundation that this was not intended. Lastly, a strict obligation of saying Mass for the donor's intention is incurred by priests who accept an alms on that condition. This alms or stipend is meant for the celebrant's support, and corresponds to the offerings of bread and wine made by the faithful in old days. The bishop fixes the amount of this stipend or tax, as it is called, and the priest must not ask, though he may accept, more. If he has leave to duplicate or say two Masses he must receive alms for one only, and if he asks another priest to say the Mass in his stead he must hand over the whole alms. Many rules have been made, particularly of late, to prevent any appearance of traffic or avarice in this matter. Moreover, Benedict XIV. points out that the rich have no unfair advantage over the poor because of their greater power to have Masses said for them. All souls are God's, and He can give the poor a special share in the general prayers of the Church, and supply their wants in a thousand ways. Riches and poverty are each, if rightly used, the means of salvation.

III. Names of different kinds of Masses.—(α) High Mass, in Latin Missa solemnis, is Mass with incense, music, the assistance of deacon and subdeacon, &c. It is usually sung, when there is a sufficient number of clergy, at least on Sundays and great feasts. Meratus quotes the term Missa alta from Rymer's "Foedera," and the term, Maskell says, seems to have been chiefly in use in England. But the fact that in Dutch and Flemish exactly the same term—viz. Hoogmis—is used, while the Germans have Hochamt, surely proves that Missa alta must have been familiar in other countries. "Missa dominica" and "aurea" were mediaeval names for Masses of special solemnity. Under solemn Masses, Meratus classes Pontifical Masses, celebrated by the bishop with his insignia, and Papal Masses, celebrated by the Pope on certain great feasts with special rites. The Pontifical Mass (the thing, not the name) is mentioned in a Roman Ordo supposed to belong to the former part of the eighth century. Meratus refers to a treatise on Papal Masses by Marcellus, archbishop of Corcyra—"Rituum ecclesiasticorum sive S. Caerimoniarum S. Romanae Ecclesiae."

(β) Low Mass; Missa bassa; in French and English documents, Messe Basse; Missa plana in the "Caerimoniale Episc.," Mass said without music, the priest at least saying, and not singing, the Mass throughout.

(γ) Missa cantata; also called media. A Mass sung, but without deacon and subdeacon and the ceremonies proper to High Mass. In some English dioceses the use of incense is permitted at such Masses.

(δ) Missa publica (sometimes communis) a Mass to which the faithful of either sex are admitted. Hence Gregory the Great prohibited such Masses in monasteries. From the sixth century at least, nine o'clock was the time fixed for such Masses. The decree on this point attributed to Telesphorus in the second century is of course a forgery.

( ) Missa privata (also secreta, familiaris, peculiaris) is difficult of definition. Meratus gives one explanation which identifies it with Low Mass; another according to which it is any Mass at which the priest alone communicates. It would be convenient if we could use this word or had another word to describe Mass which the priest says chiefly for his own devotion or that of his friends, and not to satisfy the wants of a parish, college, &c. In all private Masses the priest must have at least a server to represent the body of the faithful. Solitary Masses were once celebrated by indulgence or privilege in monasteries. They are now strictly forbidden.

(ζ) Missa parochialis: the "Assembly of the faithful in which they offer public prayers and sacrifice by the ministry of their pastor, and learn from him what they should do and not do for their own salvation and the edification of their neighbours." The Council of Trent directs bishops to warn the faithful that they should hear Mass in their parish churches at least on Sundays and greater festivals.

(η) Chapter (Capitular) Mass is the High Mass in collegiate churches.

(θ) Conventual Mass is that which "the rectors of cathedral and collegiate churches are bound to have celebrated every day solemnly and with music after tierce." It must, as we have already seen, be applied for benefactors. It is also known among regulars as Missa canonica, tertiae, publica, communis, major.

(ι) Votive Masses are those which do not correspond with the office of the day, but are said by the choice (votum) of the priest. On all days except Sundays, feasts of double and more than double rank, and certain other days specially excepted, a priest may say a Votive Mass of the Trinity, the Angels, St. Peter and St. Paul, the Holy Ghost, for the dead, &c., &c., instead of that assigned for the day.

(κ) A Requiem Mass is a Mass for the dead, and is so called from the opening words of the Introit: "Requiem aeternam dona eis, Domine."

(λ) Missa adventitia or manualis is a Mass said for the intention of a person who gives an alms; and is opposed to a Missa legata, said for a special intention in consequence of a legacy or foundation. Thus Missa adventitia or manualis is a "chance" Mass—one which "comes to hand."

(μ) The Missa praesanctificatorum is really not a Mass at all. Some account of it will be found under HOLY WEEK.[1] Still more remote from the true idea of Mass is the Missa sicca, a celebration without either consecration or communion, very common in the Middle Ages in the presence of the sick, at sea, and on other occasions when a true Mass could not be said. St. Louis of France used habitually to have this Missa sicca said at sea. Sometimes it was celebrated with all the ceremonies of High Mass. It is now fallen out of use, except that persons learning the ceremonies of Mass sometimes say a Missa sicca before ordination. A real Mass was sometimes said at sea. Gavantus (Pars I. tit. xx. f.) disapproves the practice because of the danger that the chalice may be overturned. Mass cannot be said at sea, even if there seems to be no danger of irreverence, without an Apostolic indult. (Sac. Congreg. Rit., Mar. 4, 1901.)

(The number of books upon the Mass from different points of view is very great. See Cabrol, 'Introduction aux Études Liturgiques." Only a few can be mentioned here. Lebrun, "L'Explication littérale, historique et dogmatique des Prières et Cérémonies de la Messe"; Benedict XIV., "De Sacrosancto Sacrificio Missae"; Bona, "Rerum Liturgicarum libri duo"; Rock, "Hierurgia," and "Church of our Fathers"; Duchesne, "Christian Worship"; Gihr, "The Holy Sacrifice of the Mass," Eng. tr.; Fortescue, "The Mass"; Lucas, "Holy Mass." For the rubrics: Le Vavasseur, "Manuel de Liturgie"; De Herdt, "Sacrae Liturgiae Praxis." For the devotional point of view: Bona, "De Sacrificio Missae Tractatus Asceticus.")

MASTER. [See DEGREES.]

MASTER OF THE SACRED PALACE (magister sacri palatii). This is a dignity of the Roman Curia [CURIA ROMANA], and is said to have been first conferred on St. Dominic, who, observing that the attendants of cardinals, while their masters were transacting business with the Pope, for want of employment used to indulge in idle and frivolous pastimes, obtained permission of Honorius III. to form them into a class and explain the Bible to them. Originating thus, the office gradually became one of greater importance, until it included the right of nominating the preachers before the Pope on certain great festivals, that of acting as consultor to several congregations, that of conferring the degree of doctor in theology and philosophy, with other privileges, as well as the duty of examining and licensing all books published in Rome. (Montier, "Hist. des Maîtres Généraux"; Walsh, in "Cath. Enc.")

MASTER OF THE SENTENCES. Peter Lombard, the author of the great theological text-book, "Sententiarum Libri Quattuor." He became bishop of Paris, and died 1104. From that time until the Reformation all the mediaeval theologians lectured and wrote commentaries on the "Sentences." The work is divided into four books: I., on the Trinity; II., on Creation; III., on the Incarnation; IV., on the Sacraments. Each book was later divided into "Distinctions." Peter Lombard has no claim to originality; he is merely a compiler. His chief merit is that he introduced system and order into the study of theology. His very want of originality and his keeping an open mind upon matters controverted enabled his book to become a text for opposite schools. Though some of his opinions have been condemned or generally rejected he is as a rule most orthodox, and he has the great glory of being mentioned by name in the decrees of the Fourth Lateran Council, c. 2: "Nos autem, sacro approbante concilio, credimus et confitemur, cum Petro Lombardo, &c." There is a handsome edition by Vivès, Paris, 1892. (R. B. Vaughan, "St. Thomas of Aquin," i. 337, 474; De Ghellinck, in "Dublin Rev." 1910 and "Cath. Enc.")

MATINS. [See BREVIARY.]

MATRICULA (dim. of matrix, a roll or register). The roll containing the names of the clergy permanently attached to a cathedral, or a collegiate, or a parish church; also, the list of the names of the students regularly admitted into any university.

MATRICULATION (matricula). The act of entering the name of a student upon the matricula or roll of a university, which in ordinary cases is not done till the candidate for admission has proved his competency by passing an examination in certain prescribed subjects.

MAUR, DAMES DE SAINT. The official name of this religious institute is the Congregation of the Holy Child Jesus. It was founded at Rouen in 1662 by a holy Minim named Nicholas Barré. The object was the education of young girls of all classes. The mother-house was removed to the Rue S. Maur in Paris, from which the congregation derives its popular name of "Dames de Saint Maur." In the seventeenth century, as St. Francis of Sales and St. Vincent of Paul found to their cost, all nuns were compelled to remain within the cloister. Father Barré's object could not be carried out under these conditions. Accordingly, he dispensed with vows, and required the members of the congregation to make simple promises. The "Dames de Saint Maur" flourished greatly up to the time of the Revolution. In 1789 they possessed more than 100 convents, including the famous royal foundation of Saint Cyr. In those days of terrible trial every one of the nuns refused the "Constitutional Oath" and suffered persecution. After the Revolution the institute was reorganized and allowed to take vows. The final approval was given by Pius IX: in 1872.

Among the leading members of the congregation, two are especially worthy of mention: Mother Haller, the first General, and Mother de Faudoas, the fourteenth. The latter, indeed, may be looked upon as the second foundress, as it was through her that the reconstitution and approval were brought about.

At the present time, excluding France, there are houses in England, Ireland, Italy, and Spain; also seven in British Further India, one in Siam and three in Japan. (Anon. "The Congregation of the Holy Child Jesus, commonly called Les Dames de St. Maur.")

MAURISTS. The famous congregation of St. Maur, an offshoot of the Benedictine order [BENEDICTINES], took its name in honour of the favourite disciple of St. Benedict so called, who extended the order greatly in France in the sixth century, and founded the Abbey of Glanfeuil, called after him St. Maur-sur-Loire. Hence, in these northern countries the Benedictine rule was regarded as having him for its author almost equally with St. Benedict himself; cf. Chaucer's—

"The reule of seynt Maure or of seint Beneyt."
(Prol. C. T.)

In the sixteenth century, much relaxation having crept into the monastic observance of Benedictine houses in the South of Europe, various enterprises of reform were set on foot by monks in whom the ancient fervour still glowed. There was established in Lorraine, by Dom Didier de la Cour, the austere congregation of St. Vannes. Many convents in France desired to embrace this reform, and it was solemnly adopted at the monastery of St. Augustine at Limoges in 1613. Here and at other French houses the congregation of St. Vannes planted monks who might teach their principles and procedure. But, Lorraine being at that time politically separate from France, it was thought expedient that a new congregation should be erected for the latter. This being effected in 1618, the new institute, of which Dom Bénard was the chief propagator, took the name of St. Maur, and being supported by Card. de Retz, and afterwards by Richelieu, rapidly extended itself among the Benedictine convents in France. In and near Paris they eventually had three great houses, the Blancs Manteaux, St. Germain des Prés, and St. Denis. The rule was at first observed in its full strictness in the houses which adhered to the congregation; and in union with this religious movement an enthusiasm for literature and learning developed itself, which modified all the arrangements adopted. A general, appointed for life, governed the whole institute, which, at the time when Hélyot wrote (about 1720), comprised one hundred and eighty abbeys and priories, grouped in six provinces. In every province there were one or two noviciates; on leaving which, the young novice was admitted to profession in some monastery, and trained in piety and ecclesiastical knowledge during two years. After that he was engaged for five years in the study of philosophy and theology, and finally for one year, called the "year of recollection," in the exercises and studies designed to fit him for receiving the priesthood at the end of it. If we may judge by the fruits, the preparation must have been exceedingly well fitted to train men for successfully engaging in the pursuits of literature and criticism. Those "Benedictine editions" of the Fathers, which scholars know so well and value so highly, all came from members of the congregation of St. Maur. Among their colossal labours may be mentioned "Gallia Christiana," the "History of French Literature," the "Recueil" of the historians of France, Mabillon's "Annals of the Benedictine Order" and "Lives of Benedictine Saints," Tassin's literary history of the congregation, Martène's "Amplissima Collectio," &c., &c. The majority of their own countrymen appear to be in haste to forget them; but the rest of the world will not soon forget the gentle, pious, genial, indefatigable Mabillon, the Venerable Bede of these later times; nor Edmond Martène, that model of exact and thorough research; nor Montfaucon, whose vast erudition illustrated by the engraver's art the whole field of Graeco-Roman antiquity and founded the science of archaeology; nor Ruinart, the historian of the Martyrs; not to speak of Rivet, Bouquet, Lami, Labat, Luc d'Achéry, Le Nourri, Ménard, Martianay, and many more, whose names all suggest priceless services rendered in this or that field to the cause of secular and sacred learning.

The later history of the congregation, from the time of Hélyot to their suppression in 1792, is more chequered. Jansenism insinuated itself into some of the convents; and in the controversy which grew out of the publication of the Constitution "Unigenitus"

(1713), although the general and the superiors remained loyal to the Holy See, many of the monks joined the party of opposition. After some time, relaxations of the rule, such as the abandonment of the old habit, modification of the prohibitions respecting food, and the curtailment of the midnight office, were demanded in many convents, and to a great extent conceded. The pseudo-philosophic spirit that was abroad infected even a congregation which had commenced as an austere reform not two centuries before; and, if Hélyot's continuator may be trusted, a Freemasons' lodge was established at Glanfeuil in 1775, and the prior of the Maurist monastery there became the venerable of the lodge. Nevertheless, the congregation, though it no longer produced minds of the calibre of those which adorned it at the beginning of the century, continued to be devoted to learning and literature. The "Academy of Saumur," established in the abbey of that town, achieved a wide reputation. In education also their colleges and schools were most successful, and attracted, particularly after the suppression of the Jesuits, pupils of the best blood of France; among these colleges were Sorèze in Burgundy—re-opened in our times by Lacordaire—Tiron, Pont Levoy, St. Germer, and Auxerre. After 1780 the dissensions which had long troubled the peace of the congregation grew more violent, and would probably have led to its dissolution even if the Revolution had not occurred and turned them out of their monasteries. (Hélyot, continued by Badiche.)

MAY. In recent times, a custom has arisen of addressing public prayer to the Blessed Virgin, decking her altar with flowers, singing hymns in her honour, &c., daily during the month of May. The prayers used are from books of popular devotion, for the Church does not recognize this "Month of May" by any change in the Mass or Office. However, Pius VII. in a brief, March 21, 1815, granted an indulgence of 300 days daily to those who practise this devotion at home or in church, and a plenary indulgence any one day in the month on condition of confession, communion, and prayer for the intention of the Pope. An Italian Father of Charity, Dr. Gentili, introduced the celebration of May devotions among us in England some sixty years ago.

MECHITARISTS. This congregation, which exists for the purpose of instructing and improving the scattered members of the Armenian nation, was founded by an Armenian named Mechitar, who was born in 1676 at Siwas, the ancient Sebastia, a town near the source of the Halys, on the borders of Pontus and Cappadocia. His family appears to have belonged to the section of the Armenian nation which has always adhered to the Catholic Church. From the time when he was ordained priest, in 1699, the desire of labouring for the temporal and eternal welfare of his countrymen possessed itself of his whole nature. He went to Constantinople, and formed an association there to carry out his design; but, being opposed by some of the schismatic Armenians, he transferred his operations to Modon in the Morea, which at that time belonged to the Republic of Venice. Here he and his companions worked on for fourteen years; but in 1715, war having broken out between the Porte and the Republic, Modon was taken by the Turks, and Mechitar's convent was broken up. He then retired to Venice, and obtained from the Government the island of San Lazzaro, which lies in the lagune between the Lido and the city. Here he founded that Armenian convent which travellers from foreign lands never fail to visit and unanimously and cordially admire. Literary labours which have for their object to perfect and regularise the Armenian language, and to translate into it the more important works of the various European literatures, have always been, and are still, zealously prosecuted here by these intelligent Orientals. Branches from the mother house have been founded at Vienna and Trieste, and at several places in Hungary. The Allgemeine Zeitung (December 17, 1850) thus writes of the Mechitarists: "When one takes a near view of their labours at Vienna and Venice, one is amazed at the powerful influence which the literary activity of these learned monks exerts on the Armenian nation scattered throughout the East. The reviews, the books, the numerous translations of works on history, geography, philology, natural science, and voyages and travels, which are printed in the Mechitarist presses of Vienna and Venice are carried far beyond Persia to the banks of the Indus and the Ganges, and have everywhere called forth among the Armenians the desire of knowledge and a taste for reading, and set on foot a literary movement which was before entirely dormant in a people till lately essentially and exclusively commercial." (Kalemkiar in "Kirchenlex.")

MEDALS, RELIGIOUS. Pieces of metal, stamped with some religious emblem, picture, or portrait. As mentioned in the art. AMULET, the pagan custom of wearing some material object as a protection against evil was stripped of its superstitious meaning and tolerated by the Church. (Newman, "Development," 373.) De Rossi has shown that the coin-like objects discovered in the catacombs are genuine religious medals. During the Middle Ages they seem to have been in little use. It is only when we come to the Renaissance period that the custom of wearing them became common. Here, again, the beauty of the secular coins and medals of this age naturally suggested that such art might be subservient to the purposes of religion. If paintings and statues might be venerated, why not medals? The Council of Trent was careful to guard the faithful against attaching any superstitious efficacy to mere representations of holy persons and things (sess. xxv.). Once the limits of the veneration were fixed, and the practice of blessing and attaching indulgences to medals came into use, the number of these pious objects rapidly increased. It would be impossible to give an account of the number and variety. Two only may be noticed here. The use of a blessed medal to be worn instead of the brown or other scapulars was sanctioned by Pius X. The other medal to be mentioned is the so-called "Miraculous Medal" of the Immaculate Conception, said to have been revealed to a Sister of Charity in 1830. Pius IX. approved of the medal, and Leo XIII. instituted an Office and Mass of the apparition to be kept on November 27. (See Thurston in "Cath. Enc."; Pachinger, "Wallfahrts-Bruderschafts und Gnaden-Medaillen"; Schrod in "Kirchenlex."; Migne, "Encyclopédie," xxxii., Numismatique.)

MEDIATOR (μεσίτης, "sequester Dei et hominum Christus" in Tertull. "Adv. Prax." 27, PL, ii. 192). St. Paul (1 Tim. ii. 5) speaks of Christ as the "one mediator between God and man," and it is plain that he vindicates this office as one proper to Christ alone, for the passage runs: "There is one God, one mediator also between God and men, a man Christ Jesus, who gave Himself also a ransom for all," &c. Christ is the one mediator, because He alone could draw near to God in virtue of merits which were His own and independently of the merits of any beside Himself. He alone could offer a propitiation infinite in value for the sin of man, and obtain in return all the gifts of salvation. This He did as man; not, however, as mere man, but as man who was also God, so that He was able to make full and perfect atonement. Further, St. Thomas points out (3ª, q. 26, a. 2) that a mediator, from the very fact that He comes between, must be distant from each extreme. Now "Christ as man is far from God (distat a Deo) in nature, and from men in the dignity of grace and glory." Again, a mediator's office is to join the two extremes, and this Christ does "by setting before men the commandments and gifts of God, by making satisfaction to God for them, and by interceding for them. Christ, therefore, as man is most truly called mediator."

The Arian error on this point lay in their belief that the Word in His superhuman nature came between God and creatures. Creatures "could not bear the hand of God," and "a mediator became necessary that things generated might come to be."[1] St. Athanasius ("Defens. Fid. Nic." cap. iii. § 8, PG, xxv. 437) shows the illogical character of the error, for if the Son is a creature, then on the Arian theory another mediator must have been required to create Him; if not a creature, He is true God.

The Protestant mistake consists in interpreting St. Paul's words as if they excluded the mediation of the saints. Assuredly there is only one mediator of redemption, and the saints, says Estius (ad loc.), are "mediators in an imperfect way—i.e. they intercede for us with God, just as all persons do who in prayer commend our salvation to God." "Whoever beseeches God for others constitutes himself after a manner a medium and an intercessor between them and God, though he does this leaning not on his own merits, but on another's—viz. Christ's. For whatever the saints seek for us in prayer, they only seek through Christ." In this imperfect sense St. Paul calls Moses a "mediator" (Galatians iii. 19, 20). This is his common title in Jewish writers, and his mediatorial office clearly appears, e.g. Deut. v. 2, 5—"I stood between the Lord and you"; and the doctrine of angelic mediation is asserted in a beautiful passage of Elihu's speech (Job xxxiii. 23)—

> "If there be for him an angel to mediate,
> One of a thousand,
> To declare to man what is right for him,
> Then He (God) is gracious to him and says:
> 'Loose him from going down to the pit,
> I have found a ransom.'"

There can be no doubt about the meaning of the word italicised (מֵלִיץ). "An angel interceding with God on behalf of men, a μεσίτης," is Gesenius' commentary. So Delitzsch, "Mittler," "mediator" (he, however, understands the "angel of the covenant.") The Targum rendering is Paraclete, advocate (פָּרַקְלִיטָא). The LXX entirely misses the sense; the Vulgate has "loquens pro eo."[2]

We may remark by the way that the doctrine of angelic mediation prominent in the Book of Job has not, so far as we know, received due attention from Catholics[1]; observe the words in the first speech of Eliphaz (v. 1):

> "Call. Is there one to answer thee?
> To which of the holy ones (i.e. angels) wilt thou turn?"

On which passage an eminent Protestant scholar comments thus: "They [angels] appear as intercessors for men with God, bringing men's needs before Him, and mediating in their behalf. This work is easily connected with their general office of labouring for the good of men, especially of the pious; still it is here for the first time ascribed to them" (Dillmann, on Job, p. 44). (See SAINTS; also the dogmatic theologians, [1] St. Thomas, however, refers to this very passage (Suppl. q. 72, a. 2).

"De Incarnatione," e.g. Petavius, lib. xiv.; Humphrey, "The One Mediator.")

MEDITATION AND MENTAL PRAYER. Meditation in its narrower and technical sense may be defined as the application of the three powers of the soul to prayer—the memory proposing a religious or moral truth, the understanding considering this truth in its application to the individual who meditates, while the will forms practical resolutions and desires grace to keep them. It is distinguished from vocal prayer, because in meditation no words are used, and from the higher forms of mental prayer (e.g. affective prayer, contemplation, &c.), because in these there is no methodical use of the reason. Mental prayer of some kind must be as old as the human race, but it was St. Ignatius of Loyola who reduced the rules of meditation to system, and contributed to the spread of meditation at a regular hour and for a fixed space of time. Thus St. Benedict supposes that some of his monks will pray after the vocal prayers of the office with tears and application of heart (Rule, c. 25, quoted by Fleury, "H.E." xxxii. 15), and an incident in his life (c. 4, Fleury, loc. cit.) shows that the religious used to pray in private after the chanting of the psalms. So St. Columban admonishes his religious on the duty of private prayer and the continual application of the mind to God. ("Poenit." n. 19; Fleury, xxxv. 10.)

Modern ascetical writers are much more precise, and in all communities of men and women, in all seminaries, &c., a time is set apart daily for mental prayer, which is imposed by rule. The practice of mental prayer is recommended to secular priests, and also to lay persons if they have some education and desire to lead a perfect life. The method given by St. Ignatius in his Exercises is that generally recommended and used, at least till the person who meditates forms a method of his own. [See EXERCISES.] The best exposition of it is by Father Roothaan, General of the Society, "De Ratione Meditandi" (Romae, 1871). The Ignatian method has been simplified by St. Alphonsus, and the Sulpicians have a method of their own, propounded by M. Olier; another is given by the Carmelite John of Jesus-Mary. Books of meditation without number have appeared during the last three centuries, and we cannot pretend to mention even the principal names. Da Ponte, Avancini, Crasset, Lancicius, Challoner, Chaignon, are those which most readily occur to us.

Benedict XIV., in his work on Beatification, naturally rebukes the rashness of the Jesuit Hurtado, who maintained that the daily and formal practice of mental prayer was necessary for salvation. It is, however, a great and powerful help to self-improvement and advance in virtue.

After meditation comes affective prayer, in which the soul goes straight to God by affection of the will without need of formal discourse or reasoning. Next come higher degrees of prayer, which the experience of the saints proves to be most real but which are far removed from ordinary experience. Contemplation, we are told, is either natural or infused in an extraordinary manner by God, and in the latter the soul is said to be passive—i.e. to be in some special sense moved by God. It is important to notice that in the passive prayer "free will exercises itself in the whole of its extent." Catholic mystics insist on this, and wholly reject the false notions of absorption in the Deity, loss of personality, &c. Bossuet proves this at length from St. Theresa, St. John of the Cross, &c. See his "Instructions sur les Etats d'Oraison," traité 1, livr. vii. n. 13. This work makes the whole matter comprehensible, so far as it can be comprehended, and is full of learning. See Faber, "Growth in Holiness," ch. xv.

MELCHITES. The word, which comes from the Semitic word (Heb. מֶלֶךְ, Syr. ܡܠܟܐ Chald. מַלְכָּא, the Arabic is the same) for king, means royalists. When multitudes of Christians in the East, and especially in Egypt, fell away from the Church after the Council of Chalcedon, and clung to the Monophysite creed, the Church of Constantinople and the Byzantine Court remained orthodox, and the Emperors exerted their influence on the Catholic side. Hence the name of Melchites was given to those Christians in the patriarchates of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem who held to the definition of Chalcedon.[1] These were of course closely connected with the patriarchate of Constantinople; they adopted its liturgy, and when Constantinople was severed by schism from the Catholic Church they lapsed also. In fact, both from a dogmatic and liturgical point of view, the Melchites are simply Greeks living in Egypt and Syria. And just as Jacobites, Copts, or Nestorians, when they return to the Church, retain their ancient rites, so the Melchites who have recovered Catholic unity retain the liturgies of St. Chrysostom and St. Basil, and the canon law to which they have been accustomed.

The Melchite or Greek Catholic Church of Antioch dates from 1686,[2] when the Greek Patriarch Athanasius IV. of Antioch submitted to the Pope. From Antioch the Catholic Melchites spread to the patriarchates of Alexandria and Jerusalem.

The Patriarch of Antioch is chosen by the bishops of the patriarchate. The election, however, must be examined and approved by Propaganda and confirmed by the Pope. If the election is pronounced invalid, the Pope nominates, and the Pope may appoint, if necessary, a coadjutor with right of succession. The Patriarch, who is subject to Propaganda, lives at Damascus and Ain Teraz, in the seminary for priests. The bishops are elected by the clergy of the diocese, the right of confirmation and consecration resting with the Patriarch. The bishops may be taken from the secular clergy, if unmarried. The secular priests, who are educated at a seminary on Mount Lebanon, may continue to live as married men if married before receiving Holy Orders. The Patriarch has subject to him the archdioceses of Damascus (which he himself administers), Tyre, Bosra and Hauran, Homs and Hama, and Aleppo, besides eight other dioceses.

[2] Or rather 1720, when Ignatius, who had resigned, was restored to his see.

A Greek Patriarch of Alexandria made his submission and received the pallium from Clement XI. in 1713, but he had no Catholic successors, and the Alexandrian patriarchate is administered by the vicar of the Patriarch of Antioch. This vicar is a bishop in partibus, and lives at Cairo. There are two Greek Catholic churches at Cairo, one at Rosetta, a hospice at Damietta. Another bishop in partibus, also a vicar of the Patriarch of Antioch, administers the patriarchate of Jerusalem.

The Melchite religious follow the rule of St. Basil, with modifications. The monks are divided into two congregations. The congregation of St. Salvator was founded in 1715, and is ruled by an abbot-general, who lives at Deir-el-Mukhallis, a few miles northeast of Sidon. There are 500 monks, eight monasteries, and twenty-one hospitia. This congregation has a house at Rome—Sta. Maria in Carinis. Most of the parishes are supplied by these monks. The other congregation, of St. John Baptist ("Mar Johanna-el-Shuweir"), erected early in the eighteenth century, has also a hospice at Rome—Sta. Maria in Domnica, detta la Navicella. This congregation, which is recruited from Aleppo and Lebanon, was subdivided, by authority of Gregory XVI. in 1832, into the congregation of Aleppo, with four monasteries and two hospices, and that of the Baladites, with the same number of monasteries and hospices, besides the hospice at Rome. At this last, however, the procurators of both congregations reside.

The number of Catholics of this rite is about 173,000, and of priests not far short of 350. There are also five or six convents of nuns. ("Missiones Catholicae," 1901; Silbernagl, "Kirchen des Orients"; Werner, "Orbis Terrarum Catholicus"; Streit, "Atlas.")

MELETIAN SCHISM. The name is equivocally applied to two entirely different transactions.

I. Schism of Meletius of Egypt.—An admirable article by Hefele[1] throws light on this obscure and complicated affair, in which the principal actor figures to disadvantage in the writings of one saint, and to advantage in those of another. Meletius was bishop of Lycopolis in the Thebaid. At the time of the persecution of Diocletian, when many of the Egyptian bishops were in prison, and Peter, the Patriarch of Alexandria, absent from his see (perhaps he was in hiding), Meletius took upon himself to ordain priests in dioceses other than his own—a thing clearly against the canons—and, going to Alexandria, associated himself with Arius, then a layman, and ordained priests and episcopal visitors on his own authority, without reference to the absent patriarch. This conduct naturally occasioned a schism, which, beginning about 304, was not finally extinguished till the middle of the fifth century. It is not known in what year Meletius died. St. Athanasius mentions Meletius and the Meletians in several places of his writings, and says that the former sacrificed to idols during the persecution. Hefele thinks that with regard to this Athanasius must have been misled by a false report, since it is incredible that St. Epiphanius should have spoken in terms of commendation of Meletius if he had known him to have consented to this act of weakness. The Meletian schismatics joined the Arians in all their persecution of Athanasius. On the other hand, St. Epiphanius, in his work on Heresies, tells the story of the schism from a quite different point of view. It arose, according to him, out of a difference of opinion between the Patriarch Peter and Meletius, on the subject of the "lapsi," the former taking a lax view, and being willing to consent to their replacement in all their functions on terms by which the zealous piety of Meletius was scandalized. Hefele thinks it probable that this version of the schism was given to St. Epiphanius in his youth by some Meletian priests of Eleutheropolis, where Meletius is stated to have ordained clergy. The Council of Nicaea (325) took the matter in hand, and endeavoured, by means of a synodal letter, to dispose of it; but the cunning of the Meletians enabled them to elude, to a great extent, the conditions which it was sought to impose upon them. (Hefele-Leclercq, i. 211, 488.)

MEMENTO. [See DIPTYCHS.]

MEMORIA. (1) A shrine or reliquary containing relics of some martyr or martyrs, which in primitive times it was customary to carry in procession. St. Augustine, in the twenty-second book of the "De Civitate Dei" (ch. 8), speaks of the "Memory"[2] of the "Twenty Martyrs" at Hippo, and mentions several instances of "Memories" of the protomartyr St. Stephen, belonging to different churches, being carried in procession by the respective bishops, and becoming the occasion of miraculous cures. "Lucillus, bishop of Sinita," he says, "while carrying this holy burden (pia sarcina) was cured of an infirmity under which he had long laboured."[1]

[1] In Kirchenlex.

Abuses having arisen through the eagerness to obtain relics, a law of Theodosius ("Cod. Theod." ix. 17, 7) ordered that none should buy or dismember the bodies of martyrs or remove them from place to place.[1] This law cannot have been in force in Africa at the time when St. Augustine wrote as above.

(2) A church or chapel built in memory of a martyr or confessor, and often over his tomb. Such a chapel usually, if not always, contained relics of the martyr.

MENDICANT FRIARS, that is "begging" friars, who have no property even in common, and depend for support upon the alms of the faithful: This is their characteristic difference from monks. The four great mendicant orders were the Dominicans, Franciscans, Carmelites, and Austin Hermits. To these others were afterwards added. [See FRIARS; EVANGELICAL COUNSELS.]

MENOLOGY (Gr. μήν). A monthly register. By this name the Greeks designated the calendars inscribed with the names, primarily of martyrs, but afterwards of confessors also, which in the Latin Church were called Martyrologies. (See MARTYROLOGY.)

MENSAL FUND (mensa, table). That portion of the revenue of a church set apart for the support of those who serve it. Thus, the bishop and the chapter have each their "mensa," entirely distinct. A bishop at his consecration is required to swear that he will not in any way alienate his "mensa." The share of each canon in the chapter or mensa is his prebend (q.v.). (See Boudinhon in "Cath. Enc."; Taunton.)

MENTAL RESERVATION or restriction (restrictio mentalis) occurs where a person uses words in a sense other than that which is obvious and which he knows they are likely to convey. Thus, a man who tells a beggar that he has no money in his pocket, meaning that he has no money to give the beggar, uses mental reservation. He inserts mentally a qualification or restriction which is not expressed.

If the restriction is of such a nature that it cannot be perceived by the hearer, then the person who uses it certainly sins. So all Catholics are bound to hold. (See Prop. 26, 27, 28, among those condemned by Innocent XI.)

On the other hand, almost all theologians hold that it is sometimes lawful to use a mental reservation which may be, though very likely it will not be, understood from the circumstances. Thus, a priest may deny that he knows a crime which he has only learnt through sacramental confession. A man may deny a crime he has committed if interrogated and forced to answer by one who has no authority; or, again, according to St. Alphonsus, if asked to lend money, he may equivocate, and say "I wish I had it."

But it must be remembered that, as is allowed on all hands, just cause is needed to make equivocation lawful. A habit of equivocation is detestable to all good men, and the practice of perfect simplicity and straightforwardness is not only estimable and engaging and virtuous, but it is also the wisest course.

Next, St. Alphonsus says plainly that all equivocation is sinful when a man is put on his oath by just authority; that it is utterly wicked for tradesmen to affirm on oath that their goods cost more than they really did, and then shelter themselves under equivocation; that no equivocation must be used in contracts, or generally in matters concerning the interests of others.

Further, many even of the strongest opponents of mental reservation would allow equivocation in extreme cases: e.g. few would say that it was unlawful for a man to equivocate if a burglar asked him where his money was, or how much he had, or if a murderer asked him where he could find his intended victim. It may be mentioned that St. Alphonsus makes some difficulty about letting a servant say his master is not at home, when this is not true in its obvious sense. Yet this practice is common in England. If we admit, as many Protestant authorities have done, that equivocation is in some cases allowable, it is hard to settle what these cases are. No doubt, equivocation is always an evil, though not always a sin, and the less of it there is the better. With regard to St. Alphonsus's judgment on particular cases, it is well to bear in mind that no Catholic is bound to follow him throughout, and Cardinal Newman has recorded his own dissent from the saint's teaching on this matter. In some of his decisions on mental reservation there is high theological authority on the other side.

We may add that Catholic theologians justify the lawfulness of equivocation by an appeal to John vii. 8, where our Lord says, "I go not up to this feast" ("Tabernacles"). The argument cannot be pressed against Protestants, for the weight of documentary evidence favours another reading—"I go not up yet to this feast." (See St. Alphonsus, "Theol. Moral." lib. iv.; Slater, "Mor. Theol." i. 464; and Cardinal Newman, "Apologia," note G.

MERCY, SISTERS OF. This important and flourishing order was founded in 1827

[1] Robertson, Hist. of the Christian Church, i. 354.

at Baggot Street, Dublin, by Catherine McAuley, for carrying on all the works of mercy, both spiritual and temporal. The foundress took the title of her order from that of St. Peter Nolasco; its rule, with some modifications, from that of the Presentation Nuns (q.v.). Except in the case of recent filiations, each convent is independent of every other, and is under the jurisdiction and control of the bishop of the diocese. Besides the three essential vows, the sisters take a fourth—to devote themselves for life to the service and instruction of the poor, the sick, and the ignorant. The order has many houses in England, Ireland, Scotland, Australia, and elsewhere; but nowhere has it prospered more than in the United States of America. ("Annals of the Sisters of Mercy"; Carroll, "Life of Catherine McAuley.")

MERCY, SPIRITUAL AND CORPORAL WORKS OF. In the Middle Ages seven great works of mercy to the souls and bodies of our fellow-men were enumerated, and called the Spiritual and Corporal Works of Mercy. The classification constantly appears in works of art, and is retained in modern catechisms. The Seven Works of Corporal Mercy are, to feed the hungry, give drink to the thirsty, clothe the naked, visit prisoners, visit the sick, harbour strangers, bury the dead (Mt. xxv. 35, 36; Tob. xii. 12); of Spiritual Mercy, to convert sinners, instruct the ignorant, counsel the doubtful, console the afflicted, bear wrongs patiently, forgive injuries, pray for the living and the dead. They are all comprised in two rude hexameters—

"Visito, poto, cibo, redimo, tego, colligo, condo.
Consule, carpe, doce, solare, remitte, fer, ora."

[See CHARITY, WORKS OF.]

MERCY, OUR LADY OF. [See MARY, p. 563; RANSOM, OUR LADY OF.]

MERIT, in its strict theological sense, is a quality which belongs to the moral actions of free and responsible agents and makes these actions worthy of reward. Merit implies a real proportion between the work done and the reward given. Thus, a man who labours well in the fields deserves, or merits, his day's wages from the master who hired him; while, on the other hand, a beggar who comes to receive a promised alms cannot be said to earn or merit it. To put it in another way, a man who merits can claim his reward as a matter of justice, but one who has been promised a reward out of all proportion to the work done may appeal to the fidelity and kindness, but not, strictly speaking, to the justice of the donor. In order to merit, a man must be free, since he cannot claim reward for a service which he has no power to withhold, and which, therefore, is not his to give; what he does must, obviously, be good; it must be done in the service of the person who is to confer the reward, and the latter must have agreed to accept the work done and to reward it, since nobody is bound to pay for work, however excellent, which he does not want. We have been speaking of merit in a sense strict and definite, but at the same time general—of merit as it may exist, e.g., between man and man; and so far, we suppose, there is no matter for dispute between Catholics and Protestants.

The controversy begins, however, when we pass from the nature of merit to a consideration of the cases in which it exists. Protestants admitted that man might merit reward from his brother man, and that Christ merited eternal life for Himself and for all who believe in Him from the hand of God. But the Reformers denied that the good works of the just merited an eternal reward, and they were bound in consistency to do so, for they were committed to the theory that men were justified solely by the merits of Christ imputed to them or reckoned to their account, and they rejected the Catholic doctrine that God accepted sinners because they were renewed within by the grace of Christ, that He counted them just and good because they really had become just and good, because He Himself had washed and cleansed them and reformed their nature more wonderfully than He had formed it at the first. Hence Luther and Melanchthon held that the best works of good men were actually sinful—nay, that but for God's mercy they were mortal sins. "Every work of the just man," Luther writes, "is damnable and a mortal sin if it be judged by God's judgment." Melanchthon is just as decided. "Works which follow justification, although they proceed from the Spirit of God, who has taken possession of the heart of justified persons, yet, because done in the flesh which remains unclean, are themselves also unclean." "We have taught that we are justified by faith alone, that our works, that our strivings are nought but sin." Calvin, though his language is more moderate, maintains the same thesis in substance—viz. that the "good works of the faithful lack such perfect purity as can endure the sight of God, and are in a manner defiled."[1] In diametrical and conscious opposition to this estimate, the Council of Trent (sess. vi. De Justif. canon 32) declares that a man, if already justified, "through such good works as he does by the grace of God and merit of Christ, whose living member he is, truly merits increase of grace, eternal life, and the actual attainment of eternal life, if he dies in grace." This doctrine is limited in several ways, and it will be better to state these modifications and append the grounds of the Tridentine doctrine as we proceed. In great measure, indeed, the statement suffices to justify the doctrine.

(1) The just have no claim for a reward apart from God's merciful promise. This is plain from the very nature of merit, as we have already seen. Even from other men we cannot in strict justice claim a reward for services done, unless they have expressly or by implication agreed to remunerate them. But besides this we cannot profit God by our service. He is all-wise and almighty. His bliss is complete in itself, and He has no need of us and of our works. Besides, our service is already due to God by other titles. A slave looks for no reward from his master, and any recompense he may receive comes to him from liberality and not from justice. Thus, men condemned to penal servitude, which is a kind of slavery, work hard, but they have no claim at law for wages. But no slave can belong to his master so absolutely as man to his Creator. Our existence is God's gift: His strength supports us at each instant; His we are, and Him we have to serve. There would have been no injustice had God called us to serve Him without reward, and our service at the best would be imperfect. Hence our Lord reminds us of the manner in which God might have dealt with us. A slave, He says, has to work in the fields, and when he comes home he has to prepare his master's meal and take his own afterwards. "Does he thank that servant because he did the things he was bidden?" "So you also, when you do all that you are bidden, say, We are unprofitable servants: we have done what we were bound to do" (Lk. xvii. 7 seq.). So, we say, God might have dealt with us, but as a matter of fact He has not done so.[1] He has graciously promised to reward our good works with life eternal; and since the promise has been made, since, further, there is a real proportion between the work done and the reward given, the reward is merited, or, in other words, God's justice, no less than His fidelity to His promise, is the warrant that it will be given. Scripture speaks on this point as plainly as the Council of Trent. "For the rest, there is reserved for me the crown of justice which the Lord will give in that day, the just judge" (2 Tim. iv. 8). Whatever the exact sense of "the crown of justice" may be, the last words, "the just judge," leave no room to doubt that St. Paul expected a reward from the justice of God. So again, in Hebrews vi. 10, the words are, "God is not unjust to forget your work and labour of love," and the justice consists in giving the reward of "salvation," as the preceding verse proves. The same truth follows from the reiterated assurance that "God will render to every man according to his works" (Rom. ii. 6).

(2) It is only works done in the friendship and by the grace of God which merit eternal life. St. Paul constantly asserts that no man can be justified by the works of the law. In the Epistle to the Romans he shows that the heathen (i. 18–32) and the Jews (ii. 1–29) were alike under condemnation before God, that justification came by the Gospel and through faith (iii. 21–26), and that all boasting is thereby excluded (iii. 27–31). In 1 Cor. xiii. we have the general statement, "If I give my body to be burnt and have not charity, it profits me nothing." The contrary doctrine—viz. that man "can be justified by his own works done through the strength of human nature or the teaching of the law,"—is anathematized by the Council of Trent (loc. cit. canon 1). The work of our salvation begins wholly from the grace of God and the co-operation of our free will; it springs from grace, not from merit; from the divine mercy, not from the divine justice. God moves the sinner to believe and to repent, and pours the Holy Ghost and divine love into his heart, not because of any merits which He sees in him, but because of His own infinite compassion. But when the sinner has passed from death to life, the least work done by God's grace merits heaven. Each is the fruit of Christ's Passion, each is done and can only be done by those "who have received power to become the sons of God." The Holy Spirit in the heart is a "fountain of water springing up to eternal life" (Jn. iv. 13). The smallest work of mercy, if done by Christ's indwelling grace, is from that very fact due to a principle which utterly transcends all earthly reward, and which, therefore, justly claims recompense in heaven. Hence St. Paul boldly tells the Colossians (i. 10) to "walk worthily of the Lord," and the Thessalonians (2 Ep. i. 5) so to suffer as to be "counted worthy" of the kingdom of God. To deny the merit of the just is to detract from the merit of Christ, in whose strength they act.

Nor can the doctrine of merit, so understood, fail to prove a powerful incentive to humility and gratitude. "What merits of his own," St. Augustine asks (Ep. 194, al. 105) "has [the sinner] set free to boast of, since, had he received according to his merits, he would have been condemned? Are there therefore no merits of the just? Evidently there are, because they are just. But there were no merits in order that they might become just, for they were made just when they were justified; but, as the Apostle says, 'justified freely by His grace.'" And further on in the same epistle "What merit, then, can there be in man, anterior to grace and on account of which he can receive grace, seeing that grace alone works in us all our good deserts, and seeing that God, when

[1] Those who quote Lk. xvii. 7 against the Catholic doctrine forget that Christ promises to do (Lk. xii. 37) the very thing which the master in the parable (Lk. xvii.) does not do.

He crowns our merits, crowns what are nothing else than His own gifts? For as from the beginning of faith we obtained mercy, not because we were faithful, but in order that we might be faithful, so in the end, when life will be eternal, He will crown us, as it is written, "in pity and in mercy." So not in vain do we sing to God, 'And His mercy will go before me,' 'And His mercy will follow me.' Whence also even eternal life, which, endless itself, will be attained at the end, and therefore is given after merits, is itself too called a grace, because these same merits of which it is the reward have not been done by us of our sufficiency, but have been done in us by grace, because it [eternal life] is given freely, not that it is not given in consequence of merits, but because the merits to which it is given are themselves a gift."

Again, the Catholic doctrine is utterly opposed to the legalism which expects measure for measure, so much reward in heaven for so much external service on earth. There is a Jewish saying, "God did not reveal the reward attached to each commandment, for had He done so man would keep some and neglect others."[1] It could not have arisen among Christians. To them "love is the fulfilling of the law." The love of God above all, and of men for His sake—that is the one indispensable work; and of itself, though all external works may be absent, it merits the kingdom of heaven. He who loves has passed from death to life; external good works can claim a reward so far, and so far only, as they spring from love, are the expression of love, serve to intensify love.

It is not worth while to show at length that the Fathers taught the Catholic doctrine on grace and justification, for the Reformers were conscious that they could not appeal successfully to tradition, and they professed to restore a belief contained, indeed, in Scripture, but forgotten even from early times in the Church. We may, however, refer the reader to Clem. Rom. 1 Ep. 30, cf. 32, PG, i. 269; Ep. Barnab. 19, PG, ii. 777; Iren. iv. 30, 3, PG, vii. 1066; Tertull. "Scorp." 12, PL, ii. 146. It was only the Gnostics in the first ages of the Church who denied the merit of good works. (See Iren. i. 23, 3, i. 25, 5.) It is more important to note that merit is sometimes used in a looser sense, and that theologians recognize an inferior or imperfect merit—viz. "Meritum de Congruo," merit of congruity. This latter is not, properly speaking, merit at all; it is a right founded in friendship and liberality, not in strict justice. Thus no one can merit the first grace or recovery from mortal sin, nor can a holy man merit the conversion of another,[1] or his own perseverance in grace. (See FINAL PERSEVERANCE.) It is, however, lawful to hold that a just man may merit a sinner's conversion de congruo, because it is congruous or fitting that God should hear the prayer of one who is admitted to His friendship. In other cases, Billuart denies that there is any place even for merit de congruo, unless we take it to mean merit in a still laxer and vaguer acceptation. Thus we may say, if we like, that a man who, moved by God's grace, believes, sorrows for his sin, resolves to begin a new life, hopes in God's mercy, &c., merits de congruo the further grace of justification, because these previous works dispose the soul to receive sanctifying grace. But if the question be asked in general terms, "Does a sinner, so disposed, merit God's pardon and grace?" the answer must be "no," and so the Council of Trent expressly defines. (See St. Thom. 1ª 2æ, qq. 109, 114; the dogmatic theologians "De Gratia"; Bellarmine, "De Justif." v. i.–xxi.; Suarez, "De Gratia," xii.; Wilhelm and Scannell, "Cath. Theol." ii. p. 256.)

MESSALIANS. (See EUCHITES.)

METROPOLITAN (metropolita, metropolitanus). The thirty-third of the Apostolic Canons says that the bishops in every country (cujusque gentis) ought to know which among them is the first, and take him to a certain extent as their head, and do nothing unusual without his consent. It was manifestly the intention of St. Paul that Titus should stand in a relation of this kind to all the bishops established in the cities of Crete;[2] and a comparison of 1 Tim. ch. iii. with Tit. i. seems to justify the inference that Timothy held a similar rank among the bishops of Asia. This leading bishop among his brethren would naturally be, or come to be, the prelate of the most important city (metropolis) in the province or country. In the case of an entire country, such as Syria or Egypt, each with its dependencies, the bishop of the capital city (Antioch, Alexandria, &c.) was called the patriarch; in the case of a province, the metropolitan. The ecclesiastical divisions, for a long time after the conversion of Constantine, conformed themselves closely to the civil; the same chief city of a province contained the praetor as the head of the temporal, and the metropolitan as the head of the spiritual organisation. In process of time it often happened that the seat of the civil government was removed to another city,

[1] Quoted from Tanchuma on Ekeb. in the learned Jewish work, Hamburger's Real-Encycl. für Bibel und Talmud, p. 701, art. "Lohn und Strafe." There are noble rabbinical maxims on merit: e.g. "The reward of a commandment is a commandment (i.e. leads to the keeping of another commandment), and the wages of sin is sin" (Aboth, iv. 2); and by Antigonus of Soto (about 198 B.C.): "Be not as servants who serve their master to receive a reward, but be like servants who do not serve their master because of the reward: let the fear of heaven rule over you" (Aboth, i. 2). But there is nothing in the great collection of rabbinical dicta on the subject in the article referred to above which approaches ever so distantly to the spirit of Mt. xxii. 37–40; Rom. xiii. 10.

[1] Ps. xlix. 8 (in the Hebrew) may be quoted here, though it really speaks of redemption from temporal death: "Surely a brother cannot redeem a man; he cannot give to God an atonement for him; the ransom of his soul will be too precious, and he must let that be for ever."

[2] Tit. i.

while no corresponding change took place in things ecclesiastical; in such cases the name "metropolitan" ceased to be suitable, and was replaced by "archbishop."

In former times the power of metropolitans over their suffragans was great; they could hear and decide any charges made against them, and excommunicate them if they deemed it necessary. The Council of Trent reduced this power within strict limits. It enacted that criminal causes of a more serious kind, in which bishops were implicated, should be tried and decided only by the Supreme Pontiff, with the proviso, however, that if a previous local inquiry were necessary it should be committed to none but the metropolitans, or bishops specially delegated by the Holy See. The minor criminal causes of bishops are, under the same canon, to be tried by the provincial council or by persons deputed by it.[1]

Metropolitans cannot exercise ordinary jurisdiction in the dioceses of their suffragans, nor visit their cathedrals, or any portion of their dioceses, except on the mandate of the provincial council. Nor have they any jurisdiction, proprio jure, over monasteries situated within the dioceses of their suffragans.

On the rights, privileges, and dignities still annexed to the office of a metropolitan, see the article ARCHBISHOP. (Ferraris, Metropolitanus; Soglia, ii. 5, 49.)

MILITARY ORDERS. Hélyot enumerates between ninety and a hundred military orders. For the knights of CALATRAVA, the HOSPITALLERS, and the TEMPLARS, see those articles. For the knights of the Teutonic order, see MISSIONS TO THE HEATHEN, Thirteenth Century. Of the remainder, particulars respecting a few of the more important are here subjoined.

(1) Of Alcantara.—Founded in Castile in 1177; its object was the subjugation of the Moors. The knights wore a white mantle embroidered with a green cross. For a century after their institution they did great service to the Christian cause; in the fourteenth century, their quarrels with the knights of Calatrava, resulting in actual war, no less retarded and disgraced it. The order became extremely wealthy; the rents of the grand-mastership in the time of Ferdinand and Isabella amounted to forty-five thousand ducats.[2] Castles, towns, and convents belonging to this and the other military orders were seen in every part of Spain. The election to the office of grand-master, involving the disposal of large patronage and the wielding of great power and influence, became the cause of infinite jealousy and contention; and by a prudent decision of the Pope (1494) the control of the order was granted to Ferdinand and Isabella for life. In the reign of Philip II. the grand-mastership was annexed in perpetuity to the crown; the subordinate dignities, having survived the object for which they were instituted, became the empty decorations of an order of nobility.

(2) The Annunziata, or the Collar.—Instituted by Amadeus, Count of Savoy, about 1360.

(3) The Bath.—So named from one of the ceremonies of knighthood according to the custom of England. The esquire who was to be knighted was put into a bath; while he was in it two other esquires, experienced in chivalry and its laws, came to him, and after explaining the duties which knighthood would impose upon him, poured water upon his shoulders and so left him. After the bath he was taken into a chapel, and continued in prayer the whole night, "asking the Lord and his blessed Mother that of their worthy grace they would give him power and strength to receive this high temporal dignity in honour of their holy Church, and of the order of chivalry."[1] At daylight he confessed to a priest, and afterwards heard Mass. After the completion of the ceremony by the king's striking him on the collar with his right hand and saying "Be a good knight," he was led up to the altar, knelt, and, placing his right hand upon it, promised to maintain the right of Holy Church all his life long. Geoffrey of Anjou, the father of Henry II., is said to have been knighted in this manner by Henry I. in 1128.

The honours of the Order of the Bath, though its religious meaning is now lost, are highly prized in England to this day. The dignities are—Knight Grand Cross (G.C.B.), Knight Commander (K.C.B.), and Companion (C.B.) In each grade there is a military and a civil division. The ribbon is crimson; the motto, "Tria juncta in uno."

(4) Of Constantine.—This order seems to have been created by the Emperor Isaac Angelus Comnenus about 1190, probably in imitation of the orders among the Crusaders. Innumerable fictions and forgeries have been set on foot from time to time, in order to invest this and other military orders with the dignity of an antiquity to which they have no claim. Thus the order now in question, it was stoutly maintained, was first founded by Constantine the Great. In the opinion of Papebroch the Bollandist, no military order can prove that it originated before the twelfth century.

(5) The Dannebrog.—This Danish order, if it had a mediaeval origin at all, and was not, as Hélyot was inclined to suspect, manufactured in the seventeenth century, was founded by Waldemar II. about 1219. The number of knights must not exceed 19.

(6) The Garter.—Founded by Edward III. in 1347. According to the common story,

[1] Sess. xxiv. De Ref. c. 5.
[2] Prescott's Ferdinand and Isabella, i. 278.

[1] From Nicholas Upton's book, written about 1441, De Re Militari, as cited by Hélyot.

which, however, appears to have been unknown to Froissart, the Countess of Salisbury dropped her garter in the court at Windsor, which the king picked up and bound round his knee, and then, perceiving that the courtiers were inclined to laugh, said "Honi soit qui mal y pense." "Honi" is old French for maudit, accursed. The number of the knights, including the king, was fixed at twenty-six, and to this it was limited for several centuries. The number at the present time is forty-nine. The ancient dress was a blue mantle with a red cross on the left side, a collar whence depended a representation of St. George and the Dragon, called a "George" (cf. Shakespeare's "Now by my George, my garter, and my crown") and a blue garter round the left leg.

(7) The Glorious Virgin Mary.—Founded at Vicenza in 1233. The knights, who must be of noble blood, bound themselves (like a "vigilance committee" in modern times) to take up arms against the disturbers of the public peace, and against those who committed outrages and escaped punishment. They vowed conjugal chastity, obedience to their commander, and to protect widows and orphans. In course of time they became rich, and thought more of enjoying themselves than of anything else; whence the people called them in derision the "Joyous Brothers."

(8) The Golden Horseshoe.—Founded at Paris by a duke of Bourbon in 1414. Its object seems to have been to encourage duelling, since the seventeen knights of whom it was composed swore to fight with each other, on foot or à outrance, within two years, if they could not sooner find seventeen gentlemen outside the order who would fight with them.

(9) The Thistle.—Instituted by James V., King of Scotland, in 1534. The collar of the order is of thistles twisted together; from it hangs the badge of St. Andrew, with the motto "Nemo me impune lacessit." After the flight of Mary Stuart to England this institute fell into abeyance, but was revived by James II. at Windsor in 1687, when he made several great Scottish noblemen knights of the order. Again it came to nothing in consequence of the revolution of 1688, but was revived by Queen Anne in 1703, on a Protestant basis. The order, which numbers at present twenty knights, is accessible only to peers.

(10) The Toison d'Or, or Golden Fleece.—Instituted by Philip the Good, Duke of Burgundy, in 1429, with a distinctly religious and Catholic end. The original statutes say that out of the great and perfect love which Duke Philip had to the noble estate of chivalry, "in order that the true Catholic faith, the estate of Holy Church our mother, and the tranquillity and prosperity of the Commonwealth may be . . . defended, guarded, and maintained," he had instituted, and did institute, on that his wedding day, to the glory of God, in reverence of his blessed Mother, and in honour of the Apostle St. Andrew, "an order and fraternity of chivalry or amiable company of a certain number of knights . . . to be called the order of the Toison d'Or." Charles the Bold, son of the founder, required the knights to assume a magnificent dress of crimson velvet. The grandson of Charles, the Archduke Philip, marrying the heiress of Ferdinand and Isabella, transmitted the right of conferring the order of the Toison d'Or to the kings of Spain, who have ever since retained it. But the Emperor of Austria also claims the right. The figure of a sheep in gold, hung round the neck by a silken ribbon or a small gold chain, is the distinguishing decoration of the order.

In the long list of these military orders there are several which accomplished in their day real work, and work which could not have been accomplished so well by any other agency. When the organization of society as a whole was still imperfect, kings were glad to employ these partial organizations, in which the actuating principle was religious enthusiasm or love of fame, to check enemies abroad and abuses at home that otherwise could not easily have been reached. Yet it is impossible not to suspect that a large proportion of these institutions did more harm than good—by fostering aristocratic pride and exclusiveness, and pandering to social or personal vanity—thus raising barriers unnecessarily between class and class, and furnishing fuel to those smarting feelings of envy and alienation which are wont only to be appeased by revolution. (Hélyot.)

MILLENNIUM. In the Apocalypse (ch. xx.) it is said that, after the destruction of God's enemies, "the beast and the kings of the earth and their armies," with "the false prophet" and Satan himself, will be bound and cast into the pit. The saints are then to rise and reign with Christ a thousand years. At the end of this period Satan is to be loosed for a brief space. The nations deceived by him will gather against the "beloved city" in which the saints are encamped. Then fire will descend and devour the wicked; Satan will be cast for ever into hell, and the general judgment will take place. Many of the early Christians took this as a literal description of events which would occur at the end of the world's history. Those who held to such an interpretation were known as Chiliasts or Millenarians—i.e. believers in the reign of a thousand years. This belief was very common in the early Church. It was held by Papias, bishop of Hierapolis, early in the second century (Eusebius "H.E." iii. 39), by St. Justin Martyr ("Trypho," 81), by St. Irenaeus ("Adv. Haer." v. 36), by Lactantius ("Div. Inst." vii. 24), by Tertullian and Victorinus Petabionensis (see Jerome, "De Vir. Illustr." xviii., where he refers to a lost work of Tertullian). The opinion was, no doubt, Jewish in origin. (See Grabe, "Spicileg." vol. i. p. 231.) It was also held outside the Church in a gross and sensual form by the Judaizing Gnostic Cerinthus (Eusebius "H.E." iii. 28), and opposed by the Roman presbyter Caius (Euseb. loc. cit.). At Alexandria the allegorical mode of interpretation was of course unfavourable to Chiliasm. Still, even in the Alexandrian district, Nepos, bishop of Arsinoe, in the middle of the third century, was a vehement Millenarian. He wrote a "refutation of the Allegorists" (ἔλεγχος τῶν ἀλληγοριστῶν), directed particularly against Origen, and had a powerful following. Peace was restored by Dionysius of Alexandria, who held a council on the matter in 255. (See Eusebius, vii. 23, and Hefele-Leclercq, i. 193 sqq.). It was probably the fear of Millenarianism which partly occasioned the objections long prevalent in the East to the authority of the Apocalypse. After the establishment of Christianity, the belief in the reign of the saints for a thousand years almost died out. But St. Augustine ("Civ. Dei," xx. 7, PL, xli. 607 seq.) confesses that he once held it. It appeared from time to time in the Middle Ages, and is still advocated by some Protestants.

Muzzarelli (quoted by Jungmann, "De Novissimis," p. 303) sums up the common judgment of theologians on the subject. The theory as held by the early Fathers, he says, is not heretical, but, considering the weight of authority on the other side, it is at least improbable. (Franzelin "De Trad." 191.)

MINIMS (Ordo Minimorum Eremitarum Sancti Francisci de Paula). The name commonly applied to members of the order of Minim-Hermits, an austere order of mendicant friars founded by St. Francis of Paula. They were known in Paris before the Revolution as Bons Hommes—"Good Men"—because, as it is supposed, their convent in Paris had at one time belonged to the monks of Grand Mont, who had popularly been so called; and in Spain as "Brothers of Victory," on account of the victory which Ferdinand V. had gained at Malaga over the Moors as a result, according to the general belief, of the prayers of St. Francis of Paula. They were called "Minims" (minimi, the least, Mt. xxv. 40) by their founder, to humble them even below the Franciscans, who in humility call themselves minores(friars minor), the "less."

St. Francis, their founder, was born about 1416 in Calabria in Italy, at Paola, a small city on the western coast midway between Naples and Reggio. When a boy of thirteen, Francis was sent to a Franciscan convent in his native town, for he had already begun to display the extraordinary piety which gave indication of his future holy career. He showed a strong affection for the Franciscan rule, but it was not the will of God that he should become a member of that order. At nineteen he was living as a hermit in a solitary place near Paola, and the fame of his sanctity had already spread about in Calabria. Young as he was in years, his piety was so well assured that he was prevailed on, with the approbation of the ordinary of the diocese, to receive some disciples, and with them he began a religious community in Paola. In 1444 he established a colony at Paterno, and eight years later he finished on a more splendid scale his convent and church at Paola; the next year (1453) making a third establishment at Spezano Maggiore, and in 1460 founding still another convent at Cortona. So far the new religious order had been living without any rule, except such as their holy founder had from time to time given them by word of mouth and by the example of his own life. But from the first a perpetual Lent had been observed by them. In 1464 Francis founded the first house of his order in Sicily, at Milazzo, where he remained until his return to Calabria in 1468.

The fame of his sanctity having reached Rome, a strict examination was made into the history of his life and into the working of his communities, and in 1473 Pope Sixtus IV. approved the new congregation under the name of the "Hermits of St. Francis of Assisi." The following year Francis was named by the Holy See its first superior-general, and the congregation was exempted from the jurisdiction of the ordinaries. But Sixtus refused to sanction the perpetual Lent, though even this was afterwards accorded. In 1493 Francis composed his first Rule, which was approved by Pope Alexander VI., who changed the name of the order to the "Minim-Hermits of Francis of Paola," the name it has retained ever since. In 1495 the same Pope confirmed the privileges hitherto conferred on the order, also giving it all the privileges generally possessed by the mendicant friars. In 1501, having perfected his first Rule and having rearranged it, and having also established his perpetual Lent as a vow, and having prepared a Rule for people of either sex who live in the world—that is to say, Tertiaries—he submitted these two Rules to the Pope, who approved them the next year (1502). The Rules, being again modified, were confirmed by a bull of Alexander VI. which conferred new privileges; all of which was again confirmed in 1505 by Pope Julius II. Finally, the holy founder having put the finishing touch to his two Rules, and having added a third Rule for nuns, all three were approved and confirmed by a bull of the same Pope July 25, 1506. Besides these three Rules Francis composed a Correctorium, or manual of penances, and a Ceremonial for the recitation of the Divine Office, &c.

Francis was invited to France by Louis XI., whom he attended on his deathbed; and there he spent the rest of his days, founding numerous communities in France, Spain, Italy, and Germany. The first colony in Spain was made at Malaga in 1493; in Germany in 1497. The order was never established in the North of Europe, nor in England, Scotland, or Ireland, for the persecution which soon set in in all those countries rendered them unfit fields for so contemplative an order as the Minims. St. Francis died in his convent at Plessis-les-Tours, Good Friday, 1507, being then ninety-one, and was canonized by Leo X. in 1519. In 1562 the Huguenots, while sacking this convent, found the saint's body, and, having fastened a rope about its neck, dragged it to the chapel, where they burned it along with the crucifix of the high altar, but some Catholics afterwards recovered the saint's bones from the ashes.

On January 1, 1508, Father Francis Binet was elected general. At that time the order was divided into five provinces—Italy, Tours, France, Spain, and Germany—but it afterwards had thirty-one provinces. At first the general of the order was chosen for three years, but since 1605 he has always been elected for six years by the general chapter, which consists of the general, the colleagues-general, the provincial, and the procurator-general. Each province has its chapter also. The superior of a convent is called the corrector, because he is required to correct himself and those subject to him, and he is elected for one year, ordinarily not being eligible for re-election except after an interval of at least one year. Formerly there were visitors-general, but these were suppressed as unnecessary.

Like many other mendicant orders, the Minims consist of First, Second, and Third Orders so called—that is to say, of friars, nuns, and tertiaries, these latter being affiliated lay people living in the world. The Minim tertiaries never but once, and that for a short time only—at Toledo, in Spain—have lived in community. St. Francis of Sales is said to have been a Minim tertiary. The first nuns of the order took their vows in 1495 at Andujar, in Spain. The habit of the Minim friars consists of a gown of coarse woollen stuff, reaching to the ankles, and of the natural colour of the wool without any dye. The chaperon, or shoulder-piece of the cowl, of the same colour as the gown, reaches in front to about halfway between the waist and the knee. The girdle is a woollen, unbleached and undyed rope, and has five knots for the clerical and lay friars and four for the tertiaries. Formerly the Minims were barefoot, or at most wore sandals; but the custom was relaxed, and now all are shod. With the exception of the head-dress, which resembles that worn by most orders of nuns, the habit of the Minim nuns is similar to that of the friars. (See "Acta Sanctorum," April 2; Butler, "Lives of the Saints," April 2; Heimbucher, "Die Orden und Kongr. der Kath. Kirche," ii. 527.)

MINISTER. Among the Franciscans and Capuchins the head of the order is the minister-general, and each province is placed under a minister-provincial. In the Society of Jesus the second in command in each house, who is usually charged with the internal discipline, commissariat, &c., is called "minister."

MINISTERS OF THE SICK. This order was first founded as a congregation of priests and lay brothers by St. Camillus of Lellis to serve the sick in hospitals. The approval of the Holy See was given in 1586; five years later Gregory XIV. constituted them a religious order, under the protection of Cardinal di Mondovi, with their principal establishment at the Church of St. Mary Magdalen at Rome and in the houses adjoining. The religious, besides the three ordinary vows, take a fourth vow to assist the sick in the hour of death. There is a general of the order elected for life, who is assisted by four consultors; the chapter-general meets once in six years. The dress is that of secular priests, with the addition of a large brown cross on the soutane, and another on the cloak. The noviciate lasts for two years; the religious are exempt from the obligation of singing office in choir, and from attending processions, on account of the absorbing nature of their duties beside the sick. They only fast on Fridays, in addition to the fasts prescribed by the Church. At the death of the founder in 1614, there were sixteen houses of the order, containing about three hundred religious. (Hélyot.)

MINORITES. [See FRANCISCANS.]

MINOR ORDERS. The inferior ranks of the sacred ministry—door-keepers (ostiarii), lectors, exorcists, and acolytes—are said to be in minor orders (see those articles). In the Greek Church there are only two minor orders, lector and subdeacon. Originally, when a man became a clerk, he was irrevocably attached to the service of the Church (Con. Chalced., can. 7), but since the thirteenth century the Latin Church allows simple clerks, below the dignity of subdeacon, to quit the ecclesiastical profession if they so desire. (See ORDER, HOLY, p. 626; Ferraris.)

MIRACLES. The Latin word miraculum means something wonderful—not necessarily supernatural, for, e.g., the "Seven Wonders of the World" were known as the "Septem Miracula." In theological Latin, however, and in English, the words miraculum, "miracle," are used commonly only of events so wonderful that they cannot be accounted for by natural causes. This use, as we shall see presently, is not sanctioned by the Vulgate translation of the New Testament, and is not thoroughly supported by the language of the original Greek. It has its disadvantages as well as its advantages, though, of course, the established terminology cannot be altered now, even if it were possible—as we believe it is not—to find a more convenient word. It will be well, however, to say something on the Scriptural, and particularly the New Testament, phraseology.

(1) Miracles are called τέρατα (prodigia). See Exod. iv. 21, where it is the rendering of מוֹפְתִים, shining or splendid deeds)—i.e. prodigies, because of the surprise they cause. The Greek word θαυμάσια, which would exactly answer to miracula, is found in the New Testament once only (θαῦμα never[1]), Mt. xxi. 15; and there in a wider sense than "miracle." There is no great difference, from a theological point of view, between the words "prodigy" and "miracle." It is, however, well worth notice that the New Testament never uses the word "prodigy" by itself. It speaks of "signs and prodigies," &c., many times; of "prodigies" simply, never. Evidently, the wonder caused is not the only or even the chief feature in a miracle, and this the New Testament writers are careful to note.[2]

(2) Miracles are also frequently called "signs" (σημεῖα; an accurate rendering of אוֹתוֹת Ex. vii. 3), to indicate their purpose. They are "marvels" and "prodigies" which arouse attention, but the "wonder" excited is a means, and not an end, and the "miracle" is a token of God's presence; they confirm the mission and the teaching of those who deliver a message in His name (see Acts xiv. 3; Heb. ii. 4), and they are object-lessons (parables in action) of that teaching. Of course, it is only by usage that the word "sign" acquires this technical sense, and it does not always in the New Testament mean a supernatural sign.

(3) They are often described as "powers" (δυνάμεις),[3] inasmuch as they exhibit God's power. They are evidences that new powers have entered our world and are working thus for the good of mankind. God, no doubt, is always working, and He manifests His power in the operation of natural law. But we are in danger of looking upon the world as if it were governed by laws independent of God, and of forgetting that His hand is as necessary in each moment of the world's existence for each operation of created things as it was for creation at the first. In a miracle, God produces sensible effects which transcend the operation of natural causes. Men are no longer able to say, "This is Nature," forgetting all the while that Nature is the continuous work of God; and they confess, "The finger of God is here." In Christ, miracles were the "powers" or works of power done by Him who was Himself the power of God. And so miracles done through the saints flow from, and are signs of, the power of God within them. "Stephen, full of grace and power, did great prodigies and signs among the people" (Acts vi. 8).

(4) Christ's miracles are often called emphatically His "works," as if the form of working to be looked for from Him in whom the "fulness of the Godhead dwelt bodily." They were the characteristic works of Him who came to free us from the bondage of Nature, to be our life, to overcome death, to lead us, first to a worthier and more unselfish life, and then to a better world in which sorrow and death shall be no more. They are the first-fruits of his power; the pledges of that mighty working by which, one day, He will subject all things to Himself and make all things new.

From a different point of view, then, the same event is a "prodigy" (effect), a "sign" (purpose), and a "power" (cause); each word presenting it under a distinct and instructive aspect. The three words occur three times together—viz. in Acts ii. 22; 2 Cor. xii. 12; 2 Thess. ii. 9 (in the last passage, of the false miracles of Antichrist). In each case the Vulgate has kept the distinction with accurate and delicate fidelity (virtutibus, et prodigiis, et signis), and we cannot help expressing our regret that the Rheims version, and also the Protestant Authorized Version, should have obliterated the distinction and blunted the sense of Scripture by translating —e.g. Acts ii. 22—"by miracles and wonders and signs," as if "wonder" added anything to "miracle."[1]

We cannot pretend to consider here, in full, the objections made to the possibility of miracles, but can only give in brief the teaching of Catholic theologians, and particularly of St. Thomas, on the matter. The latter defines a miracle as an effect which "is beyond the order (or laws) of the whole of created nature"— "praeter ordinem totius naturae creatae" (1ª, q. 110, a. 4). He explains further that an event may transcend the laws of some particular nature and yet by no means be miraculous. The motion of a stone when thrown up in the air, to take his own instance, is an effect which exceeds the power which resides in the nature of the stone; but it is no miracle, for it is produced by the natural power of man, and does not therefore exceed the power of nature in its entirety. No natural law can account for the [3] גְּבוּרוֹת "deeds of strength," is the Old Testament word which comes nearest δυνάμεις, and the Peshito has almost the same word, ܚܝܠܐ, but it is used, very inaccurately, for σημεῖα (Acts ii. 19, 43; v. 12; 2 Cor. xii. 12), for τέρατα (Acts xv. 12), for τέρατα καὶ σημεῖα (Acts ii. 22; iv. 30). In Acts vii. 36 there are three Syriac terms for two Greek. The text of the Peshito before us is that of Leusden and Schaaf.

sun's going back on the dial of Ahaz, for the resurrection of Lazarus, or for the cure of Peter's wife's mother by Christ when she was sick of a fever. All these things exceeded the powers of Nature, though in different degrees, and they are instances of the three grades of the miraculous which St. Thomas distinguishes (1ª, q. 105, a. 8). In the first case, the very substance of the thing done is beyond the power of Nature to effect ("excedit facultatem naturae, quantum ad substantiam facti"); in the second, the recipient of the effect stamps it as miraculous ("excedit facultatem naturae, quantum ad id in quo fit"), since natural powers can indeed give life, but not to the dead; in the third, it is the manner and order in which the effect is produced ("modus et ordo faciendi") that is miraculous, for the instantaneous cure of disease by Christ's word is very different from a cure effected by the gradual operation of care and medical treatment. The latter is natural, the former supernatural.

The definition given makes it unreasonable to deny the possibility of miracles, unless we also deny the existence of God. Usually, He works according to natural laws, and this for our good, since we should be unable to control natural agents and to make them serve us unless we could count on the effects known causes will produce. But God is necessarily free; He is not subject to natural laws, and He may, for wise reasons, make created things the instruments of effects which are beyond their natural capacity. A miracle is not an effect without a cause; on the contrary, it is a miracle because produced by God, the First Cause. It is not a capricious exercise of power. The same God who operates usually, and for wise ends, according to the laws which He has implanted in Nature, may on occasion, and for ends equally wise, produce effects which transcend these laws. Nor does God in working miracles contradict Himself, for where has He bound Himself never and for no reason to operate except according to these laws?

It is also clear from the definition given that God alone can work miracles. "Whatever an angel or any other creature does by his own power is according to the order of created nature," and therefore not miraculous according to the definition with which we started (1ª, q. 110, a. 4). It is quite permissible to speak of saints or angels as working miracles; indeed, Scripture itself does so speak. Still, we must always understand that God alone really performs the wonder, and that the creature is merely His instrument. Hence it follows that no miracle can possibly be wrought except for a good purpose. It does not, however, follow that persons through whose instrumentality miracles occur are good and holy. St. Thomas, quoting St. Jerome, holds that evil men who preach the faith and call on Christ's name may perform true miracles, the object of these miracles being to confirm the truths which these unworthy persons utter and the cause which they represent.[1] Thus the gift of miracles is in itself no proof of holiness. But, as a rule, miracles are effected by holy men and women, and very often they are the signs by which God attests their sanctity and the power of their prayer (2ª, 2æ, q. 178, a. 2). In all these cases, the miracle is a sign of God's will, and cannot, except through our own perversity, lead us into error.

It is otherwise with the "lying wonders" which, St. Paul says, Antichrist will work, or which Pharaoh's magicians are supposed by some to have done by the help of devils. Real miracles these cannot be, for God, who is the very truth, cannot work wonders to lead His creatures into error. But the demons, according to St. Thomas, are so far beyond us in knowledge and strength that they may well work marvels which would exceed all natural powers, so far as we know them, and would seem to us superior to any natural power whatsoever, and so to be truly miraculous (1ª, q. 114, a. 4). True miracles, then, are practically distinguished from false ones by their moral character. They are not mere marvels, meant to gratify the curiosity of the spectator and the vanity of the performer. They are signs of God's presence; they bring us nearer to Him with whom "we ever have to do"; they remind us that we are to be holy as He is holy, to cultivate humility, purity, the love of God and man. The doctrine which they confirm must appeal to us, apart from its miraculous attestation. "Jesus answered them and said, My doctrine is not mine, but His who sent me. If any man will do His will, he will know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether I speak from myself. He who speaketh of himself seeketh his own glory, but he that seeketh the glory of Him that sent him, he is true, and injustice is not in him" (Jn. vii. 16). So our Lord appeals, in answering John's disciples, to his miracles, not simply as works of power, but as stamped with a moral character, and in their connection with the rest of His work. "Blind see again and lame walk, lepers are cleansed, and deaf hear, and corpses are raised, and the poor have the Gospel preached to them; and blessed is he whosoever shall not be scandalized in me" (Mt. xi. 5 seq.). In short, there was a witness within, as well as without, to Christ's mission, and the miracles had no voice for those who were deaf to the voice within. Because they were deaf to this voice within, the Pharisees ascribed Christ's miracles to Beelzebub. They blasphemed, or were in danger of blaspheming, the Holy Ghost who spoke to their hearts. And precisely the same danger which made men reject Christ's miracles will make them accept the marvels of Antichrist.

So far, many Protestants are with us; but whereas most of them consider that miracles ceased with, or soon after, the Apostolic age, the Catholic Church, not, indeed, so far as we know, by any formal definition, but by her constant practice in the canonization of saints, and through the teaching of her theologians, declares that the gift of miracles is an abiding one, manifested from time to time in her midst. This belief is logical and consistent. Miracles are as possible now as they were nineteen centuries ago. They were wrought throughout the course of the old dispensation and by the Apostles after Christ's death; and although miracles, no doubt, were specially needed, and therefore more numerous, when Christianity was a new religion, we have no right to dictate to the All-wise, and maintain that they have ceased to be required at all. Heathen nations have still to be converted. Great saints are raised up in different ages to renew the fervour of Christians and turn the hearts of the disobedient to the wisdom of the just. The only reasonable course is to examine the evidence for modern miracles when it presents itself, and to give or withhold belief accordingly. This is just what the Church does. The Anglican Bishop Fitzgerald, at the end of a most thoughtful and useful essay on "Miracles" in Smith's "Bible Dictionary," asserts that, according to the confession of their ablest advocates, ecclesiastical miracles belong to the class "of miracles which may be described as ambiguous and tentative—i.e. the event, if it occurred at all, may have been the result of natural causes." Then, indeed, the question would be at an end. But anyone who looks into Benedict XIV.'s treatise on "Canonization," or into Cardinal Newman's "Lectures on Anglican Difficulties," will see what an extraordinary mistake this is. This able writer is wasting words and exposing the weakness of his own cause when he argues that the course of Nature cannot be interrupted "by random and capricious variation," that strong evidence is needed to make supposed miracles credible, and that the true miracles of Christianity at its birth may have occasioned spurious imitations of fanatical credulity. All this may be admitted, but it does not touch the question. And when Dr. Fitzgerald rests the belief in miracles upon the authority of inspired writers, and urges that there is no such authority for ecclesiastical miracles, he forgets that the first Christians must have believed the miracles of Christ and the Apostles before any inspired record of them had been made. In many cases, too, the belief in Apostolic miracles must have come first, that in Apostolic inspiration second.

It must be observed, however, that ecclesiastical and Scriptural miracles claim widely different kinds of belief. The Scriptural miracles rest on divine faith, and must be accepted without doubt. (Vatican Council, sess. iii. cap. 3, can. 4.) No ecclesiastical miracle can become the object of faith, nor is any Catholic bound to believe in any particular miracle not recorded in Scripture. He could not, without unsoundness in doctrine, deny that any miracles had occurred since the Apostolic age, and he owes a filial respect to the judgment of high ecclesiastical authority; but within these limits he is left to the freedom and to the responsibilities of private judgment.

Lastly, although there is a danger in incredulity, even when this incredulity does not amount to abandonment of the faith, Catholic saints and doctors have insisted on the opposite danger of credulity. To attribute false miracles, says St. Peter Damian, to God or His saints, is to bear false witness against them; and he reminds those who estimate sanctity by miraculous power that nothing is read of miracles done by the Blessed Virgin or St. John Baptist, eminent as they were in sanctity, and that the virtues of the saints which we can copy are more useful than miracles which excite our wonder (Fleury, "H.E." lxi. 2). Neander ("Kirchengeschichte," viii. p. 26 seq.), after speaking of the popular taste for legendary miracles in the Middle Ages, continues: "Men were not wanting to contend against this spirit, and a catena of testimonies may be produced from the twelfth and thirteenth centuries on the true significance of the miraculous in relation to the divine life, and against an exaggerated estimation of external miracles. Nor were such thoughts peculiar to enlightened men who rose above their age; they may be taken as an expression of the common Christian feeling in those centuries." The mediaeval biographer of Bernard of Tiron says that for the conversions of fallen women which he effected through God's grace he was more to be admired than if he had raised their dead bodies to life. And the biographer of St. Norbert writes: "It is the visible miracles which astonish the simple and ignorant, but it is the patience and virtues of the saints which are to be admired and imitated by those who gird themselves to Christ's service." (See the references in Neander, loc. cit.)

(St. Thomas, "Contra Gentiles," iii. 98–107. On the subject of miracles generally, Archbishop Trench's dissertation at the beginning of his "Notes on the Miracles" may be consulted. It is specially valuable for its Patristic references. The opinions of the Schoolmen on the nature of miracles are well given by Neander, vol. viii. p. 26 of the last German edition. Cardinal Newman's "Essay on Ecclesiastical Miracles" is well known; Leroy, "La Contestation du Miracle"; G. H. Joyce, "The Question of Miracles," an admirable little work which goes thoroughly into the subject.)

MISERERE. The first word in the Vulgate translation of Ps. 50 (Heb. 51). There are two other psalms beginning with the same word "Miserere" (55 and 56), but the liturgical use of Ps. 50 is so prominent that the name has been appropriated to Ps. 50. Formerly it was the first psalm at Lauds in all the ferial offices throughout the year (Paschal tide excluded), and also in the Sunday office from Septuagesima to Palm Sunday; but in the new reformed psalter it is recited "in vigiliis communibus," in the ferial office at Lauds during Advent and during the period Septuagesima to Holy Week, and on the Sundays as before. Moreover, it is no longer recited in the preces feriales at Vespers as was formerly the case. It retains, however, its position at the end of the hours (before the prayer) on the last three days of Holy Week.

The "Miserere" is the fourth of the Penitential Psalms (q.v.) and occurs in many ceremonial functions of the Church; e.g. the burial of the dead, at various blessings and consecrations &c. (For the famous musical settings of the "Miserere" in the Tenebrae offices see Wiseman, "Holy Week," lect. ii., and Rockstro in Grove's "Dict. of Music," Miserere. For the psalm itself see B. John Fisher, "The Seven Penitential Psalms"; McSwiney, "Translation of the Psalms and Canticles, with Commentary.")

MISSAL. The book which contains the complete service for Mass throughout the year.

In the ancient Church there was no one book answering to our Missal. The service for Mass was contained in the Antiphonary, Lectionary, Book of the Gospels, and Sacramentary. This last, besides matter relating to other sacraments, gave the collects, secrets, prefaces, canon, prayer infra canonem, and post-communion, and from the eighth century at latest it was known as Missal or Mass-book. There were "Completa Missalia"—i.e. Missals which contained more of the service of the Mass than the Sacramentaries; but we do not know how far this completeness went, for "during the ages which intervened between the use of the Liber Sacramentorum and the general adoption of the complete book of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, the Missal was in a transition state, sometimes containing more, sometimes less of the entire office. Thus the MSS. which still exist vary in their contents" (Maskell, "Monumenta Rit." p. lxiii. seq.).[1] There are, of course, printed Missals according to the various rites—Missale Romanum, Ambrosianum, Missale ad usum Sarum (first printed edition known, Paris, 1487), and the various uses of religious orders (Dominicans, Benedictines, &c.). The Roman Missal was carefully revised and printed under Pius V., who carried out a decree of the Council of Trent on the matter, and strictly enjoined the use of this Missal, or faithful reprints of it, in all churches which could not claim prescription of two hundred years for their own use. It was revised again under Clement VIII. and Urban VIII. New Masses have of course been added from time to time, and to the Missal, as to the Breviary, a "Proper" may be added by permission of the Holy See, containing Masses for the saints venerated in a particular country, diocese, order, &c. (See MASS; Ebner, "Quellen und Forschungen zur Gesch. und Kunstgesch. des Missale Rom. im Mittelalter"; Lippe and Legg, "The Missale Rom. of 1474"; Thurston in "Cath. Enc.")

MISSION. Mission is inseparably connected with jurisdiction, so that he who is validly "sent" exercises a lawful jurisdiction in the place to which, and over the persons to whom, he is sent; and, e converso, any person exercising a lawful jurisdiction must be held to have received true mission. Mission precedes jurisdiction in the order of thought, but is coincident with it in practice.

A priest having the care of souls within a certain district must be sent to that district by the bishop, who has the general charge of all the souls within his diocese; he cannot appoint himself to it. "How shall they preach unless they be sent?"[1] In a parish properly so called there may be more priests than one engaged in ministerial functions, but one alone has the responsibility, as the curatus, of the souls within it. He has ordinary, not delegated faculties; other priests ministering within his parish have not ordinary faculties. In missions, as here in England, the head priest and the others usually differ only in this, that the latter receive their faculties to be exercised "cum dependentia" of the former. Priests, even parish priests, are not now held to have jurisdiction in the external forum (Soglia, ii. § 86), but only in the internal. [FORUM, &c.]

Again, the bishop from whom the mission of the parochus is derived does not assume his pastoral office of his own authority; still less, in consequence of a call from his flock; his recognition or confirmation, if not actual election, by the Pope as the successor of St. Peter constitutes his mission and the title of his jurisdiction. The mission of the Pope himself is from above, and rests on the divine promises, clearly expressed as they are in Holy Scripture, and certified by the tradition of the Church. [CHURCH OF CHRIST; POPE.]

"The mission of the priest," says Bendel,[2] "has its prototype in that of Jesus Christ: 'As my Father hath sent me, so send I you.' Jesus Christ was sent into the world to seek all the souls which were lost; the Apostles were sent by Jesus Christ to all parts of the earth to continue His work in His name; the successors of the Apostles, without any break in the chain, are sent by the Church to fulfil their charge, and these send in their turn the confessors and pastors delegated by them to spread the beams of grace from the centre to the extremities, and cause every soul which desires it to participate in the benefits of their ministry." . . . . "The Church is the visible institute of salvation among men; through her alone power is given to the priest, by mission, to announce in the virtue of the Holy Ghost the word of God, as it has been all along preserved incorrupt by her, to transmit to the faithful the graces of which, through the merits of Christ, she is the depositary, and to direct them in the way of salvation in virtue of the sovereign authority which she represents. He who is not legitimately sent cannot be, in the full force of the words, 'a minister of the Church having charge of souls.'"

In non-Catholic denominations the mission to a particular locality usually proceeds from the governing body, such as the General Assembly in the Kirk of Scotland, or the Conference of a hundred ministers among the Wesleyans. But if it be asked whence such governing bodies derived their mission, it is invariably found that they derived it in the first instance from some heresiarch or other self-appointed individual, who made a breach in ecclesiastical unity, or else made a fresh schism in that which was itself a schism. Thus mission among the Presbyterians has Calvin and among the Methodists Wesley, for its fountain-head. In the Anglican Church mission is derived ostensibly from the Crown, which claims to be "in all causes and over all persons, ecclesiastical and civil," within the British Empire "supreme." Every bishop, on doing homage for his see to the sovereign, has to say, "I do acknowledge and confess to have and hold the bishopric of it, and the possession of the same entirely, as well the spiritualities as the temporalities thereof, only of your Majesty, and of the Imperial Crown of this your Majesty's realm." [1] Those who find this view too Erastian hold that mission is conferred along with consecration, in which case Anglican mission must be ultimately derived from Parker, Elizabeth's first bishop, who made a breach in ecclesiastical unity. [See JURISDICTION.]

MISSION (=quasi-parish). In countries where the majority of the population is non-Catholic, either through having lost the faith or not having yet been converted to it, the priests having charge of souls are not inducted into parishes, but stationed on missions. In England, after the change of religion, many such missions were entrusted to members of religious orders, which enjoyed in a normal state of things various privileges and exemptions. This led to a conflict of jurisdiction between the monastic superiors and the vicars-apostolic, and it was finally decided by Benedict XIV. that "regular missionaries in England are subject to the vicars-apostolic in all that concerns the care of souls and the administration of the sacraments," [1] notwithstanding the privileges of their orders. In what relates to the observance of their rule they are subject to their monastic superiors. Leo XIII. issued in 1881 the constitution Romanos Pontifices, which makes further regulations on the subject. Since the establishment of the hierarchy in England in 1850 the priests with quasi-parishes still remain mere missioners, removable at the bishop's will, with the exception of "missionary rectors" permanently instituted (see Acts of Prov. Council of Westm. I. App.), who, in virtue of decrees of Propaganda and synodal statutes confirmed by the Holy See, hold certain rights and privileges. But the status of missionary rectors and other rectors has lately been modified by the decree "Maxima Cura." [See RECTOR.] (Ferraris, Missiones; Missionarii; Taunton.)

MISSION OF DIVINE PERSONS. [See TRINITY, D, 5.]

MISSIONS, POPULAR. To quicken faith and piety among Christians whom their life in the world has made tepid and careless, is for the pastors of the Church an object of no less solicitude than to convert the heathen. In substance, mission-preaching has been employed in every age of the Church; it was applied with extraordinary fruit by St. Francis and St. Dominic; but its reduction to a system has been the work of comparatively recent times, and was commenced by St. Vincent of Paul, when (1617) he preached his first mission to the peasants of Folleville. [See LAZARISTS.] The Jesuits, Redemptorists, Passionists, and Rosminians have applied themselves with special earnestness to this branch of pastoral work (see those articles). The following sketch of a mission and of its fruits is from an article by Stemmer.[2] "A popular mission consists in a series of sermons and religious exercises, lasting over a certain number of days, directed by missionary priests with the approbation of the ordinary, in order to instruct and convert sinners, and rekindle Christian faith and Christian practice. This series or cycle of meditations, devotional exercises, and addresses, the general aim of which is to excite penitential feelings, treats of the destiny and end of man, of free will, of the need of grace, of the divine justice, eternity, the necessity of conversion, the heinousness of sin, its consequences, and the misery of impenitence; of the last things—hell, eternal punishment, and damnation. Together with these terrifying themes the preacher speaks of the mercy and love of God, the graces stored up in the Church, the sacraments of Penance and the Eucharist; usually also of loving our enemies, Holy Communion, the renewal of baptismal vows, and perseverance in doing good. In this way the sinner is brought to contrition, whence come hope and a moral change." After describing the availableness at this stage of the tribunal of Penance, the writer proceeds: "The mission is usually terminated by the renewal of baptismal vows," a general communion," the dedication of the parish to the Blessed Virgin, promises of amendment and thanksgiving before the altar, the erection of a cross or stations, the solemn publication of the indulgence attached to the mission, and the celebration of Mass for the souls of the relatives and friends of the faithful present. Thus do the few days devoted to a true popular mission, with all the truths which it proclaims, all the acts which it disposes to and realises, form a real source of benediction to the souls that are willing to profit by it. It is a work of teaching and conversion which undeceives those who are misled, convinces those who doubt, shakes the indifferent in their false security, and stops hardened sinners in full career; it is an extraordinary weapon with which falsehood and error are attacked directly, boldly, and persistently, to the destruction of erroneous systems and the triumphant erection of truth on their ruins. Deep-seated prejudices and inveterate faults, though attacked at intervals from the pulpit, always find some corner in the heart where they can hide themselves and hold their ground; but the man who attends a mission meets an assailant who deals blow after blow until the conviction of the enormity of his blindness and of his faults is forced upon the hearer's conscience. Ill-gotten gains are renounced, guilty practices and criminal connections are broken off, hatreds of old standing are appeased, separated couples reconciled, lawsuits amicably settled; the converted sinners show a change of conduct, and the face of family and parochial life is altered; through the whole district human existence is modified for the better; sanctification spreads; and where unbelief, immorality, discord, disobedience, and antipathy formerly prevailed, the serenity of Christian faith is now established, with union, love, and the peace of God."

MISSIONS TO THE HEATHEN. The kingdom of God, beginning as a grain of mustard seed nearly nineteen hundred years ago, has grown into a great tree; the stages of its growth are here briefly noticed.

The multitude collected at Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost, from whom the first converts for the Christian faith were gathered, belonged for the most part to countries bordering on the Levant or lying still further east. They came from Persia, Mesopotamia, Asia Minor, Arabia, and North Africa; some were from Crete; the only western country indicated is Italy. These converts, when they returned to their homes, must have spread Christian belief around them. The seed thus sown needed tending; and the traditions as to the teaching of the Apostles, which tell us that the labours of most of them were confined to these very Eastern countries, are therefore in strict accordance with the report in Acts ii. St. Thomas, according to a probable tradition, visited India, and founded there the Christian community which still bears his name. The legend that St. James, the son of Zebedee, passed into Spain and founded a Church at Santiago in Galicia, is of little authority.[1] It must have been regarded in the Apostolic circle as a momentous step when St. Paul (Acts xvi. 6–10), crossing the Hellespont, carried the light of Christianity into Europe. St. Peter, after residing for some time at Antioch, fixed his see about A.D. 42 at Rome, which from that time became the centre of Christendom. But the full bearing and import of his primacy were only gradually discerned in the Church; and the Apostolic sees of Alexandria and Antioch, with, later on, Constantinople and Jerusalem, and generally the greater sees, acted as powerful secondary centres to diffuse the faith among the neighbouring countries. In Macedonia, at Athens and Corinth, and in Grecce generally, Christianity was planted by St. Paul. A very ancient legend carries Lazarus and his sister Martha to the South of France, near Marseilles. A beautiful tradition, not however older than the Middle Ages, speaks of Joseph of Arimathea as visiting Britain and founding a flourishing Church at Glastonbury.

The preaching of the Gospel made its way through the Roman empire even during the lifetime of the Apostles. The work of the centuries which immediately followed was to consolidate and develop what they had begun. In spite of the terrible persecutions (see PERSECUTIONS) to which the Church was subjected, she continued to add to her numbers. By the end of the second century Tertullian could say: "We are but of yesterday. Yet we have filled all the places you frequent—cities, lodging-houses, villages, townships, markets, the camp itself, the tribes, town councils, the palace, the senate, the forum. We have left you nothing but your temples." (Apol. xxxvii., PL, i. 462.) And again: "On whom else have all the nations of the world believed but on the Christ who has already come? [After quoting Acts ii. 9 sqq.] With others as well as the different races of the Gaetuli, many of the tribes of the Mauri, all the confines of Spain, and various tribes of Gaul, with places in Britain which, though inaccessible to Rome, have yielded to Christ. unknown to us, which we are unable to enumerate." ("Adv. Jud." vii., PL, ii. 610.) "As for the stages of the mission and its history, the outstanding revivals subsequent to the life and labours of Paul are denoted by (1) the era of Commodus and his immediate successors, and (2) by the years 260–303 A.D. In both of these periods, particularly the latter, it is obvious that a large increase accrued to Christianity. The earliest period laid the foundation. House churches and town churches were established. The second period (subsequent to Commodus) saw Christianity a serious factor in the provinces and throughout the empire. In the third period it was prepared, as a universal religion, to assume control over the entire sphere of public religion" (Harnack, "Mission and Expansion of Christianity," ii. 31). To this work the reader may be referred for the study of the missions of the first three centuries The maps are especially valuable.

The next stage in the history of missions is the conversion of the different races of barbarians who overran the Roman empire in the fifth and the succeeding centuries. It was the Goths who were the first of the barbarians to catch something of Roman manners and culture, and they were the first to embrace Christianity. As early as the Council of Nicaea we find the Gothic bishop Theophilus taking his place beside the Greek Fathers. A little later another Goth, Ulphilas, was consecrated at Constantinople, and laboured with great success in spreading Christianity among his countrymen, though in the heretical form of Arianism. He belonged to the Visigothic or Western branch of that race, and they communicated the heresy to the Ostrogothic or Eastern branch. The Visigoths, driven out of Gaul by the Catholic Franks, founded a powerful kingdom in Spain, and were converted to Catholicity in 587 under King Recared.

Like the Visigoths, the Vandals found their way into Spain at the beginning of the fifth century, but they passed over to North Africa, and took possession of Hippo and Carthage. Like the Goths, they were Arians. During the long reign of Genseric (428–477) a fierce persecution raged against the Catholics, especially the bishops and the nobles. The once-flourishing church of Tertullian, Cyprian, and Augustine was destroyed. The persecution continued under Genseric's successor until the Vandal kingdom was overthrown by Belisarius (533). For the conversion of the Irish and the Anglo-Saxons see IRISH CHURCH, ENGLISH CHURCH (Anglo-Saxon period). The Franks, who, under Clovis, had invaded Gaul from beyond the Rhine and destroyed every vestige of Roman domination, embraced Christianity along with their king in 496, after his great victory over the Alemanni.

The Burgundians, a Teutonic people, in alarm at the approach of the Huns, sought instruction in Christianity from the Romanized Gauls among whom they had settled; and having obtained it and embraced the faith, they defeated the invaders (about 439). They were, however, perverted to Arianism by the Visigoths. The conquest of Burgundy by the Franks finally destroyed the last remains of Arianism among them. Germany, like Britain, had received Christianity while still under Roman rule. The inroad of the Huns had first driven the Goths into the Roman provinces, and then destroyed whatever these barbarians had left. When the Huns had retired, the work of reconversion was first conducted by the Frankish saints Rupert, Emmeran, and Corbinian. In the early part of the seventh century Irish monks from Iona (St. Columba and St. Gall) laboured first among the Franks, and then worked their way as far as the Vosges. Thence they penetrated into Switzerland and Northern Italy. Another Irishman, Trudbert, evangelized the region of the Black Forest; and a little later, Killian, also an Irishman, laboured in Thuringia. In Northern Germany and Frisia the work of the Gospel was at first carried on by the Franks, but towards the end of the century it was taken up by Anglo-Saxon missionaries. St. Wilfrid of York preached there for a time, but it was his disciple St. Willibrord who was the true apostle of the Frieslanders. Though all these saints are held in veneration in different parts of Germany, the Germans as a whole look upon St. Boniface as the national patron. He was born in Devonshire about the year 680, and was originally known as Wynfrith. After nearly forty years of missionary labours he was martyred in Frisia in 755.

The last of the Teutonic tribes to embrace Christianity were the Saxons. Hatred of the Franks was partly the reason for refusing to listen to the missionaries, and indeed it was only by force that they were finally converted. During the long war of 772–804 Charlemagne compelled his captives to receive baptism, and removed them from their own country so as to plant them among Christian tribes. Alcuin of York, the emperor's preceptor, protested against this violence, and obtained that devout missionaries should be sent to instruct the nominal converts. When once the work of conversion was complete, the Saxons yielded to no other Germans in their zeal for the Christian faith.

The missionary efforts of the Church were now mainly directed to the rough Scandinavian north, and to the Slavonic peoples which everywhere bordered on the German tribes and the Byzantine empire. St. Anschar visited Sweden in 830 and made many converts. In 834 he was chosen archbishop of Hamburg, with which Bremen was afterwards united. Some progress was made under Charlemagne in converting the Slavs of Brandenburg. Again, on the Danube, east of Passau, by the extermination of the Avars, Charlemagne made room for the "Eastern March" (Austria) and the great see of Vienna. The Slavs of Bulgaria were converted by St. Methodius (865), whom their king Bogoris had invited from Constantinople; and the same Methodius brought the faith to the Slavs of Moravia. He also visited Bohemia, and baptized the duke Boriwoy, with his saintly wife Ludmilla. The Czech population readily followed the example of their rulers. The country remained for some time ecclesiastically subject to the bishop of Ratisbon; the see of Prague was not founded until 968.

The Normans, after the grant of what is now Normandy to their duke Rollo (911), embraced the faith, and soon began to extend and illustrate it with the force and genius characteristic of the race. We have not space to trace the steps of the conversion of the outlying Scandinavians and Slavs. Suffice it to say that by the thirteenth century all the nations of Europe were Christian. (Streit, "Atlas Hieraticus," 1913, the latest authority on missions; for the missions in Canada and the United States see "Cath. Enc.")

Attempts were made by fervent preachers of the newly-founded mendicant orders to carry the faith among the Mahometans and the Christian populations under Mahometan rule in Asia Minor, Syria, &c. These efforts, owing to the pride and invincible prejudice of the Moslems, met with little success. The Teutonic knights, uniting themselves to the Order of the Sword founded in 1202, carried on from 1237 a long and cruel war against the natives of East Prussia. These last had been found intractable and ferocious, and their rejection over and over again of the teaching of the missionaries was held to justify proceeding against them by way of a crusade. The war lasted fifty-three years, and ended in the complete subjugation of Prussia, over which the Teutonic order then claimed to exercise sovereign rights. Prussians who were willing to become Christians were declared free men and enjoyed all private rights, but those who chose to remain in unbelief were made slaves to the conquerors.

Fourteenth Century.—This was an age of lamentable reaction. Crusades to the Holy Land being now regarded as impracticable, Christian princes turned their arms against one another. The hundred years' war between England and France began. The see of St. Peter remained for seventy years at Avignon, to the detriment of many religious interests; and soon after the return of Gregory XI. (1376) began the Great Schism, which distracted and perplexed all Christian nations for nearly forty years.

The people of Lithuania (1386), at the command of their duke, Jagellon, accepted the Gospel, and were baptized in vast numbers.

Fifteenth Century.—The maritime nations, Spain and Portugal, while extending the limits of geography, were full of zeal for the propagation of the faith. The people of the Canary and Azores Islands were converted in this age, and under Portuguese auspices three Dominican friars (1491) opened a promising mission on the Congo, in Western Africa. Immediately upon the discovery of America (1492) the religious orders, especially the Dominicans, Franciscans, Augustinians, and Trinitarians, hastened to send labourers to the new field.

Sixteenth Century.—While some of the European nations were being led away by heretical teachers into revolt from the Church, new populations were entering her fold in the Transatlantic regions opened out by the energy of Spain. Cortes, as soon as he had conquered Mexico, did all that he could to make the people Christians. Franciscan missioners appeared there in 1523, followed by Dominicans and Jesuits. The heroic virtue of Martin de Valenza, and his zeal in preaching, converted great numbers of the Mexicans. At the present day but few of the people remain unconverted.

In New Granada, Spanish missionaries appeared very early; the first see was founded at Santa Marta in 1529. St. Louis Bertrand laboured here from 1561 to 1569, and is said to have converted fifteen thousand of the Indians.[1] St. Peter Claver, sometimes called the Apostle of the Negroes, after extraordinary labours and sufferings, died at Cartagena in 1654. Before 1800 the majority of the population, both Indian and negro, had become Catholic.

In Venezuela the see of Carácas was founded in 1531. In 1800 three-fourths of the Indian population of the province were computed to be Christians.

The conquest of Peru by Pizarro was soon followed by the establishment of a bishop's see at Lima (1539), raised to metropolitan rank in 1548. St. Turibius, the third archbishop, is regarded as the apostle of that region. The glorious St. Rose of Lima, who died in 1617 at the age of thirty-one, "bloomed in the Indies in the flower of virginity and patience."[2] Dominican, Franciscan, and Jesuit missioners combined their efforts, and by the middle of the seventeenth century the conversion of the Peruvian Indians, within all the districts subject to Spain, was accomplished.

In Bolivia, Chiquisaca was erected into a bishop's see in 1551. Jesuit missions made rapid progress in converting the Indians; about a hundred years later not less than 100,000 of them were Christians.

In Chile, the see of Santiago dates from 1561. Those of the native tribes which submitted to the Spaniards soon became Christians; but the nation of the Araucanos and other tribes, preserving their independence, retained along with it their idolatry. To this day there are many unconverted Indians in Chile.

The vast and fertile plains of Brazil began to be occupied by the Portuguese about 1500. The first missionaries were Franciscans. The Jesuit Father, Nobrega, was sent to Brazil by St. Ignatius in 1549. Father Anchieta joined him four years later, and spent the rest of his life in extending the faith among the Indians. His sanctity was demonstrated by miracles, and he is often called the Apostle of Brazil. The first see was founded at Bahia in 1561.

The first see in La Plata, now the Argentine Republic, appears to have been that of Cordova (1570), where the Jesuits had in process of time a magnificent college. St. Francis Solano preached to the Indians of Tucuman and the Chaco in 1589, and converted a great number of them.

The faith was brought into Central America by Franciscans. Alfonso de Betanços preached both to Spaniards and Indians in Costa Rica with great fruit from 1560 to his death in 1566. Other friars laboured successfully in Guatemala during the last thirty years of the century.

Some Augustinian friars, headed by Alfonso Gutierrez, went out to the Philippine Islands in 1575 at the request of Philip II., and began to preach to the natives. Three years later they were joined by a party of Franciscans under the B. Pedro de Alfaro. In nine years 250,000 natives had embraced Christianity. At the present day, out of a population variously estimated at from five to nine millions, the vast majority are Catholics; and they have learnt the arts of civilized life, along with the doctrines of salvation, beneath the fostering wing of the Church. It is lamentable to compare with this picture the miserable condition of the Maories of New Zealand. Victimized by half a dozen Protestant sects, and unable to decide for themselves which of the Christianities offered to them was the true one, this brave and gifted people, divided still more than when they were heathens by the very influence which should have united them, have been unable to resist the corrupting effects of the civilization which has enfolded them within its toils, and are now rapidly perishing.

The first see in the Philippine Islands was founded at Manila in 1581. This was made metropolitan in 1621, and three other sees have been since erected.

The Portuguese established their power firmly on the west coast of India about the beginning of the century, and a see was founded at Goa in 1534. St. Francis Xavier arrived in India in 1542; he preached on the Fishery Coast, and in Cochin, Madura, and Travancore, and made many thousands of converts. These were chiefly of low caste, or of no caste at all; Brahmin exclusiveness and Mussulman rancour strongly barred the way against the spread of Christianity among the upper classes of Indian society.

Japan received St. Francis, when he landed at Cangoxima in 1549, with open arms. The progress of Christianity was extremely rapid, and kings and princes embraced the faith; and it seemed as if a national conversion, like those of which earlier ages afforded so many examples, was about to be effected. Gregory XIII. in 1585 forbade any missionaries other than Jesuits to preach the Gospel in Japan. About the same time a Japanese embassy visited Rome. The sequel will be told in the next section.

Seventeenth Century.—Xavier had desired to carry the Gospel into China, but he died in the neighbouring isle of Sancian (1552) without having set foot in the empire. Towards 1600 some Jesuit Fathers entered China, but little effect was produced till after Father Ricci had made his way to Pekin (1602) and conciliated the goodwill of the emperor. The scientific attainments of Ricci, and, after him, of the Fathers Schall, Verbiest, &c., were what won from the Imperial house respect for them, and some degree of toleration for the Chinese converts. There are said to have been 300,000 Catholics in China in 1663. But several causes combined to overcloud this bright prospect: (1) the dispute about the Chinese ceremonies between the Jesuit and the Dominican missioners [CHINESE RITES]; (2) the persecution, more or less connected with this dispute, raised by the Government against the Christians towards the middle of the eighteenth century; (3) the suppression of the Society of Jesus; and (4) the French Revolution, which paralysed the missionary energy of the chief Catholic nation for many years. Within the last fifty years great efforts have been made to regain the ground lost. China is now divided into forty-five sees, under vicars-apostolic, and the total number of Catholics can be little less than a million and a half. Numerous conversions occur each year in almost every one of the "Chrétientés," or Christian settlements, which are planted thickly in every province of the vast empire.

The Seminary "des Missions Étrangères," founded in 1663 in the Rue du Bac, Paris, has carried on, chiefly in Eastern countries, a great work of evangelization.

In the course of this century missionaries belonging to various orders, chiefly Dominicans and Jesuits, carried the Gospel to Tonquin, Cochin-China, Camboja, Siam, Malaysia, and Burmah, countries which all lie within the Indo-Chinese peninsula. The later history of these missions has been of the usual chequered character: In Tonquin and Cochin-China there have been prolonged persecutions and frequent martyrdoms. At the present day these missions are governed by sixteen vicars-apostolic, and the number of Catholics contained in them may be roughly estimated at 1,000,000.

Canada and Acadia (Nova Scotia) were colonized by France early in the seventeenth century; the first bishop's see was founded at Montreal in 1659. The Jesuit Fathers Brebeuf, Jogues, Lallemant, and Daniel converted the Hurons to Christianity. But the enemies of France instigated the Iroquois to attack the Hurons; all the above-named missionaries met with violent deaths, and the Hurons were nearly exterminated.[1] Acadia was ceded to England in 1713, and Canada in 1763. The French-speaking population of Lower Canada has remained Catholic, and the efforts of the missionaries have secured for the Church the large floating half-caste population of "voyageurs" and traders, besides converting many of the Indian tribes which roam over the surface of British North America.

In India, the Jesuit Nobili (1606), assuming the dress and customs of a Brahmin, and not associating with persons of inferior caste, made a considerable impression. [Malabar Rites.] The B. John de Britto, also a Jesuit, addressed himself to the lower castes, and is said to have converted 8,000 idolaters; he gave his life for the faith. The flourishing Christianity of Ceylon, evangelized partly by Franciscans, partly by the Ven. José Vaz, of the Goa Oratory, and other Fathers of the same congregation, was injured and retarded by the Dutch after they had dislodged (1656) the Portuguese from the island. When Ceylon fell into British hands equity was better observed, and at the present day there are 400,000 Catholics, governed by an archbishop and four bishops.

The policy of British rule in India, with other causes, has tended to keep Christianity stationary, and at this day the total number of Christians in British India is said to be less than one million. Of these, about 250,000 are believed to be Europeans or Eurasians (half-castes). Of the remainder about 534,000 are found in the Madras Presidency, and of these about 416,000, or four-fifths nearly, are "returned as Roman Catholics."[2] In the Native States the Christians number about 700,000. Concerning these we have not met with creed returns, but there is no doubt that the great majority are Catholics. Streit ("Atlas") gives the number of Catholics in the whole of India as 2,200,000.

The Goa schism arose in the following manner. When the see of Goa was founded in 1534, a treaty was signed between Portugal and the Holy See, giving to the king of that country the right of patronage over the churches of India on certain conditions. After their power on the Malabar coast had been displaced by that of the Dutch, and the circumstances were consequently changed, the Portuguese still refused to recognize the action of the Holy See in entrusting ecclesiastical interests in those regions to clergy of non-Portuguese nationality. A long and painful history is connected with these disputes, and the schism is not entirely healed to this day. The Indian missions were reorganized by Gregory XVI., who in 1840, Portugal having notoriously failed or become unable to fulfil its part of the contract, suppressed the original bull of patronage. In 1886 an Indian hierarchy was established by Leo XIII., containing the eight provinces of Goa, Colombo, Verapoli, Pondichéry, Madras, Bombay, Agra, and Calcutta. Later Simla was raised to the dignity of an archbishopric.

In Japan, where a considerable section of the people had become Christians, the Government took the alarm, and commenced to persecute about the end of the sixteenth century. Taicosama became Shogun, or supreme temporal ruler, in 1615, and from that time to his death in 1650 pursued a settled plan of extermination. In this he was aided by the selfish policy of the Dutch, who assisted him in putting down the revolt of the Christians of a large district, whom the persecution had driven to despair. About 1650 there were but few professed Christians left. When, however, after Japan was opened to Europeans a few years ago, the Catholic missioners returned, they found interesting proofs of the survival of a pure Christianity among a considerable number of the people. A hierarchy has lately been established, consisting of one archbishopric (Tokio) and three bishoprics. The number of Catholics is about 150,000.

Eighteenth Century. — The celebrated Jesuit missions, or "Reductions," in Paraguay attained their greatest development in the first half of this century. The Jesuits had obtained permission from the King of Spain to isolate their Indian converts in the settlements founded by them, and to manage their affairs independently of the colonial administration. A group of theocratic communities was thus formed in the plains of the Paraná and Uruguay, in each of which the clergy were at once the spiritual and temporal rulers of their flocks; in which crime was almost unknown, and industry universal; and a community of goods was established as in the Apostolic age. The Indians "in medium quaerebant"; the crops which they raised were thrown into a common stock, and divided by the clergy among the different households; not that this was regarded as a permanent arrangement, but only as that most suitable for the new Christians at the actual stage of mental and moral development which they had reached. The converts after a time displayed an extraordinary talent for imitating any kind of handicraft, mechanism, or artistic workmanship. The eyes of all the philanthropists of Europe were turned upon this new experiment in human education. Unfortunately the hostility of the colonists, the transfer of the territory of Uruguay from Spain to Portugal, the malignant policy of Pombal, and finally the suppression of the Society of Jesus, brought utter destruction on a work than which the whole history of evangelic enterprise presents nothing more suggestive and encouraging. (See Huonder, Reductions in "Cath. Enc." good bibliography).

Nineteenth Century.—In 1822 the "Work of the Propagation of the Faith" was established at Lyons, with a view to assisting in the establishment and support of foreign missions. It was computed that in the first fifty years of its existence the Church had received, by the instrumentality of the missions connected with this society, an accession of about 700,000 neophytes. It distributes at the present time an income exceeding 200,000*l.* a year.

By the exertions of Cardinal Vaughan, "St. Joseph's College of the Sacred Heart for Foreign Missions," the chief object of which is to educate missioners to preach to the heathen, was founded at Mill Hill, near London. Its missionaries already occupy important fields of work in the Madras Presidency of India and Borneo, besides the negro missions in the United States.

Great efforts have been made in recent years for the extension of the Gospel in Africa. Besides the titular sees in Algeria there are vicariates, administered by bishops, which embrace the greater part of the seaboard all round the continent, and also the newly-founded vicariates of Central Africa. [See AFRICAN CHURCH.]

In Oceania there are, besides twenty-three flourishing dioceses, fourteen vicariates-apostolic, most of which are of recent creation. When the Catholic missionaries have not been interfered with (as in the Gambier Islands, Easter Island, and Marquesas Islands) the native population has sometimes embraced Christianity en masse; but in numerous instances the work has been, and is, made difficult by the opposition of Wesleyans, Baptists, and other sectaries.

The supreme direction of all Catholic missions rests with the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda [PROPAGANDA].

It seems desirable to add a few lines on the missionary labours of the last few years, up to the commencement of 1914.

In Europe we note the restoration of an official and recognized Catholicism at Geneva, where the Federal government has allowed the see from which the late Mgr. Mermillod was expelled to be reoccupied.

The northern kingdoms have become more favourable to Catholicism than has been the case since the Reformation. The Catholic population of Copenhagen now numbers several thousands. Members of religious orders expelled from France and Italy have been welcomed in Sweden, Norway, and Denmark.

In North America great progress has been made in the various missions in the conversion of the Indian tribes. According to the census of 1911 the number of Catholics was 2,833,041.

In Asia the record is of a mixed nature; with much that is cheering there is joined much that is of a saddening and disquieting character. In China, where Christianity is of so long standing and is found in every province of the empire, there has been, and is, much persecution and hindrance, caused, not by the direct orders of the central government (which, so far as words and edicts go, is tolerant enough), but by the open animosity of the literate class, and the veiled hostility of the mandarins. The literates, i.e. the educated middle class, do not so much hate Christianity on its own account as in fear of the foreign and Western influences associated with it, by which they think their national independence is threatened. Such events as the destruction of the ancient Burmese monarchy, the French annexation of Tonquin, and the Russian encroachments on the west and north, naturally fill the Chinese, who are thorough patriots in their way, with a dread of Europe and all that comes from Europe. It is said that 25,000 Christians were put to death during the Boxer rebellion of 1900.

In Japan, Leo XIII. established in 1891 the ecclesiastical hierarchy, with the archbishop of Tokio as metropolitan, and the bishops of Nagasaki, Osaka, and Hakodadi as his suffragans. But Catholicism has not the field to itself; the various Protestant bodies, and the Russian Church, are continually labouring to add to their proselytes and extend their influence.

In India the movement towards Christianity, especially in Madura and in the districts (Chota Nagpore, Orissa, &c.) round Calcutta, has been very decided within the last few years. (See "La Mission Belge du Bengale Occidental," Brussels, 1890.) In Annam and Tonquin the losses caused by persecution and famine are being rapidly made good; it is probable that the movement in favour of Christianity will take a strong hold of the general population.

In Africa the energy of Cardinal Lavigerie, archbishop of Algiers, founded and supported a body of missioners, known as the "White Fathers," for carrying the Gospel to the tribes of the Sahara, the dark races of the Soudan, and to nations still further south. These missioners are settled on the shores and islands of the Lakes Victoria Nyanza and Tanganyika, and elsewhere. The "Brotherhood of the Sahara," a lay institute, was founded by the Cardinal, in order by degrees to irrigate and cultivate the Sahara, thus making the proceedings of the slave-traders more difficult.

MITRE (mitra, infula). A head-dress worn by bishops, abbots, and in certain cases by other distinguished ecclesiastics. Mitra (μίτρα) is used in Greek and Latin for the turban which was worn by women, and among the Asiatics, specially Phrygians, by men. It had no connection with religious rites.

On the other hand, a band (infula) was worn by heathen priests and by the sacrificial victims. The Jewish priests wore a cap (מִגְבָּעָה; κίδαρις in the LXX) of uncertain form, though the root points to a round shape, and the high priest a turban (מִצְנֶפֶת), from a root meaning "to wind" (in LXX, κίδαρις and μίτρα), with a plate of gold on the front (צִיץ; LXX, πέταλον; Vulg. "lamina"), inscribed with the words "Holiness to the Lord." The Vulgate uses "mitra" for the high priest's head-dress (Ecclus. xlv. 14), and for the priest's (Exod. xxix. 9; Levit. viii. 13). It is certain, however, that the early Church did not adopt the head-dress of the Jewish priesthood and transfer it to her own priests or chief priests. Polycrates of Ephesus, indeed, writing about 190 (apud Euseb. "H.E." v. 24), says of St. John the Evangelist that he "became a priest, having worn the plate (πέταλον)," and Epiphanius (Haer.), about 380, makes a similar statement about St. James, except that he makes it in St. James's case a mark of his Jewish, not his Christian, priesthood, for he says he was allowed both to wear the πέταλον and enter the Holy of Holies. This account of Epiphanius is evidently legendary, for on what possible ground could the authorities of the Temple treat James as high priest? Lightfoot (see also Routh, "Rell. Sacr." ii. p. 28) is probably justified in regarding the language of Polycrates on St. John's "plate" as metaphorical. But, in any case, such a "plate" answers to no vestment now in use; and even if we could translate it "mitre" (as we cannot), this use by St. John stands quite by itself. It would have been his custom, not that of the Church.

Hefele, who treats the above notices of St. John and St. James as mere legends, contends, nevertheless, that there are clear traces of mitres used as part of the official ecclesiastical costume from the fourth century. After carefully considering the proofs which he alleges, we can see no reason for abandoning the judgment of Menard, the learned Benedictine editor of St. Gregory's Sacramentary, viz. that for the first thousand years of her history there was no general use of mitres in the Church. All Hefele's references can, we think, be explained as poetical or metaphorical. And, on the other hand, Hefele himself allows that no Sacramentary or Ritual book before 1000 A.D. mentions the mitre, much less the bishop's investment with it at consecration, though, e.g., in a Mass for Easter Sunday written before 986 the ornaments of a bishop are enumerated. Again, liturgical writers, such as Amalarius and Walafrid Strabo, are silent on the subject. "It is not"—we again quote from Hefele—"till the eleventh century that representations of popes, bishops, and abbots with the mitre occur; though from that time onwards they are very numerous."

The use of the mitre seems to have begun at Rome, and then to have spread to other churches. Leo IX., in 1049, gave the "Roman mitre" to the Archbishop of Treves, and this is the earliest instance known of such a concession. Canons also, e.g. at Bamberg, got leave from Rome to wear the mitre on certain feasts, and it was used by all cardinals till, in 1245, the first Council of Lyons sanctioned the cardinal's hat. According to Gavantus (tom. i. 149), the first concession of a mitre to an abbot was made by Urban II. in 1091. The straight lines and sharp point familiar to us in the Gothic mitres first appear in works of art of the thirteenth century. The Italian mitre, with its greater height and curved lines, came into use in the fourteenth.

Bishops and abbots (if mitred) receive the mitre from the consecrating bishop—a ceremony, as Catalani shows, of late introduction. The "Caeremoniale Episcoporum" distinguishes the "precious mitre," adorned with jewels and made of gold or silver plate; the "mitra auriphrygiata," without precious stones (it may, however, be ornamented with pearls) and of gold cloth (ex tela aurea); the "plain mitre" (mitra simplex), of silk or linen and of white colour. The bishop always uses the mitre if he carries the pastoral staff. Inferior prelates who are allowed a mitre must confine themselves to the simple mitre, unless in case of an express concession by the Pope ("Manuale Decret." 870). The Greeks have no mitre properly so called. The Armenians have adopted a kind of mitre for bishops and a bonnet for priests since the eleventh century. (Hefele, "Beiträge," vol. ii.; Gavantus, Bona, "Rerum Lit." lib. i.; Catalani on the "Pontifical"; Menard on St. Gregory's Sacramentary; Braun, "Die Liturgische Gewandung," 424 sqq.; Rock, ii. 75–98. Innocent III. gives mystical meanings to the mitre and its parts—e.g. the two horns are the two Testaments; the strings, the spirit and the letter, &c.).

MIXED MARRIAGES are marriages between persons of different religions. A marriage between a baptized and an unbaptized person is invalid; one between a Catholic and a person of another communion—e.g. a Protestant—is valid, but, unless a dispensation has been obtained from the Pope or his delegate, unlawful. Further explanation has been given in the article on the IMPEDIMENTS OF MARRIAGE. But it will be useful to say something here on the legislation of the Church on marriages between Catholics and other Christians not Catholics.

(1) Benedict XIV. (Instruction on Marriages in Holland, 1741; Encyclical, "Magnae nobis") has declared the Church's vehement repugnance to such unions, on the ground that they are not likely to be harmonious, that they expose the Catholic party and the children to danger of perversion, that they are apt to produce indifference, &c., &c.

(2) He says the Church has permitted them for very grave reasons, and generally in the case of royal personages; but even then on condition that the Catholic party be free to practise his or her religion, and that a promise be given that the children of either sex be brought up Catholics.

(3) Increasing intercourse between Catholics and Protestants made such marriages far more frequent, and the conditions insisted on by Benedict XIV. were neglected. In Silesia a law of the State in 1803 required the children of mixed marriages to be brought up in the religion of the father. In England, till very recent times, there was a common arrangement by which the boys were brought up in the father's, the girls in the mother's religion; and neither in Silesia (see Hergenröther, "Kirchengeschichte," vol. ii. p. 856 seq.) nor in England did the Catholic clergy, as a rule, oppose this state of things. An attempt was made by the Prussian Government in 1825 to introduce the law which prevailed in Silesia and the other Eastern provinces to the Rhineland and Westphalia; and this order of the Cabinet was accepted by Von Spiegel, archbishop of Cologne, and also, though with some scruple, by the Bishops of Paderborn, Münster, and Treves. This led Pius VIII. and Gregory XVI. to declare a mixed marriage, when it was not understood that the children of either sex should be brought up Catholics, contrary to the "natural and divine law." Otherwise, the priest could take no part in the celebration. In extreme cases, and to avoid greater evils, he might passively assist at the contract; but more the Pope himself could not permit. Obedience to these Papal briefs led to the imprisonment of Droste von Vischering, the new archbishop of Cologne, in 1837, and to that of the Archbishop of Posen in 1839. The bishops, even those who had once been of a different mind, steadfastly adhered to the Papal regulations. One exception, however, must be mentioned. The Prince-Bishop of Breslau resigned his see in 1840 rather than submit, and became a Protestant. He died in 1871. Under the good king William IV. peace was gradually restored between Church and State.

(4) In England, as elsewhere, the following is the present canon law. If a Catholic and Protestant desire to marry, they must promise to comply with the conditions given above. Then, if the bishop is satisfied that some grave reason for the marriage exists, he may grant a dispensation, and the marriage is then celebrated in the Catholic Church. As the Anglican clergy are no longer the obligatory registrars for civil recognition, no repetition of the ceremony in the Established Church is now tolerated. (NE TEMERE; "Concil. Westm." p. 315.)

MODERNISM. In the art. GNOSTICISM we have described the attempt in the earliest ages of the Church to conciliate Christianity and paganism by distinguishing the higher knowledge of doctrine (γνῶσις) from the ordinary faith (πίστις). The latter was for the many, the former was the privilege of the few. The distinction in itself was perfectly lawful (1 Cor. xii. 8; xiv. 6) and was upheld by the early Fathers. But, as we have pointed out, there was great danger in the application of it. Under the plea of higher knowledge Christianity was changed at will. The Gnostics discerned elements of falsehood as well as truth in the received doctrines; they mutilated the text of the Gospels; they mixed tenets borrowed from the heathen philosophy or religions with Christianity; they treated the moral law as they treated Christian doctrine, and invented a new code of ethics. In short, they claimed to impart a knowledge which refused to believe what it could not understand.

So, too, in our own day, a similar attempt has been made to conciliate what is termed modern scientific thought with the ancient doctrines and practices of the Church. Here again the attempt is in itself lawful and praiseworthy. But, as of old, the danger is great lest what is essential may be sacrificed and pure teaching corrupted. "Modernism," like Gnosticism, has succumbed to this danger, and both are now terms of opprobrium.

In every age of the Church in which philosophy and theology have been studied, the highest minds have been exercised upon the problem of harmonizing reason and faith. And in each age it has been the contemporary teaching of both which has been in question. Though some difficulties are of all time, others are prominent in one age and not in another. In the Middle Ages, for example, it was the Arabian commentaries and paraphrases of Aristotle, with their pantheistic and sceptical tendencies, their mystic dreamings and dangerous asceticism, which had to be met by the Church's defenders. An apparently easy way was to condemn philosophy altogether, as some of the Fathers had done [see PHILOSOPHY], or to reject the authority of Aristotle, as also was done in the early part of the thirteenth century (see the same art.). But the bolder and truer way was to make the most profound and exact thinker of antiquity a hewer of wood and a drawer of water to the Church. This was the great work of the mightiest of Christian thinkers who realized better than any of his contemporaries that truth cannot contradict truth: that what is theologically true cannot be philosophically false. St. Thomas's apologetic was conclusive for his own day, but in ours the difficulties come from science and history, the very departments in which the mediaeval writers were weak. It was to be expected that a new method of defence would be required. To speak in military language, though the strategy was the same, tactics and weapons had altered. Without any disparagement of the theologians and philosophers of other countries, it was mainly in the German universities and the "Instituts Catholiques" of France that this defence was carried on. While there was much to be praised in their work (which is not our concern here), there was much that deserved censure. Too much was conceded to the enemy: many important positions were abandoned. The constant study of infidel writers often had a bad influence on the mentality of the defenders. When it became necessary for authority to take action, there was sometimes a want of submission, and in a few cases open revolt. We have purposely avoided the mention of names, for we are not unmindful of the warning:

> "Periculosae plenum opus aleae
> Tractas, et incedis per ignes
> Suppositos cineri doloso." [1]

Gregory XVI., Pius IX., and Leo XIII. had frequent occasion to condemn these false defences (worse than attacks) and to warn the Faithful against their pernicious influence. Nevertheless, the evil continued and increased to such an extent that Pius X. determined to do his utmost to root it out from the Church. First a decree of the Holy Office "Lamentabili" (July 3, 1907) condemned a list of sixty-five propositions embodying the chief errors of leading Modernists. This was soon followed by the Encyclical "Pascendi" (Sept. 7, 1907), in which the Pope set forth at great length the various forms of the new heresy, laid bare its causes, and prescribed the remedies. Lastly, he took severe measures to ensure the ejection of those who favoured the heresy. By the Motu Proprio "Sacrorum antistitum" (Sept. 1, 1910), he ordered that an elaborate oath, in which the modernist errors were condemned, should be taken by all who were to be promoted to sacred orders or to hold the position of preacher, confessor, parish priest, &c. We have not space to give even a short account of these various documents. An analysis of the Encyclical "Pascendi" must suffice.

The Pope begins by pointing out that the new enemies do not attack the Church from without but within, and their attacks are directed, not against particular doctrines, but against the very roots of the Faith. They assume different characters: philosophers, believers, theologians, critics, apologists, reformers.

Each are taken in turn. In philosophy they are downright agnostics, denying that the existence of God can be proved by reason and that revelation can be made credible by external signs. But what reason cannot prove is known to us by religious immanence, that is, by a certain religious feeling of and craving after (indigentia) the divine. It is this feeling which the Modernists call faith. The intellect working upon the data of the religious sense produces "secondary opinions" derived from the primary simple ones, and these, when approved by the Church, are known as dogmas. Dogmas (the Modernists say) do not contain absolute truth; they are mere symbols, capable not only of evolution but also of change. Indeed, they are bound to change, for they must be living, and life means change.

As believers, Modernists assert that they maintain the reality of the divine, but they do so relying on their own subjective experience. Science has to do with phenomena in which faith has no place: faith, on the other hand, is concerned with what is divine, of which science is altogether ignorant. Hence there can never be any conflict between them. Thus, the life of Christ belongs to phenomena; but these when transfigured and defigured by faith, are taken out of the region of sensible things and become part of what is divine. For example, if we ask whether Christ really worked miracles and rose from the dead, they reply that science denies it but faith affirms it. And (they add) there is no contradiction here: for the philosopher speaking to philosophers thinks of Christ according to historical reality, whereas the believer, speaking to believers, considers the life of Christ as lived again by faith and in faith. As a matter of fact, the Modernists hold that faith is subject to science.

Next we have to consider the Modernist

as theologian. Here is his method of procedure: as philosopher, he knows that the principle of faith is immanent; as believer, he holds that this principle is God; he infers therefore that God is immanent in man. This is theological immanence. Again: to the philosopher it is certain that the representations of the object of faith are merely symbolical; to the believer it is equally certain that the object of faith is God as He is in Himself; the theologian concludes: Therefore the representations of the divine reality are symbolical. This is theological symbolism. Besides the divine immanence Modernists hold the divine permanence. Immanence and permanence differ from each other much in the same way as individual experience differs from experience handed down by tradition. For example, they assert that the Church and the Sacraments were not instituted by Christ Himself, because the law of immanence, the law of evolution and history, forbid us to admit such immediate institution. Nevertheless it is true that the Church and the Sacraments were mediately instituted by Christ. This they explain and seek to justify by maintaining that all Christian consciences (consciousnesses) are in a way virtually contained in the consciousness of Christ, like a plant in its seed. Now just as the germs live the life of the seed, so do all Christians live the life of Christ. But the life of Christ, according to faith, is divine, therefore the life of Christians is also divine. If therefore this life in the course of ages gave rise to the Church and the Sacraments, the Church and the Sacraments are rightly said to be from Christ and divine. And so with the authority of Holy Scripture, and with Dogma and Worship. Each is from Christ and each is divine, but only in the sense that it originated from the life of Christ as lived by Christians in successive centuries, to be gradually propagated and developed and in the end formulated, not by any logical process, but according to the needs and circumstances of the Church. Thus, for the Modernist the Sacraments are the resultant of the need man has to give sensible manifestation to his religious feelings, and moreover to determine and make universal the form of such manifestation. Similarly, the inspiration attributed to the writers of the Sacred Books is no more than the impulse felt by them to commit their beliefs to writing, an impulse distinguished from others of the same kind not otherwise than by its vehemence and by the nature of its subject-matter. In the Modernist theory the Church herself is born of a twofold human need: that of the individual believer to communicate his faith to others, and that of the body of believers to form themselves into a society. Such society, it is further contended, must, in virtue of its popular origin be democratic as regards its form of government. Moreover, it must be separated from the State, to which indeed in temporal matters it ought to be subject. It further follows that any magisterium or teaching office the Church may possess is dependent on the individual consciences of its members, since it can teach no more than what private individuals or the majority among them believe, and hence the Church in her teaching is bound to bow to popular ideals. Wherefore, all, clergy and laity alike, have the right to be free to express their personal convictions and opinions. To put obstacles in the way of such expression is to hinder the necessary evolution of dogma—which evolution of dogma is practically the fundamental principle of Modernism. In the Modernist theory, tradition has its place and value as a useful check on Evolution; for it is only by a species of covenant and compromise between the present and the past, between individual consciences and recognized authority, that wholesome progress is made. To this fatal view that in religion everything is subject to change, the Encyclical Pascendi opposes the Catholic teaching of the Vatican Council: "Let intelligence, therefore, and science, and wisdom increase and prosper abundantly and vigorously, in individuals and in the mass, in the believer and in the whole Church, throughout the ages and the centuries—but only in its own kind, that is, according to the same dogma, the same sense, the same acceptation."

Next, the Modernist is studied as an historian and critic. As such, he starts from the Agnostic axiom that history, like science, dealing entirely with phenomena, must relegate to the dominion of Faith as belonging to it alone, God and every intervention of God in human affairs. Hence, for the modernist historian there is a Christ of History other than the Christ of Faith, a Church of History and a Church of Faith, Sacraments of History and Sacraments of Faith, and so forth. Again, the historian must set aside, when treating, for instance, of Christ, all that surpasses man in his natural condition as determined by the laws of psychology and by what we gather from the place and period of his existence. Lastly, must be deleted everything not in harmony with what Modernists call the logic of facts, or not in character with the persons of whom it is predicated. These a priori philosophical principles equally avail the Modernist when he poses as a critic of Biblical and Church History. But, others too come into play. For example, he lays down as an axiom: No fact can be regarded as antecedent to the need which it meets—historically, the fact must be posterior to the need. Hence, the age of a particular chapter in a book in the Canon of Holy Scripture can only be determined by the date at which the need of it has manifested itself in the Church of the Old or of the New Testament. There is thus in the Sacred Books a vital evolution springing from and corresponding with the evolution of Faith. To aid himself in setting up this thesis the Modernist makes much of the so-called Textual Criticism, using it with such easy assurance that, as the Pontiff remarks, one would imagine that before him no one had so much as turned over the pages of Scripture.

In their system of Apologetics, Modernists insist that all controversies in religious matters must be determined by psychological and historical research. Their argument is that Religion, and especially the Catholic Religion, is endowed with such vitality as to compel every psychologist and historian of good faith to recognize that its history postulates the inclusion of an element of the Unknown. And on Modernist principles the realizing of the presence of the Unknown is the basis of Faith. In their Apologetics Modernists appeal likewise to their doctrine of Immanence. They endeavour, that is, to persuade the non-believer that down in the very depths of his nature and of his life there lies hidden the need and the desire of some religion, and that not of a religion of any kind but of the specific religion known as Catholicism, which they say, is absolutely postulated for the perfect development of human life.

Dealing lastly with the Modernist as a reformer, the Holy Father observes that so great is the passion of such men for innovation that in all Catholicism there is absolutely nothing on which it does not fasten. They would have Scholastic Philosophy to be rejected as obsolete, Rational Theology to be based on modern philosophical views and Positive Theology on the History of Dogma. In the Catechism they would have no dogmas taught save those which have been reformed and are within the capacity of the people. Regarding Worship, their contention is that the number of external devotions should be reduced. They demand the reform of Church government in all its branches, so as to bring it into harmony with the modern conscience, which now wholly tends (they say) towards democracy. They insist in particular on decentralization and on the admitting to share in ecclesiastical legislation in some degree of the lower orders of the clergy and even of the laity. Turning to Morals, Modernists adopt the principle of the Americanists, that the active virtues are more important than the passive and in practice are to be encouraged in preference to the latter. Finally the clergy must return to their primitive humility and poverty.

Concluding this part of his Encyclical, Pius X. infers that the Modernist system is a closely connected whole and defines it to be "the synthesis of all the heresies," concentrating into one evil theory their whole sap and substance, with the fatal result that many are the roads it opens leading to Atheism and to the annihilation of all religion.

Our purpose being merely to set forth the nature and dangers of Modernism, we refrain from summarizing the two remaining sections of the famous Encyclical. They treat respectively of "The Causes of Modernism" and of "The Remedies for Modernism." Under this last head many wholesome disciplinary measures are enjoined or recommended. Such are, the teaching in Seminaries of Scholastic Philosophy, Episcopal Watchfulness over publications, Censorship of books, Diocesan Vigilance Committees, and others.

The Pontifical condemnation of Modernism was so absolute and so unequivocal, and the disciplinary measures taken so drastic and so loyally everywhere enforced, that Modernism as a peril to the Church may be said to have perished at the hands of Pope Pius X.

MONARCHIANS. Early heretics who belonged to the Patripassian sect, i.e. they denied any real distinction between the divine Persons, and maintained that the one God (the Father) suffered for us. This was of course a form of Sabellianism (q.v.).

MONASTERIES, SUPPRESSION OF. [See SUPPRESSION.]

MONASTERY. [See CONVENT; MONK.]

MONITA SECRETA. A code of secret instructions said to have been drawn up by Acquaviva, fifth general of the Society of Jesus, for the guidance of the superiors of his order. They consist of the various methods to be adopted so as to gain wealth and influence for the Jesuits, to the exclusion of the secular clergy and the other orders. They are known to be the work of an ex-Jesuit, Zahorowski, who was dismissed from the society in 1611. While they have always been utterly scouted by the Jesuits themselves, even such prejudiced writers as Sarpi, Arnauld, and Pascal have placed no credence in them. It was reserved for the notorious Dr. Littledale to maintain that, though admittedly a libel and a caricature, the "Monita" are substantially true. (Gerard in "Cath. Enc."; Duhr, "Die Monita Secreta, oder die geheimen Verordnungen der Gesellschaft Jesu"; Reusch [Old Catholic], "Der Index der verbotener Bücher.")

MONK (A.-S. munuc, through the Lat. monachus, Gr. μοναχός, "solitary"). The ascetics of the first Christian age have been already described [ASCETAE]. They did not, as a rule, separate themselves from men, but in the world practised a rigid mortification, and aimed at fulfilling the counsels of perfection. Monachism commenced in Egypt. In the middle of the third century the persecution of Decius caused many fervent Christians to leave the cities and flee into the deserts, there to find that freedom in the divine service which human laws denied them. For a long time they lived apart, each in his own cell, supporting themselves by daily labour. The anchorites or hermits [HERMITS] were those who specially desired solitude; of these St. Paul was the founder. St. Anthony, whose life embraces more than a hundred years (250–356), chose for a time absolute solitude, but in his later years he allowed a number of disciples to gather round him, who, though living each apart, were eager to profit by the depth and wisdom of his advice, and ready to practise whatever rules he might impose. Thus St. Anthony was the founder of Monachism, although the coenobitic life, which has been a characteristic of nearly all the monks of later times, had not appeared. Of this, St. Pachomius is regarded as the originator, who, about A.D. 315, built monasteries in the Thebaid. It is easy to conceive how the common life should appear, under given conditions, more suitable as a road to perfection than the separate life. How one might pass into the other may be seen from a passage in the "Orations" of St. Gregory Nazianzen.[1] Speaking of St. Athanasius taking refuge with the contemplatives of Egypt, who, "withdrawing themselves from the world and embracing the wilderness, live to God," he says that, of these, "some, practising a life absolutely solitary and unsocial, converse with themselves and God alone, knowing no more of the world than they can become acquainted with in the desert; others, loving the law of charity by way of intercourse (κοινωνία), at once men of solitude and men of society, while dead to all other men and to worldly affairs in general . . . are a world to one another, and by comparison and contact sharpen one another's virtue." Hilarion, a disciple of St. Anthony, is said to have been the first to introduce communities of monks in Palestine: Eustathius of Sebaste, in Armenia; St. Basil, in Cappadocia. St. Athanasius, by making known at Rome the story of the wonderful life of St. Anthony, is said to have caused a great movement towards monasticism; in the time of St. Jerome the city had many monasteries both of monks and nuns. St. Martin was a strenuous upholder of the coenobitic life; two celebrated French monasteries, Marmoutier, near Tours, and Ligugé, near Poitiers, were of his foundation. The rule of St. Austin was perhaps rather designed for regular clerks than for monks, who for a long time after their institution were all laymen. At first it was nearly true that every monastery followed its own rule; gradually, however, the rule of St. Basil [BASILIANS] obtained a preference, and, after its translation into Latin by Rufinus of Aquileia, was largely adopted in the West. Monachism languished in Italy in the fifth century, owing to the irruptions of the barbarians; in the sixth (529), the strong but gentle hand of St. Benedict of Nursia raised it to a pedestal from which it has never since been dethroned. [BENEDICTINES.] The Benedictine rule gradually swallowed up all the others, being found more suitable than any to the conditions of life in Western Europe. For several centuries no other rule was heard of. In the tenth and eleventh centuries, the Orders of Cluny, Camaldoli, the Chartreuse, and Cîteaux branched off from the parent stem. In the thirteenth century appeared the friars; in the sixteenth, the Jesuits, Theatines, and other regular clerks; followed down to our own day by the various congregations of both sexes, the members of which, under their several institutes, devote themselves to the glory of God and the good of their neighbour. MONOPHYSITES. The early history of the Monophysites, who held that there was but one nature in Christ, and were condemned at the General Council of Chalcedon, has been given in a separate article. [CHALCEDON.] For two years, Eudocia, the widow of Theodosius II., was averse to the Confession of Chalcedon, and the monks in Palestine, counting on her protection, drove Juvenal, the Patriarch, from his see. In Egypt, Proterius, the orthodox successor of Dioscorus, was murdered in 457 by the fanatical populace, headed by Timothy the Cat and Peter the Stammerer, of whom the former usurped the patriarchate, till driven out by the troops of the Emperor Leo I. In Antioch, another monk, Peter the Fuller, overthrew the lawful patriarch, on his refusal to insert the words "Who was crucified for us," in the Trisagion. Scarcely were these Monophysite leaders removed, when their party found a protector in the usurping Emperor Basiliscus (475–477). Timothy the Cat and Peter the Fuller recovered their sees, and the decision of Chalcedon was set aside in an Imperial Encyclical.

The Catholics might have looked for triumph when Zeno came to the throne. The Bishop of Constantinople, Acacius, had been hitherto orthodox, and Zeno restored an orthodox Patriarch at Alexandria—viz. Timothy Salifaciolus, succeeded by Talaja. But the latter offended the court and Bishop of Constantinople, and Acacius leagued with Peter the Stammerer, who on the death of Timothy the Cat became leader of the Egyptian Monophysites, and Zeno hit on a compromise meant to unite Catholics and Monophysites. His "Henoticon" of 482 condemned Nestorius and renewed the anathemas of St. Cyril but ignored the Council of Chalcedon, ordered preachers to avoid the points of controversy between Monophysites and their opponents, and bade the churches confine themselves to the Nicene Creed with the additions made to it at Constantinople. Peter the Fuller at Antioch, Peter the Stammerer in Egypt, on the one hand, Acacius of Constantinople on the other, accepted these terms. But Rome would hear nothing of the "Henoticon," and there was a schism between East and West from 484 to 519. Even at Constantinople a powerful party, headed by monks, known as the Acoemeti, rejected the "Henoticon," and again many Monophysites in Egypt abhorred it, fell away from Peter the Stammerer, and formed a separate sect, that of the Acephali. Justin I. acknowledged the authority of Chalcedon, and the Church of Constantinople was once more in communion with that of Rome.

From this time the Monophysites split up into numerous sects. The Phthartolatrae, or Severians, fought with Aphthartolatrae, or Julianists, on the corruptible or incorruptible nature of Christ's body. A subdivision of the latter held that Christ's body since its union with the Word was increate; the Ctistolatrae were of the contrary opinion. The Themistians, or Agnoetae, held that the human element in Christ before His resurrection was subject to ignorance. A Monophysite Aristotelian, Philoponus (560), argued that the three Persons of the Trinity were three distinct individuals, and his followers were known as Tritheists. Other Monophysite sects are mentioned by Petavius.

In 536 Armenia became Persian; in 640 the Saracens became masters of Egypt; and in these countries the Monophysites were of course freed from Byzantine persecution. In Syria and Mesopotamia they were harassed by Justinian, but their cause was maintained by the zeal of the beggar-monk, Jacobus Zangalus, called El Baradai. In all these countries Monophysite churches still exist. They are represented (1) by the Armenian National Church; (2) by the Jacobite Christians of Syria and Mesopotamia; (3) the Coptic Church; (4) the Abyssinian Church. The Schismatic Christians of St. Thomas are now connected with the Jacobites. All these sects are described under separate articles. (Hefele-Leclercq, vol. ii.; Dom Chapman in "Cath. Enc." For an elaborate account of the Monophysite divisions, see Petavius, "De Incarnat." i. cap. 16, 17. For the modern Monophysites see Fortescue, "Lesser Eastern Churches," 163 sqq.)

MONOTHELITES. A name given to those who held that Christ had only one will. "One will," "one operation," of the Word made Flesh, were the watchwords of their party. They argued, there is but one Person in Christ, therefore a single will, and a single operation. The Catholic doctrine, on the other hand, is that there are two natures, and therefore two operations and two wills in Christ. The will is a faculty of the nature, and if Christ had no human will He cannot have been true man. He remains for ever God and Man, in two distinct natures; each nature operates in the way proper to itself, Nature being the principle of operation; there are therefore two operations and two wills in Christ, the one Divine, the other human, although these wills are in perfect harmony with each other—since the human will of Christ follows, and is perfectly subject to, His Divine will. That Christ had two wills is implied in Lk. xxii. 42, Jn. v. 30, where He distinguishes His own (human) will from that of the Father, which is one with Christ's Divine will. Thus, Pope Agatho's synodal letter, accepted at the Sixth General Council—the Third of Constantinople—defines that Christ has "two natural wills, without division, change, partition, confusion, not contrary to each other, but the human will following and subject to the Divine." We may here add that Catholic theologians distinguish three kinds of operation in Christ: those which are purely Divine—e.g. creation, preservation of His creatures, &c.; those which are purely human, eating and drinking, weeping, &c.; those in which each nature acts—the Divine, as the principal, the human, as the instrumental cause—e.g. raising the dead, giving sight to the blind, &c. The last are called theandric (θεός, ἀνήρ) actions. We proceed to the history of the heresy.

Heraclius (610-641) naturally desired the reconciliation of Monophysites and Catholics, for the Persians had pressed forward to the Hellespont, and there was urgent need to unite the Christians of the Empire as one man against them. In 622, Heraclius, in an interview with Paul, the head of the Armenian Monophysites, suggested the form "one energy," as a means of reconciling the contending parties. He made use of the same expedient, taught him probably by Sergius of Constantinople, in 626, when he tried to effect a union between Cyrus, Catholic bishop of Phasis, and Athanasius, the Jacobite patriarch: When Cyrus became Patriarch of Alexandria, he taught in nine κεφάλαια that Christ, because His two natures were united in one Person, "performed Divine and human acts by one theandric operation (i.e. by one operation at once Divine and human) according to St. Dionysius" (i.e. Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite). Sophronius, a monk of Palestine, when at Alexandria, tried to keep Cyrus from publishing these κεφάλαια, and also opposed the Monothelite doctrine at Constantinople. Soon after, Sophronius was raised to the patriarchate of Jerusalem, and continued to oppose the union which had been effected with a section of the Monophysites —viz. the Theodosians. Cyrus and Sergius, occupying the two great sees of Alexandria and Constantinople, vigorously supported the Monothelite compromise, and the latter tried to enlist Pope Honorius on the same side—with what measure of success has been shown in a separate article. [See HONORIUS.] On the other hand, the Catholic doctrine was clearly formulated by the Synod of Jerusalem, which met under Sophronius, in 634. Three years later Jerusalem was taken by the Saracens, and shortly afterwards Sophronius died. In 638 Honorius, too, was gone, and a new phase of the controversy began.

In 638 Heraclius gave his imperial authority to an Ecthesis or exposition of the faith composed by Sergius. This document forbade either phrase "one" or "two energies," but affirmed "one will" in Christ. The Ecthesis was supported by Pyrrhus and Paul, successors of Sergius at Constantinople, and by two councils held there in 638 and 639; but it was opposed throughout the West, and condemned by the Popes John IV. and Theodore, Paul of Constantinople being excommunicated by the latter Pope. Moreover, the orthodox doctrine found a powerful champion in the abbot Maximus, formerly secretary of Heraclius, then abbot of Chrysopolis, who was active in defence of the Catholic doctrine in Africa (the particular place is uncertain), where he held a dispute with Pyrrhus, and at Rome. The Emperor Constans II. withdrew the Ecthesis and enforced upon the empire under strict penalties another document, known as the Type, which forbade all discussion of the number either of the energies or the wills. But in the Lateran synod of 649 Pope Martin I. condemned both Type and Ecthesis, and anathematized the Monothelite leaders. Martin was seized, finally banished to the Chersonese, where, after enduring much misery, he died in 655. Maximus also died in banishment after cruel maltreatment in 662. An approach to peace between Rome and Constantinople was made about this time, but it was not concluded till Constantine Pogonatus (668–685) in union with Pope Agatho convoked the Third General Council of Constantinople. It met in 680, defined the existence of two wills in Christ and anathematized Sergius, Cyrus, Honorius, Pyrrhus, Paul, &c. The presiding Papal legates signed the decrees, which were confirmed by Pope Leo II. So ended the last great dogmatic dispute in the East. It was only in a corner of Asia—viz. in the fastnesses of Lebanon—that the Monothelite doctrine lingered. The adherents of this doctrine gathered round the monastery of St. Maro, acknowledged its abbot as their head, and persevered in their isolation till, during the Crusades, they were reconciled to the Church. [See MARONITES.]

MONSIGNORE (Monseigneur, my lord). This mode of addressing secular persons of high rank has been adopted in addressing ecclesiastics, from a patriarch or archbishop down to the simplest honorary chaplain or chamberlain of the Papal Court. It is a mistake to say that a cleric is made a "monsignor." What really happens is that the Pope bestows upon him an office (actual or titular) entitling him to be addressed as "monsignore." Protonotaries Apostolic, Domestic Prelates, Camerieri Segreti (Private Chamberlains) and Camerieri d'Onore (Honorary Chamberlains), as well as Vicars-General, have the title of Monsignore, and in Latin they are styled Reverendissimi. Vicars-General, Protonotaries and Domestic Prelates, are addressed as Right Reverend, and in England Camerieri as Very Reverend. Monsignore, when followed by the surname, is usually written and pronounced "Monsignor."[1] The Protonotaries and Prelates are entitled to wear the purple mantelletta and rochet; Vicars-General wear a black mantelletta.[1] (Besides the officials mentioned, there are other members of the Papal Court who are styled monsignori; see Baumgarten in "Cath. Enc."; Humphrey, "Urbs et Orbis.")

MONS PIETATIS. An institution for lending money to the poor, on the security of some article deposited. The word "mons," a heap, a pile of money, was used with reference to the collected fund out of which the loan was made. Usury was in the Middle Ages (and indeed is still) the great bane of the small cultivator and shopkeeper. It was to provide against the miseries involved in the difficulty of obtaining small temporary loans, and in the high rate of interest exacted, that pious benefactors gave sums of money to be lent in the way described. Although the practice existed informally in early times, the first properly organized "Mons pietatis" was founded at Perugia in 1462, by the Franciscans. It was Blessed Bernardino da Feltre who a little later (1484) gave the greatest impetus to this good work. The principles on which the "montes" were carried on were: (1) the loans were to be only small sums and only to the poor; (2) a pawn or pledge of a saleable character was to be deposited with the officials; (3) originally a low rate of interest was exacted [B. Bernardino insisted on this]; (4) if the loan was not repaid the pawn was to be sold, and the surplus (if any) was to be returned to the pawner. The question of interest led to much opposition on the part of theologians and canonists (chiefly Dominicans), who held that all charges for loans were usurious. [See USURY.] The defenders of the "montes" replied that the charge made was not true interest, but compensation for the loss of the use of the money lent (damnum emergens and lucrum cessans) and payment of the costs of administration. The fifth Lateran Council (May 4, 1515) decided that the "montes" were lawful. (See also COUNCIL OF TRENT, sess. xxii. c. 8, De Ref.) Since that time they have multiplied exceedingly, and have been copied by the civil authorities. Curiously enough, they have not gained any foothold in England. (Ferraris, Montes Pietatis; Ballerini-Palmieri, "Theol. Mor." iii. 659 sqq.; Holzapfel, "Die Anfänge der Montes Pietatis"; Benigni in "Cath. Enc.")

MONSTRANCE. From the Latin monstrare, "to show"; the vessel in which the Blessed Sacrament is exposed at Benediction or carried in procession. It has a large stem and base like a chalice, and the upper portion is generally fashioned to represent rays issuing from the host as a central sun. At first it was constructed like the turrets in which the Blessed Sacrament was anciently exposed, and various other designs are employed. When Fénelon's quietism was condemned by the Holy See he had a splendid monstrance made, the lower part of which represented angels trampling on bad books, one of which bore the title of Fénelon's own work, "Maxims of the Saints." The origin of the monstrance is traced back to the institution of the festival of Corpus Christi (q.v.). It is also called Ostensorium, from the Latin ostendere, and often, incorrectly, Remonstrance.

MONTANISTS. The earlier writers call them "the men of Phrygia" (οἱ κατὰ Φρύγας) because Montanus belonged to that country, and it was at Pepuza that he and two women, Maximilla and Priscilla, claimed to exercise prophetic gifts. The great importance of the movement is shown by the facts that Tertullian, the ablest of the Ante-Nicene Fathers except Origen, was won over to Montanism; that Claudius Apollinaris, Miltiades, and Rhodon exerted themselves against it; that the first councils of the Church were held in the middle of the second century to stem its progress in Asia Minor; and that three bishops of Rome, Soter, Eleutherus, and (probably) Victor, pronounced themselves against it—the last, according to Tertullian, after some hesitation (Tertull. "Adv. Prax." 1, PL, ii. 155). Montanus, if we may believe the report mentioned by Euseb. ("H.E." v. 16), hanged himself, and so did Maximilla. The power of Montanism did not outlast the second century, but adherents of the sect are mentioned even in edicts of Justinian and Leo the Isaurian.

Montanism was a reaction against a change which necessarily occurred as the number of Christians increased, as the extraordinary gifts, prophecy and the like, became very rare, and there was no sign of our Lord's coming to close at once the fortunes of the world and the Church. It was this speedy coming of Christ which the new prophets announced; it was the belief in its nearness which they endeavoured to revive. "After me," said Maximilla (Epiphan. "Haer." xlviii. 2, PG, xli. 857), "there will be no longer a prophetess, but the consummation." The prophets had already seen a miraculous representation of Christ's descent from heaven (Tertull. "Adv. Marc." iii. 24, PL, ii. 357). It was time, then, for Christians to break utterly with a world which would ere long break with them. The concessions which the Apostles even had made to human weakness were to be allowed no longer. The Paraclete had appeared in the prophets and inaugurated the last and most perfect stage in the development of the Church ("De Virg. Veland." 1; PL, ii. 889). The new discipline now in force made second marriages unlawful (Tertull. "Adv. Marc." i. 29, PL, ii. 280, and "De Monog." and "Exhort. Castit." throughout); made the fasts of the Stations obligatory, and prolonged the fast till the evening, whereas with the Catholics it ended at 3 P.M. ("De Jejun." 10); and imposed two weeks (Saturdays and Sundays excepted) of "xerophagy"—i.e. of abstinence from flesh-meat, wine, dainties of all sorts, and the bath (ib. 15). No flight in persecution was lawful ("De Fuga," 6, ii. 108"). But the most serious difference between Montanists and Catholics arose from their different views on absolution. In the "De Pudicitia" Tertullian combats the claim of the Roman bishop to pardon grievous sinners and restore them to the peace of the Church. He argues that this power belonged to the Apostles personally, just as the grace of miracles did, but denies that it was transmitted to their successors. God alone could forgive sins, and though, no doubt, He might declare His will through the prophets, and enable the Church to absolve from adultery, &c., as a matter of fact the Paraclete had said through the prophets, "The Church can pardon crimes, but I will not do so, lest they commit more crimes" ("Pudic." 21, PL, ii. 1024). "Psychici," or "animal men," is the name the Montanists gave to Catholics; "spiritual men" was the title they claimed for themselves.

Except on the power of the Keys there was no dogmatic difference between Montanists and the Church. Tertullian speaks of the Paraclete as inaugurating new discipline, not new doctrine ("De Pud." 11, PL, ii. 1001), and the author of the "Philosophumena" (viii. 19) expressly says the Montanists held Catholic doctrine, and only attributes Sabellian[1] error to some of them (τινὲς δὲ αὐτῶν τῇ τῶν Νοητιανῶν αἱρέσει συντιθέμενοι, κ.τ.λ.). As the Gnostics undermined the dogma, so the Montanists the discipline of the Church. The one set individual wisdom and intellect, the other individual holiness and devotion, against the claim of ecclesiastical authority. And thus it is that Gnosticism and Montanism are two great factors in the development of the Catholic Church. The opposition which they occasioned led the Church to assert explicitly her double claim—her claim to teach the absolute truth on the one hand; to try the spirits and restore the sinner on the other. (Schwegler's work on Montanism—Tübingen, 1841—led to a more intelligent appreciation of the subject. Baur has given an interesting summary of his views in his "Kirchengeschichte," p. 237 seq. But the best and most careful account, so far as we know, is that of Ritschl, "Entstehung der Altkatholischen Kirche," pp. 462 sqq.) Tixeront, "Hist. des Dogmes," i. 210; Duchesne, "Hist. Ancienne de l'Église," i. 270; Chapman in "Cath. Enc."; Harnack, in "Enc. Britannica.")

MORAL THEOLOGY is the science of the laws which regulate duty. It is distinguished from moral philosophy, or ethics, which is concerned with the principles of right and wrong, and with their application, so far only as they can be discovered from the light of nature; whereas moral theology estimates the moral character of actions by their conformity, not only to the natural standard of ethics, but also to the Christian revelation and positive law of the Church. It is different from dogmatic theology, which investigates the truths of revelation, their connection with each other, and the conclusions which may be drawn from them; moral theology, on the other hand, looks primarily to duty and practice, not to speculative truth; it considers faith as a moral obligation, and the truths of faith as principles of conduct. But perhaps we shall give a better, if a less scientific, idea of moral theology by describing it as the science of priests sitting in the confessional, the science which enables them to distinguish right from wrong, mortal sin from venial sin, counsels of perfection from strict obligation, and so to administer the sacrament of Penance. Indeed, it is because moral theology has arisen from the wants and is adapted to the needs of priests in the confessional, because it is directed to the solution of cases more or less likely to occur, that treatises on the subject are mostly deficient in scientific unity. They draw from philosophers and dogmatic theologians, canon and civil law, ascetical and liturgical authors, &c., the material which a priest wants that he may know when to give, when to refuse, absolution, what conditions he is to exact from his penitents, how he is to advise and exhort them.

In the first centuries of the Church public penance was in force. This was regulated by the canons; much less was left to the judgment of the bishop or the priest, and therefore there was no pressing need for compendiums of moral theology. The administration of the sacrament of Penance was regulated by conciliar decisions or by collections of penitential canons, such as those attributed to St. Gregory Thaumaturgus, St. Peter of Alexandria, St. Basil, and St. Gregory Nyssen. From the seventh[1] to the thirteenth century the use of penitential books prevailed in the Latin Church—that is to say, from the whole body of decrees, canons, and sentences, those things which pertained to the sacrament of Penance were gathered in one book, known as "Extracts from the Canons of the Fathers for the Healing of Souls," "On Remedies for Sins," or, simply, "Penitential Book." But it was Pope St. Gregory's great work, "Expositio in B. Job, seu Moralium libri xxxv.," which was the text-book of the moralists until the days of the Schoolmen. Also his "Regula Pastoralis," so highly commended by Ven. Bede, was much in use among them. In the thirteenth century moral theology arose. Up to that time the confessor had to be guided purely by his own reason and the authority of ecclesiastical decisions contained in his "Penitential Book." But now scholastic theologians and canonists began to discuss the sense of ecclesiastical decisions, to harmonize them, to draw inferences from them and from the principles of the natural and revealed law. "Cases of conscience" were considered and decided on the private judgment of theologians, and not merely, as before, by councils and bishops, though the name of "casuist" began, apparently, some centuries later. Collections were made of the things a confessor should know when he had to decide cases and doubts proposed to him.

Among the earliest works on moral theology are the following, which belong to the thirteenth century: "Summa de Casibus Poenitentialibus," by St. Raymund of Pennafort (floruit 1228). Its four books treat (1) of sins against God; (2) of sins against our neighbour; (3) of ecclesiastics, [1] "Patripassian" would be more accurate. No one could be more opposed to such an error than Tertullian. The general orthodoxy of the Montanists is further attested by Firmilian, Ad Cyp., and Epiphanius, Haer. xlviii. 1, PG, xli. 856.

[1] They were introduced rather earlier in the East; see the article on PENITENTIAL DISCIPLINE AND BOOKS.

their rights, privileges, duties; (4) of marriage. It was printed at Louvain, 1480; Cologne, 1495; Paris, 1500. "Summa de Virtutibus" and "Destructorium Vitiorum" are two works attributed, on doubtful grounds, to Alexander of Hales. The "Speculum Morale," by Vincent of Beauvais. The "Liber Poenitentiarum," by John of God, written in 1247. Glosses on the "Summa" of St. Raymund of Pennafort were written by a Dominican, Gulielmus Redonensis, about 1250, and widely circulated under the name of "John of Freiburg." A little later came St. Bonaventure's "Confessionale."

The chief productions of the fourteenth century were: the "Summa Major" and "Quaestiones Casuales," by the Dominican, John of Freiburg; the "Summa de Casibus Conscientiae," by a Franciscan, Astesanus or Astensis; "Summa Casuum Conscientiae," by Monaldus, another Franciscan, who flourished about 1330; "Summa Casuum Conscientiae," by Bartholomaeus a S. Concordia, a Dominican of Pisa, who wrote in 1338; "Speculum Curatorum," by a Benedictine, Ranulphus Higdenus (1357). But the most famous book of this age appeared in 1385 from the pen of Joannes de Burgo. It is entitled "Pupilla Oculi omnibus Sacerdotibus, tam Curatis quam non Curatis, summe necessaria, in qua tractatur de septem sacramentorum administratione, de decem praeceptis decalogi, et de reliquis ecclesiasticorum officiis."

Many famous works on moral theology are due to authors of the fifteenth century. Gerson's "Opusculum Tripartitum de praeceptis decalogi, de confessione, de arte moriendi," had so great a reputation that seventeen synods ordered priests to use it in expounding the Decalogue, hearing confessions, and visiting the sick. Three canonized saints, St. Bernardine of Siena ("De Confessione"), St. John Capistran ("Speculum Conscientiae," tractatus "De Canone Poenitentiali," "De Usuris," "De Contractibus," &c.), and St. Antoninus, archbishop of Florence, wrote on moral subjects. The "Summa Theologica et Summa Confessionalis" of the last has often been republished, and is still quoted. Many other names might be given. Nor must it be supposed that an idea can be formed of mediaeval moral theology from an account, even if an exhaustive one, of books exclusively devoted to this science. On the contrary, the greatest moral theologian of the Middle Ages, and the one who has had the most enduring influence, is St. Thomas Aquinas. But he, especially in the "Secunda Secundae," treats moral theology in its organic connection with dogmatic theology. His example has been followed by many later writers; and this, we venture to think, is the true scientific method, though far less convenient for practical purposes. Scotus, on the other hand, scarcely touched on moral questions; perhaps because he found the ground sufficiently occupied by Alexander of Hales and St. Thomas.

From the sixteenth century moral theology has been treated with greater completeness, and its order has been perfected for practical use. But the great change which has occurred consists in this, that theories affecting the whole system of moral theology arose, and divided casuists into schools clearly separated from and often bitterly hostile to each other. Medina, a Spanish Dominican (1528–1581) and professor at Salamanca, first (in his "Exposition of St. Thomas") propounded the theory since known as Probabilism[1] in set terms, and kindled a controversy which raged for two centuries after his death, and is not yet quite extinct.

A probable opinion is one which rests on reasons which are good and solid, but not so strong as to exclude all doubt. Hence, in many matters of conscience there may be a probable opinion according to which I am free to choose a particular course of action, and another opinion, also probable, that I have no such liberty, the law, human or divine, having already decided the matter for me. After doing my best to ascertain the real extent of the obligation, I am still in doubt. The opinion which favours the law and that which favours my liberty both seem probable. In such cases, Probabilists hold that I am free to use my liberty. A doubtful law, they urge, is not binding. A man's conscience can be bound by a law only so far as he knows of its existence; and in this case I do not know for certain the existence of the law, nor have I the means of doing so. Therefore I may act with safety, because I am certain that practically the law does not bind me. But several limitations must be made. First, I must be sure that the opinion on the side of liberty rests on a firm basis in the reason of the thing, in the authors of great name and weight who support it, or in both. The proposition that I may follow a probability, however slight, in favour of liberty, belongs to lax, not to Probabilist theologians, and was condemend by Innocent XI. (Prop. 3). Next, if a man is under the obligation of attaining to some definite external end, he is bound to take all reasonable means of securing that end, and may by no means follow an opinion probable, or even more probable, that the end will be secured. He must take the most certain means open to him. For example, a priest must not confer the sacraments after a fashion which leaves doubt as to their validity, if a safer path is open to him. A man must not pay a debt with money or a cheque which he knows may prove worthless, though he has strong reasons for thinking them good. A doctor must not use doubtful remedies if he has better ones at command. A man may not fire at game if he knows there is even a slight danger of wounding a fellow-creature. Such opinions, again, are lax, not Probabilist, and are contrary not only to the fundamental principles of Christianity, but also to the natural conscience and common sense of mankind.

Laxity manifests itself in many ways, and the reader may form some idea of the scandalous excesses into which it has run by reading the list of propositions condemned by the Popes, especially by Innocent XI. We need not say more about it here; and, on the other side, we may also dismiss the opinion of the Rigorists, or Tutiorists, who held that we must always take the safer way, always sacrifice our freedom, however small the probability that our freedom is restrained by the law. This opinion was proscribed by Alexander VIII. A kindred opinion that we must not take advantage of our liberty unless we can point to an opinion of the highest probability in its favour may also be dismissed, for it never found any considerable support among theologians. Very different is it with another system of moral theology known as Probabiliorism, for long the powerful and even, for a time and in a certain degree, the triumphant rival of Probabilism.

The Probabiliorists put no restraint on liberty, where a man was convinced on solid grounds that the balance of evidence was decidedly in favour of his liberty. In such a case, they said, he acted prudently and as became a Christian. He was doing his best to ascertain the truth, and, after weighing the reasons, had decided that he might do this or that without sin. He judged according to the merits of the case and decided according to the rules of evidence, just as an honest judge would do. He chose the way to which he was inclined, not solely because of his inclination, but because of the preponderating evidence. On the other hand, a man who used his liberty when the probability of the opinions for and against his right to exercise it were evenly balanced, wantonly exposed himself to danger of material sin. If he acted against an opinion which he himself allowed to be more probable, alleging an opinion also probable on his own side, he was judging against the weight of evidence, and therefore sinning against the truth. If the Probabilists quoted the maxim, "A doubtful law does not bind," the Probabiliorists retorted, "In doubtful matters choose the safer side." If the Probabilists pleaded that they acted with safe and sure conscience, since, doubtful as they might be as to the absolute lawfulness of a particular action, they could be certain in practice that the action was lawful to them, since the law was uncertain, and, not being certain, had no binding force, the Probabiliorists replied, "You cannot feel certain of this without culpable presumption. The reflex principle which you assume to be morally certain, and make the basis of your conviction that in the particular case you are certainly free to act, is, in fact, contested by all Probabiliorists—i.e. by a vast number of grave and learned theologians from all nations, orders, and ranks in the Church. Yet, if this reflex principle be doubtful; if your argument, 'The law is uncertain, and therefore I am certain it does not bind,' is itself not absolutely and evidently cogent, then the question is at an end. You yourselves admit the wickedness of acting with a conscience practically doubtful. 'Whatsoever is not of faith is of sin.'"

From 1580 till about 1650 Probabilism, as even Billuart does not venture to deny, held possession of the schools. The great theologians prior to Medina's date did not treat the question formally, and are quoted on both sides. From about 1650 a powerful reaction set in. In France, Zaccaria writes, Probabilism was hated as "the pest of morality," and in 1700 it was condemned in the Assembly-General of the French clergy. The learned Benedictines of St. Maur and St. Vannes and the Fathers of the French Oratory were notoriously hostile to it. Nor must it be thought that this hostility was peculiar to French ecclesiastics or to Gallicans. Most, according to Billuart, of the Dominicans, some distinguished Jesuits (e.g. Gonzalez, General of the Society), and many Italian writers (e.g. the Dominican Concina, the brothers Peter and Jerome Ballerini, Berti, Fagnanus, many years secretary of the Congregation of the Council) were in the hostile ranks. Benedict XIV. made the moral theology of the Jesuit Antoine (in the Roman edition of the Franciscan Carbognano), an author rigid even among the Probabiliorists, the text-book at the Propaganda. And it may perhaps be worth mention that Bishop Milner recommended Collet, another Probabiliorist, for the use of his clergy. It was the text-book at Oscott within the memory of priests still alive. Henno, a well-known Franciscan, calculated that when he wrote—viz. in 1710—there were twenty Probabiliorists for one Probabilist; while the Flemish theologian Billuart, in 1747, thought the preponderance of numbers on the side of Probabiliorism had been doubled in the interval. No faith can be placed even in the proximate accuracy of these estimates. Still, they may be fairly accepted as evidence that numbers were on the side of Probabiliorism.

The proportion is now reversed, and Probabilism is the popular theory throughout the Church. It may, indeed, be regarded as the only existent theory. Carrière (died 1864), a distinguished Sulpician, who wrote "De Contractibus et Matrimonio," is the only recent writer on moral theology, so far as we know, who is not a Probabilist. This change is due partly, we think, to the force of reason, for we cannot see that Probabiliorism is logical and consistent, and the arguments adduced by its advocates really tend to Tutiorism; partly to the disappearance of the old French Church and many Catholic universities where the stricter doctrine on morals had a strong hold; partly to the great influence of St. Alphonsus' works on moral theology. His "Theologia Moralis" and "Homo Apostolicus" appeared about the middle of the 18th century, and have often been republished. At present the Probabilist theology of this writer is accepted almost everywhere in the Church, and the recent works of Scavini and Gury are little more than adaptations of St. Alphonsus, though, of course, these authors do not follow him blindly, and the Jesuit Ballerini (in his notes to Gury) often differs from his conclusions. Moreover, the Congregation of Rites, in a decree confirmed by the Pope in 1803, declared that St. Alphonsus' works contained "nothing worthy of censure." This, as Heilig, the Redemptorist editor, explains, by no means implies that each statement of St. Alphonsus is true, or even that none of them will ever be condemned by the Church. It only means that his works are free from any "error already recognized as such by the Church." So, again, in 1831, the Sacred Penitentiary affirmed that a confessor might safely follow all St. Alphonsus' opinions on account of the judgment of the Holy See just quoted, adding, however, that there was no fault in adopting the opinions given by other approved authors. The subsequent elevation of the saint to the rank of Doctor of the Church makes no formal difference in the authority of his system, though it is clearly another mark of the Church's approbation. The Pope would not have made him a Doctor of the Church had he regarded the great literary work of his life in defending and expounding Probabilism as a mistake.

We passed over by design a subdivision which exists among Probabilists themselves. Aequi-probabilists hold that a man may use his liberty if the reasons in favour of his right to do so are at least equal in probability to those on the other side, but not otherwise. Probabilists pure and simple would allow a man to take advantage of his liberty if he has really probable grounds for thinking that the law does not bind him, even if the argument on the other side is more probable. This subdivision of Probabilists is an old one, but it has attracted more attention of late. The Redemptorist authors of the "Vindiciae Alphonsianae" try, we believe, to show that St. Alphonsus was an Aequi-probabilist. The object of their book is to correct Ballerini, who edited the Moral Theology of his brother Jesuit Gury, with elaborate notes, in which he not only assumes that St. Alphonsus was a Probabilist pure and simple, but often defends the probability of opinions which the saint rejected. In his third edition Ballerini replies to the charges of laxity which the Redemptorists made against him. A posthumous work on moral theology written by him was edited by Palmieri in 1892.

(The historical part of this article is drawn from Zaccaria's learned dissertation prefixed to some editions of St. Alphonsus' "Theologia Moralis." We have said nothing of the great moral theologians who have written during the last three centuries, De Lugo, Sporer, La Croix, &c., because a useful list of them is prefixed to Gury's work, and is sure to be in the hands of those whom the subject interests.)

MORGANATIC MARRIAGE ("coined from German morgen, here short for morgen-gabe, lit. morning-gift, originally a present made to a wife on the morning after marriage, especially if the wife were of inferior rank"—Skeat). In some countries when a member of the royal house marries a person of non-royal rank, such person is not raised to the rank of her husband, nor are her children reckoned in the line of succession. If, however, all the conditions of the Church have been fulfilled, the marriage is a true one in the eyes of the Church, and no other marriage can be contracted during the lifetime of both the parties. Even the civil law in some countries recognizes no other marriage as lawful. In England, however, the so-called morganatic wife is no wife at all. Thus, Mrs. Fitzherbert, who was married to the Prince of Wales (afterwards George IV.), was in English law only his concubine, and her existence was no bar to his subsequent union with Caroline of Brunswick. On the other hand, English law recognizes in the case of persons not in the royal succession the civil rights of a wife however inferior she may be in rank to her husband.

MORSE, also called Monile, Pectorale. A clasp to fasten the cope across the breast. It was often made of precious metal or ivory, and richly ornamented. (Rock, ii. 31; Braun, "Die Liturgische Gewandung," 321 sqq., where numerous specimens are depicted.)

MORTAL SIN. [See SIN.]

MORTIFICATION. [See ASCETAE; FAST.]

MORTMAIN. [See WILL (2).]

MOTU PROPRIO. A kind of apostolic letter, generally in the form of a decree issued by the Pope "on his own initiative." It bears at the end the Pope's name, e.g. Benedictus PP. XV., and is not countersigned by any official. It is a sign that the Pontiff wishes to act in the fulness of his power. (Taunton.) [See RESCRIPT.]

MOZARABIC RITE. [See LITURGIES.]

MOZZETTA (from mozzo, mutilus; cf.

μίτυλος and μύτιλος, curtailed). A short vestment, quite open in front, which can, however, be buttoned over the breast, covering the shoulders, and with a little hood behind. It is worn by the Pope, by cardinals, bishops, abbots, and others who do so by custom or Papal privilege—e.g. in England by canons. As it is the usual state dress of a bishop when he is not saying Mass or performing other sacred functions, bishops, &c., are usually painted with the mozzetta. The mozzetta leaves the greater part of the rochet uncovered, hence it is either not worn at all or worn only over the mantelletta by cardinals, bishops, and others where they have no jurisdiction. Thus the cardinals wear the mozzetta and rochet only in the churches from which they take their titles; but throughout Rome during a vacancy of the Holy See, especially at Conclaves.

The Pope wears five different mozzette. In the hotter part of the year—viz. from the first vespers of the Ascension to the feast of St. Catharine—his mozzetta is of red satin except on vigils, ember days, Masses of the dead, and other penitential occasions, when it is of red serge or camlet. The other half of the year he wears a mozzetta of red velvet, except as a mark of sorrow or penance in Advent, Septuagesima to the end of Lent, vigils, &c., when his mozzetta is of red woollen cloth. On a feast, such as those of the Annunciation and Conception, the anniversary of his election and consecration, on visiting a church where the Blessed Sacrament is exposed, &c., he puts aside the mourning mozzetta even during penitential seasons. From Holy Saturday till Saturday in Low Week his mozzetta is of white damask. The cardinals have four mozzette—viz. of red or purple silk, violet silk, rose-coloured silk, violet serge. (Moroni, "Dizionario Istorico"; Braun, "Die Liturgische Gewandung," 377.) [See ALMUCE.]

MUNDATORY, or Purificatory. A cloth of linen or hemp (S.C.R. May 18, 1819), used for cleansing the chalice. It has a small cross in the middle to distinguish it from the Lavabo towel. It is mentioned in the "Caeremoniale Episcoporum," but its use is of recent date and it is not blessed. The Greeks use a sponge instead. (Benedict XIV. "De Miss." i. v. 5.)

MURATORIAN CANON. [See CANON OF THE SCRIPTURE, p. 112.]

MUSIC, CHURCH. [See CHANT.]

MYSTERY. In common parlance something hidden or veiled, especially by one mind from another (μύειν, to close the eyes; μῦ, a slight sound with closed lips). The heathens gave the name to the symbolical or sacred words and acts which they kept secret from the multitude, or to the hidden meaning of their liturgy, understood only by the initiated. By the early Fathers the term was applied to the sacred words and acts of the true religion, kept secret from the heathens and even from the catechumens. In the theological sense a mystery is a truth incapable of being discovered by human reason and incapable of being understood by it: a mystery is subjectively above reason and objectively above nature—it is both super-rational and supernatural. "Besides those things which natural reason can attain, there are proposed for our belief the mysteries hidden in God, which, unless they were divinely revealed, could not be known. . . . By their very nature the divine mysteries so far surpass the created intellect that, even when they have been imparted by revelation and received by faith, they nevertheless remain hidden and enveloped, as it were, in a sort of mist, as long as in this mortal life we are absent from the Lord, for we walk by faith, and not by sight (2 Cor. v. 6, 7). "If anyone shall say that in divine revelation no mysteries properly so called are contained, but that all the dogmas of the faith can be understood and demonstrated from natural principles by reason duly cultivated, let him be anathema." (Vatican Council, sess. iii. c. 4.) The teaching of the council is based on many passages of Scripture (1 Cor. ii. 6–12; Eph. iii. 4–9; Col. i. 26, 27; Mt. xi. 25–27; Jn. i. 18). The patristic writings contain many passages commenting on these texts: e.g. St. John Chrysostom and St. Jerome on Eph. iii.; also St. Peter Chrysologus, hom. 67 sqq. on the Lord's Prayer. (See TRINITY, E; Vacant, "Constitutions du Concile du Vatican," ii. 185 sqq.; Wilhelm and Scannell "Cath. Theol." i. 8 sqq.; Scheeben "Die Mysterien des Christenthums")

MYSTICAL SENSE OF SCRIPTURE. In the historical or literal sense words signify things; but sometimes God ordained that the things signified by the words should signify other things, and so we get the mystical or spiritual sense. St. Paul, for example, tells us in the Epistle to the Galatians that Ishmael and Isaac were types of Jewish bondage and Christian liberty. The mystical sense is subdivided into the allegorical, where the things of the old signify the mysteries of the new law; the moral, where they signify moral precepts; the anagogical, where they signify future glory (St. Thomas, 1ª, q. 1, a. 10). The mystical interpretation is by no means peculiar to Christians. Philo, St. Paul's contemporary, found in the allegorical interpretation of the Old Testament an easy means of reconciling it with Greek philosophy, and allegorical interpretation has been systematized by the Rabbins.[1] St.

[1] They also recognise four modes of interpreting Scripture—viz. the literal (פְּשַׁט), the seeking of hints for laws, precepts, &c. (רֶמֶז), the deduction of dogma and legal determinations (דְּרַשׁ), the interpretation of mystical theology (סוֹד). See Hamburger, Real-Encycl. für Bibel und Talmud, art. "Exegese."

Paul's authority proves that there is a mystical sense in Scripture; but common sense warns us of the dangers attached to such a method of interpretation. And St. Thomas, following St. Augustine, teaches that arguments can be drawn from the literal sense alone (loc. cit.). [See BIBLE.]

MYSTICAL THEOLOGY. One of the subdivisions of theology classed under the more general division of Moral Theology. It is sometimes identified with Ascetical Theology, but it seems more proper to confine its definition in such a way as to distinguish it precisely, by its specific name of "Mystical," from that which is more properly called "Ascetical" (q.v.). According to this stricter definition it is described as comprising two parts—viz. the doctrinal and the experimental. The experimental is defined as "a pure knowledge of God which the soul ordinarily receives in a luminous darkness or obscure light of sublime contemplation, together with an experimental love so intimate that the soul, losing itself altogether, is united to God and transformed into Him." This is called Theology because it contains acts proximately referred to God as their object; Mystical, because acquired by a secret operation known only to God and the recipient of His Divine favours; and experimental, because it is only by personal spiritual experience that such a knowledge of God can be gained. Doctrinal Mystical Theology is "a science which considers the acts of the experimental, and discusses their essence, properties, and effects, according to the authority of the Scriptures and the contemplative saints, giving practical rules for the guidance of those who have attained, or are in the way to attain, the state of high contemplation."

The most eminent mystical writers in the Catholic Church are Pseudo-Dionysius the so-called Areopagite, St. Bernard, St. Thomas, St. Anselm, St. Bonaventure, Hugh and Richard of St. Victor, Gerson, Harphius, Tauler, St. Theresa, and St. John of the Cross, and others. The great modern Doctor in Mystical Theology, whose works are the most complete and luminous, the most sublime, and at the same time the most philosophically exact and precise, and whose authority is the highest which any private theologian can have, is St. John of the Cross. His works have been translated into English in the best manner by D. Lewis. A more unpretending but very solid and useful treatise is the "Sancta Sophia" of F. Baker, an English Benedictine. As scientific and methodical treatises for the use of directors and professed theologians, the "Institutiones Theologiae Mysticae" of F. Schram, O.S.B., and the "Directorium Mysticum" of F. Scaramelli, S.J., are in the highest repute. (See Von Hügel, "The Mystical Element of Religion"; Thorold, "An Essay in aid of the Better Appreciation of Catholic Mysticism"; Devine, "Manual of Mystical Theology.") NAILS, HOLY. In the story of the Finding of the Cross (see CROSS, p. 243) it is mentioned that the nails with which our Lord's body was fastened were discovered hard by the cross itself. St. Helena had one of these made into a bridle for her son Constantine, having in mind the words of the prophet Zechariah (Zachary): "that which is upon the bridle of the horse shall be holy to the Lord" ("There shall be upon the bells of the horses 'Holy unto the Lord'" (R.V. xiv. 20). Another of the nails was worked into an imperial crown (St. Ambrose, "De Obitu Theodosii," PL, xvi. 1402). This is said to be the one now preserved at Monza, "the iron crown of Lombardy." There are others venerated at various places (notably at Santa Croce in Rome) which may be facsimiles or may contain portions of the nails mentioned above. (Rohault de Fleury, "Les Instruments de la Passion," 165–181; Thurston in "Cath. Enc.")

N

NAME, CHRISTIAN, ETC. [See BAPTISMAL NAME.]

NAME OF JESUS. [See JESUS.]

NAME OF MARY. [See MARY, FEAST OF THE NAME.]

NARTHEX (νάρθηξ, the giant fennel). In the ancient basilicas a long narrow space, from which outer doors led into the portico, and inner doors into the body of the church, was known by this name. In it stood the Audientes (penitents allowed to enter the church, but only the part farthest from the altar), the Possessed (χειμαζόμενοι), and the Catechumens, who had not yet been baptized. The oblong shape of this space, which extended the whole width of the building, suggested the name. (Smith and Cheetham; Kraus, "Geschichte der Christl. Kunst," i. 285, 549.)

NATALE, NATALITIA. The day on which a saint is born into eternal life—i.e. the day of his death. The Church does not celebrate the natural birthday of the saints because they were born in sin, and the fact that she keeps the birthday of St. John the Baptist is, as St. Augustine points out, an exception which proves the rule, for St. John was cleansed from original sin before his birth.[1]

The use of Natale, Natalitia, &c., for the day of a saint's death is very ancient. Thus the Church of Smyrna says of its bishop Polycarp, "We keep the birthday of his martyrdom" (τὴν τοῦ μαρτυρίου αὐτοῦ ἡμέραν γενέθλιον) ("Mart. Polyc." 18), and Tertullian speaks of the Mass said on the feasts of martyrs as "oblationes pro natalitiis" ("De Corona," 3, PL, ii. 79). The Church still retains the use of the word in her collects. Thence Natale came to mean a feast generally — e.g. "Natale Petri de Cathedra" in the ancient Kalendarium Becclerianum is the feast of St. Peter's Chair. It was also used for the anniversary of a bishop's consecration. (Probst, loc. cit.; Smith and Cheetham.)

NATIONAL SYNOD. [See COUNCIL.]

NATIVITY OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN. Nothing is known about the place, date, or circumstances of the Blessed Virgin's birth. Joachim and Anne are believed to have been her parents, and this belief, the earliest authority for which is the "Protevangelium Jacobi," an apocryphal Gospel of early date, was current in the East and West during the eighth century. It is recognized by St. John of Damascus and James, bishop of Edessa, while the "Liber Pontificalis," mentions in the life of Pope Leo III. that he had the history of St. Joachim and St. Anne painted in the Basilica of St. Paul. The feast of St. Anne on July 26, which is mentioned in the Roman and other Martyrologies, was sanctioned for the whole Church by Gregory XIII. in 1584. Leo XIII. raised both feasts (St. Joachim and St. Anne) to be doubles of the second class.

It is very uncertain when the feast of the Blessed Virgin's nativity was introduced. The Breviary lessons for the feast, said to be taken from St. Augustine, are spurious. The mention of the feast in Sacramentaries of St. Gelasius and St. Gregory proves little, considering the changes and frequent recensions which books of that sort, intended, as they are, for practical purposes, are sure to undergo. It is not mentioned by the Council of Mayence in 813, though it gives a list of the feasts then celebrated; nor again in the capitularies of Charlemagne and Louis the Pious. On the other hand, it is mentioned by Walter, bishop of Orleans, in 871, and in a work on the virginity of Mary ascribed to St. Ildefonsus, but really, as Dachery thinks, written by Paschasius Radbertus, in the middle of the ninth century. It is placed in the list of holidays by the Emperor Manuel Comnenus in the middle of the twelfth century, and the Copts as well as the Greeks have adopted it. Both Greeks and Latins now keep it on September 8, though at one time this was not everywhere the day fixed for the celebration. The octave was added by Innocent IV. in consequence, it is said, of a vow made by the cardinals at the election of Celestine IV. The dissensions between the Church and Frederic II. made it difficult to secure the peace necessary for an election, and in this extremity the Conclave begged the Blessed Virgin's prayers, and promised, in case the favour was granted, to have an octave added to the feast of her nativity. In the new Calendar the octave is a "simple" one. (Kellner, "Heortology," tr. 230; Hollweck, "Fasti Mariani," 118 sqq.)

NAVE. That portion of the church reserved for the laity. Though the name is said to have been derived from the comparison of a church to a ship (see CHURCH), and the use of the corresponding words in French and other languages seems to justify this derivation, yet many make it to be from ναός, a temple. It was variously called oratorium laici, ἐκκλησία, and quadratum populi. In old English it was sometimes called nef.

NAZARETH, SISTERS OF. An offshoot from the institute of the Little Sisters of the Poor, which it resembles in most respects. There are many houses in the English-speaking countries at home and abroad.

NECROLOGY. A book containing the names of the dead, especially of bishops who had built the church to which the necrology belonged, of benefactors, friends, &c., that they might be prayed for. Such a book, as Meratus shows, is mentioned by Bede[1] ("H.E." iv. 14). According to Maskell it seems also to have been called Album or "White Book," Obituarium, Mortilegium. (Meratus on Gavantus, tom. ii. § v. 21; Maskell, "Monumenta Ritualia," clxxvii.)

NECROMANCY. [See SPIRITUALISM.]

NEOPHYTE (Gr. νεόφυτος, newly grown, of new nature). The term was applied in the primitive Church to converts newly baptized. They were dressed in white garments, and continued to wear them for eight days after their baptism. Thus of the West Saxon king Cedwalla, who, renouncing his crown, went to Rome to be baptized, and died soon after, we hear that he died while still in his white garments.[2] The Nicene Council ordered (Can. 2) that neophytes should not be hastily admitted to Holy Orders, but should undergo a probation of considerable length. This canon was evidently founded on the prohibition of St. Paul (1 Tim. iii. 6), and occasioned by the ill effects which had arisen from neglecting it. In later times the neophytes commonly met with, at least in Europe, were converts from heresy, Judaism, or Islam. For these Gregory XIII. founded an ecclesiastical college. The matrimonial relations between spouses, of whom one has become a neophyte but the other refuses to leave his or her original persuasion, give rise to many difficult questions in canon law. The Catholic missionaries still use the term for their converts from the heathen, whose fervour and steadfastness are often found to equal anything recorded of the primitive neophytes. (Ferraris, Neophyti.)

[1] Apparently, however, even the heathen Romans used "natale" as a euphemism for the day of death. This, at least, seems to follow from Mommsen (De Collegiis, p. 127), as quoted by Probst (Kirchliche Disciplin der drei ersten Jahrhunderte, p. 127). A quotation is given from Statutes of the Lanuvian Collegium, with lists of feasts for the "natalia," or days on which the members had died.

NESTORIANS. A name given to the Christians who follow the doctrine of Nestorius, and hold that there are two persons as well as two natures in Jesus Christ. These two distinct persons, the person of God and that of man, were, he said, bound together in Jesus Christ by a merely moral union—i.e. there was a conformity of will between the man Christ and God the Word, who dwelt in Him, and hence the properties of one nature or person could not be ascribed to the other. He rejected, e.g., such expressions as "the Word suffered," on the ground that it was the man Christ and not God the Word who was capable of suffering; "Mary is the mother of God," since Christ indeed had a mother, but God had none (Petav. "De Incarnat." i. 9). But a full account of the doctrine and history of Nestorius has been given in the article on the Council of Ephesus, and we confine ourselves to the history of the Nestorian Church.

The Nestorians had their original home and centre in Chaldaea and Mesopotamia. Christianity, it is said, was first preached there by Mar Addai and Mar Mari, of the number of the Seventy. The Bishop of Seleucia and Ctesiphon held the chief see in these parts, and after the schism became independent of Antioch.[1] The famous school of Edessa and the writings of Theodore of Mopsuestia prepared the way for Nestorianism, and when in 498 Babaeus, whom the metropolitan Barsumas of Nisibis had won over to Nestorianism, ascended the throne of Seleucia-Ctesiphon, Catholicism disappeared almost entirely in Mesopotamia. The Persians for obvious reasons encouraged the schism which separated their Christian subjects from the Greek Church of the Byzantine empire. The Persian kingdom was the refuge of Nestorianism. Thence it spread not only through Mesopotamia, Chaldaea, and Persia, but also to Arabia, Egypt, Media, Bactria, Hyrcania, India, and even China. The Nestorian Patriarch in the eleventh century had twenty-five metropolitans under him; the Nestorian "communion extended from China to Jerusalem, and its numbers, with those of the Monophysites, are said to have surpassed those of the Greek and Latin Churches together" (Newman's "Arians," p. 425).

[1] Assemani holds it for certain that till the schism the Bishop of Seleucia was a mere metropolitan subject to the Patriarch of Antioch. He must, however, have been superior in estimation to the other metropolitans.

Towards the end of the fourteenth century the Nestorian numbers fell rapidly, owing to the persecution by the Mongol king Timour. Later, the Nestorians suffered from internal schism. On occasion of a contested election to the Patriarchate three bishops and many priests appealed to Pope Julius III., who in 1553 proclaimed Sulaka "Patriarch of the Chaldeans," and thus began the series of patriarchs for the Chaldeans or descendants of Nestorians, who have renounced Nestorian doctrine and are in union with the Pope. In 1582 an archbishop, Simeon, who had separated some years previously from the Nestorian Patriarch, and called himself Patriarch of Kurdistan, also submitted to the Pope, and he too received from Rome the title of Chaldean Patriarch. These re-unions with the Catholic Church did not last long. But since the middle of the sixteenth century there were two Nestorian Patriarchs, one residing at Mosul, another in Central Kurdistan, and the constant intestine strife favoured the efforts of the Roman missionaries. In 1780 the Nestorian Patriarch Mar Elias at Mosul became a Catholic, and consequently it is only by the Lake of Urumiah and among the mountains of Kurdistan that Nestorians are found. The Christians in the low countries by the banks of the Tigris are Chaldeans—i.e. the descendants of Nestorians, now re-united to the Catholic Church. The Nestorians proper call themselves Suraya (Syrian) Christians, Meshihaye (Christians) Nestoraye, but never Chaldeans, which name is exclusively reserved to Catholics. It is true the Nestorian Patriarch calls himself "Patriarch of the Chaldeans in the East," but this title he only assumes in order to place himself on a level with the Catholic Patriarch at Mosul, and to avoid being regarded by the Latins as the head of an heretical sect.

The Bishop of Seleucia and Ctesiphon received the title of Catholicos in the fourth century—as representative in the East of the Antiochene Patriarch. He himself assumed the title of Patriarch after the schism. Till the middle of the fifteenth century he was chosen by the metropolitans and other bishops. These last assembled, with the archdeacon of the former Patriarch and with the chief laity, and chose the new Patriarch unanimously. In difficulty, recourse was had to the lot, and from 987 the secular power confirmed the election. Since 1450 the Patriarch has been chosen from one family, and generally the office has descended from uncle to nephew. The indispensable qualification for a Patriarch is that his mother during her pregnancy and while suckling her child, and the new Patriarch himself till the time of his election, should never have tasted flesh-meat. The Patriarch confirms the election of bishops, translates and deposes them. He alone consecrates the holy oils; no book can be published without his approbation. He prescribes the liturgical rules and his name is always mentioned in the daily office. The Patriarch also exercises civil jurisdiction in cases where Nestorians only are concerned, and though there is a right of appeal to the Emir it is seldom used. In 872 the residence of the Patriarch was transferred from Seleucia to Bagdad; from 1258 onwards he resided in various places; after 1560 he lived in the neighbourhood of Mosul. After Elias XI., Patriarch of Mosul, had been reconciled to the Catholic Church in 1780, the Bishop of Urumiah, who had assumed the title of Patriarch long before, in 1582, became the only Nestorian Patriarch. In 1590 he withdrew to Kochanes, in Kurdistan. In 1842 his residence was burnt by the Emir, Nurallah Beg; next year he was driven by the Kurds to Mosul; but in 1848 he returned to Kochanes (Badger, vol. i. pp. 258, 374). His income is got from a poll-tax, levied every three years, from commutation of excommunications into fines, and from a tithe on the first-fruits contributed for the support of the churches.

The new bishops used to be chosen by clergy and laity in the presence of the provincial bishops. At present they are chosen, if any suitable candidate can be found in this way, from the relatives of the former bishop. The bishop is consecrated by the Patriarch and sometimes by the metropolitan; but in the latter case he must receive the completion of the rite, involving the confirmation of the election, from the Patriarch himself. Diocesan synods are to be held twice a year, those of the metropolitan province annually, those of the Patriarchate every four years. Bishops in distant places may, instead of personal appearance, send an account of their dioceses and letters of union to the Patriarch once every six years. Married men or widowers cannot become bishops, metropolitans, or patriarchs. A law of the Patriarch Babaeus in 499 permitted the reiterated nuptials even of the highest ecclesiastics; but it was repealed by the Patriarch Mar-Abas in 514. Still, the letter of two canons in the Sinhados assumes that bishops may be married (Badger, vol. ii. ch. 36, p. 180). The metropolitan (matran) has no power over his suffragans, except that of summoning them to synods and consecrating them. The usual title of the bishop is "Abuna" (Father). He is supported by an annual poll-tax, gifts in kind at harvest-time, fees for ordination, consecration of churches, dispensations for marriage, &c. The diocese of the Patriarch is in Central Kurdistan. There are eight metropolitans, with seven bishops. The whole Nestorian population amounts to about 100,000. The archdeacon is the bishop's vicar in spiritual and temporal matters. The chorepiscopus (saura or visitor, corresponding to the Greek περιοδευτής) visits the country churches. He instructs the country clergy in their functions, sees that the episcopal dues are collected, superintends the election of parish priests, &c. His place is at the bishop's left, that of the archdeacon at his right. Next comes the archpriest, who is the chorepiscopus of the city.

The parish priests, who are married and may even marry again after ordination, are chosen by the people, the bishop confirming the choice. An office peculiar to the Nestorians is that of the Sciahara or cleric who is responsible for the night-hours of the Breviary office. He is only, as a rule, a cantor (amura) by ordination, although he is called deacon or priest. The parish priests, though they have great influence and are consulted in all political and domestic affairs of importance, get very little money and follow a trade. There are two minor orders, reader and subdeacon; three higher, deacon, priest, bishop. The tonsure is given before the lectorate.

The monasteries, once numerous among the Nestorians, are now extinct. The only old monastery is in the hands of the Chaldeans —i.e. Catholics of the same rite—and no new ones have arisen. The monastic profession declined after the fourteenth century, when vows of chastity were no longer regarded as irrevocable. The canons, however, required monks and nuns who married to do so privately and with the bishop's leave. A monk and nun before their marriage were subjected to penance. Although there are now no nunneries, there are women under temporary [1] vows of chastity who occupy themselves in works of Christian charity (Badger, vol. ii. p. 179).

The Nestorians use the old Syrian rite, in classical Syriac. (Assemani, "Bibl. Orient." P. ii. cap. 1–6; Badger, "The Nestorians and their Rituals," London, 1852; Silbernagl, "Kirchen des Orients," pp. 202 seq. A full account of the present state of the Nestorian Church will be found in Fortescue, "Lesser Eastern Churches," ch. v.)

NE TEMERE. Some account of the recent changes in the law of clandestinity has already been given in the article IMPEDIMENTS OF MARRIAGE, p. 445, but a few words may be added here to prevent any misunderstanding of the much-abused decree on the subject, issued August 2, 1907, and beginning with the words "Ne temere."

By the law of the Council of Trent ("Tametsi," sess. xxiv. De Ref. Matrim.) marriages were declared invalid unless celebrated in the presence of the parish priest of one or other of the two parties (or another priest with the permission of the parish priest or the bishop) and two witnesses. This law was to be binding only in places where the decree was published. As a fact, the decree was not published in non-Catholic countries, and hence it was not binding in them. Great confusion arose as to which countries were subject to the decree, and also as to what was meant by the parish priest of one or other of the parties. To remove these difficulties the new decree was issued. We cannot here go into the whole of the changes made. Suffice it to say that henceforth the valid assistant is not the parish priest of the persons, but of the place where the marriage is celebrated; and the law is binding throughout the Church, even in mixed marriages. It is not, however, retrospective: marriages contracted before Easter 1908 are considered valid even though they have not fulfilled the above conditions.

Changes were also made in the law of Espousals (q.v.). (See Cronin, "New Matrimonial Legislation.")

NICENE COUNCILS. The main history of the Nicene Councils has been already given—that of the former in the articles ARIUS and CREEDS, that of the latter under ICONOCLASTS. Little need be added here. For the convocation, presidency, &c., of both, see the article COUNCILS.

1. The First Nicene and First General Council met in 325, after Constantine had sent Hosius to Alexandria in order to reconcile the Catholics and Arians, and the mission had proved unsuccessful. The bishops—according to Athanasius, who was present—were 318 in number, mostly from the East, though Hosius of Cordova played a great part in the council, and the Roman bishop was represented by the priests Vitus and Vincentius. Besides asserting the full and consubstantial divinity of the Son, the council dealt with various matters of discipline, especially the Paschal controversy [see EASTER] and the Meletian schism. The canons are twenty in number, for the eighty Arabic canons are mostly of much later date. Neophytes were not to be ordained (Canon 2); clerics not to live with subintroductae (3); the metropolitans to confirm and superintend episcopal elections (4); no bishop to receive persons excommunicated by another, but an appeal might be made to the provincial council (5); the patriarchal rights of Rome, Alexandria, and Antioch were to be maintained (6); decisions follow on the rights of the Bishop of Jerusalem [see JERUSALEM]; on the reconciliation of the Cathari or Novatians (8); then come penitential canons (9–14); canons on usury, change of place by the clergy, &c. (15–17); subjection of deacons to priests (18); the disciples of Paul of Samosata were to be rebaptized before they were received into the Church (19); prayer was to be made standing on Sundays and during Easter time. [See also CELIBACY.]

2. The Second Nicene Council, the Seventh General, met in 787 under Tarasius. Besides defining the veneration due to holy images, the council published twenty-two canons, in which the so-called Apostolic Canons and the oecumenical character of the Council in Trullo were recognized, clerics forbidden to leave the church where they had been stationed, the lives of bishops, the relations of clerics and nuns regulated, double monasteries forbidden, &c., &c. For the position taken by Rome with reference to some of these enactments, see TRULLO, COUNCIL IN. (Hefele-Leclercq, i. 335 sqq.; iii. 741 sqq.)

NOMINATION. One of the ways by which the designation of a bishop to a see may be effected. The ordinary mode is that of election by the chapter; this has been the rule ever since, in the Empire, the Concordat of Worms (1122) put an end to the abuse of the emperor's investing bishops by "ring and crosier," and since, in England, the Papal interdict compelled King John to cease from forcing his nominee upon the see of Norwich. In France, by the Concordat of 1515 [CONCORDAT], the Holy See conceded the nomination to bishoprics to the Kings of France, but the persons chosen were to be confirmed by the Pope, after due inquiry into their canonical qualifications. Under the Concordat of 1802 the nomination, with a similar proviso, continued to be in the hands of the French Government until 1906 [see FRENCH CHURCH]. Not the King of France only, but the Kings of Spain, Portugal, and the two Sicilies, and the House of Austria, obtained this right of nomination. It was extended even to the President of Hayti, by a Concordat signed in 1860. Yet, as Buss well remarks ("Kirchenlex." Bischof), the monarchical principle does not imply or require such a right; and if it be said that it is part of that surveillance which a civil ruler must exercise over all that passes within his dominions, "one may answer that it is solicitude for ecclesiastical interests which ought to determine the election of a bishop, and that this solicitude is more to be expected in an ecclesiastical body than in the government."

NOMOCANON (νόμος, law; κανών, rule). Collections of the canons of recognised councils, and of such portions of the civil law as refer to Church matters, are called by this name. The earliest is that of Fulgentius, a deacon of the Church of Carthage in the sixth century. The best known is that compiled in the ninth century by the celebrated Photius, patriarch of Constantinople; it contains the ancient canons down to and including those of the Seventh General Council, or second of Nicaea (787), and the imperial constitutions affecting the Church to the same date. Balsamon, chartophylax at Constantinople in the thirteenth century, added a commentary to the work of Photius. The Nomocanon which goes under the name of St. Vladimir, and is accepted as the basis of canon law in Russia, contains canons which are not recognized by the Western Church.

NORBERTINES. [See PREMONSTRATENSIANS.]

NOTRE DAME, SISTERS OF. In 1803, by the counsel of the celebrated Père Varin, Julie Billiart (b. 1751, d. 1816), and her friend Françoise Blin de Bourdon, Countess of Gézaincourt, laid the permanent foundations of the Institute of the Sisters of Notre Dame, "an order which had for its primary object the salvation of the souls of poor children." In 1809 the mother house and the administration of the order were transferred to Namur. The foundress lived to see fifteen convents of her institute established. After her death the rules and constitutions received the formal approbation of the Holy See (1844). There are numerous houses in Great Britain, Belgium, and the United States. The most important of the English houses is the training college for Catholic school-mistresses at Mount Pleasant, Liverpool, the direction of which was confided to the Sisters by the Government in 1856. The "Centre System," which admits of the concentrated instruction of pupil teachers, now adopted by all the Education Committees of the larger English cities, originated with the Sisters at Liverpool. Julie was declared "blessed" by Pope Pius X. in 1906. (See Sister of Notre Dame, "Life of the Blessed Julie Billiart," and art. in "Cath. Enc.")

NOVATIANISM. Novatian, a Stoic philosopher, was delivered, as is said, from demoniacal possession by the exorcisms of the Church, and became a catechumen. In danger of death, he received clinical baptism, and afterwards, without being confirmed, was ordained priest. During persecution he refused to assist his brethren, but, later on, he protested against the laxity of the Roman clergy in receiving the lapsed to penance, and led away many Roman priests. Afterwards, he was a bitter opponent of Pope Cornelius, on the ground that he was a libellaticus; persuaded three country bishops to consecrate him in the year 251, and thus became, in Fleury's words, "the first Anti-Pope" (Fleury, ii. p. 220). He consecrated new bishops and sent them as emissaries to various parts (Cyprian, Ep. lv., ed. Hartel, p. 642).

He added heresy to schism, for he denied the Church's power to absolve the lapsed[1] (Pacian, "Ad Symphor." Ep. 3). He was condemned in councils at Rome and Carthage, and by Dionysius of Alexandria. His sect, however, continued, and won adherents in Constantinople, Asia Minor, and especially Phrygia. Like the Montanists, they condemned second marriage, and they rebaptized Catholics who joined them. They called themselves "the pure" (καθαρούς, Euseb. "H.E." vi. 43). Even at the Nicene Council, Ascesius, a Novatian bishop, defended these severer principles on penance (Socrates, "H.E." i. 10).

A modern historian (Baur, "Kirchengeschichte," i. p. 367) has said with justice that the Cathari, or Novatians, sacrificed the catholicity to the sanctity of the Church. Undoubtedly, the full privileges of the Church are for the pure, and the pure alone. But the Church is the steward of the Divine mysteries, and it is her office, through the means of grace entrusted to her, to effect and to renew that purity of heart which she requires from her children. The Church has neither the power nor the will to exclude those who truly repent. Hatred of sin and mercy to sinners is the double lesson taught by her Divine Founder. If she refused to receive sinners, she would cease to be catholic; if she received them without true repentance, she would cease to be holy.

(The principal authorities on the Novatian schism are Eusebius, "H.E." vi. 43 seq.; Cyprian's numerous Epistles to Cornelius. Pacian, Ep. 3, "Ad Symphor.," thus sums up the doctrine of Novatian: "Quod mortale peccatum ecclesia donare non possit, imo quod ipsa peccat recipiendo peccantes." For the later history of the Novatians, see Socrat. "H.E." v. 21, 22; Duchesne, "Hist. Ancienne de l'Église," i. p. 407 sqq.; Chapman in "Cath. Enc.")

NOVENA (from novem, nine). The practice of dedicating a period of nine days to special prayer or devotion probably originated, like many other Christian practices, from pagan customs. Thus we read of novenas of mourning (Iliad, xxiv. 664, 784; Aeneid, v. 64), and of propitiation (Livy, i. 31). In the early Christian Church St. Augustine condemns the practice as pagan (PL, xxxiv. 596). In spite of this, the nine days of mourning continued to be observed until in the Middle Ages the novena of masses became the rule in the case of great personages, especially popes and cardinals. The "Pope's Novena" remains to this day. A novena of preparation was celebrated in Spain and France before the feast of Christmas, and is still so liturgically in the Breviary office beginning with December 17. Here the number was suggested by the nine months from the Incarnation to the birth of our Lord. Once the novena of preparation was established for one feast it was easy to extend it to others; and further, to make use of it for any occasion of special prayer. "Persevering in prayer" (Acts i. 14) for a period of nine days has nothing superstitious about it, but is a potent means of obtaining what we ask for. There are many novenas indulgenced by the Church, too numerous to be mentioned here. Perhaps the most popular of these is the devotion of the "Nine Fridays," which consists in receiving Holy Communion on the first Friday of nine consecutive months. It was introduced by Blessed Margaret Mary Alacoque in consequence of a promise said to have been made to her by our Lord assuring final perseverance and the reception of the sacraments before death to all who should practise it. There has been considerable discussion as to the exact meaning of this promise. (A large number of indulgenced novenas will be found in the "Raccolta of Indulgenced Prayers"; Hilgers in "Cath. Enc.")

[1] It must be remembered how strict the discipline of the Church was in those days. Thus Cyprian (Ep. lv. ed. Hartel, 638) tells us that some of the Catholic bishops absolutely refused to accept the repentance of anyone who had committed adultery: "totum poenitentiae locum contra adulteria cluserunt."

NOVICE, NOVITIATE (Lat. novitius). The name of "novice" is given to those persons, whether men or women and whatever their age may be, who have entered some religious house and desire to embrace its rule. Upon entering, they assume the habit of the order or congregation, and follow the community life and customs. The term of probation, or "novitiate," is at least for one year;[1] sometimes it extends to two or three years. During that period neither is the order bound to the novice nor the novice to the order. At the end of the term the order is in no way bound to allow the novice to make his profession, if he does not seem to those in authority likely to adorn the religious life; and the novice, on the other hand, may quit the order without censure, and retains, should he do so, the property which he possessed at the time of his admission, or of which he may have subsequently become possessed. Nor can he, while a novice, legally renounce such property in favour of the order, unless with the licence of the bishop and within the two months next preceding his profession.[2] But he may make a will in favour of the order which he has joined, and for this reason—because it is in his power at any time, if he decides not to go on to profession, to cancel his will. The fact of his having made it is therefore no restraint upon his leaving the order if he thinks himself unfit for it; whereas, if he had renounced his property altogether in favour of the order, or his parents had renounced it for him, this fact would tend to restrain his freedom in the event of a sudden reaction of feeling coming upon him soon after his becoming a novice.

The earliest age at which profession is allowable was fixed by the Council of Trent at sixteen years.

The name "novitiate" is also sometimes given to the house, or separate building, in which novices pass their time of probation. (Ferraris, Novitius; Taunton; Suarez, "De Religione," tr. vii., 11, iv.–vi.; Martène, "De Antiquis Monachorum Ritibus"; Vermeersch in "Cath. Enc.")

NUN (Lat. nonna. From the fifth century nonnus and nonna occur pretty frequently in relation to monks and nuns, a sense of quasi-filial respect being attached to the words. Comp. the Gr. νάννα, aunt, and the It. nonno and nonna, grandfather and grandmother). A nun is a maid or widow who has consecrated herself to God by the three vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, and bound herself to live in a convent under a certain rule.

1. Historical.—Hélyot and other French ecclesiastical writers of the eighteenth century were of opinion that the founder of the first nunnery was St. Syncletica of Egypt, of whom an ancient life is extant, written not later than the end of the fourth century.[1] This opinion was chiefly grounded on the belief that the author of that life was St. Athanasius, who thus would have been the biographer both of the first monk (St. Antony) and of the first nun. But the difference of style is too great to allow us to ascribe the latter work to St. Athanasius. No earlier notice of a nunnery occurs than that found in the saint's life of St. Antony, who, when he was renouncing the world (about 270), placed his sister in a house of virgins (παρθένων), and many years afterwards rejoiced to find her persevering in a chaste and holy life, and ruling other virgins similarly minded. But long before the institution of nunneries, and even side by side with them long after their first establishment, the Church recognized and encouraged several classes of pious women, such as widows, deaconesses, hospitallers, canonesses (canonicae; their principal duty was the care of funerals), asceticae, and consecrated virgins living with their parents.[2] The letters of St. Jerome[3] give us a clear view of the austere and exalted life led by these last. Towards the end of the fourth century nunneries began to be multiplied at Rome. St. Augustine founded one at Hippo under his own sister as superior, and gave to it a rule which is extant in his 109th Epistle. St. Scholastica, the sister of St. Benedict, founded and governed a nunnery under her brother's direction. The rule of enclosure [ENCLOSURE] was gradually enforced on nunneries with more and more of strictness. A French council (755) says:[4]—"Nuns must not go forth out of their monastery; but if any among them have fallen into a fault, let her do penance within the monastery under the direction of the bishop." The chapter "Periculoso" of Boniface VIII. settled the question irrevocably; enclosure has been since imposed on all nuns taking solemn vows. Nevertheless some convents have evaded the rigour of the rule, and the Holy See has tolerated their conduct.

The primitive practice in the Church was that virgins becoming nuns should be veiled and consecrated by the bishop. In process of time, "through oversight occasionally, but more frequently owing to absence or pressure of occupation on the part of the bishops" (Thomassin), the ancient practice ceased to be strictly observed, and great numbers were veiled by the abbesses, or by simple priests. This was strongly condemned as an abuse by several French councils, and the right of veiling virgins was reserved to the bishops; presbyters, however, might give the veil to widows. Thomassin infers from a canon of the Council of Tribur (895), that the Fathers of that council recognized two veils—one, that of probation, with which a young girl might clothe herself as early as twelve years; the other, the veil of consecration, to be given by the bishop, and not to be assumed till she was twenty-five years old.

The capitularies of Charlemagne and his son order the suppression or consolidation of small nunneries, in which it was thought the rule could not be perfectly observed.

It may be stated as a general fact, applicable to nearly all the great orders of men, that, soon after the foundation of each, an order or orders of women, subject to or in connection with it, was established, in which the rule and statutes of the founder were, so far as the difference of sex permitted, punctually observed. Even the Society of Jesus is not an exception, for, although the founder obtained a prohibition from the Pope against the company's undertaking the direction of nuns, the "Dames Anglaises," and several more recent institutes, though not otherwise connected with the Society, follow the rule of St. Ignatius.

If we consider the four principal monastic rules separately, we find that—

a. The rule of St. Basil [BASILIANS] was the basis of that framed by Albert, patriarch of Jerusalem, for the order of Mount Carmel [CARMELITES], and adopted in its original rigour by St. Theresa, for the order of Discalced Carmelites, which she founded in 1562.

b. The rule of St. Austin is followed by communities of nuns annexed to every congregation of Austin canons and hermits; also by Dominican nuns and the Ursulines. All, or nearly all, the communities of women founded since the Council of Trent follow the rule of St. Augustine, but have in addition a body of constitutions or customs suited to their special end and spirit, and, in some cases, taken from the rule of St. Ignatius.

c. The rule of St. Benedict is followed by the nuns of Camaldoli, Vallombrosa, and Fontevrault and many others. (See Hélyot.)

d. The rule of St. Francis of Assisi is embraced by the order of nuns called Poor Clares, founded by St. Clare; this is the second order of St. Francis.

The nuns of St. Jerome follow a rule found in the works of that doctor; the nuns of the Visitation (1610), one given them by St. Francis de Sales: it is the rule of St. Austin with a number of slight modifications.

2. Rights and Obligations.—Of the numerous and minute regulations contained in the canon law touching the rights, obligations, and privileges of religious women, a few of the more important are here subjoined. The general direction of all their houses is vested in the Sacred Congregation of Religious [CONGREGATIONS, ROMAN]. The orders and congregations of recent origin are usually under the ordinary jurisdiction of the bishops; of the older orders, some are under the jurisdiction of regulars. It is an exceptional case when, as with the Brigittines and the order of Fontevrault, the houses of the connected congregation of men are (or were) under the jurisdiction of the superior general of the nuns. Nearly all nuns who are bound by solemn vows are under the obligation of reciting the divine office in choir, and this they must do for themselves; their chaplains may not undertake it for them. The bishop may control their music. They use either the Roman Breviary or that approved for some order of men. They may solemnize, so it be done moderately and discreetly, their titular feast. The number of religious who can be received in any convent is determined according to the amount of revenues, or of customary alms, available for their support. Nuns are allowed to receive young girls as boarders for education, but upon many conditions—e.g. the consent of the Sacred Congregation must be obtained; the boarders must sleep in a separate building or wing; they must not be under seven or above twenty-five years, and if any one of them desires to become a nun she cannot do so without being first interrogated by the bishop or his deputy, so that the sincere and voluntary character of her wish may be tested. The novitiate, which postulants in early times often passed before they took the habit, cannot now be passed in a secular dress. Nuns cannot stand in the relation of sponsors. While on the one hand those are excommunicated who attempt to force any virgin or widow to become a nun against her will, those on the other are visited with the same penalty who, without just cause, hinder any woman from assuming the religious habit and taking vows.

The confessors of nuns must be selected and approved by the bishop for convents subject to him. For convents subject to regulars the regular prelate appoints confessors, subject to the approbation of the bishop. In either case a confessor cannot hear confessions in the same monastery for a period exceeding three years.

3. Government, Mode of Life, the Veil, &c.—The superiors of nuns are elected in chapter by secret voting[1] [see ABBESS], in some cases for life, but generally for a term of years. In every convent there is a superior and a mistress of novices; the other offices vary. The bishop often appoints a canon, or an experienced priest, to exercise his authority in regard to the external government of the convent. Nuns take their meals in common, but each must have her separate cell. With regard to diet, fasting, clothing, taking the discipline, mode of saying office, &c., there is an infinite diversity of practice in the different orders and congregations. In primitive times, when a virgin consecrated herself to God, her hair was cut off; this is expressly mentioned in the lives of St. Syncletica (fourth century) and St. Gertrude of Nivelle (seventh century).[1] The white veil of reception is given to the postulant either by the bishop or the superior at the commencement of her novitiate; the veil of profession (which is black in some orders, white in others) is given by the bishop at the end of it. [See PROFESSION, RELIGIOUS.] The veil of a Christian nun symbolizes continence in flesh and spirit, holiness to the Lord. It signifies an espousal, not that harmonious union of two unlike human beings on which conjugal happiness depends, but a far more perfect union of two unlikes —viz. of the human soul and Christ, effected by means of prayer, obedience, and the sacraments. (Thomassin, Part I.; Taunton; Ferraris, Moniales; Vermeersch, "De Religiosis Institutis et Personis," and in "Cath. Enc.")

NUNC DIMITTIS. The canticle of Simeon (Lk. ii. 29–32). It is recited at compline every day in the year. (E. English, "The Nunc Dimittis.")

NUNCIO (nuntius, messenger). A Legate a latere of the Roman see [LEGATE] discharges a commission directed to special ends, and in its nature temporary; a Nuncio of the same see is its permanent official representative at some foreign court. The diplomatic agents of the Pope are of three classes: nuncios, internuncios, and apostolic delegates. In 1914 there were nuncios at the Courts of Vienna, Madrid, Munich, and Brussels, and to the republican government of Brazil; internuncios at the Hague, Buenos Ayres (for the Argentine Republic, Uruguay, and Paraguay), and Luxemburg; and apostolic delegates to the governments of Chile, Colombia, Ecuador, Bolivia, Peru, San Domingo, Hayti, and Venezuela. Before the French Revolution nuncios resided at Warsaw, Venice, Lucerne, Naples, Florence, Cologne, and Brussels. To the last named Clement VIII. committed the oversight of the Dutch and English missions. A constitution of Benedict XIV. enjoins all nuncios to watch over the residence of bishops within their dioceses.

Papal nuncios were formerly invested with an extensive jurisdiction; their tribunals were courts of appeal from the ordinary ecclesiastical courts of the countries in which they resided. From the language of one of the Tridentine decrees,[1] it would appear that they sometimes encroached on the rights of the bishops. In Germany, the Archbishops of Mayence, Cologne, and Treves, who were Electors of the empire and legati nati, often thwarted the exercise of jurisdiction by the nuncios, and the establishment of a nunciature at Munich in 1785 was the signal for an acrimonious controversy. The troubles arising out of the French Revolution soon absorbed the attention of the disputants, and the Munich nunciature was abolished in 1799. As mentioned in the art. APOSTOLIC DELEGATE, these latter agents are also sent to countries which have no official relations with the Holy See. (Ferraris, Nuntius; Kirsch in "Cath. Enc.")

NUPTIAL BLESSING. [See MARRIAGE, V.]

O ANTIPHONS. [See ADVENT, SEASON OF.]

OATH. The calling on God to witness that a statement made is true, or to make the fulfilment of a promise bind under a more solemn obligation. Oaths were required on certain occasions in the Hebrew law (see, e.g. Exod. xxii. 10, 11; Deut. vi. 13, x. 20), and the prophets (e.g. Amos iv. 2; Is. xiv. 24; Jer. li. 14) speak of God Himself as swearing. Two places (only two, as far as we remember) in the O.T. seem at first sight to condemn swearing—viz. Zach. v. 3, Ecclesiast. ix. 2; but it is clear from the context that false and perhaps rash swearing is meant.

There is, however, much more difficulty about our Lord's teaching on oaths, and it is well known that some sects—e.g. the Waldenses, the Hussites, the "Society of Friends"—have believed that oaths are forbidden to Christians. In Mt. v. 33–37, Christ certainly seems to forbid all oaths, whether direct, i.e. by the name of God Himself, or indirect, i.e. by objects related to God, such as the temple, heaven, &c. "Let your word be yea, yea, nay, nay, but what is beyond this is from the evil one." St. James's words (v. 12) are to the same effect. On the other hand, St. Paul, far from contenting himself always with a simple "yea" or "nay," most distinctly calls God to witness the truth of his assertions (Rom. i. 9; 2 Cor. xi. 31; Gal. i. 20; Philip. i. 8; and especially 2 Cor. i. 23), and the fact seems to be that our Lord desired a state of perfection in His followers which would make oaths unnecessary, and therefore wrong, so long, at least, as they were a "little flock" known to one another. A Christian's character was to make his word as good as his oath. In dealing, however, with the heathen world, Christians could not expect their word to be taken in this way, and the presence of bad Christians in the Church made its actual state very different from that ideal which Christ set before His disciples. Many who could not be trusted to avoid the shameful sin of lying might still shrink from the greater sin and shame of perjury; and hence the Church not only maintained the obligation of taking an oath when it was required in civil courts, but also herself exacted oaths on certain solemn occasions from her children. She has ever taught the lawfulness of oaths, provided always that they are taken with judgment—i.e. for a grave cause; in justice—i.e. provided the thing sworn be lawful; and in truth—i.e. provided the thing sworn be true (Jer. iv. 2). (See the profession of faith imposed by Innocent III. on converted Waldenses; the Constitution of John XXII. against the Fraticelli, anno 1318; Prop. 43 among the propositions of Wycliffe condemned by Martin V. and the Council of Constance, anno 1418.)

[1] Alban Butler, Jan. 5, Mar. 17; Kirchenlex. "Gertrude."

[1] Sess. xxiv. 20, De Ref.

Although it is always wicked to swear without a conviction that the thing sworn is true, it is not always wrong to break a promise made on oath. A promissory oath to commit a crime is sinful, and to keep the promise is an additional sin. Again, notable change of circumstances may excuse from the keeping of an oath. Further, though, generally speaking, no earthly power can dispense from keeping an oath made in favour of another, still in other cases a dispensation may be valid. Thus, a superior may dispense in an oath concerning things subject to his authority, because such an oath is unlawful, except with an implied condition—viz. if the person who has authority in the matter consents. A parent, e.g., may annul the promissory oaths of his children below the age of puberty. So, again, an oath against the common good, or an oath extorted by fear or fraud, may be dispensed by the bishop or by those who have quasi-episcopal jurisdiction—e.g. by a chapter in the vacancy of a see, or again by confessors with power to dispense from vows. (St. Alphonsus, "Theol. Moral." lib. iv. tract. 2.)

Many oaths ordered by the Church are made more solemn by touching the Gospels; and in the Middle Ages persons swearing often touched the Blessed Sacrament, relics, the sacred vessels, &c. Such an oath was called "Corporal," a term which has nothing to do with the "corporal," or linen cloth on which the Blessed Sacrament is laid, but simply refers to corporal or bodily contact with the sacred object. (See St. Thomas, 2^a 2^{ae}, qq. 88, 89; Maskell, "Monument. Rit." vol. ii. p. li. seq.)

OBEDIENCE. [See EVANGELICAL COUNSELS.]

OBLATES. Oblates of St. Charles. This is a congregation of secular priests, who "offer" themselves (whence the name) to the bishop, to be employed by him in any part of the diocese he may choose, and upon any work which he may commit to them. St. Charles Borromeo, archbishop of Milan, having found in his large diocese, parts of which were greatly neglected or totally abandoned, the need of a band of zealous, self-sacrificing labourers, who would be ready to go and do at once whatever he commanded them to do, founded this congregation of "Oblates of the Blessed Virgin and St. Ambrose" in 1578. He established them in the church and presbytery of the Holy Sepulchre at Milan. Dividing the congregation into six "assemblies," he directed that two of these should always remain in the community house in the city, while the four others were at work in other parts of the diocese. There is a house of this congregation at Bayswater, having several affiliations in other parts of London.

Oblates of St. Frances of Rome. A community of religious women, bound only by simple vows, established at Rome in 1433.

Oblates of Italy. An association of secular priests founded by some zealous ecclesiastics at Turin in 1816. They have the charge of the mission of Eastern Burma.

Oblates of Mary Immaculate. A society of priests founded at Marseilles in 1815 by Charles de Mazenod, afterwards bishop of the diocese. The superior-general is elected for life by a special general chapter. Their numbers have increased greatly, and they have been of inestimable service by placing themselves at the disposal of the bishops to be employed on the mission in Canada, British India, South Africa, and the United States.

OBLATI. 1. Children dedicated in their early years to the monastic state. [See BENEDICTINES; SCHOOLS.]

2. A class of persons of whom ecclesiastical annals, especially in the Middle Ages, furnish frequent examples, who "offered" and gave themselves and their property to a monastery for the glory of God and their own spiritual improvement. The father of St. Hugh of Lincoln was an "oblatus" in the monastery of the Great Chartreuse, in which the saint himself was a monk, and tenderly watched over his father's old age. Benedict XIV. ("De Synodo dioeces." vi. 3) says that although oblati are not religious, yet, if they have transferred their entire property to the monastery, they are ecclesiastical persons and enjoy ecclesiastical privileges. (Ferraris, Oblati Monasteriorum.)

OBLIGATION, DAYS OF. [See FEASTS OF THE CHURCH.]

OBREPTION. "A vice in a rescript arising from a fraud. It comes from stating in the petition something which is against the truth." It is often confounded with Subreption (q.v.). (Taunton; Ferraris, Rescriptum.)

OBSERVANTINES. [See FRANCISCANS.]

OBSESSION. [See POSSESSION.]

OCCASIONS OF SIN. Any external circumstances inciting to sin. These may be persons, places, or things. Theologians divide occasions into proximate (i.e. generally followed by a sinful act), and remote (rarely followed by the act). It is clear that this distinction is vague, and admits of indefinite degrees. It is further complicated by the fact that what may be a proximate occasion to one person may be only remote to another; e.g., one man may not be able to go into a public house without getting drunk, whereas another may enter many times without any such evil result. The general rule with regard to occasions of sin is that we are bound to avoid them if proximate (absolutely or relatively), but not if remote. The reason of the latter part of the rule is given by St. Paul (1 Cor. v. 10); it is impossible for us to avoid altogether the circumstances which possibly might lead us into sin. (Ballerini, "Theol. Mor." v. p. 97 sqq.; Slater, ii. 220.)

OCTAVARIUM. The purpose of the book is explained by its title, "Octavarium Romanum, sive octavae festorum, lectiones secundi scilicet et tertii nocturni singulis diebus recitandae infra octavas sanctorum titularium, &c." Maskell knows of no edition prior to the seventeenth century. The use of the book is not obligatory on those who have to say the divine office, though it is sometimes referred to in the Ordo.

OCTAVE. The Christian, following the example of the Jewish, Church, celebrates certain feasts till the eighth or octave day. The number eight is supposed to represent perfection, for the seven days of the week are taken as figures of the ages of the world, and the eighth of the eternal rest which is to follow them.

Octaves are privileged or non-privileged; and the former, again, are subdivided into classes. In the octaves of Easter and Pentecost, no other feast may be kept and no commemoration made, except of a simple, if it falls after the first three days. In the octave of Epiphany (not, however, on the octave-day) the feast of the patron saint, title, or dedication of the church may be kept. During non-privileged octaves even semi-doubles are celebrated. Those last, to which all octaves, except those already enumerated, belong, are again arranged in order of dignity, so that the lesser gives way to the greater in case of concurrence. The changes made by Leo XIII. may be found in Bäumer-Biron, "Hist. du Bréviaire," ii. 199–200; for the further changes made by Pius X. see Burton-Myers, "The New Psalter and its Use." (Gavantus, tom. ii. § 3, cap. 8.)

OFFERTORY. (1) An antiphon which used to be sung by the choir while the faithful made their offerings of bread and wine for the Mass, of gifts for the support of the clergy, &c. From St. Augustine's time verses of the Psalms were sung in North Africa during the presentation of the gifts, and the Offertory in the Roman Missal has been in use from ancient times, being found in the Antiphonary of St. Gregory, though the precise date at which it was introduced is uncertain. The oblations of bread and wine by the faithful began to fall into disuse from about the year 1000, but the antiphon and its name are still retained. The Offertory is said immediately after the Creed. (Le Brun, Benedict XIV.)

(2) The oblation of bread and wine by the priest, made after the recitation of the antiphon just mentioned. "The Church does really offer bread and wine, but not absolutely and in themselves; for in the new covenant no oblation is made of lifeless things: indeed, no oblation is made other than that of Jesus Christ; wherefore the bread and wine are offered that He may make them His Body and Blood." (Bossuet, "Explic. des Prières de la Messe.") In the oblation the priest speaks of the bread as the "spotless victim," and of the chalice as the "chalice of salvation" by anticipation—i.e. he looks forward to the moment when they will be changed into the Body and Blood of Christ. All the ancient liturgies contain an oblation of the gifts before consecration (see the comparative table in Hammond's "Ancient Liturgies," p. xxvi. seq.); but the five prayers with which the oblation is made—"Suscipe, Sancte Pater," "Offerimus tibi," "In spiritu humilitatis," "Veni, Sanctificator," "Suscipe, Sancta Trinitas"—are of recent date, as appears "from the silence of Walafrid, Amalarius, Rupert, and Innocent III." concerning them (Benedict XIV. "De Miss." II. x.). The incensing of the oblata or gifts in solemn Masses seems to have been little known in the West till the ninth century, when it was introduced in France. The ceremony occurs in the Greek liturgies (Le Brun, tom. ii. 2 P. a. 7). The great oblation of Christ's Body and Blood must be carefully distinguished from the Offertory or anticipatory oblations of bread and wine. (Duchesne, "Christian Worship," ch. vi. 6.) "In all Eastern rites and in the Gallican rite in its various forms a later practice grew up of preparing (and offering) the gifts before the liturgy begins. Rome alone kept the primitive custom (as in St. Justin) of preparing them at this point, when they are about to be consecrated." (Fortescue, "The Mass," 296.) The Dominicans keep this Gallican practice and prepare the offerings before the Mass begins.

OFFICE. [See BREVIARY.]

OILS, HOLY. There are three holy oils, consecrated by the bishop on Holy Thursday, and received from him by the priests who have charge of parishes and districts.

(1) The oil of catechumens, used in blessing fonts, in Baptism, consecration of churches, of altars whether fixed or portable, ordination of priests, blessing and coronation of kings and queens.

(2) Chrism [see CONFIRMATION], used in blessing the font, in Baptism and Confirmation, consecration of a bishop, of paten and chalice, and in the blessing of bells. [See CHRISM.]

(3) Oil of the sick, used in Extreme Unction and the blessing of bells.

The Rituale Romanum requires these oils to be kept in vessels of silver or alloyed metal (stannum—properly a mixture of silver and lead), in a decent place, and under lock and key. The S. Cong. Rit. strictly forbids the pastor to keep them in his house, except in cases of necessity. (See "Manuale Decret." 2, 670–2.) The oils of the past year must not be used, but common oil, in lesser quantity, may be added to the blessed oils if necessary. For the history of the use of these oils, see BAPTISM, CONFIRMATION, &c. &c. (Leclercq in "Cath. Enc."; Schrod in "Kirchenlex.")

OLD CATHOLICS (Alt-Katholiken). A name assumed by various priests and laypeople in Germany who protested against the Vatican definition of Papal infallibility, and formed themselves into a separate body.

Scarcely was the Vatican definition issued, when Dr. Döllinger solemnly protested against it, as an innovation on Catholic doctrine. He found large support in the universities. Nearly all Catholics in the teaching body of Munich (44 Docenten), professors from Freiburg, Breslau, Prague, Münster, and four professors from Bonn, joined the opposition. Some of them, such as Reusch, Langen, Friedrich, were men of considerable reputation for ability, learning, and character. Nothing of course need be said of Döllinger. The party looked for encouragement to those German bishops who had been opposed to the definition, but in this they were disappointed. The leaders of the protesting movement were excommunicated.

In 1871, at an Old Catholic Congress in Münich, but against the declared wish of Döllinger, the resolution of forming Old Catholic congregations was formed, and on June 4, 1873, Dr. Reinkens was consecrated bishop by Heydecamp, Jansenist bishop of Deventer. The bishop had a salary allotted him by the Government (16,000 thalers from Prussia, 2000 from Baden); but his jurisdiction over his adherents is very limited; the real power is vested in a synod of Deputies from the congregations, of whom the majority are laymen. In many cases the Catholic churches were made over to the Old Catholics by the Government, a result which was accelerated by a decree of Pius IX. forbidding Catholic rites in all churches where partial possession had been granted to the new body. The cause of "Old Catholicism" enjoyed the special favour of the Government then engaged in a contest with the Church.

Facts, however, have proved that so inconsistent a position could not be maintained. The first synod, in 1874, changed the Tridentine doctrine on auricular confession, and made fasting and abstinence voluntary; the second, in 1875, reduced the number of feasts, and set aside nearly all the canonical impediments of marriage, except those recognized by the State; the third, in 1876, permitted priests to marry and receive the nuptial blessing, but forbade them to officiate after marriage; the fifth, in 1878, allowed persons in holy orders to marry, and to perform all the functions of the ministry. This resolution was passed in spite of a protest from the Jansenist Bishops of Holland. Friedrich and the Bonn professors, Langen, Menzel, and Reusch (previously vicar-general to the Old Catholic bishop), withdrew from their former associates. Reusch continued to officiate at Bonn, and thus formed a schism within a schism. There is no official census of the German Old Catholics, for in 1880 Dr. Reinkens told his adherents to return themselves simply as Catholics, but it may be safely said that their number in the whole empire does not reach 40,000.

In Austria they are a very insignificant body, though they had two men of learning among them—viz. the canonists Von Schulte and Maassen. In Switzerland only three priests refused submission to the Vatican Council; but a "Christian-Catholic" Church was formed, in great part from the most disreputable elements, under the auspices of the cantonal governments. Edward Herzog was consecrated bishop by Dr. Reinkens in September 1876. The "Christian-Catholic" Church has a married priesthood, a vernacular liturgy, and has made confession voluntary. This body is visibly dwindling away. Attempts have been made to erect schismatical churches by the ex-Dominican Prota-Giurleo at Naples, in Spain by the priest Aguazo, in Mexico by eighteen priests, in France by the eloquent ex-Carmelite Loyson, and in America by the Polish "bishop" Kozlowski.

Since the above was written, Pope Leo XIII. brought the Culturkampf to a happy end. In Prussia and Baden, however, the laws in favour of the Old Catholics remain unaltered, and the sect, in principle, enjoys the same protection as before. The Catholics have re-obtained possession, at the cost of great sacrifices on their part, of a few of the churches which the Prussian Government had handed over to the Old Catholics, e.g. in Neisse, Cochem, Wiesbaden. In Baden, also, the sectaries were obliged to restore several of the principal churches to their legitimate owners, e.g. in Mundelfingen, Thiengen, Säckingen, Fützen, Kappel. In Bavaria a ministerial decree dated March 10, 1890, deprived the Old Catholics of the Government protection they enjoyed; they are no longer treated as members of the Church acknowledged by the State, but as a purely private sect. Döllinger, the author of the Old Catholic movement in Germany, died January 10, and Baron von Lütz, the Minister of Worship, who all along had been its staunchest supporter, retired from office on May 31 and died September 3 of the same year, 1890. The Los von Rom movement in Austria is political rather than religious, and tends to Protestantism rather than to the Old Catholic bodies.

In Switzerland negotiations with the Holy See have rendered the position of Catholics more tolerable. In 1879 the Bishop of Fribourg, Mgr. Marilley, resigned, Mgr. Casandy succeeded him as Bishop of Fribourg, Lausanne and Geneva, and in 1883 Mgr. Mermillod was appointed in the room of Mgr. Casandy. The Federal Council had banished Mgr. Mermillod from the country when he was vicar-apostolic of Geneva; it allowed him to return as bishop, and left it to the several cantons to acknowledge his new dignity. Geneva alone refused the acknowledgment. In 1890 Mermillod was created cardinal and received all the honours due to his rank from those same authorities who a few years before had sent him into exile. Peace was likewise restored in Basle on the resignation of Bishop Lachat. In consequence of the activity of the Catholics and of the falling away of its own members, the Old Catholic sect in Switzerland lost much of their influence; in many parishes they had to give up their right to use the Catholic churches for their worship. A bill for the suppression of the "Theological Faculty" at Bern was indeed thrown out by the Council (1883), but the Faculty is dying a natural death; in eleven years it had but 57 students. Meanwhile a Catholic university, supported by the State, has been founded at Fribourg and is very prosperous. In Italy, Spain, and Mexico the Old Catholic movement never acquired the slightest importance.

(From the article "Alt-Katholiken" in the "Kirchenlexikon," with additional information supplied by Dr. Wildt, the writer of the article. See also "The Times," August 14, 15, 1902. OLD CHAPTER, OLD BROTHERHOOD. After the extinction of the old hierarchy in England there was no English Catholic bishop until the appointment of Dr. William Bishop as vicar-apostolic in 1623. He established a chapter of twenty-four canons, the status of whom, however, was always of an anomalous character. The Roman authorities never gave them any formal recognition, though the canons exercised ecclesiastical rule for thirty years (1655–1685), when there was no vicar-apostolic. In 1688, when four vicars-apostolic were created, the status of the chapter became still more anomalous: there being now four quasi-dioceses, with only one chapter, unattached to any diocese. Dr. Leyburn, the first of the new vicars-apostolic, was required to swear that he would not recognize the chapter, and henceforth it became a sort of friendly society without any jurisdiction. The vicars-apostolic were usually chosen from their number. On the restoration of the hierarchy and formation of chapters in each diocese, the Old Chapter changed its name to the "Old Brotherhood of the Secular Clergy," by which it is known at the present day. The list of capitulars contains the names of bishops Leyburn, Clifford, Challoner, Milner, Poynter, and thirty other bishops, as also Tootle (Dodd), Gother, Lingard, Kirk, Rock, Tierney, Brownlow, and John Savage, Earl Rivers (1723–1736). (Sergeant, "An Account of the Chapter erected by William, Titular Bishop of Chalcedon, and Ordinary of England and Scotland"; Dodd, "Church Hist. of England," ed. Tierney; B. Ward, "Dawn of the Catholic Revival"; E. Burton, "Life of Challoner.")

OLIVETANS. A branch of the white monks of St. Benedict, founded in 1319, by St. Bernard Ptolomei. The reform was of a severe character. The ordinary fasts of the Church and of the monks were added to, and total abstinence from wine was enjoined. Unlike the parent order, they had a general superior. At the present time there are only ten small monasteries of the order. (Hélyot; Almond in "Cath. Enc.")

OMOPHORION. [See PALLIUM.]

ONTOLOGISM. This is the name, first given by Gioberti, which designates a form of Platonic Mysticism whose principles were inculcated by Marsilius Ficinus, systematically constructed by Malebranche, and again recast by the above-mentioned Gioberti. The name denotes that it is a first principle of the theory of cognition which lies at the basis of the system; that the order of intellectual apprehension follows the order of real being. The necessary, self-existing being is first the real order; therefore it is the first object of intellectual vision, and is that in and by which every contingent and created existence becomes visible. Gioberti's theory was, for a time, very attractive to many Catholics, and seemed likely to gain an extensive sway. It was very vigorously controverted by Liberatore and others as contrary to the doctrine of St. Thomas, as rationally groundless, and as leading logically to consequences which are theologically unsound and incompatible with dogmas of faith. On account of this dangerous theological tendency seven propositions, embracing the fundamental tenets of Ontologism, were censured by the Holy See, as propositions which cannot safely be taught, in a decree of the Congregation of the Inquisition bearing date September 18, 1861.

Various attempts were made by partisans of Ontologism to maintain that this censure of the Holy See was not directed against this system, but against another species of Pantheistic Ontologism taught in Germany. But one of their number, M. Brancherau, having a conscientious doubt on the subject, drew up a summary of the doctrine contained in a text-book which he had himself composed, comprised in fifteen theses, which he submitted to the Roman Congregation for judgment. The decision was given in September 1862, pronouncing the substantial identity of these propositions with the seven already disapproved, and declaring that they fell under the same censure, that they consequently could not be taught, and that the text-book itself, which was only a development of the same theses, could not be placed in the hands of pupils. On February 22, 1866, a decree of the united Congregations of the Inquisition and of the Index, formally approved by the Holy Father, censured the writings of Prof. Ubaghs, of Louvain, another distinguished Ontologist, as containing the same doctrine condemned in the seven propositions. During the same year M. Hugonin, who had been nominated to an episcopal see in France, was required by the Papal Nuncio at Paris, as a condition of receiving the confirmation of his appointment, to publish a retractation of the doctrine contained in his "Études Philosophiques: Ontologie," and to promise to do all which depended on him in the episcopal office to prevent the teaching of this same doctrine in the schools of France. All these distinguished persons submitted with docility to the sentence of Rome. Since it has become manifest that the Holy See did intend to condemn as unsafe the fundamental doctrine of Ontologism proper—viz. that the human intellect has an immediate cognition of God as its proper object and the principle of all its cognitions—the system has fallen dead, so far as Catholics are concerned. It still lingers, under various modifications, by which the genuine idea which lies at its basis is so far altered or obscured as to be comparatively harmless, and really or apparently exempt from positive censure. In such shapes, however, it is no longer potent to attract thoroughgoing thinkers, and is of small moment.

(Kleutgen gives a brief but thorough exposition of the seven propositions, with a refutation of the errors contained in them, in a work which in the French translation is entitled "Ontologisme jugé par le Saint-Siège." Paris: 1867. The works of Cardinal Dechamps may also be consulted for information concerning the controversy.)

OPHITES. [See GNOSTICISM, p. 382.]

OPUS OPERATUM. A term used by mediaeval theologians and adopted by the Council of Trent (sess. vii. can. 8) to express the nature of the efficacy of the sacraments. Man has the power by the perversity of his will to stay this efficacy of the sacraments; and certain dispositions—such as the love of God and man, or again, true repentance and sincere purpose of amendment—are absolutely necessary, in those who have the use of reason, in order that they may derive benefit from the sacraments. These dispositions, however, are only conditions without which the grace of the sacraments cannot be received. They merely remove the obstacles (obices) in the way: the grace itself comes not from them, but from the sacraments themselves.

The following clear explanation is given by Bellarmine ("De Sacramentis," lib. ii. 1). In justification, he says, as received through the sacraments, many causes concur: on God's part, the will to employ the sensible sign; on Christ's part, His Passion and merits; on the part of the minister, power and intention; on the part of the recipient, the will to receive the sacrament, faith, and repentance; on the part of the sacrament, the application of the sensible sign. "But of all these, that which actively, proximately, and instrumentally effects the grace of justification, is only that external act, called sacrament, and this is the sense of 'Opus Operatum,' the word operatum being taken passively, so that when we say the sacrament confers grace ex opere operato, our meaning is that grace is conferred by virtue of the sacramental act itself instituted by God for this end, not by the merit of the minister or the recipient." (See also Franzelin, "De Sacramentis in Genere," thesis vii.)

ORARIUM. [See STOLE.]

ORATE, FRATRES, &c. So the address begins in which, after the Offertory and Lavabo, the priest bids the people pray that his sacrifice and theirs may be acceptable to God. Originally the priest simply said "Orate," or "Orate pro me," "Orate pro me peccatore." Rémi of Auxerre, in A.D. 880, is the first to give a fuller form, but he appends it merely as an explanation, "Orate, fratres"—i.e. "ut meum ac vestrum pariter sacrificium acceptum sit Domino." In the churches of Paris and Meaux down to the seventeenth century, and in our own Missals of Sarum, Bangor, and York, the words ran "Orate, fratres et sorores," &c. The answer which the server makes is "Suscipiat," &c.; but the response is given in a vast variety of forms by the mediaeval Missals, and it still varies much in the rites of different religious orders. (Le Brun, tom. ii., iii. Part. art. x.; Maskell, "Ancient Liturgies.")

ORATORY. In the earliest times Mass could only be said in private houses, and after the erection of churches it was still often said in private dwellings. The growth of the parochial system led to a sharper distinction between parochial churches and oratories or chapels. Thus the Council of Agde, canon 24 (anno 506), permits Mass to be said in oratories, but not on the great feasts of Easter, Christmas, &c. So the Council of Clermont, can. 14 (anno 535). In the East, the Synod in Trullo, can. 31 (anno 692), prohibited service in oratories without the bishop's leave, and many Western councils issued similar edicts.

A decree for the Universal Church issued by the S. Congregation of Rites, March 8, 1879, classifies oratories, as (1) Public, when all the Faithful have access to them. (2) Semi-public, when destined chiefly for the use of a College, Religious Community, Seminary, &c. (3) Private, when granted by Indult to a private person or family. A bishop's private chapel is, however, equivalent to a semi-public oratory. Any one of the Faithful can validly fulfil the obligation of hearing Mass on Sundays in any public or semi-public oratory, but not in a private oratory; but all are to receive Communion even if a private one when Mass is celebrated there, they being present. Public and semi-public oratories may be consecrated and should at least be solemnly blessed. Private oratories are only to have the Benedictio loci read over them. A bishop may for just cause limit the access of the Faithful to any oratory, and supervises the celebration of Masses in them as in the churches of his diocese. The reserving of the Blessed Sacrament in an oratory is only permitted when an Indult from Rome has been obtained to that effect.

ORATORY, THE FRENCH. A society of priests founded by Cardinal de Bérulle at Paris in 1611, with the advice of César de Bus, the Père Cotton, and other eminent men, in order to strengthen ecclesiastical discipline, which had been weakened during the troubles of the League. Bossuet says that M. de Bérulle "preferred to give no other spirit to his company but the spirit of the Church itself, no other rule than her canons, no other superiors than her bishops, no other bond but charity, and no vows but those of baptism and ordination." To deepen devotion, promote professional studies, and spread an ecclesiastical spirit among the secular clergy, that through them the whole population might be reached and influenced, were the principal objects of the institute. In 1612 it was declared a royal foundation. After some hesitation Paul V. (1614) approved the society, under the title of "Congregation of the Oratory of our Lord Jesus Christ in France." In 1616 a residence, with chapel annexed, was occupied in the Rue St. Honoré. The fathers paid much attention to music, and were called "les pères du beau chant." The favourite work of the founder was the institution of seminaries for the training of priests; of these he lived to see six—at Langres, Nevers, &c.—in working order. He was the friend and supporter of Descartes, and the congregation always had the reputation of being rather favourable to Cartesianism. The Cardinal died in 1629, leaving fifty seminaries, colleges, and houses of retreat in the erection of which he had been instrumental, all in full activity. The saintly Père de Condren succeeded him in the government of the congregation; he was followed by Bourgoing, Senault, Sainte-Marthe, and De la Tour. Jansenism took a strong hold of the congregation, and the bull "Unigenitus" was long a bone of contention among the members; but the sounder portion at last prevailed, and the bull was accepted by the society in 1746. At the Revolution the educational functions discharged by the congregation saved it for a time; but the fathers firmly resisted the Civil Constitution of the Clergy, and when the ceremony of consecrating the constitutional bishops was appointed to take place in their church in the Rue St. Honoré they all refused to be present. Later, a few gave way and took the oath. The "Oratory of the Immaculate Conception," founded at Paris in 1852 by M. Pététot, curé of St. Roch, and the Abbé Gratry, adopted the rule of the ancient society.

Among the eminent men whom the French Oratory produced were Thomassin (a name often quoted in these pages), Lejeune, Richard Simon, Malebranche, Quesnel, Pouget, Massillon, Renaudot, Jean Morin (commonly called Morinus), Le Brun, Lami, Duhamel, and Card. Perraud. ("Encycl. du XIX^me^ Siècle," 1852, art. by Jules Sauzay.)

ORATORY OF ST. PHILIP NERI. Philip Neri, a native of Florence, remarkable from his childhood upwards for the singular beauty and purity of his character, came to reside at Rome, at the age of eighteen, in 1533. For some years he was tutor to the children of a Florentine nobleman living in Rome. His life was one of habitual self-denial, penance, and prayer. A thirst for doing good consumed him; and by degrees he gathered round him a number of men, young and old, whom he animated by his discourses to a greater zeal for God and hatred of evil, and to a more exact regularity of life than they had known before. This he did while still a layman; but on the advice of his confessor he received holy orders, and was ordained priest in 1551. For a short time after his ordination he received in his own chamber those whom he had won to God, and instructed them on spiritual things; then, during seven years, in a larger room. Out of these colloquies was gradually perfected the plan of evening exercises which is to this day practised by the congregation—plain sermons being preached, hymns sung, and popular devotions used, in a regular order, on every week-day evening except Saturday. The number of persons attending the exercises still increasing, he obtained (1558) from the administration of the Church of St. Jerome leave to build over one of the aisles of that church a chapel, to which he gave the modest name of an "oratory," whence arose the name of the congregation. About this time many persons afterwards eminent in the Church and the world joined him, amongst whom were Caesar Baronius, the ecclesiastical historian, and Francis Maria Tarugi (afterwards Cardinals), Lucci, Tassone, &c. Six years later, the Florentines living in Rome having requested him to undertake the charge of the Church of St. John the Baptist which they had just built, the saint (1564) caused Baronius and others of his followers to remove thither and to receive ordination. From this date the commencement of the congregation is reckoned. Their numbers increasing, it seemed desirable to the Fathers to have a house of their own. The old church of the Vallicella, situated in the heart of Rome, was ceded to them in 1575; and St. Philip at once caused the present magnificent church, called the "Chiesa Nuova," to be commenced on the site. The Fathers removed to the Vallicella in 1577 on the completion of the church; St. Philip joined them in 1583. Gregory XIII. had approved and confirmed the erection of the congregation in 1575. The constitutions of the society—which St. Philip desired should be composed of simple priests, without vows, but agreeing to a rule of life—were approved by Paul V. in 1612. St. Philip died in 1595, was beatified in 1615, and canonized in 1622. The rule of the congregation from the first was that each house should be independent, the only exception being made in favour of certain Italian oratories (Naples, San Severino, and afterwards Lanciano), which were at first administered by the mother house at Rome.

The Oratory was introduced into England in 1847 by Dr. (afterwards Cardinal) Newman, who, during his long sojourn in Rome following upon his conversion, had studied closely the work of the holy founder and become deeply imbued with the spirit of his institute. The first house was at Mary Vale, i.e. Old Oscott, and was transferred, after a temporary sojourn at St. Wilfrid's, Staffordshire, to Alcester Street, Birmingham, in January 1849. A short time later a house was opened at King William Street, Strand, London, by F. Faber, with several other fathers who belonged to the Birmingham congregation, and were still subject to Father Newman. In October 1850, the London house was released from obedience to Birmingham, and erected into a congregation with a superior of its own. It was finally transferred to Brompton, where it has erected a large domed church. The Oratory at Birmingham remained under the direction—even after his elevation to the purple—of its illustrious founder, and has become a great centre for the midland counties of Catholic preaching and education.

The following passage embodies a portion of the Cardinal's conception of St. Philip's work. "He was raised up," writes Cardinal Newman, "to do a work almost peculiar to the Church." Instead of combating like Ignatius, or being a hunter of souls like St. Cajetan, "Philip preferred, as he expressed it, tranquilly to cast in his net to gain them; he preferred to yield to the stream and direct the current—which he could not stop—of science, literature, art, and fashion, and to sweeten and sanctify what God had made very good and man had spoilt. And so he contemplated as the idea of his mission, not the propagation of the faith, nor the exposition of doctrine, nor the catechetical schools; whatever was exact and systematic pleased him not; he put from him monastic rule and authoritative speech, as David refused the armour of his king. No; he would be but an ordinary individual priest as others; and his weapons should be but unaffected humility and unpretending love. All he did was to be done by the light, and fervour, and convincing eloquence of his personal character and his easy conversation. He came to the Eternal City and he sat himself down there, and his home and his family gradually grew up around him, by the spontaneous accession of materials from without. He did not so much seek his own as draw them to him. He sat in his small room, and they in their gay worldly dresses, the rich and the well-born as well as the simple and the illiterate, crowded into it. . . . And they who came remained gazing and listening till, at length, first one and then another threw off their bravery, and took his poor cassock and girdle instead; or, if they kept it, it was to put hair-cloth under it, or to take on them a rule of life, while to the world they looked as before." [1] (Capecelatro, "Life of St. Philip Neri," Eng. tr.; Faber, "Spirit and Genius of St. Philip"; Ritchie in "Cath. Enc.")

ORDEAL. [See JUDICIUM DEI.]

ORDER, HOLY. Holy Order, according to Catholic doctrine, is a sacrament of the new law, by which spiritual power is given and grace conferred for the performance of sacred duties.

I. The Meaning of the Word "Ordo" is explained by St. Thomas ("Suppl." q. 32, a. 2, ad 4), and the investigation of modern scholars has proved his view to be substantially correct. "Ordo" means "rank," whether high or low, but the meaning was restricted, much as our own word "rank" often is, to "eminent rank"—i.e. the clerical position as distinct from that of laymen. Salmasius suggested (see Ritschl, "Entstehung der Altkatholischen Kirche," p. 388) that the earliest Christian writers in Latin borrowed the word from the municipal constitution of the Romans, so that "ordo" would mean "magistracy." But it is much more likely that they adopted it as a version of κλῆρος; and, as the reader will presently see, it was only by degrees that it acquired the exclusive sense of "eminent" or "magisterial rank." Thus, though Tertullian implies that the "ecclesiae ordo" is distinct from the laity ("De Monog." 7, PL, ii. 938); though he speaks of persons who "are chosen into the ecclesiastical order" ("De Idololatr." 7, PL, 669), and, again, of "the priestly order" ("ordo sacerdotalis," "De Exhort. Cast." 7, PL, ii. 922); he also recognizes "widows" as an "order" of the Church ("Ad Uxor." i. 7, PL, i. 1286; and cf. "ordines," PL, ii. 947, in the plural, "De Monog." 12). Even Jerome uses "ordo" in its wide and, as we believe, original sense. For ("In Jesaiam" lib. V. cap. xix. 18) he enumerates five "orders" of the Church ("ecclesiae ordines")—viz. bishops, presbyters, deacons, the faithful, catechumens.

II. The Number of Orders.—In the Latin Church the ecclesiastical orders are those of bishops, priests, deacons, subdeacons, acolytes, exorcists, readers, ostiarii, or doorkeepers. The first three are as old as the time of the Apostles; and all must be very ancient, for they are mentioned incidentally by Cornelius, bishop of Rome, in the middle of the third century (apud Euseb. "H.E." vi. 43). Nor is there any reason to think that their institution was recent even then. Some canonists add another order, that of the tonsure, but it is generally regarded as a mere introduction to the clerical state, and this view is consonant to the language of the Council of Trent (sess. xxiii. cap. 2). Apart from this, very many theologians, among whom is St. Thomas, do not regard the episcopate as a separate order, but only as the completion and extension of the priesthood, and hence reckon the number of the orders as seven. The title of the Tridentine chapter already referred to, "De Septem Ordinibus," favours this view; but, according to the eminent German canonist Phillips, it is not found in the earlier editions. The theory rests on the assumption that all orders are referred to the Eucharist, and thus the bishop has no power which a simple priest has not also, except that the former can, the latter cannot, convey this power to others by ordination. Those who hold the episcopate to be a distinct order not unnaturally reject this exclusive reference of Holy Order to the Eucharist as arbitrary, and argue that the power of ordination and confirmation sufficiently justifies the position of the episcopate as separate order. The orders of bishop, priest, deacon, and (but only since the thirteenth century) subdeacon are called "sacred" or "greater," those of acolyte, &c., "minor" orders. In the Greek, Coptic, and Nestorian Churches the orders recognized are those of bishop, priest, deacon, subdeacon, and reader, to which that of "singer" (ψάλτης) is sometimes added. Great variety, however, has prevailed in the East, both as to the number and classification of the orders, and we must refer the reader for fuller information to Goar ("Euchologion"); to Denzinger ("Ritus Orientalium," vol. i. p. 116 seq.); and to the articles on the individual orders in this work.

III. Holy Order as a Sacrament.—The Council of Trent defines (sess. xxii. De Sacr. Ord. can. 3) that Order is "truly and properly a sacrament instituted by Christ," and that by means of it the Holy Ghost is given (Canon 4). Evidently, in ordination there is an external sign, but the question at issue between Catholics and most Protestants turns on the grace which, as Catholics believe, accompanies the sign. A priest, as the Church teaches, receives supernatural power in his ordination, an indelible character [see CHARACTER], and, if rightly disposed, grace to support him in the exercise of his ministry. If this question be settled, the rest of the contention follows. A sign which necessarily conveys grace cannot have been instituted by authority which is merely human, and the external sign, grace given, institution by our Lord, are the three constituents of a sacrament.

That grace is given follows from the clear statements of Scripture. Christ "breathed on" His Apostles and said "Receive the Holy Ghost; whosesoever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; whosesoever sins ye retain, they are retained" (Jn. xx. 23). St. Paul twice reminds St. Timothy of the grace he had received at ordination. "Do not neglect the grace which was given through prophecy, with laying on of the hands of the presbytery" (1 Tim. iv. 14); "I put thee in mind to rekindle the grace [or rather gift, χάρισμα] of God, which is in thee through the laying on of my hands" (2 Tim. i. 6). St. Timothy was marked out for his office by someone who had the prophetic spirit, common in the early Church, and the presbyters joined St. Paul in the imposition of hands, just as presbyters unite with our bishops in the same way at the present time. But the former was an accidental, the latter an unessential circumstance, and hence St. Paul omits the mention of both in the second passage. The grace was conveyed by the imposition of Apostolic hands (observe the contrast, "with" [μετὰ] the laying on of the hands of the presbytery, and "through [διὰ] the laying on of my hands"), and the context leaves no doubt that the grace given was for the right administration of the ecclesiastical office. St. Timothy is to remember the grace received, and to let no one despise his youth, to be the example of the faithful, &c. &c., he is to "rekindle it," for the Spirit given is one of power, love, temperance, &c., and he must not be ashamed of the "testimony of the Lord." It is in vain that an able writer (Hatch, "Organisation of the Early Christian Church," p. 133) urges that χάρισμα has a latitude of meaning, and may be rendered "talent." This is not a fair account of its meaning in the New Testament; but if it were, what then? Plainly Timothy did not receive a natural "talent" by laying on of hands. Nor was it merely the office entrusted to him, for it would be senseless to speak of "rekindling" an office. It was, then, just what Hatch denies that ordination can give—viz. an interior quality, the fire of the Holy Ghost in the heart, ever present to empower and quicken St. Timothy in the exercise of his duties. It did not come from man, though man had it in his power to "rekindle" and correspond to it. It is well to notice that an interpretation substantially identical with ours is given and justified from the context by one of the best Protestant commentators on the Pastoral Epistles (Huther, ad loc.). Further, if, the clergy had been originally mere representatives of the people, deriving all their power from them, and only doing for the sake of order and convenience what laymen might do also, then indeed it would be hard to believe in the sacramental character of the rite. St. Paul, however, speaks of ἐπίσκοποι (the precise meaning of the word does not concern us here) as those whom "the Holy Ghost had appointed to tend the Church of God which He acquired through His own blood" (Acts xx. 28). If the Holy Ghost appoints those who are ordained to their sacred function, the prophecy or popular election which designs them for these functions being a separable accident, then we are not surprised to find St. Paul assuming that the same Holy Ghost endowed them with grace and power. It is quite true that Jewish Rabbis were set apart by imposition of hands,[1] and Hatch has collected many interesting and instructive parallels to different parts of the ordination rite from the customs of the Roman magistracy, &c. These, however, in no way affect the main question. No one supposed that the imposition of hands would of itself prove the grace of orders, while the other rites to which Hatch refers are allowed on all hands to be of merely human institution. Our appeal is to the grace which Scripture assures us is attached to the imposition of hands for holy orders, and we fail to see that the appeal can be set aside on the grounds which Hatch and so many other learned Protestants allege.

Such is the value assigned to the Sacrament of Holy Order in the Scripture, and the burden of proof lies on our adversaries if they maintain that the clergy, having first received their power from God, sank after the Apostolic age to mere representatives of the congregation. As a matter of fact, Christian antiquity is in harmony with Scripture. Only, the question of election or designation to office must not be confused with the power given in ordination to the office; and again we must not expect full and dogmatic statements on the nature of Holy Order in the brief and occasional writings of the early Fathers. Their main contention against heretics did not turn on the question of their orders or want of orders—in many cases heretics did possess true orders—but on the fact that they were outside the one Church. Still, St. Ignatius speaks of the bishop as having "acquired his ministry, not from himself, nor through men" (Philad. i.). The bishop is to be regarded as "the Lord Himself" (Ephes. vi.). "Let that be considered a valid Eucharist which is under the bishop or one commissioned by him" (Smyrn. viii.)—a rule, however, which in all likelihood was meant as a warning against all schismatical rites, even if celebrated by a priest, for the word βεβαία can scarcely be pressed. True, Tertullian ("De Exhort. Cast." 7, PL, ii. 922; "Monog." 7, 12, PL, ii. 958) holds very different language, asserts the universal priesthood of Christians, and reduces the difference between clergy and laity to one of ecclesiastical institution. But then Tertullian was a bitter Montanist when he thus wrote, and it was the characteristic of Montanism to set the claims of individual piety against the claims of the hierarchy. And, although he does certainly assume that his premiss—viz. that all Christians are priests—will be accepted by Catholics, it is quite in the manner of this exaggerated writer to take the Catholic and Scriptural doctrine that all Christians are priests in a sense, just as Israel was in a sense a nation of priests, and to distort it into the admission that even Catholics made no essential difference between priest and layman. (See Döllinger, "Hippolytus and Callistus," English translation, p. 320 seq.) His reckless use of Scripture and misrepresentation of fact, to enforce his Montanist views (see e.g. "Exhort. Cast." 7 and 9), show how little he can be trusted. Nothing of the sort can, so far as we are aware, be found in a Catholic bishop who called Tertullian his master; we mean Cyprian. He speaks of the bishops as successors of the Apostles (Ep. xliv. lxvi. ed. Hartel 599, 729; see also Clarus a Mascula, "In Sentent. Episc." 79, and this by ordination, as he expressly says); he derives the power of the Episcopate (xxxiii. ib. 566), not from the people, but from Christ's commission to Peter (ib.). Just as much to the point is a passage of Cyprian's contemporary Firmilian, who says the power of forgiving sins has been bestowed on the Apostles, then on the churches and the bishops, who have succeeded the Apostles by successive ordination (ordinatione vicaria, inter "Opp. Cypr." Ep. lxxv. ib. 820). So again in the Apostolic Constitution, which belongs to the same period, we read, "Neither do we permit laymen to perform any of the priestly functions (ἱερατικῶν ἔργων)—e.g. sacrifice, baptism, ordination, blessing great or small. For through the imposition of the bishop's hands such dignity is given" ("Const. Ap." iii. 10). This rule is attributed to the Apostles. The Council of Nicaea forbade deacons to give communion to presbyters, and this on the ground, which is taken for granted, that the former had no authority or power to offer sacrifice. "Neither the rule nor custom has handed down that those who have no authority to offer (i.e. to offer sacrifice, προσφέρειν, this principle being assumed) should give the body of Christ to those who do offer" (Can. 18). Later Fathers who treated of doctrine at greater length furnish, as we should expect, more explicit statements. "Who gives," says the author of a work falsely attributed to St. Ambrose,[1] "the episcopal grace? You answer without doubt, God. But still God gives it through man. Man imposes the hand, God gives the grace" ("De Sacerdot. Dign." cap. 5, PL, xvii. 577). St. Augustine ("Contr. Epist. Parmen." ii. 13, PL, xliii. 70) compares the Sacrament of Order to that of Baptism; neither can be reiterated; ordination, even when given by a schismatical bishop, is valid, and again ("De Bono Conjugali," cap. 24) he maintains the indelible character of Order. It is not lost if the flock is withdrawn from the pastor; it abides in spite of the pastor's crimes, though of course its permanence increases the culprit's guilt. ("Sacramento Domini semel imposito non carebit quamvis ad judicium permanente.") This indelible character of Order follows from the principles for which we have been contending. Man cannot take away what he did not give. And further, if a wicked or schismatical bishop ordain, after all it is God who, in the words of the author quoted above, "bestows the grace."

We will only add that the existence of the sacrifice of the Body and Blood of Christ naturally inclines us to believe in the Sacrament of Order. God, who in the old law appointed a priesthood to offer sacrifices which could not take away sin, did not surely leave the sacrifice in which the "Word," as St. Irenaeus says, is "offered up" to Him without appointed ministers and guardians. Nor does Catholic belief foster priestly pride. Such an abuse may and does occur, for here, as elsewhere, man's weakness and sin mar the work of God. But the very fact that bishops and priests hold a commission from God and not from their flocks is a preservative against the temptation to please men at the expense of virtue and truth. A man who holds his place because of his popularity has far more temptation to vanity than a priest who knows he is nothing except for a grace he has received beyond any merits of his, and in common with multitudes of others; that he can only use this grace in accordance with laws which man cannot change, and that it involves dread responsibilities. It needs no great piety or humility to feel the contrast between the trust reposed in him and his own weakness. It is the contrast between God and man, not between men, which is the true source of humility; and what is said of Christians generally is specially applicable to priests. "We have the treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellence may be God's, and not from us" (2 Cor. iv. 7). Priests and people alike sink into nothing before Him. "The eyes of man's pride shall be humbled, and the loftiness of men shall be bowed down, and the Lord alone shall be exalted in that day" (Isa. ii. 11).

IV. The Orders in which the Sacrament is given.—St. Thomas ("Suppl." q. 37 a. 3) holds that each order is a sacrament, and this apparently was the common opinion in the Middle Ages. But historical study and knowledge of the Eastern rites do not favour this view, which is, we believe, no longer common. Probably, the orders lower than the diaconate are only of ecclesiastical institution, and are not, therefore, accompanied by sacramental grace. It is certain from the proofs given above and from the Tridentine definition (sess. xxii., especially Canons 4, 7) that the episcopate and priesthood are sacraments; and it is all but universally held (Durandus and Cajetan are quoted on the other side) that the diaconate is so also. Indeed this seems to be a clear consequence from Canon 4, just quoted, and Billuart calls this opinion that the diaconate is a sacrament "so common and certain that several theologians charge the contrary sentiment of Durandus and Cajetan with rashness" (Billuart, "De Ord." I. a. 3, § 1).

V. The Minister of Order.—The distinction by Divine right between bishops and presbyters has been sufficiently explained in the article on the former. Here it is enough to say that the ordinary minister of Order is the bishop. Priests, however, may, by concession of the Pope or Church, confer minor orders, and certain abbots exercise this privilege, though the Council of Trent (sess. xxiii. cap. 10, "De Reform.") withdrew from them the right of doing so, except in the case of their own subjects. Those who hold the subdiaconate to be of merely ecclesiastical institution would naturally allow that the Pope might permit a simple priest to give that order. It is much harder to believe that the Pope could empower a priest to ordain anyone deacon. Theologians of name assert that such a privilege was given in 1489 to a Cistercian abbot, and used by the Cistercian General at Rome in 1662 with the Pope's knowledge, but the alleged fact is disputed. (See Billuart, loc. cit. diss. ii. a. 1.) A bishop cannot lawfully ordain any except those who belong to his diocese by birth, domicile (see the article), possession of a benefice, or by having lived in his house for three years. In this last case the bishop must at once confer a benefice on the person ordained. A bishop may give letters dimissorial, enabling another bishop to ordain the bearers of them, and if the see has been vacant a whole year, then, but not till then, the chapter may give such letters. The superiors of Regulars must send their subjects to the bishop of the diocese, but in case he is absent, then the superior may send his subjects with dimissorials to any bishop. The dimissorials must, however, be accompanied with a certificate from the bishop's vicar-general, chancellor, or secretary (Gury, "Theol. Moral." De Ord. cap. 3). The episcopate may be conferred on any Sunday or feast of an Apostle, the other holy orders on Ember Saturdays, Saturday before Passion Sunday, and Holy Saturday. Minor orders may be given on the days mentioned last, and also, if the ordination is not a general one, "on Sundays and other festivals" (St. Alphonsus, "Theol. Moral." De Ord. § 794). These rules as to the time of ordination, and in particular the greater freedom as to the time allowed for consecration of bishops and conferring minor orders, are very ancient. The only change consists in this, that the ordinations used to be held, not as now, in the morning of Saturday, but on the evening of Saturday or on Sunday morning. They were held in the church in the presence of the people. As a rule, a bishop was consecrated in his own church or that of his metropolitan. (Chardon, 317.)

We have seen that Augustine recognized the validity of heretical and schismatical ordinations, provided, of course, the ordaining bishop had used the essential matter and form. The same principle had been followed by the Council of Nicaea in dealing with the Meletians and Novatians (see Hefele-Leclercq, i. 500, 576 sqq.) and by Popes Leo I., Anastasius II., and Innocent I. But in the eighth and following centuries this point of doctrine was obscured. The fact that persons ordained in conscious schism could receive no sacramental grace, though they did receive character and power, that they had no jurisdiction, that they were reconciled to the Church by an imposition of hands, mistaken perhaps for re-ordination, led to the error. The decision of a Roman council in 769 against the Anti-Pope Constantine has been variously interpreted. But in any case, "after the death of Pope Formosus, his adversaries, Stephen VII. and Sergius III., regarded the orders given by him as invalid." (The words are Cardinal Hergenröther's, "Kirchengeschichte," vol. i. p. 712.) In the tenth century, persons ordained by the Anti-Pope Leo VIII. were required to say at their degradation "My Father Leo had nothing to give, and has given me nothing." In the eleventh century, simony was known as the "heresy of Simon," and many maintained that ordination by bishops simoniacally elected was invalid (Hergenröther, ib.). St. Peter Damian defended the true doctrine, but Peter Lombard found the diversity of opinion on the validity of heretical ordination so great that he considered the question to be almost insoluble ("Sent." iv. dist. 25). Even in the thirteenth century William of Paris believed that the Church could withdraw the character of holy order by degradation; while others, starting with the view that the episcopate was a mere extension of the presbyterate, supposed that, although a degraded priest could still say Mass, a degraded bishop could not validly ordain. As a rule, however, the great scholastics adhered to the teaching of St. Augustine, which in the end was accepted. (Hergenröther, ib. p. 987 sqq.; Saltet, "Les Réordinations.")

VI. The Matter and Form of Holy Order.—An account of the rite of ordination will be found under the different articles, DEACON, LECTOR, &c. This, however, seems the fitting place to discuss the theological question as to the essential matter and form of the orders in which the sacrament is undoubtedly given—viz. the orders of bishop, priest, and deacon. There are three opinions.

(α) "Nearly all the Schoolmen," says Catalani ("Comm. in Pontif." tom. i. p. 197), "who discuss the matter and form of the episcopate make its form consist in these words, 'Receive the Holy Ghost,' which are uttered by the consecrating and assisting bishops, touching the head of the person to be consecrated, just as the book of the Gospels is placed on his head." Some Schoolmen hold that the matter and form of ordination to the priesthood consists in the bishop's handing to the new priest the paten and chalice—an act commonly called the "tradition of the instruments," and the form in the accompanying words. They felt special difficulty about the diaconate, but some of them placed the matter and form in the giving of the dalmatic, or else of the book of the Gospels. (See Chardon, 872.) And St. Thomas ("Supp." q. 34, a. 4) implies that he held one or other of these theories.

(β) We do not think any theologian at the present day would defend the theory just stated.[1] The objection to it will presently appear. Many of the later Schoolmen, however, hold a doctrine which has some resemblance to it. They suppose that Christ left the Church to determine the specific matter and form of Holy Order, and that this determination has been different for different places. According to them, the matter and form for the West consist partly in the words and rites just enumerated, partly in the imposition of hands (for the ordination of priests the third imposition in the Roman Pontifical), and in the accompanying words, which denote the reception of the Holy Ghost for the office given.

The following reasons tell, as we venture to think, with fatal effect against either of these theories, the latter of which has the additional defect of resting on arbitrary assumption.

The words "Receive the Holy Ghost" cannot be the necessary form of episcopal consecration. They are unknown in the Greek and Syriac rites, and not only so, but they are of recent introduction in the West. "They do not occur," says Chardon, writing in 1745, "in Latin Rituals which are older than 400 years, and they are wanting even in several modern ones" (loc. cit. ch. i.). The testimony of Morinus and Martène is substantially the same. "None of the English Pontificals, except the Exeter, contain this form" (Maskell, "Monument. Rit." vol. ii. p. 274). Again, the tradition of instruments for the ordination of priests is unknown at this day to the Greeks, and was unknown to the Latins till the tenth (so Morinus) or eleventh (Chardon) century. The last imposition of hands in the Roman Pontifical, that after the communion, and also the words "Receive the Holy Ghost; whose sins ye remit," &c., were unknown, according to Morinus and Chardon, even in the West, for 1,200 years. Again, Western Rituals previous to the ninth century say nothing about the placing of the Gospels in the hands of the man to be ordained deacon, and, of course, do not contain the form of words with which the book of the Gospels is presented. The rite began in England (Chardon, ch. v.; Maskell, p. 210), and is not to be found in any Pontifical before the tenth century, those of English use alone excepted. Even in the twelfth century, Latin writers who treat in detail about the rite for ordination of deacons are silent about the form "Receive the Holy Ghost, for strength," &c. It is scarcely necessary to add that investing of the deacon with the dalmatic cannot be traced beyond the Middle Ages. These facts are, we believe, accepted by all the most eminent critics, Morinus, Martène, Chardon, &c. It is only in slight details—e.g. as to the precise date of introduction—that they differ, and thus we are led to the third theory, which we state chiefly in the words of Chardon.

(γ) The form need not be imperative—"Receive the Holy Ghost," or the like: no tradition of instruments is needed for validity. "The essential matter and form of ordination consist only in the imposition of the bishop's hands, joined to the invocation of the Holy Spirit."[1] Morinus was led to adopt this opinion by the knowledge he gained when member of a Roman congregation formed by Urban VIII. to examine the Greek Euchologium. It has been adopted, scarcely, as Chardon asserts, by nearly all theologians of repute, but certainly by nearly all critics and scholars. It is in harmony with the statements of Scripture, of the Fathers, and the ancient Ritual books. It in no way contradicts the statements of the Tridentine Council, as Morinus shows, nor the practice of the Church in requiring those who have not touched the instruments to be re-ordained conditionally. For, so long as there is no authoritative decision on the point, the Church rightly insists that the safer course be taken.

Thus the matter of the consecration of a bishop would lie in the imposition of hands when the Gospels are placed on his head, and the form in the invocation of the Holy Ghost, which is preceded in the present Latin rite by the words "Receive the Holy Ghost." A priest is ordained when the bishop, with the assistant priests, imposes his hands and says

[1] Still, even the Carmelite Thomas a Jesu, in his learned work, De Procuranda Salute omnium Gentium (Antwerp, 1613; it is a guide for missionaries, with special reference to Oriental rites), says (lib. vii.) that Oriental orders, according to the truer opinion, are invalid, because given without tradition of instruments.

[1] Thus, in a certain sense, the necessary form is indeterminate; it may be precatory, imperative, &c. But, according to this opinion, the Church has not determined and cannot determine, so far as concerns validity, what Christ left indeterminate.

"Oremus, fratres," &c., "Exaudi nos, quaesumus," &c. (i.e. when the second imposition is made). A deacon is made by the imposition of the bishop's right hand, and the form lies in the prayer "Emitte in eos, quaesumus," &c. But the other ceremonies and prayers seem to determine and specificate the meaning of these forms, and mark the special purpose (the office of a deacon &c.) for which the Holy Ghost is invoked. Hence, though these particular rites are not absolutely necessary, it by no means follows that, if all were omitted and nothing left in any way corresponding to them, the grace of orders would be conveyed. (Tournely, "Praelect. Theol." De Ordine.)[1]

VII. The Subjects or Recipients of the Sacrament.—Any baptized male capable of intending to receive the sacrament may do so validly. We make the limitation as to intention on the authority of Tournely (loc. cit. qu. iv. a. 4, "verisimilius videtur"), and because it commends itself to us on grounds of history and reason. It is right, however, to say that the Thomists generally believe that an infant, or those who are hopelessly mad, might validly receive any order except the episcopate, to which last cure of souls is necessarily attached.[2] All admit that in adults, with the exception just mentioned, intention is required.

To be ordained lawfully a person must have the due age and knowledge; he must have observed the interstices (q.v.); he must be free from irregularity, suspension, excommunication; he must be of good life, and have the signs of a call or vocation from God. For holy orders he needs a title. For these requisites we refer to the articles devoted to them. But the mention of interstices suggests the questions raised on ordinations per saltum—i.e. ordination to a higher order of a person who has not received a lower one.

The Church has always disapproved such ordinations, except in rare cases, and looked on the exercise of lower orders as the best preparation for ascending higher. Still St. Cyprian was made priest and bishop without passing through the lower grades ("Vita Pontii," cap. 3, ed. Hartel, p. xciii.). St. Augustine received the priesthood in the same way ("Vita Possidii," cap. 4). Morinus, a very high authority, denies that antiquity furnishes any instance of a person who was not already a priest being consecrated bishop. But clear cases are produced by Chardon (812), and Martène ("De Antiq. Eccles." lib. i.; "Rit." cap. 8, a. 3).[1] The lower order is contained in the higher, and Church history records sudden elevations justified by extraordinary merit and emergency, just as secular history records sudden elevations like that of Xanthippus the Lacedaemonian, in the first Punic war (Polyb. "Hist." i. 32), or of Spinola to the rank of general. (See the dogmatic and moral theologians and the canonists on the sacrament of Order; e.g. De Augustinis, "De Re Sacramentaria," ii. lib. 4; Ballerini (Palmieri), "Theol. Mor." v. p. 708 sqq.; Card. Gasparri, "Tractatus Canonicus de Sacra Ordinatione"; also the liturgical writers, e.g. Martène, "De Antiquis Ecclesiae Ritibus"; Duchesne, "Christian Worship," ch. x. Other important works are mentioned in the above article.)

ORDERS, RELIGIOUS. The fundamental conceptions which lie at the root of the religious life (in the technical sense of the word "religion") have been more or less examined in the articles ASCETAE, HERMITS, MONK, and NUN. On the external development of that life within the Church, since the time when religious orders first arose, a few general remarks will find here their appropriate place.

The conception of orders of monks did not arise so long as every monastery was an independent entity, managing its own affairs without reference to any other authority but the general law of the Church. Bede speaks of monasteries following the rule of St. Benedict, but he never speaks of the order of St. Benedict. It was only when, commencing in the tenth century, separate communities such as those of Cluny, Cîteaux, and the Chartreuse were formed within the great Benedictine brotherhood, and these communities, however widely scattered, submitted to the rule of a single superior (usually the abbot of the mother house), and met periodically in order to settle their common affairs, that the term "order" came into use. A completely new order—the Trinitarians—was founded by St. John of Matha towards the close of the twelfth century for the redemption of Christians held in captivity by the infidels. The institution of our Lady of Mercy (Ransom), founded (1218) by St. Peter Nolasco as an order of chivalry, but afterwards transformed into a religious order, had the same end in view. Early in the thirteenth century the mendicant orders—Franciscan, Dominican, and Carmelite friars (see those articles)—were either founded or came into distinct prominence; in the second half of the century they were joined by the Augustinian friars. These four orders, having no landed property, but subsisting on alms, preached in all parts of

[1] The Bull Apostolicae Curae, condemning Anglican Orders, declares that the matter of the sacrament is the imposition of hands, "which indeed by itself signifies nothing definite, and is equally used for several Orders and for Confirmation." This must be determined by words definitely expressing "the sacred order of priesthood, or its grace or power, which is chiefly the power of consecrating and of offering the true Body and Blood of the Lord."

[2] So St. Thomas, Suppl. q. 39, a. 2. But Billuart, diss. iii. a. 3, § 1, with some other Thomists, will not admit this exception; and, indeed, it can scarcely be maintained.

[1] "Certe Joannes S. Galli discipulus, diaconus ordinatus, episcopus Constantiensis factus est, presbyteratu non suscepto, ut satis clare docet Strabo in Vit. S. Galli, c. 23." Martène, loc. cit.; he gives other instances.

Europe, but especially in cities, where luxury and civic pride were beginning to show themselves, the humbling and fortifying doctrines of the Cross. The Servites, founded by seven merchants of Florence and propagated by St. Philip Beniti, after a struggling existence of more than two centuries, were recognized by Innocent VIII. (1487) as a fifth mendicant order, with privileges in all respects equal to those of the other four. The Jeronymites and Bridgettines were founded in the fourteenth century. The founder of the Minims (1473), a filiation of the order of St. Francis, was St. Francis of Paula.

The movement of the Reformation, of which the mainspring was the rebellion of man's lower against the restraints imposed upon it by his higher nature, was met on the Catholic side partly by direct antagonism, partly by argument, and partly by the reassertion, under new forms adapted to the altered circumstances of the time, of the unchanging Christian ideal of the moral and religious end of man. And since the spirit of the Church is most clearly seen in the religious orders, it was to be expected that the conflict with Protestantism would fall to a large extent into the hands of men bound by the three vows. The Theatines (1524), Capuchins (1528), and Barnabites (1533) were founded in order to wage war against the corruption of morals which prevailed, and to promote the religious education of the people. The Society of Jesus (1540) opposed to the indiscipline and licence of Protestantism a more rigid and unquestioning obedience to authority than had yet been known in the Church. The Discalced Carmelites, men (1580), and women (1563), practised the full austerities prescribed by the original rule. On the movement among the Benedictines, see that article and MAURISTS. In the following century an austere reform of the Cistercian order was established in the monastery of La Trappe by Dom Armand de Rancé (1662). [TRAPPISTS.]

In the Middle Ages, when the power of law was still weak, and society was often agitated by unpunished acts of turbulence and injustice, the sight of the peaceful and orderly life of a monastery, spent in a round of ceaseless prayer, praise, and study, was by the very contrast deeply refreshing and stimulative to the higher characters among the laity. But when in process of time the "reign of law" was firmly established, this contrast lost much of its sharpness, and, so far as immunity from illegal violence was concerned, ceased to exist. It was therefore fitting that religious society, in order to maintain its ground in advance of civil, and not only "allure to brighter worlds," but also "lead the way," should produce new manifestations of the old endeavour after perfection. Coming forth from the cloister into the world, but still not of the world, the religious life has sanctified and embraced all those varied activities which have the relief of human suffering, and the dispelling of that ignorance which is an obstacle to salvation, as their end. Hence has arisen the multitude of congregations which adorn the Catholic Church of our own day. A few of these are noticed in the article CONGREGATIONS, RELIGIOUS.

The opposition of the governing class in nearly all the countries of Europe to the religious orders—an opposition lately carried in France and Portugal to the length of an ignoble persecution—is grounded, not on anything political, but on fundamental divergence in moral and religious ideas. The governing classes appear to think that man has no hereafter, and that his business is to get as much enjoyment out of his short term of life here as he can. Religious men and women know that the case is far otherwise; they cannot cease, therefore, to hold up the teaching of Christ and the practice of the saints for human instruction, in spite of any impediments which statesmen may throw in their way. (See Hélyot; Vermeersch, "De Religiosis Institutis et Personis," and in "Cath. Enc."; the moral theologians in their treatises De Statibus Particularibus.)

ORDINARY, THE. By this name, in the language of the Church, is denoted the diocesan bishop, who, in union with the common Father of Christendom, in virtue of the mission and the powers which he holds from our Lord, as a lawful successor of the Apostles, is called of common right, jure ordinario, to accomplish the Divine work of the sanctification of the faithful in the diocese over which he presides. The ordinary performs all ecclesiastical functions—teaching, administering the sacraments, governing the flock of Christ—in his own right; priests perform them by virtue of the delegated right which they derive from their bishop. [See BISHOP, SUFFRAGAN, and COADJUTOR.]

ORDINATION. The chief rules of law concerning the collation of Holy Orders, in relation to Persons, Times, and Places, form the subject of the present article.

Persons.—Women are incapable of being validly ordained, inasmuch as both the healthy natural instincts of mankind and positive Apostolic injunction (1 Cor. xiv. 34; 1 Tim. ii. 11) require that women should be "silent in the churches." When mention is made in the "Corpus Juris" of the ordination of deaconesses,[1] this is to be understood, not of ordination properly so called, but of a special benediction in virtue of which, in convents of women, those receiving it were empowered to read homilies or gospels before the community.

To receive Holy Orders validly, it is necessary to have been baptized and, at least for adults, to be acting voluntarily. To receive them licitly, it is necessary to be in a state of grace, to have been confirmed,[1] to take them in regular order and not per saltum, not to be irregular [IRREGULARITY],[2] to have attained the canonical age required, to be under no censure, to be sufficiently educated,[3] to be ordained either by one's own bishop, or, if otherwise, with his licence and after the production of his dimissorial letters [DIMISSORIALS]; and, lastly, to have a legitimate and sufficient title, by which is understood either a benefice, or a patrimony adequate to a man's support, or religious poverty—i.e. the poverty which religious men embrace by vow.[4] All orders in the regular course of things are conferred by bishops; but abbots also have the power—in some cases even before they have been blessed—of conferring minor orders on their own subjects (subditi).

Times.—The canonical age required for the tonsure and the three lowest grades of orders (ostiarius, lector, and exorcist) is seven years completed; for the acolyteship, twelve years completed. For the subdiaconate, the canonical age is 22, for the diaconate 23, and for the priesthood 25; in these three cases it is the commenced, not the completed, year that is meant. For the episcopate the full age of 30 years is required.

The tonsure can be conferred on any day, at any hour, and in any place. Minor orders can be conferred at general ordinations, and also on any Sunday or holiday,[5] and not necessarily during Mass. Sacred orders, according to the law, can only be conferred on the Saturdays in the four Ember weeks, on the fifth Saturday in Lent, or on Holy Saturday, and always during Mass. But since the plenitude of the Papal authority can dispense with any positive law, it is to be noted that orders are legally conferred on the members of all those religious orders which have received a special privilege of such a tenor from the Holy See at times other than those named by the law. The episcopate is conferred on a Sunday, or on the festival of an Apostle, unless a Papal indult has authorized the choice of some other day.

Two grades of sacred orders—e.g. the diaconate and the subdiaconate—may not be conferred on the same day.

On the intervals to be observed between the collation of the various grades, see INTERSTICES.

Place.—The Council of Trent enjoined (sess. xxv. 8, De Ref.) that sacred orders should be publicly conferred in the cathedral or in one of the principal churches of the diocese in the presence of the canons. Minor orders the bishop can confer in his own palace. But, notwithstanding the injunction of the council, custom has long sanctioned the collation of sacred orders by the bishop in his own house or chapel, if any reasonable cause can be shown for the non-compliance with the law. (Ferraris, Ordo, Ordinare.)

ORDO ROMANUS. Certain ancient collections of ritual prescriptions, or rubrics, as observed in the Roman Church, bear this name. They are represented at the present day by the Caeremoniale and the Pontificale Romanum (q.v.). The first of these collections which appeared in print was the "Ordo Vulgatus" (1559) of Melchior Hittorp. Towards the end of the seventeenth century Mabillon, in his "Museum Italicum," edited fifteen "Ordines," the first ten[1] of which are of great but uncertain antiquity; of the last five the authors and dates are known. The rubrics and directions which they contain relate, some to ordinary, others to extraordinary ceremonies. Of the former class are the Papal Mass, the Episcopal Mass, the celebration of Baptism and Extreme Unction, Ordinations, the Communion of the sick, the ceremonial of the last three days of Holy Week, Papal and cardinalitial functions during the offices of the whole year, sacerdotal functions on all ferias, benedictions, &c., &c. Of the second class are the election and consecration of a Pope, the coronation of the emperor and of kings, the creation of cardinals, the nomination of legates, canonization, &c. (Kober in "Kirchenlex."; Thurston in "Cath. Enc."; Grisar, "Analecta Romana," 198 sqq.; Atchley, "Ordo Romanus Primus.")

ORGAN (ὄργανον, organum) is used in the LXX for instruments of any kind, but especially of musical instruments. It occurs not only as the rendering of עוּגָב, the "pipe" or "flute," but also of כִּנּוֹר and נֵבֶל, which were stringed instruments (Ps. cl. 4, cxxxvii. 2; Amos v. 23, vi. 5). Our Latin psalms naturally conform to the Septuagint use; but the Vulgate, so far as it is Jerome's independent work, employs the word much more carefully. There "organum" never means a stringed instrument. It occurs fourteen times in Jerome's rendering of the Hebrew text; three times it represents עוּגָב, a "pipe" (Gen. iv. 21; Job xxi. 12 xxx. 31); in the other places it is the generic word for instruments of all kinds, a very accurate rendering of the Hebrew כְּלֵי, to

[2] There are, however, certain cases of irregularity, incurred for no very grave cause, in which the bishop can give a dispensation, and then ordain licitly.

[3] In the Corpus Juris Pope Gelasius says: "Let none presume to promote illiterate persons to the clerical order, for one who is destitute of learning cannot be fit for sacred functions." See also Conc. Trid. sess. xxiii. 4, De Ref.

[4] In missionary countries titulus missionis, that is the offerings &c. of the faithful, is recognized.

[5] In dioceses where a special custom prevails to that effect, minor orders can be given on Fridays or on an Ember Wednesday.

[1] The first ten are at least older than the ninth century or they are mentioned by Amalarius.

which in this latter case it always answers. (So 1 Paral. xv. 16; xvi. 5, 42; xxiii. 5; 2 Paral. v. 13; vii. 6; xxiii. 13; xxix. 20, 27; xxx. 27; xxxiv. 12.) Aquila, so far as we have observed, anticipated Jerome in accuracy on this point, for he did not fall into the blunder of mistaking with the LXX the "pipe" of Job xxi. 12 for a harp (see Field, "Hexapl. Orig." tom. ii. p. 30). Nor, again, does he, in Amos v. 23 and Ps. cxxxvii. 2, use ὄργανα for the stringed instruments mentioned there (Field, tom. ii. pp. 974, 290). Jerome not unfrequently imitated Aquila, and he may have done so in this case.

The organ, then, in the Vulgate, so far as it means a definite instrument at all, is equivalent to pipe. But in St. Augustine's time, as appears from his commentary on Ps. lvi. (Heb. lvii.), it was already used in its modern sense. He speaks of it as a large instrument in which the wind was supplied from bellows. It arose from a development of the syrinx, or set of pipes bound together. First these pipes were placed in a box and sounded by means of a slide which opened the hole with which the pipe was connected. The invention of this perforated slide is attributed to Ctesibius. Then, as the breath of the musician was not enough to play so many pipes, wind was supplied by bellows worked by the hand or by water. Such an hydraulic organ ("organum hydraulicum") is described by Tertullian ("De Anima," 14, PL, ii. 669), who attributes the invention to Archimedes; and there is also a well-known account of an organ with a bellows of bull's hide in an epigram by Julian the Apostate. The hydraulic organ is also mentioned by Talmudical writers, who retain the word ὕδραυλις (אוּרְגְּבָל), and the legend adds that it was not allowed in the temple because its soft tones spoilt the singing (Hamburger, "Real-Encycl. für Bibel und Talmud," p. 886). In 757 the Byzantine Emperor Constantine Copronymus sent an organ to Pepin, and another was sent to Charlemagne by Constantine Michael (references in Ducange, sub voc. "Organum"). A little later Pope John VIII. begged Anno, bishop of Freising, to send him an organ, with someone able to manage it (Mansi, "Concil." tom. xvii. col. 245). The development of the instrument does not concern us here. We only observe that keys were introduced in the eleventh century and pedals invented in the fifteenth, by Bernard, a German in the service of the Doge of Venice, and pass on to the ecclesiastical use of the organ.

It has never been adopted among the Greeks or Orientals. Chrysostom (in Ps. cl., PG, lv. 497) speaks of musical instruments generally as only "permitted" in Jewish worship "on account of their weakness." Theodoret (in Ps. cl. 5 and 6) holds much the same language, while the author of "Quaest. et Respons. ad Orthodox.," once attributed to Justin Martyr, but certainly written after the conversion of the empire, says expressly that, whereas instruments were allowed in the temple, singing only without instruments is permitted in Christian churches ("Respons. ad Quaest." 107). The Greeks and Russians at this day rigidly follow the same rule.

As to the West, we may at once put aside the fables that the organ was introduced into the churches by Pope Vitalian or even Pope Damasus. There is little doubt that it was the presents of organs made to Pepin and Charlemagne which led to the church use of the instruments. For Walafrid Strabo in the middle of the ninth century gives an account of the organ in the church at Aix-la-Chapelle, probably the very organ sent to Charlemagne from Constantinople. Its tones were so sweet and powerful, according to this writer, that they caused a woman to faint and die (Walafr. Strabo, "Carm. de Apparatu Eccles. Aquisgranensis"). Further, it has been shown from ancient charters that there was an organ in the church of Verona in Charlemagne's time (Ughelli, "Italia Sacra," tom. v. pp. 604, 610). A great organ with fourteen bellows and 400 pipes was built by Elfeg, bishop of Winchester, for the Benedictine abbey there (Mabillon, "Annal. Benedict." tom. vi. p. 630), and another at Ramsey is mentioned in the life of Oswald, archbishop of York (Mab. ib. p. 727). From the eleventh and twelfth centuries organs were usual in cathedral and monastic churches, and Bingham's assertion ("Antiq." vii. 7, § 14) that they were unknown there till after the time of St. Thomas Aquinas is quite erroneous. True it is, however, that protests were occasionally made against the use of organs. "Whence," says Aelred ("Speculum Caritatis," ii. 23), "whence, now that types and figures are over, so many organs and cymbals in the church? Wherefore that horrible sound of bellows, more like thunder than the sweetness of the voice?" More remarkable still is the opinion of St. Thomas (2^a $2^{æ}$, q. 91, a. 2). He is answering the objection that as "the Church does not use musical instruments for the praise of God, lest it should seem to Judaize, so by parity of reasoning" it should not permit singing. He replies, "Musical instruments," such as pipes, harps, &c., "minister to delight and do not promote virtue, and were only permitted to the Jews because of their carnal dispositions; whereas singing does help devotion." It is evident that he did not approve of instrumental music. In the Papal chapel it has never been employed. At Trent efforts were made to banish all music from Mass, but the majority of the bishops, especially the Spaniards, opposed this measure (Pallavicino, "Istoria del Concil. di Trento," xviii. 6), and the Council (sess. xxii. Decret. de Observ. in Celebr. Miss.) simply required that the music should be grave and devout. Similar injunctions were made by Benedict XIV. in 1749.

The use of the organ is rejected in orthodox synagogues. The Protestants were divided on the matter; the Lutherans and Anglicans retaining, the "Reformed" at first rejecting it. Thus, it was not till the close of the eighteenth century that organs were introduced at Berne, and they are still absent in most of the Scotch Presbyterian churches, though even there a change has begun.

(Bingham, the articles in the "Kirchenlex.," Smith and Cheetham, and Grove's "Dictionary of Music," have been consulted. See also Hill, "Organ Cases and Organs." But we have found by far the most full and accurate information in Ersch and Grüber, "Conversations-Lexicon," article Orgel.)

ORGANIC ARTICLES. [See CONCORDAT, p. 212.]

ORIGINAL SIN is the sin which we inherit by natural descent from Adam, our first father. The Council of Trent (sess. v. Decret. de Peccato Orig.) defines, as of faith, that Adam lost original justice not only for himself but also for us; that he "poured sin, which is the death of the soul, into the whole human race," and that this sin comes, not by imitation of Adam's transgression, but by propagation from him. Further, the council teaches that original sin does not consist in those desires and temptations which are common to our fallen nature because they remain even after baptism, which takes away original sin; and the council condemns the error of Lutherans and others who supposed that original sin destroyed free will and made man incapable of good actions. The Fathers of Trent, as Pallavicino informs us, carefully abstained from interfering in the scholastic disputes on this point. They appeal to St. Paul, particularly in Romans v. 12 seq., and do not go beyond the plain statements of Scripture. But it will be well to draw out the common teaching of theologians, putting aside for the present points on which they differ.

God made Adam the representative of all who were to descend from him by natural generation. "God, who had made him our beginning, had made all depend on him for himself and us. . . . In sinning he lost all, as well for himself as for us" (Bossuet, "Défense de la Tradition," p. ii. liv. ix. ch. 12). Had he persevered, we should have been born in original justice. As it is, we are conceived and born in sin and the children of wrath. Our nature and faculties remain entire and we are still capable of natural good, but we are left without grace, and therefore without the means of reaching that supernatural end to which God has ordered us. "The remission of this sin consists in being transplanted into Jesus Christ as the Just One, and the Author of all justice." Thus St. Thomas places the essence of original sin in "the privation of original justice," the privation, not the mere negation, because the gifts of grace are absolutely necessary for us in order that we may prepare for heaven. Concupiscence or the rebellion of the senses, though not original sin, or in itself a sin at all, is still a consequence of the fall.

Such is the common teaching of Catholic theologians, for the opinion of Gregory of Rimini and others,[1] that it consists in a morbid quality transmitted by Adam, is universally rejected; while, on the other hand, the views held by Catharinus and Pighius,[2] that it is merely the actual sin of Adam imputed to us, does not seem to satisfy the requirements of the Tridentine definition. And so understood, the Catholic doctrine, mysterious though it is, does not, like that of the Reformers, present insuperable difficulties to the moral sense.

For, whereas it would have been unjust had God deprived us of the gifts proper to our nature, without actual guilt on our part, Catholics hold that He did nothing of the sort. Grace is in no way a part of or due to human nature. It is God's free gift. He gives it and withdraws it according to His own will. We have no claims to possess it, no ground of complaint if it is taken away. Our natural faculties enable us to know and love God as our Creator and constant Benefactor, and to order our lives aright. We have no title to more.

It may be objected that God has ordered us to a supernatural end, that we cannot choose one which is simply natural, and that grace is our only means of escaping utter misery. This is true. But God condemns none to misery because of original sin. He deprives us of original justice to which we had no title, and then He gives all abundant opportunity of recovering grace and entering heaven by the merits of Jesus Christ, by becoming new men in Him. God ordered us, first of all, to an end infinitely above our nature, and gave us by His free gift original justice to attain it. Adam forfeited the original gift, and then God, still ordering us to a supernatural end, and having no will to impose impossible commands, gave us the grace of our Redeemer as the means of reaching it. The only exception occurs in the case of infants who die without baptism; and they, according to the belief now universally received, far from being miserable, attain natural happiness in the next world. [See LIMBO.]

The doctrine, then, of original sin is mysterious, but by no means cruel or unreasonable. We cannot fully understand the manner in which it is transmitted, for the soul comes directly from God, not from the parents. But here, too, the Catholic doctrine that original sin is a mere privation, not a positive quality, comes to our help. God cannot be the author of sin, nor can He stain the soul which comes from Him. But He can and does infuse souls deprived of original justice; and since the infusion follows by a natural law on the generation of the body, in that sense natural propagation may be rightly called the cause of original sin.

Theologians differ widely on the consequences of original sin. Undoubtedly concupiscence flows from the deprivation of original justice. Had Adam persevered our bodily appetites would have been in perfect subjection to reason, our reason itself to God. But according to the stricter Thomists, by the rebellion of the flesh consequent on original sin, man sinks below his natural state. Thomas de Lemos ("Panopl. Grat." tract. de Laesione Lib. Arbitr.) insists that, although after the Fall nature remains entire "as to its essence and faculties, it is not so with respect to the natural inclination to good." (So also Alvarez, "De Auxil. Grat." lib. vi. disp. 45.) Both these quotations are from Kuhn ("Dogmatik: Lehre der Gnade," i. p. 269). Other great theologians, and, as we think, more reasonably, look on man's ignorance, the rebellion of his appetites, &c., as connatural to his finite and composite nature. In Adam an extraordinary grace perfectly restrained appetites which reverted after the Fall to their natural condition. This opposite theory is well put by Bellarmine. When, he says, the supernatural gift was removed, "human nature, left to itself, began to experience that struggle between the lower and higher part which would have been natural—i.e. would have followed from the condition of matter—had not God conferred on man the gift of justice over and above." Human nature, he continues, "does not suffer more from ignorance and infirmity than it would do had it been created in a purely natural state." And he concludes, "The corruption of nature does not come from the want of any natural gift, or from the accession of any evil quality, but simply from the loss of a supernatural gift on account of Adam's sin." ("De Gratia Primi Hominis," apud Möhler, "Symbolism," p. 75.)

The Doctrine in Scripture.—The Old Testament never asserts that we sinned in Adam, or even inherited sinfulness from him. But Ps. li. (l.) 7, "Behold, in guilt I was brought forth, and in sin my mother conceived me," "contains the basis of the doctrine, inasmuch as it regards sinfulness as something inborn, and so not as resulting from the abuse of freedom" (Hupfeld, ad loc.). Job expresses the same idea, though less distinctly. "Who can bring pure from unclean? Not one" (xiv. 4). In Wisdom ii. 23, 24, death is said to have entered into the world "by the envy of the devil," and the Rabbins[1] developed the doctrine that all had sinned and incurred death because represented by Adam, and so implicated in his sin. Even this, however, is less than the doctrine of original sin.

In St. Paul we have the first explicit statement of the doctrine. "As through one man sin came into the world, and death by sin, and so death penetrated to all men, because[2] all sinned. [The construction breaks off here.] For until the law sin was in the world, but sin is not reckoned if there is no law; but sin reigned from Adam to Moses, even on those who did not sin after the likeness of the transgression of Adam, who is a type of the one to come. But not as the trespass, so also the gift of grace. For if by the trespass of one the many died, much more the grace and the gift in the grace of the one man Jesus Christ abounded to the many."

It may safely be maintained that Pelagius and many other writers ancient and modern, who understand St. Paul to speak only of actual sin by which men imitate Adam, distort the grammar and sense of the passage. For (α) St. Paul describes a momentary act of sin "because all sinned" (ἥμαρτον)—i.e. in Adam. Not "have sinned, or were sinning." (β) It is not true that death is universal because all have actually sinned. Millions have died before they were capable of sin. (γ) The parallel between the two Adams would be destroyed on the Pelagian interpretation. Not, in the first instance, by the imitation of Christ, but by the reconciliation (see Rom. v. 11) which Christ's death effected, we are saved; just so, not by following Adam's example, but by an act external to us on the part of the former Adam we were lost. (δ) St. Paul argues that there could be no trespass against law—i.e. law externally promulgated—between Adam and Moses, because no such law was given except to a few. Men in that interval did not sin like Adam by actual transgression of positive law. Yet they died because they sinned in Adam their head.

The Tradition of the Church.—The forcible

[1] The Rabbinical names for original sin are "the sin of the first man" (חטא אדם הראשון), "the pollution of the serpent" (זוהמא שׁל נחשׁ). The Targum on Ruth iv. 22 alleges that David's father, having no sin of his own, died on account of the counsel given to Eve by the serpent, for which all the generations of the earth were condemned to death. Levy, Chaldäisches Wörterbuch, sub voc. עיטא, quotes a similar statement from Baba Bathra, 17 a, respecting Benjamin, Amram, father of Moses, Jesse, father of David, and Kilab, David's son. These four were personally sinless, and died for the counsel of the serpent.

[2] ἐφ' ᾧ cannot mean in quo "in whom" (ἐν ᾧ), as the Vulgate renders it. But the Vulgate rendering does not alter the dogmatic sense. Estius defends the Vulgate rendering on insufficient grounds, but with great moderation. "Tolerari potest" is his verdict on our rendering. Bossuet (loc. cit. liv. vii. ch. 12 scq.) is far more severe.

teaching of St. Paul was, as everybody knows, fully appreciated by St. Augustine. It is useless to multiply citations, but we may give one passage ("Enchirid." cap. 26, PL, xl. 245) which fairly represents the form in which he constantly expresses the doctrine. "He [Adam], exiled after sin, bound his offspring also, which by sinning he had corrupted as it were in the root, under the penalty of death and condemnation, so that all progeny born of himself and his wife the occasion of his sin and partner of his condemnation by concupiscence of the flesh, in which concupiscence his disobedience met a punishment like itself, should draw to itself original sin, and thence be drawn through diverse errors and pains to that last and endless torture with the angels who deserted and corrupted [others], and with those who inherit and share in their portion."

Here we have the doctrine distinctly formulated that all men sinned in Adam, and that we are condemned because of him, and it is very hard to produce testimonies which touch this, the central point at issue, from Ante-Nicene Fathers. Irenaeus (ii. 22, 4, PG, vii. 784) speaks of "infants" as born again to God, and of Christ as "sanctifying infants." Clement of Alexandria ("Strom." iii. 9, p. 540) connects the fact of physical death with Adam's sin. Tertullian holds that Adam not only imparted death to his descendants, but also infected all who sprang from him with lust, and generally with a morbid inclination to sin ("Testimon. An." 3, PL, i. 613; "De Pud." 6; "De Jejun." 3; "Adv. Marc." i. 22, v. 17). Origen admits a natural inclination to sin (πάντες μὲν οἱ ἄνθρωποι πρὸς τὸ ἁμαρτάνειν πεφύκαμεν), "C. Cels." iii. 62–64, iv. 40 (where see a catena of passages from Ante-Nicene Fathers in Spencer's note); and, "In Levit." Hom. viii. 3, which only exists in the Latin version, he infers from the custom of baptizing infants their need of purification. "In Levit." xii. 4, he attributes the corruption of nature to the fact that men derive their bodies from their parents by natural generation. Cyprian, like Tertullian, traces sin and death to the Fall ("De Bono Patient." 17, ed. Hartel, p. 409; cf. "Testimon." iii. 54), but he goes in one passage far beyond Tertullian. Adults, he says, be their sins ever so great, are not to be deterred from baptism, much less infants, who "have committed no sin," but only "by carnal descent from Adam have contracted the infection of ancient death," and, in whose case, "not their own sins, but those of another, are remitted" ("remittuntur non propria sed aliena peccata," Ep. lxiv. ed. Hartel, p. 720).

The above account has been made from private notes, and the conclusion to which it leads is confirmed by the greatest historical authorities. Petavius ("De Incarnat." xiv. 2) says the Greek Fathers speak little, and then not clearly, about original sin, and that Augustine was the first among the Latins to treat the matter accurately. Cardinal Newman is of the same mind, and he quotes Petavius, Jansenius, Walch, "men of such different schools that we may surely take their agreement as a proof of the fact" ("Development," p. 22). Bossuet, indeed (loc. cit. liv. viii.), argues vigorously, but with small success, on the other side. It is enough for Catholics to show, as they certainly can, that their belief in the doctrine is due, not to St. Augustine, but to St. Paul. (The dogmatic theologians treat of the subject in connection with creation (De Deo Creante) or apart (De Peccato Originali); St. Thomas, $2^a\ 2^{ae}$, qq. 163, 164; Scheeben, "Dogmatik," ii. 575, sqq.)

ORTHODOX CHURCH. [See GREEK SCHISMATIC CHURCH.]

ORTHODOXY, FEAST OF. [See ICONOCLASTS.]

OSTENSORIUM. [See MONSTRANCE.]

OSTIARIUS, or Doorkeeper, holds the lowest of the minor orders in the Latin Church. His office was more important in ancient times. He had to prevent the heathen from entering and disturbing the service, to keep the laity separate from the clergy, men from women, and to see generally that decorum was maintained. He had to guard the church and all that it contained, to open the church and sacristy at certain hours, to open the book for the preacher, &c. (Chardon, v. 789.)

The office is mentioned by Pope Cornelius in the middle of the third century (Euseb. "H.E." vi. 43), and in the very ancient collection of canons commonly but wrongly attributed to the Fourth Council of Carthage, in 398. The rite of ordination is the same as that in the Roman Pontifical. The bishop gives the keys to the persons ordained, saying, "Go act, as having to render God an account of the things locked by these keys." In the present rite the ostiarius is led by the archdeacon to the church doors; he locks and opens them and rings the bells. Neither of these two ceremonies is mentioned in the Carthaginian canons or in the Gelasian Sacramentary. The former, however (the opening of the doors), is very ancient, being given in the Gregorian Sacramentary and in some very ancient MSS. Of the latter (ringing the bells) no trace is found in ancient Pontificals. In the time of Charlemagne and Amalarius (A.D. 820), it was the priest's business to ring the bells.

P

PALEA. Certain canons in the Decretum in Gratian [CANON LAW], about fifty in number, have the superscription "Palea." Some have considered this to be a part of the word "Paucopalea," the name of one of Gratian's disciples; others have thought that these canons (which in the MSS. of the Decretum usually appear in the margin), as treating of matters of slight importance, were hence called "palea," chaff. But as many of these canons refer to matters of the highest importance, this derivation appears inadmissible. Whatever be the origin of the name, it is certain that in the oldest MSS. of the Decretum the Paleae are few, that in those of later date they become numerous, and that in practice they are of equal authority with the canons known to have been compiled by Gratian himself.

PALLA. A small cloth of linen used to cover the chalice. The upper part may be covered with silk (S.C.R., January 10, 1852). Part of the corporal used to be employed for the covering of the chalice, but Innocent III. mentions the palla as distinct from the corporal. (Benedict XIV. "De Miss." I. v. 6.)

PALLIUM. A band of white wool worn on the shoulders. It has two strings of the same material, and four purple crosses worked on it. It is worn by the Pope and sent by him to patriarchs, primates, archbishops, and sometimes, though rarely, to bishops as a token that they possess the "fulness of the episcopal office." Two lambs are brought annually to the Church of St. Agnes at Rome by the Apostolic subdeacons while the "Agnus Dei" is being sung. These lambs are presented at the altar and received by two canons of the Lateran Church. From this wool the pallia are made by the nuns of Torre de' Specchi. The subdeacons lay the pallia on the tomb of St. Peter, where they remain all night. A bishop cannot, strictly speaking, assume the title of patriarch, archbishop, &c., cannot convoke a council, consecrate bishops, ordain clerics, consecrate chrism or churches, till he has received the pallium. He is bound, if he is elected to a see of metropolitan or higher rank, to beg the pallium from the Pope "instanter, instantius, instantissime," within three months after his consecration or from his confirmation, if he was already a bishop and has come to the metropolitan see by translation. Meanwhile, he can depute another bishop to consecrate if he has in due time applied for the pallium. He receives it from the hands of another bishop, delegated by the Pope after taking an oath of obedience to the latter, and wears it on certain great feasts, a list of which is given in the Pontifical. He cannot transmit it to his successor or wear it out of his own patriarchate, province, &c. If translated, he must beg for another pallium. The pallium or pallia, if he has received more than one, are buried with the bishop to whom they were given.

The early history of the pallium is involved in hopeless obscurity. We take the following facts from Chardon, 955 sqq. Pallium is the Latin name for the ἱμάτιον or loose upper garment of the Greeks.[1] Among the Romans, the use of the pallium was specially affected by philosophers, and afterwards by Christian ascetics (see Tertullian's treatise "De Pallio," PL, ii. 1029). Two great critics—viz. De Marca and Baluze—believed that the pallium was first given to bishops as a mark of special dignity by the emperors. It is true Pope Vigilius would not grant the pallium to Auxanius and Aurelian, archbishops of Arles, without the emperor's consent. Gregory the Great took the same precaution in granting it to Syagrius, bishop of Autun. But this deference to the imperial will arose from the difficult circumstances of the time, and De Marca admits that Gregory, before he had been calumniated to Maurice, gave the pallium to Vigilius of Arles without consulting the emperor.[2]

We may dismiss the doubtful statement of Anastasius (ninth century) that the Pope Marcus (d. 336) gave the pallium to the Bishop of Ostia, and the mention of the pallium in the spurious donation of Constantine. In all probability the pallium was at first an ornament of prelates (probably of metropolitans), and had no special connection with Rome. See the synod of Macon (anno 581), canon 6, which forbids archbishops to say Mass without the pallium, though it is certain that then the French metropolitans, as such, did not get their pallia from Rome.

The Pope then wore the pallium as a mark of his own authority, and an examination of the Liber Diurnus makes it probable that he sent it to suburbican bishops—i.e. bishops in the provinces near Rome, over whom the Pope exercised a specially immediate authority. The sending of it marked the special dependence of these bishops on the Pope. Next, the Popes granted the Roman pallium to vicars-apostolic—i.e. to their representatives in distant provinces. The first certain example of such a concession is the [1] It was tucked round the neck in running or other active exercise. Hence, perhaps, the origin of the present form.

[2] A decree of Valentinian III. (anno 432) grants the dignity of archbishop and honor pallii to the prelate holding the see of Ravenna. Baronius and Bona deny the authenticity of this decree.

grant of a pallium to St. Caesarius of Arles by Pope Symmachus in 513. Thus the Roman pallium came to be regarded as a special mark of honour, and was eagerly coveted by bishops. Gregory the Great granted it to Syagrius of Autun, to the two metropolitan bishops in England (Canterbury and York), &c. This Chardon calls "the third degree in the fortunes of the pallium." Next a rule was made, at a general synod of Franks under St. Boniface in 747, that metropolitans must ask the pallium from Rome. This law was not always regarded. It was enforced, however, in a capitulary of Charlemagne, and after that always or nearly always served in the Frankish Empire.

In 877,[1] the great synod of Ravenna under John VIII., representing all Italy, required (cap. i.) metropolitans to demand the Roman pallium personally or by deputy within three months of their consecration. (Hefele-Leclercq, iv. 660 sqq.) Otherwise, they could not consecrate other bishops, and were liable, after three monitions, to deposition. The Pope insisted on this rule being kept in France. The rule was soon afterwards established throughout the West, except in Ireland, where the pallium was unknown even in St. Malachi's time. Innocent III. forbade even the assumption of the name of archbishop till the pallium had been obtained, and the decree forms part of the "Corpus Juris."

In the East, the patriarchs gave a sort of pallium (ὠμοφόριον) to their metropolitans. After the time of the Crusades, the Fourth Lateran Council (canon 5) required even patriarchs to receive the pallium from the Pope.

To sum up, the pallium was an ornament of metropolitans, given to them perhaps from early times by the patriarchs and by the Pope in that comparatively narrow district which was under his most immediate supervision. Then the Pope gave it to his vicars in distant parts, then as a mark of special honour to some bishops, then he required all Western metropolitans to ask it from him before exercising their functions as archbishops, and finally the rule was extended even to patriarchs. (See Kraus, "Real-Encykl." ii. 574; Thurston, "The Pallium"; Braun, "Die Liturgische Gewandung," 620–676, and in "Cath. Enc.")

PALM SUNDAY. The Sunday before Easter, on which the Church celebrates Christ's entry into Jerusalem. The name, "Palm Sunday" ("Dominica in Palmis," or "ad Palmas," βαΐων ἑορτή), is ancient, for it occurs in the "Life of Euthymius" (died 472), and is spoken of as a great day by Isidore of Seville. It was also called "Pascha Floridum" ("Pascua Florida" in Spanish, "Blumensonntag" in German, and "Flower Sunday"). It was the custom to bless flowers and entwine them with the palms in sign of joy. One of the antiphons sung during the procession runs thus: "Occurrunt turbae cum floribus et palmis Redemptori obviam." The State of Florida (U.S.A.) derives its name from the fact that it was discovered on Palm Sunday, 1512. According to our present rite, palms or olive-branches are blessed by the celebrant before Mass, and distributed to the faithful; the clergy walk in procession through the church and pass outside. Then cantors enter the church, leaving the rest without; the hymn "Gloria, laus, et honor" is sung, both parties, those within and those without, taking part. At last the subdeacon knocks at the door with the shaft of the processional cross, and the whole body march up the church. The Greeks have a procession with palms at matins.

Martène denies that any trace of the procession can be found before the eighth century, in spite of Meratus's elaborate attempt (tom. ii. pars iv. tit. 7) to produce earlier testimonies. Meratus shows that the name Palm Sunday occurs in an ancient Roman Calendar published by Martène himself in his "Anecdota," and dating from the fourth or fifth century; that St. Aldhelm (709) mentions the singing of the "Ozanna"; and that in a prayer in the most ancient MS. of the Gregorian Sacramentary tenth century) there is an allusion to the practice the faithful had of coming to the church with palms. These instances clearly are not to the point. But in the "Peregrinatio Etheriae" (fourth century) the procession of Palm Sunday is described in great detail. In an "order" observed in a German monastery, and ascribed by Mabillon to the year 800 circ., the procession is mentioned, and so in Pseudo-Alcuin (tenth century).

In ancient times those who were to be baptized on Holy Saturday, called "competentes," heard the whole Creed explained on this Sunday. Hence its old name, "Pascha petitum s. competentium." (Thurston, "Lent and Holy Week," ch. v.; Rock, iv. 78–82, 264–270; Duchesne, "Christian Worship," ch. viii. sect. 4.)

PARABOLANI (Gr. παραβάλλεσθαι, "to expose oneself to danger." The word "parabolani," with its Latin suffix, was evidently formed from παράβολοι, "dare-devils," the men who for money fought with wild beasts in the amphitheatre). The "parabolani," a class of lay assistants to the clergy, principally engaged in looking after the sick and attending to funerals, are frequently mentioned by writers of the fourth, fifth, and sixth centuries. Gibbon describes them as a charitable corporation originally founded in the time of the Emperor Gallienus.[1] They were very numerous at Alexandria, and seem PARACLETE (παράκλητος). A word used four times in St. John's Gospel (xiv. 16, 26; xv. 26; xvi. 7) as a name of the Holy Ghost, once in his first Epistle (ii. 1) of Christ. It is found nowhere else in the N.T. and nowhere in the LXX. The Vulgate rendering in the Gospel is Paracletus, in the Epistle Advocatus; and Paraclete (usually Paraclitus) is a common title of the Holy Ghost in the Breviary. The Rhemish follows the Latin.

Aquila gives παράκλητοι as a rendering of "comforters" (מְנַחֲמִים), Job xvi. 2, where the LXX more rightly has παρακλήτορες. Origen, "De Princip." ii. 4, in the version of Rufinus, says the word when used of the Holy Ghost means comforter ("a consolatione dicitur, Paraclesis enim Latine consolatio dicitur"). This interpretation, though widely adopted by Greek and Latin Fathers, is surely erroneous. The word means "one called in," an advocate or pleader. This appears from the passive form, the constant classical use, the undoubted sense in 1 Jn. ii. 1 (though even there the Greek Fathers take it as "comforter"), and the use of the word in Rabbinical writers (see פרקלים in Buxtorf).[1] The Holy Ghost pleads the Christian cause against the world (Jn. xv. 8), and Christ's with the Christian (xiv. 26; xv. 26; xvi. 14). [See TRINITY, p. 827.]

PARADISE (פַּרְדֵּס). An old Persian word adopted at an early date by the Hebrews. It only occurs three times in the Old Testament, and always means simply "a park" (Cant. iv. 13; Neh. ii. 8; Eccl. ii. 5). In the LXX (Gen. ii. 8) and Peshito it is used for that particular garden or park in which Adam and Eve were placed; and in the later Jewish theology for that part of Hades which was inhabited by the souls of the just, and which we call "Limbo." In this sense it occurs in Lk. xxiii. 43. Lastly, in 2 Cor. xii. 4, Apoc. ii. 7, it means "heaven," or "a part of heaven." [See HEAVEN, and LIMBO.]

PARASCEVE (παρασκευή), "preparation"—i.e. for the Sabbath, and so equivalent to Friday (Jn. xix. 13). It is retained in the Rhemish version and in the Missal as a name for Good Friday.

PARISH [see CURE OF SOULS, PATRON, PATRONAGE, TITHES]. During the first three Christian centuries country and town parishes as now understood, each with its settled incumbent, can scarcely be said to have existed in the Church. "In the earliest times there were no churches, no presbyters, except in cities, and with the bishop" (Thomassin). The diocese was then called παροικία, paroecia; it was the παροικία both of the bishop and of the presbyters and deacons surrounding him. No other name than this for the episcopal district occurs in the Apostolic Canons or Constitutions. The ground notion was, either that Christians were πάροικοι, juxta habitantes (1 Pet. ii. 11), dwellers among the non-Christian masses, or that they were "sojourners," without any fixed abode in this life, passing onwards towards a better. The word paroecia was gradually supplanted by the barbarous form parochia, still meaning a diocese. Thus in the eighth century St. Boniface writes to Pope Zachary "Provinciam in tres parochias discrevimus" (We have divided the province into three dioceses); and Zachary often uses the word in the same sense.

Separate parishes or districts within the diocese, to which the bishop appointed resident presbyters, removable at his pleasure, began to be common in the fourth century. The change is attributed by Anastasius, in his "Lives of the Roman Pontiffs," to Dionysius, who was Pope from 261 to 272. "This Pope," says Anastasius, "assigned churches to the presbyters, and established cemeteries, parishes (parochias), and dioceses." In the northern countries of Europe, the difficulties of communication being greater than in the south, and the population more sparse, the plan of separate parishes, each with its own priest responsible for the souls of all persons living within the limits, necessarily prevailed over the earlier state of things. The zeal of laymen [PATRON, PATRONAGE] did much to spread a network of subordinate centres of religion and civilisation over each Christian country. A parish in the modern sense is "a defined district of territory, the boundaries of which are settled by the Pope or by the bishop of the diocese, having one fixed rector, with power to rule and judge the people living within it, and to administer to them the sacraments and other divine things" (Ferraris).

Parishes are properly conferrable on secular priests; if regulars hold them they are removable by the bishop, or by the superior of the order to which they belong. There is an exception to this rule in the case of the regular canons of Prémontré (see PREMONSTRATENSIANS, note).

Parishes in lay patronage are treated tenderly by the canon law; thus the Council of Trent (sess. xxiv. cap. 18) orders that the presentees of lay patrons, after due examination, be admitted by the bishop without concursus, if found "idonei." (Ducange, Parochia; Ferraris, Parochia; Soglia, Instit. Canon. ii. 8, §§ 81–87; Taunton.)

PARISH PRIEST. The word parochus, for parish priest, is of late introduction; it has nothing to do with the ancient parochi, or purveyors, mentioned by Horace:—

[1] He quotes, e.g., a gloss on the Pirke Avoth ii.: "A paraclete is a good mediator for a man to a king"; "If he has good paracletes he will be delivered"; "Penance and good works are a man's paracletes in the heavenly judgment," &c.

Proxima Campano ponti quae villula tectum
Praebuit; et parochi, quae debent, ligna salemque.—Serm. I. v. 46.

See also Cic. ad Att. xiii. 2, 2.

Early in the fifteenth century, Gerson, Chancellor of the University of Paris, taught that parish priests were of divine institution, and were the successors of the seventy-two disciples; he also held that they were members of the hierarchy and had a right to vote in councils. His opinions were adopted by the Sorbonne, and long afterwards by the Jansenists, such as St. Cyran, Richer, Bailly, and Van Espen. But it is now acknowledged that there were no country parishes until the fourth century, and that there were none in cathedral cities (except perhaps in Rome and Alexandria) until the beginning of the eleventh century [see PARISH]. The Council of Trent teaches that the hierarchy consists of bishops, priests, and ministers—making no mention of parish priests as such. As to the right of voting in councils, the bull Auctorem fidei, directed against the synod of Pistoja, condemns the doctrine whereby parish priests and other priests in synod assembled are declared to be, together with the bishops, judges of faith, and whereby it is insinuated that judgment belongs to them of their own right conferred by ordination, as false, rash, subversive of the hierarchy, &c., &c.

The true definition of a parish priest, according to Bouix ("De Parocho," p. 184), is "a person lawfully deputed and bound to minister in his own name the word of God and the sacraments to certain members of a diocese, who in their turn are to a certain extent bound to receive them from him." Hence from the very fact that a man is instituted as parish priest he has ordinary jurisdiction in foro interno, and, if he is a priest, can give absolution. Vacant parishes are to be filled by competitive examination (Conc. Trid. sess. xxiv. De Ref. c. 18). The method to be observed, as laid down by the council and modified by subsequent papal enactments, is as follows:—The bishop must give public notice of the examination. Candidates should have reached their twenty-fifth year, and should excel in virtue and learning. The examination should be conducted by three examiners in the presence of the bishop or vicar-general. The same questions should be put to each candidate, and the same text of Scripture given for the sermon to be written by each. The candidate who, in the opinion of the bishop, has passed the best examination should receive the parish. There are many exceptions to the rule of examination, e.g. when the parish has a lay patron. The new parish priest is bound to make a profession of faith within two months of obtaining possession of his parish. His duties are to reside among his flock and to feed them, that is, to offer the sacrifice of the Mass for them on all Sundays and days of obligation (festis de praecepto), to preach and to administer the sacraments to them. The chief rights of the parish priest are: (1) the reservation of the holy oils; (2) to confer the nuptial blessing, the blessing of women after childbirth, the blessing of houses on Holy Saturday; (3) to administer Communion at Easter; (4) to administer the last sacraments, i.e. Viaticum and Extreme Unction; (5) to perform the burial service for his parishioners. He has also the right to tithes and funeral dues. Under the new legislation, Ne temere, the parish priest of the place where a marriage is celebrated (or his delegate) must be present in order that the marriage may be valid. It should be noted that some parish priests are removable at the will of the bishop (ad nutum amovibiles); while others, who are styled "perpetui et inamovibiles," can be removed only for some grave cause. A recent decree of the Consistorial Congregation (Maxima Cura, Aug. 20, 1910) lays down at great length the causes for removal and the procedure to be followed.

For a long time before the Reformation parish priests in England were called persones or parsons, because they were personae ecclesiae, the representatives of the Church in the parish. The word was not in use before the Conquest; but persona, as equivalent to rector ecclesiae, occurs frequently in the treatise of Bracton, writing in the reign of Henry III. From the law courts it probably passed into the speech of the people, and Chaucer naturally speaks of the parish priest, introduced into the "Canterbury Tales," as "a poore persoun of a toun."

The "parish priest," or "parson," of England and Ireland, corresponds to the curé of France, the Pfarrer of Germany, the paroco of Italy, the pastoor of Holland, and the párroco of Spain and Portugal. (See Ferraris, Parochus; Taunton, Parochus; Bouix, "De Parocho"; Craisson, "Manuale Juris Canonici," nn. 1287–1514.)

PASCH. (Pascha, the Chaldaic for Passover, see EASTER, p. 192.) The word is retained in the N.T. in the original Greek (πάσχα), in the Vulgate (Pascha), and in the Rhemish (Pasche) (Mt. xxvi. 17; Mk. xiv. 12; Lk. xxii. 7; Jn. xiii. 1, &c.). In the New Covenant the word is used of the true "Passover," of which the ancient one was only the figure. Christ's death and resurrection were intimately bound together, so that the one name πάσχα was used for both. Afterwards a distinction was made between πάσχα σταυρώσιμον (Good Friday) and πάσχα ἀναστάσιμον (Easter Day). The days in Easter week and the Sundays after Easter are called "post Pascha" in the Roman Missal and Breviary.

PASSION (OF MARTYRS). The sufferings of one who laid down his life for the Christian faith were called his "passion," e.g. "Passio Cypriani." The entries in the Roman Martyrology of the anniversaries of the deaths of the martyrs speak of them as "passiones."

PASSION SUNDAY. The Sunday before Palm Sunday. With Passion Sunday the more solemn part of Lent begins; the images are veiled with violet at the first vespers; the Judica psalm and the Gloria Patri are omitted at the Introit, &c. The name Passion Sunday is ancient, but we have been able to find no ancient or even mediaeval author who mentions the veiling of the images. None is quoted by Gavantus or Meratus. It is said to refer to the last words of the Gospel for the day, "Jesus autem abscondit se et exivit a templo" (Jn. viii. 59).

PASSIONISTS. Their full title is, "Congregation of the Discalced Clerks of the most holy Cross and Passion of our Lord Jesus Christ." Their founder, St. Paul of the Cross, born near Genoa in 1694, put on the habit of the order in 1720, with the sanction of the Bishop of Alessandria, Monsignor Gattinara. In 1721, having compiled the constitutions which he wished his followers to observe, Paul went to Rome in order to obtain sanction for his proceedings. This sanction was withheld for many years, in the course of which Paul was ordained priest and employed on various works of charity in Rome. All obstacles being at length removed, he established the first monastery of his congregation at Monte Argentaro, near Orbitello, in 1737. The rules of the society were confirmed by Benedict XIV. in 1746. Clement XIV. showed the Fathers marked favour, and conferred on them the house and church of SS. Giovanni e Paolo on the Coelian Hill. Here the holy founder took up his abode, and here (1775) he died. In 1867 he was canonized by Pius IX. The congregation rapidly extended itself after his death, but for some time within the limits of Italy only. But Paul's most settled purpose, and the subject of his impassioned longing, had been to work and pray for the conversion of England. His desire was in part fulfilled when, in 1842, his followers obtained a footing in this country.

The whole order comprises twelve provinces and about 100 houses, with 1400 religious.

The life of the Passionists is very austere. They fast three days in every week, besides Advent and Lent; they wear nothing on their feet but sandals; they rise at night to say Matins, and, indeed, recite the office in choir at all the canonical hours. They divide their time between contemplation and action; being indefatigable in giving missions and retreats, especially to persons living in community. Besides the three usual vows, they make a fourth—that they will do their utmost to keep alive in the hearts of the faithful the memory of our Lord's Passion. On the day of their profession they make a vow of perseverance in the congregation. Nevertheless, they only take simple vows. (Hélyot, "Contin.")

The Congregation of the Passion has never had a regular cardinal protector, as is the case with other religious orders. The sovereign pontiffs have always retained it under their own immediate protection.

From the very beginning of his foundation St. Paul of the Cross had it in his mind to establish a congregation of religious women who should devote themselves to prayer and meditation on our Lord's Passion. It was not until towards the end of his life that he was able to carry out this design. The rules were approved by Clement XIV. in 1770. The nuns lead a most austere life and are enclosed.

A second order of Passionist nuns was founded in England by the Passionist Father Gaudentius in 1850. They are not enclosed, so that they may carry on external work such as homes for factory girls, parish schools, and also secondary education.

Although missions and spiritual retreats are the principal external works for the good of souls prescribed by the rule of the Passionist Fathers, still the necessities of the faithful and the scarcity of priests compelled them at first to undertake the spiritual charge of the Catholics living in the vicinity of their foundations, who otherwise would have had no one to minister to their spiritual wants. But as priests became more numerous most of these charges were gradually relinquished, and at present the Passionist Fathers retain only a few parishes. Calls for missions and retreats, on the other hand, have become very frequent, and during the greater part of the year several bands of missionaries are at work simultaneously in different localities. Their method in conducting missions is substantially the same as that followed by other missionaries, but the prominence given in their preaching to the mysteries of our Lord's Passion is found to be singularly effective in rousing the negligent and stimulating the devout to still greater fervour. (See Hélyot-Migne, supplement; Devine in "Cath. Enc.")

PASSOVER. [See EASTER.]

PASTOR. Jesus Christ, who, in the Preface for Festivals of the Apostles, is called "Pastor aeternus," communicates the characteristics of a good shepherd of souls to all those who faithfully discharge the office of governing in his Church. This communication is pre-eminently made to the Roman Pontiff, who, in the collect "pro Papa," is described as "pastor ecclesiae"; it also appertains in lesser degrees to bishops and priests, upon each one of whom it devolves to lead, feed, and gently rule, like a shepherd, the flock committed to him. [See PARISH, PARISH PRIEST.]

PASTORAL STAFF. [See CROSIER.]

PASTORAL THEOLOGY. The science of the care of souls. It is a branch of theology which grows out of and is based upon dogmatic, moral, and ascetical theology and canon law. Though the name is new, the thing is as old as Christianity itself. Our Lord practised it and taught it to His disciples (Mt. x. 6 sqq.; Mk. vi. 8 sqq.; Lk. ix. 3 sqq.; x. 4 sqq.; xxii. 35). St. Paul treats of it at length in his epistles to Timothy and Titus. So, too, the Fathers constantly deal with the subject. St. Cyprian's Epistles and his treatise "De Lapsis," St. Gregory Nazianzen's "Oratio Apol. de Fuga Sua" (al. "De Sacerdotio"), St. Ambrose's "De Officiis Ministrorum," and, above all, St. John Chrysostom's "De Sacerdotio," will occur to everyone. The "Regula Pastoralis" of St. Gregory the Great (so highly commended by Ven. Bede and translated into Anglo-Saxon by Alfred the Great) is still one of the very best books on the guidance of souls. His oft-quoted saying, "Ars est artium regimen animarum," can be traced to St. Gregory Nazianzen (PG, xxxv. 408). During the Middle Ages the "Regula Pastoralis" was the common text-book, though the subject of pastoral theology was also dealt with by the Schoolmen in connection with dogma and moral. It was, however, the outburst of pastoral zeal which accompanied the Counter-Reformation that gave rise to the special study of this branch of theology. The works published at this time are too numerous to mention; the "Instructio Pastorum" by St. Charles Borromeo and the writings of St. Francis of Sales may be taken as examples. During the succeeding centuries there has been a constant stream of pastoral literature, more particularly during recent years, the most notable being the "Homo Apostolicus" of St. Alphonsus.

The pastor, like the Chief Pastor, Christ Himself, has the threefold function of teaching, sanctifying, and ruling—he is prophet, priest, and king. Hence pastoral theology lays down the rules and methods for the due performance of these duties. It treats of the priest's studies, of catechizing and preaching, of the instruction of converts, &c.; of the celebration of the Holy Sacrifice and the administration of the sacraments and the preparation for them; of the organization of parishes, the regulation of the church and its services, the management of schools, social work, &c. The table of contents of one of the manuals will show how varied are the matters treated of.

Pastoral medicine is a branch of the subject which has lately attracted much attention. A competent knowledge of it is most useful for the spiritual care of the sick and the guidance of persons in different states of life. (Besides the books mentioned, see Frassinetti, "Parish Priest's Manual," Eng. tr.; Oakeley, "The Priest on the Mission"; Keatinge, "The Priest: His Character and Work"; O'Donnell, "The Priest of To-day"; Scannell, "The Priest's Studies"; Sandford-Drum, "Pastoral Medicine"; Drum in "Cath. Enc.")

PATEN. A plate used from the earliest times to receive the Host consecrated at Mass. Larger patens, called ministeriales, were used for the communion of the people. It is consecrated with chrism by the bishop, and this rite of consecration is mentioned in a Gallican Sacramentary as old as the eighth century, published by Mabillon in the "Museum Italicum." (Thurston in "Cath. Enc.")

PATER NOSTER. The prayer taught by our Lord to His disciples. It occurs in all the ancient liturgies, with one notable exception—that of the so-called Clementine liturgy—given in the Apostolic Constitutions. Its absence there has never been satisfactorily explained. In all the chief liturgies it occurs much in the same place—i.e. shortly before the Communion. In most of the Greek, in the Mozarabic and the Ambrosian liturgies, the Canon was followed by the Fraction of the Host; then came the Pater. St. Gregory settled finally the place of the Pater in the Roman Mass, placing it where it now stands, immediately after the Canon and before the Fraction. This seems to be the sense of Gregory's words when he says (Lib. 7, Indict. 2, Epist. 64, quoted by Le Brun) that the Sicilians taunted him with following the use of Constantinople and reciting the Pater "mox post canonem," "immediately after the Canon," and so they are understood by Le Brun, tom. iii. Diss. ii.; Benedict XIV. "De Miss." ii. 19; Probst, "Lit. der ersten drei Jahrhund." p. 356; Hammond, "Ancient Lit." lxxii. The other view—viz. that the Pater was introduced into the Roman liturgy by Gregory—is maintained by Scudamore in his article on the Lord's Prayer in Smith and Cheetham. The Pope also tells us that, whereas in the East (and also in the Gallican rite) the Pater was said by priest and people, at Rome it was recited by the priest alone. In nearly all the ancient liturgies the Pater is introduced by a preface like the exhortation in the Mass, "Praeceptis salutaribus," &c.[1]

The Pater occurs in all the Breviary hours at the beginning and end, and sometimes in the course of the hour itself. But

[1] The Ethiopic liturgy is an exception. But the introduction to the Pater is generally in the form of a prayer—not a statement, as in the Roman and Ambrosian Mass.

whereas in the Mass it is said aloud, in the Breviary it is said secretly, or at most only the first and concluding words are said audibly. The reason is that at the part of the Mass where the Pater occurs the faithful only were present, while catechumens, &c., were admitted to the hours. (So Benedict XIV. loc. cit.)

The addition to the Lord's Prayer, "For thine is the kingdom," is wanting in the best ancient authorities. It probably arose from the embolismus [see the article] of the liturgy used in the Syrian Church. The version given by St. Matthew (vi. 9–13) was adopted by the Church from the beginning for liturgical purposes (see "Didache," viii., where the doxology is added). "With regard to the English text now in use among Catholics, we may note that this is derived, not from the Rheims Testament, but from a version imposed upon England in the reign of Henry VIII. and employed in the 1549 and 1552 editions of the 'Book of Common Prayer.' From this our present Catholic text differs in only two slight particulars: 'which art' has been modernized into 'who art,' and 'in earth' into 'on earth.'" (Thurston in "Cath. Enc." and at greater length in the "Month," March 1914; Fortescue, "The Mass," p. 360. See Westcott and Hort, N.T. vol. ii., notes on Mt. vi. 13.)

PATERINES. A Manichaean sect which first came into notice under this name in Italy about 1040, when a number of them were convicted of heresy by Heribert, archbishop of Milan, and burnt at the stake. They taught that matter was essentially evil, condemned marriage, and set at naught Church authority. The Lombard married clergy, when (1057) they were attacked on the score of incontinence by Anselm of Badagio and Ariald, taunted their assailants with being Paterines. Möhler[1] identifies them with the Boni Homines who were condemned by the Council of Lombez in 1165. They appear again among the heretical sects that infested Languedoc at the end of the twelfth century, and are then identified with the Cathari or Puritans. Innocent III. spoke of "impii Manichaei, qui se Catharos vel Patarinos appellant." The origin of the name is unknown. [Albigenses; Boni Homines; Bulgarians.]

PATRIARCH, PATRIARCHATE. The dignity of Patriarch—the Primacy of St. Peter being considered as standing apart—is the highest grade in the hierarchy of jurisdiction. Immediately next to the rank of Patriarch may come that of "Primate"; metropolitans or archbishops follow; under each metropolitan are ranged his suffragan bishops. In the fifth century the Exarchate [Exarch] was an intermediate grade between the patriarchate and the rank of metropolitan.

[1] Kirchengeschichte, ii. ch. v. § 3.

The Sixth Canon of the first Nicene Council recognizes an ancient, customary, and legitimate authority in the bishops of the three sees of Alexandria, Rome, and Antioch (named in this order) over their respective provinces. The title of "Patriarch," however, is not given; the thing is recognized, but not the word. The title came into use in the fifth century, at least in its present sense, for it had earlier been used loosely for any great see. From the latter part of the fourth century, Constantinople gradually came to occupy the position of a fourth Patriarchate. That of Jerusalem, after a struggle for precedence between it and Caesarea, became the fifth. For the history of each of these Patriarchates, excluding Rome, see Alexandria, Church of; Antioch; Constantinople, Patriarchate of; Jerusalem, Patriarchate of. Since the misfortunes which overtook the Eastern Church (Monophysite heresy, Mussulman domination, Greek schism, &c.) severed all these four sees from Catholic unity, the Popes have continued to nominate bishops to the lost Patriarchates; but these bishops have resided at Rome, except lately in the case of Jerusalem, the Patriarch of which, Monsignor Valerga, commenced to reside at his see in 1847. Besides the Latin Patriarch of Antioch, the Holy See admits a Maronite, a Melchite, and a Syrian Patriarch of the same see, a Patriarch of Cilicia of the Armenian, a Coptic Patriarch of Alexandria, and a Patriarch of Babylon of the Chaldaic rite. (On the Pope as Patriarch of the West, see Pope, p. 667.)

There are also four minor Patriarchs in the Western Church—the Patriarch of the Indies, who is the prelate of highest rank in the Church of Spain; the Patriarch of Goa; the Patriarch of Lisbon; and the Patriarch of Venice. (See Le Quien, "Oriens Christianus"; Bingham, "Origines Ecclesiasticae," i.; Fortescue, "The Orthodox Eastern Church," ch. i.; "The Lesser Eastern Churches," and in "Cath. Enc.")

PATRON, PATRONAGE. The word patronus is used in three senses in canon law; it signifies (1) an advocate or barrister; (2) the former master of a manumitted slave, to whom under the Roman law a certain control over his freedman was reserved; (3) a person having the right to present to a benefice. The third sense only is here in question.

The subject of patronage is of little practical interest to English Catholics, for, from the great spoliation of the sixteenth century down to the present day, an English benefice in Catholic hands has been a phenomenon rarely met with. However, it seems desirable to give a brief sketch of the principal provisions of the law on this subject.

Patronage (jus patronatus) is defined to be "the right or power of nominating or presenting a clerk for preferment to a vacant ecclesiastical benefice." It may be usefully considered from three points of view, according as (1) its acquisition, (2) its transfer, and (3) its prominent incidents are taken into account.

1. The right of patronage is acquired in one of three principal ways—by foundation, or building, or endowment—according to the memorial line:

Patronum faciunt dos, aedificatio, fundus.

If one person founds a church by giving the ground, a second builds it, and a third endows it, the right of patronage belongs to the three jointly. The consent of the bishop is, of course, always necessary. An endowment, in order to convey a right of patronage, must be sufficient—i.e. it must be ample enough to provide a decent maintenance for those serving the church, and to meet the annual expense of lights and other church requisites. Otherwise it is not an endowment, but a benefaction, and as such carries no right of patronage. Patronage acquired by Papal privilege, conceded at any date anterior to the Council of Trent, was abolished by a decree of that council;[1] hence anyone now claiming it on that ground must show that such privilege was conceded since the council, with a clause expressly derogating from its decree. Patronage can also be acquired by prescription if multiplied unopposed presentations can be proved.

2. The transfer of patronage ordinarily takes place in one of four ways—by succession, donation, sale, or exchange. By succession—as when, on the death of a patron, the right passes to his heirs, whether at law or under settlement or devise. When the patronage passes by donation, the consent of the bishop is usually, but not in all cases, necessary. With regard to the third mode—sale—it is instructive to compare the provisions of the canon law with the law and practice of the Anglican communion as regards the sale of advowsons.[2] In England an advowson can be sold separately, and for the best price. The sole condition is that the benefice be not actually vacant at the time of sale; otherwise no distinction is made between advowsons and any other kind of property. The canon law does not permit an advowson (jus patronatus) to be sold separately at all. It can only be sold indirectly—i.e. through being inseparably annexed to some other property which is susceptible of legal sale. Thus, if a man sells his whole estate, and to this estate an advowson be annexed, the latter passes to the purchaser along with the other property. Or even if the sale be not of a man's whole estate, but only of a particular piece of property—a palace, a farm, a field, &c.—to which a right of patronage is inseparably annexed, that right is transferred to the purchaser by the sale. But in all such cases canon law exacts the condition that the price given be not enhanced on account of the annexed patronage. Any simoniacal attempt to sell the patronage as such is visited by the law with severe penalties.

3. The chief incidents of patronage are four—presentation, honour, defence, maintenance in case of poverty. (1) The first-named is so strictly inherent in a patron that if he present a qualified clerk for a benefice the bishop is bound to accept him, even though he may know of one more worthy. But the presentation must be made within four months if the patron be a layman, within six if he be a clergyman; otherwise it passes for that time to the bishop. The law is more tender of lay than of ecclesiastical patronage, because interference with the former would tend to discourage rich laymen from building churches and extending Christianity. Women are capable of presenting to benefices equally with men. No patron can present himself to any benefice in his gift, although he may ask the bishop to confer it upon him, and the bishop may, at his discretion, legally do so. (2) By "honour" are understood the precedence and respect which a patron may justly claim in a church founded by him or his ancestor. (3) "Defence" refers to the right and duty of the patron to watch over the beneficiary property, and prevent its waste or dilapidation. (4) "Maintenance in poverty" is the claim which the patron has, should misfortune overtake him and reduce him to want, to receive a decent maintenance (and this applies to his wife and children also) out of the revenues of the benefice in his gift. (Ferraris, Jus patronatus; Taunton.)

PATRON AND TITULAR OF CHURCH, PLACE, &c. The title of a church is the name it bears—e.g. of the Trinity, St. Augustine, St. Mary, St. Saviour, &c. The patron saint is that saint under whose special protection it has been placed. Thus the titular is a wider term comprehending the persons of the Trinity, mysteries (e.g. Corpus Christi), and saints; the patron of a church can only be a saint or angel. Of churches with the title of St. Mary, the patronal feast is the Assumption. Only a canonized (not a beatified) saint can be chosen as patron. (S.C.R. 23 Martii, 1630.)

The patron of a church is chosen by the founders ("ex fundatorum beneplacito," Merat. § iii. 12, 1). Usually only one patron is chosen, or else two patrons whose feast falls on the same day. The feast of the principal titular or patron is a double of the first class with an octave. This holds good even of churches not yet consecrated. The rule, however, does not apply to chapels of seminaries, &c., &c. The rules for churches which have more than one patron with independent feast are the same as those given below for local patrons.

The patron of a place is chosen by the people with the consent of the clergy. (Decret. Urban. VIII., 23 Mart. 1630.) A place may have several patrons, principal and less principal, but not more than one principal patron except by immemorial custom or Apostolic indult. The feast of the principal patron is a double of the first class with an octave (so also if there are several chief patrons); of a "less principal," a greater double when celebrated solemnly, otherwise a lesser double.

The feast of the chief or titular patron of the cathedral church is kept throughout the diocese even by regulars, who, however, are not obliged to celebrate the octave. (S.C.R. 27 Maii, 1628.)

The constitution of Urban VIII. (Const. clxi. "Universa," § 2) requires that only two patronal feasts be imposed in any one place as holiday, of obligation—one the feast of a chief patron of the kingdom or province, the other that of a chief patron of the city, town, village, &c. The Apostolic constitution Divino Afflatu and the subsequent decree of the Congregation of Rites (Jan. 23, 1912) made various changes in the way of keeping the feast of patrons. (Burton and Myers, "The New Psalter and its Use," 79.)

PAUL OF SAMOSATA. [See ALOGI.]

PAUL, ST., CLERKS REGULAR OF. [See BARNABITES.]

PAULICIANS. In the fancy of Gibbon ("Decline and Fall," ch. liv.), this Manichean or quasi-Manichean sect, after its banishment from Asia, "scattered over the West the seeds of reformation." By "reformation" can only be meant revolt; a common fury of negation and destruction may easily have induced the Protestants of the sixteenth century to accept the Paulicians as the ancient exponents of their own principles; but negation is no permanent bond; and when the positive doctrines of the sect are calmly examined they appear to be such as no moderate Protestant would endorse. The Paulicians rejected or minimized the Sacraments, abhorred images, and condemned the invocation of the saints; while reverencing some books of Holy Scripture, they repudiated Church tradition and the doctrine of a visible Church; in their eyes relics were rubbish, miracles impostures, and the Blessed Virgin not the mother of God. So far all is plain sailing; and a zealous Presbyterian might recognize in the Paulicians the theological ancestors of his own "Nullifiers." But the Paulicians also believed in two Powers, one good, the other evil, dividing the universe between them; and they held the earth and all things sensible to have been created by the spirit of evil. The good God, they said, created the soul of man; the wicked power, or Demiurgus, created his body. Instead of sin in the body being an offence against the "temple of the Holy Ghost," on this view it was the natural outcome of the bodily constitution; therefore, of course inculpable. They rejected the Old Testament as the work of the Demiurgus. Jesus Christ, they said, did not take his body from Mary, but brought it down with Him from heaven. They admitted neither of St. Peter's Epistles; most of them rejected also the Acts. Such was the sect which, according to Gibbon, "scattered over the West the seeds of reformation"!

The origin of the name "Paulician" is uncertain; one theory derives it from a certain Paul, who, with his brother John, founded a society near Samosata early in the seventh century; another — which Gibbon prefers—sees in it merely an evidence of the high value which they set on the life and writings of St. Paul. They first come prominently into notice in the seventh century, when they were organized by Constantine, a native of a village near Samosata, who took the name of Silvanus. Other eminent leaders among them were Simeon, Sergius, Chrysocheir, and Baanes. They became very numerous in Armenia, and, being persecuted by the imperial officers, rose in revolt; nor was their subjugation entirely effected till the tenth century. For their later history see the article BULGARIANS. (See "Kirchenlex."; Photius, "Contra Manichaeos"; Petrus Siculus, Hist. Manich. in "Bibl. Patrum," vol. xv.)

PAULINE PRIVILEGE. [See DIVORCE, p. 276.]

PAULISTS. The Institute of the Missionary Priests of St. Paul the Apostle was founded in New York by Isaac Thomas Hecker and several associates who had formerly been members of the Redemptorist order. A sketch of the rule was drawn up in 1858, and was approved by Archbishop Hughes. Twenty years later it was much enlarged, but it is still in the stage of experiment before being presented to the Holy See for papal approval. "Its spiritual features," says Fr. Elliot, "are substantially the same routine of devout exercises observed by the original fathers while Redemptorists. Although the Paulists do not make vows of religion, they undertake to observe the evangelical counsels as fervently as if canonically bound to do so. This is expressed in the formula of profession as a "whole-hearted determination to obey the rules, to aspire after Christian and religious perfection, to devote oneself energetically to the labours of the Apostolic ministry, and to persevere in the same vocation to the end of life." The conversion of non-Catholics is the chief object of the Paulists' Society, but all branches of the Apostolate are embraced. Many thousands of converts have been made and many lukewarm or lapsed Catholics have been brought back to the practice of their religion. Besides preaching, the Paulists devote themselves to the apostolate of the press by means of the "Catholic World Magazine" and printed books, chiefly sermons. Their "Five Minutes Sermons" have had great success both when actually delivered and when afterwards printed. "No innovation on Catholic methods, least of all on the Catholic spirit, has ever been observed in their public utterances or ministrations, though the personal tone and character of the Paulists has imparted to their discourses and writings a peculiar zest." (Elliott in "Cath. Enc."; see also his "Life of Father Hecker.")

PAX. The KISS OF PEACE in the Mass has been described under that heading. The Pax here intended is the tablet or instrument which was given to the people to kiss at Mass. It was introduced into England about the middle of the thirteenth century, and widely used. It is called "osculatorium" (Syn. Constit. of York, 1250 and 1252); "osculatorium pacis" (Statutes of Canterbury, about 1281); "asser ad pacem" (Council of Oxford, in 1287); "tabula pacis" (Council of Merton, about 1300); "marmor deosculandum" (Synod of Bayeux, about the same date). It was adopted in France, Italy, Spain, and Germany. But the use was almost extinct in Le Brun's time, on account of the absurd contentions for precedency to which it gave rise; though it was presented in some cases to communicants, &c. We have been referring to the use at Mass. It is still used in communities, confraternities, &c., at times of ordinary prayer. (From Le Brun, tom. ii. part v. art. 7. See also KISS, p. 505; Ducange, Osculatorium, Pax; Maskell, "Ancient Lit." p. 50; Rock, iv. 187.)

PAX VOBIS is said by bishops after the "Gloria in Excelsis." If the "Gloria" be not said, then the bishop's salutation is the same as the priest's—viz. "Dominus vobiscum." The fact that "Pax vobis" was our Lord's Easter greeting to the Apostles made it unsuitable for penitential days. (Benedict XIV. "De Miss.")

PECTORAL CROSS. A small cross of precious metal worn on the breast by bishops and abbots as a mark of their office, and sometimes also by canons, &c., who have obtained the privilege from Rome. (Decr. S.C.R. 17 Sept. 1828.) The Pope does not wear the pectoral cross. Innocent III. is the first author who clearly mentions the pectoral cross as one of the episcopal insignia. (Gavant. p. i. tit. 2. See BISHOP.)

PECULIUM CLERICI. The property of which an ecclesiastic can be in possession is divided into peculium beneficiale, or ecclesiasticum, and peculium patrimoniale, or quasi-patrimoniale. The former consists (1) of the annual profits of his benefice or benefices; (2) of the dues which he receives in the discharge of his clerical functions. The latter consists (a) of property which has come to him by inheritance, donation, or bequest; (b) of that which he has acquired for himself—e.g. by writing. Over property of the former class he has only a limited power of testamentary disposition; that of the latter class he can freely dispose of.

PELAGIANISM was an extreme reaction from the Gnostic and Manichean doctrine that men were necessarily determined to good or evil. According to Pelagius (1) Adam's sin injured himself only, so that his posterity are born innocent. Infants were baptized that they might be united to Christ and enter the kingdom of heaven; not that they might be purged from original sin (Concil. Carthag. anno 411, can. 2, 3). It was possible to live altogether without sin ("hominem posse esse sine peccato," Pelag. apud August. "De Gratia Christi," cap. iv.). (3) Grace, as Catholics understand the term, was not necessary or even possible. Pelagius made grace consist simply in the gift of nature, and especially of free-will. When pressed by his adversaries, he admitted the need of exterior grace—viz. "law and teaching," "the example of Christ," &c. Nay, some think he allowed that God, by interior grace, enlightened the understanding (August. op. cit. 7, 10, 40; Petav. "De Pelag. et Semi-Pelag. Haer." cap. iv.).[1] But the essence of his heresy remained, for he never granted that the will must be moved and aided by God's grace before we can take one step towards life eternal; and even if Pelagius admitted the possibility of interior illumination of the understanding, he certainly did not hold such a grace to be necessary.

Pelagius, who was a monk or ascete, and is said to have been born in Britain (Bretagne?), preached at Rome (400–410) with great applause. Here he was joined by Celestius, also a monk. Pelagius attacked the doctrine of original sin in his fourteen books on St. Paul's Epistles. They still exist, but with serious alterations in a Catholic sense, and are edited by Vallarsi in his edition of St. Jerome. His letter to Demetrius (anno 411), and his "Libellus fidei ad Innocentium" (anno 417) are also given there. St. Augustine ("De Gratia Christi, Peccat. Orig. Nat. et Grat.") has preserved fragments of four books by Pela-

[1] We cannot see that the references given by Petavius prove this.

gius on "Free-will." The strife on original sin began at Rome in 410. Celestius was condemned by a synod of Carthage, whither he had gone in 411. Pelagius next appears in Palestine, whither Orosius pursued him at the request of Augustine, who had already written three anti-Pelagian works—viz. "De Spiritu et Littera," "De Peccatorum Meritis et Remissione," "De Perfectione Justi Hominis." Jerome also attacked Pelagius in an "Epistle to Ctesiphon" and a dialogue against the heresy in three books. A synod at Jerusalem in 415 tried Pelagius, but came to no decision; another at Diospolis (Lydda), late in the same year, acquitted him. St. Augustine attacked Pelagius again in his work "De Gestis Pelagii." Theodore of Mopsuestia defended him in a lost work (πρὸς τοὺς λέγοντας φύσει καὶ μὴ γνώμῃ πταίειν τοὺς ἀνθρώπους); the Africans, again, condemned the heresy in the Councils of Carthage and Mileve (416). Both parties had recourse to Pope Innocent, who declared the doctrine of Pelagius erroneous, but died before the case could be fully judged. Zosimus (417–18) was deceived by a profession of faith which Celestius made, and declared both Celestius and Pelagius innocent. More condemnations of Pelagianism followed in the Carthaginian Councils of 417 and 418, and in the latter year Zosimus reinvestigated the matter, anathematized Pelagius and Celestius, and notified this step in an "epistola tractoria" to the bishops. Eighteen Italian bishops who refused to subscribe this epistle were deposed, among them the learned Julianus of Eclanum, against whom St. Augustine wrote ("Contra Duas Epist. ad Bonifac." anno 420; "Contra Julian." lib. vi. anno 421; later still, the "Opus Imperfect. contra secundam Julian. Respons."). Pelagius and Celestius now found an asylum with Nestorius of Constantinople, and along with him they were condemned in the Third General Council—that of Ephesus—in 431. This result was due in great measure to the energy of Augustine and the efforts of Marius Mercator, a Western layman living at Constantinople. (See the dogmatic theologians on the supernatural order, grace, and original sin. The patristic works mentioned in the article are the sources.)

PENAL LAWS. [See IRISH CHURCH, p. 465; ENGLISH CHURCH, p. 299.]

PENANCE, SACRAMENT OF. The Latin word poenitentia (from punire, in an archaic form poenire) means sorrow or regret, and answers to the Greek μετάνοια, change of mind or heart. As a theological term, penance is first the name of a virtue which inclines sinners to detest their sins because they are an offence against God. Then penance came to mean the outward acts by which sorrow for sin is shown, and the word was supposed by St. Augustine to come from "poena," and by others—e.g. Peter Lombard—from "poenam tenere." The Greek word [1] μετάνοια has wandered further still from its original sense, for in the Greek liturgies it means simply a prostration. Thus in the office for ordination of deacons the rubric runs, "The priest departs with the deacon and they make three bows (ποιοῦσι μετανοίας τρεῖς) to the icon of the Lord Christ." (See Morinus, "De Poen." lib. i. cap. 1.) In a more restricted sense still, penance is used for the penitential discipline of the Church, or even for the third station of public penitents (so, e.g., I. Concil. Tolet. canon 2), and again for the satisfaction which the priest imposes on the penitent before absolving him from his sins. Lastly, penance is a sacrament of the new law instituted by Christ for the remission of sin committed after baptism.

So understood, penance is defined as a "sacrament instituted by Christ in the form of a judgment for the remission of sin done after baptism, this remission being effected by the absolution of the priest, joined to true supernatural sorrow, true purpose of amendment, and sincere confession on the part of the sinner." The Council of Trent (sess. xiv.) defines that priests have real power to remit and retain sins, that persons are bound by the law of God to confess before the priest each and every mortal sin committed after baptism, so far as the memory can recall it, and also such circumstances as change the nature of these sins, and that the sacrament of Penance is absolutely necessary for the forgiveness of post-baptismal sin. It is true that perfect sorrow for sin which has offended so good a God at once and without the addition of any external rite blots out the stain and restores the peace and love of God in the soul. "There is no condemnation to those who are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the spirit." But this perfect sorrow involves in a well-instructed Catholic the intention of fulfilling Christ's precept and receiving the sacrament of Penance when opportunity occurs. This implicit desire of confession and absolution may exist in many Protestants who reject the Catholic doctrine on this point. They desire the sacrament of Penance in this sufficient sense, that they earnestly wish to fulfil Christ's law, so far as they can learn what it is. In this sense the sacrament is necessary for the salvation of those who have fallen into mortal sin after baptism. They must receive it actually or by desire, this desire being either explicit or implicit. This point is of capital importance for the apprehension of Catholic doctrine. We in no way deny that God is ready to forgive the sins of non-Catholics who are in good faith and who turn to Him with loving sorrow. But the High Church doctrine that confession of mortal sin is not an absolute duty imposed by the law of Christ, or that absolution is a benefit which the penitent is not absolutely bound to seek, is in the sharpest antagonism to the Catholic faith as defined at Trent. The Council also teaches that satisfaction must be made for the temporal punishment which may be due even to pardoned sin, and that confession, contrition, absolution, and satisfaction are the four parts of penance. The minister, and the only possible minister, of the sacrament is a priest with ordinary or delegated power to absolve. The form consists in the words "I absolve thee from thy sins," &c. Mortal or venial sins (for it is of faith that venial sins may be confessed, though there is no obligation of doing so)[1] supply the place of matter. The Council speaks of sins as the "quasi materia," for though Thomists and many other theologians hold that sorrowful confession of sins is the proximate matter of the sacrament, Scotists maintain that absolution is both matter and form, and the Council abstained from interfering in this scholastic dispute. In the articles of CONFESSION, ABSOLUTION, &c., many details relating to this sacrament have been given, so that we may content ourselves here with an elucidation of the main principles.

[1] The Rabbinical term is תְּשׁוּבָה, "turning," "conversion"; and the Syrian Christians have the same word in the Syriac or Chaldee form—viz. ܬܘܒܐ. This word is the translation of μετάνοια in the Peshito, and is still retained, e.g., by the Maronites (see Morinus, i. 7).

1. Priests have received power from Christ to forgive sins in His name and according to His law—i.e. in the case of true repentance. God alone can remit sins, but He has been pleased to make the priest's absolution the means by which His grace is conveyed. He said to His Apostles, "Receive the Holy Ghost; whosesoever sins ye remit, they are remitted [i.e. become remitted] unto them, and whosesoever sins ye retain, they have been retained" [i.e. continue to be retained before God] (Jn. xx. 23). This wonderful power must have been intended for the successors of the Apostles, as well as for the Apostles themselves, for it is incredible that this means of pardon was conferred only for a short period of the Church's life. While sin lasted, the stream of grace and mercy must continue to flow. History proves the correctness of this inference, for in all ages the power of absolution has been used and recognized. Thus Cyprian urges the sinner to repent "while confession may be made, while satisfaction and remission through the bishops (sacerdotes) are accepted before God." ("De Laps." 29, ed. Hartel, p. 258; the remission included, no doubt, absolution from censures.) In this, says St. Chrysostom ("De Sacerdot." iii. 5, 6), the priests of the Gospel excel those of the Jewish Church, that, whereas Jewish priests could merely declare a man clean of leprosy, the Christian priests "have received power," not with regard to the leprosy of the body, but "the impurity of the soul," a power which consists not in declaring that the uncleanness is removed but in actually "removing it entirely" (ἀπαλλάττειν παντελῶς ἔλαβον ἐξουσίαν). He proves this sacerdotal power by an express appeal to the words in St. John, "Whose sins ye remit," &c. So again the author of an ancient homily, printed among the works of St. Athanasius (PG, iv. 183; the Benedictines place it among the dubia, but say it is found "in ancient MSS."), says "If thy bonds are not loosed, entrust thyself to the disciples of Jesus. Those are to be found who can loose us, having received this power from the Saviour" (ἐξουσίαν ταύτην εἰληφότες παρὰ τοῦ Σωτῆρος), "whose sins ye remit," &c. Morinus (lib. viii. cap. 1) quotes from Leo, Ep. 91, "Ad Theodor.": "Very useful and necessary is it that the guilt of sin should be loosed before the last day by the judgment of the priest." Augustine, Ep. 189, "Ad Honorat." (apud Morin. ibidem), urges the clergy not to flee in persecution, because their presence will be urgently required for "the administration (confectionem) of the sacraments." "If the ministers are wanting, what ruin will come on those who depart this life unregenerate [i.e. unbaptized] or bound [i.e. unabsolved]!" The value of these testimonies lies partly in the fact that they do not argue for the priestly power of absolution, but assume it, partly in their connection with the strong utterances of Scripture on the one hand, the penitential discipline of the Church on the other. It must have required a strong belief in the power of absolution to make men undergo long years of rigorous penance in order to obtain it. It may be well here to answer two objections. Morinus (lib. viii. 8, 10, 11) has shown, and indeed demonstrated, that down to the twelfth century absolution was always given among the Latins in a precatory form. And it is evident from Goar and Renaudot (in the "Perpétuité de la Foi") that the Greeks, the Jacobites, and Nestorians still preserve this precatory form. This, however, cannot fairly be alleged against our belief that the priest exercises judgment in the sacrament of penance, and does really bind or loose. No one will deny that the bishop, in absolving an excommunicate person and restoring him to Church communion, exercised judicial power and authoritatively remitted ecclesiastical censures. Yet here, too, as well as in sacramental absolution, the form was precatory even as late as the time of Burchard, bishop of Worms, who lived at the close of the tenth century (Chardon, p. 644). Further, it may be said that absolution was sometimes given by a deacon, and Cyprian (Ep. xviii.,

[1] Morinus (lib. ii. cap. 3) believes he has proved that the confession of venial sins was common in the Church during the lifetime of Tertullian.

ed. Hartel, p.524), writing in the summer of 250 does certainly require the lapsed in danger of death to make confession (exomologesis) and receive imposition of hands from a deacon, if a presbyter cannot be found. But it is clear that he is speaking of absolution from censures, and indulgence granted through the intercession of the martyrs, and the distinctions already made in the article on ABSOLUTION are sufficient to meet this difficulty.[1]

2. Absolution is invalid unless given by a priest with ordinary or delegated jurisdiction over the penitent. This follows from the fact, attested by Scripture, that the priest in penance exercises judgment. A magistrate cannot bind or loose a man charged with theft unless the law subjects that man to his authority, or unless he has received special power from the Crown to try the case. The tribunals of the Church are not less carefully regulated than those of the State, since God is a God of order and not of confusion. The fundamental power to absolve is given at ordination, but its exercise depends absolutely on ecclesiastical authority. In earliest times absolution was given by the bishop alone, or by the bishop in union with the presbyters. After the rise of the Novatian heresy, the office of penitentiary priest was instituted. Later, parishes were established first in the large towns and then in the country, and from that time the accepted principle approved by the Fourth Lateran Council was that parishioners were bound to confess to their own priest or to another priest with his permission. Chardon (p. 425) reports a case from the twelfth century in which St. Ailert, monk of the abbey of Crespin in Hainaut, received power from Paschal II. and Innocent II. to hear the confessions of all who came to him. In 1227, Gregory IX. gave the Dominicans authority to hear confessions everywhere, and the same privileges, which led to bitter opposition, lasting for centuries, on the part of the seculars, were extended to the other mendicant friars and confirmed by many Popes. They were limited by the Council of Trent, as has been shown in the articles on ABSOLUTION and CONFESSION. (See Chardon, 423 sqq.) In all these disputes, the principle that absolution could only be given by a priest with jurisdiction was fully acknowledged, for the mendicants had of course jurisdiction, though it was extraordinary—i.e. not attached to their office, but directly conferred by the Pope. The Orientals also regard absolution as a judicial act, and do not dream that it can be given by any priest. Confession, according to an Oriental document, probably Coptic (cited by Denzinger, "Rit. Orient." tom. i. p. 100), cannot be made save to a priest, whether secular or religious, &c., who must have received this authority from the Patriarch or from his own bishop, with the consent of the clergy and chiefs of the people.

3. The necessity of confessing all mortal sins after baptism also follows from the very nature of the absolving power. Christ gave His Apostles authority to bind and loose, but they cannot exercise this discretion till the sins, as they are in the conscience of the penitent, have been submitted to their judgment. It is only in the case of mortal sins that this necessity arises—though, as a rule, it is expedient to confess venial sins likewise—for venial sin does not bind the soul over to evil and destroy the grace of God within it, or exclude absolutely from the kingdom of heaven, so that here there can be no strict necessity for absolution. It is needless to prove that certain mortal sins of a very aggravated character had to be confessed in the primitive Church, for this no instructed person will deny, and the writer of the article on Penitence in the "Dictionary of Christian Antiquities," edited by Smith and Cheetham, admits that this confession of the three "mortalia peccata" was obligatory, even if the sin had been secret. Possibly St. James may be alluding to the public confession when he says, "Confess your sins one to another"; for, as Döllinger ("First Age of the Church," p. 325) points out, this confession is mentioned in immediate connection with Extreme Unction. "'Confess to one another' refers to the priests called in to anoint the sick man and to pray for him, and to whom he is to confess his sins." Whatever may be thought of this interpretation, we have early evidence that confession much more extensive than that of the three great mortal sins (viz. murder, idolatry, and adultery) was known to the early Church. Origen (Hom. in Ps. xxxvii. n. 6, PG, xii. 1386) thus exhorts the sinner: "Look round diligently for one to whom you should confess your sins." He is to find a physician "learned and merciful" who will judge if his sickness is of such a nature that "it ought to be exposed in the meeting of the whole Church"; and again (Hom. in Luc. xvii., PG, xiii. 1846), "if we reveal our sins not only to God but also to those who can heal our sins and wounds, our sins will be blotted out by Him who says, 'Behold, I will blot out like a cloud,'" &c. Basil's words are express. "It is necessary to confess our sins to those who are entrusted with the dispensation of the mysteries of God" (ἀναγκαῖον τοῖς πεπιστευμένοις τὴν οἰκονομίαν τῶν μυστηρίων τοῦ Θεοῦ τὰ ἁμαρτήματα ἐξομολογεῖσθαι. "Reg. Brev. Tract. Respons. in Interr." 288, PG, xxxi. 1284). Further, what followed on the cessation of public penance is well worth consideration. This, in the case of secret sins, came to an end in the Church of Constantinople soon after the abolition of the presbyter ἐπὶ τῆς μετανοίας, or penitentiary, at the close of the fourth century. It came to an end because it was of human institution. But sacramental confession, being of divine origin, lasted when the penitential discipline had been changed, and continues to this day among the Greeks and Oriental sects.[1] So again, Leo, in a letter to the Bishops of Campania (Ep. clxviii., ed. Ballerini), desired the abrogation of public penance because of its deterrent effect, and because it was not of Apostolic institution; but he adds, "since it is enough that the guilt of consciences should be manifested to the priests alone by secret confession." An opinion, however, did prevail to some extent in the Middle Ages, even among Catholics, that confession to God alone sufficed. The Council of Châlons in 813 (canon 33, Hefele-Leclercq, iii. 1144) says: "Some assert that we should confess our sins to God alone, but some think (percensent) that they should be confessed to the priests, each of which practices is followed not without great fruit in Holy Church . . . . Confession made to God purges sins, but that made to the priest teaches how they are to be purged." This former opinion is also mentioned without reprobation by Peter Lombard ("Sentent." lib. iv. dist. 17). St. Thomas, in his commentary on the Sentences, says that what had once been a mere opinion was in his time, on account of the decision of the Church under Innocent III., to be accounted heresy, and ("Suppl." qu. 6 a. 3) he maintains that the necessity of confessing mortal sins after baptism exists by divine, and not merely by church, law.

[1] It is plain, however, from many decrees of synods, that deacons did hear confessions in cases of necessity, though, of course, they had no power to absolve. This practice lasted till late in the Middle Ages. Many also confessed to laymen at the hour of death, if a cleric was not to be found, and great scholastic doctors recommended this act of humiliation (Chardon, 417).

4. We say nothing here of the sorrow for sin and purpose of amendment requisite in the sacrament, referring the reader for an explanation of this point to the article on CONTRITION, and we pass to satisfaction, which is the fourth and last part of penance. It is defined by Billuart ("Poen." diss. ix. 1) as a payment of the temporal punishment due to sin through works which are good and penal and are imposed by the confessor."

"Catholics," says Bossuet ("Expos. de la Foi Cath." viii.), "teach unanimously that only Jesus Christ, who is both God and man, was capable, through the infinite dignity of His person, of offering to God sufficient satisfaction for our sins. But, having satisfied superabundantly, He was able to apply this satisfaction in two ways, either by granting entire remission without letting any penalty remain, or, on the other hand, by commuting a greater into a lesser penalty—i.e. eternal into temporal punishment. As that former fashion is more complete and in better harmony with His goodness, He employs it in baptism; but we believe that He employs the second way in the case of those who fall back into sin after baptism, being, as it were, constrained to do so by the ingratitude of those who have abused His first gifts so that they have to suffer some punishment, although the eternal one is remitted. From this we must not infer that Jesus Christ has failed to make entire satisfaction for us; but, on the contrary, that, having acquired an absolute right over us by the infinite price He has offered for our salvation, He grants us pardon on the conditions, under the laws, and with the reserves which seem good to Him." He proceeds to argue that Protestants who allege that Christ could not have satisfied fully for actual sin, if He left us subject to temporal punishment, might as well say that Christ has not satisfied for original sin because He has left us subject to death and to other infirmities of the soul and body which are consequences of the Fall. "Similarly, we should not marvel that He who showed Himself so merciful to us in baptism should display greater severity when once we have broken our holy promises. It is just, nay, it is for our own good, that He, when He remits [the guilt of] sin along with the eternal punishment, should exact some temporal punishment from us in order to bind us to duty."

Scripture proves that God inflicts temporal punishment for pardoned sin, for Nathan said to David after he had acknowledged his double crime, "The Lord also has caused thy sin to pass away; thou shalt not die. Only because thou hast so made the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme through this matter, even the son that is born to thee shall surely die" (2 Kings or Sam. xii. 14). Dan. iv. 24 (so Heb., LXX, and Vulg.; "Authorized," iv. 27) is the classical passage for the doctrine that man has the power of making satisfaction for sin by good works. "Therefore, O king, let my counsel please thee, and redeem thy sins by justice, and thy perversities by showing kindness to the poor." Here, as in all other articles on dogma, we have given a literal translation from the original, and our version of this text is justified, while that of the "Authorized Version" ("break off") is excluded, both by the laws of the language and by the judgment of the best Protestant and Jewish scholars. We append our reasons in a note.[1] The penitential discipline

[1] Exception, however, must be made of the Copts and Ethiopians, with whom confession seems to have died out in the Middle Ages (Chardon, 403).

[1] The words occur in the Chaldee portion of Daniel. and the main question is, Does the Chaldee word פְּרַק mean "redeem" or "break off"? It can only mean "redeem." (1) The word is found once only in that small portion of the Bible which is written in Chaldee, but it is of very frequent occurrence in the Chaldee literature. It is used by Onkelos (Exod. xxi. 8) of "redeeming" a slave: a "field" (Lev. xxv. 25); in the other Targums for the redemption of the soul—"who hast redeemed my soul from every affliction" (2 Sam. iv. 9). Levy, in his Chaldee Dictionary, gives numerous instances of the use of the verb in Peal from the Targums. In all, except one, it must mean "to buy back," "redeem," &c.; it of the early Church witnesses to the belief that satisfaction by penitential works is necessary in itself, and is required as a part of the sacrament of Penance. Nor did the early Christians consider satisfaction merely as means of deepening repentance, repairing scandal, and awakening salutary sorrow. Cyprian ("De Laps." 35, 36, ed. Hartel, pp. 571, 572) exhorts the lapsed "to be forward in good works by which sins are purged, to give frequent alms by which souls are freed from death," "to induce the Lord to pardon sin by perseverance in good works." Calvin himself acknowledges that all Christian antiquity admitted the necessity of penitential satisfaction. "I am little moved," he writes, "by passages which everywhere occur in the writings of the ancients concerning satisfaction. I see that some of them, I will say frankly nearly all whose works are extant, went wrong in this matter, or spoke too severely and harshly." ("Instit." iii. cap. 4, § 38, quoted by Billuart.)

It is to be noted, however, that satisfaction is in theological language an integral but not an essential part of the sacrament. In other words, the priest, both as judge and physician of the soul, is bound to impose a penance; and the penitent, if it is reasonable, is bound to accept it. Even if the penance is unreasonable, he must seek another penance and absolution from another priest. But whereas true supernatural sorrow with purpose of amendment, absolution, and, according to the common opinion, some outward confession of sin by word or sign, are always and in all circumstances necessary for the validity of the sacrament, still, in the case, e.g., of a man in his agony, the priest may give absolution without imposing a penance. (Billuart, Diss. ix. a. 2.) In the ancient Church part at least of the penance was usually performed before absolution; at present the priest in most cases imposes the penance, and, if he judges that the penitent is well disposed, gives absolution. The difference is one of discipline and not of principle, for, with the exception given above, absolution is not given even now unless there is the resolution on the part of the sinner to perform the penance imposed upon him.

Many Protestant objections to the sacrament of penance, as administered among us, arise from misunderstanding. Confession to the priest tends to deepen and not to replace shame and sorrow for the offence done to God. It protects the sinner against self-delusion—for no man is a good judge in his own cause—and the priest is able to insist upon the duty of restoring ill-gotten goods, reconciliation with enemies, forgiveness of injuries, avoiding occasions of sin, retracting calumny, &c., in many cases when the sinner might be blinded by his own passions or interests. At the same time the priest affords the best protection against despair or indiscreet zeal. There is little in the laborious work of the confessional to satisfy curiosity, for the priest learns nothing except the number and species of sins committed, and he is bound under the most sacred obligations to abstain from all unnecessary questions, particularly from all such as might convey knowledge of sins previously unknown to the penitent. He has to decide according to the principles of an elaborate casuistry which he has studied for years, and in which he has been examined by his superiors, before he enters the confessional. There is little room for tyranny on his part, for the faithful know well that they may have recourse to any approved confessor. Here, as elsewhere, holy things may be profaned. But the Church deprives a priest of the power to absolve an accomplice, rigorously punishing any attempt to do so; and were a priest so miserable as to abuse the confessional for bad ends, then the person to whom he had spoken wrongly could not be absolved even by another priest till he or she had communicated the name of the criminous clerk to the bishop of the diocese. Such cases are necessarily of very rare occurrence; for sin of this kind would involve almost inevitable ruin to the priest. Of all pastoral ministrations we firmly believe there is none which involves a more self-denying devotion to a monotonous duty, none where the good effects are so plain and visible, and very few which are more seldom marred by human weakness and sin.

PENITENTIAL DISCIPLINE AND BOOKS. The right of punishing members for offences never once bears the sense given it in the Protestant version. (2) Syriac, which is scarcely a distinct language from Chaldee, has the same word, ܦܪܩ. It occurs pretty often in the Peshito version of the N.T., and "redemit" is the first rendering given by Schaaf in his Syriac Lexicon. Thus it is used to render ἐρρύσατο (Coloss. i. 13), "and redeemed us from the power of darkness." Sometimes it means "to go away"; never "to break off." (3) The Vulgate rendering, "redime" is supported by the LXX λύτρωσαι. (4) It is adopted, sometimes even without a notice of the rendering given in the "Authorized" and Lutheran versions, by De Wette in his revision of Luther's Bible; by Ewald (Propheten, vol. iii. p. 366)—"löse deine Sünden durch Gerechtigkeit ein"; Hitzig (Comm. on Daniel, p. 67), who justly remarks that the rendering "break off" is contrary to the exegetical tradition, and has "no analogy to support it"; and by Gesenius. To these Protestant authorities we may add another, Bertheau, and the Rabbins, Eben Ezra and Saadia (cited by Hitzig), and a modern Jewish scholar, Fürst, in his Hebrew and Chaldee Concordance and in his Dictionary. Were the passage in Daniel Hebrew, the rendering "break off" could be supported by a comparison of Gen. xxvii. 40; but it is Chaldee, and common sense requires us to interpret a Chaldee word by Chaldee, not Hebrew, usage.

against its laws, and depriving them altogether or for a time of its privileges, belongs to any well-constituted society. It was exercised by the Synagogue (Lk. xvi. 2; Jn. vi. 2); Christ sanctioned the use of it in His Church (Mt. xviii. 15–17); and in 1 Cor. v. 1–5 we see St. Paul enforcing the penitential law of the Church against a notorious offender. Of course, this penitential discipline in the Christian Church, though analogous to the procedure of human societies, claims a higher origin and is of a much more serious nature. The power of inflicting spiritual penalties has been put into the hands of the Church by Christ Himself; it is exercised in His name; it may involve deprivation of the sacraments, which are the great appointed means of grace; and, on the other hand, it is the object of penitential discipline, not only to preserve the holiness of the Church, but also to awaken wholesome fear and sorrow in the heart of the offender while there is yet time, "that his soul may be saved in the day of the Lord." Obviously, the Church must use this power in the way most likely at the time to benefit souls, and her penitential canons have varied much at different periods and in different places. Still, on the whole, it is possible to distinguish three distinct periods in the history of penance—the first extending from the beginning of the Church to the rise of the Novatian heresy in the middle of the third century (Morinus, lib. iv.), the second reaching to about the year 700 after Christ (ib. lib. vi.), the third to the eleventh century (ib. lib. vii.). Of these periods, the first represents penitential discipline in its initial stage; the second, in its full development and vigour; the third, in its decay. Most of what we have to say is taken from the great work of Morinus, "De Disciplina in Administratione Sacramenti Poenitentiae," in the Venetian edition of 1702.

First Period.—The sins for which public penance was inflicted were the three "mortal crimes" [1] (crimina mortalia, Cyprian, "De Bono Patient." c. 14, ed. Hartel, 407) of idolatry, murder, and adultery, committed after baptism. Tertullian adds "fraud" to the list of "graver and fatal crimes which cannot be forgiven" ("Pudic." 19; PL, ii. 1020); but, generally speaking, it was only the various forms of the three great sins which reduced a man to the rank of a penitent. Tertullian ("De Poenit." c. 9, PL, ii. 1243) has left us a vivid picture of penance as he was accustomed to see it practised. He describes penance, which was generally known, even among the Latins, as "exomologesis," because it involved open confession of sins, as a "discipline by which a man was prostrated and humiliated." He speaks of the penitents as lying on sackcloth and ashes, of the unwashed body, the feeding on bread and water, the fasting and prayer, the grovelling at the feet of the presbyters and others who had a name for sanctity, the groans and tears. As yet there was no formal division of penitents into grades, and penance, though severe, did not always last long. The Apostolic Constitutions (ii. 16), in a passage which may be fairly taken as a picture of the penitential discipline in the first period, orders a great sinner to be excluded altogether from the Church; then the deacons are to admonish him and introduce him to the congregation; then penance is to be inflicted (στιβώσας αὐτὸν) "in proportion to his sin, for two, three, five, or seven weeks," at the end of which period the bishop is to receive him into communion, with imposition of hands (ib. 18: χειροθετήσας αὐτὸν ἔα λοιπὸν εἶναι ἐν τῷ ποιμνίῳ), accompanied by the prayers of the faithful. Here we see the germs of the later and more formal system, though the penalty contemplated is slight. Cyprian (Ep. lvii., ed. Hartel, 650) announces his intention of admitting to communion those who had fallen into idolatry in a former persecution and had done penance since. His reason for this indulgence was that fresh persecution was at hand.

But while penance was comparatively light, admission to it was often hard to obtain. For in this early period penance was looked on rather as a grace shown to sinners than as a penalty which they had to bear. It was in the difficulty of being admitted to penance, not in the penance itself, that the severity of the early Church appears. For a brief period, even the Roman Church refused absolution utterly and altogether in the case of the three "mortal crimes." This absolution was granted till the middle of the second century ("Pastor Herm." Mandat. iv. 1, PG, ii. 919), but it must have been withdrawn probably shortly after the "Shepherd" of Hermas was written. (This is evident from the first chapter of Tertullian, "De Pudic." Compare also the words of Hermas, loc. cit., "Servis Dei poenitentia una est," with Visio ii. 2, where it is said that soon the opportunity of performing penance will expire.) Zephyrinus (202–219) relaxed this severity in the case of adulterers (see the "De Pudic."), and his successor, Callixtus (219–222), admitted all sinners to communion after penance ("Philosophum." ix. 12), and this milder discipline became established. (See the "Epistle of the Roman Clergy," Cyprian, Ep. 30, ed. Hartel, 549.) In Africa, too, the discipline had become milder, for Cyprian (Ep. lv. No. 21, ib. 638) mentions the opinion of bishops in his province that "peace was not to be granted to adulterers" as a thing of the past. The Spanish Church continued to be more severe, for even after our period the Synod of Elvira, in 306, excluded great sinners from all hope of communion (see, e.g., canons 1, 6, 8). Moreover, in no part of the Church was communion given to those who had fallen a second time after baptism into mortal crime. It was Pope Siricius (Ep. 1, "Ad Himer." c. 5), towards the close of the fourth century, who insisted on a more indulgent course. So, again, it was the ordinary practice to refuse communion to the dying if they had been previously excommunicated and had not done penance in health. We must remember, however, that sacramental absolution from guilt, canonical absolution from penitential discipline, censures, &c., and giving communion, are three distinct things, and the refusal of the first does not follow from that of the second or third. Hefele ("Concil." i. p. 155) and Funk ("Bussdisciplin," &c., 1867) believe that though canonical absolution and communion often were, sacramental absolution never was, refused to any sinner. But Hefele's editor, Leclercq, refuses to accept this view, i. 222.

Second Period.—After the rise of the Novatian heresy, the penitential system was fully organized. The Nicene Council, can. 13, established the principle that communion was to be given in the hour of death to penitents, however great their previous crime. We have seen that Pope Siricius extended this lenity even to relapsed penitents. St. Chrysostom, it is said (Socrates, "H.E." vi. 21), received penitents again and again, however frequent their relapses, and the Third Council of Toledo, in 589, speaks in canon 11 of a lax practice which permitted men to sin as often as they pleased, and present themselves anew to the priest for reconciliation. (Hefele-Leclercq, iii. 226.)

On the other hand, the list of "mortal offences" was enlarged. We find traces of such increase in the list of sins which were subjected to penance, in the canons ascribed to Gregory of Nyssa and Basil. "Many Fathers," says Morinus (lib. v. cap. v.), "who wrote after Augustine's time, extended this [the necessity of public penance] to all crimes which the civil law punished with death, exile, or other grave corporal penalty"; and he proves this by many quotations—e.g. from Popes Pelagius II. and Gregory I. Further, in the East certain grades of penance came to be recognized. The three higher grades are mentioned or alluded to in the canonical epistle of Gregory Thaumaturgus (can. 1, 8, 9; on the last, in which the grade of συστάντες or consistentes is alluded to but not mentioned by name, see the extract from the commentary of Zonaras in Routh, "Rell. Sacr." tom. iii. p. 279). The eleventh canon, which enumerates all four grades, is certainly spurious, and is much later than Gregory's time. (See Routh, loc. cit. p. 281.) Still, from the fourth century onwards, the Eastern Church divided penitents into four classes. They are thus described in the eleventh canon of Gregory in words which are quite accurate, and were probably added as a gloss to the authentic canons:—"Weeping" (the προσκλαίοντες, or flentes, were the lowest class) "takes place outside the door of the church, where the sinner must stand and beg the prayers of the faithful as they go in. Hearing" (the ἀκροώμενοι, or audientes, were the second class) "is performed within the gate in the porch, where the sinner must stand while the catechumens are present, and then go out. For hearing the Scripture," he says, "and the instruction, let him be expelled, and not be admitted to the prayer. Prostration" (the state of the ὑποπίπτοντες, substrati, the third class) "requires the sinner to stand within the church door, and to go out with the catechumens." (Before going, they prostrated themselves to receive the imposition of the bishop's hands with prayer, hence their name.) The consistentes (the last class—συστάντες, consistentes) "stand together with the faithful and do not go out with the catechumens. Last comes participation in the sacraments (ἁγιασμάτων)." The two lower grades were little known in the West, and the Latin Fathers generally mean by "penitents" the substrati, or ὑποπίπτοντες. A severe course of life—fasts, shaving of the head, wearing a peculiar dress, abstinence from the enjoyment and even sometimes from the business of life, were the hardships which penitents (under which term we do not include the consistentes) had to undergo. The penance lasted long years—e.g. the Canons of Basil, which represent the discipline of the whole East, impose fifteen years of penance for adultery, seven for fornication. Many canons of Councils speak of clerics as subjected to penance (e.g. Neocaes. can. 1; Illib. 76; I. Orange 4; I. Arles 29); but sometimes the degradation of a cleric was considered equivalent to the penance of a layman, and it was felt to be unfair that he should incur a double penalty for one crime. (So, e.g., Can. Apost. 25; and the letter of Pope Siricius to Himerius, "Poenitentiam agere cuiquam non conceditur clericorum." Mansi, "Concil." tom. iii. col. 660.) With regard to the sick and dying, the rule varied at different times and in different churches. Cyprian (Ep. lv. 23, ed. Hartel, 641) lays down the principle that great and notorious offenders, who had done no penance before their sickness, "were to be excluded entirely (omnino prohibendos) from the hope of communion and peace." The Synod of Arles (anno 314), which represented the whole of the Western Church, also debarred death-bed penitents from communion (can. 22); but the Council of Nicaea (can. 13) relaxed this stringent rule. Still less was communion refused to secret sinners who sought penance on their death-beds, or to such as were actually doing penance when sickness overtook them. After the organization of the grades or stations of penance, a penitent who had received communion in dangerous sickness was usually sent back to do penance in case of recovery. Sometimes he returned to the grade in which he had been before; sometimes he was placed among the consistentes.

Third Period, from the Seventh till the Eleventh Century.—Before this time the laws of public penance had been altered very seriously in the East. The office of penitentiary had been abolished at the close of the fourth century at Constantinople (Socrates, "H.E." vii. 16; Sozomen, "H.E." v. 19), and this led to the cessation of public confession and public penance for secret sins. The stations of penance are mentioned at the end of the seventh century in canon 87 of the Council in Trullo. But the Greek liturgies, except perhaps that of St. James and one used by the Abyssinians, contain no reference to the dismissal of penitents from the assembly of the faithful. About the beginning of the seventh century, as Morinus (lib. vii. 1) proves by citations from Bede, Egbert, Rabanus Maurus, &c., it was received as an axiom throughout the West that public penance was to be done only for public sins.

It must not be supposed, however, that the rigour of public penance had abated among the Latins. True, even public penitents no longer received the daily imposition of the bishop's hands, and they were no longer shut out from the very sight of the sacred mysteries. But all through this period a vast number of persons were to be seen in the churches "distinguished from [the rest of] the faithful by their dress, place [in the church], mourning, and whole manner of life" (Morinus, vii. 2). Some of them witnessed Mass at a distance from a spot inside the church; others took their place in a separate part of the church; a third class mixed with the rest of the congregation, but were forbidden to communicate (ib. 7). The bishop prescribed this penance, and the civil law compelled the offender to undergo it. Very often a man was forced to appear as a public penitent, though for one reason or other he had not been condemned or even tried by the civil court. It was enough if the ecclesiastical authorities had juridical proof of his guilt. In the early part of this period, the beginning of Lent, the "caput jejunii," as it was called, was looked on as the most fitting, though not the only time, for the solemn imposition of public penance (ib. vii. 19). Nor was private penance less severe. It differed from public penance only inasmuch as it could be imposed by a priest, whereas public penance was inflicted by the bishop or a priest specially empowered by him, and inasmuch as the solemn rites of public were omitted in private penance. The same long fasts and other austerities, the same long abstinence from communion were the penalties of secret sin. Every priest who heard confession was bound to use a "penitential book"—i.e. a book which contained the penalties attached to particular sins by the canons, Popes, Fathers, or custom, along with the forms to be observed in confession, absolution, and the rest. The Roman Penitential, and those of Theodore, archbishop of Canterbury, and Bede, were those which had the highest repute in the West, but there were many others. These books were the guides of confessors down to the thirteenth century. A glance at the "Summary of Penitentials" given in Zaccaria's essay prefixed to the "Moral Theology" of St. Alphonsus will easily convince the reader of the severity which then prevailed. From the latter part of the tenth century flogging was added to the other penitential exercises, and at an earlier part of our period exile (mentioned in the Penitentials of Bede and in that known as the Roman) and perpetual retirement to a monastery were imposed as penances.

Fourth Period, Twelfth and Thirteenth Centuries (Morinus, lib. x. cap. 16 seq.).—During this period the rigour of penance was greatly relaxed; public penance, except in certain cases, especially in that of heresy, almost disappeared, and on the whole we may note a transition to modern practice. The following were the chief causes of the change:—

(a) The Redemption of Sins.—Long before this time the practice had arisen of procuring exemption from canonical penance by giving alms, &c. This custom, indeed, is mentioned and condemned by an English council held in 747, and it was generally recognized in the ninth century. But such redemptions were at first partial, and only allowed when part of the penance had been done. This accorded with the spirit of the primitive Church, which remitted part of the penance to sinners who showed extraordinary sorrow and zeal. But from the end of the tenth or opening of the eleventh century penances due to sins were arithmetically computed—i.e. if seven years of penance were assigned for committing a sin once, twenty-one years were reckoned as the penalty due for committing it three times, and large alms, flagellation, recitations of the Psalter, were accepted as redemption of penance. Thus St. Peter Damian tells the story of a man who by cruel flagellation and frequent recitations of the Psalter accomplished a hundred years of penance in six days. The arithmetical computation of penance had made its performance in the old way impossible.

(β) Remissions of penance were freely granted for works of piety—e.g. contributions to aid in the building of churches, or even works of public utility, such as building bridges or the like. As a rule, those indulgences were partial, but a complete remission of penance was often obtained by performing several good works. Maurice, who succeeded Peter Lombard in the see of Paris, built his great cathedral and four abbeys by means of indulgences. It is right to add that the Fourth Lateran Council protested against the reckless freedom with which these indulgences were given.

(γ) The Crusades did more than anything else to relax penitential rigour, and this, in the opinion of Fleury, was the most important effect they produced. As early as 1087 Pope Victor II. offered a general remission of penance to those who took up arms against the Saracens of Africa, after these had spoiled the abbey of Monte Cassino. In 1095 Urban II. offered the same reward to those who joined in the crusade. Secret as well as public sinners availed themselves of the opportunity; and when for two hundred years penance had been remitted to vast multitudes who took part directly or indirectly in these wars, it became out of the question to think of restoring the ancient rigour. It is curious to observe that bearing arms was just one of the things which penitents in ancient times were strictly forbidden to do. But it was supposed that the prohibition only applied to war between Christians.

(δ) The Schoolmen developed the opinion that absolution might be granted before the performance of penance; that the canonical penalties were arbitrary, or in any case might be remitted by the confessor, and not merely, as in former days, by the bishop.

(ε) The mendicant friars, who were constantly passing from place to place, became the favourite confessors, and it was impossible for them to defer absolution and stay to watch the progress of the penitent.

The Pontifical still contains an office for the expulsion of penitents from the church by the bishop on Ash Wednesday. The penitents are to approach in penitential garb, bare feet, &c.; ashes are to be placed on their heads, and the doors of the church shut against them till Holy Thursday. Such public ignominy is to be inflicted only for enormous crimes, and by the authority of the bishop, penitentiary, or other official to whom the power has been delegated. The Council of Trent, however (sess. xxiv. cap. 8), desires that public (but not solemn) penance be inflicted on public sinners, unless the bishop judge it to be inexpedient. St. Charles enforced this rule in his synods. But solemn or even public penance is now scarcely known. Still, in an English book published at Douay as late as 1743 with ecclesiastical approbation ("The Good Confessor," &c., by Samuel Marley, D.D., p. 522 seq.), the imposition of public penance for public sin is strictly enjoined upon the confessor. It is suggested, e.g., that the penitent kneel at the church door during the chief Mass, with a light in his hands, and beg pardon of the congregation. Drunkenness is given as an example of a sin which should be expiated in this way. It is evident from the whole chapter that penances of this kind were still frequently imposed. [Morinus is the great authority on the subject. Chardon, 449 sqq., gives a clear and useful summary of the facts. A much shorter but very interesting summary will be found in Fleury, Discours iv. and vi.]

Since the above article was written the early history of Penitential Discipline has been the subject of much discussion. According to the Protestant view the Church in the third century first became conscious of her power to forgive sins committed after baptism. (So Harnack, "Dogmengeschichte," i., especially pp. 439–444.) The Catholics, on the other hand, have denied any such discovery on the part of the Church: the Church always knew her power, but for wise reasons abstained from exercising it until such time as circumstances required it. (Funk, "Bussdisciplin" i. p. 158 sqq., and "Das Indulgenzedikt des Papstes Kallistus.") Further, there is even among Catholics considerable disagreement as to whether the edict of Callixtus introduced a complete innovation in the practice of the Church, or was merely an ordinary incident which owed its notoriety to the attacks of the heretics. Batiffol ("Études d'Histoire, &c." p. 111 sqq.) and Funk are of the former opinion; Stufler and Esser of the latter. D'Alès, who has published an elaborate monograph on the question ("L'Édit de Calliste"), also inclines to the latter. The Protestant Lea ("Hist. of Auricular Confession and Indulgences in the Latin Church") maintains that the early Church made no claim to jurisdiction in foro conscientiae. He was triumphantly refuted by Vacandard, "Revue du Clergé Français," 1898–9 (see also "La Pénitence Publique dans l'Église Primitive"; "La Confession Sacramentelle dans la Primitive Église.")

PENITENTIAL PSALMS. A name given to seven psalms which express sorrow for sin and desire of pardon. The psalms are 6, 31, 37, 50, 101, 129, 142 (in the Vulgate numeration). Innocent III. ordered their recitation in Lent; Pius V. fixed the Fridays in Lent after lauds as the time at which they should be said, but they were not to be said on Good Friday or on a feast of nine lessons. There was no obligation of saying them in the private recitation of the Breviary, though those who do so may gain an indulgence of fifty days. The choir obligation was abolished by Pius X. The name and arrangement of the Penitential Psalms is very ancient. Possidius tells us that St. Augustine, when dying, caused the penitential psalms, which are few in number, to be fixed on the wall opposite his bed. Probably our penitential psalms are meant. Cassiodorus (d. 565) gives a mystical reason for the number seven—viz. that sin is remitted by baptism, martyrdom, alms, forgiving others, converting others, abundance of charity, and penance. They are also mentioned in the oldest Roman Ordines (Gavantus, tom. ii. § ix. cap. 4). The antiphon "Ne reminiscaris," from Tobias iii. 3, attached to these psalms in the Roman Breviary, seems to have been added in the sixteenth century. (Maskell, "Monumenta Rit." vol. iii. p. 82.)

PENSIONS. At the Council of Chalcedon, Maximus, who had a short time before been substituted for Domnus as bishop of Antioch, requested the sanction of the Fathers to his assigning a pension out of the revenues of the see sufficient for the support of Domnus. The legates of Pope Leo, the other patriarchs, the entire synod, and the imperial judges assented to the request in principle, leaving it to Maximus to arrange the details according to his judgment of what was necessary.

Gregory the Great used to send clerks convicted of incontinence to various monasteries for penance, but required that the churches to which they belonged should supply them with adequate pensions, so that they should not be a burden on the monasteries.

An ecclesiastical pension is not canonical or permitted except under the following conditions: 1. The receiver must be an ecclesiastic, free from censure and irregularity; 2. The pension must be founded on a just cause; 3. He who creates the pension must have the faculty to do so, and such faculties are granted by the Pope, and may be, as some theologians think, by the bishops also; 4. The enjoyment of the pension ceases with the natural or civil death of the pensioner. (Thomassin, iii. 2. 29–31; Moroni, Pensione Ecclesiastica.)

PENTECOST.[1] The Feast of Weeks חַג שָׁבֻעוֹת was one of the three great feasts of the Jewish law. It was the feast of the ingathered harvest, and the later Jews regarded it as a solemn commemoration of the Mosaic legislation in the third month (Exod. xix. 1); but there is no trace of such a view in the Bible, or even in Josephus and Philo. It was kept on the fiftieth day after the first day of the Passover, Nisan 16, the second day of the Paschal feast being reckoned as the first of the fifty days (Lev. xxiii. 15, 16; cf. Ewald x. "Alterthümer," p. 399 seq.). Hence the Greek name πεντηκοστή, originally an adjective with ἡμέρα understood, and then treated as an independent substantive (ἐν τῇ πεντηκοστῇ ἑορτῇ ἥ ἐστιν ἁγία ἑπτὰ ἑβδομάδων, Tob. ii. 1. There is nothing answering to this in the Chaldee or Hebrew versions as given by Neubauer, or in the Vulgate; but Sabatier's "Itala" has "in Pentecosten festo nostro qui est sanctus a septem annis"). To Christians the day became specially sacred, for on it at the third hour (i.e. about nine o'clock) the Holy Ghost descended miraculously on the Apostles. The ancient tradition that this Pentecost fell on a Sunday is confirmed by John xviii. 28, for if the Friday on which Christ died was the eve of the Passover, i.e. Nisan 14, then the 16th, the first of the fifty days, and the fiftieth day itself must both have been Sundays.

Pentecost was kept as a Christian festival from very early times. The word was used both for Whit-Sunday and for the whole period of fifty days after Easter. Irenaeus, in a lost work on the Pasch, is said to have mentioned the custom of praying erect during this season (see the work falsely attributed to Justin Martyr, "Quaest. et Respons." 115, tom. iii. P. 2, p. 180, in Otto's edition); and Origen, the "Apostolic Constitutions" (v. 20), as well as the Council of Elvira (anno 306, can. 43), speak of the feast on the day itself. There was no fasting during the whole period, for even the fast on the vigil was not known in the early Church; indeed, Quesnel thinks the custom in the Roman Church is not older than the twelfth century, though Meratus and Benedict XIV. ("De Festis," 515) believe its introduction must be placed much earlier. The Vigil of Pentecost was one of the two days on which solemn baptism was conferred, and hence the Missal prescribes a form for the blessing of the font on that day [see WHIT-SUNDAY]. Benedict XIV. also mentions as customs which prevailed in some places the blessing of the candle, for which a form is given by Martène ("De Antiq. Ecclesiæ Rit."), the blowing of trumpets at the "Veni, Sancte Spiritus," in the Mass of Whit-Sunday, the discharge of fire from the roof, the letting doves loose in the church, and the scattering of roses. The Sundays which follow till Advent are dated from Pentecost in the Roman Calendar. [See WHIT-SUNDAY.]

PEREGRINATIO SYLVIAE (ETHERIAE). A MS. of c. 385 which appears to have been written at Constantinople and which was discovered at Arezzo by Gamburrini in 1884. It is a cleverly written account of the travels in the East and a pilgrimage to the Holy Land of a noble lady from Southern Gaul or Spain. The authoress was at first supposed to have been a certain Sylvia, alleged to have been sister to Rufinus, Prefect of the Praetorium under Theodosius the Great; but the researches of the Benedictine Dom Ferotin have since shown that the pilgrim was really a Spanish devotee by name Aetheria (Etheria, Echeria, Egeria) possibly a relative of Theodosius himself. That she was a personage of some importance is clear from the attention everywhere paid her by officials and dignitaries, civil as well as ecclesiastical. She was even allowed the protection of a military escort. Her journeyings took her through Egypt, Syria, Mesopotamia and Asia Minor. The chief fragment of her book of travels, still extant, comprises a minute description of what she witnessed in the Holy Land and enables us to reconstruct satisfactorily the Church-life of the East in the fourth century. Sylvia or Etheria writes in the provincial Latin of her age, but is always pleasantly readable. She confines herself to narrative and description, and rarely intrudes her personal views and appreciations, much less does she ever digress, as was the custom of her contemporaries, into forced symbolisms.

[1] For the derivation of the word Whitsunday, see that article.

Her experiences, written for the information of certain nuns ("sisters") or others in the West, while furnishing valuable topographical details concerning the Holy Places, are of the highest importance to the Liturgiologist. She wrote at the high tide of the movement guided by Pope St. Damasus and his friend St. Jerome which resulted in the grafting on the simpler Ritual of Rome of many features of the elaborate ceremonial of the East. Notable among these are the Palm Sunday Procession and the Good Friday Adoration of the Cross, of the one and the other of which Sylvia gives us a vivid description.

Sylvia herself was obviously greatly impressed by the splendour of the Jerusalem Rite. She dwells lovingly on the gorgeous festival hangings, on the innumerable lamps and candles, on the clouds of incense mounting to the roofs of the Basilicas, on the frequent and stately processions from church to church, and so forth. The services were in Greek, but there were officials present to explain the prayers and sermons in Syriac, the language of the people, and interpreters were likewise at the service of strangers who spoke only Latin. Nevertheless, Sylvia makes us feel that she found no substantial difference between the Jerusalem worship and that to which she had been accustomed in the West. Thus, she goes to what we should call a Sunday High Mass, and says that it was all just as on Sundays everywhere else (omnia secundum consuetudinem quae ubique fit die Dominica). Her only remark is that the preaching was so lengthy that the service did not end till very late. In fact, one after another, the Bishop and every priest present delivered a sermon.

In the fourth century, the Catholics of the Holy Land, our eye-witness tells us, were fervent indeed. The churches were thronged even during the hours of the night; there was almost continuous psalmody conducted by religious (monazontes) and the Lenten Fast was so rigorous that it was looked upon as a sign of weakness to want to eat more than once in forty-eight hours.

(See HOLY WEEK; HOLY PLACES, &c. Dom Cabrol's "Peregr. Sylviae" (1895) should be consulted; but the best edition is in Geyer "Corp. Script. Eccles. Hierosolym." (Vienna, 1898). See also the appendix to Duchesne's "Origines du Culte," and "Catholic Encyclopaedia," vol. viii. pp. 254 sqq.)

PERJURY. A lie confirmed with an oath. To call God as a witness of what is false implies either that He does not know the truth or that He would testify to what is false. It is therefore a grievous sin against the virtue of religion. (See OATH; St. Thomas, $2^a\ 2^{ae}$, q. 98.)

PERPETUAL ADORATION OF THE BLESSED SACRAMENT. In very ancient times perpetual adoration of God by psalm and prayer was maintained by communities of monks, e.g. by the ἀκοίμητοι in the East [see ACOEMETI], and in the monasteries of Agaunum, founded by King Sigismund in 522, by the monks of Habendum in Lorraine, St. Denis and St. Germain in Paris, of Corbie, Dijon, St. Martin in Tours, St. Médard, St. Mary in Soissons, &c. Abbot Augilbert of St. Riquier in Picardy, who died in 814, left special directions for this perpetual adoration. When it died out in Gaul, and whether it ever spread into other lands, is not known (Falle, Ew. Anbet. im Mittelalter in the "Katholik" for 1868, ii. 228–32).

It was in France also that the perpetual adoration of the Eucharist began. Anne of Austria asked her confessor, M. Picotté, a priest of St. Sulpice, to make a vow in her name to God for the deliverance of France from the scourge of war. M. Picotté resolved to found a convent of nuns for the perpetual adoration of the Blessed Sacrament, and chose Mother Mechtilde of the Holy Sacrament to carry out his intention. She was born in 1614, at St. Dié in Lorraine, and was known in the world as Catherine de Bar. She became a nun of the order of the Annunciation, and afterwards, when her community had been scattered by war, she was a nun and then an abbess in the order of St. Benedict. The troubles of the time had driven her from place to place. She was at Paris at the time when M. Picotté was seeking to found his convent, and having ever since her fourteenth year intended to devote her life to the honour of the Blessed Sacrament, she entered readily into the priest's design. A little house was bought in the Rue Féron, and here Mother Mechtilde with her sisters began the perpetual adoration on March 25, 1654. The sisters observe the primitive rule of St. Benedict in all its rigour. One or more of them is always kneeling before the altar, and on Fridays a sister kneels there with a rope round her neck and a lighted torch in her hand from prime to vespers, to do penance for sinners. The feast of the Annunciation is observed by them as the feast of their foundation. Special constitutions were added to the Benedictine rule. These were examined at Rome, amended, done into Latin, and printed by the Camera Apostolica in 1705.

Soon new houses were founded and old Benedictine convents incorporated. In Great Britain Mother Mechtilde's nuns are established at Dumfries.

A similar order is that of the Monachette del Corpus Domini, founded by Hyacintha of Bossi in 1683. The nuns are tertiaries of St. Dominic.

In 1701 the Abbess of the Convent of Notre Dame de Valdorne in Champagne established a convent for perpetual adoration at Charenton, near Paris. The rule is that of St. Benedict with relaxations. A convent of Augustinians was devoted to the same purpose at Marseilles by Father Le Quien. At Rome a congregation of Franciscan tertiaries (enclosed), united for this purpose, was established in 1807 by Mary Magdalene of the Incarnation. They received special constitutions in 1818. Their first church was that of SS. Joachim and Anna by the Quattro Fontane; later, Gregory XVI. gave them the church and spacious convent of St. Mary Magdalene on the Quirinal. They have also houses at Naples and Innsbruck.

The example of these orders has been followed by many other communities of men and women in various orders, who keep up the perpetual adoration. Lastly, various lay confraternities have endeavoured, so far as possible, to carry out the perpetual adoration. Some of them are affiliated as a kind of third order to the institute of Mother Mechtilde. (Kaulen in "Kirchenlex."; Corblet, "Hist. du Sacrement de l'Eucharistie," with complete bibliography; McMahon in "Cath. Enc.")

PERPETUAL SUCCOUR, OUR LADY OF. A Byzantine picture of the Madonna and Child, brought to Rome in the fifteenth century and venerated in the church of San Matteo in the Via Merulana. When the church was destroyed by the French in 1812, all traces of the picture were lost for more than forty years. When it was discovered again, Pope Pius IX., who remembered it and had often prayed before it in its former days, took great interest in propagating the devotion to it. The Redemptorists, into whose keeping it came, instituted a confraternity of Our Lady of Perpetual Succour, which was approved by Pius IX. and richly indulgenced. Facsimiles of the picture have found their way into almost every part of the world. In America the title is usually known as Our Lady of Perpetual Help. The feast is now appointed for June 27. PERSECUTIONS (during the first six centuries). The limits of the present work permit us only to give a brief general outline of the principal facts.

During the first century Christianity was to a great extent confounded with Judaism in the eyes of the Roman officials, and since the latter was a religio licita, the former shared the same privilege. The persecutions under Nero and Domitian were local and occasional; no systematic design of extirpating Christianity dictated them. Gradually, partly because the Jews took pains to sever their cause from that of the Christians, partly because, in proportion as Christianity was better understood, the universality of its claim on human thought and conduct, and its essential incompatibility with pagan ideas, came out into stronger relief, the antagonism grew sharper, and the purpose of repression more settled. Charges, various in their nature, were brought against the Christians; they were treasonable men (majestatis rei) who denied to the emperors a portion of their attributes and dignity; they were atheists, who, so far from honouring the gods of the empire, declared that they were devils; they were dealers in magic; lastly, they practised a foreign and unlawful religion (religio peregrina illicita). Possessed by such conceptions, a high Roman official, especially if he were a man of arbitrary or brutal character, or if Christians were indiscreet, could not lack pretext in abundance for persecution, even before any general edict of proscription had appeared. The rescript of Trajan (98–117) directed the policy of the government for a hundred years. "Search," he said, "is not to be made for Christians; if they are arrested and accused before the tribunals, then if any one of them denies that he is a Christian, and proves it by offering sacrifice to our gods, he is to be pardoned." The implication was, of course, that those who avowed their Christianity and refused to sacrifice were to be executed, as the adherents of an unlawful religion. All through the second century, the popular sentiment, whenever a Christian was put on his trial, raged against the accused; the mob, still for the most part pagan, believed every wild and monstrous calumny that was afloat against the sect. "If the Tiber overflows," says Tertullian, "if the Nile does not overflow, if there is a drought, an earthquake, a scarcity, or a pestilence, straightway the people cry 'The Christians to the lions!'" ("Apol." xl., PL, i. 479.) This popular aversion is noticed in the reports of the persecution in Asia Minor, in which St. Polycarp suffered (probably about 155, under Antoninus Pius), and of the terrible slaughter of Christians at Lyons and Vienne under Marcus Aurelius. In 202 Severus issued a formal edict forbidding conversions either to the Jewish or the Christian religion under heavy penalties. The persecution which ensued lasted ten or eleven years; but from about 212 to the reign of Decius (249–251) was a time of comparative peace, and Christians multiplied in every direction. Even upon the general population an impression was by this time made; and the attitude of the mob, in the persecutions of Christians which happened after the middle of the third century, was at first apathetic, then respectful, finally even compassionate. Under Decius, who was an enthusiast for the ancient glories of the republic and empire, the systematic general persecutions began, which aimed at stamping out Christianity altogether. Fabian, the bishop of Rome, and St. Agatha in Sicily, were among the victims of the Decian storm. Fortunately it was short; but when it had passed over, the number of the lapsi, or those who in various degrees had given way under the pressure, was found to be very great. [See LAPSED.] Under Gallus there was peace, but Valerian (257) renewed the persecution. The martyrdoms of St. Laurence, St. Cyprian, and St. Fructuosus of Tarragona date from about this time. Again, from 260 (in which year an edict of Gallienus declared Christianity to be a legal religion) to 300, the government left the Christians undisturbed except for a few months (270) under Aurelian. In 303 the terrible persecution of Diocletian was ushered in by the destruction of the great church at Nicomedia. On the next day appeared an edict ordering that all buildings used for religious worship by the Christians should be destroyed, and that their sacred books should be given up to the authorities and burnt. Christians themselves were declared to be outlawed and civilly dead; they were to have no remedy in the courts against those who did them wrong; and they were to be subject, in every rank, to torture. A second edict ordered that all bishops and priests should be imprisoned; a third, that such prisoners should be compelled by every possible means to offer sacrifice to the gods. The extreme violence of this persecution did not last beyond two years; but in that time the blood of martyrs flowed abundantly in Palestine, Italy, Gaul, Spain, and Britain. A detailed account of the sufferings of the Christians in Palestine may be read in the "Ecclesiastical History" of Eusebius. For some years after the abdication of Diocletian (305) civil war desolated the empire; but, after the fall of Maxentius, Constantine and Licinius, about the beginning of 313, published the famous edict of Milan, by which complete toleration was given to the Christians, and Christianity was placed on a footing of perfect equality with what had been till now the State religion. This edict was published some months later at Nicomedia, so that both in East and West the period of martyrdom was closed.

The persecution of Julian (361–3)—although martyrdoms were not wanting, e.g. those of SS. John and Paul—consisted rather in a studied exclusion of Christians from the favour of the court and government, together with a prohibition of teaching rhetoric, literature, and philosophy, than in actual measures of coercion.

There was a prolonged persecution of the Christians in Persia under the Sassanides, (fifth century).

The cruel persecution of the Catholics in Africa by their Vandal conquerors, under Geiseric (Genseric), Hunneric, and his successors (439–523), was motived partly by the hatred and contempt which these Teutons bore to all of Roman blood or nurture, partly by the inevitable antagonism between the Arian heresy which they professed and the Catholic creed, and partly by the policy of humbling and weakening those whom they could not hope to attach sincerely to their government.

The persecutions of the Spanish Catholics by the Arian Visigothic kings Euric and Leovigild, in the fifth and sixth centuries, were of no great intensity. For the persecutions of the English and Irish Catholics see ENGLISH CHURCH (Persecution Period); IRISH CHURCH (Period of Persecution). See MARTYRS.

PERSON. [See TRINITY.]

PETER'S CHAINS, FEAST OF. From the beginning of the seventh century, and how long before that it is impossible to determine, the festival of St. Peter ad Vincula was celebrated at Rome on August 1. The Greeks keep the corresponding feast on January 16; the Armenians on January 22. One of the lessons in the Roman Breviary for the day relates that the Empress Eudocia, wife of Theodosius the Younger, having obtained during a visit to Jerusalem the chains with which the Apostle had been bound by Herod's order, and from which he was miraculously set free (Acts xii.), brought them to Constantinople (439), and having deposited one of them in the church of St. Peter in that city, sent the other to Rome as a present to her daughter Eudoxia, who had married Valentinian III. Papebroch the Bollandist, who has a long dissertation on St. Peter's chains, under date June 29, and Baronius (a. 439), are both inclined to accept this story. There seems no means of fixing the date at which it first found its way into the Breviary.

But, besides these Palestinian chains, a very early tradition knew of other chains borne by St. Peter, those, namely, with which he was bound in the Mamertine prison at Rome during the Neronian persecution. The Acts of Pope Alexander, bishop of Rome, between 121 and 132, are believed by Papebroch to be genuine, and to have been compiled before 250. In these Acts a certain St. Balbina is spoken of as having sought and found the chains of St. Peter, which she gave in charge to Theodora, sister of Hermes, the Praefectus Urbis. These must have been the Neronian chains, for neither tradition nor probability permits the supposition of a transfer of the Palestinian chains to Rome at that remote date.

In a sermon "De Vinculis," attributed to Bede, it is said that this Pope Alexander instituted a feast on August 1 in honour of St. Peter, and built the church called ad Vincula, in which his chains were wont to be kissed by a devout people. Filings of the chains of St. Peter were from a very early period enclosed by Popes in rings or keys, and sent to friends or correspondents to whom it was desired to show special favour. To this practice, in the opinion of Papebroch, St. Augustine (?) refers when he says that, "deservedly, through all the churches of Christ, the iron of those penal chains is esteemed more precious than gold." [1]

No Greek writer speaks of the removal of one of the chains to Rome, nor mentions Eudocia in connection with them. There is, however, a Greek oration, extant in MS. in several Italian libraries, on St. Peter's chains. Though commonly attributed to St. John Chrysostom, it is of uncertain date and authorship; Baronius would assign it to Proclus or Germanus, patriarchs of Constantinople in the seventh century; Papebroch sees no reason why it should not really have been written by Chrysostom. In this oration it is merely stated that the first Christian emperors brought a chain (not chains) from Jerusalem to Constantinople, and placed it in the church of St. Peter.

Two Roman churches at the present day recall the bonds of St. Peter; one, S. Pietro in Vincoli, is on the Esquiline Hill, the other, S. Pietro in Carcere, on the Capitol. In the former is preserved the chain said to have been given to Eudoxia; [2] the latter is on or near the site of the prison in which the Apostle was believed to have been incarcerated.

The feast of this day was called by our Saxon ancestors Lammas—i.e. Loaf-Mass; [3] solemn thanksgiving being made on it for the fruits of the earth, and offerings presented.

PETER'S CHAIR, FEAST OF. [See CATHEDRA.]

PETER'S PENCE (denarius S. Petri, Rom-gesceot, Rom-scot). An annual tax of one penny for every house in England, collected at Midsummer, and paid to the Holy See. It was extended to Ireland under the bull granted by Pope Adrian to Henry II.[4] The earliest documentary mention of it seems to be the letter of Canute (1031), sent from Rome to the English clergy and laity.[1] Among the "dues which we owe to God according to ancient law," the King names "the pennies which we owe to Rome at St. Peter's" (denarii quos Romae ad Sanctum Petrum debemus), "whether from towns or vills." It may hence be considered certain that the tax was deemed one of ancient standing in the time of Canute, but its exact origin is variously related. West Saxon writers ascribe the honour (for it was regarded as an honour by our forefathers) of its institution to kings of Wessex; Matthew Paris, who represents Mercian traditions, gives it to Offa, king of Mercia. Malmesbury makes Ethelwulf, the father of Alfred, the founder; so that the same king who instituted tithes would on this view have established "Peter's pence." But a writer very little later than Malmesbury—Henry of Huntingdon—attributes the grant to Offa, king of Mercia, who "gave to the Vicar of St. Peter, the Bishop of Rome, a fixed rent for every house in his kingdom for ever." Matthew Paris, in his "Two Offas" (printed by Wats), gives the Mercian tradition in an expanded form. Offa, visiting Rome in great state, besides other munificent offerings, burdens his kingdom with the "Rom-scot," which is to be paid to the Roman Church for the support of the English school and hostel at Rome. It was to be one silver penny (argenteus) for every family occupying land worth thirty pence a year. On the other hand, Layamon, the poet (writing about 1209, among West Saxon traditions), ascribes the institution to Ina, a king of Wessex. No certain conclusion can be arrived at; but, on the whole, it seems probable that the "Rom-scot" owed its foundation to Offa, with whose prosperous and successful reign the initiation of the thing would be more in keeping than with the troubled times of Ethelwulf, although the latter may well have consented to extend that which had been before only a Mercian impost to the West Saxon part of his dominions.

The "alms," [2] sent by Alfred to Pope Marinus, who then "freed" the English school at Rome, were probably nothing more than arrears of Peter's pence, the receipt of which made it possible for the Pope to free the inhabitants in the English quarter, and the pilgrims resorting to it for hospitality, from all tax and toll. Geoffrey Gaimar [3] is responsible for the curious statement that, in consideration of the Peter's pence (the "dener de la meison" given by Canute), the Pope made him his legate, and ordered that no Englishman charged with crime should be imprisoned abroad, or exiled, but should "purge himself in his own land."

It is probable that there was at all times great irregularity in the payment of the [2] In one form of the martyrology of Usuard (Acta Sanctorum, June, vol. vii.) there is a legend to the effect that when the chain sent to Eudoxia from Constantinople was brought in contact with the Neronian chain the two miraculously cohered. See also the lesson for the day in the Roman Breviary.

Rom-scot. It is recorded (Sax. Chr.) to have been sent to Rome in 1095, by the hands of the Papal nuncio, after an intermission of many years. Again, we read (ib.) of a legate coming into England in 1123[1] after the Rom-scot. In 1534 it was abolished.

The tribute, or cess, of 1000 marks (700 for England, 300 for Ireland), which King John bound himself and his heirs to pay to the Roman See, in recognition of the feudal dependence of his kingdom, was of course wholly distinct from the Peter's pence. After being paid by Henry III. and Edward II., but withheld by Edward I. and Edward III., it was formally claimed with arrears, in 1366, by Urban V. The Holy See was then at Avignon, and the fear that money sent it from England would be used in some way for the advantage of France was what chiefly caused the rejection of the claim. (See Lewis's "Life of Wyclif," p. 349.)

The ancient and mediaeval practice of paying Peter's pence was not revived until our day. During Pius IX.'s exile at Gaeta in 1849, and again after the seizure of the larger portion of the Papal States in 1860, the piety and indignation of the faithful induced them to make voluntary contributions in money towards the expenses of the administration of the Holy See. This fund was called in France "denier de Saint Pierre" and in England "Peter's pence" in imitation of the old tribute, and is still continued in many countries. (Daux, "Le Denier de Saint Pierre"; Hergenröther, in "Kirchenlex."; Thurston in "Cath. Enc.")

PETROBRUSIANS. An heretical sect of the twelfth century, the leaders of which, Peter de Bruys and Henricus, in so far as they attacked the hierarchy and preached simplicity of life, may be regarded as the forerunners of Arnold of Brescia. A letter of Peter the Venerable,[2] abbot of Cluny, is the chief source of information respecting them. Bruys propagated his opinions in Languedoc in the first twenty years of the twelfth century; he perished at the stake, through a movement of popular exasperation, in 1124. Henricus (who may perhaps be identified with the "Henricus haereticus" mentioned by Matthew Paris under the year 1151), after a long career of success, partly in Maine, but chiefly in Southern France, was tried at the Council held at Rheims, by Eugenius III., in 1148, and sentenced to perpetual imprisonment. He died in the following year. The following abstract of the Petrobrusian tenets is given by a Protestant writer:[3] "They were strongly opposed to infant baptism, saying that you could wash a young child's skin, but you could not cleanse his mind at that early age. They objected to the building and using of churches, declaring that God could hear us whether we prayed in a tavern or a church, in a market-place or in a temple, before an altar or before a stall. They maintained that crosses, instead of being held in reverence, should be destroyed and cast away; that the instrument by which Christ had suffered such agonies ought not to be made an object of veneration but of execration. They denied the Real Presence in the Eucharist. Prayers and Masses for the dead they utterly ridiculed and said that God was insulted by church singing; as He took pleasure only in holy affections, shrill voices and musical strains could neither win nor appease Him."

PHILOSOPHY. We are compelled from want of space to forgo any attempt at a history of philosophy as pursued within the Church, and must confine ourselves to the accepted definition of philosophy, a brief sketch of its development, and a few words on its relation to faith. There was really no systematic philosophy in the Church[1] till the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, when the physical and metaphysical works of Aristotle became known in translations. Some of the Fathers condemned philosophy altogether (so, e.g., Irenaeus, "Adv. Haer." ii. 14, 2, PG, vii. 750; ii. 25, 5; ii. 14, 5; Tertullian, "Praescr." 7, PL, ii. 19; the author of the "Philosophumena," vii. 19). Tatian and Hermias, among the Apologists, are equally bitter. Theophilus ("Ad Autol." ii. 8, 12; iii. 3, 7, 17) qualifies blame with faint praise. St. Athanasius professes his ignorance of a common philosophical term, and Basil his dislike of philosophy in general (see Newman's note in the "Oxford Athanasius," p. 52). Aristotle was regarded with special aversion (Iren. ii. 14, 5, PG, vii. 752; Tertull. "Praescr." 7, PL, ii. 19; "Philosophum." vii. 19). Others found in the heathen philosophers an acknowledgment of Christian mysteries, and looked on philosophy as a preparation for Christ (so Justin, of the Stoics and

[1] Sax. Chron.

[3] J. C. Morison, in his Life and Times of St. Bernard; not a very wise book, but never consciously unfair.

[1] Nor, of course, in the New Testament, where philosophy is only mentioned once, and then in a bad sense (Col. ii. 8). On the other hand, great attention has been given by recent scholars—e.g. Ewald and Delitzsch in Germany; Hookyas, Kuenen, and Tiele in Holland—to the "wisdom" of the O.T. writers. The "wise" men, or sages, were undoubtedly a recognised class among the Hebrews, distinct from the priests on the one hand and the prophets on the other (see, e.g., Jer. xviii. 18). Now, in the Hebrew Bible—specially in Proverbs, Job, and Ecclesiastes—we have the remains of this "wisdom literature," and it has this marked characteristic. The Jewish law, all the national prerogatives and peculiarities of Israel, fall into the background. So, on the other hand, does prophetic revelation (only once alluded to in Prov.—viz. xxix. 18). The wisdom is natural, and not dogmatic; cosmopolitan, not Israelite. Its main object is to regulate life by the data of experience. For this reason the prophets protest against some manifestations of this "wisdom," as being godless (Isa. v. 24, xxix. 14; Jer. iv. 22, viii. 9, ix. 23), while they show at the same time the influence of this "wisdom," or gnomic, literature on their own style (see, especially, Isa. xxviii. 23–29). So far, then, Proverbs, Job, &c., occupy the position of philosophy; but the Hebrew "wisdom" is not speculative, but practical. The Hebrew "sages" correspond, not to the Greek philosophers, but to the Greek "sages," the wise men who preceded the philosophers. Sensible remarks on the whole subject are made by Kuenen—Onderzoek, vol. iii. p. 88—and Tiele has treated the matter admirably—Egypt. en Mesopotam. Godsdiensten, p. 629 seq.

Heraclitus, "Ap." 2, 8; of Socrates, ib. 10; Clem. Al. "Strom." i. 5, p. 331, 333; with reference to Plato, v. 13, p. 696; vi. 15, p. 802; v. 13, p. 697; v. 14, p. 714; Origen, e.g. "C. Cels." vi. 8, where he quotes a spurious passage of Plato to show that he knew the "Son of God"). Now, both these views, in spite of their opposition to each other, agree in this, that they conceive of philosophy as external to Christianity. To Clement and those who think with him, philosophy is a friendly power which, partly from the "light which lightens every man," partly by borrowing from the Hebrew Scriptures, leads men to Christ; to Irenaeus and others it is a dangerous rival of the Church. The views are not really far apart, and the adherents of neither ever reached the scholastic theory that philosophy and theology are two independent sciences, each of which has a province of its own; Augustine, even, has no formal and complete system of philosophy; and though at the close of the patristic period logic was zealously cultivated, a philosophy in the strict sense had not begun to be. In the latter part of the eleventh century speculations on the nature of universal ideas began to excite attention in the Church, though the dispute was conducted in great measure with reference to the mysteries of the Trinity and Incarnation, so that it was half-theological, half-philosophical. Roscelin, canon of Compiègne (about 1089), propounded the Nominalist view that universals are mere abstractions from individual things; he was a Tritheist in theology, was condemned at Soissons in 1092, and opposed by the Realists William of Champeaux (d. 1121) and Anselm of Canterbury (d. 1109). Up to this time only a few of Aristotle's logical works were known in the West ("Categ.," "De Interpret.," besides Porphyry's "Isagoge"; after 1128, Aristotle's "Analytica" and "Topica"). About 1200, translations of Aristotle's metaphysical and physical writings appeared, and the influence of the great Arabic commentators on Aristotle (Avicenna, b. 980; the Pantheist Averroes, 1113–1198) began to tell. These metaphysical studies met with great opposition. A council of Paris in 1210 ordered Aristotle's metaphysical works to be burnt (Fleury, "H.E." lxxvii. 59); and the Papal legate, Robert of Courçon, in 1215 forbade the use of Aristotle's physical or metaphysical works, and this by order of Pope Innocent III. (Fleury, lxxvii. 39). This decree was modified by Gregory IX., and practically abrogated by Urban V., and soon the Aristotelian philosophy became supreme in the West. The Franciscan Alexander of Hales, born in Gloucestershire (d. 1245), was the first scholastic who was acquainted with all the works of Aristotle and knew something of the Arabian commentators. Albert the Great (d. 1280), St. Thomas of Aquin (d. 1274), Duns Scotus (d. 1308), differing as they did on many points, philosophical and theological, were all Aristotelians. All distinguished between the provinces of faith and reason, accepted the decisions of the Church as supreme in the former, and followed Aristotle as the great representative of human reason. A much freer position with respect to Aristotle was maintained by the later Nominalists. The first great leader of this school was the Franciscan Occam (provincial in England, theologian to Louis of Bavaria, d. 1347), who abandoned the Scotism of his order. He was followed by some Dominicans—e.g. by the Englishman Robert Holcott, by the great Frenchmen Peter d'Ailly and Gerson (d. 1429), and by Gabriel Biel (d. 1495), the last great Nominalist. The Aristotelian philosophy, on the whole, held its own within the Church till the time of Descartes. Jesuits like Suarez choose, indeed, between St. Thomas and Scotus, but they are professed Aristotelians.

To the Schoolmen generally philosophy is the "science of things through their ultimate causes, so far as such science is attainable by the light of nature." We say by "ultimate causes," for, whereas lower sciences, such as mechanics, chemistry, &c., borrow principles from other sciences, philosophy borrows from no other science: it considers "being as being," the nature of things in their widest aspect. It either deals with "being" in itself or with "being" as the object of and as ordered by reasoning, or with "being" as the object of and ordered by the will. The two latter classes (ens rationale and morale) are the subject-matter of two subdivisions of philosophy—viz. of logic and ethics. "Being" in itself—i.e. as ordered by God—may be considered as liable to sensible motion, and then it is the subject-matter of physics; or, again, we may consider "being" like that of God or the angels, which is superior to such motion, or, in our consideration of "being," abstract from sensible motion, then we get metaphysics (so Goudin, "Philosophia D. Thomae"). Logic, metaphysics, physics, and ethics, therefore, are the four subdivisions of philosophy, psychology[1] being merely a branch of physics. Next, philosophy reasons only from the light of nature, and has no direct connection with revelation. It proves, e.g., the "being" of God, which can be done from His works; it does not investigate the doctrine of the Trinity, which is wholly beyond reason. Hence the marked difference between the scholastic philosophy and many modern systems, which latter claim to be a substitute for revelation, and to give, in the form of reason, that, so far as it is reasonable, which the uninstructed believe. Further, the Schoolmen taught that philosophy is the handmaid of faith: first, because it prepares the way for faith by establishing, e.g., the spiritual nature of the soul, the existence of God, &c.; next, because, though it cannot prove revealed truths, it can show that they are not evidently contrary to reason; thirdly, because, whenever the provinces of philosophy and theology touch, the philosopher must, if need arise, correct his conclusions by the higher and more certain truth of faith. It is a Scholastic axiom that nothing can be true in philosophy which is false in theology. Observe, the Church does not teach philosophy; that is not her province. She merely declares a philosophy which rejects, e.g., the primary truths of morals or religion, to be false. The correction of the false reasoning she leaves, and must leave, to others.

After Descartes there was an increasing defection from Scholastic philosophy among Catholics. The philosophy of Malebranche (d. 1715), bitterly opposed as it was by Bossuet ("Lettre 171, à un Disciple du P. Malebranche"), became very popular in France. The representatives of other Catholic schools of philosophy among Catholics hold a far lower place in the history of speculation. Such, during this century, were the Ontologists and Traditionalists in France; Hermes, Baader, Günther in Germany. Their systems were condemned on theological grounds by ecclesiastical authority, and are now all but forgotten. On the other hand, the philosophical works of the Spanish priest Balmes still enjoy high repute.

A great revival of the Scholastic, or rather of the Thomist, philosophy began some sixty years ago. Protestants themselves showed a more generous appreciation of the Schoolmen, and Catholics reverted to their teaching, partly from impatience at the instability of modern systems, partly because of the close connection between the Scholastic philosophy and the language used in the definitions of the later Church, partly because of the security felt in adopting a philosophy which was in proved harmony with Catholic doctrine. The philosophical works of Liberatore and Sanseverino are perhaps the best known among those of the "New Scholastics"; and a man of much higher ability, the Jesuit F. Kleutgen ("Philosophie der Vorzeit," 1860), has written an elaborate defence of Thomist principles. The Thomist philosophy is now taught in almost every seminary, and Leo XIII., in the Encyclical "Aeterni Patris," approved and urged the teaching of the philosophy of St. Thomas. It must be remembered, however, that the physics of the Schoolmen, which no one thinks of defending, are yet an integral part of their philosophy. And, however high St. Thomas may rank as a philosopher, it is none the less true that a person who accepts his theories because they are his thereby renounces the study of philosophy altogether and confuses the methods of philosophy with those of faith. It is fair to say that Kleutgen is very far from such unreasonable exaggeration, and W. G. Ward confesses himself utterly unable to understand the reasoning of persons who speak as if the most intellectually dutiful sons of the Church were those who accept every "philosophical proposition current among the Scholastics" ("Essays on the Church's Doctrinal Authority," p. 541). The best account of the history of the Scholastic philosophy will be found in Ueberweg's "History of Philosophy." It has been translated. (It is not possible within our limits to name a tithe of the modern Catholic works on the subject. In English we have the excellent Stonyhurst series: John Rickaby, "First Principles of Knowledge" and "General Metaphysics"; Joseph Rickaby, "Moral Philosophy"; Boedder, "Natural Theology"; Walker, "Theories of Knowledge"; Maher, "Psychology." The numerous Latin manuals will be familiar to students.)

PHOTINUS. A disciple of Marcellus of Ancyra and bishop of Sirmium in Pannonia. He began to teach his heresy as early at least as 344, when he was condemned by an Antiochene synod. He distinguished between the Word and the Son. The former, in the strict sense (the λόγος ἀνώτατος), was not a Person, but the immanent reason of God. The Holy Ghost was merely the energy of God, and Christ no more than a man born miraculously of a virgin (so Hefele-Leclercq, i. 845; but this is not certain), who could be called "Son" only in an improper sense, because the Word of God wrought in Him with special power. His opinions were very much those of modern Socinians, and for this reason Petavius speaks of the latter as "Photiniani." Photinus was condemned both by Semi-Arians and Catholics, but there has been great difference of opinion among Catholic scholars as to the number and dates of the synods which condemned him. Petavius and Sirmond disputed at length on the matter. Some account of the controversy will be found in Hefele-Leclercq, i. 841. Photinianism was rejected as a heresy in the General Council held at Constantinople in 381.

PHOTIUS. [See GREEK CHURCH.]

PIARISTS. By this name are known the regular clerks of the Scuole pie (religious schools), an institute of secondary education founded at Rome by St. Joseph Calasanctius in the last years of the sixteenth century. This foundation was sanctioned as a congregation under simple vows by Paul V. in 1617, and as a religious order four years later by Gregory XV. The first children taught in the schools were collected from the streets, and the founder was content, after their religious education had been well provided for, to have them instructed in reading and writing only; but by degrees the programme was extended until, besides all the subjects of a good modern education, it embraced Latin and Greek and philosophy. Houses of the order were soon planted in various Italian towns, and in 1631 the Cardinal Bishop of Olmütz introduced the Fathers into Moravia. Alexander VII. in 1656 insisted that they should return to the status under which they could only take simple vows; but, thirteen years later, Clement IX. reinstated them in the full privileges of a religious order. The Piarists appear to have never entered France or Great Britain, or any country outside the limits of Europe. The chief centres of their activity have been, and are, Italy, Austria-Hungary, and Spain. About 1870 they numbered some 2000 religious. [Hélyot; "Kirchenlex."]

PICPUS, CONGREGATION OF. A deacon in the seminary of Poitiers, Pierre Coudrin by name, when the infidel government of France dispersed (1792) all students under training in the episcopal seminaries, resolving not to be false to his vocation, and hearing that the Bishop of Clermont was in hiding somewhere in Paris, went there, found him out, and received priest's orders at his hands. During the ten years of persecution which followed, Coudrin, who was of course one of the prêtres non assermentés, exercised his ministry in the midst of danger, hardship, and poverty, in the dioceses of Poitiers and Tours. Gradually he matured the plan of a new congregation which, while protesting in the most direct way against the prevalent unbelief by maintaining the Perpetual Adoration of the Blessed Sacrament, should undertake the preparation of candidates for the priesthood, and also the work of preaching the Gospel to the heathen. The Bishop of Mende, whose household he entered, sympathized in his projects and aided him to realise them. With the bishop's help Coudrin instituted (1805) his congregation in the buildings known as of Picpus, in the Faubourg St. Antoine, Paris. The approbation of the Holy See was given in 1817. Seminaries in various parts of France were confided to the Fathers of Picpus; and, in 1825, the third fundamental aim of the institute began to be realized, when Leo XII. sent six of its members to preach the faith in the islands of the Pacific. From that time their missionary activity has gone on with an ever-increasing development, chiefly in South America, Australasia, and Oceania. Father Damien, the apostle of the lepers (d. 1889), was a member. They are also established in England and in the United States.

The history of the earlier congregation of Picpus, a reform of the third order of St. Francis founded by Vincent Mussart at Franconville in 1594, is given at considerable length by Hélyot, who was himself a member of it. (Heimbucher, "Die Orden und Kongregationen.")

PILGRIM, PILGRIMAGE (peregrinus, peregrinatio; It. pellegrino; Fr. pèlerin). The well-known line, "Coelum non animum mutant qui trans mare currunt," contains but a half-truth, for universal experience attests the stimulating, recreative, and enlightening power which mere change of scene often exerts on the mind of man. These effects are likely to be enhanced when the change has a moral motive. "Movemur enim," says Cicero, "nescio quo pacto locis ipsis in quibus eorum, quos diligimus aut admiramur, adsunt vestigia" (we are inly stirred by the very spots where the traces exist of those whom we love and admire).

The pilgrimages of the Jews to Jerusalem at the time of the great festivals were matter of precept and obligation. The pilgrimages to Pagan shrines (of Jupiter Tyrius, or Melcarth, at Gades, of Jupiter Capitolinus at Rome, of Apollo at Delphi, Diana at Ephesus, &c.), and those flockings of innumerable worshippers to shrines of Rama and Crishna, which take place in our own day, usually proceed on the assumption that the power of the divinity whose help is sought is locally circumscribed, but that within the limits of his own jurisdiction it is indefinitely great. The Christian creed, according to which "God is a spirit" to be sought and found not specially "on this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem," but wherever the true worshippers approach Him in spirit and in truth, might seem at first sight to afford little encouragement to pilgrimages. For, as St. Jerome [1] says—and other Fathers hold similar language—Christians "dare not confine the omnipotence of God to one narrow corner of the world. . . . From Jerusalem and from Britain the court of heaven is equally open." Nevertheless, so certain is it that religious impressions, blunted and weakened by the daily business of the market-place and the street, require in most minds to be often graven afresh (and that by means of impulses coming from without, for it would be vain to trust to the sufficiency of those coming from within), that the Church has from the first—while admitting the danger of abuses, and taking measures to prevent them—approved the use of pilgrimage to holy places as a very potent help and incentive to a devout life. She also favours the practice, because she recognizes the undoubted fact that God has often granted, and still grants, interior and exterior favours, graces, and miracles at particular places or shrines, to honour certain mysteries, saints, &c.

Scudamore, in the "Dictionary of Christian Antiquities" (Smith and Cheetham), has collected with praiseworthy industry a multitude of facts bearing on the conditions under which pilgrimages were made in the first eight centuries. It would appear from the letters of Paula and Eustochium (included among those of St. Jerome) that from the date of the Ascension to their own day a continued stream of pilgrims had resorted to the Holy Places. The first recorded pilgrim is St. Alexander (third cent.), who is said to have visited Jerusalem in fulfilment of a vow. Of the devout journey of Helena, the mother of Constantine, whose faith and zeal are said to have been rewarded by the discovery of the true Cross, we have a full relation from the pen of Eusebius. The "Peregrinatio Etheriae (Sylviae)" [q.v.] is a charming record of the pilgrimage to the Holy Places of a Spanish (?) lady at the end of the fourth century. The French bishop Arculfus visited Jerusalem in the seventh century, and, after his return, told his story to Adamnan, abbot of Iona, who embodied the narrative in his tract, "De Locis Sanctis." In the eleventh century, Palestine having fallen into the hands of the Seljukian Turks, Christian pilgrims were subjected to many indignities, the report of which in Europe led eventually to the first Crusade. [See HOLY PLACES.]

[1] Cited by Scudamore, in the article noticed below.

The usual motives for a pilgrimage were: (1) The desire to realize the objects of faith and quicken religious feeling in the soul; (2) the fulfilment of a vow; (3) some special benefit—as when Chaucer's pilgrims went to Canterbury—

The holy blissful martir for to seke,
That hem hath holpen whan that thei were seke;

(4) the execution of some penitential task, whether self-imposed or enjoined by the clergy. At the same time the danger of relying too much upon the benefits of a pilgrimage were not overlooked. "Qui multum peregrinantur, raro sanctificantur" ("De Imit. Christi," i. 33).

The more celebrated shrines, towards which the currents of pilgrimage have set strongly, are: (1) those of our Lord, in other words, the Holy Places in Palestine [see HOLY PLACES];[1] (2) those of the Blessed Virgin; (3) those of angels and saints. Among the sanctuaries of our Lady, which have been, or are, thronged by the resort of pilgrims, may be mentioned Walsingham (on the pilgrimage to which Erasmus wrote a tract), Einsiedeln in Switzerland, Chartres and Fourvières in France, Maria Zell in Germany, Loreto in Italy [see LORETO]; and Guadaloupe and Montserrat in Spain. The grotto of Lourdes, [q.v.], since the event of 1858, has become the centre of attraction to an immense concourse of pilgrims. Among the sanctuaries of angels and saints may be named the "limina Apostolorum," or the tombs of SS. Peter and Paul on the Vatican Hill, St. James of Compostela, the church of St. Michael on Monte Gargano (the devotion of Norman pilgrims to which led to the Norman conquest of Naples), and the shrine of our own St. Thomas of Canterbury, a pilgrimage to which is the apt setting of the well-known "Tales" of Chaucer. (There is an excellent art. in the "Cath. Enc." by Bede Jarrett; see also Rock, iii. 356–380; Waterton, "Pietas Mariana Britannica"; "Palestine Pilgrims' Text Society.")

PIOUS SOCIETY OF MISSIONS. Founded by the Ven. Vincent Mary Pallotti in 1835. It consists of (1) priests, clerics, and lay-brothers; (2) religious sisters; (3) affiliated ecclesiastics and lay persons. The object of the society is the preservation and propagation of the Faith especially among emigrants and persons living among non-Catholics. There are Italian, American, English, and German provinces. Their most successful work has been among the numerous Italian emigrants in the United States and South America.

The well-known celebrations of the Holy Sacrifice in the different rites of the Church during the octave of the Epiphany at the church of S. Andrea della Valle, were inaugurated by Pallotti in 1835. (See Vogel, in "Cath. Enc.")

PISA, COUNCIL OF. Gregory XII. (Angelo Corrario) had been elected Pope in 1406, the Antipope Benedict XIII. (Peter de Luna) in 1395, and Europe was divided between the two "obediences." After much negotiation, both Gregory and Benedict were induced to promise to adopt the way of cession, in pursuance of which each would have withdrawn his claim to the pontificate. But misunderstandings arose, and the promises were not kept. The schism had now lasted thirty years, producing confusion and bewilderment throughout the Christian world. The leading cardinals on both sides, in view of this disastrous state of things, met together, and agreed, since no other way of restoring unity seemed feasible, to ignore the claims of both rivals, and themselves summon a general council, to meet at Pisa on March 25, 1409. The council met on the day appointed; its twenty-third and last session was held on August 7 following. From first to last, twenty-four cardinals, four patriarchs, eighty bishops, a hundred and two proctors of bishops, eighty-seven abbots, two hundred delegates of abbots, besides a great number of generals of orders, doctors, deputies of universities, and ambassadors, attended the council. Within little more than four months the synod finished the business for which it was convened. It first cited the rival claimants to appear; on their failing to do so, it declared itself to be the lawful representative of the Universal Church, and to have power to judge all pontifical pretensions; it decreed that all Christians ought to withdraw their obedience both from Gregory and Benedict; it entertained an act of accusation against them; after hearing evidence, it pronounced the sentence of deposition against them both, and declared the Holy See to be vacant;

it rejected the claim of Robert, Gregory's supporter, to the imperial throne, and recognized Wenzel; lastly, it arranged for the holding of a conclave from which Card. Philargi came forth as Pope, and took the name of Alexander V.

Hefele says of this council: "Neither ecclesiastical authority nor the most trustworthy theologians have ever numbered it among the oecumenical councils" ("Conc." Introd.). Its unfortunate issue (Gregory and Benedict both refusing to yield, and there being thus three claimants for the papacy, down to the time of the Council of Constance) he attributes partly to the perversity of the temporal princes, but chiefly to the council itself; to the erroneous theory on which they based the deposition of Gregory XII. and Benedict XIII.—viz. that by their conduct they were heretical against the article "Unam Sanctam Cath. Ecclesiam"—a theory which no one believed in, and again to their violence and precipitation in resorting to extreme measures ("Conciliengesch." vi. 901).

Nevertheless Bellarmine calls it a General Council, and looks upon it as "neither clearly approved nor clearly rejected."[1] Not the former; for Martin V. would not absolutely call Alexander V. Pope, though recognizing the validity of some of his acts; and St. Antoninus will not allow that either he or his successor was a true Pope. Not the latter; for many good theologians (e.g. Natalis Alexander, Raynaldus, and Ballerini) affirm that both the Council and the Pope whom it created were legitimate; nor would Alexander VI. have taken that title if it had been generally believed that Alexander V. was no true Pope. So far from that, "it may almost be called the common opinion," proceeds Bellarmine, "that both Alexander and John his successor were true Popes."

An English prelate, Robert Hallam, bishop of Salisbury, acted a conspicuous part in the proceedings at Pisa. (ANTIPOPES; Salembier, "Le Grand Schisme"; Pastor, "Hist. of the Popes," tr., i. 178 sqq.; Creighton, "Hist. of the Papacy," i. 228 sqq.)

PISCINA. The word, which signified originally "a fish-pond," came to mean in classical writers of the silver age a basin, or bath. In the early Latin Church it was employed as an equivalent for κολυμβήθρα, the Greek word for the baptismal font. In the Middle Ages it was the common term for the small niche in the wall on the Epistle side of the altar containing a perforated basin of stone, through which the water used in washing the priest's hands was poured. Earlier in the Middle Ages the ablutions were also poured down the piscina. Examples of mediaeval piscinae abound in old English churches. They are sometimes to be seen in modern Catholic churches (Rock, iv. 194).

PISTOIA, SYNOD OF. Leopold, grand duke of Tuscany and brother of the Emperor Joseph II., began in 1780 to introduce many changes in the discipline, worship, &c., of the Tuscan Church. In 1782 he suppressed the Inquisition and he also interfered in doctrinal matters, recommended the "doctrine of St. Augustine" and the Biblical commentary of the Jansenist Quesnel. His chosen ally was Scipio Ricci, bishop of Pistoia and Prato, formerly vicar-general to Incontri, archbishop of Florence. In 1786 Leopold laid before the Episcopate of the Duchy fifty-seven articles for the "reform of the Church" in the Jansenist and Febronian sense. Only three bishops, of whom Ricci was one, accepted them. That same year (September 18), the Synod of Pistoia met. Tamburini was the promotor and 234 priests were present. The Jansenist doctrines on grace were approved. But besides this the principles of a spiritual democracy were asserted. God, it was said, had given power to the Church, and it was the Church which communicated it to the pastors, including even the Pope. Bishops were to be practically independent of the Pope, the priests in diocesan synods were to be judges of faith and discipline, &c., &c. Lastly, a multitude of decrees were passed condemning practices common in the Church—e.g. devotion to the Sacred Heart, missions, use of Latin in the Mass, the influence of scholastic theology, multiplication of religious orders, feasts, &c., &c.

The destruction of altars, images, &c., under Ricci's direction, set the Tuscan populace in an uproar; they stormed his palace in 1787, and he had to resign his see. The bishops, with scarcely an exception, were firmly opposed to the Pistoian decrees, from which eighty-five propositions were condemned by Pius VI. in the bull "Auctorem fidei" of 1794. Solari, bishop of Noli, in the Genoese territory, was the only prelate found publicly to oppose the bull. Ricci himself in 1805 made a recantation, and was reconciled to Pius VII., though it appears from the bishop's letters that his sentiments were not really changed. Solari joined himself to the Constitutional bishops in France. (From Hergenröther's "Kirchengeschichte," &c. The acts of the synod were printed at Pistoia; also at Pavia 1789, Laibach 1791, Bamberg 1794. The "Auctorem fidei" may be read in Denzinger's "Enchiridion." Gelli edited the "Memorie" of Ricci "with documents," Florence, 1865.)

PLAIN CHANT. [See CHANT.]

PLURALITY OF BENEFICES. Among the canons of the Council of Chalcedon (451) is one forbidding the cumulation of two or more benefices in the same hands. The Council of Trent [1] decrees that, whereas there are many who, "deceiving not God but themselves," seek by fraud or collusion to hold several benefices at once, no one for the future, whatever his rank in the hierarchy, shall be appointed to more than one ecclesiastical benefice, provided always such benefice be sufficient for his support. If it be not so, he may lawfully hold another along with it, provided the two be not incompatible. The incompatibility of benefices is a wide and intricate subject; for the purpose of this article it is sufficient to say that one chief cause of incompatibility is the existence of an obligation to continuous personal residence in regard to both benefices, as in the case of two bishoprics, two parishes, two canonries, &c.

Notwithstanding what has been said, the instances of Papal dispensations, authorising the same person to receive, and even to hold, several benefices together, are undoubtedly numerous. This is explained by Navarrus [2] in the following manner:— "If," he says, "his Holiness grants to one holding several benefices others in addition, it is not that he has the intention of dispensing in contravention of the decree aforesaid, but because he believes that all the benefices are necessary for the suitable maintenance of the petitioner, and that otherwise his confessor will not give him absolution, unless first he shall have resigned, or have the firm intention of resigning, such of the benefices as are not necessary for his suitable maintenance. There are, however, special cases, as to which canonists are agreed that, if the good of the Church so require, the Pope may grant a dispensation for validly holding two or more benefices, even though they are per se incompatible."

Important decrees against plurality were passed by the Third Council of Lateran (1179), the Fourth Council (1215), and also by the Council of Trent (1545–1563). (Ferraris, Beneficium, art. vi.)

PNEUMATOMACHI. [See MACEDONIANS.]

POLYGAMY. [See MARRIAGE.]

PONTIFICAL. A book containing the rites, some of which can be performed by a bishop only, others only by priests specially empowered by the bishop. Such books were compiled in the Middle Ages from the old Sacramentaries and Ordines by bishops for their own use and that of their successors. Pontificals probably came into use during the eighth century, the earliest extant being that of Egbert, archbishop of York from 732 to 766. The copy in the National Library at Paris seems to have been written in Egbert's lifetime.[3] "Ordinarium" was another name for the Pontifical. It occurs in the gloss on the "Clementina Unica [of Clement V.] de Jurejurando," and in a necrology of Paris, both quoted by Catalani. Zaccaria ("Biblioth. Rit.") gives a list of MS. Pontificals of French and German dioceses. According to Maskell, there is an imperfect Bangor Pontifical (thirteenth century) in the possession of the dean and chapter, a perfect Pontifical of the Sarum use, and an imperfect Pontifical from Winchester in the Cambridge Library, three or four imperfect Pontificals in the British Museum, an Exeter Pontifical (twelfth century) in the cathedral there. It will be seen how very rare English MS. Pontificals are. Neither the Bodleian nor the British Museum has one perfect copy. MS. Pontificals were, of course, not multiplied like Missals or Breviaries.

The first printed edition of the Roman Pontifical was edited by A. P. Piccolomini, Episcopus Picentinus, in 1485. Albertus Castellanus dedicated another edition, in which, he says, he had made many changes, to Leo X. It was revised under Clement VIII., again corrected under Urban VIII., Benedict XIV. revised it, and finally in 1888 a new typical edition was published by order of Leo XIII. The bulls of these Popes (1596 and 1644) require all bishops, &c., strictly to conform to the Roman Pontifical so revised. This must be understood of bishops belonging to the Latin Church, for the Catholic Greeks, Maronites, &c., have their own Pontificals, of which Zaccaria gives a list. There is a learned commentary on the Roman Pontifical in three volumes by Catalani. This article has been compiled from the Prolegomena to Catalani's edition, from Zaccaria's "Bibliotheca Ritualis," and from Maskell's "Monumenta Ritualia."

POOR CLARES. This is the second order of St. Francis, called the "Povere Donne," or, in French, "Clarisses." Their founder was the virgin St. Clare, born at Assisi, of which St. Francis also was a native. When very young she heard of the seraphic life led by St. Francis in his little convent of the Portiuncula, and aspired to imitate it. Against much opposition she renounced the world, and was received by St. Francis at the Portiuncula in 1212. Her sister Agnes soon joined her; the church of St. Damian was assigned to them; and in a short time she had no lack of followers. Within eight years the order had spread into both France and Spain. Cardinal Ugolino, who was protector of the whole order of St. Francis, placed St. Clare and her nuns temporarily under the rule of St. Benedict, adding some constitutions of great austerity. Under these they observed a perpetual fast, and on three days of the week in Lent fasted on bread and water; they lay on boards; their habit was rough and of coarse material; and they could not speak to one another at any time without the superior's leave. In 1224 St. Francis gave a written rule to St. Clare, which contained several mitigations of that which they had hitherto observed; they were now not to fast on Christmas Day, nor ever on bread and water; moreover, the silence imposed was confined to certain hours of the day. Like the friars, they were not to possess any landed property. This rule was approved by Innocent IV. in 1246.

A Bohemian princess renounced the world in 1234 in order to serve God in this order, which by her means was propagated in Bohemia and in the German countries adjoining it. St. Clare died in the odour of sanctity in 1253. Various modifications of the rule given by St. Francis having found their way into several convents, Cardinal Cajetan, with the approbation of Urban IV., drew up in 1264 a rule, substantially agreeing with, but somewhat mitigated from that given by St. Francis, which was adopted by the great majority of the daughters of St. Clare. Some, however, particularly in Spain and Italy, preferred to follow the unmitigated rule. The order was thus divided into two branches, the larger being known by the name of Urbanists, the latter by that of Clarisses.

The reform of St. Colette (1436) consisted in bringing back a number of convents in France and Flanders to the exact observance of the rule of St. Francis.

The first monastery of Franciscan nuns or Minoresses founded in England (1293) was outside Aldgate, to the East of London; the house soon came to be called "the Minories," a name which the locality still retains. At the dissolution, besides this house, there were two other convents of Poor Clares, at Bruisyard, in Suffolk, and Denny, in Cambridgeshire.

The government and direction of the order, being divided between a Cardinal Protector and the superiors of the Franciscans, were for a long time a subject of controversy and difficulty; until, early in the sixteenth century, Julius II. placed the Poor Clares entirely under the jurisdiction of the general and provincials of the Friars Minor.

In the time of Hélyot this order possessed 900 convents, with more than 2,500 religious. The French Revolution swept most of their houses away. (Thomas of Celano, "Vita S. Clarae," in Acta Sanctorum, Aug. 2; Robinson, "Life of St. Clare"; Cuthbert, "Life of St. Francis," ch. iv.; Joergensen, "Saint François d'Assise," ch. v.)

POOR MEN OF LYONS. [See VALDENSES.]

POOR, LITTLE SISTERS OF THE. This admirable institute was founded in 1839 by the curé of Saint Servan in Brittany (Abbé le Pailleur) aided by four women of humble birth, for the support, relief, and nursing of aged or infirm poor persons. The sisters are entirely dependent on the charity not only of the faithful but also of many non-Catholics. At present (1914) they have more than 300 houses in many different countries. The Sisters of Nazareth are an offshoot of the order. (Connelly, "The Little Sisters of the Poor"; Steele, "Convents of Great Britain"; Ram, "Little Sisters of the Poor.")

POPE. The word (πάππας or πάπας, originally a childish word for father, Lat. papa) was given at first as a title of respect to ecclesiastics generally. Among the Greeks at this day it is used of all priests, and was used, as late at least as the Middle Ages, of inferior clerics. In the West it seems to have become very early a special title of bishops. Thus the Roman clergy (Cyprian, Ep. viii. 1, ed. Hartel, p. 485) speak of the Bishop of Carthage as "the blessed Pope" ("Benedictum Papatem"). Even as late as the sixth century, the title of Pope was sometimes given to metropolitans in the West. (See Hefele-Leclercq, iii. 182.) Gradually, however, the title was limited to the Bishop of Rome, and we find a synod of Pavia in 998 (Hefele-Leclercq, iv. 890, iv. p. 653) rebuking an archbishop of Milan for calling himself Pope. Gregory VII., in a Roman Council of the year 1073, formally prohibited the assumption of the title by any other than the Roman Bishop. It is, of course, in this last and most restricted sense that we use the word here. By the Pope we mean the Bishop of Rome, who is, according to Catholic doctrine, the successor of St. Peter, and as such the vicar of Christ, the visible head of the Church, the doctor and teacher of all the faithful. We propose to give some account (1) of the place St. Peter occupies in Scripture; (2) of the position of the Pope in the Ante-Nicene age; (3) of the testimonies of later Fathers and councils; (4) to sketch the position of the Pope in the Church of the present time. Obviously, in a subject so vast we cannot do more than direct attention to the chief points.

(1) The Position of Peter in the New Testament.—Peter was first brought to Christ by his brother Andrew. "And Jesus, looking at him, said, Thou art Simon [i.e. "hearer"], the son of John [Ἰωάνου is the reading best supported], thou shalt be called Cephas," which is interpreted Peter—i.e. stone or rock. The three synoptic evangelists agree in putting Peter's name first in the list of the Apostles, and all note the change of his name from Simon to Peter ("He conferred on Simon the name of Peter," Mk. iii. 16; "Simon, whom also He named Peter," Lk. vi. 14; "first Simon, who is called Peter," Mt. x. 2), and later the reason for the change of name appeared. The change of name in itself must have been strange and significant in the ears of a pious Jew. He could scarcely fail to remember the depth of meaning which had lain in the change of Abram's name to Abraham, or how Jacob had won the glorious name of Israel, which was the pride and the joy of his descendants. And besides, "Rock" [1] was one of the most familiar names for that God who was at once the strength of His people, their impregnable fortress and refuge, their shelter in the noon-day heat of persecution. Christ Himself explained the reason for which He had changed Simon's name to Peter. Hitherto He Himself had been the visible head of that society which He had gathered round Him and He needed no vicar. But soon His disciples were to see Him on earth no more, and He promised to provide His visible Church, after He had gone to Heaven, with a visible head. Peter had confessed that his Master was "the Christ the Son of the living God." Christ accepted and rewarded this confession, which sprang from divine faith. Peter had said Christ was the Son of God, "And I," Christ replied, "say to thee that thou art Peter [or rock],[2] and on this rock I will build my Church, and the gates of Hades shall not prevail against it. And I will give to thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth will be bound in heaven, and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth will be loosed in heaven" (Mt. xvi. 18–19).

Four promises to Peter "of power and pre-eminence in the Church" are contained in these words. In a sense all the Apostles became the foundation-stones of Christ's Church (Ephes. ii. 19, 20; Apoc. xxi. 14). But Peter was to be its chief foundation-stone. He is not to derive his strength from the Church; but, on the contrary, Peter is to draw his strength from Christ, and the Church from Peter. Next, the Church built on Peter cannot fail. The gates of the invisible world, strong as they are, will not enclose and so prevail against the Church; nay, they themselves will at last be broken and will give up their dead; but the Church built on Peter will endure till death is "swallowed up in victory" (1 Cor. xv. 54), and even then the Church will not cease to be; only the Church which fights and struggles here will be changed into the Church which triumphs and reigns in heaven. Thirdly, while the Church lasts, Peter (and his successors) will hold its keys. Christ, who has the "key of the house of David," Christ, who opens and no man shuts, shuts and no man opens, continues to be the Master of the house; but Peter is the steward to whom the keys are committed. He admits to and excludes from the Church in his Master's name. In other words, he is the centre of the Church's unity. All, from the great Apostle of the Gentiles down to the most obscure of the Church's children, hold their place and exercise their functions in subordination to Peter. Fourthly, what he binds and looses on earth is bound and loosed in heaven—i.e. he is the ultimate earthly judge of what is lawful and unlawful. He is to lay down the laws and conditions on which communion with the Church and participation in its privileges depend, and the decisions of his tribunal here will be ratified in the heavenly court.[1]

Once more before His Passion Christ made a promise to Peter which brought the strength he was to have for his future office, and by virtue of Christ's help, into sharp contrast with his sin and frailty as a man. He was to deny his Master three times, but this denial was not to involve the loss of faith or to deprive him of his supernatural strength as the future rock of the Church. "Satan has sought for you [plural—i.e. the Apostles] to sift you as wheat, but I have prayed for thee [singular—i.e. for Peter] that thy faith may not fail, and thou, being once converted [when thou hast once turned to Me], strengthen thy brethren" (Lk. xxii. 31, 32). No intelligent reader can fail to notice the significant change of number here. Temptation is common to Peter with the other Apostles. Satan has "asked for" them all, that he may sift them by temptation and separate them like chaff from the wheat. But it is for Peter specially that Christ prays,

[1] "Rock" (צוּר) is constantly used as a title of God (see, e.g., Deut. xxxii. 4, "The rock—perfect is his work"; 1 Sam. ii. 2; Isa. xxx. 29; Ps. xviii. 32 (and so סֶלַע). Once only is God called a "stone" (אֶבֶן)—viz. in Gen. xlix. 24, "the shepherd, the stone of Israel." But probably we should point, with Ewald, Dillman, and others, רֹעֵה, "the shepherd of the stone of Israel," with reference to Gen. xxviii. 18 seq.; xxxv. 14, &c. Keil, Kalisch, &c., maintain the Masoretic reading.

[2] It has often been urged that Peter does not mean "rock," but "stone," πέτρα being the word for "rock." Sound scholarship will not support this distinction or the inference drawn from it. Christ calls Simon Πέτρος, not πέτρα, simply because πέτρα could not stand as a man's name. This is fully admitted by Meyer, one of the most eminent N.T. scholars—perhaps the most eminent who has appeared in our own time. He quotes, to show how commonly πέτρος occurs in the classics with the meaning "rock," Plato, Ax. p. 371; Soph. Phil. 272; O. C. 19, 1591; Pind. Nem. iv. 46, x. 126. "Christ," he says, "declares Peter a rock because of his strong faith in Him"; and again, "The evasion often taken advantage of in controversy with Rome—viz. that the 'rock' means, not Peter himself, but the firm faith and the confession of it on the part of the Apostle—is incorrect, since the demonstrative expression, 'on this rock,' can only mean the Apostle himself." We may add that Cephas (כֵּיפָא) is a common word in the Chaldee Targums for "rock"—e.g. "in the shadow of the rock" (Targ. on Isa. xxxii. 2. Other instances in Levy, Chaldäisches Wörterbuch). In the Syriac form it occurs very frequently in the Peshito, where it means, (1) "rock"; (2) "stone"; (3) "Peter." Thus, in the text before us (Mt. xvi. 18) we have the very same word for Πέτρος and πέτρα: "Thou art Cephas [ܟܐܦܐ], and on this Cephas I will build my Church."

[1] Usually, "binding" and "loosing" are taken to mean "retaining" and "remitting" sins. But "bind" and "loose" were the technical words with the Rabbis (see הִתִּיר אָסַר in Buxtorf, Lex. Chald. et Rabb.) for "prohibition and permission;" and it is very hard to see how Christ's words could have conveyed any other sense to His hearers.

because on him, the man of rock, on him and him alone, the faith of the Church depends. It is his peculiar office to strengthen his brethren. Even so determined a Protestant as Bengel admits that "this whole speech of our Lord presupposes that Peter is the first of the Apostles, on whose stability or fall the less or greater danger of the others depended (quo stante aut cadente caeteri aut minus aut magis periclitarentur)."

After the resurrection Christ graciously allowed St. Peter to atone for his threefold denial by a threefold declaration of love, and again, under a new metaphor, Christ committed to him the fulness of jurisdiction. Christ was, and ever is, the Good Shepherd, but in a few days His visible presence was to be withdrawn, and on earth Peter was to be chief shepherd of Christ's flock. "Feed my lambs." "Be the shepherd of My sheep" (perhaps "little sheep," προβάτια). "Feed my sheep" (perhaps προβάτια again). The Church was still Christ's flock ("my lambs," "my sheep"), but Peter is entrusted by Christ with the office of feeding both the old and the little ones of the flock. The duty of feeding the young and "the watchful care and rule over maturer Christians" (Westcott, ad loc.) are alike laid upon him. The gift of the Holy Ghost, the power of remitting and retaining sins, are bestowed on the other Apostles as well as upon St. Peter. But Peter alone receives the keys of the Church; he alone is the rock on which the Church is built; on the faith of him alone the faith even of the other Apostles depends; he alone is made the shepherd of the whole flock.

This primacy of Peter after Christ's ascension clearly manifests itself even in the scanty records of the New Testament, though it must not be forgotten that the personal infallibility of the other Apostles and the fact that they were free to extend their missionary conquests throughout the earth made their relation to Peter very different from that between the Pope and bishops of later times, who have no gift of infallibility and whose jurisdiction is confined to the limits of a particular diocese. Still, as has been said, the subordination of the other Apostles to Peter does evidently appear. At his instigation steps were taken to fill up the vacancy in the Apostolic College, and he laid down the rules of the election. "The punishment of Ananias and Sapphira, the anathema on Simon Magus, the first heretic, the first visiting and confirming the churches suffering under persecution, were all his acts. If he was sent with St. John by the Apostolic College to the new converts at Samaria, he was himself member and president of that college. So the Jews sent their high-priest Ismael to Nero: and St. Ignatius ('Philad.' 10, PG, v. 837) says that the neighbouring churches in Asia had sent, some their bishops, some their priests and deacons" (Döllinger, "First Age of the Church"). He was indeed the Apostle of the Circumcision, in this following Christ, who had said, "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (Mt. xv. 24), while St. Paul was the Apostle of the Gentiles (Gal. ii. 7). This, however, involved no more than a division of labour, and in no way derogated from St. Peter's position as chief of the Apostles and head of the whole Church. On the contrary, it was St. Peter who was taught by revelation "to call no man common or unclean," and who first publicly and solemnly opened the gates of the Church to the Gentiles by the baptism of Cornelius (Acts x.). St. Paul did not enter upon his peculiar office of preaching to the Gentiles till after his fifteen days' conference with St. Peter (Gal. i. 18), and this though he constantly insists on the fact that his doctrine and Apostolic authority came to him direct from heaven. About A.D. 51 an Apostolic council was held at Jerusalem to decide the controversy with the Judaisers. "Certain men coming down [to Antioch] from Judaea kept teaching the brethren, 'Unless ye are circumcised according to the custom of Moses, ye cannot be saved.'" It is often alleged that St. James's position in the assembly is quite inconsistent with St. Peter's primacy. The very contrary seems to be the case. No doubt St. James says (Acts xv. 19), "I judge"—i.e. "I give a decision for myself and my brother Apostles." But we cannot understand the history till we observe that there were two questions before the council: one a question of doctrine—viz. Is circumcision necessary for salvation? and then a question of expediency—What disciplinary decree will be most likely to promote peace between Jewish and Gentile converts? On the former question St. Peter pronounces authoritatively. He is the first to speak. He tells the assembly that God had ordained that the Gentiles should hear the Gospel "through my mouth," that God had "purified their hearts by faith," that He had made no difference between Jew and Gentile, that both were to be saved by the grace of Christ. Thereupon "the whole multitude was silent," and heard Paul and Barnabas recount their missionary experience (v. 12). St. James refers to and accepts St. Peter's doctrinal decision (v. 14), and proceeds to give his own judgment on the practical rules to be laid down—viz. abstinence from things offered to idols, things strangled, blood, &c. It was natural, on Catholic principles, that St. Peter should pronounce the doctrinal decision; it was also natural and fitting, in the circumstances, that St. James should give his judgment on the practical rules, for St. Peter and St. Paul were both parties in the dispute, already committed to the cause of freedom and spirituality; while, on the other hand, St. James, the head of the chief Jewish church, was just the man likely to conciliate the Pharisaic party. Further, in a famous passage (Gal. ii. 11), St. Paul says of himself that he "withstood Peter to the face, because he was condemned" (κατεγνωσμένος—i.e. "his conduct carried its own condemnation with it," Lightfoot, ad loc.). But there was no question of error in faith. St. Paul himself circumcised Timothy "because of the Jews who were in those parts (Lystra and Iconium)" (Acts xvi. 3). So St. Peter, when he went to Antioch, withdrew from eating with the Gentile converts and acted against the principles of Gospel liberty he had maintained at Jerusalem shortly before. This proves, no doubt, that St. Peter was capable of error in judgment and of vacillation. It is no argument against his primacy, nor does it show that he could teach the Church false doctrine, or cease to be the rock on which its faith is built. In short, the Gospels in plain and unmistakeable terms recount the divine institution of the Petrine primacy. There is nothing to contradict and something to confirm the Gospel view of Peter's primacy in the Apostolic records, and the natural exposition of Christ's words remains in its rights.

(2) The Pope in the Ante-Nicene Age.—It is the constant tradition of the earliest Christian writers that Peter held the first place among the Apostles. Tertullian ("Praescr." 22, PL, ii. 34; "Monog." 8) asserts that Peter is the rock on which the Church was built, and, again, that Christ left the keys to him and "through him to the Church" ("Scorp." 10), which last words exactly tally with the Catholic doctrine that Peter is the fountain-head of all spiritual rule and jurisdiction. Clement of Alexandria ("Quis Dives," c. xxi. p. 947) speaks of Peter as "the elect, the chosen one, the first of the disciples." Origen declares that Peter was "the great foundation of the Church, the most solid rock on which Christ founded" it, that he was "the prince of the Apostles" ("In Exod." Hom. v. PG, xii. 329; "In Luc." Hom. xvii.).[1] It is impossible to give in full all or nearly all the passages in St. Cyprian which express his belief in St. Peter's primacy, for he is never weary of asserting it. We may quote, however, the following words: "Peter, on whom the Church had been built" (Ep. lix. 7, ed. Hartel, p. 674); "One Church founded on Peter" (Ep. lxx. 3, p. 769); "Peter, to whom the Lord entrusted the feeding and the care of His sheep, on whom He set and founded His Church" ("De Habit. Virg." 10, 194); "One is the Church and founded on one, who also received its keys" (Ep. lxxiii. 11, p. 786): "Peter, on whom He built His Church and from whom He instituted and showed the origin of unity" (Ep. lxxiii. 7, 783). Cyprian has been sometimes understood to mean that St. Peter received his power as the representative of all; that he merely stood for the Apostles who were all one in dignity and jurisdiction. But the words just cited go far beyond this. Christ, according to Cyprian, did not merely show the unity by giving the keys to Peter alone, but He "instituted" the unity of the Church from Peter—i.e. He made the Church one by giving it one visible head. We may also refer to Ep. lxvi. 8, p. 732; Ep. xliii. 5, 594. It is true that in one of his letters (Ep. lxxi. 3, p. 773) Cyprian argues that the controversy on the validity of heretical baptism must be decided "by reason, not custom," and urges that even Peter, "whom the Lord chose as the first [quem primum elegit; Peter, of course, was not chosen first in order of time], and on whom He built His Church, when afterwards Paul disputed with him about the circumcision, made no arrogant claim or insolent assumption, so as to say that he held the primacy and that those who were new and had come later should rather give way to him; nor did he despise Paul because he had been previously a persecutor of the Church, but he admitted the counsel of truth and easily agreed to the good reason which Paul asserted." But St. Cyprian here is not denying St. Peter's primacy; on the contrary, he implies his belief in it. What he says is that St. Peter did not assert his authority on that occasion, and this simple statement of fact would be accepted by all. Cyprian's works ("Sentent. Episc." 17, p. 444) supply us with another testimony from one of his contemporaries and fellow-bishops to the general belief that Christ "built the Church on Peter." We conclude with another illustration, which has an interest of its own. The "Homilies," falsely ascribed to Clement of Rome, betray their Judaizing and heretical character in this among other ways, that they exalt the dignity of St. James, "the bishop of bishops," and of the Mother Church of Jerusalem. Yet even there we find St. Peter called "the foundation of the Church" (p. 10, ed. Dressel: p. 6, ed. Lagarde), "the firm rock which is the foundation of the Church" (Hom. xvii. 19; see also viii. 5).

St. Peter's connection with the Roman Church as its founder is proved by historical evidence which cannot be set aside, except by an extreme scepticism which would serve equally to undermine the historical character of the New Testament. The New Testament itself is silent about St. Peter's presence at Rome, except that St. Peter, in his first Epistle, sends greetings from the Church in Babylon (1 Pet. v. 13), which all ancient writers, with, so far as we know, only one late and insignificant exception (that of Cosmas Indicopleustes), understand to mean Rome. Many internal arguments from the N.T., ably stated by Döllinger ("First Age of the Church," p. 97 seq.), support this view. But, apart from this, we have abundant evidence from the earliest ages and from every quarter of the globe. Dionysius, bishop of Corinth (about 170), in a letter to the Roman Christians (apud Euseb. "H.E." ii. 25), mentions the fact that both the Corinthian and Roman Churches were "planted" by Peter and Paul (τὴν ἀπὸ Πέτρου καὶ Παύλου φυτείαν), and that both died as martyrs there at the same time. About 190, Irenaeus, bishop of Lyons, the disciple of St. Polycarp, who was the disciple of St. John, speaks ("Adv. Haer." iii. 3, PG, vii. 848) of the Roman Church as "greatest, most ancient, known to all, founded and constituted by the most glorious Apostles Peter and Paul." "Having founded and built the Church [of Rome], the blessed Apostles entrusted to Linus the administration of the episcopacy." Caius, a Roman presbyter under Zephyrinus (200–218), says: "I can point out the trophies of the Apostles. For if you will go to the Vatican or to the Ostian road, you will find the trophies of those who founded this Church" (Euseb. "H. E." ii. 25). A little later, the African Tertullian tells us ("Adv. Marc." iv. 5, PL, ii. 366) that Peter and Paul left to the Romans "the gospel sealed with their blood"; that Clement, bishop of Rome, was ordained by Peter ("Praescr." 32, PL, ii. 45); that at Rome Peter suffered like his Master ("Praescr." 36, PL, ii. 49). This early evidence from Greece, Gaul, Africa, and Rome itself is so certain and so sufficient that we do not care to dwell on evidence which is merely probable. The language of St. Ignatius, the disciple of St. John ("Rom." 4, PG, v. 809), as Bishop Lightfoot justly remarks (in his edition of Clem. Rom. p. 46), 'seems to imply that they [Peter and Paul] had both preached in Rome," and the preaching and death of the two Apostles there appear to have been the subject of a very early work, "The Acts of Peter and Paul" (see Hilgenfeld, "Nov. Test. extra Canonem Recept." fascic. iv. p. 68). Against this uniform tradition nothing can be advanced on the other side. It was this connection of Peter with Rome which made "the Chair of Peter" an accepted name for the Roman see. Thus Cyprian (Ep. lix. 14, p. 683) uses the following words of persons who had been concerned in the schism of Felicissimus and had gone to Rome: "They dare to sail to the see of Peter and to the chief church [ad ecclesiam principalem], from which the unity of bishops [unitas sacerdotalis] has arisen." The early Church thus believed in the primacy of Peter, and also held that the Roman Church is "the Chair of Peter."

Nor is direct testimony to the authority and supremacy of the Roman Church wanting. At the very beginning of patristic literature Ignatius describes the Roman Church as "presiding in the place of the region of the Romans," and again, as the Church "which presides over charity" ("Rom." ad init., PG, v. 801). Hefele, in his edition of the "Apostolic Fathers," takes this latter phrase to mean a presidence over "the whole congregation of Christians," who are bound together by charity, and this interpretation is defended at length by Hagemann ("Römische Kirche," p. 681 seq.). So too Duchesne: "Le sens le plus naturel de ce langage, c'est que l'Église romaine préside à l'ensemble des églises. Comme l'évêque préside dans son église aux œuvres de charité, ainsi l'Église romaine préside à ces mêmes œuvres dans la chrétienté tout entière." And he quotes Harnack as being of the same opinion (Duchesne, "Églises Séparées," p. 128). In any case the primacy of Rome over the Christian world is acknowledged, for had Ignatius meant to confine the primacy of the Roman Church to Rome itself, the assertion would have come to this, that the Roman Church presided over itself, which has no meaning. "Presides" (προκάθηται) is the very word which St. Ignatius uses (e.g. "Magnes." 6, PG, v. 764) to describe the authority of the bishop in his own diocese; and this acknowledgment is all the more important because it comes from one who was himself bishop of Antioch, which also could boast of its connection with St. Peter. Tertullian makes communion with the Apostolic Churches—i.e. the Churches founded by Apostles—the test of Catholic unity ("Praescr." 21 et passim, PL, ii. 33); but Rome alone he calls "the happy Church, into which the Apostles poured all their doctrine with their blood" ("Praescr." 36, PL, ii. 49). The words Tertullian wrote after his lapse into Montanist heresy disclose still more plainly the power claimed by the Pope in his day. For he ridicules the "peremptory edict" of Zephyrinus the Roman bishop and his pretence to speak as "bishop of bishops." "I want to know," he exclaims, "how you usurp this authority for the Church." [1] And at once he answers his own question by supposing that the Pope does so on the strength of the words, "On this rock I will build my Church," "To thee have I given the keys of the kingdom of heaven," "Whatsoever thou shalt bind or loose on earth, will be bound or loosed in heaven." (Tertull. "De Pudic." 21, PL, ii. 1025). But the most important testimony to the authority of Rome in the first ages of the Church is that of Irenaeus. He wrote the third book of his work against heresies, in which the words which we are about to quote occur, between 184 and 192.[2]

[1] I.e. for the Roman Church, because founded by Peter. "Idcirco praesumis et ad te derivasse solvendi et alligandi potestatem, id est ad omnem ecclesiam Petri propinquam."

[2] In iii. 21 he mentions Theodotion's version of the O.T., which was not published before 180 (see Field, Hexapl. Orig. tom. i. p. 38); and in iii. 3 he speaks of Eleutherus (177–190, according to Jaffé, Regest. Pontif.) as actual bishop of Rome. With the exception of a few fragments, the work of Irenaeus only remains in a Latin version. Massuet (Diss. ii. § 43), Lachmann (N.T. Graece et Latine, Praef. p. x), and Westcott (N.T. Canon, p. 280)

But he "is rightly included in what may be called the Apostolic family" (Newman, "Tracts Theological and Ecclesiastical," p. 200), for he was the disciple of St. Polycarp (Iren. ad Florin. apud Eusеb. "H.E." v. 20), who was the disciple of St. John. He had singular opportunities of knowing the mind of the Church throughout the world, for he was brought up in Asia Minor, he was bishop of Lyons, and twice at least he came into intimate relations with Rome. Irenaeus then appeals ("Adv. Haer." iii. 3, PG, vii. 848), in attacking Gnostic error, to the Apostles. They, he insists, had perfect knowledge, and delivered the truth in its fulness to the Church. He points out that different churches are able to trace back the succession of their bishops to the Apostles, and, since it would be tedious to enumerate all these churches, he has recourse to the Church of Rome, founded by "two most glorious Apostles, Peter and Paul." "Pointing to the tradition which this Church has received from the Apostles, to that faith which has been announced to the whole world, and which has come even to us by the succession of bishops," we confound all who err from the right way. "For with this Church, because of its more powerful principality,[1] every church must agree—that is, the faithful everywhere [2]—in which [3] [i.e. in communion with the Roman Church] the tradition of the Apostles has ever been preserved by those on every side." Then he enumerates the series of Popes, beginning with Linus. According to St. Irenaeus, the faithful all over the world must agree with the teaching of the Roman see, in which the tradition of the whole Church is virtually contained. This assent is due because Rome has the "more powerful principality," and this principality rests on the Apostolic dignity of the Roman Church, as the whole context shows. When Irenaeus wrote, general councils had not been dreamt of. It was from the Apostles, not from them, that the Roman Church derived her supreme power. Nor, again, does Rome depend upon the assent of the faithful; on the contrary, it is the faithful all over the world who are bound to agree with her. This passage has been the crux of Protestant theologians. For two centuries and more they have been devising a variety of interpretations, no one of which has found general acceptance even among themselves. Ziegler admits that the saint, "passing, as it were in prophecy, beyond himself, anticipates the Papal Church of the future," that he marks out Rome "as the chief seat of Apostolic tradition, as the centre which sustains and unites the whole Church." ("Irenäus," 1871, p. 151.)[1]

We cannot expect many instances of the exercise of Papal power at this time. Time was needed to develop the principles contained in the Apostolic tradition on "the Chair of Peter," and, besides, the hand of the persecutor was heavy on the Church. Still, indications of Roman supremacy are not wanting in the facts of early history. "The heretic Marcion, excommunicated in Pontus, betakes himself to Rome." "The Montanists from Phrygia come to Rome to gain the countenance of its bishops; Praxeas from Asia attempts the like." "St. Victor, bishop of Rome, threatens to excommunicate the Asian churches." "St. Stephen refuses to receive St. Cyprian's deputation, and separates himself from various churches of the East; Fortunatus and Felix, deposed by Cyprian, have recourse to Rome; Basilides deposed in Spain, betakes himself to Rome." "The presbyters of St. Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria, complain of his doctrine to St. Dionysius of Rome; the latter expostulates with him and he explains." (Newman, "Development," p. 157 seq.; cf. Duchesne, "Églises Séparées," p. 135.[2]) No doubt the early Fathers spoke and acted at times in a manner inconsistent with their own utterances elsewhere on Roman authority. This was perfectly natural, seeing that they had indeed the tradition of the Church, but not formal definitions or even a developed theological system to guide them. It would, of course, be a monstrous anachronism were we to attribute a belief in Papal infallibility to Ante-Nicene Fathers. Our contention simply is that the modern doctrine on Papal power is the logical outcome of patristic principles. It is another and a very different thing to say that the early Fathers themselves saw all this, and they were of course furthest from seeing it when they were irritated by an unwonted consider that the version was known to Tertullian, and therefore nearly contemporaneous with the Greek. Massuet's conclusion was contested by Sabatier (Vetus Italica, Praef. n. 93) and the Benedictine authors of the Histoire Littéraire de la France, vol. i. "S. Irénée," § 2. In any case, the fidelity of the Latin is admitted on all hands. The Syriac Fragments, published by Harvey in 1857, would prove this, "if a doubtful cause needed support" (Harvey's Irenaeus, vol. ii. p. 431).

[1] "Principalitas" can only mean "principality" or "supremacy." It occurs: iv. 38, "God holds the principality"; ii. 30, God "is above every principality and domination." In eight other places it is used of the supreme God of the Gnostics. So, i. 26, 1, "the principality which is above all," "the principality which is above everything." It is used—as we know from the Fragments of the original Greek preserved in Philosophum. x. 21; Theodoret, Haeret. Fab. i. 15—to translate αὐθεντία, "authority" or "supremacy."

[2] "Undique" = "ubique," as Thiersch and Stieren admit. Cf. iii. 24, 1, "Praedicationem ecclesiae undique constantem," with i. 10, 2, "Praedicatio veritatis ubique lucet."

[3] "In qua," "in which"—i.e. "in union with which," or "in the unity of which." Cf. "Salutem in eo dedit" (iii. 12. 4); "Quod perdideramus in Adam" (iii. 18, 1); and "In qua una cathedra [sc. Petri] unitas ab omnibus servaretur" (Optat. Schism. Don. ii. 2).

[1] The interpretation given in the text is that of the Gallicans Natalis Alexander, Bossuet, Massuet, and Ceillier; also of Döllinger, Church History, Engl. Transl. i. p. 256, and Friedrich, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, i. p. 409. Interpretations mutually destructive will be found in Salmasius, De Primatu, p. 65; Grabe, ad loc.; Neander, i. p. 259; Gieseler, i. p. 175.

[2] "Le centre d'une future orthodoxie était évidemment là (à Rome). Sous Antonin (138–161) le germe de la papauté existe bien caracterisé" (Renan, "Rome et le Christianisme," p. 153, cf. p. 172).

interference on the part of Rome or opposed to Rome in theological controversy. And it deserves to be carefully remembered that there is no counter-theory to be found in the Fathers of the Ante-Nicene age. The external unity of the Church is their constant theme. But if the see of Peter was not the centre of unity, then what was ? If two bishops anathematized and refused to communicate with each other, how were the faithful to know which of the two was in the unity of the Church ? If we do not take the chair of Peter as the centre of unity, then the Ante-Nicene Fathers supply no answer to the question. They never mention general councils or appeal to a majority of the bishops throughout the world. Yet, if each bishop is to be independent and subject to God alone, we should have a thousand Popes instead of one, and the unity of the Church would be shattered into pieces.[1] Our opponents may complain that the early Fathers do not speak fully enough on the authority of Rome, that their acts and dicta are occasionally inconsistent with Roman claims. They cannot say with any show of reason that the drift of patristic teaching tends to any definite theory of church unity, other than that of the Catholic Roman Church.

(3) The Fathers of the Fourth and Fifth Centuries.—Here the difficulty lies, not in finding proofs that Papal supremacy was asserted and recognized, but in selecting typical instances from the mass of evidence. "More ample testimony," says Cardinal Newman, "for the Papal supremacy, as now professed by Roman Catholics, is scarcely necessary than what is contained" in a series of passages which he quotes. ("Development," p. 148 seq.) "The simple question is whether the clear light of the fourth and fifth centuries may be fairly taken to interpret to us the dim, though definite, outlines traced in the preceding"—i.e. the Ante-Nicene age. The following are among the most striking passages in which the Fathers maintain not only that the Pope holds a supremacy of jurisdiction by divine right, but also that communion with him is the necessary condition of Catholic unity.

Optatus (lib. ii. c. 2, 3, PL, xi. 947): "You cannot deny that you know that in the city of Rome the episcopal chair was bestowed on Peter first, in which Peter, head of all the Apostles, sat, in which one chair unity was to be preserved (servaretur) by all, that the rest of the Apostles might not maintain each his own chair, that he might be at once a schismatic and a sinner who against the chair which stands by itself (singularem cathedram) set another." He then enumerates the Popes from Peter down to Siricius, the Pope of his own day.

The Council of Aquileia, in which St. Ambrose took a chief part, begs in a letter to the Emperor Gratian that he will "not permit the Roman Church, the head of the whole Roman world and that sacred faith of the Apostles, to be disturbed, because from it the rights of venerable admonition flow forth for all" (Hefele-Leclercq, ii. 52). St. Ambrose tells us ("De Excessu Satyri," i. 47, PL, xvi. 1306) that his brother, in places where the schism of Lucifer prevailed, if he doubted the orthodoxy of a bishop, asked him "if he communicated with the Catholic bishops, that is, with the Roman Church."

St. Jerome (Ep. 15, PL, xxii. 355) addresses these words to Pope Damasus: "Following none but Christ, I am associated in communion with your Holiness—that is, with the chair of Peter. On that rock I know the Church was built. Whosoever eateth the lamb out of this house is profane. If anyone is not in the ark of Noe he will perish when the floods prevail. . . . I know not Vitalis; I will have none of Meletius; Paulinus is strange to me. Whoso gathereth not with you scattereth; that is, he who is not on Christ's side is with Antichrist."

"Come, my brethren," says St. Augustine to the Donatists ("Ps. contr. Don.," PL, xliii. 30), "if you wish to be grafted in the vine. . . . Reckon up the bishops even from the very see of Peter. . . . That is the rock which the haughty gates of hell do not overcome." In 416 a council of sixty-eight bishops at Carthage, and of fifty-nine at Mileve in Numidia, condemned Pelagius, whose doctrine had been anathematized five years before in another council at Carthage. Each of the two last councils sent letters to Pope Innocent, begging that Apostolic authority might be given to their decrees ("Ep. Concil. Carthag." Galland. Epp. Innoc. 26; Hefele-Leclercq, ii. 183, 184). Another letter was sent to the Pope by Augustine and four other bishops, in which they tell him what had been done against Pelagianism. All these letters are full of deference to the Apostolic See, and the Bishops of the Council at Mileve tell the Pope that heretics were more likely to yield to his authority, which was "derived from the authority of Holy Scripture" ("auctoritati tuae ex scripturarum sacrarum auctoritate depromptae," Galland. Ep. 28). Innocent replied, commending them for following the old rule which prescribed that answers should come to all the provinces from the Apostolic fount. Before Rome spoke, but after the provincial councils, St. Augustine (Ep. 178) admits that "Pelagianism was not yet fully excluded from the Church." After the councils had been confirmed by Rome, after the rescript came, he thought that by the letters of Innocent "the whole doubt had been removed" ("Contr. Ep. Pelag." ii. 3, PL, x. 574). Pelagius himself had promised "to condemn all which that see [the Roman see] had condemned" (August. "De Peccat. Orig." 7). We need not dwell on the claims made by the Popes themselves. "The canons themselves have decided," says Pope Gelasius (492–6) writing to Faustus, "that no one whosoever shall appeal from this see, and so provide that it shall judge the whole Church and itself be judged by none. . . . Timothy of Alexandria, Peter of Antioch, Peter, Paul, John, not one, but many, bearing the episcopal name, by the authority of the Apostolic see alone, were cast down. . . . Therefore, we are in no fear lest the Apostolic judgment be reversed, to which the voice of Christ, tradition, and the canons have given the decision of controversy throughout the whole church." (Mansi, "Concil." tom. viii. 16 seq.) At an earlier date—viz. in the year 422—Pope Boniface had spoken of the Roman see as that "from which, if any divide himself, he becomes an outcast from the religion of Christ" (Galland. Epp. Bonifac. 14).

It may be objected that all this is Western evidence. But testimony quite as strong comes to us from the East. In 341 (or, as some think, 342) Pope Julius, with a synod of fifty Italian bishops (see Athanas. "Apol. contr. Arianos," ad init., and the epistle of the Synod of Philippopolis, Mansi, tom. iii. 130) restored two Eastern prelates, St. Athanasius and Paul of Constantinople, to their sees. "He" (Pope Julius), says the Greek historian Socrates ("H. E." ii. 15), "in accordance with the prerogatives of the Roman Church, established the bishops in outspoken letters, sent them back to the East, restored each to his own see, and laid his hand upon those who had rashly deposed them." Eustathius, bishop of Sebaste, was reinstated on producing a letter of restitution from Pope Liberius (Basil, Ep. 263, PG, xxxii. 980). Chrysostom and his persecutor Theophilus appealed to Pope Innocent. The latter also addressed himself to the Bishops of Milan and Aquileia, but that the appeal was made specially to Rome appears from the statement in a letter from Anysius, bishop of Thessalonica, who was a friend of Chrysostom's—viz. "that he abode by the judgment of the Romans" (ὡς ἐμμένει τῇ κρίσει τῇ τῶν Ῥωμαίων). See the life by Palladius, himself a contemporary of Chrysostom, cap. 3. But it is in the proceedings of the two great Councils of Ephesus and Chalcedon that Roman supremacy, with its divine sanction, shines forth most clearly. Cyril did not dare to break off communion with Nestorius till he had consulted Pope Celestine. He begged the Pope to declare his mind on this point (Mansi, "Concil." tom. iv. 1011 seq.). The Pope told his legates to act, not as disputants, but as judges (Galland. Ep. Cel. 17). The Fathers of Ephesus passed sentence on Nestorius, "compelled and constrained [ἀναγκαίως κατεπειχθέντες] by the sacred canons and the letter of our most holy Father and fellow-minister Celestine, bishop of the Roman Church." (Mansi, iv. 1207.) John of Antioch, after a schismatical resistance to Pope and council, returned to Catholic unity. Whereupon Sixtus III. reminds him that he has learnt by experience "what it is to think with us. Blessed Peter, in the person of his successors, has handed down what he has received. Who would wish to cut himself off from the first of the Apostles, taught by our master Himself?" (Galland. Epp. Sixt. III. Ep. 6.) The Fathers of Chalcedon acknowledge that the Pope had presided over the council through his legates "as head over the members," that the Pope "is appointed for all (πᾶσι καθιστάμενος) interpreter of the voice of Peter"; they say that "Dioscorus had dared to restore Eutyches to the dignity of which he had been deprived by his Holiness," and had "turned in his madness against him to whom the Saviour had entrusted the guardianship of the vine." They mention the 28th canon, and ask its confirmation, that "the establishment of good discipline (εὐταξίας), as well as of faith, might be attributed" to Leo. Finally, they gave an account of all that had been done to the Pope, "that he might confirm it" (εἰς βεβαίωσιν, Mansi, tom. vi. 148 seq.). Next year the Emperor Marcian wrote to Leo that doubts had arisen in the minds of many whether his Holiness had confirmed the decrees of the council (τὰ τυπωθέντα ἐβεβαίωσεν). One more instance and we have done. The Formulary or Libellus of Pope Hormisdas was signed in 519 by the Bishop of Constantinople, and imposed by the Byzantine emperor upon all the bishops within his dominions. It contains the following words: "Whereas the sentence of our Lord Jesus Christ cannot be set aside, in which He says, 'Thou art Peter, and on this rock I will build My Church'; the above words are confirmed by the effects, since in the Apostolic see religion has ever been preserved without stain. Anxious, therefore, by no means to be severed from his hope and faith, and following in all things the constitutions of the Fathers, we anathematize all heretics, especially Nestorius, &c. . . receive and approve all the encyclical letters of Pope Leo, which he wrote concerning the Christian religion. Whence, as we have said before, following in all things the Apostolic see, and proclaiming all its constitutions, I hope I may attain" (we are not responsible for the grammar) "to be with you in the one communion which the Apostolic see proclaims, in which is the perfect and true solidity of the Christian religion. (Mansi, tom. viii. 407; Hefele-Leclercq, ii. pp. 1024, 1052.) This Libellus was also approved by the Eighth General Council.

Such was the tradition of East and West, long before the forgery of the False Decretals, long before schism rent the Eastern patriarchates from the obedience due to the Holy See. With good right, therefore, did the Council of Florence define "that the Roman Pontiff is the successor of blessed Peter, prince of the Apostles; that he is the true vicar of Christ; that he is head of the whole Church, Father and doctor of all Christians; that to him [in the person of] blessed Peter was given full power of feeding, ruling, and governing the universal Church, as also [1] is contained in the acts of oecumenical councils and in the holy canons." It is necessary to bear in mind that all Catholics, Gallican as well as Ultramontane, accepted the belief that the Roman Church is the centre of unity, and that communion with her is the test of Catholicity. "The Son of God," says Bossuet, "since He willed that His Church should be one. . . . instituted the primacy of St. Peter to maintain and cement it." The chair of Peter "is the common centre of all Catholic unity." ("Exposition de la Foi Catholique," 21.) "The Catholic Church from her birth has had for a mark of her unity her communion with the chair of St. Peter, so that, remaining in it, as we do, without letting anything separate us from it, we are the body which has seen those who have severed themselves fall on the right hand and the left" ("Première Instruction Pastorale sur les Promesses de l'Église," n. 32). "We grant that in Church law there is nothing the Pope cannot do, when need requires it" ("Def." xi. 20). He looked on Archbishop Fénelon's submission to the Pope, who condemned his book, as a natural act of "ecclesiastical subordination," for "there is one chief bishop, there is one Peter appointed to guide all the flock, there is one Mother Church established to teach all the others; and the Church of Jesus Christ founded on that unity, as on an immovable rock, cannot be shaken" ("Relation des Actes et Délibérations" on Quietism, vol. xx. p. 505, in the edition of Bossuet, by Lachat, Paris, 1864).

(4) The Vatican Decrees.—In two important particulars the last council went beyond the principles accepted by Gallicans. First it defined that the Pope has not only "the office of inspection and direction," but also "the whole fulness of supreme power" in discipline as well as faith, and that this power is "ordinary and immediate over all and each of the pastors and of the faithful." This is in no way meant to derogate from the rights of bishops, or to make them mere delegates or vicars of the Pope. On the contrary, the council teaches that they too have "ordinary and immediate jurisdiction" in their dioceses, that they have been "placed by the Holy Ghost," that they have succeeded to the position of the Apostles," that they are "true pastors." It may be well to quote on this point two theologians whom no one will suspect of watering down the Ultramontane doctrine. Speaking of the allegation that Ultramontanes "consider the episcopate as the Pope's mere creation and vicegerent, just, e.g., as the Roman Congregations are," W. G. Ward replies that "every Catholic would repudiate such a tenet as erroneous and even heretical." (See Ward, "Essays on the Church's Doctrinal Authority," pp. 376, 377.) So again, Dr. Murray (author of the treatise "De Ecclesia," &c.) writes: "Christ established not episcopal order merely, but episcopal jurisdiction. That is, He ordained that there should be for ever in the Church, besides the universal pastor, pastors having particular flocks, with power to teach, legislate, inflict censures," &c., &c. The Pope may for a just cause withdraw jurisdiction from a particular bishop, but he cannot destroy the corpus episcoporum. Such is the true sense of the Vatican decree, and plainly it is in perfect harmony with the exposition given above of Christ's words to St. Peter, "Feed My lambs," "Feed My sheep." The whole flock and each member of it are given to St. Peter's charge. His successors draw their authority over each Christian from Christ Himself. The Pope, in virtue of his office, has direct power over each Christian in any particular diocese; the bishop of that diocese has the same power attached to his office, but the bishop must exercise it in union with and subordination to the Pope. There is no difficulty in supposing that superior and inferior may both have ordinary jurisdiction in the same place. Thus the ordinary right which the constitution might give a sovereign to try legal cases by commission would in no way make it impossible for the appointed judges also to exercise ordinary jurisdiction.

Next, the Vatican Council teaches "that when the Roman Pontiff speaks ex cathedrâ —that is, when he, using his office as pastor and doctor of all Christians, in virtue of his Apostolic office defines a doctrine of faith and morals to be held by the whole Church,

[1] "Quemadmodum etiam" (καθ' ὃν τρόπον) is now proved to be the true reading. It is found in the original copy signed by the Council (Milanesi, in the Giornale Storico degli Archivi Toscani for 1857, pp. 196–225; and Cecconi, in the Armonia Feb. 1870). It was in the "authentic" copy of the Colbertine library (Bossuet, Def. Cler. Gall. vi. 11); in the authentic copy of the Vatican (see the letter of Mamachius, Orsi, Rom. Pont. vi. 11); in the fifteenth century copies of the Vatican (Facsimiles in Civiltà, Feb. 5, 1870). Of these last, one has "etiam" written "et," whence probably the false reading "quemadmodum et" crept into the text of Blondus and obtained some currency in the printed copies. Bréquigny (Mémoires de la Société des Inscriptions, tom. xliii. 306 seq.) denies (against the authors of the Nouvelle Diplomatique, v. 315 seq.) that any of the four originals mentioned by Syropulus exist. He admits, however, that the MS. copy at Florence was made before the departure of the Greeks, so that in any case the question is completely settled.

he, by the divine assistance, promised to him in the blessed Peter, possesses that infallibility with which the Divine Redeemer was pleased to invest His Church in the definition of doctrine on faith or morals, and that, therefore, such definitions of the Roman Pontiff are irreformable in their own nature and not because of the consent of the Church" ("Pastor Aeternus," cap. 4). The Pope in himself is subject to error like other men; his infallibility comes from the Spirit of God, which on certain occasions, and under certain conditions, protects him from error in faith and morals. He has no infallibility in merely historical or scientific questions. Even in matters of faith and morals he has no inspiration and must use the same means of theological inquiry open to other men. He may err as a private doctor; nor is any immunity from error granted to books which he may write and publish. The Vatican Council only requires us to believe that God protects him from error in definitions on faith or morals when he imposes a belief on the Universal Church.

So understood, the Papal infallibility follows by logical consequence from principles already illustrated in this article and that on the CHURCH. Our argument is not addressed to Protestants. They must understand and accept the infallibility of the Church, and the position of the Holy See as the foundation of faith and centre of unity, before they can understand or accept the Vatican definitions. It is against the Gallican theory that we are arguing now, and we therefore take for granted the Catholic principles which Gallicans held.

We have seen that from the earliest times the faith of Peter and his successors has been taken as the foundation of the Church; indeed, so much is implied in Christ's words to the chief of his Apostles. Peter, says Bossuet, by his confession of Christ's Godhead "attracts to himself that inviolable promise which makes him the foundation of the Church. The word of Jesus Christ, which makes what He wills out of nothing gives such strength to a mortal. Let it not be said or thought that St. Peter's ministry ends with himself; that which is to serve as the support of an eternal Church can never end. Peter will live in his successors; Peter will ever speak in his chair; this is what the Fathers say, and 630 bishops at the Council of Chalcedon confirm" (Sermon à l'Ouverture de l'Assemblée-générale du Clergé). Now, if Peter and his successors are the foundation of an infallible Church, of a Church, moreover, unchangeable in constitution, they themselves must be infallible. If they were to impose a false belief on Christians, the faith and infallibility of the Church itself would be shaken.

Let us turn once again to Bossuet, and see how he expounds Christ's charge to Peter, "Confirm thy brethren." Christ, he says, "does not merely give a commandment to Peter individually": Peter receives "an office which [Christ] founds and institutes in His Church for ever." "There was always to be a Peter in the Church to confirm his brethren in the faith; it was the most fitting means of establishing that unity of sentiments which the Saviour desired above everything; and that authority was so much the more necessary for the successors of the Apostles, inasmuch as their faith was less stable than that of those from whom they sprang" (de leurs auteurs, "Méditations sur l'Evangile," lxxii.). But if the bishops are infallible because confirmed in the faith by Peter's successors, those who hold Peter's place must be themselves infallible. Further, if the see of Rome, which is by divine appointment the head of the Church and the centre of unity, solemnly and persistently made false belief a condition of communion, then one of two things must follow—either the body of the Church would accept the heresy which the Pope propounded and so forfeit its infallibility, or else would maintain the truth, and be left without the head and centre of unity given by Christ. Either consequence is a sheer impossibility on Gallican, no less than on Ultramontane, principles.

It must not be supposed for a moment that the Pope is an absolute monarch. He cannot, as we have already shown, annul the constitution of the Church ordained by Christ. His power of definition is limited by a multitude of previous definitions due to his predecessors, to the councils, to the ordinary exercise of the Church's magisterium through the pastors united to the Holy See.

(5) The Pope's Election; the Exercise of his Powers; Titles, &c.

(a) Rome and the Papacy.—As a matter of fact the Pope is and always has been Bishop of Rome, and, according to the common opinion, this connection between Rome and the Papacy exists by Divine law. According to others, however (e.g. Soto, apud Billuart "De Fide," diss. iv. a. 4), the Pope might choose another see, or might govern the Church without holding any special see at all.

(β) Papal Election.—In the first ages the Bishop of Rome was chosen, like other bishops, by the clergy and people, with the assent of the neighbouring bishops, and the person elected was consecrated by the Bishop of Ostia. The Christian emperors decided doubtful elections, while Odoacer and Theodoric the Great claimed the same right as kings of Italy. Felix III. was actually nominated by Theodoric, and other Italian kings received a sum of money for confirming Papal elections. After Justinian recovered Italy, the election of a new Pope was notified to the Exarch of Ravenna and confirmed by the Byzantine emperors. From the eighth century onwards the influence of the Eastern empire over Italy declined, and the Papal elections were disturbed by factions in the city. The canon in which Hadrian I. concedes the right of nomination to Charlemagne is spurious; still, as a rule, the election took place in the presence of commissioners from the Carlovingian emperors. After the deposition and death of Charles the Fat, the Papal elections became once more and for a long time an object of factious contention, till the Roman emperors began once again to exert their influence. The first German Pope, Gregory V., owed his nomination to imperial favour, and four German bishops were raised in succession to the Papal dignity by Henry III. The decree of Nicolas II. in 1059 marks a new era. The cardinal bishops [CARDINAL] were to elect, with the approval of the clergy and people, "saving the honour due to our beloved son Henry, who is now king and will be, as we hope, by God's favour, emperor according as we have already granted to him and his successors, who have obtained this right personally from the Apostolic See." Gradually the influence of the Roman emperors fell away, and the election rested in the hands of the cardinals alone, no distinction being made between the cardinal bishops and other members of the Sacred College. Something has been said on the present mode of election and the chief enactments on the subject in the article on CONCLAVES, and to this we refer our readers, adding, however, the following facts from Ferraris (art. Papa). Ecclesiastical and, as is commonly held, divine law, make it impossible for a Pope to nominate his successor. The election is in the hands of the cardinals. In the event of all the cardinals being dead, some think the right of election would pass to the Canons of St. John Lateran, others to the Patriarchs, others to a general council. The cardinals are not bound to choose one of their own body; a layman, and even a married man, may be lawfully elected. In modern times Austria, France, and Spain have been allowed to exclude any single candidate, provided they notify their objection before the election is made. This, of course, is a mere concession, not a right. Portugal and Naples have claimed to exercise the same power, but have never been allowed to do so. [See VETO.]

(γ) Coronation, &c., of the Pope.—If the newly-elected Pope is not already a bishop, he must first be consecrated as such. This ceremony sometimes takes place quite apart from the coronation (as in Clement XIV.'s case), sometimes in connection with it, either before (Gregory XVI.) or during the Papal Mass. Before consecration he is the Pope, the supreme head of the Church, able to decree, rule, name, or depose bishops, and exercise every duty of pontifical jurisdiction; but he cannot ordain or consecrate till he has himself received the imposition of hands from other bishops, inferior to himself, and holding under and from him their sees and jurisdiction. The coronation ceremony is performed at St. Peter's, according to a rite dating from the latter part of the fourteenth century. As the Pope enters the church a clerk of the papal chapel holds up before him a reed surmounted by a handful of flax. This is lighted; it flashes up for a moment and then dies out at once as the chaplain chants "Pater sancte, sic transit gloria mundi," "Holy Father, thus passeth away the world's glory." This is done three times. The Mass is begun as usual, but before the incensation of the altar the Blessing of the Pontiff-elect is pronounced by three cardinal bishops, each of whom recites a prayer over him. After the collects come the so-called Laudes, that is, the threefold supplications to God for the welfare of the new Pope. The coronation itself takes place after Mass in the balcony over the portico of St. Peter's, overlooking the great piazza. The second cardinal deacon takes off the mitre which until now the Pope has worn, and then the senior places the tiara on his head, whereat the people cry out Kyrie eleison. Either on the same day or shortly afterwards the Pontiff goes to take possession of St. John Lateran, receiving the homage of the Jews on his way. But since the occupation of Rome (1870) many of these ceremonies have been curtailed. The Pope reckons his pontificate from his coronation day, although of course he is Pope from the day of his election. (Wiseman, "Last Four Popes"; Thalhofer, Krönung, in "Kirchenlex.")

(δ) The Insignia of the Pope are the pedum rectum, or straight crosier; the pallium, which he wears constantly; the tiara, or triple crown. [See TIARA; CROSIER; PALLIUM; KISS.] He is addressed as "Your Holiness," "Beatissime Pater," &c., and he speaks of himself as "Servus Servorum Dei." [See the article.]

(ε) The Actual Exercise of Papal Power.—The Pope is Bishop of Rome, Metropolitan of the Roman province, the only real Patriarch in the West (see Hefele-Leclercq, i. 552 sqq., on the 6th Nicene Canon). Even these offices, as held by him, differ in this from the same offices as held by others—viz. that the Pope holds them without having to render an account of his administration to any earthly superior. No line of demarcation can be drawn between the Pope's exercise of Papal and Patriarchal power. The fulness of the latter is included in the former, and, as a matter of fact, the Pope for long did not exercise throughout the whole West the power which the Eastern Patriarchs wielded in confirming the election of bishops, &c. It is still true, however, that the Pope exercises more immediate power over bishops in the West, where there is no other Patriarch, than in the East, with Patriarchates of its own. We need not, however, consider here the Papal government in the East. The number of Greeks and Orientals who acknowledge the Pope's jurisdiction is very small, and enough has been said on the subject in other articles—e.g. in those on the various Eastern rites. We speak only of the Pope's power as exercised in the Latin Church, and we take as our guide Cardinal Soglia ("Institut. Juris publici Eccles." lib. ii. cap. 1).

The Pope, then, is the supreme judge in all controversies of faith, and he may, and does, exercise the power immediately or through the Sacred Congregations. Thus he may condemn or prohibit books, he may reserve to himself the canonization of saints, he may alter the rites of the Church in matters which are not essential. Often, on such occasions, the Pope, though exercising his supreme power, does not speak ex cathedrâ or claim infallibility. To him the supreme direction of discipline belongs. He may enact laws for the whole Church, and dispense from the common Church law. It is his duty to see that the canons are observed and to this end he may send legates and nuncios to distant provinces and receive appeals from all persons in all parts of the world. He reserves to himself the hearing of the "greater causes"—e.g. grave charges against a bishop. He can inflict censures, such as excommunication, on all Christians, and reserve to himself the power of absolving from certain sins. He alone can erect, suppress, and divide dioceses, translate or deprive bishops, and that without crime on their part, if the general good requires it; he alone can confirm the election of bishops or appoint coadjutors with right of succession. Bishops are required at various intervals to visit the limina Apostolorum and give an account of their ministry. Lastly, the Pope alone can approve new religious orders, and exempt them, if he sees fit, from episcopal jurisdiction.

(The brothers Ballerini, "De Primatu" and "De Potestate Summ. Pontif." are among the most useful books on the subject. But theologians and canonists without number have treated of it, and it would be vain to attempt an account of the literature in the space at our command. We may, however, mention Allies, "St. Peter, His Name and Office." The English reader will find the Patristic evidence given at length in Allnatt, "Cathedra Petri," and Waterworth, "The Fathers on St. Peter and his Successors." On the Anglican side Bishop Gore, "The Roman Catholic Claims," answered by Dom Chapman; Puller, "The Primitive Saints and the See of Rome.")

PORTEFORIUM (portean, portuary, portius, portuasse, porthoos, portfory) was the common word in England for the Breviary. Originally the name was meant to denote that the book was portable, but the original meaning was forgotten and the word used of copies, however large. The word is as old as Breviarium, and though of constant occurrence in English documents and literature, does not seem to have been known on the Continent. (Maskell, "Mon. Rit." vol. i. p. xcviii seq.)

PORTER. [See OSTIARIUS.]

PORTIUNCULA. This was one of the three churches, at or near Assisi, which were repaired by St. Francis. "The old little church, . . . like the holy chapel at Loreto, is enclosed in the middle of a spacious church, annexed to a large convent in the hands of Recollects or Reformed Franciscans; it is the head or mother house of this branch of the order."[1] Here, according to the common tradition (of which, however, there is no trace in the five oldest biographies of the saint), Jesus Christ appeared to St. Francis in 1221, and "bade him go to the Pope, who would give a plenary indulgence to all sincere penitents who should devoutly visit that church."[2] Two years later, Honorius III., at the request of St. Francis, granted the indulgence (commonly known in Italy as the "Pardon of Assisi"), confining it to the 2nd of August, and to the Church of the Portiuncula. Gregory XV. (1622) extended it to all the churches of the Observant Franciscans, including the Recollects or Reformed, between first Vespers and sunset on August 2. Innocent XI. (1678), in favour of the same churches, allowed this indulgence to be applied by way of suffrage to the relief of the souls in Purgatory. Finally, the indulgence of the Portiuncula can be gained in all churches in which the Third Order of St. Francis is canonically established (Moroni). The subsequent declarations of the Popes have removed all doubt as to the fact that the Portiuncula is a genuine indulgence which may be gained by the faithful on fulfilling the conditions. But the question of its origin is still doubtful. The silence of the early biographers has been attributed to opposition of the cardinals to so extraordinary a favour. (See Cuthbert, "Life of St. Francis of Assisi," Appendix ii.; Joergensen, "Saint François d'Assise," Appendice i. 503. Kirsch maintains that the indulgence was invented by the "spiritual section of the friars about 1288," "Der Portiuncula Ablass" in "Theol. Quartalschrift," 1906.)

PORT-ROYAL. [See JANSENISTS.]

POSSESSION, DEMONIACAL. A state in which an evil spirit, by God's permission, inhabits the body of a rational being. The devil is able in this way to torture the body, to deceive the senses by hallucinations, and indirectly, because of the connection between soul and body, to torture the soul, to impair and pervert its faculties. He cannot, however, inhabit the soul, for this is a power which belongs to God alone; much less can he master the free will and force the possessed person to sin. But he may increase to a fearful extent the power of temptation, overpower the body, and even produce insanity, in which last case the possessed person may of course commit actions outwardly sinful, for which he is not responsible. (Mt. viii. 28–34, Mk. v. 1–29; Lk. viii. 26–39.) In obsession (also called circumcessio) the devil attacks the man in an extraordinary manner from without—by presenting, e.g., phantoms to the senses—but does not inhabit the body or exert an abiding and immanent influence. [See ENERGUMEN; EXORCIST.]

POST-COMMUNION. A prayer or prayers, varying with the day, said after the priest has taken the ablutions. In the Gelasian Sacramentary it was always followed by a prayer over the people, and this is still the case in the Ferial Masses in Lent, when the Post-Communion is still succeeded by the "Humiliate capita vestra Deo" and the "Oratio super populum." All the Western liturgies conform in this part to the same type. The Ambrosian has a "Post-Communio"; the Gallican a "Collectio post communionem" and a "Consummatio vel ad plebem."

In the Mozarabic rite, however, the prayers after Communion are invariable. (Le Brun; Benedict XIV.; Hammond; Fortescue in "Cath. Enc.")

POSTIL. Originally, a note or commentary on a passage of Scripture, the derivation being, post illa verba textus. Since such commentaries often took a hortatory or homiletic form, the word postilla came to be used for a short sermon. The sense of "commentary" appears in the title of the celebrated fourteenth-century work of Nicholas de Lyra, "Postilla in universa Biblia." [GLOSSA ORDINARIA.] A verb postillare, "to compose a commentary," also came into use.

POSTULANT. (Postulare, to ask.) One who is seeking entrance into a religious order. In the art. NOVICE it has been shown that before being admitted to take religious vows a candidate must pass through a period of probation. The first stage of this probation, or rather a preliminary to it, is a short time spent in the religious house before the reception of the habit, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the candidate has the dispositions suitable for the order. This is the stage of "postulancy." If it is passed satisfactorily the postulant receives the habit and enters upon the stage of novitiate.

POVERTY. [See EVANGELICAL COUNSELS.]

POWER OF KEYS. [See PENANCE; EXCOMMUNICATION; POPE.]

PRAGMATIC SANCTION. By this term the mediaeval lawyers understood a solemn edict, adopted and published with every formality by the sovereign of a country, with the advice of his councillors and of the estates of the realm. To the English reader the name is chiefly familiar in connection with the celebrated instrument by which Charles VI., emperor of Germany, endeavoured to secure for his daughter Maria Theresa the peaceable succession to all the dominions of the House of Austria. Among Pragmatic Sanctions which have dealt with ecclesiastical affairs, three are specially noted. The first, which is ascribed to St. Louis (1268), grants many liberties and privileges to the Church of France. For an account of the second, passed at Bourges by Charles VII. (1438), see the articles GALLICANISM and CONCORDAT. The third (1446) preceded the concordat between Eugenius IV. and the German nation; on which see CONCORDAT.

PRAGMATISM. [See MODERNISM.]

PRAYER. One of the acts of the virtue of religion (see that art.). All intelligent creatures are bound to think about God and to hold converse with Him; in other words, to pray to Him. Prayer in this wide sense may be defined to be the raising of our minds to God: ἀνάβασις νοῦ πρὸς θεὸν, "ascensus mentis ad Deum." It may be either purely mental [see MEDITATION] or vocal, that is, expressed in language. The four great acts of prayer are Adoration (the acknowledgment of God's supreme majesty and our entire dependence upon Him), Thanksgiving, Petition, and, in the event of our having offended Him, Contrition. The third of these, Petition, is so important that the word prayer (precari) conveys this notion alone; and it is of this that we shall here chiefly speak.

The objections to prayer arise from two entirely opposite errors, chance and fate. If all that happens takes place without any kind of power to regulate it, or if everything is governed by rigid law which cannot be controlled, then of course it is useless to pray. But reason and revelation alike tell us that the world is ruled by the Providence of God. We firmly uphold the existence of law in the universe, but at the same time we maintain that God, the author of this law, can counteract, suspend, or change it at His pleasure. Thus we pray for rain, fine weather, or health because we believe that God is the Lord of heaven and earth, "Who worketh all things according to the counsel of His will" (Eph. i. 11; cf. Mt. v. 45; Acts xiv. 14–16). How God brings about the answers to our prayers cannot be exactly determined. The late W. G. Ward discussed the subject in a pamphlet entitled, "Science, Prayer, Free Will, and Miracles."

Prayer, being an act of religion, should be addressed to God. We pray to Him, not because He does not already know our needs, but because He wills that we should ourselves put them before Him and beg Him to grant them. Although our Lord said, "Your Father knoweth that you have need of these things" (Mt. vi. 32), yet He also told us "that we ought always to pray, and not to faint" (Lk. xviii. 1). It is God alone Who can give us what we ask for. This, however, does not prevent us from praying to certain of God's creatures. We ask God directly to grant us our petitions; we ask the Blessed Virgin, the angels, and the saints to ask God to grant them. "And the smoke of the incense of the prayers of the saints ascended up before God from the hand of the angels" (Apoc. viii. 4).

Should we specify our petitions, and, if so, what may we ask for? St. Thomas considers that the opinion of Socrates, that we should merely ask for what is good for us, is only partially true. Some things we know to be certainly good for us, and these we may specify: the Lord's Prayer contains a number of specific petitions. This being granted, the general rule is that laid down by St. Augustine: we may pray for whatever we may lawfully desire. Hence we may ask for even temporal blessings, not indeed for their own sake, but as aids to our spiritual welfare. According to the Apostle we should pray for all men (1 Tim. ii.). Charity bids us help our neighbour on the road to salvation, and prayer is one of the most potent means of doing so (1 Jn. v. 16; James v. 16; Rom. xv.). The order in which we should pray for others follows the order of charity, and depends upon their nearness to us and their needs. With regard to enemies, we are bound to pray for them in general—not excluding them from the benefit of our prayers. To pray for them specially belongs not to precept but to counsel (Mt. v. 44).

It is obvious that as prayer is a thinking about God and speaking with Him, it should be performed with great attention and devotion. Merely to utter the words is no prayer. "This people honoureth Me with their lips, but their heart is far from Me" (Mt. xv. 7). St. Thomas distinguishes three kinds or degrees of attention: to the words, to the meaning of the words, and to the objects of the prayer, that is, to God and what we pray for. It is the last kind that is required. To keep one's attention fixed on an unseen object is difficult, and consequently we are very liable to mind-wandering when we pray. But if our distractions are not wilful—if whenever we recollect ourselves we try once more to fix our attention on God—our prayer is not altogether unfruitful. To be wilfully distracted would be sinful. The best plan is to collect our thoughts for a few moments before kneeling down. "Before prayer prepare thy soul, and be not as a man that tempteth God" (Ecclus. xviii. 23). The various degrees of prayer are spoken of in the article on MEDITATION. (See St. Thomas, $2^a\ 2^{ae}$, q. 83, and the well-known little work of St. Alphonsus, "On Prayer." The subject is treated in all ascetical writings.)

PRAYER, APOSTLESHIP OF. An association founded in 1844 by the Jesuits at Vals, in the diocese of Puy. The Popes have shown their approval of its spirit and work by many briefs and privileges. According to the statutes granted by Leo XIII., in 1892, its canonical constitution is as follows: The Apostleship of Prayer is a work of piety, by means of which the faithful endeavour to enkindle in themselves and others zeal for prayer, according to the desire and after the example of the most Sacred Heart of Jesus, "always living to make intercession for us." In order to attain the end proposed, the associates may most profitably employ not only prayer but also all other sorts of good works, such as the frequent reception of the sacraments, &c. To gain the indulgences, the associates must add to their morning prayers an offering of all the prayers, works, and sufferings of the day for the intention with which our Lord Jesus Christ offers Himself in the Holy Sacrifice of the Altar. The work of the association is governed by a general director, who is named by the Superior-General of the Society of Jesus. The general director may, in different countries, appoint diocesan directors with the consent of the respective ordinaries, whose jurisdiction must always be scrupulously respected. No one has power to receive new members except the local directors and promoters, who possess diplomas issued by a diocesan director. For further information see a pamphlet entitled "What is the Apostleship of Prayer?" The organ of the association is the "Messenger of the Sacred Heart."

PREACHERS, ORDER OF. [See DOMINICANS.]

PREACHING. Christian preaching began with our Lord Himself, who entrusted the continuation of the work to His Apostles. At first the Christian congregations were instructed not only by "teachers" in the common acceptation of the term, but also by "prophets," to whom the counsels of God were revealed in an extraordinary manner—a gift which might include a knowledge of the future, though this was not necessarily the case. Later, the Fathers speak of preaching as a chief part of the bishop's office. In Africa, till St. Augustine's time, it was not usual for priests to preach ("Vita Possid." 5, PL, xxxii. 37), and this was also the case in the time of Socrates ("H.E." v. 22) at Alexandria. On the other hand, Origen preached in Palestine while only a layman, or at least not a priest (Euseb. "H.E." vi. 19). Even in the African Church preaching by laymen, at the request of the clergy, became a permitted use (laicus praesentibus clericis nisi ipsis rogantibus docere non audeat, c. 98 of the so-called Concil. Carthag. IV. anno 398). According to a well-known statement of Sozomen ("H.E." vii. 19)[1] sermons had not been preached at all in the Roman Church till the middle of the fifth century, but possibly the truth is that down to St. Leo's pontificate there had been no great preacher or formal sermons in the Greek style at Rome. The preacher sat during his sermon; the people sometimes sat, sometimes stood. Sermons were delivered on Sundays and feasts, and Chrysostom's homilies on Genesis prove that sermons were delivered daily in Lent. In the East sermons were often very long. Chrysostom's discourse lasted sometimes for two hours. In the West they were generally short. Chrysostom, the two Gregories, Basil in the East, Ambrose, Augustine, Leo, Gregory the Great in the West, were the great preachers of the Patristic period.

For a long time they had no successors who came near them in eloquence. The Synod of Mayence in 847 (c. 2) requires each bishop to have a book of Latin homilies, and turn them "in linguam rusticam Romanam aut Theotiscam" (German) for the good of the people. Peter Damian in the eleventh, and St. Bernard in the twelfth century, were conspicuous preachers. A new era began with the rise of the mendicant orders. Tauler, Suso, in the fourteenth century, St. Vincent Ferrer (d. 1419) and Savonarola in the fifteenth, Louis of Granada in the sixteenth, were Dominicans; Bernardine of Siena and John Capistran in the fifteenth were Franciscans; John of Avila (d. 1569), a secular. Enormous crowds surrounded the great preachers of the later middle age, and sometimes persons actually died from the emotion which the sermon awoke in them.

Important regulations on preaching were enacted by the Council of Trent (sess. v. De Reform.; sess. xxiv. De Reform. cap. iv.). The council teaches that preaching is the "principal office of bishops," and requires bishops, parish priests, and all who have the cure of souls, to preach personally, or in case of lawful impediment by deputy, at least on Sundays and solemn feasts. Further, during the fasts, and particularly during Advent and Lent, the bishop is to provide sermons daily, or at least three times a week. Regulars preaching in their own churches must first be examined and approved by their superiors and must seek the bishop's blessing, nor are they to preach even there against the bishop's will. In other churches they cannot preach without episcopal licence. Bishops are to warn the faithful that they are bound to hear the word of God in their own parish church, if they can do so without inconvenience. The sermons are to be short and simple, and of a practical character.

We can only mention a few of the great preachers of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, the golden age of preaching. In France the names of Bossuet, Bourdaloue (1632–1704), Massillon (1663–1742) will occur to all. De la Colombière, S.J. (d. 1682), and Fléchier, chiefly remembered for his funeral orations (d. 1710), are prominent in the second class. In Italy the great preacher was the holy Jesuit Segneri (d. 1694); in Portugal, Vieira, also a Jesuit (d. 1697). In the 19th century the great preachers have been the Italian Theatine Ventura, and in France the Jesuit Ravignan, the great Dominican Lacordaire, and Mgr. Dupanloup. The Germans have never reached the level of French or even of Italian eloquence. Still, Veith, who preached at Vienna, Cardinal Diepenbrock and Forster, bishops of Breslau, the Jesuit Father Roh and others, have won high reputation. In the English-speaking countries we have had Wiseman, Newman, Manning, and the Dominican Father Tom Burke. (The latter part chiefly from Kraus, "Kirchengeschichte." See also Beecher in "Cath. Enc."; Keppler in "Kirchenlex." The manuals of Pastoral Theology usually have some chapters on the subject.)

PREADAMITES. The first author of the Preadamitic system, as Zaccaria calls it, is said to have been Giordano Bruno, a Dominican (who abandoned his order and the Catholic religion), though there are traces of it in Rabbinical writers. It was developed by a French Calvinist, Isaac de la Peyrère, in a book entitled "Praeadamitae, sive Exercitatio super versibus 12, 13, et 14, cap. v. Epist. ad Rom., quibus inducuntur primi homines ante Adamum conditi," in the year 1655 (not 1652 as Calmet has it). He held that Adam was the progenitor of the Jews only, and that the Flood, which was local merely, did not destroy the nations who had inhabited the earth long before Adam's creation. He appealed, e.g., to the words of Cain, Gen. iv. 14, "Every one who findeth me will kill me," to Cain's building a city, to the impossibility of supposing that the Antipodes were peopled in prehistoric times from Asia, &c., &c. Peyrère became a Catholic, and retracted his system, which cannot be reconciled with the Catholic doctrine of original sin, at Rome ("ad Philotimum Ep.") in 1657. He died with the Fathers of the French Oratory in 1675, aged 82. (Zaccaria, "Prolegom. in Petav. de Op. Sex Dierum." The dogmatic theologians treat of Preadamism in connection with Creation. See also Reusch, "Bibel und Natur," 437.)

PREBEND (Lat. praebenda). The term is probably derived from the daily rations issued to soldiers. A prebend is the share in the revenues of a chapter [CHAPTER, CATHEDRAL] or collegiate church, enjoyable by each canon or prebendary. The latter are not strictly members of the chapter, though entitled to a share in its funds. A capitulary of Charlemagne orders that no canon should hold a benefice along with a prebend; those found doing so were to be deprived of both. When the common life of canons was generally discontinued, in the course of the tenth century, a division was made of the Church revenues into episcopal and capitular, and each canon enjoyed his share of the latter, which was still called his prebend, together with—at least in the case of the senior members of the chapter—a prebendal residence. (Ferraris; Smith and Cheetham; Taunton; "Kirchenlex.")

[1] οὔτε δὲ ὁ ἐπίσκοπος οὔτ' ἄλλος τις ἐνθάδε ἐπ' ἐκκλησίας διδάσκει. Valesius, in his note on the passage, quotes Cassiodorus, who had lived at Rome, as witness to the same fact.

PRECENTOR. The religious, or the canon, who in a cathedral, collegiate, or monastic church has the chief charge of the choral service. The word corresponds to the French "chantre," Lat. cantor. The precentor in a monastery "presided over the singers, choristers, and organist, and instructed the monks to sing, chant, and read. His place was in the middle of the choir, on the right side; he began the chant first, and corrected all mistakes and irregularities; he made provision for writing the tables of the monks, keeping the Liber diurnalis or chapter-book, reading the martyrology, and announcing the anniversaries; he arranged the processions, superintended the education and correction of the novices, and had charge of the books, presses, and furniture of the choir. He also provided parchment and ink for the writers, colours for illuminating, and materials for binding the books" (Yates's "History of the Abbey of St. Edmund's Bury," p. 198).

PRECIOUS BLOOD. (1) Relics.—Beyrout, Bruges, Saintes, the imperial monastery of Weingarten, the English monasteries of Ashridge and Hailes, have claimed to possess relics of the Precious Blood (Faber, "Precious Blood," p. 294). St. Thomas says (3ª, q. 54, a. 2) that all the particles of blood which Christ shed in His Passion were reassumed by Him in His resurrection, "but that blood which is kept in some churches as relics did not flow from Christ's side, but is said to have flowed miraculously from some image of Christ when struck"—i.e. it never was the blood of Christ at all. Observe, the saint makes no exception, and speaks doubtfully of the supposed miracles. Benedict XIV. ("De Fest." § 374) admits the possibility that some particles of Christ's blood may not have been reassumed, and may remain as relics. In this case they are not united to the Godhead, and it would be the crime of idolatry to give them divine worship.

(2) Confraternities.—F. Faber mentions a very ancient one at Ravenna; one at Rome erected under Gregory XIII. and confirmed by Sixtus V., afterwards merged in the confraternity of the Gonfalone. Its members were priests and preached missions. An arch-confraternity was set up in the church of San Nicolò in Carcere by Albertini, bishop of Terracina, and Bufalo, canon of San Marco under Pius VII. A confraternity was founded at St. Wilfrid's, in Staffordshire, in 1847, and transferred to the London Oratory in 1850.

(3) Orders.—There was a Cistercian congregation of nuns, entitled Bernardines of the Precious Blood, at Paris in the middle of the seventeenth century. Bufalo, who died in 1837, founded a congregation of Missioners of the Precious Blood, and another congregation of Nuns of the Precious Blood. (See Faber, "Precious Blood," c. vi.)

(4) The Feast was instituted and fixed for the first Sunday of July by Pius IX. after his return from Gaeta. In the new Calendar it is kept on the first day of July. There was formerly a Mass and office for the Friday after the fourth Sunday in Lent.

PRECONIZE (praeco, a public crier). When the preliminary inquiry at Rome, required by the Council of Trent and several Papal constitutions in the case of those nominated to the higher ecclesiastical dignities, has terminated favourably for the person designated, a report to that effect is made in secret Consistory by the Cardinal Protector of the nation to which the candidate belongs, and after the cardinals present have all given their opinions on his eligibility, the Pope—if the majority be in his favour—pronounces his solemn approbation of the appointment. This approbation is termed the "preconization," and the Pope is said to "preconize" the archbishop, bishop, or other dignitary, whose cause has been brought before him. The approbation is posted up ad valvas ecclesiae, and a bull of preconization is expedited to the candidate. [See BISHOP, § iv.]

PREDELLA. The highest step of the sanctuary, on which the altar stands.

PREDESTINATION. St. Augustine's definition—viz. "God's prevision and preparation of benefits by which those who are freed [i.e. from eternal death] are most certainly freed" ("De Dono Persev." cap. 14, PL, xlv. 1014)—is generally accepted by Scholastic theologians. They are all[1] agreed that God predestinates from all eternity the number of elect, that He bestows the grace needed to obtain eternal life without any respect to merits on their part, either before or after grace is conferred, so that life eternal is His free gift; and, on the other hand, that no adult enters heaven except because he has of his own free will corresponded to the grace of God, and none are lost eternally except by the perversity of their own will, since God sincerely desires all men to come to the knowledge of the truth and be saved. But if we ask why, seeing God gives grace enough to all, and desires the salvation of all, some are saved, others reprobate, theologians give different answers.

[1] An exception, apparently, should be made of Catharinus, quoted by Petavius, and of Pighius, of whom something is said by Schneemann. Both seem to graze Semi-Pelagianism.

(1) According to the Thomists, "God's purpose of efficaciously conducting some rather than others to salvation has no reason on our part, but depends entirely on God's mercy and free will" (Billuart, "De Deo," diss. ix. a. 4). To those who are predestinated God gives grace efficacious in its own nature, and so orders it that they die in His grace; to others He gives grace which is merely sufficient [see the article on GRACE], and to which, as a matter of fact, nobody corresponds, though all have the power of doing so.

(2) A large number of Jesuit theologians, known as Congruists, hold, like the Thomists, an absolute predestination to glory, irrespective of merits foreseen. God gives to the predestinate the same grace as to the reprobate; but to the former in circumstances under which He foresees they will accept it, to the latter in those under which He foresees they will not do so. Such was the opinion of Suarez (after his return to Spain), of Bellarmine, Antoine, and many others. A decree of the Jesuit general Aquaviva made it the recognized teaching of the society, but the decree seems to have been practically inoperative. (See Schneemann, "Controv. de Div. Gratiae Liberique Arbitrii Concord." cap. 16.)

(3) A large number of Jesuits—e.g. Toletus, Maldonatus, Lessius, Vasquez, Valentia, and Suarez, while he taught at Rome (so Schneemann, loc. cit.)—admit that predestination to grace, but deny that predestination to glory, is irrespective of merit foreseen. God decrees, they say, to give grace to all, and predestinates those who, as He foresees, will correspond to it, the rest being reprobate.

It is to be carefully observed that the Thomists admit, just as much as Lessius, that God desires the salvation of all, and gives all sufficient means of attaining that end. Whether their theory is logical and consistent is another question, and one on which the Church has never pronounced. It is a matter of philosophy and logic rather than of faith. On the other hand, no Catholic may hold with Gottschalk, a German monk of the ninth century, or with Calvin in later times, that God willed the salvation of the predestinate alone, so that the reprobate perished necessarily.

The history of patristic opinion is given with his usual fulness of learning and critical discernment by Petavius ("De Deo," libb. ix. and x.). Augustine most certainly held and constantly asserted predestination not only to grace but to glory without respect to merits foreseen. (See, e.g., a decisive passage, "De Correptione et Gratia," cap. vii., PL, x. 923.) Nobody, says Petavius—who was himself of the contrary opinion on the theological question—nobody could doubt this unless "blinded by party spirit" (loc. cit. cap. vi.). But the same great scholar shows how very different the opinion of the Greek and earlier Latin Fathers was; and Augustine, though he rightly exercised a mighty influence on the subsequent Church, has no claim to represent the whole of her tradition. (See GRACE; St. Thomas, 1ª, q. 23; Ruiz, "De Praedestinatione et Reprobatione"; the dogmatic theologians "De Deo," "De Gratia," e.g. Franzelin, "De Deo Uno," p. 598 sqq.; Scheeben-Atzberger, "Dogmatik," iv. 244.)

PREFACE. A prelude or introduction to the Canon of the Mass, consisting in an exhortation to thanksgiving made by the celebrant, in the answers of the minister or choir, and a prayer ending with the Sanctus, in which God is thanked for His benefits. In our missals the title "Canon Missae" now stands after the Sanctus, but the whole Preface is really part of the Canon. "Originally it was counted as such. In the Gelasian Sacramentary the rubric 'Incipit canon actionis' stands before 'Sursum corda.' The reason of this is plain. The Canon is one long prayer, the Eucharistic prayer (Prayer of Consecration). In accordance with the fact that our Lord at the Last Supper took bread and wine and gave thanks, in all rites this prayer is in the form of a thanksgiving." (Fortescue, "The Mass," p. 315.) The Greeks have only one Preface, which in the Clementine liturgy is extremely long. The Gallican and Mozarabic rites, on the other hand, are rich in Prefaces, and so originally was the Roman liturgy, which from the sixth till about the end of the eleventh century had a special Preface for nearly every feast. About 1100 the number was reduced in most churches of the Roman rite to ten—viz. the common one, found in nearly all the ancient Sacramentaries, and nine others named in a letter falsely attributed to Pelagius, predecessor of St. Gregory, and cited in the "Micrologus," &c.—viz. the Preface of Christmas, Epiphany,[1] Lent, Easter, Ascension, Pentecost, the Trinity, the Apostles, the Cross. Urban II. is said by Gratian, who lived fifty years later, to have added the Preface of the Blessed Virgin in 1095. The Sarum Use had "proper Prefaces" for the "Conception, Nativity, Annunciation, Visitation, Veneration, and Assumption of the Blessed Virgin." "The York Use added another for the days between Passion Sunday and Easter. The Hereford appointed the same Preface from Palm Sunday to Easter." (Maskell; the rest of the article is from Le Brun and Hammond. See also Fortescue, "The Mass," ch. viii.)

PRELATE (praelatus). A general name for an ecclesiastical dignitary, whether among the secular or the regular clergy, who has a jurisdiction inherent in his office, and not merely one transmitted to him as the delegate of a superior. The designation is extended in a wider sense to the prelates of the Pope's Court and household, as having a superiority of rank.

Prelature, or prelacy, is the status of a prelate. When the first Scotch Presbyterians raved against "Popery, Prelacy, and Erastianism," prelacy in their mouths was not exactly equivalent to "episcopacy"; they meant that they were in rebellion against canon law and ecclesiastical jurisdiction. It is true that they erected a new jurisdiction, far more burdensome and inquisitorial than the old one; on which see Buckle's "History of Civilisation," vol. ii. chap. v. (Ferraris, "Regularis Praelatus"; Taunton.)

PREMONSTRATENSIANS. This celebrated order of regular canons was founded by St. Norbert in 1119, at a place called Prémontré (that is, "foreshown"), a lonely valley in the forest of Coucy, near Laon. Several other sites had been offered to the saint in vain; but as soon as he saw this valley he said "Here is the place which the Lord hath chosen." A monastery was built, which remained the mother house of the order till the French Revolution; it is now in ruins. St. Norbert was soon joined by thirteen companions, to whom he gave the rule of St. Austin to observe, with certain constitutions framed by himself. The habit of the Norbertines was white; hence they were commonly called in England the White Canons. Their founder imposed on them perpetual fasting, and an entire abstinence from meat; but, as in other orders, mitigations after a time crept in, followed by a general relaxation, which in its turn led to several remarkable reformations. The Abbot-General at Prémontré exercised a general supervision over the whole order down to 1512, when all the abbeys in England and Wales were subjected to the Abbot of Welbeck. There were at one time, according to Hélyot, a thousand Premonstratensian abbeys, many provostships and priories, and five hundred houses of nuns. In England, at or shortly before the Dissolution, there were thirty-four houses; the names are given below.[1]

Lecuy, the last abbot of Prémontré, was a man of exceptional force and nobleness of character. Driven from his abbey in 1790, he bore his unbent and undishonoured head through all the mournful or shameful scenes of the Revolution, and, living far on into the next century, died in his ninety-fourth year in 1834. A few months before his death, the old man compiled a short tract on the history of his order; from these touching and simple pages the reader will thank us for making the following extract:—

"Of this illustrious order, once so widely extended, the débris only are left. Its impoverishment began with the English schism.[1] The Reformation caused it yet further losses by the suppression of a great number of houses in the countries which embraced it. The abbeys in Spain, about 1573, separated themselves from the body of the order in order to form a congregation apart, retaining, however, the habit and the statutes. Under the Emperor Joseph II., other suppressions took place in the hereditary provinces; still, besides the French abbeys of either observance, which numbered before 1789 about one hundred, there remained in Belgium and different parts of Germany some very fine establishments, distinguished by their regularity and love for ecclesiastical learning. Notably, Swabia, where the abbots were prelates of the empire, had lost nothing; and in spite of so many suppressions the order of Prémontré might still be called flourishing. At the Revolution all the French houses suffered the fate of other ecclesiastical institutions, enveloped in a common proscription. The invasion of Belgium by revolutionary armies extended to that country the measures of destruction taken in France; what the order still possessed in Germany perished along with the great sees and rich endowments of the German Church, sacrificed to a system of indemnities, at the time of the formation of the Confederation of the Rhine. Of the splendid heritage of St. Norbert, subject to the crosier of Prémontré, there remained in 1805 ten abbeys, of which two, in Prussian Silesia, had been till then religiously maintained by the kings of Prussia, though Protestants. It was but natural, when the Catholic princes seized the property of religious, that those who were not so should follow their example, and these two abbeys ceased to exist."

There are abbeys in Belgium, Holland, Austria, Hungary, and a few houses in England and in the United States.

A community of French Premonstratensians has been established at Storrington, in Sussex, on land given by the Duke of Norfolk. (Hélyot and his continuator; Dugdale's "Monasticon.") by the king and parliament of England to check evasions of the existing statutes against provisors—i.e. persons appointed to English benefices or dignities by Papal provision. The Holy See had employed various means, including excommunication or the menace of it, for the protection of persons whom it had "provided" to benefices, and for the punishment of all who might interfere with them. On this account a severe penal clause was inserted in the above-mentioned statute, to the effect that if any man should pursue or obtain in the court of Rome excommunications, bulls, or other things, against the king's crown and regality, or bring them into England, or receive or execute them, "such person or persons, their notaries, procurators, maintainers, abettors, fautors and counsellors, shall be out of the king's protection, their goods and chattels, lands and tenements, shall be forfeited to the king, and their persons attached wherever they may be found."[1] Execution of process under this statute was by means of a writ called of "Premunire"—from the first words, "Premunire [praemonere] facias"—whence in time the statute itself was so called. (Stephen, "Commentaries," book vi. ch. vi.)

PRESBYTERA. The wife of a presbyter, especially a wife who had come under the operation of the rule which rendered the continence of clerics necessary. The position of such persons is dealt with by the canons of the Council of Tours (567). In these cases the presbytera usually went into a convent, but without taking the habit. (Smith and Cheetham.) The word is also used for aged widows who devoted themselves to the service of the altar; and in the Greek Church it is applied to superiors of convents of women (Ducange).

PRESBYTERIANS, SCOTTISH. The doctrine and discipline of Presbyterians, founded upon the teaching of Calvin and his management of ecclesiastical affairs at Geneva, were perhaps embraced as early in England as in Scotland, for Christopher Goodman, an Englishman, was associated with Knox when they were both in exile in Mary's time, and sat in the First General Assembly held at Edinburgh. But since the form of Protestantism which first prevailed in England and supplanted the Catholic Church there was that of the English episcopalian reformers [see ENGLISH CHURCH], and Presbytery did not rise into importance until much later, we shall here almost confine our remarks to the subversion of Catholicity in Scotland, and the introduction of new ecclesiastical arrangements in its place.

Before the destructive fanatical outbreak which is associated with the name of John Knox, the Catholic Church in Scotland had thirteen sees—of which two, St. Andrews and Glasgow, were metropolitan—and upwards of 100 monasteries, large and small. Of these, nineteen belonged to the Austin Canons; the magnificent establishments of Holyrood, Jedburgh, Scone, and St. Andrews were among the number. The Franciscans had thirteen houses, the Dominicans eleven, the Cistercians ten; among these last were the abbeys of Melrose and Newbattle. The Benedictines had nine or ten abbeys and cells, including Dunfermline, Arbroath, and Lindores. Among the six Premonstratensian houses was Dryburgh, the ruins of which still charm the traveller by their incomparable grace. The rest were distributed among the other orders. That the Scottish clergy, both secular and regular, stood greatly in need of reformation is an indisputable fact; but how far corruption had gone is a point which cannot be easily determined. If we attach credit to the rhetoric of Knox and his followers, we must believe that the whole clerical body in Scotland, with scarcely an exception, was stained with avarice and conscious hypocrisy, and sunk in gross immorality, sloth, and gluttony. But the interest which these men had in making such assertions believed would make us suspend our belief in them, even if there were no rebutting evidence. On the whole there seems good reason for accepting on this subject the contemporary testimony of Bishop Lesley.[1] The Bishop of Ross says that some of the bishops had been for a long time past engaged in political and diplomatic business, and that others lived too freely (liberius viverent), forgetting their sacred functions, so that the whole hierarchy had become lowered in popular esteem. The pernicious system of holding abbeys in commendam was in full vigour; thus Lord James Murray, a bastard son of James V., was commendatory abbot of St. Andrews. As to the priests and monks, Lesley declares that most of them, in either order, were persons of piety and virtue; but he adds that there was one vice—licentious living—of which many of them, and another—great negligence in preaching—of which nearly all were guilty. He mentions it as a deplorable circumstance that the people had not been provided with an elementary catechism, for want of which they often could not tell whether what the sectaries taught them was true or not.

"The Reformation," says a modern historian[2] of the Kirk of Scotland, "was baronial in Scotland, monarchical in England." Almost all the nobles who had been detained as prisoners in England after the battle of Solway Moss (1542) returned home Protestants. The English monasteries had been just dissolved, to the great enrichment of their brother aristocrats south of the Tweed; Lollard preachers were everywhere, and their denunciations of a wealthy and powerful priesthood, electric as was then the condition of the religious atmosphere, fell upon willing ears. A countryman of their own was soon found, who in extravagance and fluency of reviling left the English Lollards far behind. John Knox, born in Haddingtonshire in 1505, studied with some distinction at the universities of St. Andrews and Glasgow, having attended the lectures of the eminent theologian John Mair, or Major. He probably imbibed Lollard opinions very early: if before his ordination, his voluntarily placing himself under the control of the canon law is a remarkable act. The death at the stake in 1527 of Patrick Hamilton, who had studied at Wittenberg and brought home Lutheran opinions, seems to have made a deep impression on him. However, he became a priest, and thus was canonically bound to continence, an obligation which he set at naught by marrying, not once only but twice.

Not only was there a strong Lollard party in Scotland between 1530 and 1540, but several Franciscan and Dominican friars took up warmly the cause of ecclesiastical reform, and preached against abuses and superstitions. Of this there is ample evidence in the history which bears the name of Knox. As late as 1545 the bulk of the people were attached to the old faith;[1] Knox speaks of Edinburgh in 1546 as "drowned in superstition"; but in the fifteen years which followed a great change is said to have taken place.

George Wishart, a friend of Knox, was burnt for heresy in 1545; and, partly in revenge for this, Cardinal Beaton was assassinated at St. Andrews by members of the reforming party in 1546. Knox hastened to St. Andrews and made common cause with the assassins. He is supposed to have renounced his priesthood some time before,[2] and to have arrived at the conclusion that ecclesiastical functions could not be lawfully discharged but in obedience to a "call" from some reformed congregation. The men of blood to whom he had joined himself gave him the desired "call," and Knox became a minister. We hear of controversies between him and representatives of the Catholics. The volubility, earnestness, and audacity of the man were amazing; but we see that he "abounds in his own sense"; his incapacity for taking in any but the one narrow view of religion to which he had committed himself is manifest from the account of these disputes which he has himself transmitted; and when we find him resolutely maintaining that no rites or ceremonies are lawful, unless "God in express words hath commanded them,"[3] we are able to take the measure of his spiritual wisdom. Every Presbyterian at this day who countenances Dr. Lees' innovation of organs in the kirk, since organs are nowhere "expressly commanded," falls under the ban of the patriarch of his religion. In a sermon preached about the same time Knox defined the Roman Church to be "the last beast," and the head of it to be "the Man of Sin," the "Antichrist," and the "Whore of Babylon." This violence is easily accounted for. Knox intended to violate the canons and marry;[1] and he knew that if the Catholic Church and the canon law retained their ascendency in Scotland, he, as a married priest, would not only lose the career to which his ambition urged him forward, but also be in danger of punishment. On the other hand, if he and his friends could overpower the Church and establish their own sect, the highest ecclesiastical rank, along with a commanding position in the State, was at once within his reach.

The French king sent an expedition which compelled the surrender of St. Andrews, and Knox, being taken along with the garrison, was condemned to the galleys. For some years French and Catholic influences were in the ascendant; and Knox, after his release, deemed it best to retire to England. In 1549 a reforming council met at Edinburgh under Archbishop Hamilton, attended by six bishops and fourteen abbots, and enacted sixty-eight disciplinary canons. Two years later the Parliament passed an Act imposing severe penalties on any who should "contemptuously make perturbation in the kirk in the time of divine service." When Mary came to the throne (1553), Knox found his way to Geneva, and came under the influence of the powerful mind of Calvin. To this intercourse he chiefly owed the specific Presbyterian beliefs—viz. that some are predestinated to eternal life, and some—the greater number—to eternal damnation; that bishop and presbyter are two different names for the same office; and that in the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, although the faithful really and truly partake of the Body and Blood of Christ, yet that Body and that Blood are in heaven and not on earth, and the elements undergo no change. Superior as it is to the shallow commonplaces of Zwingli, this doctrine can hardly be said to be less mysterious, though much less logical, than that of transubstantiation, which the Calvinists rejected with so much heat.

Between 1554 and 1560 Mary of Guise, the queen regent, mother of Mary Queen of Scots, administered the government in her daughter's name. During all this time a fierce struggle was going on between the men of the old and the new opinions. The Protestant noblemen, headed by the Earls of Argyll, Glencairn, and Morton, met together in 1557, and drew up the "First Covenant." They pledged themselves thereby to establish the "Word of God and His congregation," and to support these with all their strength against the "congregation of Satan," by which they meant the Catholic bishops and clergy. They were hence called the "Lords of the Congregation." The bishops did what they could to strengthen the hands of the regent, who, however, from political motives, desired to keep in with both parties. Walter Milne, an old man who had once been a priest, but had gone over to the Reformers, was burnt at St. Andrews in 1558.[1] But the bishops were not really strong; the tide was setting the other way; and Knox felt emboldened to return to Scotland. While the tension of feeling on each side was at its height, he went to Perth, the fair city on the Tay, then embellished with several religious houses of great beauty. He preached a sermon against "idolatry," after which there was a riot; images, altars, and pictures were destroyed and defaced; the Carthusian abbey was plundered and greatly damaged, and the monks ill-used; the Dominican and Franciscan friaries were destroyed. The ruin of Scone Abbey followed. Knox then went into Fife, and continued this line of preaching; more destruction of art monuments was the result. Defying the inhibition of the archbishop, he preached at St. Andrews (1559), and immediately afterwards the magistrates and the mob "proceeded to destroy the Dominican and Franciscan monasteries, and to rifle and deface all the churches in the town."[2] The cathedral, which was also the church of the Austin Canons, a building of rare beauty, was dismantled about the same time. There was now a state of actual war, and the Lords of the Congregation marched upon Edinburgh, "flushed with these victories over the monuments of idolatry and architecture" (sic).[3] Here is the true Puritan ring; it is not only against what he calls superstition, but against the "sublime and beautiful" that the Puritan revolts. Art withers under his tread, like grass beneath the hoofs of the Calmuck cavalry.

The struggle was marked by several sudden changes of fortune; the Scotch Protestants showed little courage, and their English allies little skill. The French troops who had come to support the regent, and garrisoned Leith, were well handled and gained some remarkable successes; but they were foreigners, and this told heavily against them. In April 1560 the regent died; her death led to a negotiation, and indirectly to the triumph of Protestantism. The young queen, whose husband, Francis, had just succeeded his father Henry II., was absent in France; the Catholics were left without any natural leaders. By the treaty of Edinburgh (July 1560) made between the French envoys of Francis and Mary and English plenipotentiaries (Cecil and Sadler), acting on behalf of the Scotch nobility and people, it was agreed, inter alia, that the forces on both sides should be disbanded and the French troops return home; that a parliament or convention of the three estates should meet on August 1, and that any complaints of wrongs done to them, made by bishops, abbots, or other churchmen, should be considered by the Parliament and redressed, "as they should find according to reason."[1]

The event soon showed that Cecil had overreached the French envoys in the negotiation. The wrongs of which the churchmen had to complain were serious enough—e.g. while the hostilities lasted the Bishops of Dunkeld, Dunblane, and Ross had been driven by the sectaries from their houses and dispossessed of all their property; the monasteries of Dunfermline, Melrose, and Kelso had been plundered, and the lands and movables of churchmen seized upon in every part of the country.[2] It was the evident intent of the treaty that wrongs such as these should be redressed. But when the Parliament met, being composed, as to the great majority, of enthusiastic or deeply interested sectaries, it proceeded to pass bills for the subversion of the Catholic religion; after which, it is needless to say, they did not find it "according to reason" to give the bishops any compensation whatever.

Before these bills were adopted, a confession of faith in twenty-five articles, drawn up by Knox and his party, was read in Parliament, faintly opposed by the Catholic members, who seem to have been helpless and stupefied, and accepted by the Assembly. To a large extent the doctrine of these articles is sound; they err rather by exclusion than by inclusion. One capital error regards the Church Catholic, which (art. xvi.) is said to consist only of the elect. On the Eucharist, the Calvinistic doctrine described above is asserted (art. xxi.).

On August 24, 1560, the Parliament passed a bill by which it was ordered that none should "say Mass, nor yet heere Mass, nor be present thereat, under the paine of confiscation of all their goods, and punishing of their bodies at the discretion of the magistrates." A second bill, dated the same day, declared that the Bishop of Rome had thenceforward no authority in Scotland, and decreed punishments against any who should recognize such authority. Such was the Scottish "St. Bartholomew's Day."

In Knox's "History" these bills are described as "Acts"; but they were not really so, for they required the royal assent or ratification; this Sir James Sandilands was sent into France to demand, but Mary steadily refused. They were first ratified by the Regent Murray in 1567. This single fact throws a sinister light on the conduct of the Protestant party towards the unhappy queen before her flight to England and during her imprisonment there. But the new religion, in Knox's view, "from God hath full power, and needed not the suffrage of man"; [1] whether legal or not, it was forced upon the people of Scotland with all the power of the secular arm. When Mary (1561) returned to her kingdom, and required the liberty of her religion in her private chapel at Holyrood, Knox said, doubtless with perfect sincerity, that "one Masse was more fearfull to him than if ten thowsand armed enemies were landed in anie part of the realme." [2] This sentiment, according to the experiences of many of the saints, is precisely that of the devil on the same subject. The Lords controlled him on this point, nor did they pay much regard to his "Book of Discipline," calling many things in it, particularly the proposal to devote the Church property to the sustentation of the ministers of the Kirk, "devout imaginations." What is called the "First General Assembly" was held in December 1560; it was attended by six ministers, among whom were Knox and Goodman, and thirty-six lay delegates.

Some doubt appears to exist on the question how many of the bishops joined the movement. Bishop Lesley distinctly states [3] that in 1561 only one had done so, the Bishop of Galloway; according to Dr. Cunningham,[4] the Bishops of Caithness and Orkney also became Protestants.

All this time there was a party among the nobles favourable to the retention of episcopacy and the use of the English prayer-book; and in process of time, when James VI. grew to manhood, he became persuaded that bishops were a necessary support to the regal power, and maintained a small Protestant hierarchy side by side with the ministers and the General Assembly. Knox himself, who had declared against bishops many years before,[5] submitted shortly before his death (1572) to the introduction of episcopacy, "in order to secure the episcopal revenues." [6] The form of Presbyterian polity as now seen in Scotland was chiefly the work of a man of high ability and sincere conviction, Andrew Melville. He was the master spirit of the General Assembly of 1580, which absolutely condemned episcopacy, and the chief framer of the "Second Book of Discipline," in which the system of church courts and assemblies, one above another, and each strengthened by a lay representation—kirk-session, presbytery, synod, general assembly—is minutely and skilfully laid down. In this able document the proper functions of the Kirk and the state are distinguished with great judgment; and the separation of the two powers, and the exaltation of the Kirk to the highest place, are asserted in language which strikingly recalls the definitions of the bull "Unam Sanctam." The Assembly of 1581 also adopted the famous "Negative Confession," chiefly directed against "all kinds of papistrie"; it is extremely curious, but our space does not permit of our giving an abstract of it. Every one of the Presbyterian Kirks, large and small, among which the mass of the Scottish people is now distributed, regards this assembly with the highest veneration.

Negation, however, is a poor basis for a theology; and one need feel no surprise that the clerical intellect of Scotland, during the three centuries that have followed, has been stricken with sterility. The ministers have certainly written many books, but their theological discussions interest few outside their own country.[1] Not one of the ecclesiastical sciences has been in any way advanced by Scotch Presbyterianism. The lay Scottish intellect, thanks to the natural endowments of the race and a good system of primary education, has achieved great things; it has perfected the steam-engine and the steamboat, invented political economy, composed the Waverley Novels, and borne more than its full share in the great governing and colonizing enterprises of the English people. But who can prove that all this might not have been done, Scotland remaining Catholic? The clerical intellect pays the penalty of having submitted itself to such a patriot as John Knox, with whom passion habitually took the place of reason, and frantic reviling was substituted for patient and equitable investigation.

PRESBYTERY (πρεσβυτέριον, assembly of the elders; senatus has the same meaning). (1) The word is used twice in the N.T. for the Jewish Sanhedrin.[2] In the Christian Church it signified, perhaps from the first, the assembly of the entire clergy of the diocese, both presbyters (identified with bishops in 1 Peter v. 1) and deacons; it was such a body at Ephesus, the "celebrated presbytery" [3] of that Church, which consecrated Timothy to the episcopal office with the imposition of hands.[1] St. Cyprian convened a diocesan council of this kind continually, and did nothing important without its advice. That the Roman presbyterium in the fifth century meant such a synod—i.e. that it included the deacons and the clergy generally, as well as the presbyters—is plain from a letter of Pope Siricius (385) on the condemnation of Jovinian. It therefore seems reasonable to assign this same sense to the word when used by Pope Cornelius (251), who, writing to Cyprian, says "placuit contrahi presbyterium," to hear the recantation of Maximus. Finally, when St. Ignatius, about the beginning of the second century, exhorts the Ephesians to be "subject to the bishop and the presbytery" ("Ad Eph." c. 2; PG, v. 733), the word may well be understood to have the same meaning. (Ferraris, Presbyterium.)

(2) The portion of the church in which the clergy assist at the services; also called the choir (q.v.) and chancel (q.v.).

(3) "Presbytery" is often used among English Catholics to designate the priest's house. In this sense it is a translation of the French presbytère, so used (Littré) since the twelfth century; presbyterium appears never to have had this meaning. (Ducange; Taunton.)

PRESCRIPTION. The acquisition of an object or a right on the strength of a long undisturbed possession. It is of three kinds —ordinary, extraordinary, and immemorial. By ordinary prescription jurists understand one which rests on a possession of three, or of ten, or of twenty years—three years in the case of movable property; ten years in the case of a right, or of immovable property, inter praesentes; twenty years, in the same case, inter absentes. A just title must also be proved—i.e. the prescriptor must show that he obtained the property by purchase or gift, or some other mode in itself sufficient to constitute a title in the absence of an adverse claim. He must, moreover, have held the property during the time necessary to constitute prescription in good faith. One of whom it can be shown that he knew that he was detaining the property of another cannot plead prescription. The canon law is more strict on this head than the Roman, which only required that the prescriptor should have acted in good faith at the commencement of his enjoyment of the object. Extraordinary prescription, proof of which is required in many cases by the canon law, especially in regard to ecclesiastical or state property, is of thirty or forty years. Immemorial prescription is merely the presumption of a legitimate ownership, founded on the attestation of the fact of continuous and undisturbed enjoyment, made by old or elderly persons, during a period reaching back to the limits both of their own memory and that of aged persons with whom they had conversed in early life. PRESENTATION BROTHERS. A religious institute founded in Ireland by Edmund Ignatius Rice in the early part of the nineteenth century. At first it was attached to the different dioceses in which it had houses, but in 1889 all of these were united under one superior-general. It is now established in Ireland, England, and Canada. The Brothers conduct colleges, primary schools, industrial schools, and orphanages. (Br. De Sales in "Cath. Enc.").

PRESENTATION OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN. The story of Mary's presentation in the temple when three years old and her sojourn there till her marriage first appears in Apocryphal Gospels—viz. the Protevangelium (vii.), and that of the Birth of Mary. The belief was adopted by later Fathers—e.g. St. John of Damascus. Benedict XIV. ("De Fest." P. ii. § 178) considers the fact of the presentation certain, but the details of the story "altogether uncertain." The feast (εἰσόδια τῆς θεοτόκου) was kept by the Greeks as early at least as the time of the Emperor Emmanuel, who ascended the throne in 1143, and partially by the Latins on November 21 since 1374. Paul II. confirmed the feast, which was still not kept in all parts of the West, by "Apostolic authority." Pius V., on the contrary, abolished its celebration in the Roman Church itself, though this was permitted in other parts of the Latin world. Sixtus V. restored the feast in 1585 at the prayer of the Jesuit Turrianus. The present office was corrected under Clement VIII., who made the feast a greater double. (Benedict XIV. PRESENTATION OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN MARY, ORDER OF THE. This order was founded in 1777 by Miss Nano (Honoria) Nagle, who belonged to a good Catholic family in the county Cork, and was born in 1728. She established an Ursuline convent at Cork in 1771. But her object being the instruction of the poor, whereas the Ursuline order has for its main business the instruction of the well-to-do, she was not yet satisfied. She built another convent near the first, and entered it, with three companions, towards the end of 1777. They were not enclosed, but were engaged in visiting and teaching the poor, and followed a rule drawn up for them by the curé of St. Sulpice. They took simple vows, renewed from year to year. Worn out by labour and austerities, Nano died in 1784. Her institute was confirmed by Pius VI. in 1791, with simple vows and no enclosure. In 1805, at the request of Bishop Moylan, Pius VII. raised it to the rank of a religious order, with solemn vows and strict enclosure. A fourth vow was added, by which the nuns bind themselves to instruct young girls, especially the poor, in the precepts and rudiments of the Catholic faith. Their work, however, extends also to higher education. They have many houses in Ireland, England, America, and Australia. (See the "Life of Nano Nagle," by Dr. Hutch; "Cath. Enc.")

PRIESTS, CHRISTIAN. The priesthood is the second in rank among the holy orders. It is the office of a priest, according to the Pontifical, "to offer, bless, rule, preach, and baptize." First, he is empowered to offer that sacrifice of the Mass which is the centre of all the Church's worship, because in it Christ, the great high-priest, continually offers Himself in a bloodless manner, and applies that one sacrifice consummated for our redemption on the cross. Next, the priest, standing between God and his fellow-men, blesses the people in God's name. It is his duty, if a flock is entrusted to him, to rule and to instruct it, and to administer the sacraments of Baptism, Penance, Holy Communion, and Extreme Unction, besides solemnising marriages, &c. His duties are much wider than those of the Jewish priests. The latter were to teach the statutes of the Lord in Israel (Lev. x. 11; Deut. xxiii. 10; Ezech. xliv. 23, 24), and their lips were to keep knowledge (Mal. ii. 7); but these moral duties were only hinted at, and were not the subject of special regulation. On the contrary, though the offering of sacrifice is the chief, it is by no means the only duty of the Christian priest. He succeeds the Jewish "elder" as well as the Jewish priest. Hence he is called ἱερεύς and sacerdos—i.e. "sacrificing priest," but also presbyter—i.e. "elder." Our Saxon ancestors had both words, "priost" and "sacerd." We have retained only the former, but always use it in the sense of the latter.

The word "presbyter" was familiar to every Jew. The "elders" (זְקֵנִים, πρεσβύτεροι) were the chief men in the old civil communities of Palestine, and the word exactly answers in meaning to the Arabic "sheikh." In later times the number and authority of these "elders" was definitely fixed, and even among the Jews of the dispersion there was a council (יְשִׁיבָה = consessus) which met in the synagogue and administered the discipline of the Jewish community.[1] No record remains of the institution of such a body among Christians; but in Acts xi. 30, when the persecution in which St. James was slain drove the Apostles from Jerusalem, we find the Church there provided with a senate of "presbyters." It was apparently at a later date that such "presbyters" appeared among communities of Gentile Christians, for they are not once mentioned by St. Paul, except in the pastoral epistles. They were "rulers" of the Church, and though they might teach, if qualified to do so, this was no necessary part of their office (1 Tim. v. 17).[1] This ruling-office, as we have seen already, is still prominent in the Pontifical, which compares presbyters to the "seventy elders" who assisted Moses. In ancient times they formed the council of the bishop, who for many centuries could take no important step without consulting them. (See Second Council of Seville (619) can. 6: Hefele-Leclercq, iii. 257.) The presbyters of the diocese are now represented by the chapter, which the bishop is obliged to consult in enacting statutes &c. In one place the New Testament attributes the administration of a sacrament, viz. Extreme Unction, to presbyters (James v. 14).

The words "priest," "priesthood" (ἱερεύς, ἱεράτευμα), are never applied in the New Testament to the office of the Christian ministry. All Christians are said to be priests (1 Pet. ii. 5, 9; Apoc. v. 10). This recognition of the universal priesthood of Christians, however, involves no denial of the existence of a special priesthood, for the Israelites too were called a "kingdom of priests," though they had, of course, a special priesthood with prerogatives jealously guarded. Further, the Old Testament prophesies that priests would be taken from the Gentiles, and that the office of the priesthood was to last for ever (Isa. lxvi. 21; Jer. xxxiii. 17, 18); and St. Paul, so far, at least, brings the Christian ministry into connection with the Jewish priesthood that he justifies the claim of the former to support by a reference to the way in which the latter "lived by the altar" (1 Cor. ix. 13). Döllinger ("First Age of the Church," E.T. p. 222) also urges the liturgical character of St. Paul's language (Rom. xv. 16), where he describes himself as a "minister" (λειτουργόν, cf. Heb. viii. 2) and as an evangelical priest (ἱερουργοῦντα τὸ εὐαγγέλιον, "ministering in sacrifice," R.V. marg.). The argument does not seem to be of much account, and Estius is probably right in considering the language merely metaphorical. The Apostle was a minister appointed by Christ, "administering the gospel" like a priest, that the Gentiles might offer up themselves an oblation to God.

The Apostolic Fathers also abstain from any mention of a Christian priesthood; at least the single reference in St. Ignatius (Phil. 9, PG, v. 704, καλοὶ οἱ ἱερεῖς) is very [1] Vitringa (De Synagog. Vet. lib. ii. cap. 4 seq.) is at great pains to show that in the early synagogues these "elders" directed worship as well as discipline. We cannot see that he proves his point..

[1] So Cyprian, Ep. 29, ed. Hartel, 548, distinguishes the "presbyteri doctores" as a special class. The word "pastors" (ποιμένες, Ephes. iv. 11), which expresses the ruling office, is derived, like "presbyter" itself, from the anguage of the Synagogue, פרנסים). (See Vitringa, ii. 10).

doubtful.[1] Justin, in the middle of the second century (Dial. 116, 117 ; PG, vi. 744) simply alludes to the general priesthood of Christians. In a curious letter to Victor of Rome (190–200) Polycrates says of St. John the Evangelist that "he was a priest having worn the mitre" (ἐγενήθη ἱερεὺς τὸ πέταλον πεφορηκὼς, apud Euseb. "H.E." v. 24). The language can scarcely be anything but metaphorical (so Routh, "Rell. Sacr." tom. ii. p. 28). At the end of the second or beginning of the third century the term "priest" was in common use. We find it in Tertullian ("Praescr." 41, "sacerdotalia munera," PL, ii. 57), in the "Philosophumena" (Proem. μετέχοντες ἀρχιερατείας), Origen (Hom. v. in Lev. iv.). In Cyprian the word (sacerdos) constantly occurs—usually for bishops, but sometimes also for presbyters ("De Zelo et Livore," ed. Hartel, 423, 6).

We may distinguish three stages in the position of the priesthood.

(1) In the earliest times they ruled with and in subordination to the bishop. The bishop and priests said Mass conjointly, and the priests administered the sacraments independently only in the bishop's absence.

(2) The presbyters became more independent owing to the gradual establishment of parish as distinct from episcopal churches. Innocent's letter to Decentius exhibits the change in actual progress. In towns, he says, the Eucharist is to be consecrated by the bishop only and sent to the parish priests ; in outlying churches the priests are to consecrate for themselves. Thus, separate replaced conjoint rule and administration of the sacraments.

(3) Gradually the rule became a separable accident of the priesthood. At first a priest, by the very fact of ordination, was attached to a particular church, and only in rare and exceptional instances a man of extraordinary merit was induced to submit to ordination on condition that he should not be bound to a particular church. In this way St. Jerome was ordained by Paulinus of Antioch. But from the eleventh century the custom began of ordaining priests who had no benefice, provided they had the means of honourable support (Juenin, "De Sacr." diss. viii. cap. 3). Further, the ordination of religious without cure of souls became the rule instead of the exception. And it is the capacity for rule, rather than the actual exercise of it, which we now associate with the priestly office. [PARISH ; PARISH PRIEST ; ORDER.]

PRIMATE (primas). In early times bishops were called primates who held any commanding position in the Church. Thus the Roman Pontiff was sometimes called the primate of the whole Church ; and the Council of Chalcedon declared that the primacy, or first place before all (πρὸ πάντων τὰ πρωτεῖα), was to be accorded to "the Archbishop of Old Rome." (Sess. xvi. See, however, Hefele-Leclercq, ii. 834.) In Africa the metropolitans were called primates, or bishops of the first sees. Carthage, in the province of Africa strictly so called, was always the first see, though its bishop might be junior to others ; in the other provinces the dignity of first see passed from city to city, as it depended on the priority of the date of consecration of the respective bishops.

In modern times those bishops only are properly called primates to whose see the dignity of vicar of the Holy See was formerly annexed. Such sees are—Armagh in Ireland, Arles and Lyons in France, Mayence in Germany, Toledo in Spain, Gran in Hungary, Pisa and Salerno in Italy, and some others. None of these retains any primatial jurisdiction except Gran, the archbishop of which has still the right of receiving appeals from all the other archbishops in Hungary. Changed circumstances—especially the great facility with which the most distant countries can now communicate with Rome—have made the jurisdiction of primates almost a thing of the past. [ARCHBISHOP ; EXARCH ; METROPOLITAN.] (Soglia, "Instit. Canon." lib. ii. § 48.)

PRIME. [See BREVIARY.]

PRIMER. [See PRYMER.]

PRIMICERIUS (primus, cera). The leading person, or foreman, on a list of the employés in a particular business or function ; thus we read of the p. notariorum, the p. palatii, &c. "First on the waxed tablet" is the literal meaning of the word. In its modern use the term is only applied to the precentor of a cathedral or collegiate choir, who is responsible for the due instruction of every member of the choir in ecclesiastical chant and other things proper to his function. But the word is now seldom heard ; the "primicer" of St. Denis is among the few instances where it is still retained. (Ferraris ; Thomassin, I.)

PRIOR, PRIORESS. It is doubtful whether the word "prior" was used in either of the senses which it has borne for many centuries past—that is, as signifying either the ruler of an independent monastery, or the coadjutor and second-in-command of an abbot—before the pontificate of Celestine V. in the thirteenth century. The older term was praepositus, provost ; thus Bede speaks of St. Cuthbert having been praepositus under the Abbot Eata, first at Melrose and afterwards at Lindisfarne.[1] Whenever the term "prior" occurs in relation to monks before the thirteenth century, it is said to be used in a loose sense, as signifying merely one who on account of greater age or other ground of superiority ranked above his fellows. The duties of a prior, or praepositus, are thus described by Isidore: "To the praepositus belongs the charge of the monks, the carrying on of lawsuits, the management of the estates, the cropping of the fields, the planting and cultivation of vineyards, acquaintance with the law, the erection of buildings, the work of the carpenters and the smiths." [1] The prior claustralis, being next to the abbot in the monastery, and appointed by him, generally for life, had the inspection and control of the decani, or deans [DEAN], and was expected to maintain discipline firmly among the monks, for which purpose he might use the lesser excommunication. The prior conventualis was the master in his own house; under him there was generally a sub-prior. Yet there were several distinct positions, all of which might be described as priorates. For (1) in a place with a special history—e.g. Durham, where the mighty memory of the abbot-bishop St. Cuthbert coloured and modified all that was done for nine centuries—the bishop of the see might hold a quasi-abbatial position in the monastery out of which the see first arose; in which case the head of the monastery could only be a prior. But the Prior of Durham, modest as the name might sound, was a greater personage than most abbots. (2) a cell, or obedience, the offshoot of some larger monastery, was always governed by a prior. A conventual prior in this sense was often a person of little dignity or consequence, both from having a very small community to govern, and because the property with which the cell was endowed was small. (3) the superiors of the houses of regular canons (Augustinians, Arroasians, and — originally — Premonstratensians) were always called priors, never abbots. St. Dominic, who adopted the rule of St. Augustine for his friars, probably on this account put their houses under priors.

[1] In the Didache (xiii. 3) the "prophets" (1 Cor. xii. 28) are called ἀρχιερεῖς ὑμῶν.

[1] Bed. iv. 27.

A prioress under an abbess held nearly the same position as a claustral prior, and prioresses governing their own houses were like conventual priors. (Thomassin: Smith and Cheetham.)

PRISCILLIANISTS. The followers of Priscillian, bishop of Avila in Spain (the birthplace of St. Theresa), in the fourth century. An Egyptian named Mark brought the Manichaean doctrines into Spain, and seduced by them the Bishops Instantius and Salvianus, besides other important or wealthy persons, of whom Priscillian was one. The sect was condemned by a synod held at Saragossa in 380; but even after this Instantius and Salvianus ventured to raise Priscillian to the see of Avila. The Emperor Gratian vacillated; but when the usurper Maximus came into power, he listened to the complaints of Idacius and Ithacius, the representatives of the majority of the Spanish bishops, and caused Priscillian and several of his adherents (384) to be tried before his own tribunal at Treves. St. Martin, who happened to be at Treves at the time, vainly endeavoured to dissuade Maximus from bringing a question of heresy before a secular court. Priscillian, the widow Euchrocia, and several others, were condemned and put to death. St. Martin was so grieved and shocked by this that for a long time he refused to communicate with Ithacius, and would not go near the Court. The heresy lingered on in Spain during the fifth century and was not entirely extinct at the date of the Council of Braga, 563. (Leclercq, "L'Espagne Chrétienne," iii. 150–203; St. Augustine, "De Haer. lxx.," PL, xlii. 44.)

PRIVATE MASSES. [See MASS, p. 568.]

PRIVATE REVELATION. The Christian religion is described as a revelation, on the ground that God through Christ has revealed truths to which the unaided reason could not have attained, or attained with the same certainty. This revelation was made to the whole world, just as the Mosaic religion, also a revelation, communicated God's will to a single people. But after the full revelation made to the whole human race through Christ, the New Testament speaks repeatedly of private revelations made to individuals for a particular end. Thus St. Paul (Gal. ii. 2) on a memorable occasion went up to Jerusalem "in accordance with a revelation" (κατὰ ἀποκάλυψιν); and he speaks elsewhere of such revelations as made repeatedly to himself (2 Cor. xii. 1), and as of frequent occurrence in the Church (1 Cor. xiv. 6, 26), or at least that part of the Church to which he was writing. Justin ("Dial." 88 ad fin.; PG, vi. 688) and Irenaeus ("Adv. Haer." v. 6, 1, PG, vii. 1137) speak of prophetic gifts as enduring in the Church of their own day; and later Fathers, in their strife with the Montanists, did not attack those sectaries simply because they claimed to prophesy, but partly because of the contents of their revelations, partly because these supposed prophecies were made in an ecstatic state, which impeded the use of reason. Thus the Montanist Tertullian ("Adv. Marc." iv. 22, PL, ii. 413, cf. "De Anima," 45); whereas Miltiades, an early Catholic opponent of the sect, wrote a book to prove that "a prophet must not speak in ecstasy" (περὶ τοῦ μὴ δεῖν προφητὴν ἐν ἐκστάσει λαλεῖν, Euseb. "H.E." v. 17). This principle became an accepted one in the Church (so, e.g., Chrysost. Hom. xxix. in Epist. 1 ad Corinth., PG, lxi. 239; Epiphan. "Adv. Haer. Montan." 2; Jerome, "Praef. Comm. in Nahum," PL, xxv. 1232; "Praef. Comm. in Habacuc"); but the possibility, and even the actual occurrence, of private revelations in the Church of all ages was, as we shall see presently, never denied.[1] The whole subject has been investigated with patient learning by Eusebius Amort in his work entitled "De Revelationibus, Visionibus, et Apparitionibus Privatis Regulae tutae" (Augsburg, 1744). For the remainder of this article we are largely indebted to him; and in theological principles we have been content to follow him, though the historical facts have been drawn from various sources. We should add that Amort's book contains an analysis of all that has been said by the chief theologians and mystics who have treated of the question.

So far as we are aware, the first attempt to classify revelations from the subjective side was made by St. Augustine ("De Genesi ad lit." xii. 1 seq., PL, xxxiv. 453). He divides them into such as are sensible, i.e. given through sensuous images; such as are spiritual, i.e. conveyed through the imagination, which presents to the mind the figures of bodily things not actually present; and such as are purely intellectual. The last he considers the most perfect, because least subject to demoniacal illusion, since devils, as was supposed, could influence the bodily powers, among which imagination is reckoned, but could not directly influence man's intellectual nature. Even intellectual visions are certainly from God only so far as the objects and the light by which they are manifested transcend nature. St. Augustine's principles are accepted as fundamental by the later mystics, e.g. by St. John of the Cross and St. Theresa, whose opinions are given by Amort at length.

St. Augustine evidently believed that these private revelations were made from time to time, though on each particular revelation he leaves others free to think as they please ("Ep. clix. ad Evod." PL, xxxiii. 700; "Doctrin. Christ." i. Prolog.), and he sharply contrasts their authority with that of the Bible ("De Catech. Rud." 6, PL, xl. 317).

In the Middle Ages a notable change was effected since mediaeval Popes have actually given their solemn approval to private revelations of saints. So Eugenius III. approved the revelations of St. Hildegarde (see Baronius, ad ann. 1148, n. 32), and Cardinal Turrecremata tells us that those of St. Bridget of Sweden were sanctioned by Urban VI. and Boniface IX. (see Turrecremata's Prologue prefixed to the folio edition of St. Bridget's works, Munich, 1680, and the extracts from the bull of Boniface IX., renewed and confirmed by Martin V.). Of St. Gertrude's revelations Blosius merely says that they were examined and approved by "most learned and enlightened men," and that no spiritual person will venture to impugn them (Blosius, Appendix to the "Monile Spirituale"). It is but another sign of the growing importance attached in the mediaeval Church to private revelations, and their closer connection with ecclesiastic authority, when we find Leo X., in his bull "Supernae," forbidding private revelations to be published —e.g. in sermons—unless already approved by the Holy See (see Castaldus, "De Potestate Angelica," Rome, 1650, apud Amort).

This prominence of private revelations in the later Church has given them a greater influence on devotion and pious beliefs. No doubt even in the early Church the "Shepherd" of Hermas had for a time quasi-canonical authority. The vision of St. Perpetua promoted the belief in purgatorial pain; the origin of the Trisagion was attributed to private revelation (St. John of Damasc. "De Fid. Orthodox." iii. 10, PG, xciv. 1021); the second Council of Tours appeals to a private revelation for the proper number of psalms at Sext (Mann's "Concil." ix. 797); and the Corpus Juris supposes (c. "Nosse." De Consecr. D. 3, Pius I.) that an early Pope was led to institute the celebration of Easter on Sunday by the revelations of Hermas. But till the Middle Ages it may be safely said that no private revelations exercised anything like the wide and enduring influence enjoyed by those of St. Gertrude, St. Bridget, St. Catharine of Siena, and many others who might be named. Still, no marked change was made in theological principle. For,

(1) Private revelations are only approved by the Pope in some general sense, as containing nothing contrary to faith or good morals, while the particular facts given in them are only approved as probable and calculated to promote piety. Amort points out that Suarez, although he believed in the truth of St. Bridget's revelations, does not scruple to contradict them on details in the history of Christ's passion.

(2) They cannot in any case avail to settle a controversy of faith still undecided by the Church. It is true that Amort quotes two theologians who judged otherwise, Corduba ("Question." lib. I. q. 44) and Orlandus ("In III. Sent." D. 3, q. 3, dub. 4). and even St. Augustine clearly thought, when in doubt about the validity of baptism given in joke, that the question might be decided by private revelation, "per alicujus revelationis oraculum concordi oratione implorandum" ("Contr. Donat." vii. 53, PL, xliii. 243). But the whole weight of theological opinion is, as Amort abundantly proves, on the other side. An attempt was made to influence the controversy on the Immaculate Conception in this way. The Dominicans were the great adversaries of the doctrine, the Franciscans its champions. St. Bridget, who was a Franciscan tertiary, asserts in her revelations (vi. 49) that she heard the Blessed Virgin say, in so many words, "The truth is that I was conceived without original sin." To this the Dominican theologian St. Antoninus of Florence replies ("Theol." P. I. tit. viii. cap. 2) that St. Catharine of Siena, who was a Dominican tertiary, and "other female saints, illustrious for miracles, had a revelation to the contrary effect" ("habuerunt revelationem de contrario"). (St. Thomas, 2^a 2^{ae}, q. 174, a. 6; Benedict XIV. "De Canonizatione," lib. ii. c. 32, lib. iii. c. 53; Franzelin, "De Traditione," 279.)

PRIVATION. [See SUSPENSION.]

PRIVILEGE. "A private enactment, granting some special benefit or favour, against or outside the law."[1] It differs from a dispensation in that this last usually refers to a single act, such as a marriage, or the reception of orders, whereas a privilege presupposes and legalizes many acts done in pursuance of it. It differs from a grace or benefaction, because the latter is confined to the good which it operates once for all, whereas a privilege confers on its possessor immunity in regard to every act of the kind privileged, as much as if he had obtained the sanction of the law. A privilege may be granted by word of mouth as well as by deed. Privileges are either against the law (as when the duty of paying tithes, or that of submitting to the jurisdiction of the ordinary, is remitted to certain persons or communities), or it is beyond or outside the law—namely, when it authorizes acts which the law does not forbid, but which are only allowable to particular persons, such as the power of absolving in reserved cases, or of dispensing, and the like. Again, privileges are divided into real, personal, and mixed; the first being primarily annexed to some thing (a place, or a building, or a dignity), and indirectly extended to the persons by whom the thing is owned or enjoyed; the second being primarily granted to some person, regarded as an individual; the third being granted to classes of persons—e.g. the privileges of clerics, or students, or soldiers. Many other distinctions are noted by the canonists. It is obvious that only that authority can establish a privilege which is competent to frame and enforce a law. Concession made by such an authority is the usual source of a privilege; it may, however, also be acquired by prescription. A third way is that of communication, of which the mendicant orders furnish a brilliant example, since every such order enjoys by communication, not only every privilege ever granted to any other mendicant institute, but also those granted to any of the non-mendicant orders.

The chief privileges appertaining to clerical or monastic persons have been incidentally stated in the articles BISHOP, ABBOT, DEACON, PRIEST, MONK, NUN, &c.; but there are two important privileges belonging to the entire clerical body, which may here be noticed. These are the privileges of the tribunal and the canon (privilegia fori et canonis). The first is the exemption of the clergy from the secular tribunals in criminal and civil causes: an exemption of the highest value in barbarous times, but less desirable in those more civilised, and now in point of fact hardly anywhere enjoyed. The privilege of the canon consists in the excommunication (under the fifteenth canon of the Second Lateran Council), with reservation of absolution to the Pope, of anyone who has "laid violent hands on cleric or monk." (Ferraris, Privilegium; Taunton; Soglia, ii. § iii.)

[1] Ferraris.

PRIVILEGED ALTAR. (1) An altar, such as the seven privileged altars in St. Peter's, by visiting which certain indulgences may be gained.

(2) An altar at which Votive Masses may be said even on certain feasts which are doubles. There are often altars of this kind at places of pilgrimage.

(3) Altars with a plenary indulgence for one soul in purgatory attached to all Masses said at them for the dead. The privilege continues even if a new altar be erected, provided it be in the same place and under the same title. All altars are privileged on All Souls' Day. Sometimes the privilege is personal—i.e. a priest may have the privilege of gaining the plenary indulgence always, or on certain occasions, when he offers Mass for the dead, without respect to the altar at which he says it. The local privilege is only granted to fixed altars, the personal may be used even at portable altars. The Mass must be a Requiem Mass, if the rubrics permit it to be said on that day, but these limitations have been removed. This privilege is not withdrawn in the general suspension of indulgences during a jubilee. (Probst, art. Altar, "Kirchenlexikon.")

PROBABILISM. [See MORAL THEOLOGY, p. 603.]

PROCESSIONS. The word in its wider sense is used of the solemn entrance of the clergy to the altar for Mass, Vespers, &c., or of their return after service to the sacristy. The oldest Ordo Romanus, about the year 720, contains elaborate directions for a procession of this kind. At processions in a more restricted sense persons march together in public that they may express their gratitude to God, beseech His mercy, or do honour to the living or the dead. Processions with the first of these objects are called processions simply, those with the second are also known as "Litaniae," "Rogationes," "Stationes," "Supplicationes," "Exomologeses." Processions at the visitation &c. of a bishop and at funerals are instances of the third class. Processions are also classified, according as they are made with or without the Blessed Sacrament, relics, statues of the Blessed Virgin or the saints.

Lastly, there are extraordinary processions ordered by ecclesiastical authority for some special cause, and ordinary ones prescribed by the common ritual law of the Church. To the latter class the processions on Candlemas, Palm Sunday, St. Mark's Day, three Rogation Days, Corpus Christi, and at funerals belong. Each procession has a head, who walks last, those being nearest him who are highest in dignity and the juniors walking in front. The chief person, if a priest, wears biretta, stole, surplice, and sometimes also cope; if he bears the Blessed Sacrament, always a cope and humeral veil. A bishop wears his mitre and carries his pastoral staff; but in procession with the Blessed Sacrament and with a particle of the True Cross (S.C.R. Sept. 2, 1690) the head must not be covered, and then the bishop's staff is carried behind, his mitre before, him. The baldacchino always carried over the Blessed Sacrament may also be used, where it is the custom, with particles of the True Cross and other instruments of the Passion (S.C.R. 27 Maii, 1826). It is also used to honour the bishop—e.g. at his solemn entrance into a church. The colour of the vestments and the prayers said vary with the occasion of the procession. An out-door procession always starts from and ends by returning to the church, but sometimes several churches are visited in the course of the procession. The bishop may compel the attendance even of religious at processions under pain of censure, unless their rule obliges them to entire seclusion (S.C.R. 18 Martii, 1679).

Processions, at least in the case of funerals, were known in the Church during the time of heathen persecution. (See, e.g., "Acta Martyr. S. Cypriani.") The litanies or penitential processions are thought by some to be mentioned by Basil (Ep. 207, "Ad Neoc.," PG, xxxii. 764; but see the Benedictine note). Festal processions are spoken of as an ancient custom by Ambrose (Ep. 40, § 16, ad Theodos., PL, xvi. 1107). They are often mentioned in the "Peregrinatio Etheriae." The procession on St. Mark's Day was old and established in the time of St. Gregory the Great, and was perhaps a survival in a purified form of the procession on the same day in honour of the goddess Robigo (Ovid, "Fasti," iv. 906); processions with relics were common in the fourth century. (See, e.g., August. "Conf." ix. 7, PL, xxxii. 770; Socrates, "H.E." iii. 18.) Gregory of Tours ("Hist. Franc." v. 4) mentions the custom of carrying banners in processions. Processions are in fact a natural means common to all religions of publicly expressing the feelings of the heart, and are taken by an obvious symbolism as a figure of the Christian journey through this life to the next. (For further information see FUNERALS; CORPUS CHRISTI; ROGATION, &c.)

PROCESSION OF THE HOLY GHOST FROM THE FATHER AND THE SON. The addition made to the Nicene Creed at Constantinople in 381 mentions only the procession of the Holy Ghost from the Father, and this for a plain reason. The definitions of the Council were directed against the Macedonians, who denied the divinity of the Holy Ghost and supposed that He was created, like all else which is not God, through the Son. The Council, on the contrary, denied that the Third Person was to be placed in the category of creatures at all. It affirmed His procession from the Father, and so in effect denied that He was created through the Son or owed His existence to Him, in the same sense that creatures do. Whether the Spirit did or did not eternally proceed from the Son was a question which did not come before the assembly. For a long time after there was no controversy on this point. Theodore of Mopsuestia (Mansi, "Concil." iv. 1348) says of the Holy Ghost: "Neither do we regard Him as the Son or as having received existence through the Son." And so Theodoret, criticising the ninth anathema of St. Cyril, declares he will admit the Spirit's procession from the Father, but by no means "that He has existence" (τὴν ὕπαρξιν ἔχον) from the Son or through the Son.[1] Great authorities —Bellarmine, Petavius, and Garnier—have seen in Theodoret's criticism the first rise of the famous controversy on the double procession. This view is very far from certain. In all probability Theodoret simply meant to separate the existence of the Spirit from that of creatures. (So Kuhn, "Trinitätslehre," p. 484 sqq.)

However, the theology of the Church was forced to consider the eternal relations of the Second and Third Persons. If both alike proceeded from the Father, then how was the Spirit distinct from the Son? Why were there not two Sons? The difficulty met in West and East with two answers, different at least in form:—

1. The Latin formula is contained in the early Creed falsely ascribed to St. Athanasius —"The Holy Ghost is from the Father and the Son," a Patre et Filio. So Hilary, "De Trin." ii. 29, PL, x. 69; Augustine, "De Trin." iv. 20, PL, xlii. 908. These appear to be the oldest testimonies,[2] for Tertullian's "a Patre per Filium" ("Adv. Prax." 4, PL, ii. 159) can scarcely be regarded as a direct and certain reference to eternal procession. There is no need to quote later writers. Petavius ("Trin." vii. 8) says he only knew of one single Latin author—viz. Rusticus the Deacon —who ever doubted the correctness of the current Latin formula. St. Augustine

[1] The text will be found in the words of St. Cyril, PG, ix. 432.

[2] Ambrose (De Spiritu S. i. 11; PL, xvi. 732) says the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father and the Son. But, in this place "procedere" means "to be sent."

("In Joann." Tract. xcix., PL, xxxv. 1885, and in many other places) proves the procession of the Spirit from the Son, from the fact that the former is called the "Spirit of the Son" (Gal. iv. 6), and again because the Son, while on earth, gave the Holy Ghost the temporal mission by, implying eternal procession from, the Son. St. Augustine clearly explains ("De Trin." v. cap. 14,[1] PL, xlii. 920) that the Spirit proceeds from the Father and Son, not as from two principles, but as from one. St. Anselm, in his treatise on the procession of the Holy Ghost (cap. 18, al. 17), answers the objection of the schismatic Greeks, that the Latins asserted the procession of the Spirit from the Father and the Son as from two principles, by denying the alleged fact. The Spirit, he says, proceeds from the Father and Son, not in so far as they are distinct from, but in so far as they are one with, each other. St. Thomas argues (1^a, q. 36, a. 2) that if the Holy Ghost did not proceed from the Son there would be no real distinction between them, since in the Trinity the Persons are only distinguished from each other by mutual relation. This is no more than the development of a principle laid down by St. Augustine and other Fathers. It was, however, rejected by the Scotists.

2. The Greek Fathers commonly expressed their belief by another formula—viz. "from the Father through the Son" (ἐκ τοῦ πατρὸς διὰ τοῦ υἱοῦ), intending by this mode of expression to guard the doctrine that the Father is the principle or ultimate source of the Godhead. This form was not unknown in the West, for it occurs, e.g., in St. Hilary ("De Trin." xii. "ex te," addressed to the Father, "per eum"), and implies, instead of excluding, the belief that the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Son as well as from the Father. Moreover, some Greek Fathers actually use the Latin form. St. Epiphanius does so again and again (τὸ δὲ ἅγιον πνεῦμα παρ' ἀμφοτέρων, "Haer." 74, 7, PG, xlii. 488; ἐκ τοῦ πατρὸς καὶ τοῦ υἱοῦ, "Ancorat." 8; ἆρα θεὸς ἐκ πατρὸς καὶ υἱοῦ τὸ πνεῦμα, ib. 9). So does St. Cyril of Alexandria, who says the Spirit is "the Spirit of Christ and His mind," and no mere minister, since He "knows without teaching all that appertains to Him from whom and in whom He is" ("In Joann." xiv. 25–26, p. 837, ed. Aubert). Other great Fathers of the Greek Church clearly express their belief in the double procession. Thus, St. Athanasius asserts "it is not the Spirit which knits the Word to the Father, but rather the Spirit receives from the Word" (Orat. iii. "Contr. Arian." 24, p. 454 in the Benedictine edition); and again, "Such as we have found the proper relation (ἰδιότητα) of the Son to the Father, such we shall find is that of the Spirit to the Son, and as the Son says, 'All that the Father has is mine,' so we shall find all this through the Son and in the Spirit" ("Ad Serap." iii. 1, p. 552); and then he quotes the "Spirit of the Son" (Gal. iv. 6) and other places in which He is called both the Spirit of the Father and of the Son. Basil speaks of the Spirit as the "utterance" of the Son (ῥῆμα δὲ υἱοῦ τὸ πνεῦμα, "Contr. Eunom." v. p. 304, ed. Benedict.; see also ib. ii. 34, p. 271. In iii. 1, p. 272, the clause παρ' αὐτοῦ τὸ εἶναι ἔχον καὶ ὅλως τῆς αἰτίας ἐκείνης ἐξημμένον is spurious). A very late Father, St. John of Damascus, is the first to reject the Latin statement that the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Son (ἐξ υἱοῦ δὲ τὸ πνεῦμα οὐ λέγομεν, "De Fide Orthodox." i. 8); and although St. Thomas and Petavius consider this an error on his part, Le Quien gives strong reasons for supposing that he only meant to deny that the Son is the ultimate principle of the procession or a principle of it at all, so far as He is distinct from the Father.

Up to this point, then, we meet with nothing but a difference of words, like that which divided the West from most of the Orientals on the use of the term hypostasis; and for a long time each part of the Church was allowed to go its own way in peace. Pope Hormisdas, in a letter to Justin in 521, states the double procession in the Latin form ("proprium Sp. S. ut a Patre et Filio procederet sub una substantia deitatis," Mansi, viii. 521), and met apparently with no opposition. Maximus ("Ad Marin." ed. Combefis, p. 70 seq.) shows that some Greeks (as Le Quien thinks, Monothelites) raised a difficulty on the matter; but Maximus shows that both formulae expressed the same truth. So, on the other hand, Pope Hadrian, in a letter to Charlemagne, defends the Greek formula against the attack of some Latins (Mansi, xiii. 760 seq.). The Latin formula was violently denounced about the same time by John, a Greek monk, otherwise unknown, who charged the Latin monks on Mount Olivet with heresy, but no great result followed. (See the documents in Le Quien, "Diss. Damasc." i. § xiii. seq.)

Unfortunately, the difference of words was used by Photius after his condemnation at Rome, and again when the schism was renewed by Caerularius, as a means of exciting hatred against the Latins. And the strife became more bitter after the addition of the "Filioque" to the Creed even in the local Church of Rome. Enough has been said on these subjects in the articles on the Greek Church and on the Creeds. But something remains to be added here on the doctrine of the Schismatic Greeks.

Had they merely anathematized the Latin formula because they thought it implied two principles of spiration; had they merely denied the right of the Pope to permit the addition to the Creed, all this would have been proof of a schismatical spirit, but would not in itself have involved heresy on the doctrine of the Trinity. In fact, however, the Greeks, beginning with a factious opposition to the Latin terminology, ended in a denial of the Catholic doctrine. Although the Greek Fathers, says Le Quien, and St. John of Damascus, to whom the Greeks constantly appealed, taught the eternal procession of the Holy Ghost from the Father through the Son, the schismatics with one consent, from Caerularius to Beccus (i.e. till about 1274), denied any eternal procession of the Spirit through the Son, and simply admitted that the gifts or temporal manifestation of the Holy Ghost came through the Son. (Le Quien, loc. cit. § xlviii.) Here of course is an absolute opposition, not of terminology, but of doctrine.

A new opinion was devised in a council held against the Patriarch Beccus, who became a Catholic. Examination showed that the form in St. John Damascene, "from the Father through the Son," referred to eternal procession. Thereupon Gregory of Cyprus, the schismatical successor of Beccus, advanced the theory that the Holy Ghost proceeded from the Father through the Son, not in respect to existence, but to effulgence (εἰς ἀΐδιον ἔκφανσιν). There was, according to him, an eternal effulgence, improperly called the Spirit, produced by the Father through the Son, or rather by all three Persons (Le Quien, § xlix. 1). This was a prelude to the notion of the Palamites, the kernel of which consisted, as Combefis puts it, in this, that they considered the ἐνεργήματα and gifts of the Spirit to be eternal and uncreated (Combefis apud Mansi, xxvi. 211).

At Florence, Mark of Ephesus began by a simple objection to the insertion of the "Filioque" in the Creed; but later on he asserted that "through the Son" meant "with the Son," denying any other relation between the Second and Third Persons. Many more instances of Greek theologians who knowingly and of set purpose opposed the Catholic doctrine will be found in Petavius "De Trin." vii. 15. (A very full and accurate account of the whole history of the controversy is given in the first of the dissertations prefixed by Le Quien to his edition of St. John of Damascus. We have also derived much help from Petavius, "De Trinitate," and Kuhn, "Trinitätslehre." Wilhelm and Scannell, "Cath. Theol." i. 294 sqq)

PROCURATOR. The authorized agent or representative of another (Fr. procureur, proctor). Thus it answers to a "proxy," when the question is of a marriage which one of the parties contracts through a representative, and to a "sponsor," when the question is of a baptism where one or both of the god-parents are not able to be present. In either of the above senses, a procurator contracts spiritual affinity not to himself, but to his principal. A procurator is such either in respect of lawsuits entered upon, or in respect of business transactions; in the first case he is judicialis, in the other, extra-judicialis. The procurators or official agents of monasteries of nuns should not hold office more than three years. (Ferraris, Procurator.)

PROCURATOR CLERI. An official appointed as a representative of the clergy and acting at their mandate. He is appointed in synod. His duty is to make (if necessary) respectful remonstrances to the bishop regarding the synodal decrees (Taunton).

PROCURATOR FISCAL. An official attached to a bishop's court as promotor or prosecutor of cases affecting the public welfare or interest of the Church. He is appointed by the bishop or judge of the episcopal court. (Périès, "Le Procureur Fiscal ou Promoteur"; Taunton.)

PROFESSION OF FAITH. [See CREEDS.]

PROFESSION, RELIGIOUS. A religious or regular profession is "a promise freely made and lawfully accepted, whereby a person of the full age required, after the completion of a year of probation, binds him- (or her-) self to a particular religious institute approved by the Church."[1] The full age required is sixteen years, reckoned from the day of birth.[2] The year of novitiate or probation must have been continuous; so that if the novice had interrupted it even for so short a time as two hours, e.g. by leaving the monastery with the intention of entering some other order, the year would have to be begun de novo, from the date when he renewed his resolution of seeking admission to the order. Moreover, the year of probation must be spent in the religious habit, and in a monastery or other house designed for the purpose or approved by the Holy See.

By being "freely made" is meant, with entire personal liberty, with the free command over one's own property, and without prejudice to the rights of third parties. Thus neither a slave, nor a married person (without the consent of the other spouse), nor a bishop already consecrated (without a Papal dispensation) can be validly professed.

The matter of the promise is, the three essential vows of religion—poverty, obedience, and chastity—and any other vow or vows peculiar to the institute which the candidate is entering.

The following is an outline of the manner of profession of a nun, as prescribed in the "Pontificale Romanum":—

The Pontifical office is recited as far as the Gospel. The novices, habited as during their probationary year, each accompanied by two veiled religious, are led from the convent into the church, and go up two and two into the sanctuary; there they kneel; and the priest, officiating in the character of archpriest, requests of the bishop, seated on his throne before the altar, that they may be consecrated. The bishop asks whether they are fit and worthy, and, being assured that they are, bids them come up. They obey, and range themselves in a semicircle round the bishop, who, after a short exhortation, says to them in a loud voice, "Are you willing to persevere in the observance of holy chastity?" Each of them declares her willingness aloud, and after placing her joined hands between those of the bishop, pronounces her perpetual vows. They return to their former place, and kneel down, with heads bowed to the ground; the bishop kneels in front of the altar, and the choir sings the Litanies. After the sentence, "Ut omnibus fidelibus defunctis," &c., and the response, the bishop rises, and, with his mitre on, and the crosier in his hand, solemnly blesses the newly-professed, saying "Vouchsafe, O Lord, to bless and consecrate these Thy servants." The response is made, "We beseech Thee, hear us."

[1] Ferraris.
[2] Conc. Trid. sess. xxv. c. 15, De Reg. et Mon.

After the Litanies the professed rise, "Veni, Creator," is sung, and they withdraw into a robing-room to change their dress. The bishop blesses the different articles of their future costume, and first of all the habit, which they immediately put on. They reappear, two and two, and again form a semicircle round the bishop, who, after the prayers, &c., set down in the ritual, puts the veil on the head of each, the ring on her finger, and the bridal wreath on her head. After several solemn benedictions the Mass continues. At the Offertory the professed come up to lay their offerings on the altar, and at the Communion the bishop imparts to them the sacred particles which he has consecrated for them.

With regard to the right of profession, as also the minimum of age and length of probation, there is considerable diversity in the various approved rules of different orders.

The effects of profession are, first, that nothing short of a Papal dispensation, which would only be given in extremely rare and altogether exceptional cases, can warrant the professed in returning to the world. A religious in any other order can pass into that of the Carthusians, on account of its great austerity. To pass from one order into another which has an easier rule is not permitted without a Papal dispensation; A valid profession secures to its subject the right of maintenance in the convent during life, and the enjoyment of all the rights and privileges of the ecclesiastical state. It annuls any simple vow previously contracted which could not be made compatible with the exact observance of the rule. It cancels a promise of marriage, and even a marriage itself, if not consummated. It releases its subject, so far as ordination is concerned, from the irregularity consequent on illegitimacy; finally, it invests the convent with the ownership of any property belonging to the professed at the date of profession, and also of any subsequently acquired.

The above article applies to what is termed "Solemn Profession," which is now made in comparatively few Religious Congregations of women. For it almost everywhere is now substituted "Simple Profession," which secures the privileges mentioned but is compatible with the retention of the ownership (though without the use or administration) of property. PROMOTION PER SALTUM. [See ORDINATION, p. 630.]

PROMOTOR FIDEI: [See CANONIZATION, p. 114.]

PROMULGATION. That a law should bind, it is necessary that it should be adequately promulgated or published. From and after the date of such promulgation those whom the law concerns are presumed to be acquainted with it, and become liable to the penalties which disobedience entails in case of any infraction of it. Papal rescripts were promulgated by proclamation in acie campi Florae,[1] and by being affixed to the gates of the Vatican; whence came the expression "Publicatio urbi et orbi facta." By the Constitution "Promulgandi" of Pius X. (Sept. 29, 1908) the ordinary method of promulgating pontifical laws is by insertion in the "Acta Apostolicae Sedis," the official organ of the Holy See. A further regulation (Jan. 5, 1910) divides this publication into two parts; the first containing all documents requiring promulgation in order to have the force of law; the second, merely illustrations and explanations of the former. But the Pope expressly reserves to himself the right to determine in exceptional cases any other mode of promulgation. In fine a decree of Dec. 26, 1913, ratifies and declares authentic all legislation published up to that date in the "Acta." The diocesan ordinances and pastorals of bishops are, in general, transmitted by them to the rural deans, who forward copies to the parochial clergy under them; but where the number of the clergy is not very large, they receive such missives direct from the bishop. In either case, the parish priest (or missionary rector, as the case may be), completes the promulgation by reading from the pulpit those portions which concern the laity, and affixing the document to the doors of his church.

Among the pernicious doctrines of modern bureaucracy is that which, while denying validity to Papal or episcopal constitutions unless specially promulgated, makes such promulgation dependent on the consent of the civil government. The exercise by the Pope and the hierarchy of their divinely-conferred function of ruling the flock of Christ is thus circumscribed, and may at any time be rendered nugatory by a hostile government. [EXEQUATUR.] (Zaccaria, "De Varia Ecclesiae praesertim Latinae in Promulgandis Sacris Constitutionibus Disciplina"; Bouix, "De Principiis Juris Canonici," 196 sqq.; Van Hove in "Cath. Enc.")

PROPAGANDA. The sacred congregation of Cardinals de propaganda fide, commonly called the Congregation of Propaganda, which had been contemplated by Gregory XIII., was practically established by Gregory XV. (1622) to guard, direct, and promote the foreign missions. Among other countries subject to its control were the British Isles, North America (except Mexico), Australasia, and the East and West Indies. By the Constitution "Sapienti Consilio" (June 29, 1908) this jurisdiction has been considerably restricted. The British Isles, North America, and certain other non-Catholic countries are now under the Congregation of the Council; that is, they are now under the normal system of Church government.

Urban VIII. (1623–1644) instituted the "College of Propaganda" as part of the same design, where young men of every nation and language might be trained for the priesthood, and prepared for the evangelic warfare against heathenism or heresy. The management of this college the Pope entrusted to the Congregation. Urban caused the present building to be erected from the designs of Bernini. The College possesses a library of 30,000 volumes, among which are the translations of a great number of Chinese works, and a large collection of Oriental MSS. Attached to the library is the Museo Borgia, which contains several interesting MSS., service-books, and autographs, and a collection of objects sent home by the missionaries from the countries where they are stationed, including an extraordinary assortment of idols. [See CONGREGATIONS, ROMAN.]

PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH. The Society for the Propagation of the Faith is an association for assisting in the spread of the Gospel by means of prayer and alms for the support of missionaries. From the very earliest ages of the Church the faithful have helped in these ways when they have not been able to render personal service. The special society for this object was founded at Lyons in 1822. [See MISSIONS, p. 587.]

PROPERTY. [See CHURCH PROPERTY.]

PROPHECY. (1) The biblical meaning of this word is wider than that which is now popularly attached to it. A prophet was not necessarily one who foretold what was to come; he was rather one who spoke, acted, or wrote under the extraordinary influence of God to make known to man the divine counsels and will. The Hebrew word (נָבִיא) clearly indicates this. In Exod. iv. 16, Aaron is appointed to be Moses' "prophet": "He shall speak in thy stead to the people and shall be thy mouth" (see Patrizi "In Evang." l. iii. diss. 13; St. Thomas, 2^a 2^{ae}, q. 171, a. 3). But as the predictive element became prominent the word has gradually been restricted to foretelling. We shall here state briefly the Catholic teaching on prophecy in this sense.

A prophecy is the certain prediction of future events which cannot be known by natural means. This definition discriminates prophecy from revelation of things past or present; from scientific forecasts and predictions; and from mere conjectures as to the future. God, in whose sight all things to come are ever present, is able to communicate to His creatures the knowledge which He possesses. He alone has this power, because foreknowledge of the contingent future is peculiar to Him. Prophecies are the words of His prescience, just as miracles are the works of His omnipotence. Hence a religion supported by prophecies must be divine. They belong to the supernatural order, because, directly or indirectly, they tend to a supernatural end—the salvation of mankind. Most of them directly make known supernatural facts, e.g. the coming of the Messiah, the conversion of the Gentiles, the Last Judgment. Those which directly refer to temporal events in no far off future serve to prove indirectly, by their fulfilment, the veracity of those of the former class which have not yet been fulfilled. It is clear that not all predictions are worthy of credit. If the foreteller does not claim to be God's mouthpiece, and if his life is ungodly, we are not bound to believe him. Although there have been exceptions (e.g. Caiaphas, Jn. xi. 49–52), we may assume that God does not, as a rule, communicate His knowledge to the impious. The credentials of a genuine prophecy are miracles wrought in confirmation and the fulfilment of other predictions made by the prophet. Miracles stamp the speaker as the minister of God, while the fulfilment of what he had previously foretold is the natural and obvious proof of his possessing predictive powers. Fulfilled prophecies serve to prove the divine origin of a religion when they possess the following qualifications: (1) that the prophecy was really such, that is, was made before the event; (2) that the fulfilment exactly answers to the prediction; (3) that the event could not have been foreseen by natural means; (4) that the harmony of prediction and event is not accidental. (See Vatican Council, sess. iii. ct. 3; St. Thomas, 2^a 2^{ae}, qq. 171–176.)

(2) Twelve lessons from the Prophets are sung after the blessing of the Paschal candle and before the blessing of the font on Holy Saturday. Six of these are sung on Whitsun eve also. They were meant originally for the instruction of the catechumens. It is evident from the Sacramentaries and mediaeval writers on ritual that the number varied very considerably in different places and at different times (Merat. on Gavant. tom. i. p. iv. tit. 10).

(3) Lessons from the Prophets at Mass are mentioned by Justin, and were a regular feature in the Gallic, Ambrosian, and Spanish Liturgies. In Rome and Africa, as a rule, there was no lesson in the Mass from the Old Testament (Le Brun, tom. iii. diss. 1). Still, instances of such lessons occur, e.g. on the Ember Saturday in Whitsun week, and occasionally, e.g. on Friday in the same week, a lesson from the Prophets replaces the Epistle.

(4) "Prophetia" was the name in the Gallican Mass for the Benedictus. It was followed by a "Collectio post prophetiam." (Le Brun, tom. iii. diss. iv. a. 3.)

PROPOSITIONS, CONDEMNED. From the earliest times the Church has condemned heretical propositions. The First General Council, for example, anathematized certain propositions of Arius. But the Church also condemns propositions which are not indeed heretical, but are opposed in some lesser degree to soundness in the faith. Thus in 1418, Martin V. (bull "Inter Cunctas") proposed thirty-nine articles for the examination of persons suspected of agreement with Wyclif and Hus. Of these the eleventh puts the question whether they hold that of the forty-five propositions of Wyclif and Hus, condemned at the Council of Constance, all are uncatholic, and of these, some heretical, "some erroneous, others rash and seditious, others offensive to pious ears." Such condemnations have been very common in the modern Church. Sometimes, as in the bull "Unigenitus," the propositions have been condemned in globo—i.e. a number of propositions have been condemned as respectively heretical, false, scandalous, &c. Sometimes, as in the "Auctorem fidei" against the Jansenist synod of Pistoia, each proposition has a particular censure attached to it.

We may thus explain the meaning of the terms of censure. A proposition is "heretical" when it is directly opposed to a truth revealed by God and proposed by the Church; "erroneous," when it is contradictory to a truth deduced from two premises, one an article of faith, the other naturally certain; "proximate to error," when opposed to a proposition deduced with great probability from principles of faith; "haeresim sapiens," when it is capable of a good sense, but seems in the circumstances to have an heretical meaning; "evil sounding" or "offensive to pious ears," when opposed to piety and the reverence due to divine things according to the common mode of speaking; "scandalous," when it gives occasion to think or act amiss; "rash," when opposed to the common sense of the Church in matters of faith and morals. This account is taken from Viva, "De Fide"; but Melchior Canus ("De Loc. Theol." lib. xii. cap. 10) shows that opinions have varied much on the precise import of the minor censures. There is a well-known work "Propositiones Damnatae" by the Jesuit Viva.

PROSE. [See SEQUENCE.]

PROTESTANT. The origin of the name was as follows. At the first Diet of Spires (1526) a decree was agreed to, to the effect that, pending the convocation of a general council, every prince of the German Empire should be free to execute the imperial edict of Worms (1521, by which Luther and his doctrine had been condemned) in such a manner as was consistent with his being prepared to answer for his conduct to God and the Emperor. The adoption of this decree led in practice to much discord and confusion, the princes of the different states being emboldened by it to make and enforce within their own territories any arrangements about religion that might be agreeable to them. Thus, in states and cities where the Lutheran opinions prevailed, the Catholic worship was often forbidden. At the Second Diet of Spires (1529) the majority adopted a new decree to this effect: that those states which had hitherto observed the edict of Worms should continue to observe it; that the other states, in which the new opinions had been introduced, should not, pending the meeting of the council, make any fresh changes in regard to religion; and that, in these last-named states, no preaching against the Sacrament of the altar should be permitted, the Mass should not be abolished, and, if Lutheranism had gained the upper hand, the Catholics were not to be prevented from hearing Mass. Against this decree the Lutheran minority in the Diet (chiefly Duke Frederic of Saxony, the Landgrave of Hesse, and Albert of Brandenburg) protested; the meaning of the protest being that the dissentient princes did not intend to tolerate Catholicism within their borders. The followers of Luther objected to being called Lutherans; the name of "Evangelical," which Luther approved, the Catholics would not concede. Hence the name "Protestant," which implied nothing positive, and might be used indifferently by all who rejected the authority of the Church, came easily into use by common consent. [See REFORMATION.]

It has lately become the fashion among a certain party in the Anglican Church to reject the word "Protestant." But this is the title given to their Church in the coronation oath, in the Bill of Rights, and in the Act of Settlement. "Will you," asks the officiating prelate of the King, "to the utmost of your power maintain . . . the protestant reformed religion established by law?" (Möhler, "Kirchengeschichte," vol. iii.)

PROTONOTARY (πρῶτος, notarius). In early times this title, which seems to have been first used at Constantinople in the eighth century, meant "the chief of the notaries," and corresponded to primicerius notariorum, the term then in use at Rome. After 800, the title of protonotary was introduced in the West, and for a long time past it has designated, not the chief, but any member of the important and dignified College of Protonotaries Apostolic in the Roman Curia. Their great and varied privileges are described by Ferraris. Tradition assigns to St. Clement in the first century the institution of the notaries, seven in number; Sixtus V. raised the number to twelve.

But their importance gradually diminished until by the end of the eighteenth century they had practically disappeared. Gregory XVI. revived the office by creating seven protonotaries called "protonotarii de numero participantium," because they had a share in the revenues.

Besides the above, the popes were wont to appoint honorary protonotaries. By the Motu Proprio "Inter Multiplices" (Feb. 21, 1905) Protonotaries are divided into four classes: (1) "Protonotarii Apostolici de numero Participantium," who exercise their office in connection with the acts of consistories and congregations; (2) "Protonotarii Apostolici Supranumerarii"; (3) "Protonotarii Apostolici ad instar (sc. Participantium)"; (4) "Protonotarii Titulares seu Honorarii." The privileges, &c., of the various classes are defined in the Motu Proprio. (The last part of the art. from Kirsch in "Cath. Enc."; see also Ferraris; Smith and Cheetham.)

PROTOPRESBYTER. The protopapas, or chief of the clergy of the second order, was anciently so called in the Eastern Church. In the acts of the Synod of the Oak (401), Arsacius, the protopresbyter of the Church of Constantinople, figures as a witness against his own archbishop, St. John Chrysostom. Apparently the term was equivalent to "archpriest." (Smith and Cheetham.)

PROVIDENCE, SISTERS OF. There are several religious congregations of this name. The chief are: (1) Daughters of Providence founded by Mme. Polaillon at Paris in 1647, for the protection of young girls. In the course of time their activities embraced elementary schools, orphanages, asylums, and the care of the sick in hospitals and in their homes. (Hélyot; Heimbucher, "Orden und Kongregationen.")

(2) Sisters of Providence of the Institute of Charity (Rosminian Sisters). The objects are the teaching of poor girls and the care of the sick. Their constitutions were drawn up by Antonio Rosmini, of whose Institute of Charity they form a branch. [See ROSMINIANS.]

PROVINCE. The territory, comprising usually several dioceses, within which an archbishop or metropolitan exercises jurisdiction. In rare cases—e.g. Glasgow and Olmütz—there is an archbishop without suffragans.

A modern theory derives the provincial councils and metropolitans of the primitive Church by direct imitation from those assemblies and their presidents by which civil affairs were conducted in the various provinces of the Roman Empire.[1] The president of such an assembly (κοινόν, concilium) was, it is said, called the sacerdos provinciae; the members were called σύνεδροι or legati; here we have the original type of a metropolitan and bishops sitting in council. But till it can be shown that these σύνεδροι were, as Christian bishops were from the first, invested with permanent powers of government and administration within certain local limits, the resemblance of the two institutions cannot be said to be very close. Of course there can be no doubt that the boundaries of many ecclesiastical provinces merely conformed themselves to those of the civil provinces; the convenience of such an arrangement would be obvious. [See ARCHBISHOP; METROPOLITAN; DIOCESE.]

PROVINCIAL. The religious who, being appointed either by the general of the order or by the chapter, has the general superintendence of the affairs of the order within the limits of a certain province. These provinces have a greater or less geographical extension according to the number of monasteries established within them; when the monasteries are numerous, caeteris paribus, the provinces will be smaller. In 1580 the residences and colleges of the Society of Jesus [JESUITS] were distributed among twenty-one provinces; this implies the existence of the same number of provincials.

PROVISION, CANONICAL. By this is meant the regular conferring of, and induction into, ecclesiastical functions. It has three principal parts or stages—designation, collation or institution, and installation. [See BISHOP, IV.; NOMINATION; COLLATION TO A BENEFICE; and INSTALLATION.]

PROVISORS, STATUTE OF. [See PREMUNIRE.]

PROVOST (praepositus). Professor Cheetham has collected six different senses in which the word praepositus was used in the first eight centuries: (1) as the president or chairman of any meeting; (2) as the chief of a body of canons; (3) as the second in authority under an abbot, or the head of a subordinate house [see PRIOR]; (4) as that member of a chapter who manages the estates; besides two senses of minor importance. Referring to (2), the provost of a cathedral chapter was anciently the archdeacon; the provost of a collegiate chapter was the first dignitary among the canons. At the present day, in Austria, Prussia, Bavaria, and England, the cathedral chapters are presided over by provosts; in France and other parts of Germany by deans. In Austria the provost of a cathedral has the title and privileges of a prelate; the provost of Munich has the right of wearing the mitre in processions. Provosts in Austria are nominated by the Emperor; in England, and the other countries named, by the Pope. (Smith and Cheetham; Taunton; "Kirchenlex.")

PRUDENCE. [See CARDINAL VIRTUES.]

PRYMER (PRIMER). The Prymer was a name given in England to a popular manual containing the Hours of the Blessed Virgin, the dirge, penitential, and gradual psalms, Pater, Ave, Creed, Commandments, Litany, commendations, and other occasional prayers. It is only when different parts of the offices, prayers, &c., are translated into English that the word Prymer is used. Thus the title runs, "The Prymer of Salysbury Use," "The Prymer in Englysshe," "The Prymer in Englysshe and Latin," &c. Prymers were published by the authority of King Henry VIII. after he had asserted the royal supremacy, and again by the Reformers, who published Prymers to suit their own way of thinking. We owe to Maskell a most learned and interesting edition of the English Prymer from a MS. now in the British Museum, not later than 1410. The MS. has no title, but the contents answer to those of the Prymer, and Maskell traces the word back to the fourteenth century. (From Maskell's Dissertation on the Prymer, "Monument. Rit." vol. iii.)

PSALTER (Psalterium). The book of Psalms as used for liturgical purposes. The Western Church has used (and still uses) two different Latin versions: the Roman and the Gallican. Both are due to St. Jerome, the former being his first revision, the latter his second revision. This latter from being circulated in Gaul received the name "Gallican," and ultimately supplanted the other, which is now used only at St. Peter's at Rome, at St. Mark's, Venice, and at Milan.

The practice of reciting the whole Psalter once in every week does not appear to have prevailed in the early Church, nor did it ever obtain in the synagogue worship. Its introduction is probably due to the solitaries of the fourth and fifth centuries. St. Benedict (after the year 500) imposed it on his monks, reminding them that their predecessors in the religious life made it a point of going through it daily from beginning to end. Both in the East and West the continuous recitation of the 150 psalms took firm hold on popular devotion, though in some places (as in the Ambrosian rite) the finishing it within a fortnight was deemed sufficient. Previously, in the Roman Church, matins in summer had three psalms only; in winter, four; and on Sundays and Feast days, nine, as now ("Liber Diurnus," tom. iii. p. 7). The Psalmody of Lauds appears to have been identical with that disused only in our own time. Especially has to be noted the Saturday sequence psalm, "Bonum est confiteri," the canticle, "Audite coeli," of Moses, and Psalms cxlviii., cxlix., terminating with the general Doxology "Laudate Dominum in sanctis ejus." This perpetuates the pre-Christian usage of Jerusalem. The daily recital of the "Beati immaculati" began probably after the peace of the Church, but two centuries later was still sufficiently novel to justify St. Benedict in modifying it for his monks. Vespers had proper psalms (at least in part), prominent among them being Psalm cxl., "Domine clamavi," whence our versicle "Dirigatur," so constantly repeated at that hour, and giving origin to the incensing of the altar that follows. Compline in those ages was barely struggling into life. There was thus no provision for a weekly recitation of the Psalter.

Festival days had their proper psalms. St. Benedict assumes that his monks were acquainted with their varying order and gives no particulars about them. They were probably the very same as those of the Breviary of our own day. The inclusion of the "Venite, exultemus" in the Nocturns of the Epiphany points to an age in which the Invitatory psalm was not known in Rome. And all tradition evinces the chant of the "Dixit Dominus," with the four psalms immediately following, to have been looked upon as specially appropriate to Sunday and Festival vespers, and the first psalms of the Psalter to have been similarly judged the right ones with which to begin the matins of such days. Indeed, so much was this the case that, up to our own time, Roman devotion to SS. Agnes and Agatha has refused to forsake the primitive practice on the festival days of these holy virgins.

When the weekly recitation of the whole Psalter was established, Feasts, whether occurring on Sundays or on week days, were, however, allowed to retain their proper psalms. Thus, St. Benedict laid down that the matins on Saints' days should have the same psalms as the Sunday office. At the outset this rule only slightly interrupted the order of the Psalter, and led to the omission of but few of the psalms during the week. However, in the course of time, the multiplication of Saints' offices made the weekly recitation of the Psalter a rare exception. To remedy this abuse, Pius X., by his Constitution "Divino Afflatu" (Nov. 1, 1911), restored the weekly recitation of the Psalter. Further, he equalized the daily office by breaking up the longer psalms into portions and making these portions equivalent to single psalms. Thus the Sunday matins no longer has eighteen Psalms, but only nine, or rather six, the ninth Psalm (Confitebor) being split up into four portions. In making these changes, the Holy Father had doubtless before him, as a guide and a warning, the drastic reform drawn up by Cardinal Quiñonez in the sixteenth century and approved for private recitation for more than thirty years, until its abolition by St. Pius V. in 1568. This was a revolution rather than a reform. Antiphons, responsaries, little chapters, versicles, and responses were struck out, and all the hours had only three psalms each. But the weekly recitation of the Psalter and the equalization of the daily offices were sound principles of this reform, and were adopted by Pius X. It was Quiñonez' breviary which Cranmer took as a model when framing the matins and even-song of his prayer book. Indeed he copied word for word in his preface a portion of Quiñonez' preface. He was, of course, still more revolutionary than Quiñonez, reducing the hours to two, and arranging for the recital of the Psalter only once a month. (See Burton and Myers, "The New Psalter and its Use"; Thurston in "Cath. Enc."; Baudot, "The Roman Breviary," tr., p. 41 sqq.; Bäumer-Biron, "Hist. du Bréviaire," i. 242 sqq.; for the story of Quiñonez' reform, ii. 126 sqq.)

PSALTER, THE JESUS. An old English pre-Reformation devotion to the Holy Name of Jesus. It consists of 150 invocations of the Holy Name, divided into fifteen decades, each followed by a number of verses in imitation of the verses of the Psalms. The author is believed to have been Richard Whytford, a Brigittine monk of Syon House, Middlesex, in the fifteenth century. The original edition, printed (probably) in 1520, was much longer than the form given in Challoner's "Garden of the Soul," which is now commonly found in our prayer-books. Challoner also modernized the language. (Thurston, Prayer Books, in "Cath. Enc.")

PSEUDO-ISIDORE. [See FALSE DECRETALS.]

PUBLIC HONESTY: [See IMPEDIMENTS OF MARRIAGE.]

PULPIT. The old custom was to preach from the altar or episcopal chair. But apparently even in St. Augustine's time the ambo, originally meant for readers and singers, and large enough to hold several persons easily, was used for preaching, and so was raised and narrowed into the form of the pulpit. It should be placed on the Gospel side (S.C.R., February 20, 1862), unless that side is already occupied by the bishop's throne. The bishop, according to the "Caer. Episc." should preach, if possible, from the throne or from a faldstool at the altar. If this is inconvenient, he should be accompanied to the pulpit by the two canons who assist at the throne. (Montault, "Traité de la Construct. et des Églises.")

PURGATORY. A place in which souls who depart this life in the grace of God suffer for a time because they still need to be cleansed from venial sins, or have still to pay the temporal punishment due to mortal sins, the guilt and the eternal punishment of which have been remitted. Purgatory is not a place of probation; for the time of trial, the period during which the soul is free to choose eternal life or eternal death, ends with the separation of soul and body. All the souls in Purgatory have died in the love of God, and are certain to enter heaven. But as yet they are not pure and holy enough to see God, and God's mercy allots them a place and a time for cleansing and preparation. At last, Christ will come to judge the world, and then there will be only two places left, heaven and hell.

The Councils of Florence ("Decret. Unionis") and Trent ("Decret. de Purgat." sess. xxv.; cf. sess. vi. can. 30, sess xxii. "De Sacrific. Miss." c. 2 et can. 3), define "that there is a Purgatory, and that the souls detained there are helped by the prayers of the faithful and, above all, by the acceptable sacrifice of the altar." Further the definitions of the Church do not go, but the general teaching of theologians explains the doctrine of the councils, and embodies the general sentiment of the faithful. Theologians, then, tell us that souls after death are cleansed from the stain of their venial sins by turning with fervent love to God and by detestation of those offences which marred, though they did not entirely destroy, their union with Him. St. Thomas and Suarez hold that this act of fervent love and perfect sorrow is made in the first instant of the soul's separation from the body, and suffices of itself to remove all the stain of sin. (See the quotations in Jungmann, "De Novissimis," p. 103.) Be this as it may, it is certain that the time of merit expires with this life, and that the debt of temporal punishment must still be paid. The souls in Purgatory suffer the pain of loss—i.e. are in anguish, because their past sins exclude them for a season from the sight of God, and they understand in a degree previously impossible the infinite bliss from which they are excluded and the foulness of the least offence against the God Who has created and redeemed them. They also undergo "the punishment of sense"—i.e. positive pains which afflict the soul. It is the common belief of the Western Church that they are tormented by material fire, and it is quite conceivable that God should give matter the power of constraining and afflicting even separated souls. But the Greeks have never accepted this belief, nor was it imposed upon them when they returned to Catholic unity at Florence. The saints and doctors of the Church describe these pains as very terrible. They last, no doubt, for very different lengths of time, and vary in intensity according to the need of individual cases. It is supposed that the just who are alive when Christ comes again, and who stand in need of cleansing, will be purified in some extraordinary way—e.g. by the troubles of the last days, by vehement contrition, &c., but all this is mere conjecture. In conclusion, it must be remembered that there is a bright as well as a dark side to Purgatory. The souls there are certain of their salvation, they are willing sufferers, and no words, according to St. Catherine of Genoa, can express the joy with which they are filled, as they increase in union with God. She says their joy can be compared to nothing except the greater joy of Paradise itself. (See for numerous citations, Jungmann, "De Noviss." cap. 1, a. 6.)

This may suffice as an account of theological teaching on the subject. It must not be supposed that any such weight belongs to legends and speculations which abound in mediaeval chronicles (see Maskell, "Monument. Rit." vol. ii. p. lxxi.), and which often appear in modern books. The Council of Trent (sess. xxv. Decret. de Purgat.), while it enjoins bishops to teach "the sound doctrine of Purgatory, handed down by the holy Fathers and councils," bids them refrain "in popular discourses" from those "more difficult and subtle questions which do not tend to edification," and "to prohibit the publication and discussion of things which are doubtful or even appear false."

Scripture, it may be justly said, points to the existence of Purgatory. There is no fellowship between the darkness of sin and selfishness and God, "in whom there is no darkness at all," so that the degree of our purity is the measure of our union with God here on earth. Perfect purity is needed that we may see God face to face. When God appears "we shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is." "Every man who hath this hope in him purifieth himself, as he is pure" (1 Jn. iii. 2, 3). Without holiness "no man shall see the Lord" (Heb. xii. 14). This work of inner cleansing may be effected by our correspondence with grace. We sow as we reap: deeds of humility increase humility; works of love deepen the love of God and man in the soul. Often, too, God's mercy in this life weans the soul from the love of the world, and affliction may be a special mark of His compassion. "Whom the Lord loves He disciplines, and He scourges every son whom He receives" (Heb. x. 6). He disciplines us "for our good, that we may participate in His sanctity" (ib. 10). Now, it is plain that in the case of many good people this discipline has not done its work when death overtakes them. Many faults, e.g. of bad temper, vanity, and the like, and infirmity consequent on more serious sins of which they have repented, cleave to them still. Surely, then, the natural inference is that their preparation for heaven is completed after death. By painful discipline in this world or the next, God finishes the work in them which He has begun, and perfects it "unto the day of Jesus Christ" (Phil. i. 6).

We would appeal to those general principles of Scripture rather than to particular texts often alleged in proof of Purgatory. We doubt if they contain an explicit and direct reference to it. St. Paul (1 Cor. iii. 10) speaks of some who will be saved "yet as through fire," but he seems to mean the fire in which Christ is to appear at the last. He himself, he says, has established the Corinthian Church on the only possible foundation—viz. Jesus Christ. Others have built it up from this foundation, or in other words, have developed the Christian faith and life of its members. These teachers, however, must take care how they build, even on the one foundation. "Each man's work will be made manifest, for the day will show it, because it [the day of judgment] is revealed in fire, and the fire will test each man's work of what kind it is: if any man's work which he has built up [on the foundation] remains, he will receive a reward; if any man's work is burnt down he will suffer loss—[i.e. he will forfeit the special reward and glory of good teachers], but he himself will be saved, but so as through fire." The man who has built up with faulty material is depicted as still working at the building when the fire of Christ's coming seizes it and he himself escapes, but only as a man does from a house on fire, leaving the work which is consumed behind him. St. Paul, if we have caught his meaning, speaks of the end of the world, not of the time between death and judgment, and so, we think, does our Lord in Mt. xii. 32. The sin against the Holy Ghost, he tells us, will not be forgiven, either "in this age" (ἐν τούτῳ τῷ αἰῶνι)—i.e. in the world which now is—or in the future age (ἐν τῷ μέλλοντι)—i.e. in the new world, or rather new period which is to be ushered in by the coming of the Messiah in glory. There is no hope of forgiveness here or hereafter for the sin against the Holy Ghost, but it does not follow, and, granting our interpretation, it would be inconsistent with Catholic doctrine to believe, that other sins may be forgiven in the age to come. Thus, "the age to come" would have precisely the same sense as the corresponding Hebrew words (הָעוֹלָם הַבָּא—see, e.g., "Pirke Avoth," cap. 4, and for many other instances Buxtorf, "Lex. Rabbin. et Chald." sub voc. עולם), which is in itself a strong argument, and the meaning we have given is fully supported by New Testament usage (see particularly τοῦ αἰῶνος ἐκείνου τυχεῖν, Lk. xx. 35, and συντέλεια τοῦ αἰῶνος, Mt. xiii. 39, 40, 49, xxiv. 3, xxviii. 20—decisive passages, as we venture to think). Maldonatus decidedly rejects the supposed allusion to Purgatory in Mt. v. 25, 26. "Be well-disposed to thine adversary [i.e. the offended brother] quickly, even till thou art on the way with him [i.e. it is never too soon and never, till life is over, too late to be reconciled], lest the adversary hand thee over to the judge, and the judge hand thee over to the officer, and thou be cast into prison. Amen, I say unto thee thou shalt not go out thence till thou shalt pay the last farthing." Maldonatus follows St. Augustine in the opinion that the "last farthing" will never and can never be paid, and that the punishment is eternal. Just in the same way it is said of the unmerciful slave (Lk. xviii. 34) that he was to be handed over to the tormentors "till he should pay all the debt." Yet a slave could never pay so enormous a sum as 10,000 talents. "Semper solvet, sed nunquam persolvet," "He will always pay, but never pay off," is the happy comment of Remigius (and so Chrysostom and Augustine; see Trench, "Parables," p. 164). The reader will find the various interpretations of these texts fairly discussed in Estius and Maldonatus or in Meyer. Döllinger, however ("First Age of the Church," p. 249), sees an "unmistakable reference" to Purgatory in Mt. xii. 32, v. 26.

In two special ways, writers of the early Church, as Cardinal Newman points out ("Development," p. 385 seq.), were led to formulate the belief in Purgatory. In the articles on the sacrament of Penance, we have shown the strength of primitive belief in the need of satisfaction for sin by painful works, and in the article on Penance the rigour with which satisfaction was exacted. Indeed, the belief in Purgatory lay dormant in the primitive Church to a certain extent, just because the fervour of the first Christians was so vehement, just because the severity of penance here might well be thought to exclude the need of purifying discipline after death. But what was to be thought of those who were reconciled on their death-bed, before their penance was ended or even begun, or in whom outward penance for some cause or other had failed to do the whole of its work? Clement of Alexandria supplies a clear answer to this question: "Even if a man passes out of the flesh, he must put off his passions, ere he is able to enter the eternal dwelling, . . . through much discipline, therefore, stripping off his passions, our faithful man will go to the mansion which is better than the former, bearing in the special penance which appertains to him (ἰδίωμα τῆς μετανοίας) a very great punishment for the sins he has committed after baptism" ("Strom." vi. 14, p. 794, ed. Potter). He speaks of the angels "who preside over the ascent" of souls as detaining those who have preserved any worldly attachment (iv. 18, p. 616), and with at least a possible reference to Purgatory, of fire as purifying sinful souls (vii. 6. p. 851). The genuine and contemporary Acts of St. Perpetua, who suffered under Septimius Severus at the very beginning of the third century, plainly imply the belief in Purgatory. The saint, according to a part of the Acts written by herself, saw in a vision her brother who was dead, and for whom she had prayed. He was suffering, and she went on praying. Then she beheld him in another and more cheerful vision, and "knew that he was translated from his place of punishment" (de poena; Ruinart, "Act. Mart. S. Perpet." &c., vii. viii.). Cyprian (Ep. lv. 20; ed. Hartel, 638), in answer to the objection that the relaxation of penitential discipline in the case of the lapsed would weaken the courage and stability which made martyrs, insists that after all the position of one who had fallen away and then been admitted to martyrdom would always be much less desirable than that of a martyr. "It is one thing for a man to be cast into prison and not to leave it till he pay the last farthing, another thing to receive at once the reward of faith and virtue; one thing to be tormented long with sorrow for sins, to be purified and cleansed for a long time by the fire, another to purge away all sins by martyrdom." Cardinal Newman urges that these words, especially "missum in carcerem," "purgari diu igne," "seem to go beyond" a mere reference to penitential discipline in this life, and the Benedictine editor is of the same mind.

Next we can prove the early date of belief in Purgatory from the habit of praying for the dead, a habit which the Church inherited from the Synagogue. The words in 2 Macc. xii. 42 seq. are familiar to everybody. Judas found ἱερώματα, or things consecrated to idols, under the garments of those who had been slain in battle against Gorgias. Whereupon he made a collection of money and sent to Jerusalem, "to offer sacrifice for sin, doing very well and excellently, reasoning about the dead. For unless he had expected those who had fallen before [the others] to rise again, it would have been superfluous and absurd to pray for the dead. Therefore, seeing well [ἐμβλέπων] that a most fair reward is reserved for those who sleep in piety, his design was holy and pious, whence he made the propitiation for the dead that they might be loosed from sin."[1] This passage implies a belief both in Purgatory and the efficacy of prayers for the departed, and takes for granted that this belief would be held by all who believed in the resurrection. This is not the place to discuss the canonical or even the historical character of the book. It represents a school of Jewish belief at the time, and we know from xv. 37 that it was written before the destruction of Jerusalem. Second Maccabees was composed in Greek, but we have the fullest evidence from Hebrew and Chaldee sources that the later Jews prayed for the dead and recognized the need of purification after death. Weber ("Altsynag. Paläst. Theol." p. 326 seq.) thus sums up the Rabbinical doctrine: "Only a few are sure of [immediate] entrance into heaven; the majority are at their death still not ripe for heaven, and yet will not be absolutely excluded from it. Accordingly, we are referred to a middle state, a stage between death and eternal life, which serves for the final perfecting." Those who were not perfectly just here suffer "the pain of fire, and the fire is their penance." The "Pesikta," a very ancient commentary on sections of the Law and Prophets, composed at the beginning of the third century after Christ, describes the penance as lasting usually twelve months, of which six are spent in extreme heat, six in extreme cold. The common Rabbinical doctrine that Israelites, except those guilty of some special sin, do at last enter heaven, and the fantastical shapes which the Jewish doctrine of Purgatory has assumed, do not concern us here. But it is well to observe that the Jews have never ceased to pray for their dead. The following is from the prayer said at the house of mourners, as given in a modern Jewish prayer-book, issued with authority:—"May our reading of the law and our prayer be acceptable before Thee for the soul of N. Deal with it according to thy great mercy, opening to it the gates of compassion and mercy and the gates of the garden of Eden, and receive it in love and favour; send thy holy angels to it to conduct it, and give it rest beneath the Tree of Life." (שִׂיחַ יִצְחָק "Meditation of Isaac," a Jewish prayer-book according to the German and Polish rite, pp. 336–7.[2])

Against the Jewish custom and doctrine Christ and His Apostles made no protest, though both custom and doctrine existed in their time. Nay, "St. Paul himself [cf. 2 Tim. i. 16–18 with iv. 19] gives an example of such a prayer. The Ephesian Onesiphorus, mentioned in the Second Epistle to St. Timothy, was clearly no longer among the living. St. Paul praises this man for his constant service to him, but does not, as elsewhere, send salutations to him, but only to his family; for him he desires a blessing from the Lord, and prays for him that the Lord will grant he may find mercy with Christ at the day of judgment." The words put in inverted commas are from Döllinger's "First Age of the Church," p. 251; but many Protestant commentators, among whom we may mention De Wette and Huther, who is eminent among recent commentators on the Pastoral Epistles, lean to the same interpretation.

All this considered, it cannot seem strange that every ancient liturgy contains prayers for the dead. To understand the strength of this argument we must remember that these liturgies are written in many different languages, and represent the practice in every part of the ancient world. The very first Christian who has left Latin writings speaks of "oblations for the dead" as a thing of course (Tertull. "De Coron." 3, PL, ii. 79). It is often said that prayers for the dead do not necessarily imply belief in Purgatory, and this is true. The words, e.g., in the Clementine liturgy, "We offer to Thee for all Thy saints who have pleased Thee from ancient days, patriarchs, prophets, just men, apostles, martyrs, confessors, bishops, presbyters, deacons, subdeacons, readers, singers, virgins, widows, laymen, and all whose name Thou knowest," do not imply that those for whom the sacrifice is offered are in a state of suffering. But Tertullian ("Monog." 10, PL, ii. 912) connects prayer for the dead with Purgatory when he says of a woman who has lost her husband that "she prays for his soul, and supplicates for him refreshment [refrigerium], and a part in the first resurrection, and offers on the anniversaries of his death [dormitionis]." So, too, St. Cyril of Jerusalem ("Mystagog." 5, PG, xxxii. 1116): "If when a king had banished certain who had given him offence, their connections should weave a crown and offer it to him on behalf of those under his vengeance, would he not grant a respite to their punishments? In the same manner we, when we offer to Him our supplications for those who have fallen asleep, though they be sinners, weave no crown, but offer up Christ sacrificed for our sins, propitiating our merciful God, both for them and for ourselves." Still the doctrine was not fully established in the West till the time of Gregory the Great. Some of the Greeks conceived that all, however perfect, must pass through fire in the next world. So, e.g., Origen, "In Num." Hom. xxv. 6, "In Ps. xxvi." Hom. iii. 1, PG, xii. 769. St. Augustine had, indeed, the present doctrine of Purgatory clearly before his mind, but had no fixed conviction

[1] This sentence is, of course, ungrammatical; but so is the Greek. A part of 2 Macc. is more like rough notes than a finished composition.

[2] The קַדִּישׁ is recited at morning and evening prayer for deceased parents during eleven months of the year of mourning. Formerly it was said for the whole year. It is one of the few prayers in the Ritual which are in Chaldee instead of Hebrew, but there are internal signs that it comes from a lost Hebrew original.

on the point. In his work "De VIII Dulcitii Quaestionibus" (§ 13; PL, xl. 156), written about 420, he says it is "not incredible" that imperfect souls will be "saved by some purgatorial fire," to which they will be subjected for varying lengths of time according to their needs. A little later, in the "De Civitate," he expresses his belief in Purgatory as if he were certain (xxi. 13, PL, xli. 731), or nearly so (xx. 25), but again speaks doubtfully (xxi. 26, "forsitan verum est") and in the "Enchiridion" (69, PL, xl. 265). Very different is Gregory's tone: "Ante judicium purgatorius ignis credendus est." ("Dial." iv. 39, PL, lxxvii. 396.) (Billot, "De Novissimis," p. 85; Scheeben-Atzberger, "Dogmatik," iv. 843 sqq., good bibliography; Anderdon, "Purgatory Surveyed"; Coleridge, "The Prisoners of the King.")

PURIFICATION, as distinct from ablution, is the pouring of wine into the chalice after the priest's communion, the wine being drunk by the priest. This purification is not of ancient date. "Liturgical writers," says Le Brun ("Explication de la Messe," P. v. a. 9, § 3), "down to the treatise on the mysteries by Cardinal Lothair, afterwards Pope under the name of Innocent III., at the end of the twelfth century, simply note that the priest washes his hands, that the water was thrown into a clean and decent place, called the piscina, and that [the water] used to wash the chalice was thrown into the same place." But Innocent III., fifteen or sixteen years after writing his treatise "De Mysteriis," laid it down that the priest should always use wine to purify the chalice, and drink it, unless he was going to say another Mass.

PURIFICATION OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN. The Levitical law (Lev. xii. 2 seq.) declared women unclean for seven days after the birth of a male child; it excluded them from the sanctuary for thirty-three days more; on the fortieth they had to appear in the temple and to offer a lamb one year old for a holocaust and a young pigeon or turtle-dove as a sin-offering. In the case of the poor it was enough to offer two turtle-doves or young pigeons, one as a holocaust and the other as a sin-offering. The Blessed Virgin was not bound by this law, since the child born of her was conceived by the Holy Ghost (see Lev. xii. 2 and St. Thomas, 3ª, q. 37, a. 4). But her divine Son subjected Himself to the burdens of the law that He might set His seal to its divine origin, remove occasion of cavil, and leave us an example of humility; and similar motives no doubt induced the Virgin herself to undergo the rite of purification. It is this event which the Church celebrates in the feast which bears that name, and is kept for a reason virtually given already on the fortieth day after Christmas, i.e. February 2. If, however, we turn to the Mass for the day, we find no less prominence given to two other events which were simultaneous with the purification. Candles are blessed and carried in procession to remind us how the holy old man Simeon met our Lord, took Him in his arms, and declared Him the light of the Gentiles and the glory of Israel. Next, in the collect, epistle, and the gospel there are marked references to the fact that our Lord was at the same time presented in the temple before God and redeemed with five holy shekels (Lk. ii. 22, cf. Exod. xiii. 2; Num. viii. 16, xviii. 15). Indeed, these two latter incidents are more prominent in the Mass and office than that of the Blessed Virgin's purification, and it is noteworthy that the Preface in the Mass is the same as that of Christmas, not the one which is proper to the feasts of the Blessed Virgin. The Greeks number the festival amongst those of our Lord, and call it ὑπαντή, ὑπαπαντή, i.e. the meeting of Christ with Simeon and Anna. The old Latin title "occursus," "obviatio," points in the same direction. So Bede calls it "Oblatio Christi ad templum," and in the Ambrosian rite it is still reckoned among the solemnities of our Lord's life. On the other hand, the name in the Roman Missal and Breviary, viz. "Purificatio B.V.M.," stamps it as a feast of the Blessed Virgin. The English name Candlemas refers of course to the candles blessed and carried in procession before Mass.

We have the first certain traces of the observance in the East. The "Peregrinatio Etheriae" speaks of the feast as "Quadragesima de Epiphania," that is, the fortieth day after the Epiphany. No Father of the first five centuries mentions it, for the homily of Methodius on the feast is probably due to Methodius of Constantinople in the ninth century, and in any case is certainly not by Methodius of Tyre, who lived at the end of the third. Similar homilies attributed to Cyril of Jerusalem, Amphilochius and Gregory Nyssen are admitted on all hands to be spurious. In the year 543, says Fleury ("H.E." livr. xxxiii. 7), "they began to celebrate at Constantinople the feast of the Purification, named by the Greeks Hypapante," and he refers to the notes of Baronius on the martyrology for February 2. Fleury's statement is undoubtedly accurate. But there is nothing incredible in that of Cedrenus that there was a local celebration at Antioch begun under the Emperor Justin in 526, while Tillemont ("Mém." tom. 1, note 7 on the life of Christ) infers from a passage in the life of the abbot Theodosius that the day was kept in the Church of Jerusalem as early as the middle of the fifth century. We cannot say for certain when it was introduced in the West, and the conjecture of Baronius that Pope Gelasius, who abolished the heathen festival of the Lupercalia in the month of February, persuaded the people to accept the feast of the Purification instead, is only a conjecture and not a very probable one. Be that as it may, we have evidence that the feast was known to Bede ("De Rat. Temp." cap. 12, PL, xc. 351), who died in 735. It is, moreover, mentioned in the Sacramentary of St. Gregory and in the Capitularies of Charlemagne (in the latter under the modern title, Purificatio S. Mariae; see Thomassin, "Traité des Festes," livr. ii. ch. 11), and after that time it is clearly recognized everywhere. The candles borne in procession and held in the hand at Mass are spoken of by Bede, loc. cit., and by St. Eligius ("Hom. ii. in die Purificationis S. Mariae"), who was bishop of Noyon from 640–648. On the other hand, it does not seem possible to trace the rite for the blessing of the candles beyond the eleventh century. (See Kellner, "Heortology"; Duchesne, "Christian Worship," 271, 479; Holweck, "Fasti Mariani," 18.)

PURIFICATOR. [See MUNDATORY.]

PURIFIER. [See MUNDATORY.]

PYX. A vase in which the Blessed Sacrament is reserved. The word occurs in this sense in a decree of Pope Leo IV., who reigned from 847–885 (Mansi, "Concil." xiv. 891). The pyx should be of silver, gilt inside, and covered with a silk veil. It is not consecrated, but the Missal gives a form for the blessing of a pyx by the bishop or priest with episcopal faculties ("Manuale Decret." p. 76 note). QUADRAGESIMA. [See LENT, p. 519.]

QUADRIVIUM. [See UNIVERSITY, p. 835.]

QUAESTORES. Persons appointed by the Popes and bishops who announced the indulgences for those who joined or supported the Crusades, contributed to the building of churches, to monasteries, &c., and collected the alms given for these objects. The Fourth General Council of the Lateran (in 1215) enjoined the Quaestors to be modest and discreet. They were not to be received unless they could produce letters of authorisation, and were only to propose to the people what these letters contained. Similar regulations were made by the Council of Vienne in 1311. The Council of Trent (sess. xxi. De Ref. cap. 9) declared that these Quaestors had occasioned intolerable scandal, that the proposed remedies had been inefficacious, and abolished the office altogether.

QUATER TENSES (Quatre temps). An old English name for the Ember Days (q.v.)

QUIETISM is a name given to a dangerous tendency rather than to any definite system, for persons called by the common name of Quietists have differed seriously from each other, and have advanced to different degrees of delusion. The common tendency consists in making perfection here on earth consist in a state of uninterrupted contemplation (see Bossuet, "États d'Oraison," livr. 1) during which the soul remains quiet or passive under the influence of God's Spirit, without forming the ordinary acts of faith, hope, love, &c., without desiring heaven or fearing hell. [See HESYCHIASTS.]

Molinos, a Spanish priest, born at Saragossa in 1627,[1] was the first Quietist of modern times. He spent a great part of his life at Rome, and, while there, published in Spanish his "Spiritual Guide" which was translated into Italian, Latin, French, German, English (1688, 1775), and other languages. He maintained not only the merits of passive contemplation without hope or desire, but also that the soul in this state neither gained by the practice of good works nor suffered by gross sins, which last only affected the lower part of the nature and could not tarnish the purity of a contemplative soul. In 1685 the Inquisition censured 68 propositions of Molinos and condemned the author to perpetual imprisonment, in which he died, having recanted his errors, in 1696.[2]

Quietism crossed the Alps, stripped, however, of its gross and directly immoral part. It was propagated by Malaval at Marseilles in his "Pratique facile pour élever l'Ame à la Contemplation." This book also was condemned at Rome, and Malaval submitted. But Quietism found a much more talented and engaging defender in Madame Guyon. This lady, originally Jeanne Bouvier de la Motte, had contracted an unhappy marriage at 16 and was left a widow at 28. She went to the diocese of Geneva at the bishop's request to help in the instruction of converts, and at a convent in Gex met the Barnabite Fr. Lacombe, with whom she travelled from town to town. At Grenoble she published her "Moyen court et très facile pour faire l'Oraison." Some time before,

P. Lacombe had issued his "Analyse de l'Oraison Mentale." Lacombe was imprisoned at Lourdes and Paris, where he died in 1699, and for eight months Madame Guyon herself was confined to a convent. After regaining her freedom, she published a book on the "Mystical Sense of Canticles" [1] (Lyons, 1688), and she contrived to win over Fénelon, then tutor to the grandson of Louis XIV., and she sent her works, printed and MS., to Bossuet. But with Bossuet she could make no way. His profound learning, his common sense, his manly and simple piety, made him proof against the charms of delusion, and he could see nothing in Madame Guyon's works except "a mass of extravagances, illusions, and puerilities." He has fully justified this verdict in his "Relation sur le Quiétisme." A commission in which Bossuet was the leading member met in 1694 and 1695, and issued thirty-four articles in which the condemnation of Quietism was implied.

Fénelon was made archbishop of Cambray in 1695, and soon after (Feb. 1697) published his "Explication des Maximes des Saints sur la Vie intérieure." He defended the Quietist idea of "holy indifference," in which the soul loses all deliberate desire of its own bliss or fear of its own woe. Fénelon, who was censured by sixty doctors of the Sorbonne and refuted by Bossuet, appealed to Rome, and there twenty-three propositions of his book were condemned as rash, scandalous, &c., in a brief of Innocent XII. dated 1699. Fénelon made a most edifying submission, publicly burning his own book. "It is not I who have conquered," Bossuet said in reply to the congratulations offered to him; "it is the truth." (Chiefly from the new edition of Bossuet; see also Bausset, "Hist. de Fénelon.")

QUINISEXTA. [See TRULLO, COUNCIL IN, p. 831.]

QUINQUAGESIMA, Sexagesima, Septuagesima, the first, second, third Sundays before Lent. The words are ancient (Septuagesima occurs in the Gelasian and Gregorian Sacramentaries); but it is hard to divine their meaning. Alcuin proposed two solutions to Charlemagne (Thomassin, "Traité des Festes," p. 308 seq.)—one that there are seventy days from Septuagesima to "Pascha clausum"—i.e. the Octave of Easter. This leaves the names Sexagesima and Quinquagesima unexplained. His other solution is adopted by Thomassin ("Traité des Jeûnes," p. 231). Quoting a passage from the "Regula Magistri," Thomassin says: "It clearly shows that the names Quinquagesima and Sexagesima are not intended to denote the numbers fifty or sixty. They have been formed on the [false] analogy of Quadragesima—i.e. Lent—being one and two weeks before the first Sunday in Lent. In the same rule the second week of Lent is called Tricesima, the third Vicesima." The custom of beginning the fast on Septuagesima, &c., and the reasons for it, are given in the article on LENT.

R

RANSOM, OUR LADY OF. Sometimes called also Our Lady of Mercy (Sancta Maria de Mercede). Under this title a religious order for the redemption of Christian captives among the Moors was founded by St. Peter Nolasco in 1218. Some of the members were priests, some lay brothers or knights. There are also nuns of the order. They were generally known as Mercedarians. The objects of the order were much the same as those of the Trinitarian order (q.v.) but the two remained distinct. (See Hélyot; Besse in "Cath. Enc.")

In recent years the title of Our Lady of Ransom has been adopted by a confraternity founded by Father Philip Fletcher for the conversion of England. The feast of Our Lady of Ransom is kept on September 24.

REASON AND FAITH. [See FAITH.]

RECEPTION OF CONVERTS INTO THE CHURCH. We speak here only of converts who are supposed to have received baptism. For adults who have never been baptized a longer form of baptism is provided. But in England, at least, leave is usually given by the bishop to use the shorter form.

A baptized person who has previously belonged to an heretical sect has incurred the censures of the Church, and cannot therefore be restored to the sacraments or receive sacramental absolution till he has been absolved from censures. It may be that his error was no fault of his, and, if so, he was not a formal heretic. Still, he is treated as such in the external court of the Church, and the Pope reserves to himself the power of removing the bar of excommunication. In many countries, however, bishops receive power as delegates of the Holy See in their extraordinary or quinquennial faculties to absolve from the censure in question, and in England they communicate this power to all their priests who have faculties for hearing confessions.

In England, after a priest has carefully tested the sincerity and steadfastness of the person who wishes to be a Catholic, and is satisfied that the person really knows and understands sufficiently the tenets of the Catholic religion, he may admit him into the Church. First the "Veni, Creator" is said, and the convert reads the creed of Pope Pius IV. or some shorter form. Then the "Miserere" or "De Profundis" is recited. For fear his former baptism should have been invalid because the proper matter, form, or intention was wanting, he receives baptism from the priest under condition, unless there is evidence that this sacrament has already been validly given. This rule was made by the vicars-apostolic at the beginning of the nineteenth century for all born after 1773, and was renewed by the first provincial synod of Westminster. He is then absolved from excommunication, and the "Te Deum" is said in thanksgiving. Finally, the convert goes to confession and receives sacramental absolution sub conditione and the plenary indulgence granted on this occasion by the Pope. The ceremonies, as contained in the English Rituale, are not always observed, nor are the absolutions and sacraments always conferred in the same order. Some priests, relying on the authority of Bishop Grant (Synod. Suthwarc. p. 76 seq), begin by hearing the convert's confession, and give absolution after the baptism; but, according to a Roman decree subsequent to Dr. Grant's instruction (December 17, 1868), the confession should be made after the baptism, and this order is prescribed in the new "Ordo administrandi Sacramenta," 1915. (See Decreta Conc. Prov. Westmon., pp. 334–337.)

RECLUSE. The life of a recluse is still more solitary and austere than that of a hermit; it implies that the persons practising it "live for ever shut up in their cells, never speaking to anyone but to the superior when he visits them, and to the brother who brings them necessaries. Their prayers and austerities are doubled, and their fasts more severe and more frequent." [1] St. Romuald allowed reclusion to such of his hermits [CAMALDOLI] as desired and seemed to be fitted for it, as the highest and most difficult stage of monastic discipline. Female recluses were usually called inclusae. [See INCLUSI.]

RECOLLECTS. A branch of the Franciscan order bore this name (derived from the detachment from creatures and recollection in God which the founders aimed at) for nearly three centuries. From the time of the Minister-General Elias, who succeeded St. Francis, the Franciscans have been divided into two branches, Conventuals and Observantines, or of the Observance. The Observantines in France were commonly called Cordeliers. Several distinctions appeared in course of time among those of the Observance, which Leo X. endeavoured to check by fusing all the subdivisions into one, under the name of the Reformed Franciscans. Before this a saintly Spanish friar, B. John de Puebla, had founded (1489) a house of "Strict Observance" on the Sierra Morena, in Spain. The friars of the Strict Observance soon became a separate congregation; they passed into Italy (where they received the name of "the Reformed") in 1525, and established themselves at Nevers, in France, in 1597. The French filiation increased rapidly; the friars were called "Recollects"; Henry IV., Louis XIII., and Louis XIV. loved and favoured them; and it was arranged that in every French province of the Observance a certain number of houses should be given up to the Strict Observance. The Recollects were uninfected by Jansenism, and when the commission on the regular orders (1768) put it in their power to relax the austerities of the rule they did not do so. They were suppressed in France at the Revolution, but reappeared some years ago, at Amiens and other places. The various "families" of Observantines have been reunited under the single title of Friars Minor by Leo XIII. (October 4, 1897), and are subject to one Minister General. [See FRANCISCANS.]

RECONCILIATION OF PENITENTS. [See PENITENTIAL DISCIPLINE OF CHURCH; CEMETERY, &c. See also DESECRATION.]

RECTOR. 1. The ecclesiastic who has charge of the government of a congregation or a college is often called the Rector.

2. In England there is a certain number of missions in each diocese, important either on account of their having been long established or because of the size of the congregation, the priests in charge of which are styled "Missionary Rectors." [See PARISH PRIEST.]

3. In Germany, when a parish has no Pfarrer in the strict sense, the priest in charge is called the Rector. (Taunton.)

RED FRIARS. So called from the red cross on their habits. They are properly Trinitarians [q.v.].

REDEMPTION OF MANKIND THROUGH CHRIST. The idea connected with redemption is that of being brought out of a state of bondage or slavery and restored to one's former estate. Christian usage applies the term to the acts by which Christ delivered mankind from the bondage of sin and the devil, and restored it to its original estate of friendship with God. Such restoration is beyond the power of man, who may, indeed, satisfy the Divine justice by undergoing eternal punishment, but whose weakened and despoiled will is unable to embrace a God-pleasing life as commanded by the divine holiness. If the first gift of grace was a free gift, much more so was the second, when the first had been forfeited by man's wilful transgression. God's decree of redeeming man was as free as the decree of his creation, and as eternal; its freedom excludes all rightful claim of man to it; but its eternity includes man's destination to redemption. The Divine message of salvation was revealed at divers times—each revelation being more distinct than the preceding—from the proto-evangelium (Gen. iii. 15) to the testimony of the Baptist (Jn. i. 29). In the fulness of time, that is, when the Law and the Prophets had prepared Israel, and to a certain degree the heathen world, for the coming of the Redeemer, "the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us." The Incarnation, in which the Son of God took unto Himself a human nature, so as to be one Person in two natures [see CHRIST], was necessary if God demanded for our redemption a full, though vicarious, satisfaction of His offended justice and sanctity.

God, then, decreed at the same time the redemption through vicarious satisfaction and the Incarnation. The decree comprises the offer of God the Son to act, in a human nature, as representative of mankind and to satisfy for all its sins (Heb. x. 5 sqq.), and on the other hand the acceptance of this offer by God (Gal. iv. 4; Jn. iii. 16, 17). Man is bound to satisfy the claims on him of God's holiness and justice. God's holiness claims that man should honour Him by leading a holy life, a life of obedience to and love of his Creator. The satisfaction of this claim is the foundation of merit; it gives man a title to grace and other rewards promised by the Divine goodness and justice. The refusal to satisfy this claim, by committing sin, is an infringement of the Divine right—an injury—and is the foundation of guilt (reatus culpae). Guilt puts man in contradiction with God and with himself; guilty man is not what he ought to be according to the Divine ideal. Here the claim of Divine justice intervenes. God must oppose the perverted will of the sinner, and this opposition constitutes the sinner's punishment, for it inflicts "pain" on him. The just pain of the sinner is temporal and eternal death. Temporal death, because sin has frustrated the object of his state here below; eternal death, that is, endless striving after an unattainable happiness, because the possession of God, the Sovereign Good, is incompatible with rebellion against Him. The claim of the Divine justice can only be satisfied by the sinner undergoing the punishment. However, a compromise is possible between Divine holiness and justice on the one hand, and Divine mercy and love on the other. It lies in the acceptance by God of a vicarious satisfaction. This kind of satisfaction takes place when some person substitutes himself for another and acts or suffers in his place and on his behalf. If the claim merely refers to a lifeless object, anyone who possesses such object and is willing to part with it on behalf of another, can act as substitute and perform vicarious satisfaction. But not so if the claim be a personal one. Where a personal act is required, e.g. a reparation of honour, vicarious satisfaction can only be accepted by the claimant when the substitute has something in common with the offender that enables or entitles him to act in his place. Hence, to meet the claims of Divine holiness and justice by vicarious satisfaction, a "man" must come forth qualified to honour God by a holy life as much as mankind has dishonoured Him by sin, and to endow his sufferings with an amount of atoning merit equivalent to the demerit of all mankind. No mere man is equal to such task. Even granting that his impaired will were turned entirely to the service of God, this finite and purely natural homage could in no wise counterbalance the gravity of his offence against the infinitely Holy and Just. The greatness of the offended God at the same time magnifies the offence and diminishes the value of attempted satisfaction. Again: satisfaction for sin embraces the whole existence of the sinner and all his powers, so that no one can atone by suffering but for his own self. And, besides, satispassion is the reverse of redemption. No angel can atone for man, because angels have no natural communion with man. Only a Man-God was able to enter the world with a sinless human nature and to stand before God as the representative of His kin, without guilt, without the necessity of atoning for Himself. Only a God-Man had sufficient personal dignity to invest His action and passion with that infinite value which they draw from the personal dignity of their author.

The Divine decree of Redemption was realised in the Incarnation of God the Son, Jesus Christ, the Messiah. Christ's redeeming work comprises atonement for sin and acquisition or merit of grace, according as we consider it in relation to God's justice or holiness. He atoned by His passion, He merited by His holy actions, yet so that His actions were also satisfactory and His passion meritorious. Merit and satisfaction are not more distinct than justice and holiness in God, upon which the distinction rests. Christ's atonement began when He assumed humanity, continued throughout the trials and troubles of His life, and ended on the cross. In all these sufferings He bore the sins of the world "that through death He might destroy him who has the empire of death" (Heb. ii. 14, 15). He could not, on account of His Divinity, suffer the pains of separation from God, i.e. hell; but the pains He really did suffer acquired, through His Divinity, an intensity and an atoning value more than equivalent to the pains of hell. The atoning effect of His sacrifice is the remission of sin and its punishment, or in the language of Scripture, the appeasement of God's anger, the reconciliation of man with God. The merit of Christ is the satisfaction of the Divine claim of holiness on the part of man. Christ's holiness of life far outweighs the guilt of Adam (Rom. v. 15); the honour He gives to God more than compensates for the dishonour arising from man's sin. Like His satispassion, so His satisfaction embraces the whole earthly career of the Saviour, from the moment He entered the world (Heb. x. 5–7) to His last word on the cross. His voluntary death on the cross is the crowning act of both His satisfactory and meritorious work, because it is at the same time the crowning act of a life of suffering and of a life of holy obedience to the will of God. Through His obedience "even unto the death of the cross" (Phil. ii. 8) He merited the fulness of grace, for Himself and for us "who all have received of His fulness" (Jn. i. 16). For Himself, that is, for His human nature, He merited His glorious resurrection and ascension, and a place at the right hand of the Father; for us, sanctifying grace from its beginnings to its completion in the beatific vision.

The doctrine of vicarious satisfaction is universally taught in the Church, although no council has ever defined it. Such definition was never called for. The older heresies directly impugned the Person of the Redeemer; the more recent ones have erred concerning the manner in which His merits are applied to individuals. Erroneous consequences as to the work of Christ were indeed drawn from these heresies, but the Church contented herself with the condemnation of the fundamental errors. The Socinians first directly denied the work of atonement through Christ. The Council of Trent does not ex professo treat of this matter, but supposes the doctrine of vicarious satisfaction as a foundation for its teaching on justification and sanctification. E.g., in sess. v. c. 3, it says that original sin is taken away from us "by the merit of the one Mediator, our Lord Jesus Christ, who reconciled us to God in His blood," and in sess. vi. c. 7, on the causes of justification, the meriting cause is said to be "Our Lord Jesus Christ, who by His most holy passion on the cross merited for us justification and satisfied for us God the Father."

The earliest Fathers do not carry us much beyond the very words of Scripture. In Clement of Rome Christ is said to be "the high-priest of our oblations" (1 Ep. 36, PG, i. 280), to have given His flesh for our flesh, His soul for our soul (ib. 49); in the Epistle falsely ascribed to Barnabas, to have ransomed us from death (Barnab. 19); in Ignatius (ad Ephes. v. 1, PG, ii. 778), to have presented Himself as a sacrifice and oblation to God. The notion of satisfaction is more prominent in Justin, who says (Dial. 95, PG, vi. 701) that Christ "took on Himself the curses of all," while Clement of Alexandria ("Quis Dives," 37, p. 956) says that our Lord "laid down His soul as an equivalent for all" (ἀνταξίαν τῶν ὅλων). In the great work of St. Irenaeus, who wrote a little earlier, we meet for the first time with a full and dogmatic exposition of the doctrine of the Incarnation—an exposition wrung from him in his controversy with the Gnostics. According to him, it was not enough for God to vindicate Himself: He had to vindicate His workmanship ("Adv. Haer." iii. 23, 1, PG, vii. 960); it was necessary that man should return to the sanctity and obedience for which God had destined him, and overcome the devil as God meant him to be overcome. For this task fallen man was utterly unfit. But what mere man could not do, the Word of God, being made flesh, did (iii. 18, 2, iii. 18, 7; PG, vii. 932). Christ "passed through every age, restoring communion to God with each" (ib.). The new Adam died on that day on which Adam died (spiritually) by disobedience to God (v. 23, 2, PG, vii. 1185). His atonement had a retrospective efficacy. He was the "man who strove for the fathers, and by obedience paid for disobedience" (iii. 18, 6). For the rest, he contents himself with the words of Scripture, and lays down the principle that the Word ransomed us by His death, without inquiring to whom the ransom was paid (v. 1, 1).[1] Very similar is the doctrine of Tertullian ("Adv. Marc." iii. 9, PL, ii. 334), that Christ reformed our birth by His, and destroyed our death by His own.

But soon the speculative mind of Origen applied itself to Christ's satisfaction, and struck out a theory which was to exercise a great and lasting influence in the Church. The Gnostics maintained (see Baur, "Christl. Gnosis," p. 272 seq.) that Christ deceived and overcame the demiurge or lower god who created the world. In the place of the demiurge Origen put the devil. He asks (in Matt. tom. xvi. 8; PG, xiii. 1398) to whom it was that Christ gave His soul as a ransom. He distinguishes the soul from the spirit, which He commended to the Father, and suggests that Christ's soul was paid as a ransom to Satan that he might let us go free. Satan thought he could hold Christ bound in death. But it was not so. Christ was "free among the dead," nay, so much stronger than Satan that He wrested from the power of death all who believe in Him. In the East this strange fancy of Origen had only a partial success. It was adopted by Gregory Nyssen ("Orat. Cat." 22 seq., PG, xlv. 60), who explains the deception of the devil on the ground that, although he knew Christ's miraculous birth and power, he saw Him clothed in flesh, and believed he could secure Him as his own. But at an earlier date Athanasius tacitly rejects it. His view is ("De Incarn." 8, PG, xxv. 109) that Christ "delivering His body to death instead of all, offered it (προσῆγε) to the

[1] Baur's statement (Lehrbuch der Dogmengeschichte, p. 131, that Irenaeus held the devil's rule over us to be just, is refuted by the saint's own words (v. 1, 1) "injuste nobis dominabatur apostasia."

Father."[1] Gregory Nazianzen, although ("Orat." xxxix. 13, PG, xxxvi. 348) he accounts for the deception of the devil much as Gregory Nyssen had done, yet in another place ("Orat." xlv. 22, PG, xxxvi. 653) distinctly repudiates the supposition that Christ paid a price to the devil. The Father received it, "not asking for it, or needing it, but because of the dispensation (διὰ τὴν οἰκονομίαν), and because man had to be sanctified by the human nature of God" (τῷ ἀνθρωπίνῳ τοῦ θεοῦ). St. John of Damascus sums up all results of theological speculation in the East, and he utterly sets aside Origen's theory. It was the Father who had been offended, and He, not "the tyrant," must "receive the ransom" ("De Fid. Orthodox." iii. 27, PG, xciv. 1096).

In the Latin Church Origen's tenet struck deeper root. St. Augustine ("De Lib. Arbitr." iii. 10, PL, xxxii. 1286) holds that after the fall Satan claimed men as his own "by most just right." But he slew Jesus, who was not only sinless, but born without concupiscence, and so most justly was obliged to loose those who believe in Jesus. Augustine is followed by St. Leo (Serm. xxiii. 3 et 4), "Per injustitiam plus petendi totius debiti summa vacuatur"); by St. Bernard ("De Error. Abaelard." cap. 5 et 6); and by the Master of the Sentences ("Sentent." lib. iii. distinct. 19).

St. Anselm's famous treatise, "Cur Deus Homo," marks a new epoch in the treatment of the doctrine, and the discussion of it within the Church has continued ever since within the lines which he has laid down. He lived before Bernard and Peter Lombard, but we have not placed him in strict chronological order, because the new position which he occupied did not become immediately the accepted one in the Church. His view did, however, finally prevail in substance, and became dominant in the Scholastic period, just as that of Origen had been among the Western Fathers. He fixed attention on sin mainly as an offence done to God's honour, to whom and not to the devil reparation must be made, for he utterly denies the devil's rights over man (i. 7). God was constrained by a moral necessity to punish sin or else to provide an atonement. "Necesse est ergo ut aut ablatus honor solvatur aut poena sequatur" (i. 13). Christ's human nature enabled Him to incur, His Divine nature to satisfy, the debt (ii. 6 et 7). As He made this payment or satisfaction freely, He merited a reward which He did not need for Himself, and therefore transmitted to us.

The theory of St. Anselm was amended and developed by St. Thomas. He denies, in opposition to Anselm, the necessity of Christ's passion. God is subject to no restraint, and might have liberated us from sin and its consequences without the death of Christ (3ª, q. 46, a. 2). So, again, Christ's death was not a penalty inflicted upon Him by God. He, as man, willingly offered Himself for us, and God permitted wicked men to work their will upon Him, and accepted His death as a sacrifice and satisfaction for our sins (ib. q. 47 a. 3); nor did the merit and satisfaction of Christ consist in His mere death and sufferings considered by themselves. The passion was meritorious because willingly undergone (ib. q. 47, a. 1). Christ's death was a perfect satisfaction. For full satisfaction is made when the offended person receives that which he loves as much as or more than he hates the offence done to him. Now Christ's satisfaction was superabundant, first, because of the exceeding love which led Him to suffer, then because he offered the life of a God-man for our ransom, thirdly because of the greatness of His sufferings (ib. q. 48, a. 2). It was also a sacrifice, inasmuch as it was offered "for the honour properly due to God," and in order to propitiate Him; and here too it was the free will and love of Christ which made His oblation acceptable (ib. a. 3), and the merit of Christ's sacrifice and satisfaction is infinite because of the dignity of His person (this is implied in 3ª, q. 46, a. 6, compared with the answer). As sin partakes of the nature of infinity because committed against God who is infinitely great and good, so with the worth of Christ's atonement, because offered by a person of infinite dignity. This, however, by no means excludes the necessity of acceptation on God's part. It was necessary that He should freely give up His Son for the life of the world, just as it was necessary that Christ should freely suffer.

Like St. Thomas, Duns Scotus rejected the notion that Christ's death was the only means by which we could have been freed from sin and death, but he brought another point in the discussion prominently forward. He regarded Christ's merit as finite, not infinite, because it proceeded from a created human will: "Meritum Christi fuit finitum quia a principio finito essentialiter dependens" (3 dist. 19, n. 7, quoted by Werner, "Johannes Duns Scotus," p. 457 sqq.), although the dignity of Christ's person made it "congruous" that God should accept His satisfaction for us all (ib.). Here we reach the last stage in the history of the controversy among Catholics. Clement VI. (in Extravag. "Unigenitus," lib. v. tit. 9, De Poenit. et Remiss.) speaks of Christ's "infinite merits,"[2] and asserts that one drop of His blood would, because of its "union with the Word," have sufficed for the redemption of mankind. The Scotists rightly refused to take this as a dogmatic decision on the matter, and although the Thomist opinion has been widely adopted, even by those who do not belong to the Thomist school (see, e.g., Billuart, "De Incarnat." Diss. xix. a. 5; and for an invaluable catena of Patristic passages, Petavius "De Incarnat." xii. 9), the question is still open. The Council of Trent (e.g. sess. vi. "De Justific." cap. 11) contented itself with general statements, e.g. that Christ is the propitiation for the sins of the whole world "through faith in His blood."

[1] We deliberately reject Baur's interpretation of St. Athanasius, viz. that Christ paid the ransom to Death conceived of as a person.

The belief in Christ's atonement, or vicarious satisfaction, exactly reflects the doctrine of Holy Scripture on the work of redemption. Scripture calls the work of redemption a sacrifice, a sacrifice of propitiation, and generally applies to it the sacrificial terminology of the Old Testament: Christ is the High Priest of the New Testament, who offers Himself as victim, and His action is termed oblation. But the bloody sacrifices of the Old Law were certainly offered as vicarious satisfaction for sin. The sinner acknowledged that his life had been forfeited to God, and begged Him to accept as a substitution for his own the blood (in which is the life) of the victim (Lev. xvii. 11). The idea of substitution is especially clear in the imposition of hands on the head of the victim, by which rite the victim was made the bearer of the sin of the offerer (Lev. xvi. 21). This atoning idea, of which the old sacrifices were but symbols, was truly realized in the sacrifice of Christ (Heb. x. 1 sqq.), the only true priest, who not only symbolized but effected our reconciliation with God. Christ's priesthood is often insisted upon (Heb. v. 10; vi. 20; vii.; ix. 11–15 and 24–28; x. 1–22). The victim is Himself (Heb. ix. 14, 26), His Body and Blood (x. 10; ix. 14), which He offered on the cross, where the real sacrificial act was completed (ix. 25 sqq.). St. Paul says: "Christ hath loved us, and hath delivered Himself for us, an oblation and a sacrifice (προσφορὰν καὶ θυσίαν), to God for an odour of sweetness" (Eph. v. 2 cf. 1 Cor. v. 7, Rom. iii. 25). "Jesus Christ; is the propitiation (ἱλασμός) for our sins; and not for ours only, but also for those of the whole world" (1 Jn. ii. 2; iv. 10). Besides these direct testimonies, we have numerous passages in which to the Blood of Christ (shed in His death) are ascribed all the effects of the blood shed in the ancient sacrifices. The Blood of Christ is our ransom λύτρον, ἀντίλυτρον (Eph. i. 7; Col. i. 14; 1 Pet. i. 19; Apoc. v. 9); our reconciliation with the Father (Col. i. 20; cf. Eph. ii. 13–15); our justification (Rom. v. 9); the remission of our sins (Mt. xxvi. 28); the cleansing of sin (1 Jn. i. 7; Apoc. i. 5; vii. 14; xxii. 14); the blood of a new testament or covenant with God (1 Cor. xi. 25; 1 Pet. i. 2). In the same manner the death of Christ is given as ground of our reconciliation (Rom. v. 10) and of our redemption from sin (Heb. ix. 15). The doctrine so clearly set forth in these texts leaves no doubt as to the sense of the passages in which Christ is said to have shed His Blood, or died for many, for all, for sinners, for us (Mt. xxvi. 28; xx. 28; 1 Tim. ii. 6; Rom. v. 6; 2 Cor. v. 14 sqq.; 1 Thess. v. 10). In most of these places, it is true, the word ὑπὲρ (for) is used; ἀντὶ, however, is used Mt. xx. 28 (δοῦναι τὴν ψυχὴν αὐτοῦ λύτρον ἀντὶ πολλῶν) and 1 Tim. ii. 6 (ἀντίλυτρον); and this, in connection with the above distinct doctrine, shows that ὑπὲρ has the sense of ἀντὶ and refers to vicarious sacrifice. Besides, it is not easy to conceive how Christ died "on our behalf" if He did not die "instead of us." The idea of vicarious sacrifice is also apparent in the testimony of the Baptist calling Christ the Lamb that beareth or taketh away the sins of the world (with reference to Isaias liii.); in 2 Cor. v. 21, "Christ who knew no sin, He [God] hath made sin for us," viz. treated Him as bearing our sins, and in Gal. iii. 13, "Christ being made a curse for us," viz. the object of the Divine anger which we deserved. The term redemption itself carries with it a sacrificial notion (Lev. xxvii. 27–33; Num. xviii. 15–17). The prophet Isaiah most distinctly shows the vicarious character of the Redeemer's work: "He hath borne our infirmities and carried our sorrows . . . He was wounded for our iniquities, He was bruised for our sins: the chastisement of our peace was upon Him and by His bruises we are healed. The Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all. He was offered because it was His own will . . . the Lord was pleased to bruise Him in infirmity: He shall lay down His life for sin [Hebrew: as an offering for sin] . . . He shall divide the spoils of the strong because He hath delivered His soul unto death and was reputed with the wicked; and He has borne the sins of many and He has paid for the transgressors" (Isa. liii.).

The satisfaction offered by Christ is perfect; it meets the claims of Divine justice and holiness to their fullest extent, and even superabundantly; moreover, it gives him a real claim on God's justice to all grace. No good work of man can have a claim for reward on God's justice, because man and all his acts belong to God more than a slave to his owner. When man merits by the aid of Divine grace, strictly speaking, God rewards His own gift rather than the work of man (see MERIT). Christ, on the contrary, merited of His own power (ex propriis). His Divinity gave to all He did or suffered Divine excellence and infinite value. His whole work was a work of mercy indeed, yet not of mercy to Him, who needed none for Himself and who undertook to meet the justice of God in full on behalf of His brethren. The superabundance of Christ's merits follows from the "infinite excellence" of each of His actions and passions, each of which was sufficient to redeem the world. St. Paul testifies to it, Rom. v. 12–21.

The redemption wrought by Christ is universal, that is, sufficient and intended for all men. It is sufficient because infinite, and because its vicariousness makes it applicable to all who have the nature of man in common with the Redeemer. It is intended for all, as appears from Scripture. The decree of redemption is an effect of God's love for the world (Jn. iii. 16) or for mankind (Tit. iii. 4); "God will have all men to be saved" (1 Tim. ii. 4). Hence Christ is "the Saviour of the world" (Jn. iv. 42); "the Light of the world" (Jn. ix. 5); He sends His apostles to the whole world to preach the Gospel to all creatures (Mk. xvi. 15); He gives His flesh for the life of the world (Jn. vi. 52). He is a propitiation for the sins of the whole world (1 Jn. ii. 2); as Adam brought condemnation Christ brought salvation on all men (Rom. v. 18); lastly "Christ died for all" (2 Cor. v. 15).

If redemption is undoubtedly universal as to its sufficiency and intention, it is yet not universal in its efficacy; the lot of many for whom the Saviour gave His blood is eternal damnation. From this, however, we must not conclude with Calvin and Jansenius, that God's saving will either does not exist or is not in earnest. Otherwise, we ought also to infer that God's will concerning the observance of His commandments is not in earnest because, as a matter of fact, His commandments are often set at naught by man. God's will is infallibly fulfilled only when the execution depends solely and entirely on the Divine omnipotence; when the execution is made dependent on the free co-operation of the creatures, it may be frustrated. That all men should be saved is like a Divine commandment, for the fulfilment of which God has given ample means through the work of redemption; the use, however, of these means to some extent depends on the co-operation of each individual: this much must be conceded to save the freedom of human will. They who refuse the required measure of co-operation remain unsaved, not on account of a deficiency in God's saving will or power, but of their own free will. Still, even human resistance to the Divine offer of salvation cannot entirely deprive redemption of its fruits. Even though the final grace of heavenly bliss be not granted, many actual graces, sufficient in themselves to secure salvation, are granted to each and all. To secure these latter, it is sufficient to be a member of Christ as the "Head of all men"; to secure the former, it is necessary to be a member of Christ as the "Head of the Church." (See GRACE, MERIT, &c. All the dogmatic theologians deal with the subject in their treatises "De Verbo Incarnato," e.g. Petavius, lib. xii.–xiii. "De Incarnatione"; Franzelin, sect. iv. p. 477 sqq.; Scheeben, "Dogmatik," lib. v. sect. 206 sqq.; Oxenham, "The Atonement.")

REDEMPTORISTS. The Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer, the members of which are commonly known as Redemptorists, and in some countries as Ligorians, was founded by St. Alphonsus Maria de Liguori in the year 1732. Born of a noble Neapolitan family in 1696, Alphonsus, after giving promise of a brilliant career at the bar, abandoned its honours at the age of twenty-seven to embrace the ecclesiastical state. His first desire was to join the Congregation of the Oratory; being unable to do this on account of the opposition of his father, he devoted himself to evangelizing the poor in the city of Naples, and to the duties of preacher and confessor, residing first in his father's house, afterwards in the College of the Chinese, founded by Father Matthew Ripa, the famous Chinese missionary. He also joined a secular congregation of missionaries called the Propaganda, and with them gave several missions in the provinces. By this means he came to know the spiritual destitution of the poor peasants and shepherds, and felt a strong desire to devote his life to the succour of the rural populations. He was confirmed in these thoughts especially by the advice of Monsignor Falcoia, bishop of Castellamare. This prelate had long desired the establishment of an institute of apostolic men, who should strive in all things to copy the life of our Lord Jesus Christ, and after His example to evangelize the poor. He had founded at Scala a community of ladies, called Nuns of the Most Holy Saviour, who prayed continually for the same intention. It was while giving the spiritual exercises to these nuns that St. Alphonsus at last resolved, under the direction of Bishop Falcoia, to gather some companions, who should on the one hand seek their own perfection by the obligations and rules of a religious life, and on the other devote themselves to apostolic work among most neglected and forsaken souls. The work was solemnly begun at Scala on November 9, 1732, St. Alphonsus being then thirty-six years old.

In carrying out this design the saint encountered innumerable obstacles, first on the part of good men who looked on him as misled by enthusiasm or spiritual ambition, and afterwards from the civil authorities. The times were indeed most unfavourable to such a project, and it is one of the miracles of the saint's life to have founded and maintained a new religious congregation at the time when the Marquis Tanucci was all-powerful in Naples. In spite, however, of these obstacles, St. Alphonsus succeeded in establishing several houses in different parts of Naples and Sicily, and before his death saw his institute spreading in the Papal States, and already transported beyond the Alps.

On February 25, 1749, Pope Benedict XIV. approved the rules and confirmed the new institute by a solemn approbation.

St. Alphonsus had called his Congregation by the name of the Most Holy Saviour; but to prevent confusion with the canons regular of that name in Venice, the Pope himself changed the title to that of the Most Holy Redeemer. The members of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer, besides the three simple but perpetual vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, bind themselves by a vow of perseverance until death in the Institute, which they confirm in a promissory oath. They are bound by their vow of poverty to refuse all benefices, offices, or dignities outside their Congregation. Whenever a Redemptorist has been raised to a bishopric it has been by command of the Sovereign Pontiff, and by his dispensation. It was in this way that St. Alphonsus himself was obliged to accept the bishopric of St. Agatha of the Goths. In order also more effectually to pursue the principal end of the Institute, which is to succour the most ignorant and neglected souls, St. Alphonsus forbade his Fathers to undertake such works as the instruction of youth, the government of seminaries, the direction of nuns. Their main occupation is the apostolic ministry in the preaching of missions and retreats to all classes of persons, but with a preference for such as are most neglected, especially those who live in remote villages and hamlets. As, however, in many countries the most neglected souls are to be found in the great cities, the intention of the founder is carried out in labouring for them. It is on record that St. Alphonsus, about the time of the establishment of his congregation, seriously debated the question of going himself to the savage heathen in South Africa, and that he welcomed an invitation that had been made to him to send out missionaries for the conversion of the Nestorian heretics in Asia. It was also his wish that the members of his Congregation, who should have reached the age of thirty, should bind themselves by vow to give missions to the heathen, as soon as they should receive the command of the Sovereign Pontiff or of the Superior-General. This vow was, however, considered superfluous by the cardinals who examined the rules for approbation. It need scarcely be said that a founder, whose pre-eminent science has gained him a place among the doctors of the Church, could not be indifferent to learning among his disciples. He insists, therefore, in his rule on the duty of continual study, so that his priests "may be of use and profit to the Church on all occasions."

St. Alphonsus died on August 1, 1787, in his ninety-first year. Before his death he foretold the spread of his Congregation beyond the Alps, and rejoiced when he heard that two Germans had asked admission from the superior of the Roman house. One of these, the Blessed Clement Maria Hofbauer, established the order in Poland, Austria, and Switzerland, and since his death, in 1820, it has spread through Europe, in North and South America, the West Indies, and Australia. It was introduced into England by Dr. Baines, vicar-apostolic of the Western District, in 1843. Ireland became a separate province in 1898. In the revolutions of the past century the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer has experienced more than the usual share of persecution, having been expelled in turn from Poland, Austria, Bavaria, France, Spain, Portugal, Switzerland, Italy, and Germany. Into several of these countries the missionaries have returned a second time and renewed their labours. From some they have been again driven out when revolution or impiety has become predominant.

The Congregation is under the Government of a superior-general, called the Rector Major, who is elected for life by a general chapter, and is assisted by six consultors. His residence is in Rome. The superiors of the various provinces (Provincials) and of the houses (Rectors), with their consultors, are appointed for a term of three years by the Rector Major. Their term of office may be renewed at his discretion.

The nuns already mentioned, commonly called Redemptoristines, form the Order of the Most Holy Redeemer, as distinguished from the Congregation of missionaries. They are under the jurisdiction of the bishops in whose dioceses they reside. They are strictly enclosed and contemplative, assisting the missionaries by their prayers. They have monasteries in several parts of Europe. REFORMATION, THE. Since the conversion of the Barbarians, who broke up and divided amongst them the Western Empire, wealth in every form had been lavishly poured upon the Church; and a relaxation of discipline—against which great pontiffs, saintly bishops, and the founders or reformers or religious orders unceasingly strove—had been too frequently the result. Through the operation of this and other causes—such as the Great Schism, the Renaissance, wars of ambition, national rivalries, the growth of commercial and other purely secular interests, &c.—the sense of the essential unity of the Church, which was so strong throughout Christendom in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, was considerably weakened at the beginning of the sixteenth. On the rise and progress in Germany of the series of conflicts and changes which go by the name of "the Reformation," see the article LUTHER AND LUTHERANISM. The subversive doctrines of the German reformer found a willing disciple in Gustavus Vasa who, on the dissolution (1523) of the Union of Calmar, became king of Sweden. Aided by the brothers Peterson and by Lawrence Anderson, archdeacon of Strengness, whom he made Chancellor, Gustavus (1527) induced the estates of the realm, in the Diet of Westerås, to sanction the confiscation of the property of the monasteries. The work of change then went rapidly on. Lawrence Peterson was appointed by the king (1531) archbishop of Upsala, and married. The king declared himself supreme in matters ecclesiastical, and setting aside entirely the authority of the Holy See, deposed or appointed bishops at his will. The last remains of Catholic usages were abolished at a second Diet of Westerås in 1544. Under the reign of King John (1569) there seemed to be some hope of a Catholic reaction; an envoy was sent to the court of Gregory XIII., and the Jesuit Possevin was received at Stockholm, but a sudden change in the sentiments of the king restored things to their former state. The system adopted in Sweden, in organizing which Lawrence Peterson was mainly instrumental, was Lutheranism; but, as in England, bishops were nominally retained. The episcopal authority of Lawrence Peterson, the head and fountain of the new hierarchy, appears to have been derived solely from the king; according to Rohrbacher ("Hist. de l'Egl." xxiii. 303), there was a true Archbishop of Upsala, Olaus Magnus, alive at the time, though in exile; he did not die till 1544.

In Denmark the tyrant Christian II., before his deposition in 1523, had brought to Copenhagen a Wittenberg preacher, a follower of Luther, favoured the marriage of the clergy, and in various ways sought to tamper with the faith and laws of the Church. His successor, Frederick I., instigated by his son Christian, who had studied in Germany and become a zealous Lutheran, established by degrees his own supremacy in religious matters, and, by favouring heretical preachers and discouraging and punishing all who stood up for the ancient faith, prepared the way for its ruin. At a diet held in 1536, at which no representative of the clergy was admitted, he induced the assembly to decree the abolition of the Catholic worship in all the Danish dominions; the bishops were required to cease from opposing Lutheranism and the beneficed clergy to embrace it. The nobles and people acquiesced with a singular apathy in all these changes. The king then invited Bugenhagen, a friend of Luther, into Denmark, appointed him court preacher, and commissioned him to reorganize the Danish church. Bugenhagen crowned the king afresh, as if to show that his previous coronation with Catholic rites had been invalid; he also consecrated superintendents in the place of the deposed Catholic bishops. As these last successively died out, the superintendents assumed the title of bishop; and this is the origin of the present Danish episcopate.

On the Reformation movement in England, Scotland, and Ireland, see the articles ENGLISH CHURCH; PRESBYTERIANS; SCOTTISH CHURCH; and IRISH CHURCH.

In France the Protestants, there called Huguenots, became very numerous; civil war broke out in 1562, and was renewed at frequent intervals during more than thirty years, till the abjuration of Protestantism by Henry IV. in 1593. By the edict of Nantes (1598) liberty of worship was granted to the Huguenots, and certain cities, of which the chief was Rochelle, made over to them. In the eighteen flourishing provinces of Holland and Belgium the reforming party, owing to the neighbourhood of France, adhered to the system of Calvin. Under the rule of Charles V., and afterwards of his son, Philip II., the designs of the innovators were severely repressed. The seizure of Brille by the Gueux, in 1572, was the commencement of the long civil war which ended in the disruption of the seven northern provinces from the eleven provinces of Belgium, and the consolidation of the former into a Republic. The necessity of providing a rallying point and symbol of union caused the adoption by the Dutch, in the Synod of Dordrecht (1574), of the "Belgic Confession," drawn up by Gui de Brès, a Walloon, a few years before. This confession is Calvinistic. In 1582 the provinces of Holland and Zeeland proscribed the Catholic worship, and the wholesale plunder and desecration of churches followed. The final success of the revolt was the signal for a series of penal enactments which had for their object the extirpation of Catholicism from the Republic. This, however—since the Belgian provinces, conterminous in their whole breadth with those of Holland, had remained Catholic—was found a task impossible of achievement.

"In Switzerland the Reformation arose, independently of Luther, by the exertions of Zwingli, in Zurich (who fell October 11, 1531, at Cappel, in a battle with the Catholics). It spread rapidly; in 1528 it had been adopted, altogether or partially, by the cantons of Zurich, Bern, Basle, Appenzel, Glarus, and Schaffhausen. A separation from those [the Lutherans] who followed the Confession of Augsburg grew in 1525 out of the . . . difference of opinion respecting the sacrament of the Lord's Supper; and thus originated the Reformed party, which was first fully developed in Geneva, through Calvin, 1536–1564. . . . . The forms and discipline of the Reformed Church were here fully developed. By means of the university founded in 1539, under the direction of Calvin, and supported by his exertions and those of Beza, Geneva became the principal school of theology for the professors of these opinions, and in those days the only one where the French language prevailed." (Heeren, "Political System of Europe," i. 76.) By the "Consensus Tigurinus," arranged in 1549 between Calvin and Bullinger, of Zurich, a concord, at least external, was brought about between the Calvinist and Zwinglian factions.

The true and Catholic reformation, long desired but delayed by many difficulties, was taken up and successfully accomplished by the Council of Trent (1545–1563); see that article. (Besides the ordinary Church histories numberless works have been written on the subject. We can only mention Döllinger, "Die Reformation"; Pastor, "Hist. of the Popes," tr.; Janssen, "Hist. of the German People," tr.; Grisar, "Life of Martin Luther," tr.; Baudrillart, "L'Église Catholique, la Renaissance, le Protestantisme.")

REFRESHMENT SUNDAY: [See LAETARE SUNDAY.]

REGALIA. The right claimed by kings of receiving the revenues of a bishopric during a vacancy, and of appointing, pending the election of a successor, to all benefices in the bishop's patronage, not involving the cure of souls, which might fall vacant in the interval.

In England, as is well known, the Norman and Angevin kings exercised this right, and were accustomed to keep the sees vacant for years in order that they might enjoy the revenues. After the martyrdom of St. Thomas, Henry II. (1176) promised the Pope that he would in future not keep any vacant bishopric or abbey in his hands for more than a year, unless it were required by the evident necessity of the case.[1]

In France the regalia was introduced about the end of the eleventh century,[2] at first with reference to certain provinces only; but there was a tendency to extend it further and further. The Council of Lyons (1274) in its fifth session sanctioned the right in cases where ancient custom could be pleaded for it, but forbade on pain of excommunication its extension to churches hitherto free.[3] In spite of this, the kings of France, supported by the lawyers, went on developing and extending the regalia, until by three edicts of Louis XIV. (1673, 1674) it was declared to be applicable to all the provinces of the French monarchy. The patronage which it conferred was now declared to be inherent in the crown until such time as the new bishop should sue out his temporalities in the Parliament of Paris and pay certain fees; and to this clause a retrospective effect was given, so that any beneficiary appointed by a bishop who had not complied with these formalities might be dispossessed in favour of a royal nominee.

Most of the French bishops, seeing the overwhelming power of the crown, submitted to these innovations; but the bishops of Aleth and Pamiers (Pavillon and Caulet) resisted them; and when royal nominees were inducted by the secular arm into canonries to which these bishops had already made appointments, they excommunicated the intruders. The struggle began in 1675 and lasted several years. The excommunicated ecclesiastics appealed to the metropolitans (Archbishops of Toulouse and Narbonne) of the two bishops, and obtained from them decisions nullifying the episcopal censures. The bishops then appealed to Rome; Innocent XI., regarding the question as one in which the liberties of the Church were involved, espoused their cause, and annulled the decrees of the metropolitans. Great confusion and excitement followed.

The king's interpretation of the regalia was supported against the Holy See, not only by the Parliament and the Archbishop of Paris (Harlay), but also by the Jesuits. The explanation of this remarkable fact is found in a complication of the question connected with the spread of Jansenism [JANSENISM]. The Bishops of Aleth and Pamiers were known to be favourable to Arnauld and his party, and they had appointed to canonries in their gift persons more or less imbued with these opinions. If the regalia were maintained, and in the extent now claimed for it, these men might be ejected, and ecclesiastics nominated by the King's confessor, the Père la Chaise, S.J., might be put in their place.

This united opposition neutralised the efforts of the Pontiff; and when, in 1682, the assembly of the French clergy issued its celebrated Four Articles [see GALLICANISM], the question of the regalia, in view of this fresh subject of solicitude, fell into the background. (Ferraris, Regalia; Döllinger, in "Kirchenlex.")

REGINA COELI. An anthem in honour of the Blessed Virgin which begins with these words, and after each of whose four clauses the Alleluia is repeated; it is said at the end of the offices of the Breviary during the Easter season. Pope Benedict XIV., confirming on April 20, 1742, the indulgences granted to the recitation of the "Angelus," ordered that the "Regina Coeli," with its verses and prayers, should be said standing, instead, during the Paschal season. An ancient tradition relates that in the days of St. Gregory the Great a plague broke out in Rome. The Pope ordered all the people to march in procession, carrying the picture of the Blessed Virgin said to have been painted by St. Luke. As the crowds went towards St. Peter's and reached the bridge across the Tiber, a multitude of angels were seen above the picture singing the first three lines of the anthem. The Pontiff cried out "Ora pro nobis Deum, Alleluia," completing the anthem, and the angel of the plague was seen sheathing his sword above Adrian's mausoleum, which henceforth was known as the castle of Sant' Angelo. (Guéranger, "Liturgical Year," Paschal Time, tr., Part I., p. 111.)

REGIONARIUS. Pope Fabian, it is said, divided Rome into seven regions, founded no doubt on the fourteen known since the Augustan age, and he assigned each to the charge of a deacon, who was responsible for the distribution of alms, care of hospitals, &c. These regionary deacons were the seven chief deacons of the Roman Church; they were subject to the archdeacon, while the "titular" deacons—i.e. deacons of the parochial churches—were placed under the archpriest of each church. From the time of Honorius II. Rome had twelve regionary deacons, and six with the name of Palatinales.[1] The regionarii sang the Gospel when the Pope officiated at the stations, the Palatinales when he did so at the Lateran. There was a similar division of subdeacons and acolytes. Sixtus V. fixed the number of cardinal deacons at fourteen. (Mabillon, "Museum Italicum," vol. ii. p. xi. seq. and p. 567 seq.)

RELICS. The word includes the bodies of departed saints, fragments of their bodies, articles or portions of articles which they have used, such as clothes, vestments, rosaries, and the like. The Church also venerates relics of Christ and His Blessed Mother. Such are the holy nails, lance, spear, or fragments of the True Cross, the girdle, veil, &c., of the Blessed Virgin. The devotion to relics, solemnly approved by the Council of Trent (sess. xxv. De Invoc. Sanct.), rests on two great principles of Catholic belief.

First, the Church honours the bodies of the dead who sleep in Christ. Our Lord has opened the kingdom of heaven, and given us the pledge and assurance of the resurrection of the body. Hence, Christians have lost that horror of dead bodies which was characteristic of the heathen, and even of Jews. But the Church specially venerates the bodies of the martyrs and other saints; because, while they were on earth, their bodies were the temples of the Holy Ghost and they themselves living members of Christ. Their souls are already in heaven, their glorious resurrection is a matter of certainty, and therefore the Church joyfully anticipates the glory which God will give to these remains at the last day. She testifies at once the firmness of her belief in the resurrection and her love of the virtues which shone forth in the saints. For these were not virtues of the soul only: they were proper to the whole man, body and soul, which toiled and suffered together. The same reasons which make the resurrection of the body credible also tell in favour of the veneration due to relics. And so Christians have felt from the very infancy of the Church. They gathered the bones of St. Ignatius of Antioch (anno 107) and placed them in linen, "as a priceless treasure, being left to the Holy Church by the grace which was in the martyr" ("Act. Mart." 6). When Polycarp's body was burned in 167 the Christians exhumed the bones they could find "as more precious than costly stones and more valuable than gold." The Jews suggested that the Christians would leave Christ and worship Polycarp, ignorant that Christians could "never leave Christ or worship another" ("Act. Mart." 17, 18). When in 258 Cyprian was about to be beheaded, the Christians cast towels and napkins before him, clearly that they might be soaked in his blood ("Act. Procons." 5). So baseless is the statement that devotion to relics came into the Church from Pagan influences after Constantine's conversion.

Next, Catholics believe that God is sometimes pleased to honour the relics of the saints by making them instruments of healing and other miracles, and also by bestowing spiritual graces on those who, with pure hearts, keep and honour them. For this principle the Fathers (e.g. Cyril of Jerusalem, "Catech." xviii., PG, xxxiii. 1036) appeal to the Old Testament which relates the resurrection of a dead body which touched the bones of Eliseus (4 Kings xiii. 21), and to the New, which tells us that the sick were healed by towels which had touched the living body of St. Paul (Acts xix. 12; cf. v. 15). "There is a power," says Cyril (loc. cit.), "latent [ἔγκειται] even in the bodies of the just." No proof is needed that, after the heathen persecution was over, the Christians sought and believed that they obtained graces through the relics of the saints. St. Ambrose, St. Augustine, and, indeed, the Fathers of the fourth and fifth centuries generally, are witnesses to the belief. A catena of passages will be found in Petavius, "De Incarnat." lib. xiv. cap. 11. (See also Newman's "Development," ch. x. § 1, Resurrection and Relics.)

Abuses no doubt have occurred in all ages with regard to relics. In 1215, canon 62 of the Fourth Lateran Council, inserted in the "Corpus Juris," forbade relics to be sold or to be exposed outside of their cases or shrines, and prohibited the public veneration of new relics till their authenticity had been approved by the Pope (Mansi, "Concil." tom. xxii. 1049–50; see also Fleury, "H.E." livr. lxxvii. 54). The Council of Trent (sess. xxv. De Invoc. Sanct.) renews these prohibitions and requires bishops to decide on the authenticity of new relics after careful consultation with theologians, or, if necessary, with the metropolitan and other bishops of the province assembled in council.

Relics are usually venerated in public by being exposed in their cases, with burning lights, upon the altar. They are often placed there at High Mass and incensed. They are carried in procession and the people are blessed with them. A special Mass and Office are permitted to churches which have an "insignis reliquia" of a saint named in the Roman Martyrology. (See the decrees at the beginning of the Breviary and Missal; Bened. XIV. "De Servorum Dei Beatif. &c." iv., Pt. II.; Thurston, in "Cath. Enc.")

RELIGION, RELIGIOUS (religio, prob. from relego; relegens, attentive, studious, would be the opposite of neglegens, careless [1]). The word "religion" is often used in a technical sense by Catholic writers to denote the virtue which deals with giving to God the honour which is His due. St. Thomas looks upon it as a part of the virtue of justice. God is the supreme Lord of all; all other beings are entirely dependent upon Him. Man by his reason can know this dignity of God and his own dependence upon God. He is therefore bound to acknowledge this dignity and dependence; to adore, praise, and thank his Creator, and to ask Him for all that he stands in need of. These acts of homage are paid chiefly by prayer and sacrifice (see these articles).

As religion is a moral virtue, it lies midway between two extremes. The defect of religion is called irreligion. To this belongs all want of reverence for God, or for persons or things dedicated to Him. Thus, tempting God, perjury, and sacrilege are instances of this vice. The opposite extreme is superstition. We cannot, of course, give God too much honour, but it is possible to honour Him in an unbecoming way, or to give to creatures the honour due to Him alone. To offer Mosaic sacrifices now that the new law has been established would be an instance of the former kind of superstition; idolatry, divination, and vain observance are instances of the latter.

[1] Skeat, Etymol. Dict.

Religion is sometimes used in a still narrower sense to designate the state of those who have entirely devoted themselves to God by the three vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience [see ORDERS, RELIGIOUS; MONK, NUN, &c.]. Hence the various religious orders are styled "religions." Trench ("Study of Words," p. 9) infers from this use of the word that monks and nuns are the only "religious" people among Catholics. St. Thomas long ago met this objection in a way that should commend itself to a writer on language. "A name common to many things is sometimes appropriated to that one to which it eminently belongs; as, for example, Rome is often called 'the city.' Now, religion is the virtue by which a man does something for the service and worship of God. And, therefore, they are said, by antonomasia, to be religious who have devoted themselves entirely to the service of God, offering, as it were, a holocaust to Him" ($2^a\ 2^{ae}$, q. 186 a. 1). St. Thomas has treated of religion at some length, $2^a\ 2^{ae}$, qq. 81–100; and of the religious state, qq. 184–190.

RESCRIPTS, PAPAL. Under the old Roman empire the emperor was the fountain of justice. He was the supreme judge, and he exercised his powers in two ways principally. He either sat as judge on appeals, or he gave opinions (rescripta, replies) at the instance of a subordinate judge or party to a cause. Thus the famous "rescriptum Trajani" (Pliny, "Epist. ad Trajanum," 96, 97) is a reply to the request made by Pliny for guidance as to his conduct towards Christians. In like manner, the custom arose of writing to the Popes or Papal Congregations and receiving replies. Such rescripts have the force of law inter partes, that is, for those in whose favour they have been granted; and they serve as precedents applicable to similar cases. If they are inserted in the Corpus Juris they have the force of common law. They are of various kinds: they may explain or extend or abrogate the law; or they may bestow benefices or favours. They presuppose the truth of the allegations mentioned in the petition. (Taunton.)

RESERVATION OF BENEFICES. Mandates and favours in expectation (mandata, gratiae expectativae), by which Popes had been accustomed to require that bishops and others, having the right of conferring benefices should, as soon as they fell vacant, confer them upon particular persons—and mental reservations, by which a Pontiff announced, but without mentioning their names, that he had reserved certain benefices, when they should fall vacant, in favour of particular persons—were all abolished by the Council of Trent.[1] With other Papal reservations the Council did not interfere.

The reservation of benefices is desirable for many reasons: it is a practical means of giving effect in widely separated countries to the supreme pastorate of the Roman Pontiffs; it links the different national Churches more closely, by personal ties of gratitude and affection, to the Apostolic See, and through it to each other; and it provides the Pope with the means of rewarding those who have laboured meritoriously in his cause and that of the Church.

Considered with reference to the legal foundation on which they rest, reservations are divided into four classes—(1) those which are contained in the "Corpus Juris"; (2) those which are found in the "Extravagants," outside the "Corpus"; (3) those specified in the constitutions of later Popes; (4) those specified by the rules of the Chancery. Another classification, founded on differences in the quality of reservations, is suggested by Cardinal Soglia. According to this arrangement, reservations are fivefold:—

(1) Benefices are reserved on the ground of their own quality; thus the second rule of the Chancery reserves to the Pope all vacant bishoprics, and the abbacy or headship in any monastery of men, the revenues of which exceed a certain amount. The fourth rule reserves the greater dignities in cathedral churches, and the principal dignities in collegiate churches possessing a certain revenue. One such dignity only in each church is understood to be affected by the rule. With regard to all the reservations under this head, it should be remembered that they do not take effect in countries where there is any pact or concordat regulating the course of patronage, for it is a maxim that pactum praestat juri.

(2) Benefices are reserved on the ground of their being held by particular persons—e.g. by cardinals, members of the Curia, and officials of the Holy See.

(3) The third ground of reservation is connected with the manner in which a benefice has become vacant. Thus a benefice may be vacated on account of heresy, in collusive simony (simonia confidentialis), or informality (as in the case of parishes, or appointing to which the concursus ordered by the Council of Trent has been neglected), or deposition proceeding from a particular cause; in all these cases, under constitutions emanating from St. Pius V and other Pontiffs, reservation takes effect.

(4) The fourth ground is connected with the place where the vacancy has occurred. The benefice of any ecclesiastic dying at the court of Rome is a familiar instance; this is mentioned in the "Corpus Juris," and is the most ancient of all reservations.

(5) The fifth ground depends on the time at which the vacancy has occurred. The ninth rule of the Chancery reserves all benefices strictly so called (not being in lay patronage), whether with or without cure of souls, which fall vacant in eight months of the year—viz. in January, February, April, May, July, August, October, and November. In the case of bishops, however, who reside continuously in their dioceses, and who apply for the privilege, the above rule is modified to this extent, that the Papal reservation only takes effect in alternate months, the patronage being thus equally divided between the Pope and the ordinary.

It should be observed that the rules of the Chancery have no legal force during a vacancy of the Holy See; each Pope renews them immediately after his election. Reservations, therefore, which depend only on a rule of the Chancery, and not also on a Papal constitution, do not take effect in the case of benefices vacated in the interval between the death of one Pope and the election of another. (Soglia, "Instit. Canon." III. 2, § 20.)

RESERVATION, MENTAL. [See MENTAL RESERVATION.]

RESERVATION OF THE HOLY EUCHARIST. The doctrine of the Church on this subject has been explained under the word EUCHARIST. In this article we propose to give a brief history of the reservation of the Holy Eucharist in the Church.

a. Causes of Reservation.—In all ages, of course, the Blessed Sacrament has been reserved for the sick; and the first Christians, in the times of persecution, kept the Eucharist at home and gave communion to themselves. But, besides this, (1) the Eucharist was sent from bishop to bishop as a sign of charity. Irenaeus (apud Euseb. "H.E." v. 24) testifies that the bishops of Rome sent the Eucharist to other bishops, and although the Council of Laodicea (canon 14) forbade the sending of the Eucharist at Easter into strange dioceses, and this prohibition found general acceptance, still a decretal of Pope Innocent to Decentius proves that the Bishop of Rome sent the fermentum or consecrated Host "per titulos"—i.e. to the chief churches of the city. (2) In Rome, as we know from the earliest Ordo, a Host consecrated at one Mass was placed on the altar at the Mass of the next day, to signify the unity of the sacrifice. A similar custom prevailed in Gaul under the first dynasty. (3) The Eucharist was carried by lay persons, or even catechumens (see Ambros. "De Excessu Sat." i. 43, PL, xvi. 1304), as a protection against danger. This custom must have lasted, at least in the case of clerics, till late in the Middle Ages, for St. Thomas à Becket carried the Eucharist with him when he went to meet Henry II.; St. Louis of France carried the Eucharist with him beyond the sea, but by permission of the Papal legate; and, from about this time, the privilege seems to have been reserved to the Pope, though one or two instances of priests carrying it for their own protection occur in later times—e.g. in the life of Savonarola. Among the Greek monks it was still maintained when Arcudius wrote his work "De Concordia Eccl. Occid. et Orientalis in VII Sacramentorum administratione"—i.e. in the seventeenth century. (4) In Rome and France, as appears from the Ordo Romanus and Alcuin, a bishop at his consecration kept a part of the Host presented to him by the consecrator and consumed it during the next forty days. The same usage obtained in some parts of France at the ordination of priests. (5) Many councils reprove the custom, which must have been widely spread, of giving communion to the dead (Concil. Hippo. c. 4; Auxerre, c. 12; Statut. Bonifac. 20). (6) The Host was buried with the dead. This was done on one occasion, according to St. Gregory the Great, by St. Benedict ("Dial." ii. 24), and, according to an ancient author, in the case of St. Basil, at the saint's own desire. (7) The pen was sometimes dipped in the Communion under the species of wine in subscribing decrees of councils, &c. Pope Theodore, for example, signed the condemnation of Pyrrhus in this way. (8) In dedicating churches three portions of the Host were put in the altar and sealed up with cement. This rite was followed by Pope Urban II. in dedicating the abbey church of Marmoutier (Martène, "De Rit." tom. i. c. 5, a. 4; quoted by Chardon).[1]

[1] Sess. xxiv. c. 19, De Ref.

b. The Case or Tabernacle in which the Blessed Sacrament was Reserved.—The oldest tabernacles had the form of a tower. According to Anastasius, Constantine presented St. Peter's Church at Rome with a tower of pure gold adorned with jewels and with a dove upon it, while Innocent I. and Hilarius I. gave towers of the same kind to the churches of SS. Gervase and Protase and of St. John Lateran. Such a tower existed in Chardon's time (the middle of the eighteenth century) at Marmoutier. There is one still in Nuremberg in the Church of St. Laurence. Their turrical form was succeeded in many churches by tabernacles in the shape of a covered cup; in others by small boxes suspended over the altar. The custom, so common in France, of suspending the Blessed Sacrament in a tabernacle made like a dove has been described elsewhere [art. DOVE]. Tabernacles were of very various material, of precious metal, of precious stone such as onyx, of glass, or even wood.

c. The Place of Reservation.—The most ancient use was to reserve the Holy Eucharist in παστοφόρια or thalami—i.e. in chambers at the side of the church. Jerome, in cap. 40 Ezech. (quoted by Chardon), alludes to this custom. Reserving the Eucharist in the sacristy was not extinct in France even during the eighteenth century. In the Middle Ages the Eucharist was often reserved in an ambry [AMBRY], or press, in the corner of the building or in a pillar—such a press as we now use for the holy oils. The modern Greeks reserve the Eucharist for the Mass of the Presanctified in the sacristy, whence it is carried in procession to the altar. For the sick they keep it in a place called ἀρτοφόριον behind the altar, with a lamp burning before it. Such, no doubt, is their rule, but M. Nointel, ambassador from the King of France to the Sultan, gives an interesting account (printed in the "Perpétuité de la Foi") of the different ways in which he saw the Eucharist reserved among the Greeks. Sometimes the box which held it was on the altar; very often it was put in a silk bag and hung on a nail.

Gavantus approves the custom which exists in many Catholic churches, of placing the tabernacle on the altar in a side chapel; but in most English churches the tabernacle with the Blessed Sacrament is placed over the chief altar, and the Sacred Congregation of Rites approved of this practice, except in the case of cathedrals. (From Chardon, 295 sqq.; see also Bridgett-Thurston, "Hist. of the Holy Eucharist in Great Britain," especially 186; Thurston, "Month" 1907, and "Cath. Enc."; Fortescue, "The Orthodox Eastern Church," 421.)

RESERVED CASES. Certain sins, power to absolve from which is reserved by the superior to himself and not imparted to inferiors, who have ordinary or delegated jurisdiction over other sins. Papal cases are reserved to the Pope, episcopal cases to the bishop, the reserved cases of regulars to the prelates of the order. Jurisdiction given by a superior is, as has been shown in the article on PENANCE, necessary for the validity of absolution. But a superior may either confer the whole of the jurisdiction which he himself holds, or only a part of it, just as in England the Crown empowers magistrates to try petty cases, but not the more serious crimes. Hence, the Council of Trent (sess. xix. De Poenit. can. 11) defines that bishops have the power of reserving cases, and that absolution from them cannot be validly given by an ordinary confessor. The object of the reservation is to increase the shame of the penitent, to impress the serious nature of the offence upon him, and to give the superior, who is likely to have more experience than the ordinary confessor, the opportunity of prescribing a fitting remedy. This power of reservation, however, is given for edification, not destruction. Clement

[1] In modern times the Holy Eucharist is also reserved for exposition and benediction, and in order that the faithful may be able throughout the day to adore Christ present on the altar. [See BENEDICTION; EXPOSITION; VISITS TO THE BLESSED SACRAMENT.]

VIII. warns prelates [1] only to reserve "the more atrocious and grievous crimes," and it is generally assumed that the reservation falls only on sins which are grievous, external, certain, and complete in their kind. The reserved sin may also have a censure attached to it, and this is almost always the case in Papal reserves. Absolution from a reserved sin may be given by the superior who reserves it, by his successors, by those whom he delegates, by his own superiors. For full information we refer to the common treatises on moral theology; only adding that in the dioceses of England very few sins, and those of most rare occurrence, are reserved either to the Pope or ordinary.

The practice of the modern is consonant with that of the ancient and mediaeval Church, which usually "reserved to the bishops the absolution of public penitents" (Chardon, 664 sqq.). Some of the cases quoted by Chardon scarcely seem to the point—e.g. the direction of ancient Rituals that priests are to hear the confessions of those who present themselves, and take them, if they seem well disposed, to the bishop for absolution; or the statement of Peter the Cantor in his "Sum of the Sacraments," that formerly monks used to hear confessions and the abbot alone to absolve. But he quotes from the Acts of a Benedictine, St. Redon, who lived in the tenth century, and from Constitutions of Richard, bishop of Salisbury, clear cases of Papal reserve. In 1171, Pope Alexander III. wrote to the Archbishop of Upsala, that women guilty of child-murder and other abominations were to be sent to Rome for absolution. "This," says Fleury ("H.E." lxxii. 35), "is the beginning of Papal reserves for more atrocious crimes"; but the instances just given show that this is scarcely correct. Maskell ("Monum. Rit." vol. i. p. 97) gives some account of reserved sins in the old English Church. Thus, a Council of Durham in 1250 lays down the principle that greater sins are to be reserved to those higher in office. The penitent is to go to the bishop or the penitentiary with a letter from his confessor stating the nature and circumstances of his sin, or else the confessor is to accompany him. In 1367, Thoresby, archbishop of York, reserved thirty-seven sins to himself or his penitentiary. (St. Alphonsus, "Theol. Mor." lib. vi. 578 sqq.; Ballerini, "Theol. Mor." v. 348 sqq.; Ferraris; Taunton; Slater, "Mor. Theol." ii. 192.)

RESIDENCE. Before the Council of Trent the non-residence of ecclesiastics, even of bishops, had long been a crying evil. In the sixth session, the Fathers adopted a decree of reformation, which provided that any patriarch, metropolitan, or bishop, who should remain without legitimate cause for six months together absent from his church should forfeit a fourth part of the revenues. A still more protracted and contumacious absence was eventually to be reported to the Pope, who would meet it by appropriate measures. Finding that this decree had been by some perversely understood, as if a bishop might, without incurring censure, be absent five months in the year from his diocese, the Council, in the twenty-third and twenty-fourth sessions, returned to the subject, and declared that "all the rulers of patriarchal, metropolitan, and cathedral churches, under whatsoever name or title, even if they be cardinals of the Holy Roman Church, are bound to personal residence in their own church or diocese, where it is their duty to discharge the functions of their office, and cannot be absent, except for the causes and under the circumstances hereunder specified." There are many legitimate causes of absence, but these must be approved in writing either by the Pope or the metropolitan; except in the case of some urgent political exigency, the occurrence of which, being usually sudden, and at the same time notorious, dispenses the bishop from the necessity of notifying his absence. As a rule, the period of absence in the course of a year, apart from the urgent causes above noticed, "ought on no account to exceed two or at most three months; and care should be taken that there be a sufficient cause, and that the bishop's flock suffer no harm; judgment on which point [the Council] leaves to the conscience of those absenting themselves, hoping that it [their conscience] will be scrupulous and full of fear, since hearts are open before God, whose work they are bound at their peril not to do deceitfully." [1]

Canons in cathedral and collegiate churches are ordinarily bound to residence during nine months in the year.[2] But where a foundation possesses a privilege, confirmed by the Pope, in virtue of which the canons are permitted to be absent for a longer time, it is held that the conciliar decree does not derogate from that privilege.[3] In the case both of bishops and canons, the period of absence ought not to comprise the times at which the great festivals (Christmas, Easter, Pentecost, Corpus Christi) are celebrated, nor the days of Lent or Advent. The obligation on individual canons to reside does not bind when they have a lawful excuse for not doing so. Such excuses are—illness, permitted sojourn in a foreign country for the purpose of study or teaching, and employment in the immediate service of the bishop.

Parish priests and other beneficiaries having cure of souls cannot be absent from their cure for more than a week without the bishop's permission. Two months in the year is the period beyond which the bishop's permission of non-residence to his clergy is not ordinarily extended.

[1] He actually limited the power of reservation on the part of religious superiors.

[3] Ferraris, "Canonicatus," art. 5.

Diocesan statutes, concordats, and the civil law in certain countries, contain a great variety of particular regulations respecting the residence of ecclesiastics. (Taunton; Ballerini, "Theol. Mor." iv. 221 sqq.; St. Alphonsus, "Theol. Mor." lib. v. 120 sqq.)

RESIGNATION. The resignation or renunciation of a benefice is "the spontaneous relinquishment of an ecclesiastical benefice, made before the lawful superior, and accepted by him."[1] It is either tacit or express. A resignation is tacitly or ipso facto made of any church preferment held by the resigner in the following cases: by one who, already having one benefice, is nominated to another incompatible with the first; by a clerk in minor orders who enters into a contract of marriage; by a clerk becoming professed in a religious order [PROFESSION, RELIGIOUS]; and by a clerk becoming a soldier or a strolling player. An express resignation is made either in words or in writing, and is either pure or conditional. A pure resignation is an unqualified absolute surrender of the preferment; a conditional resignation is made sub conditione, and is of five kinds, according as it is made—(1) in favour of a third person; or (2) with the reservation of a pension out of the revenues; or (3) with the right of resumption, if the resignatary should die before the resigner; or (4) with the right of resumption at some given date in the future; or (5) in pursuance of an arrangement for an exchange of benefices. But these conditional resignations, the status of the clergy relatively to the civil power being so different from what it formerly was, are now of rare occurrence.

Publicity is necessary to the validity of a resignation, and the mode of publication under varying circumstances is minutely regulated by canon law.

Reserved benefices, the collation of which belongs to the Pope alone, cannot be resigned into the hands of any ordinary lower than the Pope.

According to a decretal of Innocent III.,[2] a bishop can only resign his see for one of six causes, which are summed up in the memorial lines:—

> Debilis, ignarus, male conscius, irregularis,
> Quem mala plebs odit, dans scandala, cedere possit.

The lawful causes, therefore, are physical infirmity; ignorance, or a want of the knowledge necessary for the discharge of his office; the consciousness of some crime, such as heresy, which, even after penance done, would impede him in the performance of his duties; irregularity (see that article); great personal unpopularity, and some grave scandal, which nothing short of his resignation could remove. (Ferraris, Resignatio; Taunton.)

[1] Ferraris. [2] Ferraris, "Resignatio," § 29.

RESPONSORY. Verses said after the Lessons, so called according to Isidore because part of it is said by one reader or singer to whom the choir answer with the rest of the responsory. "Historia" is the name given in the Micrologia, because they mostly refer to the history in the Lesson or commemorated on the day. (Probst, "Brevier und Breviergebet," p. 107 seq.; Batiffol, "Hist. du Brév." p. 93 sqq.; Baümer-Biron, i. 172.)

RESTITUTION. The principle, "Do wrong to no man," implies that if we have done another any injury we are bound to make good the loss. Thus, if we have converted another's property to our own use, we must give it back to him; if we have destroyed anything that is his, even without benefiting by the action, we must hand over to him an equivalent at our own cost. We are also bound to indemnify him for any inconvenience that he may have suffered by being deprived of his property. Restitution applies, as far as the case admits, to any injury to another's life or limb, wife, goods, or good name (V., VI., VII., and VIII. commandments), and is binding under pain of mortal sin where the matter is serious. Absolution may be given before restitution is actually made, provided that the penitent has the intention of restoring as soon as possible. If the intention is not carried out, the penitent grievously sins. It should be noted that they who co-operate in causing injury are bound to make restitution. The exact details of this branch of the subject cannot here be entered into. Restitution is not necessary where the injurer cannot make good the loss, or where he may prudently judge that the injured party does not require him to do so, or where an equivalent compensation has been made. Thus, Crolly holds that a bankrupt who has passed his examination, at least in England, is not afterwards bound to pay his liabilities. Lehmkuhl accepts this opinion only with hesitation and with some qualification. (See the last named writer's "Theol. Moralis," i. 573 sqq.) But Slater, "Moral Theol." i. p. 438, 451, quite confidently maintains that the bankrupt is not bound.

RESURRECTION OF THE BODY. The doctrine of a general resurrection of the dead, both good and bad, is nowhere taught in the Hebrew Bible. The Book of Isaias, xxvi. 19, certainly expresses faith in a resurrection. The prophet expresses the disappointment of the Jewish nation when their land was restored to them and they were not numerous enough to people it. But they must not lose heart. "Thy dead shall live: thy dead bodies shall arise. Awake and shout, ye who lie in the dust, for thy dew is a dew of lights, and the earth shall bring forth the the shades"—i.e. the power of God shall descend like dew, instinct with the light of life; the corpses shall arise, and the departed spirits from the nether world will quicken them into their old life. We have in Osee (Hosea) vi. 2 ("He will quicken us after two days: on the third day He will raise us up and we shall live in His sight"), and in Ezech. xxxvii. 11–14 allusions to a resurrection, but only in an allegorical sense. In Daniel xii. 2, as in Isa. xxvi. 19, it is a literal and not a metaphorical resurrection which is intended, and the writer, who has the verse of Isaias in his mind, goes further, and teaches a resurrection to shame as well as to joy. "Many of them that sleep in the dusty earth shall awake, some to eternal life and some to eternal reproach and horror." The character of the book makes it likely that the "many" who are to rise are all Israelites, some of whom have been faithful to the law, others apostates; but in any case it is a resurrection of many, not of all, which is predicted. We have still to consider the famous passage in Job xix. 27. We venture to give the following as an exact translation of the Hebrew:—"I know that my avenger liveth, and at the last [lit. as the last one—i.e. to speak the last decisive word] he shall rise up on the dust. And after my skin has been thus destroyed [lit. which they have thus destroyed] and [away] from my flesh I shall see God, whom I shall behold for myself, and mine eyes shall have seen [a preterite of confidence] and not another: my reins waste [with longing] in my breast." There are very strong grounds for believing that Job here asserts his expectation of immortality, and this interpretation is held by critics, such as Ewald and Dillmann, who cannot be suspected of dogmatic prejudice. The confident hope of immortality shines forth clearly, just when Job's desolation, when the absence of all human comfort is most complete. The poem leads us up naturally to this expression of confidence. There is a gradual advance from the doubts of ch. xiv. to the sublime prayer and trust of xvi. 18 ad fin. All this culminates in the passage before us; nor does Job fall back again to the depth of his former despair. But, on the other hand, "from my flesh" may quite well, according to Hebrew usage, mean "away from my flesh." This use of the particle is very common in Hebrew (see, e.g., Gen. xxvii. 29, Jer. xlviii. 45), and a striking instance of the double sense of "from" in English will be found in "Richard III." act iv. scene 4.[1] In Second Maccabees we find the doctrine of the resurrection strongly asserted, but even there nothing is said about a resurrection of all men. And although the resurrection of the dead (תְּחִיַּת הַמֵּתִים) is the thirteenth article of the Jewish creed, the doctrine of a resurrection of both good and bad, says Weber ("Altsynag. Theol." p. 372), cannot be proved from the Talmud or Midrashim; and he quotes the dictum of Maimonides, "The resurrection of the dead is a fundamental article of Moses our teacher . . . but it only belongs to the just." Heathen, or Jews who are to be reckoned as heathen, have no part in it. We may add that David Kimchi on Ps. i. 5 ("the wicked shall not rise in judgment") denies the resurrection of the wicked, and on Ps. civ. 30 he says "it is disputed among our sages" whether the resurrection will be general; but adds that the "ways" or style of the Talmud favours the belief that it is the just only who will rise. This doctrine of the most orthodox Jewish doctors is by no means to be confounded with the Sadducee denial that the bodies of just or unjust rose again.

The New Testament, however, clearly teaches that the wicked also will rise again (e.g. Mt. v. 29, x. 28). In it the resurrection of the just assumes a new prominence, and the "resurrection of the flesh" became an article of the Apostles' Creed, and one of the most characteristic[1] doctrines of Christianity. St. Paul insists that as death came by sin (Rom. v. 15), so Christ completes His redeeming work by raising to new life the bodies of those who sleep in Him (1 Cor. xv. 54 seq.). From the very first the doctrine was an object of Pagan ridicule (Acts xvii. 32), and the Fathers down to the end of the fourth century were constantly employed in answering Pagan and heretical objections. (See, e.g., Athenag. "De Resurrect." c. 4; Iren. "Adv. Haer." v. 3, PG, vii. 1129; Tertull. "Apol." 48; PL, i. 520; "De Carne Christi," 15, PL, ii. 779; "De Resurrect." 3, PL, ii. 798; Minuc. Felix, 11; Cyril Hieros. "Cat." xviii., PG, xxxiii. 1017; August. "Enchirid." 84, PL, xl. 272.) We cannot wonder at the objections which Pagans and heretics such as the Gnostics felt. Plato, the noblest of heathen philosophers, had regarded the body as the prison-house of the soul, and death as an escape from the bonds of matter. It was long before the world could accept the deeper view of the Christian Church—viz. that the body is a constituent part of human nature; that man, body and soul, is the work of God, and that both are precious in his sight. The Christians, on the other hand, during times of persecution comforted themselves with the thought of the resurrection. The symbols of it—e.g. the tree, the eagle, the egg, the peacock—occur on the oldest monuments;

What do you think?
Q. Eliz. That thou dost love my daughter from thy soul:
So from thy soul's love didst thou love her brothers;
And from my heart's love I do thank thee for it.
K. Rich. Be not so hasty to confound my meaning.

[1] The Babylonians, however, and the Persians had believed in a resurrection. The former ascribed it to the god Marduk, who himself died and rose again.

and so also the types of the resurrection—the three youths in the furnace, Job, Ezechiel, Daniel in the lions' den, the ascent of Elias, &c. (See Kraus, "Real-Encyclop." art. Auferstehung.)

All the Creeds confess the resurrection of the body, but the fullest definition is that of the Fourth Lateran Council in 1215 (cap. i. "Adv. Albig."): "All will rise with their own proper bodies which they now bear." St. Thomas ("Supp." q. 79 a. 2) says it is heretical to deny the numerical identity of the body which dies and rises again; and the opinion attributed to Durandus (see Jungmann, "De Noviss." cap. iii. a. 2), viz. that the body will be the same in this sense only, that it will be informed by the same soul, does not seem to satisfy the terms of the Lateran definition. But this identity must not be pressed too strictly. Our bodies remain the same, though the atoms of which they are composed are in constant change. Jungmann (loc. cit.) lays it down as the common teaching of all Catholic theologians that we may suppose part of the elements of the risen body to be supplied by the power of God without in any way denying the truth of the resurrection. He admits that modern writers "of the best reputation" mention (and apparently hold) opinions which go much further than this.

We learn from St. Paul that the bodies of the just will rise incorruptible, glorious, and spiritual—i.e. subject no longer to animal wants, but entirely dominated by the spirit (so Estius, ad 1 Cor. xv. 44). The Schoolmen have expanded this Pauline doctrine into the theory that the risen body will have four gifts or endowments: impassibility; claritas or splendour, the glory of the soul shining forth in the body; subtlety, i.e. the power of penetrating other bodies, as Christ passed through the closed doors; agility, i.e. the power of moving and acting swiftly at the will of the spirit. (The subject is dealt with by the dogmatic theologians in their treatise "De Novissimis," e.g. Billot, Jungmann, Atzberger "Die Christliche Eschatologie"; Oxenham, "Catholic Eschatology"; Wilhelm and Scannell, "Cath. Theol." ii. 535 sqq.).

RESURRECTION OF CHRIST. This greatest of Christ's miracles and strongest proof of His Divinity is the object of persistent attacks on the part of unbelievers. Against them we show:

I. The historical truth of Christ's resurrection; viz. (1) His real death, and (2) His coming to life again.

(1) His death is attested unanimously by the four Evangelists: "He gave up the ghost" (Mt. xxvii. 50; Mk. xv. 37; Lk. xxiii. 46; Jn. xix. 30). Pilate asked the Roman centurion in command at the crucifixion if Christ was already dead, and only when he had understood it from the centurion he gave the body to Joseph of Arimathea (Mk. xv. 43–45). Other witnesses are the soldiers who broke the legs of the two thieves crucified with Jesus, but did not break His legs because they "saw that he was already dead" (Jn. xix. 32, 33). All doubt as to His death is removed through the opening of His side by a spear, which would have killed Him had He not been dead already. According to Roman law, the relatives of the condemned were entitled to take possession of His body and to bury it, yet not before death had been made certain by a thrust of the spear. The thrust left behind a large open wound into which Thomas was able to introduce his hand. Again, the water and blood that flowed from the side are a sure sign of death. The observations of older doctors testify that water gathers in the pericardium of those who die after a long and painful agony. The thrust of the spear was given soon after death and before the blood had coagulated, as appears from the great number of things which took place between that moment and the evening of the same day, before the Sabbath commenced. If death had only been apparent, the handling of the body in removing it from the cross would certainly have restored life; not to mention that His Mother, Mary Magdalen, and Joseph of Arimathea would not have performed the rites of the burial if they had not been convinced of His death. Nay, these very ceremonies, especially the wrapping up in linen, would have been sufficient to extinguish the last gleam of life if any remained. Again, the hatred of the Pharisees and Scribes is a guarantee that they did not leave the place of execution before being sure of the death of their victim. They never contended that His death was only apparent in order to disprove His resurrection. Modern rationalists were the first to put forward the theory of Christ's merely apparent death. They founded it on Pilate's astonishment at the Saviour's early death, and on the fact that men have been known to live two or more days on the cross. In the case of Christ, however, death was accelerated by His previous sufferings, spiritual and corporal; although it may be permitted to attribute death to an act of His free will.

(2) Not less certain than Christ's death is His coming to life again. The Evangelists with one voice declare that Christ rose from the dead, and that an angel announced His resurrection to the women who had gone to the sepulchre (Mt. xxviii. 1–7; Mk. xvi. 1–8; Lk. xxiv. 1–8; Jn. xx. 1 seq.). After His resurrection Christ appeared to many and gave them tangible proofs of His being alive. He appeared to Mary Magdalen and to the women who came to the sepulchre (Mt. xxviii. 9–10; Mk. xvi. 9; Jn. xx. 14–17); to the two disciples on the way to Emmaus, who recognized Him by the breaking of the bread (Lk. xxiv. 13 seq.); to Simon Peter (Lk. xxiv. 34; 1 Cor. xv. 5); to the Apostles gathered together in the absence of Thomas, to whom He showed His hands and His feet, whom He allowed to touch Him and to whom He gave the power of forgiving sins (Lk. xxiv. 36–43; Jn. xx. 19–24; Mk. xvi. 14; 1 Cor. xv. 5); eight days later to the Apostles when Thomas was with them (Jn. xx 26–29); repeatedly in Galilee, especially to seven disciples fishing on the Sea of Tiberias (Jn. xxi. 1 seq.), and to more than five hundred brethren on a mountain in Galilee, many of whom were still alive when St. Paul wrote his first epistle to the Corinthians (1 Cor. xv. 6; Mt. xxviii. 16–20; Mk. xvi. 15–18; Lk. xxiv. 44–49); to James (1 Cor. xv. 7); lastly, to the Apostles before His ascension into heaven (Mk. xvi. 19; Lk. xxiv. 50; Acts i. 6–10; 1 Cor. xv. 7). Strauss and Renan treat these many witnesses as visionaries. "The Apostles," they say, "were at first bewildered and confused by the death of Christ. Yet they were unable to shake off their belief in Jesus as the expected Messiah. Hence, in Galilee, where everything reminded them of the Master, they sought to conciliate their belief 'that Christ abideth for ever' (Jn. xii. 34) and the prophecies of the Old Testament (e.g. Isaias lxiii. and Psalm xv.) with the events they had witnessed, and thus gradually they evolved the idea of His resurrection from the dead. Their enthusiasm, and the excited imagination of women, created imaginary visions of the departed, which tradition transformed into real apparitions." But such an hypothesis is incredible on the face of it. The Apostles and other disciples, who during Christ's lifetime were often rebuked for their incredulity, were not the men to persuade themselves that Christ had risen from the grave, had appeared to and been touched by them, had taken meals with them, and communicated to them things of the utmost importance which they faithfully relate. The Gospel narrative, on the other hand, bears upon it the stamp of consistency and truth. After, as before, the resurrection, the Apostles remained slow in believing. The words of the women seemed to them as an idle tale, and they did not believe them (Lk. xxiv. 11; Mk. xvi. 11, 13); they were rebuked for their incredulity by the risen Christ Himself (Mk. xvi. 14; Lk. xxiv. 25); even when Christ stood in their presence and said to them "Peace be to you; it is I, fear not," they were troubled and affrighted and supposed they saw a spirit. To convince them, He showed them His hands and His feet; they saw and felt, yet they believed not until He had eaten before them a piece of broiled fish and a honeycomb (Lk. xxiv. 36–43). Still more unbelieving than the rest was Thomas, who was not with the Apostles when Jesus appeared to them. When they said to him "We have seen the Lord," he answered "Unless I shall see in His hands the prints of the nails, and put my finger in the place of the nails, and put my hand into His side, I will not believe" (Jn. xx. 25 seq.). After eight days, the Lord again appeared and invited Thomas to put his hands in the wounds, and only then the Apostle exclaimed: "My Lord and my God!" The slowness of belief in Thomas, as St. Gregory observes, has been more useful to us than the faith of the other Apostles, for by putting his hands into the wounds of the Lord the doubting disciple has cured the wounds of our incredulity. The above facts entirely upset all rationalistic theories attributing the Apostles' preaching on the resurrection of Christ to preconceived ideas or to an over-excited imagination. The multiplicity and incontrovertible evidence of the proofs of the resurrection are evidenced by the enthusiasm and unflinching constancy with which the Apostles published it everywhere and appealed to it as the best proof of the divinity of their teaching. St. Peter commences his public preaching by proclaiming the fact of the resurrection to the Jews who had crucified Christ (Acts ii. 22 seq.); he insists upon it in presence of the authorities and of the people, and no threat deters him (Acts iii. 15, 26; iv. 10, 33; v. 30; x. 40 seq.). In his first epistle he again appeals to the resurrection (1 Pet. i. 3, 21). St. Paul likewise bears frequent witness to the resurrection of Christ; in Antioch of Pisidia and at Thessalonica (Acts xiii. 30 seq.; xvii. 3); at Athens in the midst of the Areopagus (Acts xvii. 31), and very often in his epistles (e.g. Rom. iv. 25; viii. 34; xiv. 9; 1 Thess. iv. 13, &c.). He lays special stress on it in his first epistle to the Corinthians, where he makes the certitude of our faith entirely dependent on the certitude of the resurrection. "With great power did the Apostles give testimony of the resurrection of Jesus Christ our Lord" (Acts iv. 33); they liked to call themselves witnesses of His resurrection, and they confirmed their testimony by dying to maintain its truth. God corroborated the testimony of the Apostles through miracles wrought in the name of the risen Lord (Acts iii. 15 seq.; iv. 10). Nobody contradicted the Apostles when they preached the resurrection to the people of Jerusalem who had seen the crucifixion. On the contrary, 3000 conversions were made by the first sermon of St. Peter, and more on other occasions (Acts ii. 41; iv. 4). Many priests were among the converts (Acts vi. 7). The conduct of Christ's enemies affords another confirmation of His resurrection. They had sealed the tomb and placed guards round it. When the guards told them that an angel had removed the stone and that the grave was empty, "They gave a great sum of money to the soldiers, saying 'Say you that His disciples came by night and stole Him away when we were asleep'" (Mt. xxviii. 12, 13). Only perfect helplessness could suggest such an explanation. Why did they not punish the soldiers who failed to do their duty? How could they appeal to sleeping witnesses? Why not exact a judicial inquiry? Why not accuse the Apostles of breaking the seal attached by lawful authority? They did nothing of all this, although the Apostles publicly reproached them with the murder of Jesus, and found credence among the people. All they did was to forbid the Apostles to teach in the name of Jesus (Acts iv. 18; v. 40). Thus the conduct of the Jews shows that they did not believe in their own assertion, which, moreover, is intrinsically impossible. The Gospels characterize the Apostles as simple and honest men, quite unable to perform the feat of stealing Christ's body. Then, what could have induced them to act thus dishonestly? If Christ did not rise, His whole undertaking was at an end; they had nothing more to expect from the man who had so utterly deceived them. God also would punish them for giving testimony against Him (1 Cor. xv. 15). The world offered no other reward to their dishonest schemes than the hatred, scorn, and persecution which it had bestowed on their Master. With such prospects nobody practises deceit. Moreover, any scheme of stealing the body was doomed to fail. The Roman soldiers who guarded the sepulchre were not likely to be all sleeping; and granted that they were, the removal of a heavy stone and the carrying off of the corpse would have disturbed their sleep. Among the many whom it was necessary to let into the secret, how is it that none betrayed them? Remorse, fear, hope of reward, unguardedness of speech, would certainly have led one or more of the conspirators into divulging the conspiracy. The modern opponents of Christianity have abandoned the Jewish theory as indefensible; they substitute for it the theories of visions and fancies dealt with above. The common ground of all objections to the resurrection of Christ is disbelief in miracles generally, and rejection à priori of the historical value of all books that admit miracles. Certain contradictions in the Gospel narratives are also adduced as objections against the resurrection. But these contradictions are only apparent, and rather confirm than weaken the authority of the narratives. The writers constantly keep in view the main point, on which they all agree; the fact that they differ on minor and unimportant details merely proves that they wrote independently of one another. A very ancient objection—Celsus raised it long ago—is the question why Christ did not appear to His enemies. To this we may reply that Christ's enemies were among the first to receive certain news of His resurrection through the guards who had witnessed it. Such testimony would have been sufficient if their hearts had not been hardened. But as, formerly, they had attributed Christ's miracles to the influence of the devil (Mt. xii. 24); as they had been prepared to kill Lazarus, raised from the dead (Jn. xii. 10), rather than acknowledge the miracle, so now they remained unmoved by the miracles which accompanied the death of Christ, or which were wrought by the Apostles. An apparition of Christ to them would have increased their guiltiness rather than have brought about their conversion (cf. Lk. xvi. 31).

II. The resurrection as proof of the divinity of Christ's teaching.—Christ often foretold His resurrection, and declared that He would rise by His own power. "I have power to lay down my life, and I have power to take it up again" (Jn. x. 18). "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up" (Jn. ii. 19). When the Pharisees would see a sign of Him, He answered: "A sign shall not be given, but the sign of Jonas the prophet," &c. (Mt. xii. 39, 40), thus holding out His resurrection as a proof in itself sufficient of His Divine mission. And often, when foretelling His passion and death, He added, "and the third day He [the Son of Man] shall rise again" (Mt. xvi. 21; xx. 19; cf. xvii. 9). Hence the resurrection of Christ is at the same time a miracle and a prophecy, and affords a double proof of the divinity of His mission and of His whole teaching. It is a miracle wrought by His own power, and therefore the strongest proof of His oft-asserted Divinity. It is the greatest of all miracles ever wrought, because, more than any other, it transcends the power of created causes. Hence it is a fit crowning and sealing of Christ's other miracles, and for this reason St. Paul has no hesitation in making all Christian truth dependent on the truth of the resurrection (1 Cor. xv. 14–20). Hence, also, the other Apostles always bring to the front the fact of the resurrection to make their doctrines acceptable to Jews and Gentiles, although with cultured Gentiles they might have succeeded better by simply holding out to them the beauty and reasonableness of Christian teaching. The world accepted the testimony of the Apostles; the foundation, progress, continuance of the Church are a great fact which in its turn bears out the truth of the resurrection. For the world to believe the Apostles without any miracles would be in itself a greater miracle than any attributed to them.

It may be well to point out that the Modernist views on the Resurrection were condemned in the 36th and 37th propositions of the decree "Lamentabili": "The Resurrection of our Saviour is not properly a fact of the historical order, but a fact of the purely supernatural order neither proved nor provable, which Christian consciousness has little by little inferred from other facts"; "The faith in the Resurrection of Christ pointed at the beginning not so much to the fact of the Resurrection as to the immortal life of Christ with God." (A dogma so fundamental as the Resurrection is treated of by all the commentators on the Gospels and also by all the dogmatic theologians and apologists. It will be sufficient to mention here a few works having reference to recent controversies: e.g. Mangenot, in "Revue Pratique d'Apologétique" (1908–9); Ladeuze, "La Résurrection du Christ devant la Critique Contemporaine"; Dentler, "Die Auferstehung Jesu Christi nach den Berichten des N.T." in "Biblische Zeitfragen," I. Münster, 1908; Westcott, "The Gospel of the Resurrection.")

RING. The use of rings as ornaments for the fingers goes back to remote antiquity. Though not mentioned in Homer they are spoken of in Gen. xli. 42, and elsewhere in the O.T. Everyone is familiar with the story of Mago flinging down a bushel of gold rings before the Carthaginian Senate, adding that "none but knights, and only the chief of these, were entitled to wear them" (Livy, xxiii. 12). While the ring of gold was a mark of distinction, the ring of iron was a sign of ignominy. St. Isidore of Seville says: "Among the Romans neither slaves nor freed-men wear gold rings in public; only the free-born do this. Freed-men wear a silver ring, slaves an iron one, though persons of the highest rank also wear an iron ring" ("Etym." xix. 32, PL, lxxxii. 701). Rings were also used as seals, and were sometimes worn on the finger for safe custody. The only rings which concern us here are those worn by (1) bishops; (2) abbots and abbesses; (3) nuns; (4) the wedding ring; (5) the "ring of the Fisherman."

(1) The priests of Jupiter at Rome enjoyed senatorial honours, and among these the right to wear a gold ring. This custom may have influenced the Christian bishops to adopt the same mark of honour. We do not meet, however, with any mention of it until, early in the seventh century, Boniface IV., in the third council of Rome (610), speaks of the elevation of monks to the episcopal dignity: "De monachis annulo pontificali subarrhatis." This, and similar other references, show that the use of the pontifical ring was already a well-known custom. St. Isidore says: "Huic (episcopo) autem dum consecratur . . . datur et annulus, propter signum pontificalis honoris vel signaculum secretorum" (De Ecclesiasticis Officiis, ii. 5, 12, PL, lxxxiii. 783–4). In the Pontifical of Egbert we find the formula: "Accipe annulum pontificalis honoris, ut sis fidei integritate munitus" (Martène, ii. p. 342). According to the present Roman Pontifical, the ring is blessed by the consecrating bishop and placed upon the third finger of the right hand of the new bishop. The mystical meaning of the bishop's ring is his union with the church to which he has been appointed: "Episcopus debet habere annulum quia sponsus est" ("Speculum Eccles." ap. Martène, ii. 559). Innocent III. and Calixtus III. both dwell upon this.

(2) No early mention is made of the ring as one of the insignia of abbots. But it was to be expected that they would in time obtain this also among other privileges of bishops. Certain abbeys received from the Holy See the exceptional right for their abbots to wear pontificalia. It was only in the Middle Ages that this privilege became common. In the present pontifical the blessing is the same as that of a bishop's ring. It is not easy to trace the history of the abbess's ring. For a long time the ring given in religious profession was the only one worn by an abbess, but with the growing custom of assimilating the privileges of abbots and abbesses, a special ring came to be bestowed at the blessing of an abbess. There is no mention of it in the Pontifical.

(3) The wearing of a ring by virgins consecrated to God is a sign of their mystical marriage with Christ. The analogy with the ordinary wedding ring is so obvious that the practice must have been introduced in early Christian times. St. Ambrose alludes to it in his sermon on St. Agnes ("Serm." xlviii., PL, xvii. 701, 735). Nevertheless, the ancient pontificals do not mention it in the rite of consecration of virgins. It is only in the Middle Ages that we find it. According to the present Pontifical the bishop blesses the ring and places it upon the third finger of the nun's right hand, saying "I espouse thee to Jesus Christ," &c.

(4) Plautus ("Miles Gloriosus," iv. 1, 11) speaks of the custom of giving a ring as a sign of betrothal. Originally it was of iron, but during the second century a gold ring was given (Tertullian, "Apol." vi. PL, i. 302). The history of the transition from the betrothal ring of the ancients to the wedding ring blessed by the priest at the marriage ceremony is very obscure.

(5) "The ring of the Fisherman (St. Peter)" is not mentioned until 1265 during the pontificate of Clement IV. It is the private seal of the Popes, used in Papal briefs.

RITES. A Christian rite is the manner of conducting the services for the worship of God and the sanctification of man. It is sometimes confused with liturgy; but it is better to keep the latter for the Eucharistic sacrifice, the Mass. Again, it is sometimes used for a particular ceremony, e.g., the rite of burial, the rite of consecrating a church, &c. Here we use it as meaning the whole collection of Christian services.

The Church is one in doctrine and one in the essential parts of her services. Nevertheless, she allows, and indeed encourages, varieties in the mode of conducting her services, adapted to the varying circumstances of time, place, temperament, history, &c. Thus washing and the recital of words indicating the character of the washing are of the essence of baptism; but the washing may be by immersion, effusion, or aspersion, and by a single or by triple washing; and the words may be "I baptize thee," &c., or "The servant of God is baptized," &c. Wheaten bread must be used in the Holy Eucharist; but it may be leavened or unleavened. And so with other ceremonies of the Church. "Leo XIII., in his Encyclical 'Praeclara' (June 20, 1894), expressed the traditional attitude of the papacy when he wrote of his reverence for the venerable rites of the Eastern Churches and assured the schismatics, whom he invited to reunion, that there was no jealousy of these things at Rome; that for all Eastern customs 'we shall provide without narrowness'" (Fortescue). To show how great is the latitude of the Church, we may mention that the Mass is said in no less than nine different languages; viz. Latin, Greek, Syriac, Coptic, Armenian, Arabic, Slavonic, Georgian, and Rumanian. (See LITURGIES; the different rites are described in separate articles, e.g. BYZANTINE RITE &c.; Fortescue in "Cath. Enc."; Cabrol, "Introduction aux Études Liturgiques," extensive bibliography.)

RITES, CONGREGATION OF. This Congregation was instituted by Sixtus V. in his Constitution "Immensa" (Jan. 22, 1588). The Council of Trent (sess. xxv.) had ordered that the bishops and metropolitans should watch with anxious care all that was done respecting the invocation of saints and the use of images and relics, and sanction no novelties without consulting the Roman Pontiff. Moreover, it defined, with special reference to the Mass, that the Church has instituted certain rites and ceremonies, "such as mystical benedictions, lights, incense, vestments, and many other things of the like nature, in accordance with Apostolic tradition, so that both the majesty of so great a sacrifice might be recommended, and the minds of the faithful aroused by these visible signs of religion and piety to the contemplation of those deep and high things which are hidden in this sacrifice" (sess. xxii. c. 5). The object of the Congregation is to promote a general uniformity (which is consistent, however, with the permission of innumerable differences of detail, according to the customs and traditions of different nations) in the externals of divine worship, since by this uniformity the unity of the faith is mirrored and more easily retained. With regard to all such matters, the Congregation is ordinary, and is assisted only by Consultors, among whom are the Papal Sacrist and the Master of the Sacred Palace; with regard to the beatification and canonization of saints it is extraordinary, and is assisted by a Promotor Fidei, three auditors of the Rota, theologians, medical men, professors, &c. (See CANONIZATION; Benedict XIV. "De Servorum Dei Beatificatione et Beatorum Canonizatione"; "Decreta Authentica Congr. Sacrorum Rituum.")

RITUALE. A book which contains the forms to be observed by priests in the administration of the sacraments (communion out of Mass, baptism, &c.), in churchings, in burials, in most of the blessings which they can give by ordinary or delegated authority. Such a book (under the title "Manuale") is mentioned in the year 1279 in the synodal statutes of Odo, Bishop of Paris. It was known by many names—"Manuale," "Sacerdotale," "Agenda," "Institutio Baptizandi," "Pastorale," "Obsequiale," "Sacramentale," &c. "Manuale" seems to have been the common name in England ("Rituale" and "Manuale" in France), and the last edition of the "Sarum Manual" was printed at Douay in 1610. The contents of these books agree on the whole, but not in all details; some, for example, contain the order of confirmation, the blessing of bells, a few Masses, and the like, which are not in our Roman Ritual. A Sacerdotale was edited by Castellanus and printed at Rome in 1537. Previously the different dioceses were free to follow their own Rituals, but in 1614 an edition with the title "Rituale" was drawn up under Paul V., who in the bull "Apostolicae Sedi" exhorted all prelates, secular and regular, to conform to it exactly.[1]

(From Zaccaria, "Bibliothec. Rit." tom. i. There is an edition of the Roman Ritual, with an elaborate commentary by Baruffaldius, 3rd Venetian ed., 1763, which is useful for practical purposes, but gives hardly any historical information. The commentary of Catalani is also well known. Zaccaria also mentions one in Italian by Mariscandolo, Lucca, 1742.)

ROBBER SYNOD. [See LATROCINIUM.]

ROCHET. A vestment of linen, fitting closely, with sleeves reaching to the hands,

[1] The bull says "hortamur" merely; but the Cong. of Rites declared (Sept. 7, 1850) that the laws of the Roman Ritual "affect the universal Church," and (October 5, 1652) that all regulars "were bound" to follow it exactly.

proper to bishops and abbots. The use of it is also granted to certain other dignitaries (e.g. to some canons in virtue of privilege). The length and closeness of the sleeves distinguish it from the surplice. Priests who are allowed to wear it are to regard it as a choir vestment, and are not to use it in the administration of the sacraments. Bishops, on the other hand, wear it in giving confirmation.

Our word rochet is from the French, the French from the Low Latin rochettus, and that again from the old High German hroch, rocch, which is the same as the modern High German Rock, a coat. (So Littré, "Dict. Franc.") From the instances given in Ducange it appears to have been first an upper garment of common life, then a clerical dress. Lyndwood, our great English canonist of the fifteenth century ("Provinciale Eccles. Cant." lib. iii. tit. 27, quoted by Ducange) speaks of it as sometimes used by clerics serving Mass, or priests baptizing, because it left their arms free, usages now strictly forbidden (see "Manuale Decret." art. v.), so that the modern limitation of the rochet to dignitaries recognized by Urban VIII. cannot have been old in that Pope's time.

The mozzetta and uncovered rochet are signs of plenary jurisdiction. Hence, a bishop may wear his rochet uncovered within his own diocese even in the churches of religious who are exempt, but not beyond its limits (Gavant. P. II. tit. iii.; Braun, "Die Liturgische Gewandung," 125 sqq.; Rock, ii. 14–16).

ROGATION DAYS. The Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday before Ascension Day are observed by all Catholics of the Latin rite as days of solemn supplication, and are called Rogation days because the Litany of the Saints is chanted in the procession which takes place on each of the three days, rogatio being the Latin equivalent for the Greek word litany. Those who are bound to recite the breviary are also bound to say the litany privately, if not in procession. These litanies are called lesser, by comparison with the more ancient and solemn chanting of the litany on St. Mark's Day. [LITANIES.]

The Rogations began in the kingdom of Burgundy, where they were instituted, or at least made solemn and public, by Mamertus, bishop of Vienne, at a time when the province suffered from earthquake and other troubles (Sidon. Apollinar. Ep. vii. 1). Thence they passed into the kingdom of Clovis, where the Council of Orleans (c. 27), in 511, requires the faithful to rest from servile work and to fast, or, as Thomassin thinks, to abstain, on these days.[1] In England the synod of Cloveshoe in 747 prescribes processions and fasting till None on the three days before Ascension, "according to the way of our fathers." A Spanish council (Concil. Gerund. can. 2) in 517 recognizes Rogations with abstinence, but on the Thursday, Friday, and Saturday after Pentecost. The ancient custom at Milan, enforced by St. Charles Borromeo, was to hold the Rogations and to fast on the Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday after the Ascension. At Rome, according to Anastasius the Librarian, it was Leo III. who introduced the Rogation days. But the obligation of fasting and rest from work which still existed in the French church[1] of Thomassin's time was not imposed at Rome. ROMAN COLLEGE. Founded by St. Ignatius in 1551. At first only the ordinary school subjects (humanities) were taught, but soon afterwards philosophy and theology were added. Gregory XIII., the great patron of ecclesiastical studies, caused the present magnificent structure to be built and richly endowed. He raised the two above-named faculties to the dignity of a university bearing his name (Universitas Gregoriana), and gave it the right of conferring degrees. The college was entirely in the hands of the Jesuits, but students attended from many of the other colleges, notably those founded by Gregory XIII., and also from the city. After the suppression of the Society (1773), it was continued by the secular clergy until the year 1824, when Leo XII. restored it to its original owners. The Piedmontese took possession of the building soon after their invasion of Rome in 1870, but the philosophical and theological faculties are still flourishing under another roof. When the whole curriculum was taught the students numbered from 1500 to 2000; they are now more than 1000.

We have not space to give a list of the distinguished personages who have taught or studied at the Roman College. The names of St. Aloysius, St. John Berchmans, St. Camillus of Lellis, St. Leonard of Port Maurice, and St. John Baptist de Rossi will occur to everyone. It can boast of having educated eleven popes, including his present holiness Benedict XV. Among the professors in times past were Toletus, Bellarmine, Cornelius à Lapide, Suarez, De Lugo, Pallavicini, and Segneri; and, in our own day, Passaglia, Perrone, Tongiorgi, Patrizi, Tarquini, Ballerini, Franzelin, Kleutgen, Palmieri, and Billot. As early as the end of the sixteenth century an observatory was established in connection with the college, and has produced the famous astronomers Scheiner, Boscovich, and Secchi. The museum, called after Kircher, its most energetic curator, contains many objects of interest. It was seized, together with the valuable library (63,000 books, 2000 MSS.), by the Piedmontese. (Grisar in "Kirchenlexicon.")

ROOD-BEAM AND ROOD SCREEN. (Anglo-Saxon rod, a pole, a gallows, and so a cross.) The rood-beam separates the choir from the nave, and is surmounted by a cross. There is no proof that any such thing was known in the early Church (see the article "Rood" in Smith and Cheetham), but it is common in modern churches, and was introduced as early at least as the twelfth century. Other figures besides the crucifix were often placed on it (e.g. those of the Blessed Virgin and St. John), and lights were burnt on it. Ducange quotes a mediaeval writer who mentions fifty candles being placed on the tables or rood-beam. A veil used to be suspended from it during Holy Week. (Ducange, art. Trabes; Viollet-le-Duc, "Dict. de l'Architecture," art. Trabes.)

Screens separating choir from nave were introduced in French cathedrals towards the close of the thirteenth century, and the richest examples date from the fifteenth and sixteenth. It was not till the seventeenth and eighteenth that the heavy stone screens were replaced by grilles. (Viollet-le-Duc, art. Clôtures; Pugin, "Treatise on Chancel Screens and Roodlofts.")

ROSARY. A form of prayer in which fifteen decades of Aves, each decade being preceded by a Pater and followed by a Gloria, are recited on beads. A mystery is contemplated during the recital of each decade, and the rosary is divided into three parts, each consisting of five decades, and known as a corona or chaplet. In the first chaplet the five joyful mysteries are the subjects of contemplation—viz. the Annunciation, Visitation, the Birth of our Lord, His Presentation in the Temple, His being found after the three days' loss. The sorrowful mysteries contemplated in the second chaplet are the Agony in the Garden, the Scourging, the Crowning with Thorns, the Carrying of the Cross, the Crucifixion. The glorious mysteries, which are allotted to the third chaplet, are the Resurrection of Christ, His Ascension, the Descent of the Holy Ghost, the Assumption and the Coronation of the Blessed Virgin. The word rosary first occurs in Thomas Cantipratanus, who wrote in the latter part of the thirteenth century ("De Apibus," ii. 13[1]—quoted by the Bollandists, "Vita S. Dominici"). The original meaning is very doubtful. We think it most likely that the word was used in a mystical sense and meant Mary's rose-garden. (So the writer of the article Rosenkranz in Herzog, "Encycl. für protestant. Theol.") It was also called "Psalterium Marianum" because of the number 150. Catholics of the humbler class still speak of a pair of beads, thus preserving a pure and ancient mode of speech, "pair" meaning "set," as in "pair of organs"—i.e. a set of organ pipes, or, in other words, an organ.

[1] As a title, however; not in the text.

The practice of using beads, &c., as a help to memory in reciting a set number of prayers is not distinctively Christian, but it has long existed in the Church. Palladius, a writer of the fifth century ("Hist. Lausiac." cap. 23), tells us that the Egyptian monk Paul in Pherme put 300 pebbles in his lap and flung away one as he finished each of the three hundred prayers he said. The English synod of Cealchythe (Mansi, "Concil." tom. xiv. 360) in 816 orders "septem beltidum Paternoster" to be sung for a deceased bishop. We can only guess at the meaning. But Spelman's conjecture that it means belts or circles of Paters is plausible. William of Malmesbury ("De Gest. Pont. Angl." iv. 4, quoted by the Bollandists, loc. cit.) says that Godiva, who founded a religious house at Coventry in 1040, left a circle of gems strung together—on which she used to tell her prayers—that it might be hung on a statue of the Blessed Virgin.

So far we have only considered the general question of reciting prayers on beads &c. From the eleventh century the Bollandists produce the following instances of a fixed number of Aves addressed to the Blessed Virgin. Herimannus, at the close of the century, mentions a person who recited sixty Aves daily. The monk Albert, who lived about 1005, said 150 every day; so did St. Agbert, who died in 1140.

Thus we find early traces of the use of something corresponding to beads, and we can trace the 150 Aves back farther than St. Dominic's time, but no instance presents itself of 150 Aves, much less of 150 Aves and 15 Paters, said on beads, before the lifetime of that saint. The notion that the Venerable Bede introduced the rosary is founded on an absurd etymology ("Bead," from "Beda") and the statement of Polydore Virgil, who lived in the middle of the sixteenth century, that Peter the Hermit instituted the rosary, comes too late to have any weight. The common story that St. Dominic learnt the use of the rosary from the Blessed Virgin by revelation, and propagated it during the crusade against the Albigenses, has been accepted by later Popes—viz. Leo X., Pius V., Gregory XIII., Sixtus V., Alexander VII., Innocent XI., Clement XI., and Leo XIII. This belief rests, according to Benedict XIV. ("De Fest." § 160), on the tradition of the order; no contemporary writer vouches for it. But the Dominican Friar Nicolas (Quétif and Echard, "Script. Ord. Praed." tom. i. p. 411) gave in 1270 to the Blessed Christina a Paternoster, "quod personaliter iv annis portaverat." Dominicans, too, are represented on a tomb of Humbertus Delphinus, who became a Dominican about 1350, with rosaries in their hands, so that the rosary in the strict sense cannot be much later than St. Dominic.

But, of course, the Ave of those days was not identical with the modern form. It was simply "Hail Mary, full of grace, the Lord is with thee, blessed art thou amongst women, and blessed is the fruit of thy womb." Further, the great Dominican writers Quétif and Echard show that the meditation on the mysteries is much later than St. Dominic. It began with a Dominican, Alanus de Rupe (De la Roche), born about 1428 ("Script. O. P." tom. i. p. 852). (See the Bollandist dissertation on the Rosary, in the first vol. for August; Quétif and Echard; Benedict XIV. "De Fest."; Thurston, in "Cath. Enc."; "Month," Oct. 1900, &c.; Walsh, "Irish Rosary," Dec. 1900, &c. For Feast of the Rosary, see MARY, FEASTS OF.)

According to Benedict XIV., a Confraternity of the Rosary at Piacenza was indulgenced as early as 1254 by Alexander IV. The Living Rosary, in which fifteen persons unite to say the whole rosary every month, was approved by Gregory XVI.

A popular manual by Labis, translated by an English Passionist, enumerates the following rosaries besides the Dominican—viz. that of St. Bridget, 7 Paters and 63 Aves, in honour of the joys and sorrows of the Blessed Virgin and the 63 years of her life; that of the Seven Dolours, a Servite devotion; that of the Immaculate Conception, approved by Pius IX. in 1855; the Crown of our Saviour, attributed to Michael of Florence, a Camaldolese monk, in 1516, and consisting of 33 Paters, 5 Aves, and a Credo; the Rosary of the Five Wounds, approved by Leo XII. in 1823 at the prayer of the Passionists.

ROSMINIANS. That is, the Fathers of the Institute of Charity, a congregation founded by the Italian philosopher Antonio Rosmini in 1828. According to the design of the founder, the members of the new society were to "embrace with all the desire of their souls every work of charity, without arbitrary limitation to any particular branch, undertaking all that should be required of them of which they should be capable."[1] The first house of the institute was built on Monte Calvario, near Domo d'Ossola. In 1831 a branch of the society was established at Trent, and another at Verona two years later. In 1835, Fr. Gentili was sent by the founder on a mission to England. After a short stay with the Trelawny family in Cornwall, Gentili was settled by Bishop Baines in the college of Prior Park, near Bath; before long he began to preach missions with signal success in the large towns, and died at Dublin while thus engaged in 1854. The variety of work done by the society in the first ten years of its existence was fully in accord with its declared aim; it consisted in giving retreats, preaching, sick-visiting, taking care of prisons and hospitals, teaching, missions abroad, literary work, and almsgiving. In 1838, on the report of the Congregation of Bishops and Regulars, the Institute of Charity and its rule were approved by the reigning Pontiff, Gregory XVI., who had a singular affection and admiration for Rosmini. Three months afterwards the founder and all his followers took the vows required by the rule, and in 1839 the Pope, by letters Apostolical nominated Rosmini Superior-General of the Institute for life. It is well known that two of his smaller works, one of which was "Delle Cinque Piaghe della Santa Chiesa," were condemned by the Congregation of the Index in 1849. Rosmini's submission to the decree was absolute and unreserved; but a far more serious matter was behind, even the general examination of all his philosophical works, including the "Nuovo Saggio sull' Origine dell' Idee." After a severe and protracted scrutiny, the decision of the Congregation was given in 1854, "Dimittantur opera Antonii Rosmini-Serbati." Finally, however, long after his death, forty propositions taken from his writings were condemned (Dec. 14, 1887). Meantime a novitiate had been opened on the side of the hill above Stresa, on the Lago Maggiore; and here Rosmini chiefly resided in the last years of his life. The Institute has houses in Italy, England, Ireland, and the United States. ROTA ROMANA. A tribunal within the Curia Romana, formerly the supreme court of justice in the Church, and the universal court of appeal.

In early ages the cases referred to Rome were heard by the Pope himself, usually in Consistory, with bishops assembled. The increasing number of cases made it necessary to appoint an official to deal with them and report to the Pope. He was called an auditor, as his chief duty was to hear the evidence, though he was sometimes empowered to give a decision. By the time of John XXII. the custom of appointing auditors had become so common that the Pope instituted a regular tribunal of them, with certain rules for their guidance ("Ratio Juris," 1331). Succeeding pontiffs defined its competency, notably Sixtus IV., who fixed the number of auditors at twelve. The rise of the Roman Congregations (see CONGREGATIONS, ROMAN) gradually deprived the Rota of its importance until, at last, in the pontificate of Gregory XVI., it had become almost a civil court. With the loss of the temporal power even this sphere of action was lost. Leo XIII. gave the Rota a share in the process of Beatification and Canonization.

A great change was made by Pius X. in his Constitution "Sapienti Consilio" (June 29, 1908). The Sacra Rota Romana was entirely re-constituted as one of the three great tribunals of the Holy See, the other two being the Penitentiaria and Signatura. Under the new régime all contentious cases requiring judicial investigation with proof must come before the Rota, causae majores excepted. It is also the court of appeal from the decisions of episcopal courts. The auditors are the judges, each of whom has an assistant; there are also a promoter of justice, a defensor vinculi (in cases of ordination, religious profession, and matrimony), and three notaries. Three auditors form a quorum; but sometimes the decision is given in pleno, i.e. when all are present. The decision is given by the majority.

The explanation of the name "Rota" is said to be the fact that the marble floor of the chamber in which the tribunal used to sit was designed so as to exhibit the appearance of a wheel. So Ducange; but the explanation is doubtful. (See Benigni in "Cath. Enc." and "Lex propria S. Rom. Rotae"; Hilling, "Procedure of the Roman Curia"; Capello, "De Curia Romana.")

RUBRICS. Directions for the order to be followed in Mass and other sacred rites. The word is taken from the Roman law, in which the titles, maxims, and principal decisions were written in red. Juvenal's words—"Causas age, perlege rubras majorum leges" ("Sat." xiv. 192)—refer to this. MS., and even the first printed Missals, have scarcely any rubrics. These were contained in Directories, Rituals, Ceremonials, Ordines. It was Burchard, Master of Ceremonies under Innocent VIII. and Alexander VI., who first set out at length both the words and the ceremonies of the Mass in his Roman Pontifical, printed at Rome in 1485, and again in his "Sacerdotale," printed a few years later, and reprinted under Leo X. After this the ceremonies were joined to the Ordinary of the Mass in some printed Missals, and were finally arranged under their present titles by Pius V. The same course has been followed in the authoritative editions of the Pontifical, Ritual, &c. The rubrics of the liturgical books are real laws. "Rubricae sunt regulae juxta quas officium divinum persolvi, Missae sacrificium celebrari, et sacramenta administrari debent" (De Herdt, "Sacr. Lit. Praxis" i. p. 1). If, however, the wording of the regulation shows that it is of a voluntary character (e.g. the prayers before Mass, "pro opportunitate sacerdotis facienda"), it is obvious that it is not binding. (Cabrol in "Cath. Enc."; De Herdt, "Sacrae Liturgiae Praxis"; Le Brun, tom. i. "Traité Prélim." a. 3.)

RULE, RELIGIOUS. At the time when Ferraris wrote, about the middle of the seventeenth century, it was considered that there were four principal rules of the religious life—the Basilian, the Benedictine, the Augustinian, and the Franciscan—under which, or some modification of which, the majority of the existing orders and congregations were ranged; while, in a few isolated cases, rules unconnected with any of these four were observed. So great a number of religious institutes, especially of women, has subsequently arisen in the Church, and obtained the approbation of the Holy See, that the classification of Ferraris is far from accurately corresponding to the present state of things.

1. The rule of St. Basil, founded by that saint about 360, besides being that generally observed by coenobites in the Eastern Church, was followed, down to the recent secularisations, by a number of monasteries in Sicily, Italy, and Spain.

2. The rule of St. Augustine (390), according to the computation adopted by Hélyot, was followed by no less than ninety-seven congregations, including military orders. Among these were the Lateran Canons, the Canons of Arouaise, the Hermits and Regular Canons under the name of St. Augustine, the Premonstratensians, the order of Preachers, (Dominicans), the Servites, the Theatines and the Barnabites. Connected with every general congregation following this rule were nuns of corresponding observance.

3. Hélyot enumerates sixty-seven congregations (including the monks of Camaldoli, the Cluniacs, the Cistercians, the Bridgittines, &c.) as under the rule of St. Benedict (540), besides military orders.

4. The rule of St. Francis (1208) was and is professed, with more or less of rigour, by the various branches of the Franciscan order; of which the principal now are the Friars Minor, the Conventuals, the Capuchins and the Poor Clares.

Among the religious following independent rules are the Carthusians, the Carmelites, the Discalced Carmelites of St. Theresa, and the Society of Jesus.

Many of the institutes contained in Hélyot's enumeration are now extinct; on the other hand, if we consult the Abbé Badiche's continuation of Hélyot, or turn over the pages of "Terra Incognita,"[1] we find that in the last century an extraordinary number of new institutes, for the most part with determinate practical aims, under carefully adapted rules, and with simple vows, has arisen in the Church. (Ferraris.)

[1] By J. N. Murphy (Longmans, 1873).

RURAL DEANS (decani rurales). In the article DEAN it was explained how that title, which originally arose in the monasteries, was introduced into cathedral and collegiate chapters. The institution of rural deans appears to have commenced in Italy in the following manner. The first parishes, owing to the thinness of the population, were very large; as the population increased, the inconvenience of their size was felt, and Alexander III. ordered that new churches should be built in places where they were required, and endowed out of the revenues of the parish churches. The new churches would naturally be dependent on the church within the district of which they were built; this would be their matrix ecclesia, and its rector would appoint priests to them. Such larger districts came to be called plebes, and the ecclesiastic in charge of one was named plebanus, or archipresbyter, or decanus. The practice grew up of monthly meetings of the priests in each plebs or rural deanery, under the presidency of the plebanus. An archpriest in this sense differed entirely from the cathedral archpriest, who was at the head of the clergy serving a cathedral church. The rural deans were always subject to the archdeacon; nevertheless, by deputation from the bishop, they gradually drew to themselves a considerable jurisdiction, of which in later times they have been deprived. (See VICAR FORANE; Thomassin, "Vet. et Nova Eccl. Disc." i. 2, 6; Ferraris, Decanus; Taunton.)

RUSSIAN CHURCH. According to the Russian legend, St. Andrew first preached the gospel in Russia and planted a cross at Kiev, but the truth is that Christianity came to Russia from Constantinople in the latter part of the ninth century. At that time the Russian Slavs had been united under the rule of Scandinavian princes, and Ruric founded the great Russian monarchy in 864. Soon after, however, two other princes, Ascold and Dir, also of Scandinavian origin, founded an independent kingdom at Kiev, so that Russia was divided into two kingdoms, both under Scandinavian rulers—viz. a northern monarchy with Novgorod, and a southern with Kiev, for capital. In 866 Ascold and Dir attacked Constantinople, and are said to have been converted by miracles, variously reported; but the fact is certain that their expedition led to the sending of missionaries from Constantinople to Russia. The exact chronology, which has a curious interest here, is hard to fix. According to Constantine Porphyrogenitus, the mission from Constantinople was sent in 867, when Ignatius, the lawful and Catholic Patriarch, was in possession, so that the first Russian Christians were Catholics, united to Rome. If, on the other hand, Nestor, the father of Russian history (d. 1113), is to be believed, the mission was sent in 866, and therefore under Photius, the schismatical Patriarch, so that the first Russian church was not in union with Rome. In any case, the impression made on the mass of the people at this time was very slight.

In 882 Russia was again subject to a single ruler, Oleg, Ruric's successor; Kiev, however, being the capital. In 955, Olga, the Russian Helena, was baptized at Constantinople; and in 988 her grandson Vladimir the Apostolic also became a Christian, and strove successfully to Christianize his people. Vladimir, whose life had been stained by infamous cruelty, sent ambassadors to examine the rites and doctrines of the Latins, Mahometans and Greeks, and attached himself to the last because their worship was the most imposing. He sent missionaries through his dominions, destroyed idols, and though there were heathen Russians even in the twelfth century, still Vladimir may fairly be considered to have made the mass of the nation Christian. So far, then, whatever the date of the first mission may have been, Russia, like the mother-church of Constantinople, was in communion with Rome. The union was severed in the middle of the eleventh century by the schism of Michael Caerularius. But for a time the Russian church was in schism unawares, and knew little of the anti-Roman bitterness which prevailed at Constantinople. Even to this day, the Russians, in their liturgical books, written in Old Slavonic, assert the primacy of the Roman See. Pope Sylvester is called the "Divine head of the holy bishops"; Pope Leo, "the successor on the highest throne of St. Peter, the heir of the invincible rock and the successor in his kingdom." Martin, Pope in the seventh century, is thus addressed: "Thou didst adorn the divine throne of Peter, and, holding the Church upright on this rock which cannot be shaken, thou didst honour thy name"; and Leo III. (about 800): "O chief shepherd of the Church, do thou represent the place of Jesus Christ." The feeling was changed, though the liturgy still witnessed to the past, under Vladimir Monomachus [1] (1113). He was filled with hostility to Rome by Nicephorus, who came from Constantinople and was metropolitan of Kiev. This spirit was fostered by successive metropolitans from Constantinople, and has lasted ever since.

Unsuccessful attempts to unite the Russians with the Papacy were made by Alexander III., who corresponded with John III., metropolitan of Kiev (since 1164); by Innocent III. during the Latin occupation of [1] He was the first prince who was called "Czar" (= "Upper King"); but the title was not usual till the middle of the sixteenth century.

Constantinople; by Clement III., who tried to engage Russia in the third crusade; by Innocent IV., when the Russians were groaning under Mongol domination (Mongol supremacy, 1238–1462). Galicia, however, which had fallen under Hungarian rule, became Catholic, retaining its Slavonic rites, under Pope Honorius III. But there were causes which favoured the success of Catholicism in part of Russia. First, the Russians, weakened by Mongol oppression, could not cope with their enemies on the West—viz. the Poles and Lithuanians, and of these the Poles were Catholics. The Lithuanians, at first heathen, were won over to a great extent by the zeal of Dominican and Franciscan friars; in 1386 they became dependent on the Polish kingdom, and in 1387 all Lithuania except the Ruthenian provinces declared itself Catholic. The Lithuanian prince Vitolt seized strips of Russian territory, and was averse to the connection between his Ruthenian subjects and the Russian metropolitan. Next, the metropolitan see of the Russian church had been transferred to the city of Vladimir in 1299, to Moscow in 1328, though the title "Metropolitan of Kiev and all Russia" was retained. This weakened the hold of the Russian church in the South-West. In 1414 seven Russian bishops renounced allegiance to the metropolitan at Moscow and chose one of their own, resident at Kiev. After a vacancy of some years this metropolitan see of Kiev was occupied by Isidore, a Greek of Thessalonica, who at the Council of Florence in 1438 warmly supported the cause of union. To this union the church of Northern Russia and the temporal ruler, Vassili II., were from the first bitterly opposed, but it was accepted at Kiev and in the nine suffragan dioceses. All subsequent attempts at the conversion of Russia Proper—e.g. under Sixtus IV., Leo X., and Clement VII.—proved fruitless. Russia, freed in 1462 from the Mongol yoke, won and converted vast provinces in the North and East. Even the union of Kiev and its suffragan sees to the Catholic Church was neither real nor lasting; though, as we shall see in a subsequent article on the RUTHENIAN CHURCH, it was afterwards renewed in a much more solid way.

The discipline of the Russian church has undergone many changes. In the Middle Ages the Metropolitan of Russia was nominated by the Duke and consecrated by the Patriarch of Constantinople. Once consecrated, the metropolitan had immense power even in secular matters; it was seldom, even in the fifteenth century, that the Duke dared to resist him. The other archbishops and bishops—in whose election the Prince, the clergy and people, and the metropolitan all took part—were placed in the strictest subjection to the metropolitans. Yet the bishops, on their part, had great influence. They were well supported by tithes, and held secular jurisdiction in their own lands. They had, moreover, the privilege of interceding for condemned persons; and no prince could engage in war till a bishop had given his blessing; if the blessing was withheld, no soldier would follow the banner. Thus, in spite of much ignorance and superstition, wretched disputes on the right way of making the sign of the cross, controversies whether processions should move from east to west or west to east, ready belief in grotesque miracles, still the influence of the bishops, who were taken from the monastic orders and were superior both in knowledge and character to the rest of the clergy, was a beneficent one on the whole. They did much to temper the barbarism of the times. At the end of the Middle Ages the power of the Crown was consolidated, that of the nobles and clergy declined, and the Czars began to act more and more as the heads of the Church. Ivan IV. (1533–84) deposed and even murdered bishops, confiscated Church property, and forced the prelates to confirm his fourth marriage, which was against the Greek canon law, and to endure without protest his frequent divorces, his fifth, sixth, and even seventh marriage. In 1589, Jeremias II., Patriarch of Constantinople, consecrated Job, the metropolitan of Moscow, Patriarch of the Russias, and recognized him as the third Patriarch of the Eastern Church, inferior only to those of Constantinople and Alexandria. The metropolitan gained nothing by his change of title, but it suited the policy of the Czars to make the church national and independent. The strife of the Patriarch Nicon with the Czar Alexis Michaelovitz ended with the deposition of the former at a council of Moscow in 1667, and early in the following century the entire subjection of the ecclesiastical to the imperial power was completed. For Peter the Great left the Patriarchal See vacant for twenty years, and then, in 1721, with the consent of the Eastern Patriarchs, placed the whole government of the Russian church in the hands of the "Holy Synod," which depended entirely on the Czar. Catharine II. seized all the Church property, and since then the prelates have had a regular salary apportioned to them by the State.

The synod consists of twelve members, though the number has varied at different times. The members are nominated by the Czar, who may remove them at will.[1] The synod in 1881 was made up of the Metropolitan of Novgorod, president, four other metropolitans, the Emperor's confessor, and the grand chaplain of the army and fleet. The last two are secular priests. To these is attached a chief procurator as representative of the Czar, and other lay officials. This procurator, who in 1770 was a brigadier, may put his veto on any measure till it has been laid before the sovereign. Further, each member on entering office swears that he recognizes the Czar "as supreme judge in this spiritual assembly." But if on the one side the synod is entirely subject to the Crown, on the other the centralizing system of the Russian Government gives the synod enormous power in the church. It proposes suitable candidates for vacant sees to the Czar; it translates and deposes bishops; it can, with the Czar's formal approval, make new laws for the Church; it gives dispensations; it watches over doctrine and ritual, sees to the printing of liturgical books, examines relics and the evidence for alleged miracles, has the control of ecclesiastical colleges, receives appeals from the bishops; it decides on the money to be given for building churches and monasteries, and superintends the payment of the clergy. Nay, since 1809 the bishops must transmit to the synod the money made in their dioceses by sale of candles, use of churches, sale of bridal crowns, collections in churches, &c. The whole sum is then apportioned to the different dioceses according to their needs.

Bishops are really all equal, except so far as they are divided into three classes, and receive more or less support from the Government. Since the time of Peter the Great, metropolitan and archbishop have become mere titles of honour given by the Czar and not attached to any diocese, except that the Bishops of Kiev and of Novgorod and St. Petersburg are always archbishops, while Siberia is always placed under a metropolitan. If a see is vacant, the Holy Synod recommends two candidates to the Czar, who, however, often takes the first step and names a person whom the synod have to choose. The bishops are all unmarried, and therefore chosen from the monks. They cannot leave their dioceses on any account without leave from the synod. They must make a complete visitation at least every three years. They are urged to be zealous in establishing schools, and they may enforce discipline in the case of the secular clergy by punishment, not, however, in that of the regulars, unless they are armed with a decree from the synod. The bishop is assisted by a Consistory composed of the most experienced and distinguished secular and regular clergymen. The bishop presents them to the synod, but cannot remove them when once approved. The Consistory watches over orthodoxy, prepares returns on the state of the diocese for the synod, and for this purpose has a body of officials in Government pay at its disposal. Appeal lies from the Consistory to the bishop, thence to the synod. In very large dioceses —e.g. Novgorod and Moscow—a district is placed under a vicar who is in episcopal orders, but differs in this from other bishops, that there is an appeal from him to his metropolitan. Vicars were also appointed in 1832 for countries where the people are mostly Catholic or Protestant. The number of those who compose the bishops' household is settled, and each official fed and paid by the Government. There are three prelates of the first class—viz. the Metropolitans of Kiev, of Novgorod and St. Petersburg (united since 1764), of Moscow and Colomna. There are fourteen archbishops, fifty-nine bishops, and thirty-seven auxiliaries, whom they call vicars. Since 1801 Georgia was incorporated within the Russian Empire, and there the Metropolitan of Tiflis is Exarch, and there are five bishops. There is also, since 1858, a Russian bishop at Jerusalem, and there are bishops in Japan, Alaska, and the United States. The classes of bishops have, of course, nothing to do with their jurisdiction, for in that respect all, except the vicars, are on one dead level under the synod. The classes simply refer to the amount of their allowance from the Government.

The "white" or secular clergy must all be married, and are mostly sons of priests. They begin their education at the parish school, continue it at the district school and diocesan seminary, and finish at one of the four ecclesiastical academies—those of St. Petersburg, Kiev, Moscow, and Kazan. Three or four years are spent at each of these stages. The benefices are all conferred by the bishop, except that landed proprietors have often a right of patronage in country churches—so far, at least, that they can put a veto on the nomination of a cleric whom they do not wish to have. The Government supports a certain number of clergymen in churches which had more than twenty serfs before the confiscations of Catharine II. There are numerous officials at the cathedrals, and even small country churches are supposed to have a deacon as well as a priest. Each regiment has a priest, reader, sacristan, doorkeeper, and sometimes also a deacon. In peace, military chaplains are subject to the bishop of the place; in the field, to a Proto-Pope who is set over them. A canon of the fifteenth century required a priest who lost his wife to live like a layman in a monastery. This law of enforced seclusion was set aside by Peter the Great. A widowed priest may now get leave from the synod to officiate as before; and even in the case of second marriage an edict of Peter the Great in 1724 permits a priest to be employed as rector of a seminary, or in the episcopal chancery, if he has applied himself diligently to study, and especially to preaching.

The Russian religious follow the rule of St. Basil. Men must not be professed till they are forty, women till they are fifty. The noviciate lasts three years, and is followed by another period of probation. The discipline is strict, and only a few monks receive holy orders. Regular priests never have parishes, but the naval chaplains are taken from monks educated in the Monastery of St. George at Balaclava; and not only the bishops, but also many preachers, confessors, and prelates generally, are supplied by them. According to the synodal report of 1838, there were 225 monasteries and 100 nunneries receiving support from the State in place of confiscated property, besides 161 monasteries and thirteen nunneries maintained by themselves or by the people. Only seven religious houses are stauropegia—i.e. exempt from episcopal rule and subject immediately to the synod.

The great symbolical book of the Russian church is Ἔκθεσις τῆς τῶν Ῥώσων Πίστεως ("Exposition of the Faith of the Russians") drawn up by Mogilas, metropolitan of Kiev, and his suffragans between 1630 and 1640. At the desire of the Patriarch of Constantinople, it was examined by a commission of delegates from Constantinople and Kiev, received the title of "Confession of Faith of the Catholic and Apostolic Eastern Church" (Ὁμολογία τῆς Πίστεως τῆς Καθολικῆς καὶ Ἀποστολικῆς Ἐκκλησίας τῆς Ἀνατολικῆς), was approved by the four Eastern Patriarchs, and again by the Synod of Jerusalem in 1672. There are authoritative translations into Slavonic, and it has been edited with a Latin version by Kimmel ("Libri Symbol. Eccles. Orientalis," 1843). The Little Catechism published by order of Peter the Great is merely a compendium of the "Exposition" or "Confession."

This Confession shows that except on a very few points the Russians believe as the Catholic Church believes. It teaches the necessity of good works for salvation; that Scripture and tradition are the two sources of faith; the intercession and invocation of the Blessed Virgin, the saints, and the angels; that the faithful departed are helped by prayers, alms, and the sacrifice of the Eucharist; the Seven Sacraments, transubstantiation (μετουσίωσις), &c. The commandments of the Church—such as fasting, hearing Mass on Sundays and feasts &c.—are much the same as those in Catholic Catechisms. But the Russians deny the Pope's supremacy, and the procession of the Holy Ghost from the Son; further, they hold that marriage may be dissolved on account of adultery, and maintain that baptism by sprinkling is invalid. On this last point they differ from the Greeks. On Purgatory their doctrine is less sharply defined than ours, but they hold all which we hold as of faith.

Such is the formal teaching of the Russian church. But since the latter half of the last century education has made great strides, and Western, but especially German, theology has exercised a marked influence on the more educated members of the clergy. Prelates in high place have shown their leanings to Protestant views, and this tendency has appeared in books printed with the approval of the Holy Synod. The Catechism of Plato, archbishop of Moscow and tutor to Paul I., differs essentially from the old Catechism in the doctrine of the Sacraments, and especially that of the Eucharist. In 1805, Archbishop Methodius, of Tver, published in Latin, with the approval of the synod, a work on the first four centuries of the Church, founded chiefly on Bingham. Philaret, patriarch of Moscow, a man of talent and of cultivated mind, formed a school of theologians imbued with the spirit of German Protestantism. He issued a Catechism, and a Review of the Controversies between East and West. While Germans like Neander and Schleiermacher have been read and studied, Catholic theologians are little known, and there is a constant tendency to soften the points of difference between Russians and Protestants, and to accentuate those which separate Russians from Catholics. At the same time, the interest in the Greek Fathers and in the old Russian orthodoxy has been revived in a certain section of the younger clergy.

(The historical account and the sketch of doctrine are from Hefele's "Essay on the Russian Church," 1864; Silbernagl, "Kirchen des Orients," ch. iii., 1865; Palmieri, in "Cath. Enc.," good bibliography. An article by Professor Lamy, of Louvain, in the "Dublin Review" for April 1881, has also been consulted. Fortescue's "Orthodox Eastern Church," 1907, is the great authority on the subject in English.[1])

RUTHENIAN CATHOLICS. The name is given to Christians who use the Greek liturgy translated into Old Slavonic, but own obedience to the Pope. They are descendants of converts from the Russian church, who have kept their old rites and discipline.

The metropolitan see of Kiev and its suffragan dioceses were united to the Catholic Church, as has been said in the article on the Russian church. The union was never satisfactory, and the last trace of it had disappeared early in the sixteenth century. But the cause of union was zealously promoted by the Jesuit school established at Vilna by Father Possevin and by the Polish king Calixtus III. In 1595 the Metropolitan of Kiev and seven suffragans were at their own request received by Clement VIII. into the Catholic communion. Thus the Ruthenian province arose; the metropolitan was chosen by the bishops and all were placed under Propaganda, which was represented by the Polish nuncio. But at the partition of Poland all the Catholic Ruthenian dioceses, except Lemberg, Przemysl, and part of Brezk, became Russian dominion.

[1] The reader will find a vivid and interesting account of the Russian church in Palmer's "Visit to the Russian Church," edited by Cardinal Newman.

In 1795 Russia suppressed all the dioceses except one; in 1798 three dioceses were tolerated, a fourth in 1809, two only by Nicholas in 1828. In 1839 three bishops joined the schismatic Russians, and there was till lately only one see of the United Ruthenians in Russian Poland—viz. Chelm and Belz—immediately subject to the Pope. At present there is another bishopric—viz. Minsk — united to Mohilew. The see of Suprasl was erected in 1799 for the Ruthenians in Prussian Poland; they numbered about 40,000.

In the Austrian territory the see of Lemberg, with its suffragan sees of Przemysl, Sanok, and Sambor, belongs to the Ruthenian church of Poland, and the history of its union with the Catholic Church has been just given. The metropolitan see of Lemberg was erected for the two millions of Ruthenian Catholics in Galicia by Pius VII. in 1807, Kalik and Kamenek being united to it. But, besides this, many schismatical Slavs in Hungary followed the example set by their Polish brethren in 1595. The union lasted only till 1627, and though a bishop of Munkacs became Catholic in 1649, the population remained schismatic. More was done for the Catholic cause by the Ruthenian bishop De Camillis at the end of the seventeenth century, and in 1771 the diocese of Munkacs was properly constituted by Clement XIV. The Catholic population amounts to 470,000 souls. From the diocese of Munkacs that of Eperies was divided in 1816. It contains 160,000 souls. Munkacs and Eperies are under the Latin Archbishop of Gran. Cries is under Zagrab (Agram). In Croatia the Ruthenians have one diocese, that of Kreutz (Kőrős), with 20,000 souls, erected in 1777, and subject to the same Metropolitan of Agram. In 1907 a titular bishop, who resides in Philadelphia, was appointed for the Ruthenian immigrants living in North America. They come chiefly from Galicia, Bukowina, and Hungary. They have about 120 priests, with 150 churches.

The Ruthenians have a married secular clergy, and religious who follow the rule of St. Basil. The bishops are usually taken from the monks. The Ruthenians are under the laws made by Propaganda for Catholics of Greek rite living among Latins. Their bishops at their consecration make the profession of faith prescribed for the Greeks by Urban VIII. (Silbernagl, "Kirchen des Orients"; Streit, "Atlas Hierarchicus"; Shipman in "Cath. Enc.")

S

SABAOTH. This word, retained in the Sanctus, is often confounded with Sabbath, but has an entirely different significance, being from צבאות, hosts. [See SANCTUS.]

SABBATH. [See SUNDAY.]

SABBATINE BULL. [See SCAPULAR.]

SABELLIANISM. A name given to two very different forms of doctrine, which, however, agreed in this, that they denied any real distinction of Persons in God. The Catholic Church teaches that there are three divine Persons really distinct from each other, and yet one God. The Sabellians confessed with Catholics the numerical unity of God, but denied the mystery of the Trinity by explaining away the real distinction of the Persons.

(1) The earliest form of the heresy was Patripassianism. Praxeas, who came from Asia Minor to Rome under Pope Eleutherus (175-189), Noetus of Smyrna, who was excommunicated in his own province about 230, Epigonus and Cleomenes, who transplanted the doctrine of Noetus to Rome, all held that God the Father of all is the only God, and that this one God became man, suffered, and died. Thus Praxeas held "that the Father came down into a virgin, that He himself was born of her, that He himself suffered; finally, that He himself is Jesus Christ" (Tertull. "Adv. Prax." 1, PL, ii. 154, and so 28, 29, 30). Pressed to explain how it was that Father and Son could be said on this theory to exist at all after the Incarnation, Praxeas replied that Christ so far as He was flesh was Son, and so far as He was spirit or God was the Father (ib. 27, PL, ii. 190). The tenets of Noetus were precisely the same (Hippolytus, "C. Noet." ed. Lagarde, "Philosoph." ix. 7–10). And such also was the original doctrine of Sabellius, a Libyan, who came to Rome under Zephyrinus, was banished from the Roman Church by Callistus, and took refuge in the Libyan Pentapolis. The testimonies as to the original teaching of Sabellius are too early and express to be set aside. "He [Sabellius] blasphemes," says Dionysius, bishop of Rome in the middle of the third century, "saying that the Son himself is the Father, and vice versa." (The Epistle of Dionysius is contained in Athanas. "D. Decret. Nicen. Syn." and edited by Routh, "Rell. Sacr." vol. iii. p. 373 seq.) Novatian, another author, nearly contemporaneous, speaks of Sabellius as one "who calls Christ the Father" (Novat. "De Trin." c. 12). The Macrostich, a Semi-Arian creed of the Eusebians (apud Athanas. "De Synod." 26), refers to "those whom the Latins call the Patripassians and we the Sabellians." So also Athanasius, iii. 36; and Cardinal Newman ("Oxford Translation of St. Athanas." p. 529) quotes on the same side Euseb. "Eccl. Theol." i. p. 91; Basil. Ep.

210, 5; Rufin. "In Symb." 5; August. "Haer." 41; Theodor. "Haer. Fab." ii. 9.

(2) The doctrine of the Sabellians, and perhaps of Sabellius himself, underwent a complete transformation, and resolved the mystery of the Trinity into three manifestations of God to man. It was difficult for Sabellianism, in its original form, to assume even the appearance of conformity to the traditional teaching, embodied in the form of baptism, on the Holy Ghost. A very early author, Dionysius of Alexandria (apud Euseb. "H.E." vii. 6), reproaches the Sabellians with this very thing, "that they had no idea of the Holy Ghost" (ἀναισθησίαν τοῦ ἁγίου πνεύματος). It was conceivable that the Father should have been incarnate in Christ, but there was no room for such an incarnation, and therefore, on Sabellian principles, for a real existence of the third Person in the Trinity. Hence Sabellius, or at least the Sabellians, came to hold that the same Person is the Holy Ghost, so far as He manifests Himself in the Christian Church, and by parity of reasoning the Son, so far as He appeared in Christ. The same Person or Hypostasis (so Theodor. "Haer. Fab." ii. 9, reports the doctrine of Sabellius) was Father when He gave the law, Son when He became flesh in Christ, Holy Ghost when He descended on the Apostles, being "one person with three names" (ἓν τριώνυμον πρόσωπον). He compared the three πρόσωπα or characters of God (Epiphan. "Haer." 62, 1) to the spherical form, light, and heat of the one sun. Such late authorities are not decisive for the supposition that Sabellius himself held this view, but undoubtedly the Sabellians did. Patripassianism was thus avoided altogether; but on the other hand the Incarnation, no less than the Trinity, was in effect denied, for the manifestation of God in Christ could differ in degree only, and not in kind, from His union with other holy men. This Sabellian doctrine, which takes πρόσωπον or persona in its original meaning of mask, character, &c., has been maintained by many Protestant divines—e.g. by Archbishop Whately in his "Logic." It is of course completely incompatible with Catholic belief, and is contrary, e.g., to the first chapter of St. John's Gospel.

(3) Closely akin to the later Sabellianism is the doctrine of Marcellus of Ancyra. He was a strenuous defender of the Nicene definition against the Arians, and this and the obscurity of his doctrine account for the fact that he was defended by Pope Julius, the Synod of Sardica, and Athanasius himself (Athanas. "Apol. c. Arian." 23, 32; "Ep. ad Monach. et Hist. Arian." 6). He made the Λόγος a mere attribute of God like the reason of man, manifesting itself in the creation, in the Incarnation, and in the sanctification of Christians. (Theodor. "Haer. Fab." ii. 10.) In Christ the Word dwelt with extraordinary power, to retire from Him at the consummation of all things, when the manhood of Christ would no longer reign. (Euseb. "Adv. Marcell." ii. 2–4; "Eccl. Theol." iii. 8–17.)

(Newman, "Notes on Athanasius"; Petavius, "De Trinitate," lib. i. cap. 6; Franzelin, "De Deo Trino," thes. iii.; Kuhn, "Trinitätslehre"; Döllinger, "Hippolytus and Callixtus.")

SACRAMENTALS. We shall show in the article on SACRAMENTS that the word, not only by Fathers like St. Augustine, but even by mediaeval theologians, was widely used for the most sacred and solemn rites of the Church. We have seen that St. Augustine, like the Roman Rituale in present use, called the salt in baptism a sacramentum, while mediaeval writers use the word of religious profession, holy water, &c. After Peter Lombard, when the use of the word sacrament and its definition became restricted and fixed, the name "sacramental" was given to rites which have some outward resemblance to the sacraments. The word sacramentalia occurs in St. Thomas (3, q. 71, a. 3), but he does not, so far as we know, enumerate or classify them, and with him sacramentalia seems only to mean ceremonies accompanying the sacraments.

The sacramentals are enumerated in the following line—

Orans, tinctus, edens, confessus, dans, benedicens

—i.e. the prayers of the Church—above all the Lord's prayer—and alms (however, to be called "sacramentals," prayer must be said or the alms given in the name of the Church or in a consecrated place; otherwise, as Billuart says, they do not differ from other good works), blessed bread, the confession at Mass and in the Office, the blessing of bishops or abbots, holy water (with which we may class blessed ashes, candles, palms, &c.). If the "sacramentals" are used with pious dispositions they excite increased fear and love of God, detestation of sin, and so, not in themselves, but because of these movements of the heart towards God, remit venial sins. They have a special efficacy, because the Church has blessed them with prayer, and so when, e.g., a person takes holy water, accompanying the outward act with the desire that God may cleanse his heart, the prayer of the whole Christian people is joined to his own. The opinion that "sacramentals" remit venial sins by a power given them by God over and above the good dispositions with which they are used is held by some, but rejected by Juenin, and even by Billuart, as destitute of warrant in Scripture or tradition. (See Probst, "Sakramente und Sakramentalien"; Lambing, "Sacramentals of the Holy Cath. Church"; Leclercq in "Cath. Enc.")

SACRAMENTARY (or Liber Sacramentorum). A book containing the rites for Mass and the sacraments generally — e.g. Holy Orders, Baptism, &c.; also for various sacramental rites—e.g. dedication of churches, consecration of nuns, &c. It is represented by our Missal, Pontifical, and Ritual. On the other hand, the Sacramentary had few rubrics.

An imperfect Roman Sacramentary, without Ordo or Canon, was published by Muratori in his "Liturgia Romana Vetus." It is known as the Leonine, though some of the Missae are probably later than Leo I. The Gelasian Sacramentary was published from a ninth-century MS. in the Vatican by Cardinal Thomasius. The Gregorian is a revision of the Gelasian Sacramentary. Three Gallican Sacramentaries (Missale Gothicum, Gallicum, Francorum) were published by Thomasius, and reprinted by Mabillon and Muratori. Another known as Bobbiense was discovered by Mabillon at Bobbio, and printed by him in his "Museum Italicum." The Mozarabic Sacramentary or "Liber Sacramentorum," the most elaborate collection of the kind, was published in its entirety in 1912, by the lamented Dom Férotin. [See LITURGIES; MISSAL; ORDO; RUBRICS.]

SACRAMENTS OF NATURE AND OF THE JEWISH CHURCH. If we define a sacrament as "a sign of a sacred thing, which thing sanctifies men," we are able to include the sacraments of nature, the old law, and the Christian Church in one common class. All are outward signs and all were instituted by God. But they do not all confer grace ex opere operato. It was the primary and direct object of the Jewish sacraments to typify the mysteries of the Christ who was to come. Moreover, the grace which most at least of the Jewish sacraments effected was not grace in the proper sense, but an outward and legal status, a position as members of the Jewish Church. We lay down these principles provisionally, for there is scarcely a question in theology which has occasioned a greater variety of opinion.

The existence of grace given by sacraments before Christ does not seem to have occurred to anyone previous to St. Augustine. His clear apprehension of the doctrine of original sin led him to believe that some remedy for it must have been prescribed before Christ came, and this remedy he found in circumcision ("De Nupt. et Concupisc." ii. 11, PL, xliv. 449; "Adv. Donat." iv. 24, ib. xliii. 174). This explanation, however, did not touch the case of children born before Abraham received the covenant of circumcision. He thinks it incredible that those under the law of nature had no sacred sign of the Mediator (sacramentum) by which they "helped their little ones," though he does not profess to know what this sign was ("Adv. Julian." v. 11, PL, xliv. 809). Subsequent Latin Fathers, and the Schoolmen generally, adopted St. Augustine's theory, and the term "sacraments of the old law" has been adopted by the Councils of Florence and Trent. The latter council anathematizes (sess. vii. De Sacr. can. 2) the view of Calvin ("Instit." iv. 14)[1] that there is no difference except in the outward rite between the sacraments of the old law and the new; but this is all the Church has decided in the matter. It is agreed that the statement of Eugenius IV. in the Council of Florence ("Instructio pro Armen.")—viz. that the sacraments of the old law, unlike those of the new, did not confer but only typified grace—is not a definition of faith. (See Tournely, "De Sacr. in Gen." qu. 3, a. 3.)

We have to distinguish between the sacrament or sacraments of the law of nature and circumcision on the one hand and the many sacraments of the Mosaic law—e.g. the paschal lamb, the ordination of priests and Levites, legal purifications, &c.—on the other. The opinions of the School divines are thus given by Tournely:—(1) With regard to the Mosaic sacraments, excluding circumcision: The Master of the Sentences denied that anyone was justified by them, even if they were performed in faith and charity. Durandus believed that grace was given by some of the Mosaic sacraments—at least by ordination to the priesthood. Hugo of St. Victor and Bonaventure, followed by Estius, hold that the old sacraments gave grace ex opere operato, not indeed in themselves and primarily, but so far as they were signs by which men confessed their faith in the Redeemer. St. Thomas and many others have thought that the sacraments of the old law gave grace not ex opere operato, but ex opere operantis—i.e. because of faith in the minister and recipient. (2) As to circumcision: The Master of the Sentences, Bonaventure, and many of the most celebrated Schoolmen—e.g. Alexander of Hales, Scotus, Durandus—held that circumcision was primarily and directly instituted as a remedy for original sin, and of itself sufficed to remove it. We may notice in passing that neither Scripture nor Philo and Josephus, nor the Rabbins, attribute any such efficacy to circumcision. Lastly, St. Thomas holds that circumcision did indeed remit sin and confer grace, not, however, in itself, but as a type of Christ's Passion, the faith of the recipient, if an adult, being requisite, and in the case of an infant the faith of others in his behalf. On these conditions it remitted original and actual sin if the latter had been committed. In the case of male children who died before the eighth day (or, we may add, of female children) he suggests that some other sign of faith on the part of the parents sufficed. But he points out that circum-

[1] He of course admitted this difference, that the sacraments of the old law shadowed forth Christ who was to come, while those of the gospel "bear testimony to Him as already come."

cision did not, like baptism, impress a character which incorporates a man with Christ; nor did it give a title to the immediate possession of heaven, nor bestow such abundant grace as baptism (3ª, q. 70, a. 4). (The dogmatic theologians discuss the question of the sacraments of nature in their treatises "De Sacramentis"; e.g. Franzelin, thes. i.–iii.; Drouin, "De Re Sacramentaria," qu. ii.)

SACRAMENTS OF THE GOSPEL. 1. Definition and General Opposition between Catholic and Protestant Doctrine.—The Roman Catechism (P. II. cap. i. n. 4), following the Council of Trent (sess. xiii. cap. 3), defines a sacrament as "a visible sign of invisible grace instituted for our justification." There must be a visible sign. Constantly, indeed, is grace bestowed without sign at all; God justifies at once the sinner who turns to Him with sorrow and love, and His grace is continually descending on the hearts of the just, but in all these cases there is no sign, and therefore no sacrament. This sign is efficacious—i.e. it really effects the grace which it signifies. Moral and spiritual dispositions, it is true, are required in order that those who have come to the use of reason may receive the grace of the sacraments; but these dispositions are the condition and not the cause of grace; the grace given is far beyond the pious feelings which the mere sign awakens, and herein lies the difference between sacraments such as baptism and sacramental rites instituted by the Church, such as sprinkling with holy water. Lastly, it is beyond the power of man to make earthly things the channels of divine grace; the Church may bless holy water and hope that her prayers for those who use it will be heard; she cannot make water "the laver of new birth." Such power belongs to Christ, the author and the finisher of our salvation, and therefore the institutor of the sacraments.

Very different was the Protestant doctrine against which the definitions of Trent were framed. According to the Lutherans, the sacraments did not produce grace, but were pledges and seals of God's promises to us. Thus Melanchthon says, God invites us to His table in order to remove all doubt from our minds that He has forgiven us; and the Augsburg Confession describes the sacraments as "signs and testimonies of God's good will towards us." Calvin's teaching is substantially the same, while Zwingli made the sacraments signs, not of God's fidelity, but of ours. We receive the sacraments to show that we believe: they are merely the badges of Christian profession. Several consequences followed from the Lutheran definition. It became necessary to reduce the number of the sacraments, for it could not be said—e.g. of marriage and holy order—with any show of reason that their primary and direct object was to excite faith. Next, the Lutheran doctrine of the sacraments was out of all harmony with Lutheran belief in consubstantiation. Why should Christ work a miracle and place His true body and blood under the bread and wine if He did not mean to confirm and renew His promises? A simple feast of bread and wine received in His name and at His bidding was surely enough, and so Luther's doctrine naturally led to that of the Sacramentarians, which he so bitterly opposed. Further, the Anabaptists were fully justified by the Lutheran definition of a sacrament in rejecting infant baptism, since a sacrament cannot possibly excite faith or assurance in an unconscious child. Equally logical were the Society of Friends and other small sects which abandoned the sacraments entirely; the perfect believer might fairly plead that to him God's word was enough, and needed no confirmation by outward signs or seals. So it happened that while the Calvinists, Zwinglians, Anabaptists, &c., advanced on the path of negation, the later Lutherans retreated and almost accepted the Catholic doctrine. The "Apology" admits that a "promise of grace" is annexed to the sacraments ("sacramenta vocamus ritus qui habent mandatum Dei et quibus addita est promissio gratiae"). (For references on the Lutheran and Reformed doctrines see Möhler, "Symbolism," book i. ch. 4.)

The fact is that the differences between Catholics and Protestants on the doctrine of the sacraments spring from the still more radical difference between them on redemption and justification. The Reformers held that man's nature was wholly and incorrigibly bad; he could only appropriate Christ by faith and have the merits of another set down to his account. The Church, on the contrary, teaches that Christ's grace purifies man within, really makes him just, and ennobles his whole earthly life by imparting to it a divine and heavenly character. And just as Christ appeared in the flesh, just as virtue went forth from that body which He took, just as He saved us by that blood which He willingly shed in love for us, so He continues to make sensible things the channels of that grace by which our lives are elevated and sanctified. In Baptism we are born again; in confirmation we grow up to perfect men in Christ; Communion is the daily bread by which the life of the soul is maintained; in Penance God "heals the soul which has sinned against Him"; when death is near, Unction comes to remove the last remnant of infirmity and prepare the soul for final glory. But man has a social as well as an individual nature. Marriage is given that natural impulses which have often proved the source of corruption and crime may become the fountain of blessing. that the young may be brought up in God's love and fear, and the Church be the fruitful mother of children. Order is instituted that the Church may be ruled by those whom God has set over her, may be fed by the word of life and with the other sacraments. (St. Thomas, 3ª, q. 65, a. 1.)

(2) The Number of Sacraments.—We have already touched on this division of the subject, for we have just given a rationale of the Seven Sacraments from the "Summa" of St. Thomas. The Catholic Church has defined that there are seven sacraments of the new law, and seven only. That there are seven sacraments is proved by the arguments given in favour of each from Scripture and the perpetual tradition of the Church, while, on the other hand, as we shall presently show, there is no other rite which can claim a place in the same category. Again, though it is quite true that the enumeration of seven sacraments was unknown for nearly twelve centuries of Church history, this is explained by the fact that the word sacramentum has various senses, and till its sense had been definitely fixed, or some other word found as a substitute, the enumeration of seven sacraments was impossible. Indeed, the history of this enumeration furnishes an argument on our behalf. How was it that, when once Peter Lombard had fixed the number and names of the seven sacraments, his view was at once and universally, or all but universally, accepted? The answer is, because he supplied the complete and correct formula for the doctrine which the Church already held. His statement came like a right word which exactly expresses a man's meaning, but which he has been long searching for in vain. Once more, the Greeks separated from the Catholic Church before the list of sacraments had been made. Yet they, too, reached the same conclusion. The "Orthodox Confession of the Eastern Church," solemnly accepted by all the Eastern patriarchs and used by the Russians, gives (ad Qu. 97) the number of sacraments as seven, corresponding to the Seven Gifts of the Holy Ghost, and names the same seven which we confess (Confirmation being called τὸ μύρον τοῦ χρίσματος). So, too, the Confession of Dositheus, schismatical patriarch of Jerusalem, accepted in the Council of Jerusalem in 1672, declared that there were seven sacraments, and that it was a sign of "heretical madness" to say there were more or less. The Protestant Confessions, with scarcely an exception, deny that there are more than two. But such a denial had never been made before, except by some of the mediaeval heretics. And even the Protestants were not sure of their ground. The "Apology" of Melanchthon, subscribed by the chief Lutherans, acknowledges that "baptism, the supper, and absolution are three true sacraments." And it adds a fourth, since "no difficulty need be made against putting Order in this rank, if it be taken to mean the ministry of the Word, because it is commanded by God and has great promises." Confirmation and Extreme Unction are said to be "ceremonies received by the Fathers," which have no express promise of grace. In Marriage they recognize divine institutions, but with promises of temporal blessing only. "As if," says Bossuet, "it were a temporal thing to bring up children of God for the Church, and to be saved by begetting them in this fashion (1 Tim. ii. 15), or as if it were not one of the fruits of Christian marriage to cause the children born in it to be called holy, as being destined for sanctity" (Bossuet, "Variations," livr. iii. ch. 51).

In tracing the history of the numeration within the Church, we may distinguish four different stages. Till about the end of the fourth century we find usually two and sometimes three rites placed together as sacraments. Tertullian, for example, speaks in the same place of Baptism and the Eucharist ("De Corona," 3, PL, ii. 79), and he calls the latter a "sacramentum"—though nothing can be made of this, for he uses sacramentum for the oath or obligation of Christian service, for a mystery, and for a sign of any kind which conceals a sacred meaning. This use of the words sacramentum and μυστήριον is common to the New Testament, the Old Latin, the Vulgate, and all the Fathers, and is still retained in Greek and Latin. A century before, Justin (1 Apol. 61 seq., PG, vi. 420) had explained together the two sacraments of Baptism and the Eucharist, and, long after, Chrysostom ("In Joann." Hom. 84, PG, lix. 463), preaching on the water and blood which flowed from Christ's side, said, "Thence the sacraments [μυστήρια] take their origin"—viz. Baptism and the Eucharist—"which the initiated know." On the other hand, Cyprian (Ep. 73, ed. Hartel, p. 785) classes Baptism and Confirmation ("signaculum dominicum") together, clearly making each a channel of sacramental grace in the strict sense; and in like manner Pacian ("De Baptism." 6) speaks of the sacrament or mystery of the laver and of chrism ("lavacri et chrismatis et antistitis sacramentum"—meaning only two rites, not three, for the action of the prelate is common to both sacraments). Further, Ambrose ("De Virgin." cap. 10, PL, xvi. 280) seems to attribute a sacramental efficacy to the washing of the feet. And here we add, for the sake of convenience, that the author of the famous treatise "De Sacramentis" (iii. 7, PL, xvi. 433), long attributed to St. Ambrose, but really written in our second period, eagerly adopts this theory, though he owns the practice of the Roman Church was against him.

Augustine sometimes (see, e.g., "Contr.

Faust." xix. 14, "Pro baptismo Christi, pro eucharistia Christi, pro signo Christi," PL, xlii. 356) classes Baptism, Confirmation, and the Eucharist together, and this was the prevailing classification down to the end of the tenth century. Thus, Isidore of Seville ("Etymolog." vi. 19, PL, lxxxii. 255) writes: "A sacramentum consists in a certain rite, when a thing is so done that we understand something to be signified which must be received with holy dispositions. Now, the sacramenta are Baptism, and Chrism, the Body and Blood." Aytho, bishop of Basle, in his capitulary: "They are to be taught to know what the sacramentum of Baptism and Confirmation is, and of the Body of the Lord, how, in these same mysteries (mysteriis), the visible creature is seen and still invisible grace is supplied for the eternal life of the soul." Rabanus Maurus ("De Universo," v. 11) repeats Isidore almost verbally. So the writers of this period generally, when they enumerate the sacramenta, though they often speak of two "principal sacramenta," two which flowed from the side of Christ, &c., &c. We, of course, lay no stress on the mere use of the word sacramentum, else we might have noticed, e.g., that St. Augustine ("De Peccat. Remiss." ii. 26, PL, xliv. 176; "De Catech. Rud." 50, PL, xl. 344) calls the salt in baptism by that name.

From the end of the tenth century to the time of Peter Lombard (d. 1164), we find a long list of sacramenta in vogue. Peter Damian (Serm. 69) says there are "twelve sacramenta in the Church." Hugo of St. Victor ("De Sacr." ix. 7) counts (a) two necessary sacramenta—viz. Baptism and the Eucharist; (β) sacramenta useful for sanctification—e.g. sprinkling with holy water, blessed ashes, &c., &c.; (γ) those which prepare us for other sacred rites—e.g. ordination &c. St. Bernard (Serm. "In Coena Domini") tells his hearers there are many sacramenta, but he will only speak then of three—viz. Baptism, Eucharist, and the washing of feet.

The first distinct and certain mention of seven sacraments occurs in Peter Lombard ("Sentent." IV. dist. ii.). "Let us now come to the sacraments of the new law, which are seven in number." It has been said that the Master of the Sentences was anticipated by Otto of Bamberg, the Apostle of Pomerania (1124–28). The question is of little moment, but the statement rests on the word of a biographer, not on any writing of Otto himself. A work of Hugo of St. Victor, often referred to—viz. "De Caerimoniis"—is not his, but later than Peter Lombard.

To sum up: in the earliest ages, Baptism and the Eucharist—the two sacraments most clearly and directly instituted by Christ and most necessary for all—were classed together. Then Confirmation, long given along with Baptism, was added to the number. Next—as this number of three did not seem to rest on any fixed principle—various writers chose various rites of the Church and put them together under the common name of sacramenta. At last, theological reflection, just when systematic theology was beginning to be, led Peter Lombard to the conclusion that there were seven rites, with this in common, which separated them from all others—viz. that they were the ordained means of grace. He called them, and them only, sacraments. The Schoolmen at once perceived the accuracy of his doctrine and the convenience of his nomenclature, and, finally, the number of the sacraments was defined to be seven, in 1274, at the Second Council of Lyons ("Prof. Fidei Mich. Palaeolog."), at Florence ("Decret. pro Armen."), and under anathema at Trent (sess. vii. "De Sacr." c. 1).

(3) The Matter and Form of the Sacraments.—Eugenius IV. ("Instr. pro Armen.") states that the sacraments are effected by the things which stand for the matter ("tanquam materia"), by the words which stand for the form, and by the person of the minister; and that if any one of these three things be wanting there is no sacrament. The terms "matter" and "form" are borrowed from Aristotle, matter being the indeterminate element which is stamped with a definite character by the form. Thus, washing can be performed for various purposes; e.g. cleanliness, health, amusement, or devotion. But when the minister, as he sprinkles the water on the catechumen, adds the words, "I baptize thee," &c., the end and meaning of his action is apparent, and we have the three constituents of the sacrament—viz. the person of the minister, the washing with water, which is the matter, and the words, which are the form. The special difficulties about the matter and form of particular sacraments—e.g. Penance, Order, Marriage, &c.—have been discussed under these titles; but we may say in this place that theologians distinguish a double matter in the Eucharist. While that sacrament is being produced, the matter is bread and wine; after consecration the matter consists in the outward appearances or accidents of bread and wine. The difficulty arises from the fact that the Eucharist, unlike all the other sacraments, continues to exist after the words have been spoken. Its duration is not transitory but permanent, so long as the species last.

This terminology began with the Aristotelian or Scholastic theologians. It is unknown, says Juenin (diss. 1, cap. 2), not only to the Fathers, but to Lanfranc, Anselm, Bernard, Hugo of St. Victor, and Peter Lombard, all of whom wrote formal treatises on the sacraments, and it first appears in William of Auxerre about 1215. In early times, the "form" of a sacrament means something quite different—viz. the whole rite. The Fathers commonly distinguish between the "sign," which includes both matter and form, and the invisible thing, between "things" and "words," and between the sacramentum, which includes all the outward part, and the res sacramenti, the invisible part. This last distinction is of capital moment for the right understanding of patristic texts.

The Council of Trent defines that though the Church may change rites and ceremonies, it cannot alter the "substance" of the sacraments. This follows from the very nature of a sacrament. The matter and form have no power in themselves to give grace. This power depends solely on the will of God, who has made the grace promised depend on the use of certain things and words, so that if these are altered in their essence the sacrament is altogether absent. How far the matter and the form were specifically, or only generically, determined by Christ is a difficult question (see infra, The Author of the Sacraments). The custom of the Church in different ages and countries shows that the form is not fixed in its particular words. It is often very hard to determine what change in the form would render the sacrament invalid. Common sense makes the decision turn to a great extent on the intention with which the change is made. Thus to baptize "in the name of the Father, the Son, the Holy Ghost and the Blessed Virgin," would always show gross ignorance or gross perversity; but if the intention were to baptize in the name of the Blessed Virgin, as if she were one of the divine Persons, or as if her name were operative in the sacrament, the baptism would be null (St. Thomas, 3^a, q. 60, a. 8).

We first hear of a conditional form ("I do not rebaptize thee, but if thou art not," &c.) in the Capitularies of Charlemagne (lib. vi. cap. 181, quoted by Juenin). The expediency of expressing a condition was not universally admitted till it was approved by Gregory IX. ("Extra. de Baptism." cap. 2, apud eundem). Till about 1600 the conditional form was only used in the three sacraments which imprint character (Juenin, i. a. 2). Even now it is not usual to express the condition in the other sacraments, and a sacrament must never be reiterated under condition, expressed or implied, unless the minister, after diligent examination, is unable to satisfy himself as to the validity of the previous act.

(4) The Author of the Sacraments.—The Council of Trent defines that the seven sacraments were all instituted by Christ Himself, and this for a reason already given. But the Council does not say that Christ instituted them directly and immediately. Some of the older Schoolmen held that some sacraments were instituted by the Apostles. Tournely quotes, for this opinion, Peter Lombard ("Sent." IV., dist. 23), Hugo of St. Victor ("De Sacr." ii. 2), St. Bonaventure ("In Lib. IV. Sent." ad dist. 17, a. 1, qu. 3), and Alexander of Hales ("Summa," p. iv. qu. 24, 1), the last of whom believed that Confirmation was instituted in 845 at the Council of Meaux. This last opinion must certainly be rejected. But although Tournely holds it to be "true and certain" that Christ immediately and directly instituted each of the sacraments, he by no means agrees with Becanus, Bellarmine, and Vasquez in accepting this as an article of faith, or considering that it is now heresy to attribute the institution of some sacraments to the Apostles, acting with power granted them by our Lord. He quotes, on his own side, these "most grave theologians" Sotus and Estius, the former of whom was a leading theologian at Trent. Indeed, Estius goes further than Tournely, for he is inclined to admit that something may be said for each opinion—that of St. Bonaventure and that common among Post-Tridentine theologians—though more for the latter ("ut aliquid probabilitatis habeat, majori tamen probabilitate diversae sententiae superatur"). Juenin likewise denies that the immediate institution by Christ is of faith. Billuart tends the other way, but speaks doubtfully. The question is admirably discussed by Pourrat, "La Théologie Sacramentaire," ch. vi. The excesses of the Modernists were condemned in the decree "Lamentabili," Props. 39–51; e.g. "The sacraments had their origin from the fact that the Apostles and their successors interpreted some idea and intention of Christ, under the influence of circumstances and events." (40).

(5) The Minister of the Sacraments.—Little need be said here about the personal holiness required in the dispensers of the mysteries of Christ. "Holy things are to be handled in a holy manner," and the minister is guilty of sacrilege if he confers the sacrament on others while he himself is at enmity with God. But at the same time the Church held against the Donatists that the validity of the sacraments does not depend on the worthiness of the minister, since in any case Christ is always present as the invisible dispenser of grace. A person may even be justified in seeking the sacraments from one whom he knows to be unworthy, if he cannot obtain them otherwise. Neither schism nor heresy deprives a man of the power of Holy Order (see ORDER, HOLY). But a great difficulty remains. The Council of Trent (sess. vii. De Sacr. can. 11) requires us to believe that the minister of the sacraments must have "the intention of doing that at least which the Church does." This definition has been the occasion of much controversy within and without the Church. Protestants have attacked it as making the effect of the sacraments uncertain. Catholics have interpreted it variously.

Intention is "an act of the will, by which a man chooses a particular thing." This intention may be actual—i.e. present at the time; habitual—i.e. present as a rule in similar cases and never recalled, but not actually present, or even present in effect; virtual—i.e. once present and still surviving as the cause or motive of a man's acts. Thus, if I make up my mind to take a journey, my intention is actual; I set out and continue walking, though the purpose is not at the moment present to my mind, then my intention is virtual. I make up my mind to take a journey next day, and meantime go to bed; while I am asleep my intention is habitual. All theologians agree that at least a virtual intention is needed for the validity of the sacraments. St. Thomas, indeed, pronounces an habitual intention enough, but only because habitual meant then what virtual meant later.

So far all is plain. But what must the object of my intention be? Several answers are conceivable. The minister (α) may intend to perform the outward rite, but as an open mockery, or as children might do in play, actors on the stage, &c. (β) He may intend to perform the outward rite seriously. (γ) He may intend to confer the grace of the sacrament, to regenerate, e.g., the child whom he baptizes, &c. The first and third solutions are inadmissible. A performance of the sacramental rite in open mockery is allowed by all to be invalid, and, on the other side, no one doubts that an infidel or a Calvinist can baptize, or, if he is a priest, can say Mass, anoint, &c., &c., validly. We will give the words of Tournely ("De Sacr." qu. vi. a. 1): "Whatever a man's opinion may be about the sacrament, its effect and end, or about the Church itself, whether he rejects all these things or admits them, makes no difference to the substance of the sacrament." "He need not intend to produce the effect of the sacrament, or to perform the rite of the Church as a sacrament, or to do what the Catholic and Roman Church does; it is enough that he should intend in some general way to do what the Church does, whatever his notion about the Church, the sacrament, its effect and object may be." Unless the Church held this, she would not, as she certainly does, recognize the validity of many sacraments given by heretics, infidels, and even pagans. Protestants sometimes urge that bishops have been secret infidels, Jews, &c., and that therefore on Catholic principles the orders and other sacraments given by them must have been invalid; but it is evident that they have utterly failed to grasp what the doctrine of intention, as held by any Catholic, is.

But is it enough for validity if the minister merely perform the external rite in a serious manner, even if internally he withhold his intention—i.e. even if from malice or impiety he says to himself, "I don't mean to act as the minister of the Church, I don't intend to baptize, consecrate, or the like, but merely to deceive the people"? We follow the opinion of those who answer in the affirmative, and we give our reply in the words of Bossuet ("Sententia Episcopi Meldensis, on the 'Cogitationes Privatae' of Leibnitz"). "It is a most common opinion among Catholics that the intention necessary for the validity of the sacraments consists in this—viz. the will on the part of the minister seriously to perform the rites prescribed by the Church, and to do nothing which is calculated to show a contrary intention, which intention he himself cannot make void by any secret intention whatsoever." This clear explanation removes, as we believe, every difficulty. The people are in no possible danger of deception. The serious performance of the exterior rite is all that is required. The difficulty that there is no mention of the necessity of intention in Scripture or tradition falls to the ground. The sacraments are to be given by men—by men acting, in St. Paul's words, as the ministers of Christ and dispensers of the mysteries of God (1 Cor. iv. 1). We only ask that they be given by conscious, human action. For example, in some Masses the words of consecration occur in the Gospel, while the bread and wine are on the altar. Will anyone maintain that the consecration takes place there and then? Does anyone suppose that the ancient Church thought so? Scarcely. Yet, if not, then the ancient Church admitted the whole doctrine of intention which every Catholic is bound to maintain.

This opinion which we have been defending was propounded by Catharinus, a Dominican theologian present at the very session in which the doctrine of intention was defined. Some time after the definition the work of Catharinus was reprinted at Rome in 1552 by Baldus, printer to the Apostolic Chamber. (So Tournely.) Cardinal Pallavicino, in his "History of the Council," ix. 6, allows that the Fathers of Trent did not suspect, much less condemn, the doctrine of Catharinus.[1] The great Jesuits Salmeron and Becanus, and the celebrated Dominican Contenson, espoused it. So in the last century did the learned Oratorian Juenin. It was defended in the Sorbonne in 1685 by Harlai, afterwards archbishop of Paris. We have seen how Bossuet speaks of it. It has never been censured by any competent authority, for a proposition condemned before Alexander VIII. by the Roman Inquisition in 1690 was, as Juenin shows, quite different. F. Ryder, in his book on "Catholic Controversy," admits that the question is still quite open, though he himself holds the contrary opinion. It is quite true that the majority of school theologians believe that secret withholding of the intention is enough to invalidate the sacrament. Our objection to this, the common theory, is grounded on the fact that its advocates can adduce no proof from Scripture or tradition,[1] while we fail to see the force of the argument from reason. Reason no doubt requires us to look on the valid administration of the sacraments as a human act distinguished by the outward circumstances from possible combinations of the same words and acts which have no sacramental character. But this does not carry us beyond the opinion of Catharinus.[2] This question also is well discussed by Pourrat (op. cit. ch. vii.), and by Franzelin "De Sacramentis," thes. xvi., xvii.

(6) The Subject or Recipient of the Sacraments.—In order that they may be received with profit by adults, certain dispositions are indispensable. To the sacraments of the dead—i.e. Baptism and Penance—the recipient must come at least with faith and hope, sorrow for sin, and purpose of amendment; the sacraments of the living—i.e. the other five—must be received by those who are already in the grace and love of God, the living members of Christ.[3] Otherwise the sacraments only add to the condemnation of those who receive them. As regards mere validity, the sacrament of the Eucharist is always the same, in whatever state it is received, because in any case it remains the true Body and Blood of our Saviour. In order that the other sacraments may be valid, some intention is necessary on the part of the recipient as well as of the minister. But whereas the latter must have an actual or virtual intention, it suffices for the validity of Baptism, Confirmation, Penance, and Extreme Unction if they are received with an habitual or interpretative intention of accepting the rite of the Church. This is plain from decisions of early councils. For example, the First Council of Orange in 444 (c. 12) ordains that Baptism or Penance may be given to a man who has fallen into frenzy. At the time, he has no intention of receiving the sacrament, but he is to receive it, so the council directs, if others give "testimony to his past desire." There is a special difficulty, however, with regard to Penance, for many theologians, believing that sorrowful confession by word or other sensible sign is the matter of the sacrament, are obliged by their theory to hold that the actual presence of some such sign is always necessary for the validity of absolution. The Scotists, who make absolution both the form and matter of Penance, are able to consider the mere desire of absolution in the past enough, even if the penitent is unable to express it ever so indistinctly at the moment. Again, the mere purpose of living a Christian life involves the intention requisite for Baptism, Confirmation, and Extreme Unction. It is different with Matrimony and Holy Order, states of life the desire of which is no way implied in the general resolve to live like a Christian; and it is usually said that a definite desire is also needed for Penance (so Billuart, "De Sacr." diss. vi. a. 1). We have the same disputes here as in the previous section on the necessary object of the intention. The common opinion is that it must be an internal one of receiving the sacred rite; while Juenin thinks it likely that a man "who withheld his intention," and did but mean to submit to the rite with external seriousness, would still receive it validly. The whole doctrine of intention on the part of the recipient, interpret it as we will, is not without historical difficulties. History furnishes several instances in early times of men ordained, and supposed to be validly ordained, in spite of their struggles and resistance. Generally, it may be said that such persons did give a final, though reluctant, consent; and Augustine speaks ("Ad Donat." Ep. 173, PL, xxxiii. 753) of those who were made bishops after being imprisoned and severely handled, "until they consented to undertake a good work." No such explanation will fit the case of the hermit Macedonius, concerning whom Theodoret ("Hist. Relig." cap. 13) relates that he was ordained priest by the celebrated Flavian without the least knowledge of what was going on, and was furious when he learnt what had occurred. The only answer, so far as we can see, is to say that Flavian was mistaken, and the ordination good for nothing. It may be asked wherein does the validity of a sacrament consist if no inward grace accompanies the outward sign? We reply, first, that three sacraments confer character which is always bestowed, even if no grace accompany it; and, next, that Baptism certainly, Confirmation, Order, Marriage, Extreme Unction probably, confer grace which revives when the recipient enters into due dispositions, even if his malice impeded the grace at the time they were received. Some even suppose that this holds good of Penance, and a few of the Eucharist. (St. Alphonsus, "Theol. Moral." vi., Tract. i. cap. 1.)

[1] Innocent III. is the earliest authority they quote. Their text from St. Paul certainly proves the necessity of intention, but only as Catharinus understood it. For a priest who behaves with exterior seriousness always acts as a minister of Christ.

[2] "When anyone has rightly and seriously made use of the due form and the matter requisite for effecting or conferring the sacrament, he is considered by the very fact to do what the Church does" (Leo XIII., Apostolicae Curae, on Anglican Orders).

[3] Accidentally, however, the sacraments of the living may restore a soul to the grace of God; e.g. if a person has attrition—i.e. sorrow—for his mortal sins, which is supernatural, but imperfect, and a firm purpose of amendment, believing erroneously, but in good faith, that he is already justified.

(7) The Grace of the Sacraments is twofold. They increase that sanctifying grace which is the supernatural life of the soul, and they bestow a sacramental grace—i.e. one which is special and singular, and proper to each sacrament. A person, e.g., who receives Confirmation worthily obtains, besides the character and the increase of sanctity, a title to special assistance from God when he is tempted to forsake the faith, has occasion to confess it by word or deed, &c. The Thomist opinion is that the sacraments cause grace physically, which means, not, of course, that sensible things have power in themselves to produce it, but that they become instruments in the almighty hand of God. A brush is powerless to paint a picture, but it is the instrument of painting in the artist's hand. The Scotists look on the sacraments as merely moral causes of grace. When the outward signs are present and the other conditions fulfilled, then God, directly and without any instrumentality of the sacraments, infuses grace. Each opinion has found many advocates outside of the Thomist and Scotist schools.

(It would be vain to attempt a list of writers on the sacraments, which would be in fact a list of nearly all Catholic theologians. But we would call particular attention to the excellent work of the French Oratorian Juenin, "Commentarius Historicus et Dogmaticus de Sacramentis" [Lyons, 1717]. We have also derived great assistance from a learned treatise of the Protestant Hahn, "De Numero Sacramentorum Septenario Rationes Historicae" [Breslau, 1859]. The references, as the writer of this article knows by painful experience, are frequently inaccurate, and the general statements require sifting, but the work is one of learning and merit, and much may be learnt from it. Chardon's "Histoire des Sacrements" [Paris, 1745] has no treatise on the sacraments in general. But we take this opportunity of expressing our great obligations to this admirable work. Gibbon—we quote from memory—eulogizes it as containing all that can be known on the subject, and this praise is due. The author was one of the most learned men in the Benedictine Congregation of Vannes. A recent little work by Pourrat, "La Théologie Sacramentaire," is well worthy of study.)

SACRED HEART. [See HEART OF JESUS.]

SACRED HEART, CONGREGATIONS OF THE. There are various religious congregations under this title, e.g. (1) a society founded mainly by Père Varin in 1794 in imitation of the then suppressed Society of Jesus. A similar society founded by Baccanari, called the "Society of the Faith of Jesus" a little later, absorbed the former, and both were absorbed into the restored Society of Jesus in 1814. [See BACCANARISTS.]

(2) Missionaries of the Sacred Heart of Jesus (Issoudun). A congregation of priests and lay-brothers founded for the spread of devotion to the Sacred Heart, founded at Issoudun, in France, by Abbé Chevalier. It has houses in England and on the continent of Europe; but its chief energies have been devoted to foreign missions in N. America and Oceania.

(3) The Society of the Sacred Heart, commonly known as the "Dames du Sacré Cœur." This institute of religious women was founded at Paris in 1800 by Madeleine Sophie Barat. The two societies of priests mentioned in (1) recognized the importance of making some provision for the education of girls, and carrying on the work of the destroyed communities of nuns under the new conditions necessitated by the Revolution. Père Varin, who had become the superior of the Fathers of the Sacred Heart, drew up in conjunction with Mme. Barat the first plan of the institute. "The end of the association was the perfection of its members and the salvation of souls; the spirit aimed at detachment from the world, purity of intention for the glory of the Sacred Heart, gentleness, zeal, and obedience; the means, for the religious, the training of the novitiate and spiritual exercises; for others, boarding schools for the upper classes, free schools for the poor, and spiritual retreats. The rule in this preliminary stage was simple; the houses were to be under one superior-general; everything was to be in common; the office of the Blessed Virgin was to be recited; the time appointed for mental prayer was specified. The manner of life was to be simple, without the prescribed austerities of the older orders, which would be incompatible with the work of education" (Mme. Stuart). After some internal difficulties, which are the usual lot of great undertakings, the rule was further elaborated by Mme. Barat and Père Varin, and was formally approved of by Leo XII. in 1826. The attempt to bring the constitutions into closer conformity with those of the Society of Jesus was given a three years' trial, but, as Mme. Barat had foreseen, it proved a failure. Gregory XVI. decided that the original constitution should be adhered to. Mme. Barat, who died in 1865, was declared "Venerable" in 1879, and "Blessed" by Pius X. on May 24, 1908. The Society, which has had a large share of persecution in France, Italy, and Germany has flourished exceedingly. Expelled from one country, it has migrated into another. At the present time it has 150 houses and 6500 religious; 27 houses and more than 1100 religious being in the United States. "Originally the plan of studies was more or less uniform in all the houses, but it has become necessary to modify it according to the needs and educational ideals of different countries and the kind of life for which the pupils have to be prepared. The character of the education of the Sacred Heart, however, remains the same, based on the study of religion and of Christian philosophy, and laying particular stress on history, literature, essay-writing, modern languages, and such knowledge of household management as can be taught at school." (Janet Stuart in "Cath. Enc.," Society of the Sacred Heart of Jesus; and also a separate work, "The Society of the Sacred Heart"; an anonymous "Life of Ven. Madeleine Louise Sophie Barat," Roehampton, 1908.)

SACRIFICE. In this article we confine ourselves to the theological notion of Sacrifice, without going into its Biblical history. Sacrifice is an act of external worship in which God is honoured as the Principle and End of man and all things, by the oblation of a visible creature, by submitting it to an appropriate transformation by a duly qualified minister. The term sacrifice is also (metaphorically) applied to internal acts by which man devotes himself to the service of God through either "reforming or giving up his life" for Him. No external sacrifice is perfect without such internal acts, whereby the soul associates itself with the meaning and object of the external rite. This object is that of practical religion in general, viz. practically to recognize and profess our dependence on God as regards our existence and our ultimate happiness. Some post-Tridentine theologians have narrowed the idea of sacrifice into the expression of God's dominion over life and death, or of the Divine Majesty as exalted above all, and its primary object into atonement for sin. Likewise, the external form of sacrifice—an appropriate transformation of the creature offered—has been limited by Vasquez and his followers to a "transformation by destruction." Neither historical nor doctrinal grounds can justify these limitations, unknown to the Fathers and earlier theologians. (See St. Augustine, "De Civ. Dei," x. c. 6, PL, xli. 283: "Verum sacrificium est omne opus quod agitur ut sancta societate inhaereamus Deo," &c., St. Thomas, 2^a 2^{ae}, q. 85, and the collection of definitions in Tanner in 2^{am} 2^{ae}, disp. v. q. 3, dub. 1.) The burning of incense, θυσία, which has furnished the Greek name for all sacrifices, is not so much a destruction of the incense as its conversion into "an odour of sweetness," the symbol of the soul transformed by the fire of divine charity. In the sacrifice of the Mass, "the immutatio," as the Fathers technically call the sacrificial act, is not the destruction but the production of the victim. (See Scheeben, "Dogmatik," book v. n. 1425 seq.; Schanz, "Die Lehre von den H. Sakramenten," § 35; Wilhelm and Scannell, "Man. of Theol." ii. p. 449.)

A lawfully appointed minister is necessary for public sacrifice in the name of the people. If the sacrifice is to have a peculiar dignity and efficacy as oblation and as action, viz. if it is to be more than the most expressive act of external worship and of man's earnest desire of sanctification, a consecrated minister is required. Both as gift and as action, the value of the sacrifice is measured by the personal dignity of the sacrificer. Hence, in the Mosaic dispensation, the hierarchical or lay priesthood of the sacrificer elevated the sacrifices to the dignity of sacrifices of the covenant; under the Christian dispensation, individual self-sacrifice and the public sacrifice derive supernatural efficacy and dignity from the supernatural character of the Christian layman or priest. Sacerdotal and hierarchical consecration are especially necessary to the minister of a sacrifice which is an objective and efficacious means of sanctification, a perfect sacrifice of the covenant between God and His people and a vehicle of sanctifying grace: here the sacrificer must possess a holy power in addition to his holy dignity, a power that enables him to act in the name and power of God, and to be a principle of sanctification to those on whose behalf he acts. There exists, then, between perfect public sacrifice and priesthood a relation of interdependence: without the priesthood there is neither a true nor a perfect sacrifice. Acts which may be, or actually have been, sacrifices, cease to be such when withdrawn by God from public cultus (e.g. sacrifices of animals in the New Testament), or when deprived of their sacrificial efficacy (e.g. the burning of incense). In the former case the act ceases to be a holy act; in the latter, it still is holy, but only retains a distant analogy with real sacrifice; it is used as a ceremony. (See EUCHARIST, p. 323; REDEMPTION; MASS; the dogmatic theologians in their treatises "De Incarnatione" and "De Eucharistia." The question of the theory of sacrifice was discussed at length in the "American Eccl. Review," 1905–6; the "destruction" theory is urged with much force by Franzelin, "De Eucharistia," thes. xvi.)

SACRILEGE. The violation of a sacred object. A thing is called sacred from the fact that it is set apart for the service of God; it thereby becomes in a sense divine, and has a right to be held in honour. Any irreverence to it is an injury to God, to whom it belongs. The sin of sacrilege, therefore, is opposed to the virtue of religion. It may be of three kinds, Personal, Local, and Real, according as the object violated is a sacred person, place, or thing. Instances of personal sacrilege are: laying violent hands on a cleric, summoning him before a secular tribunal, having immoral intercourse with a cleric in sacred orders or anyone bound by a vow of chastity. [See PRIVILEGE.] Local sacrilege is committed by certain profane, violent, or immoral acts committed in churches, cemeteries, &c. [See DESECRATION OF CHURCHES, &c.] To administer or receive the sacraments unworthily, to turn the sacred vessels (e.g. chalice, ciborium, pyx) to profane uses, would be cases of real sacrilege. Formerly the civil law inflicted the penalty of death on those guilty of sacrilege. The Church still inflicts grave spiritual censures for the various kinds of sacrilege. (See the constitution, Apostolicae Sedis; St. Thomas, 2^a 2^{ae}, q. 99.)

SAINTS, INTERCESSION AND INVOCATION OF. The Council of Trent (sess. xxv. De Invoc. Sanct.) teaches that "the saints reigning with Christ offer their prayers for men to God; that it is good and useful to call upon them with supplication, and, in order to obtain benefits from God through Jesus Christ, who alone is our Redeemer and Saviour, to have recourse to their prayers, help, and aid." The prayer which we may address to the saints is of course wholly different from that which we offer to God or Christ. "We pray God Himself," says the Roman Catechism (p. iv. ch. 6) "to give good or free us from evil things; we ask the saints, because they enjoy God's favour, to undertake our patronage and obtain from God the things we need. Hence we employ two forms of prayer, differing in the mode [of address]; for to God we say properly, Have mercy on us, Hear us; to the saints, Pray for us." Or, if we ask the Blessed Virgin or the saints to have pity on us, we only beseech them to think of our misery, and to help us "by their favour with God and their intercession"; and "the greatest care must be taken by all not to attribute what belongs to God to any other" ("Cat. Rom." ib.). Two points, then, are involved in the Catholic doctrine —the intercession of the saints and the utility of invoking them.

(1) Intercession of the Saints.—The whole of the New Testament enforces the principle that we are members of Christ, and so bound to each other as members of the same body (see, e.g., 1 Cor. xii. 12 seq.). God might, had it pleased Him, have made us solely and directly dependent on Himself, but He has chosen to display His own power by giving great efficacy to the intercession of the just (James v. 16). He taught us to go to Him with the wants of others as well as with our own, and He has deepened charity and humility by making us dependent to some extent on the prayers of others. Everybody knows the store St. Paul set on the prayers of his fellow-Christians (Eph. vi. 18, 19; 1 Tim. ii. 1). Prayer even for enemies was a duty enjoined by Christ Himself (Mt. v. 44). Now, it is hard to imagine a reason why souls which have gone to God should cease to exercise this kind of charity and to intercede for their brethren. The Old Testament plainly asserts the intercession of angels, as has been proved already [see MEDIATOR], and it seems at least to imply the intercession of departed saints in Jerem. xv. 1; and undoubtedly the later Jews believed in the merits and intercession of the saints of Israel (Weber, "Altsynagog. Theol." p. 314). We find an explicit statement of the doctrine just where we should reasonably expect it. The Apocalypse was written later at least than the death of Nero (June 9, A.D. 68), and the writer is filled with the thought of his martyred brethren who had gone before him to God. He believes that they still sympathise with and intercede for those whom they had left behind. "I saw beneath the altar the souls of them that were slain because of the word of God and the witness which they had, and they cried with a loud voice, How long, O Lord, holy and true, dost thou not avenge our blood on them that dwell on the earth? And there was given to each of them a white robe, and they were told to rest a little, until their fellow-servants and their brethren be completed [in number," or else, according to the reading συμπληρώσωσιν, complete the number] "who are to be killed even as they" (vi. 9 seq.). So again, in v. 8 (cf. viii. 3), the elders before the heavenly altar are represented as falling "before the Lamb, having each a harp and golden vials full of perfumes, which are the prayers of the saints." It matters nothing for our present purpose whether the "saints" mentioned were or were not still on earth. In either case their prayers are offered to God by the elders in heaven, so that the imagery implies that the saints before God offer up our prayers and so help us by their intercession.

But, if Scripture were silent, tradition witnesses to the doctrine so universally and so constantly as to remove all doubt of its Apostolic origin. The genuine "Acts" of the early Martyrs abound in testimonies. Thus, the contemporaries of St. Ignatius, St. John's disciple, tell us that some saw the martyr in vision after death "praying for us" ("Act. Mart." 7). The "Acts" of the Martyrs of Scilla (anno 202) speak of them as interceding after death before our Lord (Ruinart, "Act. Mart." ed. Ratisb. p. 132). Theodotus, before his death, says: "In heaven I will confidently pray for you to God" (ib. p. 384). "Pious men" built the Martyrium of Trypho and Respicius, "commending their souls to the holy patronage of the blessed martyrs" (ib. p. 210). Fresh evidence comes from the early Fathers. Cyprian, writing to Cornelius (Ep. lx. 5, ed. Hartel, p. 695), thus exhorts those who may be martyred first: "Let our love before God endure; let not our prayer to the Father's mercy cease for our brethren and sisters" (see also "De Habit. Virg." 24, p. 205). Origen ("In Cantic." lib. iii. p. 75, ed. Bened.) thinks it no "unfitting" interpretation of a passage in the Canticles if we take it to mean that "all the saints who have departed this life care for the salvation of those who are in the world, and help them by their prayers and mediation [interventu] with God." It is useless to add passages from later Fathers. A long list of them will be found in Petavius ("De Incarn." lib. xiv. cap. 10).

(2) Invocation of the Saints.—If it is the will of God that the saints should help us on the road to heaven by their prayers, we may be sure that He makes the communion between the Church militant and the Church triumphant perfect on both sides; that He enables us to speak to them in order that they may speak for us. Our Saviour tells us that the angels rejoice over repentant sinners (Lk. xv. 7), and a passage already cited from the Apocalypse shows that the martyrs in heaven are aware of what happens on earth. The inscriptions in the Catacombs recently brought to light witness to the confidence with which the Church invoked the prayers of departed saints. We select a few instances from those given by De Rossi (in the "Triplice Omaggio" and "Collection of Epitaphs," as quoted in Kraus, "Real-Encycl." art. Gebet): "Ask for us in thy prayers, because we know thou art in Christ" (n. 15); "Beseech for thy sister" (n. 19); "We commend to thee, O holy [Domina] Basilla Crescentius and Micena, our daughter" (n. 17). The great Fathers of the fourth century directly invoke and bid others invoke the saints. St. Gregory Nazianzen begs a martyr, St. Cyprian, to "look down from heaven upon him with kindly eye, and to direct his discourse and his life" (Orat. xxiv. ad fin., PG, xxxv. 1193). So he invokes his friend St. Basil (Orat. xliv. ad fin.). St. Gregory Nyssen, fearing the Scythian invasion, attributes past preservation to the martyr, and not only invokes him, but begs him in turn to invoke greater saints, Peter, Paul, and John (Orat. in S. Theodor., PG, xlvi. 746). St. Ambrose ("De Vid." cap. 9, n. 55, PL, xvi. 251) exhorts Christians to supplicate (obsecrandi) their guardian angels and the martyrs, especially those whose relics they possess. "Let us not only on this feast day but on other days also keep near them; let us beg them to be our patrons," are the words of St. Chrysostom on the martyrs Berenice and Prodoce. In his verses the early Christian poet Prudentius habitually invokes the saints; and St. Augustine (Serm. 324, PL, xxxix. 1447) tells a story to his people of a woman who prayed to St. Stephen for her dead son, "Holy martyr . . . give me back my son," and was rewarded by the miracle she asked. It must be remembered that these passages are but samples out of many which might be adduced. They come to us from every part of the Christian world, and the devotion which they attest cannot have sprung up as if by magic at once and in every quarter. We may add that then, as now, Catholics were charged with idolatry because they venerated the saints. Such accusations were made by the heathen generally, and in particular by Julian the Apostate, by the Manicheans, Eunomians (extreme Arians), by Vigilantius, &c. (See Petavius, "De Incarnat." xiv. 14.) St. Augustine's reply is well known—viz. that the sacrifice of the Mass and supreme worship of every kind was offered, not to the martyrs, but to God, who "crowned the martyrs" (so, e.g., "Contr. Faust." lib. xx. cap. 21, PL, xlii. 384).

The fact that the saints hear our prayers was held by the Fathers as certain; the way in which they do so is a matter of philosophical or theological speculation, about which neither they nor we have any certainty. In some way, unknown to us, God reveals to them the needs and prayers of their clients, and Petavius warns us against curious speculation on the matter. The very uncertainty of the Fathers on this point throws into relief their unshaken confidence in the intercession of the saints and the advantage of invoking them. Augustine, Jerome, and others suggest that sometimes departed saints may actually be near those who are calling on them. Modern theologians have generally thought that the blessed beholding God see in Him, as in a mirror, all which it concerns them to know of earthly things. Whatever theory we adopt, the knowledge of the saints depends entirely on the gift of God. We should be idolaters indeed were we to think of them as omnipresent or omniscient.

An account has been given of the institution of the Feasts of the Saints in a previous article [FEASTS]. The devotion of the Church has turned chiefly to the saints who died after Christ. The ancient liturgies do indeed commemorate the Patriarchs and prophets. Abel, Melchisedec, and Abraham are mentioned in the Roman Mass, and more than a score of Old Testament saints in the Roman Martyrology. Abel and Abraham are invoked by name in the Litany for the Dying prescribed in the Roman Ritual. The list of feasts given by Manuel Comnenus mentions one feast of an O.T. saint, that of Elias; but the Church of Jerusalem had many such feasts, and at Constantinople churches were dedicated to Elias, Isaias, Job, Samuel, Moses, Zacharias, and Abraham. But the Maccabees are the only O.T. saints to whom the Latin Church has assigned a feast.[1] The reason, as Thomassin thinks, for the exception is that the mode of their martyrdom so closely resembled that of the Christian martyrs, and that their date was so near to the Christian period. (The chief authority followed has been Petavius, "De Incarnat." lib. xiv., which treats the subject exhaustively, and for the last paragraph Thomassin's "Traité des Festes," lib. i. ch. 9).

[1] I.e. a feast kept by the whole Church; for the Carmelites keep the feast of St. Elias, and, e.g. at Venice there are churches dedicated to Moses, Job, &c.

SALESIAN SOCIETY. This religious institute was founded by Don Bosco (d. 1886) under the patronage of St. Francis of Sales. Its object is "the Christian perfection of its associates, obtained by the exercise of spiritual and corporal works of charity towards the young, especially the poor, and the education of boys for the priesthood." The founder's aim was to promote confidence and love among the children, instead of fear and hatred. His system and institute have had extraordinary success. The Society possesses more than 300 houses, and has found its way into almost every country. The Salesian "Bulletin" is issued in eight different languages. The rule and constitutions were approved by Pius IX. in 1874. "The main work of the institute is the education and training of boys, divided into two classes, students and artisans. The second branch is the missionary one, and finds its scope principally in South America and Asia. The third branch is engaged in the education of adults for the priesthood, and the fourth is occupied in the diffusion of good Catholic literature." (Marsh in "Cath. Enc."; Heimbucher, "Die Orden und Kongregationen.")

SALT. [See BAPTISM.]

SALVE, REGINA. The antiphon said after Lauds and Compline from Trinity Sunday to Advent. Some, with Durandus, ascribe its composition to Peter of Compostella in the tenth century, but Cardinal Bona, with better reason, attributes it to Hermannus Contractus, a Benedictine monk of the eleventh century. St. Bernard, according to the Chronicle of Spires, added the last clause, "O clemens, O pia, O dulcis Virgo Maria." Gregory IX., in 1239, is said to have ordered the recitation of the "Salve" after Compline, and it is certain that the four antiphons of the Blessed Virgin now in use among us were said daily by the Franciscans after Compline as early as 1249. "But even the 'Salve, Regina,' which was the earliest antiphon of the Blessed Virgin commonly recited in the Church, did not find a place in the Breviary till it was put there by Cardinal Quignon, and was thence transferred to the Roman Breviary of Pius V." (Probst, "Brevier und Breviergebet," p. 134). (See Henry in "Cath. Enc."; Julian, "Dictionary of Hymnology"; Thurston, "Month," 1901, 1905, 1916, where he traces our modern Benediction service to the singing of the "Salve" (Salut); see BENEDICTION.)

SANCTUARY. 1. The part of the church round the high altar reserved for clergy. Eusebius ("H.E." x. 5) speaks of the altar in the church built by Constantine at Tyre as enclosed with wooden rails. In ancient times, says Morinus ("De Pen." vi. c. 1, n. 10), both the Latin and Greek churches were divided into two parts, the atrium, or court for the laity, and the sanctuary (called by the Greeks ἱερατεῖον, but most commonly βῆμα, from its raised position, also ἅγιον τῶν ἁγίων, ἄδυτα, ἱλαστήριον, ἀνάκτορον; by the Latins presbyterium, tribuna, sanctum) for bishop, priests, and deacons. The porch, or νάρθηξ, is not mentioned till 500 years after Christ. [See NARTHEX.] The Latin word sanctuarium occurs in the thirteenth capitulum of the Second Council of Braga, in 563, which forbids any lay person to enter the sanctuary for the reception of communion. (Le Brun, tom. iii. diss. i. a. viii.) Another name is "chancel" [q.v.].

2. The name of sanctuary is also applied to a church or other holy precinct, to which, in the Middle Ages, a criminal or a fugitive from secular justice might resort and find immunity [ASYLUM]. The degree of this immunity varied at different times and under different circumstances. The most ancient and famous sanctuary in England was that of Beverley, the immunities of which originated in a grant by Athelstan to St. John of Beverley, after returning from his victory over the Danes at Brunanburg (937). Under the grant the limits of sanctuary extended for a mile around the town, and were marked out by four crosses, of three of which there are still some remains. Violent and arbitrary men often strove to break through or disregard the immunity. "The pax of this dead man" [St. Cuthbert], said Barcwith,[1] one of Earl Tosti's soldiers, "ought not to be observed so strictly, that thieves, robbers, and murderers, if they flee to his shrine, should triumph over us and escape without punishment." Bury St. Edmund's was also a famous sanctuary; see a story in the work of Hermannus ("Mem. of St. Edmund," i. 31, Rolls series) about the breach of sanctuary attempted by Sheriff Leofstan, about A.D. 1000, and its immediate punishment. In London the precinct on the south side of Fleet Street, where had stood the monastery of the White Friars (Carmelites), retained the privilege of sanctuary long after the Reformation. Debtors, swindlers, and worse criminals frequented it; it was known by the cant name of Alsatia (see Scott's "Fortunes of Nigel"; Stephen, "Commentaries," iv. p. 263, ed. 8).

SANCTUS, THE, also known as the Tersanctus, as the angelic hymn among the Latins, as the triumphal hymn (ἐπινίκιος ὕμνος) among the Greeks, forms the conclusion of the Preface in all the liturgies. It is composed of the words, "Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of Sabaoth," from Is. vi., and a fragment of Ps. cxvii. 26 (Heb. cxviii.), "Blessed is he who cometh in the name of the Lord. Hosanna in the highest" (Mt. xxi. 9). In the Roman rite, except in the Pontifical chapel and during exposition of the Blessed Sacrament, a small bell is here rung. But Benedict XIV. says he could not discover when this custom began. It is to be observed that the Missal here follows the old Latin version, which retained the word Sabaoth, while the Vulgate has exercituum. This, no doubt, is the right translation, but scholars are not agreed as to the original reference. Ewald believes the reference is to the armies of angels (Ps. ciii. 21, cxlviii. 2; 1 Kings [3 Reg.] xxii. 19, "the camp of God"; Gen. xxxii. 2). Schrader suggests, which is very unlikely, that the hosts of Israel are intended; while, probably, the opinion of many other critics, Kuenen, Baudessin, Tiele, Delitzsch, is the right one—viz. that the original reference was to the stars. These are constantly spoken of as the "host of heaven," and in Is. xl. 26 as the host which God musters. The title never occurs in the Pentateuch, Josue, or Judges. But it is constantly employed in the historical books from Samuel onwards, in Psalms, in the Prophets, but not in Osee, Ezechiel, or in Micheas, except iv. 1–4. (See Fortescue, "The Mass," p. 320, where he traces the early history of the practice of singing the words at this point of the Mass; on the other hand Cabrol, "Les Origines Liturgiques," p. 329, says: "Le Sanctus . . . n'est pas dans la liturgie d'une origine primitive, et sa place à la fin de la préface n'est pas non plus primitive.") SANDALS form part of the bishop's liturgical dress. The fact is interesting, as one of many proofs that Church vestments are derived from the dress of daily life, and had originally no connection with the garb of Jewish priests, who officiated barefoot.

[1] Sim. Dun. i. 244.

SANCTVS BENEDICTVS.

Sandals are first mentioned as part of the liturgical dress by Amalarius of Metz ("De Eccl. Offic." i. 25 and 26). He distinguishes between the sandals of the bishop, which were fastened with thongs, because he had to travel, and those of priests. The deacon's sandals were the same as those of the bishop, whom he had to accompany; those of the subdeacons were again distinct. Rabanus Maurus is the next to mention sandals ("De Cleric. Institut." i. 22); he sees a reference to them in Mk. vi. 9, Ephes. vi. 15, and, as they covered the under but not the upper part of the foot, he sees here a symbol of the teacher's duty of revealing the Gospel to the faithful and concealing it from infidels. Pseudo-Alcuin in the tenth century ("De Div. Offic." 39) copies the authors just named. On the other hand, Hugo of St. Victor ("De Sacram." ii. iv. 14), Innocent III. ("De Altaris Myster." i. 10, 34, 48), and Honorius of Autun ("Gemma Animae," i. 210) show that in their time the sandals of bishops only, not of priests, belonged to the liturgical dress, as is the case still. Innocent mentions the stockings[1] of bishops (caligae, also tibialia), which since the twelfth century have been of silk. (Hefele, "Beiträge," vol. ii. p. 219 seq.; Rock, ii. 194–208; Braun in "Cath. Enc." and "Die Liturgische Gewandung," 384 sqq.)

SARDICA, THE COUNCIL OF, was summoned, as the members of the synod expressly state, by the two emperors Constans and Constantius (αὐτοὶ οἱ εὐσεβέστατοι βασιλεῖς συνήγαγον ἡμᾶς—apud Athanas. "Apol. contr. Arian." 44, PG, xxv. 324). The wish for the convocation of the synod began on the part of the bishops Julius of Rome, Hosius of Cordova, and Maximin of Treves. They addressed themselves to Constans, and he arranged matters with his brother (Athanas. "Apol. ad Constant." 4, PG, ib. 600). The date of meeting was long a subject of debate, but the discovery of the Paschal letters of Athanasius in a Syriac translation (first published by Cureton, London, 1852) makes it certain that the synod was held either in 343 or 344. Hefele ("Concil." i. 535) was in favour of the latter date, but his editor Leclercq is in favour of the former (i. 740, note). The place of meeting—Sardica, now Sofia in Bulgaria—lay conveniently on the borders of the two empires. The synod gives three reasons for its convocation: first, the troubles which had arisen from the persecution of orthodox bishops, particularly Athanasius, Marcellus of Ancyra, Asclepas of Gaza; next, the extirpation of the Arian heresy; and, thirdly, the restoration of true faith in Christ (see the letter quoted above, and a slight variation in the statement, Mansi, "Concil." iii. 40). The bishops of the Eusebian or Arianizing party numbered 76, those of the Catholic party 94 (see Hefele-Leclercq, i. 746). Julius, bishop of Rome, was represented by the priests Archidamus and Philoxenius; but it was Hosius, bishop of Cordova, who presided (Athanas. "Hist. Arian. ad Monach." iv. 16, ἡ ἁγία σύνοδος ἧς προήγορος ἦν ὁ μέγας Ὅσιος; also Theodor. "H.E." ii. 15; Sozom. iii. 12). In the list given by Athanasius ("Apol. contra Arian." 50, PG, xxv. 712) the Roman priests sign immediately after Hosius. The Eusebians, finding the majority favourable to Athanasius, Marcellus, and the other bishops incriminated by them, withdrew to the neighbouring city of Philippopolis, whence they addressed a letter to the clergy of Christendom. In this they repeat their accusations against Marcellus, Athanasius, Paul of Constantinople, Asclepas of Gaza, and the bishops generally who were assembled at Sardica. They append a semi-Arian creed, which is nearly identical with that known as the fourth formula of Antioch. It omits the ὁμοούσιος, which was the test of orthodoxy, and at the same time anathematizes the Anomoeans or strict Arians. The Eusebians claimed to be the true synod of Sardica. The text of their encyclical is given by St. Hilary of Poitiers (Fragm. iii. p. 1307–1326).

Meanwhile, the orthodox bishops were left to pursue their work in peace. After investigation, they acquitted Athanasius, Marcellus, and Asclepas, &c., and anathematized the Eusebian leaders, Theodore of Heraclea, Narcissus of Neronias, Acacius of Caesarea, Stephen of Antioch, Ursacius of Singodunum, Valens of Mursia, Menophantes of Ephesus, and George of Laodicea.

Next, dogma came directly under consideration, and some proposed that the synod should issue a new Creed. It was ruled, however, that no addition should be made to the Nicene symbol (Athanas. "Tom. ad Antioch." 5). The Sardican Creed, therefore, given by Theodoret ("H.E." ii. 8) cannot be genuine, though the Ballerini conjecture (edition of St. Leo, tom. iii. p. xxxix.), with great probability, that this Creed, a translation of which is given in the Latin acts of the council discovered by Maffei, was actually put forward and approved by some of the Fathers.

Lastly, the council passed a number of canons for the regulation of discipline. Canons 1 and 2 forbid the translation of bishops. Canon 3 forbids bishops to ordain or perform other spiritual acts out of their own diocese, except when called upon to do so by the metropolitan and bishops of the provinces. Charges against a bishop are to be judged by the bishops of the province. Then follow decrees concerning appeal to Rome, which have been the subject of eager controversy. At the end of canon 3, already quoted, the council supposes the case of a bishop who has been condemned by the bishops of his province, and still pleads innocence: It proceeds: "If it seems good to your charity, let us honour the memory of Peter the Apostle." Hefele-Leclercq (i. 775) give the following summary of the council's determinations on this right of appeal to Rome :—

(1) A bishop deposed by his comprovincials may appeal to the Pope personally (canon 5), or through the court of first instance—viz. the comprovincial bishops who have condemned him (canon 3).

(2) Rome may confirm the former sentence or appoint a court of second instance (canon 3).

(3) This latter court is to consist of bishops from another, and that a neighbouring, province (canons 3 and 5).

(4) The Pope may appoint legates to act as assessors and to preside (canon 5).

(5) If a bishop appeals to the Pope, his see is not to be filled up till Rome has either confirmed the original sentence or referred the matter to a court of second instance (canon 4). Of course, in the latter case no step could be taken till the cause had been tried a second time.

In many copies the Sardican canons were appended to, and so confused with, those of the first Nicene council. It was this, in all probability, which led Pope Zosimus, in his dispute with the African bishops, to allege a Nicene canon which recognized the Pope's right of re-examining the cause of a bishop condemned by his colleagues. And, acting on this principle, he received the appeal of the priest Apiarius of Sicca, who had been condemned in his own country (Hefele-Leclercq, i. 504). The African prelates replied that they could not find the canon in question; and, in fact, even the Sardican canon does not contemplate appeals from priests. It was not till the ninth century, in the controversy with Hincmar of Rheims, that the Sardican rule underwent essential alteration, so that all charges involving the deposition of bishops were reserved to Rome as causae majores, even in the first instance. This latter principle found complete expression in the forged decretals (Hefele-Leclercq, i. 776).[1]

Canons 7, 8, 9 restrict, and in great measure prohibit, the visits of bishops to the Imperial Court. Canon 10 forbids episcopal consecration per saltum. Canons 11 and 12 enforce episcopal residence, and forbid a bishop to officiate in a strange diocese. Canons 13 and 14 forbid one bishop to restore a cleric whom another bishop has excommunicated, but permit the cleric to appeal to the metropolitan or, in his absence, to the nearest bishop. Here the Latin text inserts a canon which forbids a bishop to ordain for his own diocese a cleric who is subject to another bishop. Canon 16: clerics, like bishops (see above, canon 11), must not be absent from their diocese more than three weeks. Canon 17: only if unjustly expelled from his see may a bishop remain in a strange city Canons 18 and 19 concern the strife for the bishopric at Thessalonica and the quarrels that had arisen thence. Canon 20 enforces the previous canons (7, 8, 9) on episcopal visits to the Court, and gives a certain control over travelling bishops to the prelates of the sees on the great roads.

Three additional documents of importance are still extant: the first an encyclical to all Christian bishops; the second a letter to the Church of Alexandria, declaring the innocence of Athanasius; the third a letter to Julius, bishop of Rome, recognizing his reasons for absence and giving him an account of the proceedings.

[1] The Carthaginian synod of 424 A.D. rejected appeals to Rome as infringing the rights of the African Church (Hefele-Leclercq, ii. 214). Yet Popes Celestine and Leo the Great and the 12th Synod of Toledo make the same confusion between Nicaea and Sardica (Hefele-Leclercq, i. 821).

By some historians and critics, viz. Baronius, Natalis Alexander, the Ballerini, and Palma, the Council of Sardica has been considered oecumenical. No doubt it was convoked as an oecumenical council. Moreover, its canons were approved by the council in Trullo, and received, according to Pope Nicolas I., by the whole Church (see Hefele-Leclercq, i. 822). This latter fact, however, proves nothing, since the disciplinary enactments of many other councils —e.g. of Ancyra and Neocaesarea—were generally received. On the other side it is to be remembered that, although the episcopate of East and West was summoned, scarcely any Eastern bishops were actually present at the deliberations. This might have been compensated by subsequent subscription of the decrees on the part of absent bishops. But, although the decrees were transmitted through Christendom, only about 200 absent bishops signed, of whom ninety-four were Egyptians. No single ancient authority speaks of the council as oecumenical. St. Augustine ("Contr. Crescon." iii. 34, iv. 44, PL, xliii. 516; Ep. 44 ad Eleus. 3) did not even know that an orthodox synod had met at Sardica. Gregory the Great ("Epist." lib. iii. Ep. 10, PL, lxxvii. 613) and Isidore of Seville ("Etymolog." vi. 16) recognize four General Councils only, viz. Nicaea, Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedon. These are the chief reasons which have constrained Bellarmine, De Marca, Tillemont, Fleury, Du-Pin, Ceillier, Neander, and many other scholars, to deny Sardica a place among the General Councils. SCALA SANTA (Holy Stairs). Twenty-eight marble steps, said to have belonged to Pilate's palace at Jerusalem (the praetorium of Jn. xviii. 28), up and down which Christ passed. Like other relics of the Passion, now in Rome, they are said to have been brought by St. Helen, mother of Constantine the Great. Since the time of Clement XII. they have been cased in wood. It is a pious practice of the faithful to ascend them on their knees, at the same time praying and meditating on the Passion. Pius VII. granted an indulgence of nine years for each step, and Pius X. a plenary indulgence as often as the ascent is made after confession and communion.

The history of the Holy Stairs is obscure. De Montault challenges the rather dubious utterances of the Popes, from Sergius I. to Gregory IX. (1227–1241), cited by Benedict XIV. in favour of the traditional story. He also rejects (and Duchesne agrees with him) the appeal to two passages in the "Liber Pontificalis" (ed. Duchesne, i. 502, ii. 91) neither of which connects the steps with Pilate or our Lord. His opinion is summed up in the words: "L'antiquité est complètement muette au sujet de l'origine, du transport et de l'installation de la Scala Santa. Le moyen âge est, sinon aussi silencieux, au moins fort obscur à cet endroit" ("Œuvres," i. 505). "The approval of the Holy See," says Father Thurston, "which may be accorded from time to time to such popular devotions as that of the Scala Santa, does not involve any infallible pronouncement upon a question of pure history. It implies that reasonable care has been taken to exclude fraud or the probability of error; but that such care is necessarily proportioned to the canons of historical criticism prevalent at the period at which the approbation was first granted." ("Holy Year of Jubilee," p. 185 sqq.; Moroni, "Dizionario," lxii. 55 sqq.)

SCANDAL (σκάνδαλον, "the spring of a trap, the stick which sprang up when the trap was shut, and on which the bait was placed," Skeat). The word is used in English in quite a different sense from the theological meaning. Here we speak only of the latter, which is indeed more in accordance with the etymological and Scriptural sense (Mt. xviii. 6 sqq.)

Scandal, according to St. Thomas (2^a 2^{ae}, q. 43, a. 1), is any evil word or deed which is the occasion of sin to another. It may be direct, i.e. foreseen and intended; or indirect, i.e. foreseen, but not intended. "There is a twofold malice in sins of direct scandal; such sins are against charity and also against the special virtue which he who suffers scandal violates. So that, when A incites B to drink to excess, A sins against charity and against temperance" (Slater, "Moral Theol." i. 199). Another distinction is that between active and passive scandal; the former being given, the latter taken but not given. This latter may again be divided into pharisaical scandal, where the malice of another makes mischief out of what is harmless, and "scandalum pusillorum," where human frailty takes occasion of sin from the same cause. Thus, to some persons the mere sight of a beautiful woman may suggest dangerous thoughts.

How far we are answerable for the sins of others is a difficult question to solve, and moral theologians devote many pages to it in their treatises on charity, and also on the sixth commandment, which is frequently broken through scandal. It is well to be on one's guard against extreme views expressed in sermons by pulpit orators. St. Alphonsus himself, who was both a great preacher and a great theologian, acknowledges that in his former capacity he had sometimes been too severe. "In the exercise of my duty as a preacher," he says, "I have spoken strongly against (a certain practice); but now as a writer on moral theology I must say what I really (juxta veritatem) think of the matter, and what I have learnt from the authors" ("Theol. Mor." ii. n. 55). St. Thomas's treatment is based upon sound reason and common sense. In 2^a 2^{ae}, qq. 168, 169, he deals with the subject of modesty in action and dress, avoiding both dangerous laxity on the one hand, and over-scrupulosity on the other. (See Ballerini, "Theol. Mor." ii. 165 sqq.; Slater, "Moral Theol." i. 198.)

SCAPULAR (from scapulae, shoulders). A dress which covers the shoulders. It is mentioned in the rule of St. Benedict as worn by monks over their other dress when they were at work, and it now forms a regular part of the religious dress in the old orders. But it is best known among Catholics as the name of two little pieces of cloth worn out of devotion over the shoulders, under the ordinary garb, and connected by cords.

It was through the Carmelites that this devotion began, and the following is the account given of its origin: The Blessed Virgin appeared at Cambridge to Simon Stock, general of the Carmelite order, when it was in great trouble. She gave him a scapular which she bore in her hand, in order that by it "the holy [Carmelite] order might be known and protected from the evils which assailed it," and added, "This will be the privilege for you and for all Carmelites; no one dying in this scapular will suffer eternal burning." Another apparition is related by John XXII. in the famous Sabbatine bull. The Blessed Virgin, he says, appeared to him, and, speaking of the Carmelites and those associated to them by wearing the scapular, promised that, if any of them went to Purgatory, she herself would descend and free them on the Saturday following their death. "This holy indulgence," says the Pope, "I accept, corroborate, and confirm, as Jesus Christ for the merits of the glorious Virgin Mary granted it in heaven." To gain this privilege it is necessary to observe fidelity in marriage or chastity in the single state. Those who read must recite the Office of the Blessed Virgin, unless already bound to the Divine Office; those who cannot must abstain from flesh meat on Wednesdays and Saturdays, unless Christmas falls on one of these days. So the Sabbatine bull, as given in the Carmelite "Bullarium."

It is to be noted, however, that there have been many Catholic writers of great weight who call in question the genuineness of this Sabbatine bull. It has no place in the Roman "Bullarium," and its autograph has never been found. Pope Benedict XIV. ("De Fest." lxxiv., lxxvii.) denies the authenticity of the bull, and says it is as hard, perhaps harder, to believe in this bull than in the story of the chapel built on Mount Carmel in honour of the Blessed Virgin during her lifetime. He says he could find more reasons against it than he cares to produce, and arguments drawn from things [in the bull] which want all appearance of truth.

The authenticity of the bull is also denied by the great Bollandist Papebroch, in his reply to the attacks made upon him on the subject; and Launoy, in a dissertation of wonderful learning, to be found in the second edition of his works (the edition we have used is dated 1731, "Coloniae Allobrogum"), brings forward a superabundance of reasons to show that the bull of John XXII. is a clumsy forgery, and that of Alexander V. another forgery, made to cover the former.

The "Acts" of St. Simon Stock, written down by a Carmelite friar, Peter Swanington or Swaynton, who was his constant companion, were kept in the record-room of the monastery at Bordeaux. As to the fact of the apparition to the saint, it is accepted by Benedict XIV., Papebroch, and Alban Butler on the faith of the above-mentioned "Acts" of the saint by Swaynton, who, it is alleged, was his secretary and wrote the story of the apparition at his dictation. A fragment of this "Life" was produced from their archives at Bordeaux, and printed by one of the Carmelites—viz. Chéron (Cheronensis). We may observe that the Carmelites refused a sight of this "Life" to Papebroch. (See Bollandist "Acta SS." Maii, tom. iii.) Next, to understand the force of Launoy's arguments for regarding this passage in the "Life," if it be authentic, as an interpolation, we must remember that the miracle is represented as gaining immediate notoriety. These are Swaynton's or pseudo-Swaynton's words: "The story running through England and beyond it, many cities offered us places in which to live, and many nobles begged to be affiliated to this holy order, that they might share in its graces, desiring to die in this holy habit." If so, the silence of Carmelite authors for more than a century after is remarkable. St. Simon Stock died in 1265. Ribotus, provincial in Catalonia (about 1340), in his ten books "On the Institution and Remarkable Deeds of the Carmelites," ignores the story. So does Chimetensis in two books specially designed to glorify the order ("Speculum Historiale" and "Speculum Ordinis Carmeli"), and so do three other authors of similar books quoted by Launoy. Strangest of all, Waldensis, a Carmelite, an Englishman, and writing in England ("De Sacramentalibus"), tries hard to prove the religious habit a sacramental, and speaks particularly of the Carmelite habit and the form which it is given. Nothing could have been more to the point than Swaynton's story, but Waldensis never alludes to it. The vision is mentioned, apparently for the first time, so far as is known for certain, by Grossus, a Carmelite of Toulouse, in his "Viridarium" (1389), then by Paleonidorus ("Antiq. Ord. Carm." vi. 8, apud Launoy), published in 1495. It is right to add, however, that the Carmelites claimed the support of an anonymous MS. in the Vatican said to have been written early in the fourteenth century.

Many of the later Popes have granted numerous indulgences to the Confraternities of the Scapular, and no Catholic, Launoy as little as anyone, doubts the utility and piety of the institution. "The scapular," says Bossuet, "is no useless badge. You wear it as a visible token that you own yourselves Mary's children, and she will be your mother indeed if you live in our Lord Jesus Christ" ("Sermon pour le Jour du Scapulaire," vol. xi. p. 369). Benedict XIV. speaks in a similar tone, but he admits that too many abuse these symbols and badges by a misplaced confidence in them.

There are other scapulars used in the Church: that of the Trinity, of white linen with a red and blue cross, given by the Trinitarians or priests delegated by them; the Servite scapular of the Seven Dolours, which is of black woollen stuff; that of the Immaculate Conception, of light blue woollen cloth, propagated by Ursula Benincasa in the sixteenth century, and given by the Theatines who governed the congregation to which this nun belonged; the red scapular of the Passion, originated by a Sister of Charity at Paris, who is said to have received a revelation on the matter in 1846, and given by the Vincentian Fathers. All these Confraternities are designed to promote prayer and other good works in their members.

This article has been compiled from Benedict XIV. "De Festis"; the Bollandists, Maii, tom. iii.; Launoy, "Dissertat." tom. ii. Swaynton's "Life" does not seem to have been published entire. At least, we have searched in vain for a copy at the British Museum. There is nothing in Alban Butler which had not been already stated by the authors quoted. The brief notice on the other scapulars is from a little book of Labis, "Notices et Instructions sur les Scapulaires," &c. It is merely practical, and has no historical worth.

When the above article was first published, in 1883, it met with much criticism. This found expression in the "Month" Nov. Dec. 1886; "I. E. Record," Sept. 1887; and elsewhere. At the time of the issue of the fourth edition of the present work (1893), an American Review called for the suppression of the edition (Jan. 1894). It is pleasant to note, in contrast with these outbursts, the industry and candour of the learned English Carmelite Provincial Fr. Zimmerman, in the "I. E. Record," May 1901, Feb., March, April, 1904, and the art. in the "Cath. Enc." where the matter is summed up thus: "Hitherto no authenticated testimony has been discovered proving that the small scapular was known from the second half of the thirteenth century and was given to the members of the Confraternity of Our Lady of Mount Carmel. On the contrary, there are many reasons for the view that the small scapular as we now know it, and in the form it has certainly had since the sixteenth century, is of much later origin." Father Thurston, S.J. ("I. E. Record," July 1904, and "Irish Eccl. Review," 1911), maintains that there was no life by Swanington; he recommends "a certain reserve in proclaiming on Our Lady's authority that the wearing of our familiar brown scapular may be regarded as a sure pledge of salvation"; and he rejects the Sabbatine—or rather the Subitine—indulgence altogether.

SCAPULAR MEDALS. It is permitted to wear, instead of the small cloth scapulars, a medal of metal, having on one side a representation of our Lord with His Sacred Heart, and on the other an image of His Blessed Mother (decree of Holy Office, Dec. 16, 1910).

SCHISM (σχίσμα). A tear or rent (Mt. ix. 16; Mk. ii. 21); a division of opinion (Jn. vii. 43; ix. 16; x. 19); party spirit in the Christian Church (1 Cor. i. 10; xi. 18; xii. 25); and then, in Fathers and theologians, a technical word to denote formal separation from the unity of the Church. "Schismatics," says St. Thomas ($2^a\ 2^{ae}$, q. 39, a. 1), "in the strict sense, are those who of their own will and intention sever themselves from the unity of the Church." This unity of the Church, he continues, consists in the connection of its members with each other, and of all the members with the head. "Now, this head is Christ, whose representative in the Church is the Supreme Pontiff. And therefore the name of 'schismatics' is given to those who refuse to be under the Supreme Pontiff and to communicate with the members of the Church subject to him." Further, he thus explains the difference between heresy and schism:—Heresy is opposed to faith, schism to charity; so that, although all heretics are schismatics, because loss of faith involves separation from the Church, all schismatics are not heretics, since a man may, from anger, pride, ambition, or the like, sever himself from the communion of the Church and yet believe all which the Church proposes for our belief. Still, a state of pure schism—i.e. of schism without heresy—cannot continue long—at least, in the case of a large number of men. The words of St. Jerome (on Titus, cap. 3), quoted by St. Thomas, are to the point: "Schism, at the beginning, may be understood as something different from heresy, but there is no schism which does not invent some heresy for itself, in order to justify its secession." History abundantly confirms this observation. Bodies which at first separate from the Church merely because they think their personal rights have been infringed are sure, in the end, to deny the Church's unity and to lose the spirit of faith. And so St. Thomas remarks that, as loss of charity is the way to loss of faith, so schism is the road to heresy.

Schismatics do not, of course, lose the power of order; their priests can say Mass, their bishops confirm and ordain. But they lose all jurisdiction, so that "they cannot either absolve, excommunicate, or grant indulgences, or the like; and if they attempt anything of the kind the act is null" (loc. cit. a. 3). Whether pure schismatics do or do not cease thereby to be members of the Church is a question controverted in the Schools. Many theologians consider that all who retain integrity of faith are members of the Church. But all agree that they are not united to the Church by charity—that if members, they are dead members—so that the question is of no great moment. (Ferraris; the dogmatic theologians "De Ecclesia," e.g. Franzelin, thes. xxiii.).

SCHOLASTICISM. [See PHILOSOPHY.]

SCHOLASTICUS (Fr. écolâtre). An ecclesiastic attached to, but generally not a member of, a cathedral or collegiate chapter, to whom the administration of its schools was entrusted. The scholasticus is also called, in charters of the eleventh century, capischolus, caput scholaris, and magister scholarum. The office seems to have arisen along with the schools which the Capitularies of Charlemagne order with such earnestness and reiteration to be erected in all the Frankish dioceses. Those who held it often combined teaching with the super-intendence of teachers; this was the case with St. Bruno, the founder of the Carthusians, appointed in 1056 Scholasticus in the Church of Rheims. The Council of Trent ordered that the Scholastici of a diocese and others who were bound to lecture or teach should, if competent, themselves give instruction in the seminaries of which the council decreed the erection in all dioceses; and that in future the office of a Scholasticus (scholasteria) should only be conferred on doctors, masters, or licentiates in theology or in canon law, and other fit persons capable of teaching; the collation otherwise to be void.[1] (Thomassin, i. 3, 70.)

SCHOOLS. A child is usually sent to school in order that he may obtain, with greater ease and fewer interruptions than would be possible at home, knowledge which will be serviceable to him in after-life. This is a motive which acts on parents independently of State instigation; it filled the school of Flavius at Venusia with "big boys, the sons of big centurions,"[1] and took Horace to that superior establishment at Rome which received the sons of "knights and senators." The earliest Christian school of which we have a distinct account—that of Pantaenus at Alexandria (A.D. 180)—was one for religious and catechetical instruction (ἱερῶν λόγων κατηχήσεων).[2] The earliest State provision for secondary instruction was made by the Emperor Vespasian,[3] who established a group of "imperial schools" at all the great provincial towns; Besançon, Arles, Cologne, Rheims, and Treves are particularly mentioned. In these schools rhetoric, logic, and Latin and Greek literature were well taught, and many a Christian apologist owed to them the mental culture which he employed after his conversion in the service of Christ. Julian the Apostate knew well what he was about when he allowed none but pagans to teach. This meant for Christians the loss either of their faith or of their intellectual life. After a generation or two a certain number of them would have become pagans, while others, true to their faith, would have become unable to defend it with skill or to take any part in the higher affairs of state. Happily his reign was short. When the empire had finally become Christian the schools still retained the old methods and subjects of instruction, and even, to a great extent, the old spirit. St. Jerome, who had himself been educated in one of them, was alive to the perilous nature of this influence, and interdicted the reading of the pagan authors to all those under his direction who were in training for the religious life. Every bishop's residence was from the first more or less definitely a school, in which clerics were trained for the ecclesiastical life. Similarly, after the commencement of the monastic life under St. Antony and St. Hilarion, the monastery, besides subserving the ends of self-discipline and continual intercession, became a school for training monks. This was especially seen in the monasteries in Gaul which followed the rule of the abbot Cassian of Marseilles. Early in the fifth century the invasions of the barbarians began; for four centuries Western Europe weltered in chaos, and the institutions of civilized life perished. In the cities of Gaul, as the Franks pressed southwards, the old municipal schools—the schools of the Rhetoricians and the Grammarians—dwindled and were dispersed. Lay life became barbarous; and the arts of barbarism—which are chiefly fighting, destruction, and coarse indulgence—do not stand in need of schools. But in the wreck the episcopal and monastic schools survived, and, through the degradation of lay life, became ever more attractive. In the island of Lerins, the abbot Honoratus, about 400, founded a celebrated monastery, the school of which was known as the Studium Insulanum. Ireland, soon after its conversion by St. Patrick, was dotted over with monastic schools, in which such learning as was then accessible was prosecuted with remarkable success.

The suppression of the schools of Athens by order of Justinian (529) sounded the knell of the educational institutes of antiquity. These schools were, in fact, a university, although that name was of later introduction. They had never been able to shake off the pagan modes of thought which gave birth to them, and now the advancing tide of Christian ideas engulfed them, without being able for a long time to supply their place. A few months after the suppression St. Benedict founded the abbey of Monte Cassino, and the schools for the erection of which his rule provides were soon spread over Western Europe. These gradually produced a race of teachers and students whose higher and wider views suggested the resuscitation of academic life. It is sufficient to mention Iona, Lindisfarne, Canterbury, York, Fulda, Rheims, Corbie, Fleury, and Seville—not as being all of Benedictine origin, but as among the best schools to be found in the troubled period from the fifth to the tenth century.

The great organizing mind of Charlemagne endeavoured to make use of education, as of all other forces within his reach, for restoring civilization in the West. He invited Alcuin, the Scholasticus of York, as the best-known teacher in Europe, to his Court at Aix-la-Chapelle, and gave into his charge the palace school. Conscientious and painstaking, Alcuin was yet essentially borné; there is something cramped and unsatisfactory in his way of handling all the subjects of his narrow curriculum. The age of universities was not yet. Charlemagne, and his son after him, were perpetually urging the bishops to improve their schools. Rabanus Maurus, a pupil of Alcuin, made the school of Fulda illustrious; that of Corbie, in the same age, produced Paschasius Radbert. The trivium and quadrivium—the invention of which is ascribed by some to Martianus Capella, a Carthaginian professor of rhetoric, by others to St. Augustine—supplied the cadre of the most advanced instruction for several centuries. Between 850 and 1000, the inroads of the Normans and Danes again made havoc of all that had been hitherto done in France and England to promote education. The Normans, however, when once fully converted, became the most active propagators of all civilizing ideas that the world has ever seen. The Norman school of Bec, founded in the eleventh century by the Abbot Herluin, numbered among its teachers Lanfranc and St. Anselm. In schools of this class, where knowledge was sought at first hand and philosophy disdained conventional methods, university ideals began to emerge. In the twelfth century, at Paris, commences the history of modern universities. [UNIVERSITY.] After the establishment of these foci of superior teaching, the secondary school became, in theory, on the one hand a stage of preparation for the university, on the other a place of final training for those who had to begin work early. But for a long time the first of these two aspects of a secondary school overpowered the other. William of Wykeham, bishop of Winchester, founded there, in 1373, the school which still exists, expressly in order to feed the college (New College) which he was establishing at Oxford. The Winchester foundation was for a warden and ten fellows, three chaplains and three clerks in orders, an informator or head master, a hostiarius or second master, seventy scholars who were to be "poor and in need of help," and sixteen choristers.[1] Imitating this example, Henry VI. founded the school at Eton in 1440, as a nursery to King's College, Cambridge. The later public schools of England—Westminster, Rugby, Harrow, &c.—have been founded, speaking generally, upon the model of these two, but without the same close connection with the universities.

The common belief, perpetuated by the name "King Edward's Grammar School," is that secondary education in England owes its origin to that youthful Protestant monarch. "Never," says Leach ("English Schools at the Reformation"), "was a great reputation more easily gained and less deserved than that of King Edward VI. as a Founder of Schools." The few educational foundations made by Henry VIII. or his son were really the partial restoration of educational endowments seized with the monasteries and chantries. Before Henry's time there were cathedral schools, collegiate grammar schools, monastery schools, guild schools, and especially chantry schools, where the priest was bound to teach as well as sing Mass for the founder. "The proportion of the population which had access to Grammar Schools and used them was much larger than now" (Leach, p. 97). It can truly be said that education was much more democratic in the old Catholic days than it is now.

Towards the end of the seventeenth century, the necessity of separating primary or elementary instruction from secondary began to make itself felt. The greater complexity and variety of employments, and the increased application of science to all the useful arts, made it desirable, if not indispensable, that the labouring class also should at least be instructed in letters and in the art of calculation. Primary instruction on a large scale was first tried (1684) by the Ven. De la Salle, the founder of the Christian Brothers. [See that article.] The new grade had its two aspects—that by which it was a stage of preparation for the secondary school, and that by which it gave a final training. Up to very recent times the former aspect was little regarded; but, at present, the advantages of making free and easy communications by which the best scholars can pass from the primary to the secondary, and from that to the superior grade of instruction, is clearly perceived by educationists.

All English schools before the Reformation had a Catholic character. That being withdrawn from them by the change of religion, and the laws prohibiting the erection of new schools under Catholic teachers, those who adhered to the old faith were put to great straits for several generations in order to get their children educated under any tolerable conditions. A single sample of Protestant legislation will show what difficulties had to be faced. By the 11 and 12 Will. III. c. iv., "If any Papist, or person making profession of the Popish religion, shall keep school, or take upon himself the education or government or boarding of youth, he shall be adjudged to perpetual imprisonment in such place within this kingdom as the King by advice of his Privy Council shall appoint." [1] Unless foreign education were sought, obscure private schools, such as those of which we obtain a glimpse in the accounts of the early life of Pope, were the only available resort.[2] The first school of a higher class was that established at Sedgley Park (it had previously existed in a humble way at Newcastle-under-Lyme) by Bishop Challoner in 1763. St. Edmund's, Old Hall (a continuation of an earlier school dating from 1769), founded in 1793; Ushaw, which, as Crook Hall, was founded in 1794; Stonyhurst, in the same year; Downside, in 1798; and Edgbaston, in 1858—with Ampleforth, Beaumont, and Prior Park—may be mentioned among our older secondary schools.

The monitorial system of Bell and Lancaster, by means of which it was considered that primary instruction could be much extended at little expense by setting the elder children as "monitors" to teach the rudiments to the younger, was brought out in 1797. The primary schools of Prussia, organized under Hardenberg with great skill and thoroughness, drew general attention; and in 1833 the first public grant, 20,000*l.*, in aid of the elementary education of the people, was voted by Parliament, and its administration confided to a Committee of the Privy Council. The system of aiding local efforts thus introduced has received an enormous development and undergone numerous changes of detail, but in its substantial features it remains unaltered to the present day. In the Anglican communion, the organ through which State help was dispensed was the "National Society for the Education of the Poor in the Principles of the Established Church," founded in 1812. The corresponding organ for the Dissenters was the "British and Foreign School Society." For Catholics was established, in 1847, the "Catholic Poor School Committee," which, by maintaining efficient training-schools for masters and mistresses, enables Catholic managers to obtain their fair share of the Parliamentary grant for elementary education.

In Ireland the penal laws rendered the erection of Catholic schools impossible until about a hundred and thirty years ago, when the ill-success of the war against the American colonists compelled certain relaxations. A secondary school for forty boarders was founded at Burrell's Hall, Kilkenny, in 1783, under Drs. Lanigan and Dunne.[1] It throve exceedingly, and was transformed in 1836 into St. Kieran's College, under which name it still exists. Of more recent foundation are Carlow and Thurles Colleges, and the Jesuit College of Clongowes. These institutions, with many others, though without State aid or inspection, are already more flourishing than the Royal and Charter Schools—founded in the bad times in order to preserve and extend Protestant ascendency—could ever boast of being. [See UNIVERSITY.]

The National Board of Education—in the schools of which a combined literary instruction was to be given to children of all creeds during certain hours in the day, while separate religious teaching might be given to those whose parents desired it before or after those hours, and also on one particular day of the week—was organized through the exertions of Mr. Stanley, Chief Secretary for Ireland (afterwards Earl of Derby), in 1831. The bishops accepted this arrangement, not as the best, but as the best obtainable measure; and under it, notwithstanding the difficulties caused by extreme poverty, elementary school training has penetrated into every corner of Ireland. As regards secondary education, Catholics received no assistance from the State until 1878. In that year an Act of Parliament established the Commissioners of Intermediate Education to distribute grants to schools of all denominations "on the basis of an annual general examination in the subjects of secular instruction, and giving exhibitions and prizes to the most successful candidates." This Act was further extended in 1900. These Acts have been accepted by practically all the Catholic schools and colleges, including those of the Christian Brothers.

An Act for the enforcement of general education, and authorizing the formation of School Boards, and the levying of rates, in all places where voluntary effort should appear to be insufficient for the need, was brought in by Mr. Forster in 1870, and became law. Great efforts have been made by the Catholic body in England, and hitherto with a large measure of success, to provide schools under certificated teachers (and therefore qualified to participate in the educational grant) sufficient for the reception of all the Catholic children in the country. Whether these efforts will prevail, or the Board schools, from which definite religious teaching is excluded, will more and more bring the elementary instruction of the people under their control, is a question still uncertain. This Act, which supported out of the rates none but Board Schools, was amended in 1902 so as to allow the rates to be applied to the support of denominational (voluntary) schools. We only know that society is not likely to go back, and that the necessity of an adequate preparation of all classes for the work of life will become increasingly manifest. At the same time, as was stated in the article on EDUCATION, the Divine and irrefragable right of the Church to share in the control of all schools in which her children are taught, together with the corresponding right and duty of parents, can never be surrendered by Catholics. It is not possible to name the numberless works, treatises, and reports on the subject of schools. The admirable work done by the Nuns in primary and secondary schools is referred to in the articles on the different religious institutes of women. One of the best books on the subject (including higher education) is "Christian Schools and Scholars," by Mother Raphael (Theodosia Drane).

SCOTISM. Scholastic philosophy, as has been shown in other articles, was the philosophy of Aristotle interpreted, developed, and reconciled with the Christian faith. In the latter part of the Middle Ages, scholastic theology, accepting the data of Catholic faith, occupied itself in arranging, defending, and drawing deductions from them on the principles of the scholastic philosophy. Of this scholastic philosophy and theology there were two great schools, of which the Thomist found its home in the Dominican, the Scotist in the Franciscan order. The Nominalist school found adherents in both of these orders and in the Church generally, but never exercised an influence like that of the older systems, and really marks the decay of Scholasticism as a whole.[1] [1] We refer to Nominalism in its later form, as represented by Occam and his followers.

Very little is known about the life of Scotus. His full name, Joannes Duns Scotus, has been variously interpreted. Some (e.g. Camden, Leland, Wharton, &c.) suppose that he was born at Dunstane, in Northumberland, Scotch writers (Camerarius, Dempster, McKenzie) have claimed him as their countryman, and argued that "Duns" means "Dunse," a little town to the north-west of Berwick. Wadding, the Franciscan annalist, makes him an Irishman, born in the county of Down and province of Ulster. He contends that he cannot have been an Englishman, since his epitaph runs, "Scotia me genuit, Anglia suscepit"; not a Scotchman, since Bonaventure, in a list of the Franciscan provinces, mentions that of "Scotia, or Ireland." The date of his birth is given by some as 1265, by others as 1274. When he made his noviciate is quite uncertain. Of the names of his teachers one only has been handed down—that of William Varo, or Ware, whom he succeeded in the chair of theology at Oxford. He went to Paris in 1304; to Cologne in 1308, where he died suddenly the same year and was buried in the Franciscan church. His works consist of commentaries on the logical works of Aristotle and the "Isagoge" of Porphyry, a commentary on Aristotle's "De Anima," two commentaries on Aristotle's "Metaphysics," besides a shorter work, "Conclusiones ex xii. Libris Metaphys. Aristot.," "Grammatica Speculativa," "Tractatus de Rerum Principio" and "De Primo Principio," "Theoremata," "Collationes," "Quaestiones Miscellaneae," "Quaestiones Quodlibetales," and an unfinished "Tractatus de Cognitione Dei." All these books, except the "Collationes" and "Quodlibetica," were written at Oxford. There, too, he wrote his "Opus Oxoniense," a commentary on the "Four Books of the Sentences," which contains his whole philosophical and theological teaching in a collected form. The "Reportata Parisiensia" is an abridgment by Scotus himself of the "Opus Oxoniense." At the end of book iii. dist. 18, Scotus was called to Cologne, and left the work incomplete. The "Quodlibetica" consists of twenty-one questions on which Scotus disputed in public when he took the degree of doctor at Paris. In general chapters of the order, and, as Wadding thinks, soon after his death, decrees were passed requiring the Scotist doctrine to be taught in all the Franciscan schools. His works were collected by the Irish Franciscan Wadding in twelve folio volumes (Lyons, 1639). Commentators on Scotus appear in the latter half of the fifteenth century.[1] Such were the Irishman Mauritius a Portu (d. 1513), professor at Padua, afterwards

[1] But long before this Scotus had distinguished disciples —e.g. Antonius Andreae, the "Doctor Dulcificus" (d. circ. 1320); Franciscus de Mayronis, the "Magister Abstractionum" or "Doctor Illuminatus" (d. circ. 1325); Walter Burleigh, "Doctor Planus et Perspicuus" (1275—circ. 1337). (Ueberweg, p. 457.)

archbishop of Tuam; Francis Lychetus of Brescia (d. 1520), minister-general of the order; Joannes Poncius (d. 1550), an Irishman and professor at Rome; Hugo Cavellus, professor at Rome and Louvain, minister-general of the order, finally archbishop and primate in Ireland; Antonius Hiquaeus (Hickey), also an Irishman. Among Scotist theologians the best known are Albergoni ("Resolutio Doctrinae Scotisticae," Lyons, 1643); Baro on the Scotist philosophy (Cologne, 1668); Frassen ("Scotus Academicus," Paris, 1680); Hieron. de Monte Fortino, who arranged, in a very convenient manner, the teaching of Scotus in a "Summa" which corresponds question for question to that of St. Thomas ("Summa ex Scoti Operibus concinnata juxta Ordinem et Dispositionem Summae S. Thom. Aq.," Romae, 1728, 5 vols. fol.). In the middle of the eighteenth century Ferrari undertook the defence of Scotist against modern philosophy ("Philosophia Peripatetica adv. veteres et recentiores praesertim firmioribus propugnata rationibus Joannis Duns Scoti," Venice, 1746).[1]

Scotists no less than Thomists were, in the strictest sense of the word, Schoolmen. The one as well as the other accepted the whole tradition of the Church as it was collected by Peter Lombard; to Scotus no less than to St. Thomas the "Pope is the supreme guardian and divinely-instituted exponent of the deposit of faith left to the Church, the highest guide and ruler of the Christian commonwealth, the supreme representative of the Church's judicial power" (Werner, p. 497). Again, to Scotus as well as to St. Thomas, Aristotle is the representative of human reason, the decisive authority in philosophical discussion.[2] Hence, the differences between the two schools, numerous as they are, move between very narrow limits. Far wider, far more interesting and important, questions arose in the conflict on the power of the Pope begun at Constance and Basle and prolonged in the learned French church, and on a multitude of questions after the rise of scholarship and historical criticism, in the war between the old and the new philosophies. Probably just because the limits of opinion were so narrow, it came to pass that Thomists and Scotists fought on so many points which have little interest for us. So numerous are they that we can but make a selection from them here.

(1) Both Thomists and Scotists were Realists, but the Realism of the latter was more pronounced. To St. Thomas no universal exists as such. The essence is only actually found in the individual; it is by a process of the intellect—viz. abstraction—that we separate humanity in general from humanity as it manifests itself in this particular man and reach the idea of humanity in general. "Universale, dum intelligitur: singulare, dum sentitur." At the same time, St. Thomas, unlike the Nominalists, held that the universal has a "foundation in reality," because the species exists with identical qualities in a number of individuals. It has precisely the same character, though it is not numerically one. But this numerical unity was just what the Scotists maintained. To them the nature in all individuals of the same species was numerically one. The obvious difficulties of this theory led later Scotists to modify it till it was scarcely distinguishable from Thomism, or else to take refuge in unintelligible subtleties. (2) The Thomists made matter the principle of individuation, so that, e.g., in spiritual beings like the angels there could only be one individual in each species. The Scotists believed that in individuals there was an "haecceitas," something which made them individual apart from matter. (3) St. Thomas held that second causes, including the will, only move so far as they are moved by the first cause. God moves the will to act, gives the action as well as the power to act, in such manner, however, as to leave the freedom of the will unimpaired. So, at least, the Dominicans—rightly, as it seems to us—understood their master. Scotus, on the contrary, held that "the created will is the total and immediate cause of its volition, so that God in respect thereto has no immediate but only mediate efficacy." The will is like a "free horse," grace like the rider, and the horse can throw its rider; otherwise, the will could not be free, and there would be no possibility of sin. Observe that both Scotus and St. Thomas argue on general philosophical grounds. Very different from either is St. Augustine's position. To the first man, he says, a grace was given "without which he could not abide [in grace] if he willed; but to will was left in his own power." After the Fall, God gives "to those on whom He sees good to bestow it an assistance so great and of such a nature that we do will." "The first freedom of the will consisted in the power not to sin (posse non peccare); the last is to be much greater, not to be able to sin (non posse peccare)." "One is the help without which a thing is not done [i.e. grace of perseverance before the Fall], and another, the help by which a thing is done" ("De Corrept. et Gratia," cap. xi. xii., PL, xliv. 933). But, clearly, Scotus is far further removed from St. Augustine. Kindred to his teaching on the freedom of the will is the tenet of Scotus that "man without grace may avoid all mortal sin" against the natural law. Again, whereas St. Thomas places final beatitude

[1] There is also a handy work (not, however, Scotist) by Joannes de Rada, Controversiae inter Thomam et Scotum, Venice, 1599.

[2] Still, Scotus adopted many Platonic and Neoplatonic conceptions, with which he became familiar through Avicebron's (Ibn Gebirol's) Fountain of Life (Ueberweg, Hist. Phil. Engl. transl. i. p. 453).

in the intellect which knows God, Scotus attributes it to the will which loves God.[1] (4) Scotus, against St. Thomas, denies that the immortality of the soul can be proved by reason; and he separates, by a much sharper line than St. Thomas, natural from supernatural theology. (5) Scotus held it "more probable" that the Blessed Virgin never contracted original sin, and he proved this belief consistent with the fact that she was redeemed by Christ. (6) He taught that the Word would have become man, even had there been no fall; that the merits of Christ were not infinite in themselves and from the union of his human nature with the Word, but only from the acceptation of them as infinite on the part of God. Consequently, he denied the infinite value of the sacrifice of the Mass. (7) With respect to the Sacraments, his treatment of the mystery of the Eucharist differs on a multitude of subtle points from that of St. Thomas (Werner, p. 283 seq.). It is more interesting to observe that he rejected the Thomist doctrine of physical, and admitted only a moral, efficacy in the Sacraments. [For an explanation of this, see SACRAMENTS; and for the Scotist doctrine on the matter and form of Penance, see the article.] (8) On moral points, two doctrines of Scotus may be noted here. St. Thomas denied that any deliberate action, however indifferent in itself, could be really indifferent at the time it was done. Either the action was referred to a good end and so morally good, or not so referred and therefore evil. Scotists rejected this reasoning, and held that the end, and therefore the action, might be indifferent. The other point is connected with the principles of toleration. Scotus, against St. Thomas, held it lawful to take away the children of Jews by force, baptize, and educate them as Christians.

The Scotist philosophy and theology are now, we believe, abandoned, or all but abandoned, in his own order. But many of his opinions have been adopted—e.g. by the eclecticism of some Jesuit theologians (e.g. on the moral efficacy of the Sacraments; on grace, to a certain extent)—and have exercised an enduring influence. His opinion on the Immaculate Conception finally prevailed, and his theory on the Incarnation has recommended itself, as a philosophical view of that mystery, even to writers of name outside the Church. His differences from St. Thomas served the useful purpose of maintaining intellectual life and preventing a servile adherence to that great author.[2]

[1] "The fundamental position of Scotus in psychology and ethics was this: Voluntas est superior intellectu" (Ueberweg, loc. cit. p. 456).

[2] The Sacred Congregation, by order of Paul V., declared the doctrine of Scotus free from censure, and forbade anyone to presume to prohibit the printing of any book known as his (Viva, Disp. 59, 6, n. 5; Franzelin, De Deo Trino et Uno, thesis 20). Scotus, as Ueberweg points out, was a critical rather than a creative genius. His early mathematical training made him impatient of demonstration which was not rigorous; and, accepting the Church's doctrine, he dismisses many Thomist arguments in its favour. Just in the same way, Kant accepted the convictions of the moral sense and of the "religious consciousness," while he rejected the proofs which Leibnitz thought valid.

SCOTS COLLEGE. In the time of Henry VIII. the Scotch possessed an ancient church and hostel at Rome. Mary Stuart, soon after she assumed the government of Scotland, put the institution on a sound footing; but in consequence of her long imprisonment in England it was abandoned. Clement VIII., by the bull "In Supremo," founded in 1600 a college for training natives of Scotland to the sacred ministry, near the Church of St. Mary of Constantinople; whence, in 1604, he removed it to a site opposite the Palazzo Barberini, granting to it at the same time the neighbouring church of St. Andrew. In 1616 the college was made over by Paul V. to the Jesuits, who had the management of it down to their suppression in 1773. For twenty-five years it continued under the rule, or rather misrule, of Italian clergy until its suppression in 1798 by the French revolutionaries. It was revived under Pius VII., mainly through the exertions of the Rev. Paul MacPherson, the Scots agent, who became rector in 1820. The students have always attended lectures at the Roman College, now the Gregorian University. The college is immediately subject to the Holy See, which exercises its authority partly through the Cardinal Protector, partly through the Consistorial Congregation. Among its distinguished alumni may be mentioned Bishop Hay and Archbishop Smith, the author of a learned work on the Pentateuch. There were also Scots colleges at Douay, Paris, and Valladolid, the last-named being still in existence. (Bellesheim, "Hist. of the Cath. Church in Scotland," tr. iii. 386–7; Fraser in "Cath. Enc."; Guilday, "English Catholic Refugees," 28, &c.)

SCOTTISH CHURCH. The Gospel was originally announced in Scotland by three principal teachers, St. Ninian, St. Kentigern, and St. Columba. The first, a Briton, who had been carefully instructed at Rome,[1] fixed his see at Whithern in Galloway, and thence evangelized the Southern Picts. His death is placed in 432. St. Kentigern or Mungo, a Strath-Clyde Briton, became the first bishop of Glasgow, and in the course of a long episcopate planted the faith firmly in Strath-Clyde, and helped to root out paganism, dying probably about 603. St. Columba, a Scot from Ireland, founded Iona (563), and planted Christianity among the northern Picts—i.e. in the Hebrides, and in the Northern and Western Highlands. For more than a thousand years only one religion was known in Scotland, that taught by the Catholic Church, and the immense good done by it is acknowledged even by enemies. A Protestant historian [1] draws a glowing picture of the state of the country before the Reformation, covered over as it was by a network of well-planned institutions, and adorned with magnificent ecclesiastical and monastic buildings, where learning was prized and art encouraged—where the hungry were fed and the miserable consoled. One special service which the land owed to its clergy was the removal or mitigation of slavery. "The priesthood set the first example of mitigating domestic slavery—that curse and disgrace of the Middle Ages—having emancipated all the bondmen belonging to their estates, before the lay proprietors could be taught either the advantage or the obligation" [2] of doing so.

In the article PRESBYTERIANS, SCOTTISH, the religious revolution of 1560 was described. The perfervidum ingenium of the Scotch was not content with the establishment of the Knoxian system, unless the old faith was proscribed at the same time. Tytler [3] describes the anti-Catholic legislation of 1560 as consisting mainly of three acts. "The first abolished the Papal supremacy in the realm; the second repealed all previous acts in favour of Popery; the third enacted that any person hearing or saying Mass should suffer for the first offence confiscation of his property; for the second, banishment; and for the third, death." Surprise has often been expressed at the feebleness of the resistance offered. But we may assume that the bishops knew their countrymen, and felt that resistance would no longer avail. The pride and overweening self-confidence of the Scottish character had become irrevocably engaged on the wrong side, and the great majority of the active spirits were favourable to change. For men so obstinate, so self-satisfied, so intensely and enthusiastically bent on having their own way, after they had once turned out of the path of Catholic obedience, it was impossible, humanly speaking, to return to it. Error must take its course; the Scottish people must test to the very utmost the system which it had preferred to the Catholic faith; and not till the proud edifice of Presbytery had been shivered to pieces, and its ambitious discipline become a laughing-stock, would the possibility of a Catholic reaction arise.[4]

[4] Hill Burton (Hist. of Scotl. v. 204) says that Scottish Presbyterians at the present day are split up into a number of sects, all tracing their descent from the Kirk of 1580, "of which every Presbyterian communion in Scotland"—and there are some that "count their adherents by hundreds"—"professes to be the representative, and the only legitimate representative, all others who profess that title being impostors."

The head of the Scottish hierarchy, Archbishop Hamilton, of St. Andrews, was executed by order of the Regent Lennox in 1571. The last survivor of the bishops dispossessed in 1560 was James Betoun, archbishop of Glasgow; he died at Paris, in his eighty-sixth year, in 1603. Till 1623 the Scottish clergy were subjected to the jurisdiction of the archpriests of England, and afterwards to that of local prefects of the Mission. From 1653 to 1694 Church affairs were administered by three prefects-apostolic, W. Bannatyne, A. Dunbar, and J. Walker. The first vicar-apostolic was Thomas Nicholson, who was consecrated in 1695, and arrived in Scotland in 1697, finding only twenty-five priests in the whole country.

The names of twelve or thirteen Scottish noblemen are recorded in 1583, and again in 1592, as belonging to the Catholic party; the chief of these was the Earl of Huntly. The contemptible character of James VI. suggested various plots and enterprises to turbulent men of all parties during the twenty years preceding his succession to the English crown. In these affairs the Catholic party was mixed up, but with no permanent result. About 1590 the state of things was this: All the northern part of Scotland, including the counties of Inverness, Caithness, Sutherland, and Aberdeen, with Forfarshire on the east, and Wigtonshire and Nithsdale in the south, were for the most part in the interests of the Catholic party, and led by noblemen professing that faith.[1] Negotiations were opened between Huntly, Erroll, Angus, and others on the one side, and Philip II. on the other; Jesuit missionaries were the intermediaries; even after the failure of the Armada it was hoped that a Spanish army of 30,000 men might be landed on the south-west coast of Scotland, and, covered by a force of cavalry to be raised by the Scotch Catholic lords, march south into England to put down the government of Elizabeth.[2] This was known as the affair of the "blanks," because Huntly, Erroll, &c., put their names to blank sheets of paper, on the understanding that above their signatures the particulars of the enterprise should be inserted according to what might be agreed upon between the King of Spain and Fr. W. Creighton, the Jesuit rector of Louvain.

The General Assembly never ceased to press upon the Government the execution of the penal laws against Catholics. Ordinary intolerance might be passed over, but one of their proposals, made to James I. in 1608, calls for some remark. It was "that the sons of noblemen professing Popery should be committed to the custody of [such of] their friends as are sound in religion." [1] The penal legislation of England and Ireland, bad as it was, never so absolutely ignored parental authority as it was proposed to do on this occasion.[2] Among the many forms of oppression which Catholics had to bear, not the least intolerable was that was which described as "planting wise pastors." A Catholic family was compelled to give hospitality to a minister, who of course constituted himself a spy on all their movements, and was empowered to "catechize their families twice a day." (Chambers, "Domestic Annals of Scotland," i. 351.)

[1] Statement of Burghley given by Tytler in his History; quoted in the Month for January 1878.

About 1612 the Jesuits and other missionaries were very active; many conversions were made and apostasies repaired. The Government and the Protestant clergy, both Episcopalian and Presbyterian, were somewhat disturbed. Two Jesuit missioners, Fathers Moffat and Ogilvie, were arrested: the former, after a term of imprisonment, was banished; the latter, being plied with entangling questions on the Pope's deposing power by the King's order, and not answering satisfactorily, was condemned to be hanged, drawn, and quartered (1615); and the sentence was carried out. However, it is only just to the General Assembly to say that they appear to have been averse to shedding blood, especially after experience had proved that modes of persecution which just stopped short of killing them were more effectual than death itself. Banishment from Scotland, with threat of death or perpetual imprisonment in case of return, was the usual penalty both for priests and laymen. Being joined to a greater or less confiscation of property, and rigorously carried out year after year, this policy of banishment brought the Catholic party to a state of extreme weakness and distress. In 1641 Father Mambrecht was the only priest left in all the South of Scotland; whereas in England, for years before that date, the penal laws had been slackly executed, and Catholics were going openly to Mass in London down to the meeting of the Long Parliament. The same unrelenting bigotry pursued and hunted down every symptom of the revival of Catholic worship till far down in the eighteenth century. As if all truth had come into the world with John Knox, and existed not outside of their own sect, the ministers rejected with indignation the "toleration" and "liberty of conscience" preached by the Independents, and reminded the lukewarm English that their Parliament had joined in the same covenant with the Scots for the reform of religion, "with the extirpation of Popery, Prelacie, and all belonging to that hierarchie." [3] In 1685 James II. vainly besought the Scottish estates to relax the penal laws against the Catholics. He then suspended these laws by an exercise of the prerogative, brought over several Jesuits to Edinburgh, and ordered the chapel of Holyrood to be fitted up for the celebration of Mass. This transient gleam was soon extinguished by the Revolution. Under Anne the magistrates must in some places have been tolerant; for we find the General Assembly in 1713 complaining that the Catholics had set up "openly in divers places their idolatrous worship, notwithstanding the penal laws which stand in force against them." [1] With no little effrontery, considering that they and their predecessors had allowed no Catholic to live in peace in Scotland for a hundred and fifty years past, the ministers attribute to their victims "the hellish design of extirpating the Protestant religion, under the name of the Northern heresie." The son and grandson of James II., in the risings of 1715 and 1745, found great support in the more ardent loyalty of those Highland clans which had retained the ancient faith. The failure of the attempt of 1745 was disastrous to Catholic interests in Scotland. At that time, says Archbishop Strain,[2] "not only individuals, but many entire families fell away from their religion." [3] Deep inroads were made in the Catholicity of the North through the fall of many heads of clans and great landholders, whose example was usually imitated in good faith by their simple followers. "The territory inhabited by the western Celts was portioned off, like a chess-board," [3] into Catholic and Calvinist districts. In the South the resolution of those holding authority to repress any Catholic manifestation was so well known that the attempt was seldom made. There were but seven Jesuits in all Scotland when the order was suppressed. Aberdeenshire was perhaps the county in which religion was least persecuted; the noble house of Gordon (Earls of Huntly) always "gave ready shelter to priests"; and we read of "an inaccessible college of priests living like a band of robbers in the wilds of Glenlivet." [4] A storm of reviling swept over Scotland when it was announced (1778) that the Government, which the turn that events had taken in America had seriously alarmed, was bringing in a bill to relax the penal laws. A multitude of addresses, protests, declarations, and overtures, from every kirk-session, presbytery, and synod in the kingdom, poured in upon the Parliament at Westminster, in order to arrest them in their wild career. These were collected in a neat volume of 350 pages; [5] in the introduction to which the existence of an "insidious design" to tolerate Jesuits and seminary priests was deplored, and the legal safeguards were declared insecure which forbade "the very dangerous privilege of Papists' enjoying heritable property." In 1731 the Vicariate which had been established in 1694 was divided into two districts, the Lowland and Highland. A Papal rescript of 1827 erected three Vicariates—the Eastern, the Western, and the Northern. "This last arrangement remained in force till the re-establishment of the hierarchy by the Apostolic letter 'Ex supremo,' March 4, 1878." ("Cath. Dir. for Scot.")

In the article on ENGLISH CHURCH it was mentioned that the shock of the rioting and destruction at London in 1780 was more than the aged frame of Challoner could bear. Bishop Hay, vicar-apostolic for Scotland, had a rather narrow escape at the same time. He had lately completed a chapel and house, from the exterior of which, however, every mark of their ecclesiastical use was carefully banished, in Chalmers' Close, High Street, Edinburgh. In the February of 1779 the excitement against the Catholic Relief Bill was at its height. Returning from a journey the bishop found the High Street occupied by an enormous crowd. He asked a woman what it meant; she replied "Oh, sir, we are burning the Popish chapel, and we only wish we had the bishop to throw him into the fire." [1] The bishop after a time succeeded in obtaining some compensation for the property burnt and destroyed; but he did not venture to rebuild the chapel; that was only done by Bishop Cameron, three years after Dr. Hay's death, in 1814.

During the last sixty years the Catholic population of Scotland has been largely augmented by an Irish immigration, consequent on the demand for labour arising at great industrial centres like Glasgow and Paisley. In 1878 the Holy See judged in its wisdom that the time had arrived for restoring to Scotland some of those ancient sees which had been vacant for nearly three hundred years. The mitre of St. Andrews was now conferred on Bishop Strain, of the Eastern district, with the title of "Archbishop of St. Andrews and Edinburgh." The archdiocese of Glasgow, which formerly had four suffragan sees, was committed to Mgr. Eyre, translated from the Western district. The sees of Aberdeen, Dunkeld, Galloway, and Argyll, which had all been vacant since the Reformation, were resuscitated at the same time, and made suffragan to St. Andrews. To Argyll the old see of "The Isles" was annexed. The number of priests, secular and regular, having cure of souls in Scotland, is nearly 600. The Catholic population appears to number about 500,000 souls. (Bellesheim, "Hist. of the Cath. Church in Scotland," tr.; Hunter-Blair in "Cath. Enc.")

SCRUPLES. [See CONSCIENCE, p. 223.]

SCRUTINY (scrutinium). 1. An examination of those who were about to receive baptism as to their faith and dispositions. They were taught the Creed and the Lord's Prayer, exorcized, &c., during those scrutinies. The days appointed for the different scrutinies varied in different places. At Rome the Creed was given to the catechumens on the Wednesday of the fourth week in Lent (traditio symboli), and they made profession of faith (redditio symboli) on Holy Saturday. In the Roman Church, under Pope Siricius, there were apparently three scrutinies only; at a later date, seven; then, when baptism was seldom given except to infants, the number fell again to three, and from the beginning of the twelfth century—as infants were baptized soon after birth, even if there was no apprehension of death, and not, as formerly, at Easter and Pentecost—the ceremonies of the scrutiny were joined, as in our present Ritual, to the actual baptism. The Gelasian Sacramentary contains four Masses "pro scrutiniis electorum" (Chardon, 49 sqq.).

2. The term "scrutiny" is also used for the examination of a candidate for Holy Order. Though the actual term is not used by St. Cyprian, the thing is alluded to by him (Ep. xxxviii. ed. Hartel, p. 579). The ninth canon of Nicaea supposes the scrutiny to be already customary (Hefele-Leclercq, i. 587, note).

3. A third use of the term is to denote election by written ballot or by open pronouncement of the name chosen. It is the usual form for electing the Pope or other ecclesiastical official. [See ELECTION; CONCLAVE.]

SEAL OF ALTAR. [See ALTAR.]

SEAL OF CONFESSION. The obligation of keeping absolutely secret knowledge gained through sacramental confession. It rests on the natural law which binds us to keep secrets communicated in confidence, and on the ecclesiastical law, which, as we shall see, forbids, under most severe penalties, any revelation of sins confessed sacramentally. But it also arises from the positive divine law, and, as Suarez points out, the obligation of the seal is probably connatural, and belongs to the very essence of the sacrament of Penance. In other words, Christ did not impose the obligation of confessing mortal sins committed after baptism and then add a protective law binding the priest to secrecy, but the obligation of the seal follows necessarily from the nature of confession as instituted by Him; otherwise, Penance, which is the ministry of mercy and reconciliation, would become a burden intolerable to mankind. What the priest hears in sacramental confession he hears not as a mere man, but as one who stands in God's place. He must not by word, or look, or change of conduct remind the penitent himself of anything he has heard, much less convey such knowledge to others. To do so is sacrilege, excusable by no advantage to himself, to the public, or even to the penitent. The law admits of no exception, except where the penitent freely gives the confessor leave to use his knowledge. Not only sins however slight, but moral or natural weaknesses, sins of accomplices, all that may bring the penitent into trouble, or contempt, or suspicion of any sort, fall, if known through confession, under the sacramental seal. A priest might break the seal, in certain circumstances, merely by admitting that a person has confessed to him; or, again, even if there be no danger of suspicion fixing itself on any individual, by revelations which might bring bad repute or suspicion on a community or a certain number of men.

The first express mention of the seal of confession, so far as we know, occurs in Canon 20 of the Armenian Synod at Dovin, in 527. It anathematizes any priest who breaks the seal (Hefele-Leclercq, ii. 1079). In the West, there is no mention of penalties for breaking the seal till very late; probably because such a sacrilege was scarcely thought possible. There is a decree attributed to Pope Gregory (as Morinus conjectures, Gregory VII.), and quoted by the Master of the Sentences and Gratian (Can. "Sacerdos," 2, causa 33, q. 3, dist. 6), which sentences a confessor guilty of this crime to deposition and to perpetual and ignominious pilgrimage. The Fourth Lateran Council ("Extra. de Poenit. et Remiss."; Const. "Omnis utriusque sexus") condemns such a priest to deposition and perpetual imprisonment in a monastery. The sanctity of the seal is further recognized by all the Oriental sects (Denzinger, "Rit. Orient." vol. i. p. 101), and their canon law threatens with the most severe punishments those who break it. True, a law of Peter the Great requires Russian confessors to reveal the confessions of those who are guilty of treason or of palming off fictitious miracles, unless they desist; but such a law only proves how completely the Russian church has become the slave of the State.

Whether in English law, confession made to a priest is privileged, is a matter of some doubt. Serjt. Badeley ("The Privilege of Religious Confessions in English Courts of Justice") maintains the affirmative. The whole question is well discussed by R. S. Nolan in "Cath. Enc." He quotes Phillimore ("Ecclesiastical Law") as saying: "When this question is again raised in an English Court of Justice that court will decide it in favour of the inviolability of the confession." In the United States the position at common law is the same as in England. But some of the States have made the privilege a matter of Statute Law.

In one respect, modern are stricter than mediaeval theologians with respect to the seal. St. Thomas ("Suppl." q. 11, a. 1, ad 3) says an abbot who knows from the confession of his prior that the office is an occasion of ruin to him may, on some excuse, relieve him of his office, if he will not resign it willingly, provided always there is no danger of the confession being revealed. According to St. Alphonsus ("Theol. Moral." lib. vi. n. 656), this is the docrine of St. Bonaventure and Alexander of Hales, but he adds that it can on no account be put in practice, and this seems to be certain from the eleventh of the Propositions condemned in 1682 by Innocent XI. (Ferraris, Sigillum Confessionis; De Lugo, "De Poenitentia," disp. 23; Ballerini, "Theol. Mor." vol. v. p. 486 sqq.)

SECRET. Either secreta, neut. pl., "secret things," or secreta oratio, a prayer or prayers said by the celebrant in a low voice, which cannot be heard except by himself, after the Offertory and before the Preface. Hence, in some old Missals it is entitled "Super oblata."

The Reformers objected to the practice of saying the Secrets and nearly all the Canon inaudibly, and great disputes on the matter arose in the French church at the beginning of the eighteenth century. About 1709, when the Missal was revised for the diocese of Meaux at the order of Bishop Bissy (five years later Cardinal), the new addition appeared with an "Amen," preceded by an ℟ in red, at the end of the different prayers in the Canon; and the Rubric requiring the prayers to be said "in a low voice" (submissa voce) was explained by the additional clause—"i.e. without singing" (i.e. sine cantu). The chapter (Jan. 29, 1710) and the bishop (in a mandement two or three days later) repudiated all complicity in the change, and the copies of the Missal were again corrected by episcopal authority. But the innovation of saying the Secrets and Canon aloud, which had been previously condemned by Savary, bishop of Séez, in a mandement of 1698, was eagerly defended and adopted by a number of priests secular and regular, and this number was constantly increasing in Le Brun's time. This great scholar has written an elaborate treatise on the subject, which forms the eighth volume of his "Explication de la Messe." The following are the chief points which he establishes:—

(1) The Meaning of the Word "Secreta."—Bossuet ("Explic. des Prières de la Messe," n. 2) suggested that the word came from secretio, as missa from missio, &c., either because said over the oblations, which were then separated from the rest of the bread offered, or because said after the separation of the catechumens from the faithful. This derivation, adopted as certain by Vert, is proved false by Le Brun. Neither secretio nor secernere is used for the dismissal of catechumens. Besides, the adjective sense of secreta—i.e. "secret"—is fixed by the ancient Sacramentary of Bobbio and the Ordo Romanus, which have "collectio secreta," "dicta oratione secreta," and by the old liturgical writers—e.g. Amalarius, who says: "Secreta nominatur quia secreto dicitur."

(2) The present Discipline of the Church makes it unlawful for any celebrant (except bishops in the Mass of Ordination) to say the Secrets or Canon audibly. The Council of Trent (sess. xxii. De Sacr. Miss.) approves the custom of saying some parts of the Mass in a "more elevated," others in a low voice, and (canon 9) anathematizes those who assert that such a custom is "to be condemned." The French innovators explained away these words, as we have already seen. But both Sarpi and Pallavicino understand the Council to mean secret prayer, inaudible to others; so did St. Charles; so do the most celebrated commentators on the Rubrics, Gavantus and Quarti. Lastly, there is an authoritative interpretation of the words submissa voce in the Roman Missal prescribed by Pius V. The priest is to say the secret prayers so low as not to be heard by those around (Rub. Gen. a. 16). This settles the question of practice. Ecclesiastics are free to think as they please on the historical question about the date at which the usage began; but they must keep the law as it stands.

(3) The Antiquity of the Usage.—Cardinal Bona believed that the Secrets and Canon were said audibly till the tenth century. His reason was that the faithful used to answer "Amen" after the words of Consecration, and that Florus, who lived in the ninth century, is the last writer who mentions this response. That the people did answer "Amen" after the Consecration is an unquestionable fact; but there is no reason to believe that they did, and many weighty reasons for thinking that they did not, do so immediately after the words of consecration were uttered. Neither in the old Gallican Missal edited by Thomasius, nor in the first Ordo Romanus, nor in any of the Missals older than the twelfth century examined by Le Brun, is any "Amen" marked till after the "Per omnia saecula saeculorum" which ends the Canon and precedes the Pater Noster. All the Oriental liturgies distinguish the prayers to be said aloud from those which are uttered in an undertone. True, the modern Greeks say the words of consecration in a loud voice, but this custom was introduced by a constitution of Justinian (Novella 132, cap. 6, quoted by Le Brun), and even now the Greeks say the rest of the Canon in an undertone. Add to all this that the Canon of the Mass was never committed to writing in the first four centuries; that St. Cyril of Alexandria ("In Joann." lib. xii. apud Le Brun) speaks of the doors of the sanctuary which were closed, St. Chrysostom of the curtain drawn during the Consecration; and we shall scarcely doubt that Le Brun is right in claiming immemorial antiquity for our present use. We may quote, in conclusion, two other authorities. Martène, in a letter to Le Brun (March 27, 1726), tells him he has treated the question in a manner which leaves no room for reply, and he says Mabillon, who was his master, always held that the Canon had never been said audibly in the Latin Church. The names of Mabillon, Martène, and Le Brun are probably the very greatest which could be adduced in such a controversy. Nor can any valid objection be made on general grounds to the practice of the Church. It is fitting in every way that the priest, in these solemn moments, should speak in the ears of God alone, and that the faithful should meditate in reverent silence on that great mystery of our redemption which is represented, continued, and applied in the sacrifice of the Mass. (See, in addition to the works mentioned, Fortescue, "The Mass," 311.)

SECRET, DISCIPLINE OF THE. [See DISCIPLINE OF THE SECRET.]

SECRET SOCIETIES. In the technical sense, a secret society is one which (1) plots against the Church or State; (2) binds its members upon oath not to reveal any of its proceedings; (3) requires blind obedience to the orders of the heads; (4) has a ritual of initiation, &c., simulating Christian rites. It is clear that such a society is forbidden by the Church. [See FREEMASONRY.] On the other hand, it is not always easy to decide whether some given society (e.g. the Oddfellows, the Good Templars, the Foresters) comes under this condemnation. A society may disclaim all intention of plotting against Church or State, and all profane imitation of sacred rites; and it may point out that secrecy and obedience are necessary for the success of their proceedings, and do not involve any violation of the moral or civil law. Each society must be judged on its own merits, care especially being taken to inquire into the quasi-religious character of the ceremonies. The third Council of Baltimore (no. 253) declares: "We see no reason why the prohibition of the Church against the Masonic and other secret societies should be extended to organizations of working men, which have no other object in view than mutual protection and aid for their members in the practice of their trades. Care must be taken, however, that nothing be admitted under any pretext which favours condemned societies; or that the working men who belong to these organizations be induced, by the cunning arts of wicked men, to withhold, contrary to the laws of justice, the labour due from them, or in any other manner violate the rights of their employers. Those associations are also entirely illicit in which the members are so bound for mutual defence that danger of riots and murders is the outcome." (See Fanning in "Cath. Enc."; Stevens, "Cyclopaedia of Fraternities"; Rosen, "The Cath. Church and Secret Societies.")

SECULAR CLERGY (saeculum, the world). From St. Cyprian downwards, the terms saeculum, saecularis were habitually used by Christian writers to express the world outside the Church, and the spirit of that world. In proportion as the monastic institution grew and spread itself, the contrast between the cloister or the cell and life outside of these was more vividly realised, and when the profession of Christianity had become general the contrast was no longer between saeculum and ecclesia, but between the secular or worldly and the monastic or regular life. To the clergy of all ranks and orders serving Christ in the world, not bound by vows or by a rule of life, the term "secular" seems to have been first applied in the twelfth century. Honorius II. (1125) permitted the monks of Cluny to give their habit to secular clerks who desired to join them; laicos, seu clericos saeculares . . . ad conversionem suscipere.[1] (Ducange, Saeculum.)

SECULARIZATION. This term may be applied to persons or things. (1) In the former sense it means the authorization given to religious to live in the "world" outside their order. The person remains a religious still bound by his vows. Generally speaking, however, secularization is synonymous with dispensation from vows, whereby the person becomes no longer a religious. Both secularization and dispensation must be carefully distinguished from expulsion or dismissal, which are penal measures. Stringent regulations regarding secularization and dispensation from vows have been laid down by a decree of June 15, 1909 (S.C. of Regular Discipline). (Boudinhon, in "Cath. Enc."; Vermeersch, "De Relig. Inst. et Personis.")

(2) As applied to things, secularization is the extinction of the title by which property, whether real or personal, is held by the Church, and the placing of that property at the disposal of the secular power. It is obvious that such extinction of title cannot justly take effect except with the consent of the Holy See, as representing the whole Church. Historically, such consent has seldom been asked or obtained; the utmost concession to equity that civil governments are accustomed to make in such a case is to enter into a treaty with the Holy See for regulating the compensation, generally a most inadequate one, awarded to the clergy, secular or regular, whose property has been secularized. This has been done [CONCORDAT] in France, Austria, and Catholic countries generally. In England, Ireland, Sweden, Denmark, Holland, and Portugal no compensation for the expropriation of Church property has ever been made.

The principal European secularizations have taken place in the following order: Sweden, 1527; England, 1534–8; Denmark, 1536; North Germany, 1521–1648; France, 1790. In Germany the great secularization took place in 1803, when the territories of the three ecclesiastical Electors, the Prince-Archbishops of Cologne, Mayence, and Trèves, with those of an immense number of bishops and convents, were apportioned among the German sovereigns as indemnity for the loss which the Empire had sustained at the Peace of Lunéville, through the cession of the left bank of the Rhine to France. Spain, 1835–1836; Italy, 1851–1882; France, 1880–1906; Portugal, 1911. [See CHURCH PROPERTY; CHURCH OF FRANCE, &c.]

SEDILIA. The seats in the sanctuary or choir occupied by the priest and his ministers.

SEGNATURA, SIGNATURA. In the early Middle Ages, as petitions to Rome increased in number, certain officials were appointed to examine and report upon them. These were called "Referendarii Apostolici." They are mentioned by Innocent IV. The brief in reply was called "signatura" (Ducange). As the petitions naturally fell into two classes, viz. requests for favours or justice, Alexander VI. divided the officials into two bodies, those belonging to the Signatura of Grace and those to the Signatura of Justice. The former gradually disappeared. The latter was a real tribunal, and received fresh organization from Gregory XVI. in 1834.

By the Apostolic Constitution "Sapienti Consilio" (June 29, 1908), Pius X. made the Signatura one of the three tribunals of the Roman Curia, the others being the Penitentiaria and the Rota (q.v.). It consists of six cardinals, one of whom is the prefect, and a number of subordinate officials. It is a sort of court of appeal from the decisions of the Rota, and is sometimes appointed for special purposes. (Ojetti in "Cath. Enc." Roman Curia, with bibliography there given.)

SEMIARIANS. [See ARIUS, p. 50.]

SEMIDOUBLE. [See FEASTS.]

SEMINARY. A school or college for the training of young persons destined for the priesthood. Under the headings SCHOOLS and UNIVERSITIES will be found some account of the methods employed by the Church to impart this training, and to adapt it to the changing circumstances of European society, in the primitive times and during the Middle Ages. In the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries the university system was greatly extended; faculties of theology were everywhere erected in them; and the old monastic or cathedral schools, of the success of which Bec, Fleury, York, Rheims, and Cologne had given brilliant examples, fell into decay. In the sixteenth century many of the existing universities, coming altogether under Protestant influences, were lost to the Church; and even in the remainder a spirit of disaffection or doubt was rife, which made them ill adapted to nourish and protect that pure and peaceful ecclesiastical temper in which it is so desirable that the future servants of the sanctuary should be reared. The Fathers of Trent, comprehending in their full bearing the difficulties and confusions of the time, and providing with equal piety and wisdom the suitable remedies, resolved that, so far as in them lay, no Catholic diocese should in future be without regular and permanent means for supplying itself from generation to generation with pastors carefully trained to meet its spiritual needs. They accordingly ordered that the metropolitan of every province, and the bishop of every diocese, should establish at some suitable place (if there were no institution of the kind already existing) a college or seminary, into which a certain number of boys of not less than twelve years of age, born in wedlock, able to read and write, and giving some promise of perseverance in the service of the Church, should be admitted. The sons of poor parents were to be preferred; but the rich, provided that they paid their own expenses, were not to be excluded. The tonsure was to be given, and the ecclesiastical dress to be worn from the very first. All branches of study—such as the ecclesiastical chant, the ritual, the administration of sacraments, and especially what relates to the tribunal of Penance—which contribute to form a well-instructed priest, were to be taught to the students; besides, of course, Holy Scripture and theology. The rule aut disce aut discede was to be strictly enforced. The management of the seminary was to be in the hands of the bishop and two of the senior canons. On the important question of "ways and means" the Council was full and precise, ordering that the prebends of canons and the revenues of ecclesiastical benefices of every description should be taxed to the extent required for the sustentation of the institution. Two poor dioceses might unite to found one seminary; and a rich diocese might found more than one within its own limits (sess. xxiii. cap. 18).

The wish of the Council was but partially fulfilled. In France seminaries arose in every direction before the Revolution; the fame of St. Sulpice, founded by M. Olier about 1650, became European; but the Revolution swept away everything. After the Restoration most of these were refounded, but were once more confiscated in 1906–7. In Germany various obstacles have all along impeded the execution of the Council's decree. The usual practice has been for clerical students to pass two or three years at a university, and afterwards one year or even less in an episcopal seminary, to acquire special professional knowledge. Of this mode of meeting the exigencies of the problem, so different from that appointed by the Council, Pius VII., in a brief dated August 10, 1819, expressed his disapprobation. Recently, we believe, the German bishops have made great advances towards the introduction of the seminary system. In Ireland, besides the great seminary of Maynooth, there are a number of diocesan seminaries and diocesan colleges, the ecclesiastical students from which go up to Maynooth to receive their final preparation for the priesthood. In England four dioceses have seminaries in the strict sense (Liverpool, Leeds, Birmingham, and Southwark). Blairs (Aberdeen) serves for a number of dioceses. There are also a number of diocesan colleges, in which a certain number of ecclesiastical students are educated for the priesthood.

In recent years a large number of well-equipped seminaries have been founded in the United States, e.g. at Baltimore, New York, Rochester, Philadelphia, Milwaukee, &c., besides the provision made for higher theological studies at Washington University and elsewhere.

The training of the clergy in seminaries engaged the attention especially of Leo XIII. and Pius X. The former prescribed the study of St. Thomas's philosophy, and encouraged historical research and Biblical studies. Pius interested himself more particularly in the well-being of Italian seminaries, and indirectly suggested regulations for the guidance of bishops in other countries. Recognizing the impossibility of maintaining efficient seminaries in small dioceses, he directed that, in accordance with the decree of Trent, such dioceses should combine together to form central or interdiocesan seminaries. He drew up a programme of studies for Gymnasium, Lyceum, and Theology courses, corresponding with our Humanities, Philosophy, and Theology. The first course should be conducted in such a way "that students may obtain recognized certificates which will be useful to them in case they should adopt some other state of life. Such certificates are also likely to prove of advantage to those whom God may be pleased to call to the priesthood."

The Secretary to the Congregation of Bishops and Regulars explained the purpose of this. "Our students cannot as a rule decide whether they have a vocation to the ecclesiastical state until they have reached a certain age. If any, therefore, should change their mind, their clerical education would not be an obstacle to the choice of a professional career. They could secure diplomas required by law and thus be more free in their choice of a state of life."

This most wise provision should be carefully noted, as it applies not only to Italy, but also to non-Catholic countries. The Lyceum course is to occupy three years. An intermediate year is to be devoted to "Propaedeutics": that is, introduction to Theology, Church History, and the Bible. The theological course is to last four years.

On the occasion of his golden jubilee, Pius addressed to the clergy of the whole world an exhortation setting forth the ideal priestly life which all should strive after (August 4th, 1908). (See Bargilliart, "De Institutione Clericorum"; Micheletti, "De Institutione Clericorum in Sacris Seminariis," "De Ratione Studiorum in S. Seminairis"; Taunton; Hogan, "Clerical Studies"; Schneider, "Manuale Clericorum.")

SEMIPELAGIANISM. A heresy which arose from reaction against the doctrine of St. Augustine on grace and predestination. The Semipelagians did not go so far as Pelagius, and they held their errors, so far as can be known, without any intention of rejecting Catholic doctrine. They were not considered heretics; on the contrary, St. Augustine and St. Prosper speak of them as "brethren," "holy men," &c., though their doctrine was undoubtedly heretical. Contention arose among the monks of Adrumetum, occasioned by Augustine's letter to Sixtus, priest, afterwards bishop, of Rome in 418. To these monks Augustine in 426 addressed two letters ("Ad Valentin. Abbat. et Monach. Adrumet.") and sent along with them his little work "On Grace and Free-will," and afterwards another "De Correptione et Gratia" (PL, xliv. 881 sqq., 915 sqq.), which Cardinal Noris calls the key to the whole doctrine of the saint. But in the following year St. Augustine had to write to Vitalis, "a certain learned man in the Carthaginian church," who held that "right belief in God and assent to the Gospel was not the gift of God but of ourselves—that is, from our own will" (August. "Ep. ad Vital." ad init., PL, xxxiii. 978). Here we have Semipelagianism appearing in a definite form. Further, Augustine learnt from the letters of Prosper and Hilarius that his book "De Correptione et Gratia" had met with great opposition among the monks of Marseilles. These letters are extant, and give a very clear and coherent account of the Semipelagian tenets, which are often called the heresy of the Massilienses. The monks objected to the Augustinian doctrine that the number of the elect was absolutely fixed by the decree of God. They made predestination the mere foreknowledge of God that some would, others would not persevere. They also held that God allowed some infants to die without baptism, some adults without hearing the Gospel, only because He knew they would have made no use of these graces had they been offered. Again, admitting that "all mankind perished in Adam and could not be freed from that state by their own free will," that "no one was able in his own strength to begin, much less to finish, any [good] work," they still maintained that the wish to be healed, the beginning of faith, "if not entire faith," must proceed from the good use of the natural faculties. Christ was the physician, but the desire to be healed by Him was natural and human. "To that grace through which we are new-born in Christ, man comes by natural power, by seeking, asking, knocking." Lastly, they denied that God gave not only the power to persevere but also perseverance itself ("ut eis perseverantia ipsa donetur"). These two letters, from which the words in inverted commas are taken, are eminently trustworthy, for they speak of the Massilienses not only with courtesy but even with reverence. St. Augustine replied by sending his two books, "De Predestinatione Sanctorum" and "De Dono Perseverantiae," written in 428 or 429 (PL, xliv. 959 sqq., 993 sqq.). It was at this time that Cassian finished the writing of his "XXIV. Conferences" (begun in 423, finished in 428). He had come to Provence about 509, and, having been ordained priest, founded two monasteries, one for men, the other for women. He is regarded as the founder of the celebrated abbey of St. Victor at Marseilles, and is said to have had 5000 monks under him. His "Conferences" ("Collationes") have always had a high reputation in the Church. But in them we find Semipelagianism in its most developed and offensive form. "Not only," says Petavius ("De Pelag. et Semipelag. Haer." cap. vii.), "did he attribute the beginning of good-will to the will of man, but even ascribed to it remarkable and heroic virtues." Thus, in Collat. xiii. cap. 14, he supposes that God "withdrew His hand" from Job and left him to obtain an actual victory over Satan in his own strength. So he asserts (ib.) that the centurion's faith which Christ praises (Mt. viii.) was due to his natural efforts; else, he says, Christ would not have praised it, and would have said, not "I have not found such faith in Israel." but "I have not given such faith in Israel." Cassian was attacked by St. Prosper in his "Liber adversus Collatorem," written about 432 or rather later. It is specially directed against Conference xiii., already referred to.

Before this, in 431, Pope Celestine, appealed to by Prosper and Hilarius, had addressed a letter of capital importance to Venerius, bishop of Marseilles, and the other bishops of Gaul. The Pope, though he speaks of St. Augustine as one whom previous Popes had always reckoned "among the best masters," carefully abstains from insisting on many points in the Augustinian doctrine of grace and predestination which had been regarded, and most naturally, as "hard sayings" by the Semipelagians. But he teaches emphatically (1) that "the will is prepared by God"; that "every holy thought, good counsel, movement of the will comes from God"; that only through His grace we "begin to will and to do any good"; that He acts in us in order "that we may do and will what He wills"; (2) that "no one, except through Christ, can use his free will aright"; that none can overcome temptation "save through God's daily help"; (3) that "we must refer final perseverance to the grace of Christ." These statements, he adds, are enough; while he does not despise, he declines to enter on the "deeper and harder parts of the questions which present themselves." (Celest. "Ad Episc. Gall." ep. 21.)

The controversy entered on its last stage about 475. The Predestinationist heresy appeared for the first time in the persons of Lucidus, a priest, and a certain Monimus of Africa. We have little accurate information about these heretics. Lucidus seems to have denied free will, and to have held that men were lost by no will of their own and simply because they were reprobate by the divine decree. He was opposed by Faustus, abbot of Lerins, and afterwards bishop of Riez, and submitted after he had been condemned by two councils at Arles and Lyons (probably in 475; see Hefele-Leclercq, ii. 908). But Faustus, in his two books "De Gratia Dei et Humanae Mentis Libero Arbitrio," showed himself a Semipelagian, and Scythian monks laid the matter before Pope Hormisdas and then before Fulgentius of Ruspe and other African bishops who had taken refuge in Sardinia, and who anathematized Faustus in 523. Fulgentius refuted Faustus in three books, "De Veritate Praedestinationis et Gratiae Dei." The Catholic doctrine was defended in France by Avitus of Vienne and Caesarius of Arles (d. 542). In 529, the Synod of Orange (Arausio), in South Gaul, gave the final blow to Semipelagianism. Although only a provincial council, it possesses the highest dogmatic authority, for it was confirmed by Pope Boniface II. It defines that man can neither "believe, will, desire, attempt, labour, watch, strive, seek, ask, knock" "as it behoves him" (can. 6), or even "think any good thing which pertains to the salvation of eternal life" (can. 7), "by the strength of nature" and "without God's grace." "No one has aught of his own, except lying and sin" (can. 22). On the other hand, the Council teaches that the free will of fallen man is not destroyed, but "perverted and weakened"; "A reward is due to good works, but grace, which is not due, comes first, that the works may be done" (can. 18); "Men do their own will, not God's, when they do that which displeases God" (can. 23); "That some are predestined to evil by divine power we not only disbelieve, but also, if there are any who believe so horrible a thing, we say anathema to them with all detestation" (Denzinger-Bannwart, 174-200).

(The great authority on the history of Semipelagianism is Cardinal Noris, "Historia Pelagiana." See also Petavius, in the work cited in the text. The chief sources are the works of Augustine (PL, xliv.), Prosper, and Fulgentius mentioned above.)

SEMPRINGHAM, ORDER OF. This order was founded by Gilbert, the priest of Sempringham in Lincolnshire, about 1135, for both men and women. The rule for the women was that of Benedictine nuns, that of the men was the same as that followed by Austin canons; in either case St. Gilbert added particular statutes of his own. The habit of a Gilbertine canon was a black cassock with a white cloak over it, and a hood lined with lambskin. At his death in 1189 St. Gilbert left thirteen houses of his order, of which nine were double, and the others for men only. In the double monasteries the only common portion was the church, and in that the nuns and canons could neither see nor hear each other; the other buildings were placed at a considerable distance apart. Robert Mannyng, the well-known author of one of the old English "Rhyming Chronicles," was a member of this order.

At the Dissolution, the following twenty-five Gilbertine houses were suppressed:—

SEPTUAGESIMA. [See QUINQUAGESIMA.]

SEPTUAGINT. By this name is known the first Greek translation of the Bible, made at Alexandria, about B.C. 286-284. The various more or less fabulous stories concerning its origin are all founded upon a Greek letter purporting to be written by one Aristeas, an alleged partaker in the transaction. According to Aristeas, "the Athenian Demetrius Phalereus induced the Egyptian king, Ptolemy Philadelphus, to have a Greek translation prepared of the Jewish Book of the Law. By buying the freedom of the whole of the Jewish bondsmen in Egypt for a sum of more than 1000 talents be assured for himself the favour of the Jews. He then requested the high priest, by means of an embassy in which Aristeas took part, to send him men learned in both languages and suitable for the translation, six out of each tribe. The high priest sent the number of men asked for, together with a Hebrew codex written in golden characters. These persons were highly honoured by the king; they completed the translation in seventy-two days, working together at it in a beautiful building on the shores of the island of Pharos. Demetrius wrote down the translation as soon as they agreed on any portion of it. Then Demetrius convoked an assembly of the Jews, and read out the translation in their presence and in that of the translators, and it found general approval. The Jews asked Demetrius to let their principal men have a copy of this translation of the law, and to utter an anathema on any who should venture to alter anything in it. The king was highly rejoiced at the success of the work, and, commanding Demetrius to take particular care for its preservation, dismissed the translators to their homes with rich presents" (Venables' translation of Bleek's "Introduction to the Old Testament," ii. p. 396). This groundwork was successively embellished by Philo ("De Vita Mosis," l. 2, §§ 5–7), Josephus ("Ant." xii. 2); Justin Martyr ("Cohort. ad Graecos," c. xiii., PG, vi. 265), who adds that the seventy translators worked in seventy different cells, had no communication with one another, and yet translated every passage in the same words without the slightest difference. Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, Augustine, and others repeat Justin's narrative with but slight variations. The fundamental fact of Aristeas' letter, viz. the translation of the Bible into Greek under Ptolemy Philadelphus, is corroborated by the testimony of Aristobulus, who wrote about a century after the event (Clement of Alex. "Strom." i. p. 342, and Eusebius, "Praep. Evang." ix. 6, xiii. 12). The genuineness of Aristobulus is almost universally admitted, whereas the letter of Aristeas is almost universally regarded as spurious. The reader will find the question fully debated in Humphry Hody's "De Bibliorum textibus originalibus, versionibus Graecis et Latina Vulgata," Oxford, 1705, and in Van Dale's "Dissertatio super Arietea de LXX interpretibus," etc., Amsterdam, 1705, or in the "Introd. to the Old Testament" by Bleek, Keil, etc. After sifting the evidence at hand, Bleek comes to the following conclusions as to the real origin of the Septuagint: (a) probably the translation of the Book of the Law was put in hand by Ptolemy Philadelphus and carried on by Demetrius Phalereus in particular, as stated by Aristobulus; (b) we have no ground for assuming that this translation embraced any books of the Old Testament besides the Pentateuch; (c) it may be assumed as certain that the Pentateuch was then for the first time translated into Greek; (d) the character of the translation decidedly points out that the translators belonged to Egypt and not to Palestine, and certainly that they were not those whom the high priest expressly sent to Egypt with a codex of the Law for this purpose. The other books of the Old Testament were also translated in Egypt, some time before 133 B.C., by various authors. A variety of translators may be inferred, both from the different character of the translation in different books, and also from certain perpetually recurring variations. These translations differ in important respects from our Hebrew Bibles. It is not only that we meet with various readings, often strongly commended by internal evidence, but we find certain sections present in the Greek and wanting in the Hebrew, and vice versa. These differences are most striking in the books of Samuel and Kings, in Proverbs, and in Jeremiah, in the last of which no fewer than 2,700 words of the Hebrew have nothing answering to them in the Greek. It cannot always be decided whether the translators had a different text before them, or whether they themselves ventured sometimes to make additions and alterations, or whether the translation afterwards underwent change. The Jews considered the LXX as an authentic and even inspired version of their Sacred Books and used it even for doctrinal purposes. Philo and Josephus, and the writers of the New Testament, constantly quote it instead of the Hebrew original. It was read out and explained in the Alexandrian and Hellenistic synagogues. This reverence lasted until the Jews returned to the study of Hebrew, when by degrees it gave place to a pronounced aversion. In the Christian Church the LXX retained a higher and more continuous authority. Most of the Fathers held it as equally inspired with the Hebrew text, e.g. St. Irenaeus (iii. 25), Clement of Alexandria ("Strom." i. 22), St. Augustine ("De Civ. Dei," xviii. 43, PL, xli. 604: "The same spirit who was in the prophets when they spoke was in the seventy men when they interpreted the prophets"). Origen, however, and still more St. Jerome, discriminate between the text and the version, and in cases of discrepancy give the preference to the original. In the Greek Church the LXX has retained its authority to the present day, whereas in the Latin Church it has been superseded by the Vulgate of St. Jerome. For its critical value see VULGATE, p. 863. (Johannes Bleek, "Introd. to the Old Testament," § 342; Keil, "Introd." § 175; Ewald, "History of Israel," transl. by Carpenter, vol. v. p. 249; Stanley, "The Jewish Church," § 47; Swete, "Introd. to the Old Testament in Greek," "The Old Testament in Greek according to the Septuagint.")

SEQUENCE. A rhythm sometimes sung between the Epistle and Gospel; also called a "prose," because not in any regular metre. At first, the sequence was merely a prolongation of the last note of the Alleluia after the Epistle (farcing), till, to avoid the wearisome effect of such a prolongation, words, appropriate to the occasion, were substituted. Notker, a monk of St. Gall, who wrote about 880, is generally said to have been the first writer of sequences; but he himself tells us, in his preface, that he had seen some verses for the notes of the sequence in an Antiphonary which a priest brought him from Jumièges, a Benedictine abbey five leagues from Rouen. Many mediaeval Missals have sequences for every feast and Sunday, and they were made in such number and so carelessly that the Carthusians and Cistercians were praised for not admitting any of them. In the revision of the Roman Missal in the sixteenth century, only four sequences were retained: "Victimae Paschali," at Easter (attributed to Wipso, chaplain to Conrad II., eleventh century); "Veni, Sancte Spiritus," at Pentecost (attributed to Robert, king of France, d. 1031); "Lauda, Sion," at Corpus Christi (by St. Thomas of Aquin); the "Dies Irae" in Masses of the Dead (by Thomas of Celano, d. circ. 1250). A fifth prose, "Stabat Mater," by Jacopone da Todi, on the two feasts of the Seven Dolours, must have been added very recently, since neither Le Brun nor Benedict XIV. recognizes it. Other sequences are found in the Missals of religious orders—e.g. one for the Feast of the Holy Name in that of the Franciscans. The Lyons Missal, in use till a few years ago, is rich in sequences, some very beautiful. "The sequence is peculiar to the Roman and its derived rites. Neither Milan nor the Mozarabic liturgy, still less the Eastern liturgies, know it." (See Fortescue, "The Mass," p. 272 sqq.; Neale, "Sequentiae ex Missalibus"; Dreves, "Ein Jahrtausend Lateinischer Hymnendichtung.")

SERVITES. The order of the "Religious Servants of the Holy Virgin," commonly called the Servites, was founded in 1233 by seven Florentine merchants, whose names were Monaldi, Manetti, Amidei, Lantella, Uguccioni, Sostegni, and Falconieri. The last named, Alexis Falconieri, who lived to be 110 years old, was uncle of St. Juliana Falconieri, whom Hélyot regards as the foundress of the Servite Third Order (1306). The seven founders, who were already members of a confraternity instituted to sing the praises of Our Lady, being assembled in their chapel on the festival of the Assumption, 1233, were conscious of a common internal admonition that they should renounce the world. They began by selling their goods and distributing the price to the poor; then, having found a mean house outside the city, they took up their abode there, living in great austerity and continual prayer, and, with the consent of the bishop, Ardinghi, begging their bread in the streets. Entering the city one day to ask the bishop's blessing and counsel, they are said to have been greeted by infants in their mothers' arms with cries of "See the servants of the Virgin"; and the name thus given has adhered to them ever since. After a while they removed to Monte Senario, three leagues from Florence, and built a convent on the top of the mountain, which was for centuries the chief seat of their institute. Monaldi was their first superior; St. Philip Benizi, who joined the order in consequence of a vision and became the fifth general (1267), propagated it exceedingly, and saved it from the ruin with which it was threatened in 1276, when Innocent V. wished to suppress it, as coming under the prohibition of the Council of Lyons against the multiplication of religious orders. The habit finally adopted by the Servites was black, with a leather girdle, a scapular, and a cape. They took the rule of St. Augustine, adding to it many particular constitutions. After a period of uncertainty, the pontificate of Honorius IV. witnessed the first of a series of Papal confirmations and graces conferred on this order, culminating in the celebrated constitution "Mare Magnum" (1487), whereby Innocent VIII., confirming all former grants, bestowed on the Servites equal privileges and prerogatives with those enjoyed by the other four mendicant orders—viz. the Franciscans, the Dominicans, the Augustinian Hermits, and the Carmelites. So rapidly did the order spread that at the death of the last of the seven founders, Alexis Falconieri, it numbered over 10,000 religious, besides nuns, distributed into more than twenty provinces. Its strength lay chiefly in Italy and Germany; in England it had no houses before the Reformation. Among its distinguished members may be named—besides the seven founders, who have all been canonized, and St. Philip Benizi—the B. Piccolomini of Siena, the learned Ferrari, Francis Patrizzi, Latiosi, &c. Fra Paolo Sarpi, theologian and counsellor to the Republic of Venice, belonged to this order [see TRENT, COUNCIL OF]. The number of Servite houses revived in various countries since the French Revolution is considerable. The second order of Servites consists of cloistered nuns, who have convents in various parts of the world. The "Mantellate" are the Servite third order of nuns. There is also a third order for men and women in the world. (Ledoux, "Hist. des Sept Saints Fondateurs"; Soulier, "Vie de S. Philippe Benizi"; Lepicier, "Sainte Julienne Falconieri").

SERVUS SERVORUM DEI. The servant of the servants of God. Thomassin seems to say[1] that the phrase was first employed by St. Desiderius, bishop of Cahors, and then adopted by the Roman Pontiffs. But a comparison of dates precludes this supposition, for St. Desiderius became bishop only in 630—i.e. twenty-five years after the death of St. Gregory the Great, who had frequently used the phrase at the commencement of his letters.[2] St. Gregory had objected strongly to the title of Universal Bishop, or Oecumenical Patriarch, which John, the patriarch of Constantinople, had assumed; if any new title was needed for the Vicar of Christ, it should be one which likened him still more to the lowliness of Jesus, who "came not to be ministered unto, but to minister." (Mt. xx. 28.)

SEVEN DOLOURS. [See DOLOURS OF B.V.M.]

SEVEN GIFTS OF THE HOLY SPIRIT. They are, according to St. Thomas (1^a 2^{ae}, q. 68), certain gifts bestowed upon the just in order that they may promptly follow the instinct and movement of the Holy Ghost. He appeals to the authority of Scripture—viz. Isa. xi. 2, where we are told that seven gifts of the Spirit are to rest upon the Messiah. "And the Spirit of the Lord will rest upon him; the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and strength, the spirit of knowledge and piety, and the spirit of the fear of the Lord will fill him." Even, says St. Thomas, when the soul of man is perfected by the moral and the theological virtues, he still needs to be moved and led by the Holy Spirit, and the Seven Gifts enable him to follow this movement promptly. All this, however, is mere speculation, for the Scotists deny that there is any real distinction between the gifts and the corresponding virtues.

Next, although the Fathers generally (so, e.g., Ambrose, "De Sp. S." lib. i. 16, PL, xvi. 740; August. in Ps. cl., PL, xxxvii. 1960; Greg. "Moral." i. 27) enumerate the seven gifts of the Spirit, just as St. Thomas does, this is because they followed the LXX or Vulgate instead of the original.[3] Both the LXX and Vulgate render the same Hebrew words "fear of the Lord" (יִרְאַת יי) in two ways, first by "piety," then by "fear of the Lord." In the Hebrew the words simply are, "The Spirit of Jehovah shall rest upon him; the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and strength, the spirit of knowledge and the fear of Jehovah, and his delight[1] shall be in the fear of Jehovah." It was probably from mere wish to avoid repetition that the LXX varied their rendering, and Jerome may have been unwilling to restore a mere literal rendering, since the enumeration of the seven gifts, based on the LXX and Old Latin, was already recognized in the Church. It is possible, however, to find seven gifts (on the analogy of Zach. iii. 9, Apoc. iv. 5, v. 6) even in the original. The Spirit of the Lord seems most naturally to mean the Divine Spirit itself, from which the six following gifts descend. But the "Spirit of the Lord" may be itself a special gift, and this view is represented by the Chaldee Targum, which has, "The spirit of prophecy shall rest upon him; the spirit of wisdom and understanding," &c. SHROUD, THE HOLY (σινδών, sindon). The "clean linen cloth" in which Our Lord was wrapped before He was laid in the tomb (Mt. xxvii. 59). It is said to be still preserved at Turin. The relic there shown can certainly be traced back to the year 1360, when it was kept at Lirey, in the diocese of Troyes. No satisfactory account, however, can be given of its previous history. Chevalier ("Étude Critique sur l'Origine du S. Suaire," 1900) published a series of documents which clearly proved that in 1389 the Bishop of Troyes appealed to Clement VII., the Avignon Pope, to put a stop to the veneration of the so-called relic, declaring that it was the work of an artist who confessed to having painted it; and that the Pope decided that when it was exhibited the priest should declare that it was not the real shroud, but only a representation. The acrimonious controversy which followed may be read in the works quoted at the end of the article. The fact that Julius II. approved of an office "De Sancta Sindone," which continued to be recited till our own day, on the third Friday in Lent, need not cause any difficulty. Such celebrations do not decide the historical question of the genuineness of a relic (see LORETO &c.). Baumgarten in "Historisches Jahrbuch" (Munich, 1903, 319–43) shows that the weight of Catholic

SIGN OF THE CROSS. [See CROSS.]

SIMONY. Giving or receiving, or intending to give or to receive, anything temporal for anything spiritual. It is so called from Simon Magus, who offered St. Peter money for the power of communicating the gifts of the Holy Ghost (Acts viii.). The guilt of this sin arises from the fact that spiritual things are not fit matter for bargaining. And this, says St. Thomas, for three reasons: because the value of a spiritual thing cannot be estimated in money or the like; because the holder of anything spiritual is merely a dispenser and not the owner of it (1 Cor. iv. 1); and because sale is opposed to the origin of spiritual things, since they come from the gratuitous gift of God ("freely have ye received, freely give," Mt. x. 8). Hence simony is a species of real sacrilege (see the art. SACRILEGE). It is of two kinds: (1) simony forbidden by natural or divine law, and (2) simony forbidden by ecclesiastical law. The former, which is simony properly so called, is committed when something temporal is given or taken for something spiritual or connected therewith, e.g. grace, blessings, consecration, jurisdiction; the latter when something spiritual or connected therewith is exchanged for the like, e.g. benefice for benefice, or even when something in itself temporal but annexed to spiritual functions is bought or sold, e.g., the office of sacristan. The ground of the distinction between the two kinds is that in itself there is no harm in exchanging the spiritual for the spiritual or the temporal for the temporal; the Church, however, out of reverence for holy things, has forbidden such trafficking.

In deciding whether an act is simoniacal we have to consider (1) whether there is any idea of bargaining, i.e. of giving or receiving the temporal as the price of the spiritual. Though it is not lawful to receive anything for exercising one's sacred ministry, as the price of such work, yet there is no harm in taking something by way of stipend for one's suitable support. "To sell or to buy what is spiritual is simoniacal; but to receive or to give something for the support of those who minister spiritual things, in accordance with the statutes and approved customs of the Church, is lawful, yet in such wise that there is no idea of buying and selling, and that no pressure is brought to bear on those who will not give by withholding spiritual things which ought to be administered, for this would look like sale. But after the spiritual things have been freely bestowed, then the statutory and customary offerings and other dues may be exacted from those who are unwilling but able to pay" ($2^a\ 2^{ae}$, q. 100, a. 3). We may add that this doctrine is founded upon the teaching of our Lord (Lk. x. 7) and of St. Paul (1 Cor. ix. 13, 14). Hence all theologians hold that such stipends are due ex justitia. Familiar instances are the offerings made at weddings, funerals, and baptisms, and when Mass is said for anyone's special intention. We have to consider (2) what is understood by the word "temporal." Canonists distinguish three kinds of "munera" or temporal objects which must not be given for spiritual things, (a) munus a manu, that is, anything exchangeable or passing from hand to hand, e.g. goods, whether movable or immovable; (b) munus a lingua, that is, favour, defence, and the like; (c) munus ab obsequio, that is, any kind of service. (3) Lastly, by "spiritual" is meant any supernatural thing, either formally, such as grace and the gifts of the Holy Ghost, or causally, such as the sacraments, prayers, &c.; or the exercise and results of supernatural powers, such as consecration, blessing, jurisdiction, &c. "Things annexed to spiritual things" are in themselves temporal, but assume a sort of spiritual character from their connection with what is spiritual, e.g. the sacred vessels, vestments, right of patronage, &c. It is not easy to draw the line in such matters. The Church has made many positive enactments on the subject, and has imposed the following penalties: (1) excommunication, reserved to the Holy See; (2) invalidity of election, presentation, confirmation, and institution, in the case of benefices; (3) incapacity for holding the same benefices even if afterwards obtained without simony. Moreover, restitution must be made, as the whole transaction is unjust.

Simony was one of the worst banes of the Church in mediaeval times. The great pontiffs St. Gregory VII. and Innocent III. made strenuous efforts to extirpate it. The Council of Trent (sess. xxiv. "De Reform.") also enacted wholesome decrees regarding appointments to vacant benefices. (See St. Thomas, $2^a\ 2^{ae}$, q. 100; Ferraris; Ballerini, "Theol. Mor." ii. p. 298 seq.)

SIMPLE. [See FEASTS.]

SIN. St. Augustine's definition of sin—viz. "any thought, word, or deed against the law of God." has been adopted by St. Thomas ($1^a\ 2^{ae}$, q. 71, a. 6) and theologians generally. We have spoken of original sin in a special article, and many of the popular classifications of sin, e.g. into carnal and spiritual, of omission and commission, are easily understood, and need not, therefore, detain us here. But something must be said of the distinction between mortal and venial sin, both because of its dogmatic importance in itself, and because of the objections made to the distinction by Protestants.

The early Protestants regarded every sin as deserving of eternal wrath. They admitted that some sins were more heinous than others, but they looked upon all alike as mortal. Even the daily falls of good men, according to Calvin ("Institut." iii. 4 [1]), make them "liable to the penalty of death before the judgment seat of God." On the other hand, no sin is imputed to those who believe; so that we may sum up the Protestant doctrine thus: All sins are mortal in their own nature, but in effect no sin is mortal to those who have faith, all sins are mortal to those who are without saving faith.

Very different is the Catholic doctrine. The Church holds that justification consists in a real renewal of man's nature by the grace of Christ, and cannot therefore admit that one who is in friendship with a holy God is guilty of sins which in their own nature [2] expose him to eternal death. The fact of justification implies a passage from death to life, from sin to holiness. On the other hand, the Church, in accordance with the plainest statements of Scripture and tradition (James iii. 2; 1 Jn. i. 8), has defined (Concil. Trident. sess. vi. can. 23) that no one, not even the most holy, can avoid sin altogether "except by a special privilege of God, as the Church holds concerning the Blessed Virgin." Hence, by inevitable consequence, it follows that some sins are mortal, others venial. There is an analogy between human friendship and that of the soul with God, and just as some offences are sufficient to destroy friendship entirely, while others weaken it, so there are some sins which destroy, others which do but weaken the grace and love of God in the soul. There are some sins of which St. Paul says (Gal. v. 21) that they "who do such things will not inherit the kingdom of God," and these must be distinct from less serious faults which none entirely avoid. This is the basis of the distinction between mortal and venial sins. The former are against the very end of the law, which is the love of God, utterly destroy charity and grace, cause the death of the soul, and deserve eternal punishment. Venial sin, though it disposes to that which is mortal, and is the greatest of all evils except mortal sin, still does not annihilate the friendship of the soul with God. Venial sin is a disease of the soul, not its death, and grace is still left by which the sin may be repaired. Mortal sin is, on the contrary, irreparable, and a man who is guilty of it has lost every principle of vitality, so that he is as unable to recover life as one who has suffered bodily death. Renewal cannot come from within, but only from the Almighty power of God, who can make even the dead hear His voice and live (St. Thomas, 1^a 2^{ae}, q. 78, a. 1). It is very hard to decide in particular what is or is not mortal sin. We know that we cannot fall away from God without a deliberate act of the will, and those walk securely who avoid, not indeed all transgression, for that cannot be, but all deliberate transgression. The distinction, St. Augustine tells us ("Enchirid." cap. 24), between grave and light sins is to be determined by the judgment of God, not of man; and Scripture does furnish many such divine judgments on the point. The tradition of the Church and natural reason, following the analogy of faith, must also be taken into account; but when all is done much remains, and must ever remain, uncertain. Some sins, such as those of blasphemy, perjury, impurity, are, if deliberate, always mortal; others—e.g. theft—though mortal in their own nature, are venial if the amount of the wrong done is very small. Others, again, are venial in their own nature, and only become mortal under superadded circumstances. Mortal sins differ very much in gravity. The chief subdivision of venial sins is that into deliberate and indeliberate, though, strictly speaking, the latter are done with imperfect deliberation, for when deliberation is wholly wanting there is no act of the will, and therefore no sin.

It must be remembered that in the Fathers "mortal" and "venial" sin are terms which have quite a different meaning from the modern one explained above. The ancient distinction, often misunderstood by scholastic writers, is clearly put by Petavius in his edition of Epiphanius ("Animadv. in Haer." lix.). The Fathers, he says, mean by mortal sins ("mortalia seu capitalia," also "lethalia") not, as we do, those which deprive us of grace, but sins of an aggravated character, which were specially named in the canons and synodal decrees, and which subjected anyone who was guilty of them to canonical penalties. To these they oppose "lighter and daily sins," including in this class "some which we call mortal and some which we call venial sins." Very often the Fathers simply distinguish between "mortal sins" for which public penance was due and the daily faults of good people. So Tertull. "Pudic." 19, PL, i. 1017; "Adv. Marc." iv. 9, PL, i. 374; Ambrose, "De Poenit." ii. 10; Cassian, "Collat." xxii. 13; Augustine. "In Joann." tract. xii. ad fin.; Serm. 3 2, cap. 2 et 3; "De Symbolo ad Cat." ap. 7. But the Fathers acknowledged in fact our distinction between mortal and venial sin, though they use other words. Thus St. Augustine ("De Fide et Op." 26, PL, xl. 228) divides sins into three classes—those which involve excommunication, sins without which we cannot live ("sine quibus vita non agitur"), and sins to be corrected, not indeed by public penance, but by sharp reproof. We have seen already that he distinguishes between grave and light sins, and means just what we do by mortal and venial sin. Further, in Serm. 393, PL, xxxix. 1713, and "In Joann." tract. xli. 10, PL, xxxv. 1697, he distinguishes between a "sin" and a "crime" ("peccatum" and "crimen"). Man, he says, cannot be without sin, but ought to be without crime, "such as murder, adultery, the impurity of fornication, theft, fraud, sacrilege"; those who are exempt from crime have reached "an inchoate liberty" which will be perfected in heaven. And a little earlier in the same treatise he defines crime as "a grave sin, most worthy of accusation and condemnation." This is precisely the doctrine of the modern Church. (See the moral theologians who deal with the subject in their treatise "De Peccatis," e.g. St. Alphonsus, "Theol. Mor." lib. ii.; Ballerini, "Theol. Mor." tract. iv. vol. i. p. 427 sqq.; Slater, "Moral Theology," i. 133 sqq. The dogmatic theologians treat of it in connection with the Fall of the angels and of man. See also Manning, "Sin and its Consequences.")

[1] "The sins of believers are venial, not because they do not merit death, but because . . . there is no condemnation to those who are in Christ Jesus, their sin not being imputed."

[2] The doctrine of Baius stands midway between that of the Reformers and the Church. He held that "no sin is venial in its own nature"—i.e. apart from the merciful ordinance of God (Prop. 20; condemned by Pius V., Gregory XIII., and Urban VIII.).

SINLESSNESS OF CHRIST. [See CHRIST.]

SION, NOTRE DAME DE. The Congregation of our Lady of Sion took its rise from a remarkable event which occurred in 1842, when M. Alphonse Ratisbonne, a member of an influential and wealthy Jewish family at Strasburg, was suddenly converted to the Catholic faith by the apparition of the Blessed Virgin Mary, with which, as he declared, he was favoured while standing in a side chapel of the Church of S. Andrea delle Fratte, at Rome. M. Ratisbonne at once asked to be taken to a priest, and in a short time was baptized and confirmed. His elder brother, Théodore, had become a Catholic many years before, and, having taken orders, was at this time living at Paris. Alphonse suggested to him the opening of a house for the reception of Jewish children, to be educated, with their parents' consent, as Christians. There seems to have been a movement in the Jewish mind at the time inclining many to embrace Catholicism, and when the Abbé Théodore resolved to act on his brother's suggestion there was no lack of candidates for admission. They were all young girls, and were placed provisionally in the Convent of the "Providence" under the care of the Sisters of St. Vincent of Paul. In May 1843, Théodore Ratisbonne, with the aid of the Abbé Desgenettes, the venerable founder of the Archconfraternity of the Sacred Heart of Mary for the Conversion of Sinners, obtained the approbation of the Holy See for a new institute, under the title of "Our Lady of Sion," the ladies of which should devote themselves principally to the charge and education of converts from Judaism. The centre of the new foundation was fixed at Paris, in the Rue Notre Dame des Champs. The rule of the congregation aims at the union of the active with the contemplative life. Before long the institute planted itself at Jerusalem; a site was obtained bordering on the Via Dolorosa, where tradition places the praetorium of Pilate, and a large convent was opened in 1862. In recognition of the awful memories which make this spot unique on earth, the religious repeat three times a day, "Pater, dimitte illis, non enim sciunt quid faciunt" (Lk. xxiii. 34). The congregation has since opened houses in other parts of Syria and at Constantinople, and also in England. A "Community of Missionary Priests of Our Lady of Sion," working in concert with the congregation, was organized at Paris with diocesan sanction in 1863; both the brothers Ratisbonne joined it.

SISTERHOODS. This term is not much used by Catholics, who speak rather of convents, religious orders of women, nuns, &c. These have greatly increased in number in quite recent times, and any attempt to enumerate them must necessarily be very imperfect. The chief of them are given under the different headings, MERCY, SISTERS OF; CHARITY, SISTERS OF; &c. (See NUN; Murphy, "Terra Incognita"; Steele, "The Convents of Great Britain.")

SLAVERY. The state of a human being whose present and future lot in life is dependent on the arbitrary will of another person, or of other persons. The young child of free parents, though his present lot in all countries, whether civilized or not, is largely determinable at the will of others, knows that his future will be his own; after reaching a certain age he will be his own master. The slave has no such prospect; even where the law gives him some protection from his master's cruelty or injustice, he has not during the whole course of his life the control of his own acts or movements, and his children are born to the same condition as himself.

The earliest records of man contain no mention of slavery. No slave went into the ark with Noe and the other seven persons who composed his family. It seems to be represented in the book of Genesis as the punishment of the sin of Cham,[1] whose son Chanaan was to be a "servant of servants" (Vulg. servus servorum) to his brethren. The first mention of actual slaves is connected with Egypt; both male and female slaves, with cattle, &c., were given to Abram by the [1] Gen. ix. 22–27.

Egyptians [1] on his surrendering his wife to Pharaoh; and Hagar, the domestic slave of Sarah, was an Egyptian woman.[2] Under the law of Moses, the institution was fully sanctioned among the Hebrews, perhaps because of the "hardness of their hearts"; but they were to take slaves from the nations around them, not from their own people; if any Hebrew were compelled to sell himself into bondage, he could go out free in the year of jubilee.[3] At the return from the Captivity, the slaves are said to have stood to the free Hebrews in the proportion of one to six; [4] but the rate was probably much higher than this in times of national prosperity.

Considering the corrupt selfishness of human nature, unaided by grace, there is nothing to wonder at in the institution of slavery. Men, and women too, like to live at ease, and to have the hard work, without which neither food nor luxuries are obtainable, done for them. Especially is this the case in hot countries, in which physical exertion is always more or less distressing. When then neither conscience nor civilization restrains, any well-armed human tribe has a strong motive for making war upon any neighbouring tribe which it believes to be weaker than itself, in order to obtain the use of the enforced labour of the vanquished. The instructive volumes of Dr. Barth, long a resident in Central Africa, are one long commentary illustrating this statement. Wars for the sole purpose of obtaining slaves were then, and are still, of constant occurrence among the teeming nations of the Soudan. Conversion to Islam, which for many years has been making great progress in Africa, far from checking slavery, tends to spread it; for it gives to the converts a feeling of superiority to the tribes still heathen, which seems of itself to entitle the former to make slaves of the latter. Nothing but the twofold conviction (1) that all men are equal in the sight of God, (2) that a man is bound to do to others as he would they should do to him, can restrain from making slaves of their fellows those who have the power to do so. This conviction, now generally entertained among civilized nations, is the fruit of Christianity; and it has produced a state of things, within the sphere of peoples equally civilized, which removes the power to enslave. Were the belief in Christianity to fail, it does not appear what principle would remain of sufficient power to prevent the civilized from enslaving the uncivilized.

Among the Greeks the notion prevailed that a man could not effectively discharge the duties of a free citizen unless he were exempted from the drudgery of life. This, except in the case of a few rich men, could only be done by means of slavery. Accordingly the institution was an integral part of Hellenic civilization; and in proportion as a people was more intellectual and refined, it availed itself of slave labour more systematically. Dr. Lee, Protestant bishop of Manchester, one of the best of modern schoolmasters, used to say to his boys at Rugby:—"Remember now: thirty thousand Athenians; four thousand Metœcs; four hundred thousand slaves!" The contrast was perhaps accentuated a little too strongly; [1] but its substantial truth and significance are unimpeachable. We are all too apt to forget, in admiring the marvellous fertility of the Attic genius, how ruthlessly these pattern men exploited the labour of a gagged and fettered multitude of miserable beings, created equally with themselves for happiness and immortality.

When the Greek mind began to speculate upon slavery, it rejected the cynical tenet of the old times, that force is its own justification, and that any man who can enslave another may. It suggested that some races of mankind are naturally inferior to other races, and born to be their servants. Aristotle mentions this opinion, without however adopting it as his own.[2] But there were Greeks who expressed nobler views. Not to mention the well-known lines of Homer [3]—

> Jove fixed it certain that the self-same day > Makes man a slave, takes half his worth away

—Philemon wrote that "no one was ever born a slave by nature; it was ill-fortune which enslaved his body." [4]

The able work of M. Wallon describes the extension of slavery among the Romans, even under the Republic, and delineates the fatal moral corruption which it produced. The domestic side of Roman life is unveiled for us in the plays of Plautus and Terence and in the Satires of Juvenal; we thus see how slavery influenced society and vitiated character. The sternly practical turn of the Roman mind, understanding that slavery was at all times dangerous (the war of Spartacus was sufficient to prove that), carried out with horrible consistency the doctrine that the slave, as against his master, has no rights, and that revolt is an unpardonable crime. When Pedanius Secundus, prefect of the city under Nero, had been murdered by one of his slaves, the Senate, on the ground that among the other slaves there must have been some guilty knowledge of the murderer's intention, decreed that the whole household, numbering four hundred—old and young, men, women, and children—should be indiscriminately put to death; and this was done.[5] The gladiators, who were bred to the use of arms that their deadly duels might furnish sport for the Romans, were of course slaves.

Slavery was everywhere one of the conditions of human existence when Christianity appeared in the world. The methods of the Gospel are not revolutionary; they do not deal in those sweeping general assertions which fuller experience always shows to be but half truths; rather they introduce new moral principles into the hearts of men, leaving them there as germs, to bring forth fruit in due season. So it was in the case of slavery. The Gospel never directly attacks slavery as an institution; nor was the liberation of their slaves prescribed by the Apostles to their converts as an absolute duty. Christianity lifted men to a moral height at which the distinctions between slave and free, Jew and Greek, seemed of trifling importance. "There is neither Greek nor Jew; there is neither bond nor free; there is neither male nor female. For you are all one in Christ Jesus." [1] "Where the spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty" [2]; the liberty of the mind, even though the body be in bondage. "He that is called in the Lord, being a bondman, is the freeman of the Lord" [3]; but if a slave could be made free, he was to prefer freedom (1 Cor. vii. 21).[4] A slave was taught to obey his master as though he were Christ Himself, not with eye-service, but heartily and strenuously, "as to the Lord and not to men." Similarly masters were taught to deal humanely with their slaves, as recognizing that they had a common master in heaven, with whom there was no respect of persons.[5]

With such principles introduced into human life, slavery, as being in ordinary cases unjust, was at once undermined, and gradually fell. Besides manumissions in life, it became a common practice for Christian owners of slaves to emancipate them by their last will. Long before the end of the fifteenth century slavery had disappeared from Christendom, and even serfdom had been reduced within a narrow compass. The influence of the clergy, pressing with gentle force in the same direction during many centuries, was the chief agent in this beneficent change. After the discovery of the New World, the adventurers and planters whom Spain sent out enslaved the weak Carib population of the West Indies, and forced them to work in the mines. To save the Caribs, the Dominican Las Casas was instrumental in bringing over negroes from Africa, whose hardy frames were capable of bearing great labour under a tropical sun. Other nations, Protestant as well as Catholic, rushed eagerly into the new field of commerce and settlement, and all alike enslaved the negro. The unscrupulous cupidity of the planters of all nations was pretty much on a par; but in countries occupied by Catholics the Church was a real power, and restrained to a great extent the greed and cruelty of the laity. In the Spanish and Portuguese colonies, the slave was not entirely a slave; a code of laws regulated the relations between him and his master; he could buy his freedom for a fixed price; and the slave mother, by paying a small sum, could emancipate her child at the font. These mitigations did not exist in the English and Dutch colonies, where the ministers of the various Protestant sects, divided by deep sectional disagreements, took no common action, but obeyed the public opinion of those among whom they lived. Before the Civil War in the United States, the Methodist ministers at the North denounced slavery as a sin; the Methodist ministers at the South defended it as an institution sanctioned in Scripture, and eminently pleasing to the Almighty.

In England, after the American War of Independence in the 18th. century, a movement against slavery in the British colonies, and against the slave trade which ministered to it, was set on foot by the Quakers. Other philanthropists joined them, and the names of Clarkson, Wilberforce, Zachary Macaulay, Stephen, and Buxton are deservedly revered. The slave trade was abolished, so far as the British Empire was concerned, in 1807, and slavery itself suppressed in 1833, the planters in the West Indies being compensated with a sum of twenty millions sterling voted them by Parliament. The French, proclaiming in their frantic revolutionary way that in Hayti and their other colonies slavery was at an end, threw the entire system of their colonial society into a confusion from which it has not recovered to this day. Spain, proceeding gradually and prudently, reduced slavery in its magnificent colony of Cuba within very narrow limits, and in Porto Rico abolished it altogether. In Brazil, and in Mexico, and all the other republics carved out of the colonial empire of Spain, slavery no longer exists. In the United States, the Federal Government (1863), as a war measure, declared that all the slaves in the seceded States were free, and as the war ended favourably for the North the declaration has become a fact. Thus Christianity, aided, no doubt, by mere humanitarian views and political considerations, has a second time overmastered those selfish instincts in man which favour the establishment of slavery. In Mahometan and Pagan countries, no such influence being in operation, slavery, it is to be feared, will for a long time hold its ground.

Since the above article was written, the question of slavery has come into special prominence, partly on account of the efforts of Pope Leo XIII., partly on account of the interest aroused by the English occupation of Egypt and the opening up of the interior of Africa by travellers and colonists of various European nations. In a letter addressed to the bishops of Brazil (May 5, 1888) Leo XIII. treats, with his usual erudition, of the origin and history of slavery, dwelling especially on the labours of his predecessors in securing its suppression. St. Gregory the Great granted freedom to all slaves who wished to embrace a monastic life; Hadrian I. allowed them to marry even against their masters' will; Innocent III. confirmed and encouraged the Trinitarian Order for the Redemption of Captives [see TRINITARIAN]; a similar order, under the protection of Our Lady of Ransom, was approved by Honorius III.; Gregory IX. forbade the sale of the Church's serfs, and warmly exhorted the faithful to free their slaves, as satisfaction to God for their own sins. When the great discoveries were being made in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries the Popes raised their voices against the oppression of the natives. Pius II., Leo X., Paul III., and Urban VIII. used their influence with the Kings of Spain and Portugal to prevent the spread of slavery, and imposed censures on those who took part in it. In more recent times, Benedict XIV., Pius VII., and Gregory XVI. have been the slaves' friends. Leo XIII. espoused their cause with characteristic energy and wisdom. He appointed the intrepid Cardinal Lavigerie, Archbishop of Algiers, to preach a crusade against the infamous traffic in human beings, and supplied him with the munificent sum of 300,000 francs to help to carry on the work. The African Primate's visit to England will long be remembered. His address to the Anti-Slavery Society excited an amount of enthusiasm which proved how deep and widespread is the sympathy for the poor negroes. His plan was to strike the evil at the root; to destroy the markets of the interior, or to render them useless by establishing—as Gordon wished to do for the basin of the Nile—barriers against slavery, composed of natives led and instructed by Europeans. Large numbers of young men enrolled themselves in the new military order which he instituted for the purpose.

SOCIETY, SECRET. [See SECRET SOCIETY].

SOCINIANS. Anti-Trinitarian heretics who derive their name from the two Sozzini, Lelio (1525–62) and Fausto (1539–1604). They are the modern representatives of the Sabellians, who denied the real distinction of persons; of the Arians, who denied the divinity of the Son; and of the Macedonians, who denied the divinity of the Holy Ghost. Though frequently confounded with the Unitarians, the two are not exactly the same; for the Socinians hold a higher doctrine of the Son, believing in His miraculous birth, His perfect manhood, and His mediatorship and adorability. His mediatorship, however, is not a satisfaction for our sins, but merely an example to us and a pledge of forgiveness. Socinianism, in one form or another, is practically the belief of most extreme modernists. (See SABELLIANISM; TRINITY, HOLY, &c.; Petavius, "De Theologicis Dogmatibus," lib. xvi. cap. 1; Neander, "Hist. of Christian Dogmas" ii. 626–700; Pope in "Cath. Enc.")

SODALITY. A religious congregation or association consisting of lay persons, male or female, or both male and female, meeting together at stated times under ecclesiastical direction, for the performance of pious exercises, and recommending to each of its members conformity in life and conversation to a body of rules, framed in order to promote the honour of God, devotion to the Blessed Virgin, the spread of good works, and the spiritual advancement of those who faithfully observe them.

Under this general definition will fall, besides other confraternities and pious societies, the Little Oratory of St. Philip Neri, established in every place where there is a congregation of priests of the Oratory.

There are Sodalities both in England and Ireland for promoting temperance; there are also Sodalities founded in honour of the Sacred Heart of Jesus. The greatest and most ancient Sodality in the world appears to be that known as the Prima Primaria. (See CHILD OF MARY; Beringer, "De Congregationibus Marianis"; Delplace, "Hist. des Congrégations de la S. Vierge"; Hilgers in "Cath. Enc.")

SOMASCHA, THE REGULAR CLERKS OF. The founder of this order was St. Jerome Emiliani, a noble Venetian, born in 1481. In his youth he adopted the profession of arms, and fought with distinction in the war, disastrous for the republic, which arose out of the League of Cambrai (1509). After valiantly defending the town of Castelnuovo, he fell into the hands of the enemy; but, being delivered, some say miraculously, from his imprisonment, he resolved to give his future life to God. For some years he devoted himself to the care of some orphan nephews, and to the management of their property. Circumstances gradually led him to the establishment of an orphanage at Venice, about 1528; this was followed up by similar foundations at Brescia and Bergamo. His first associates were laymen, in concert with whom he fixed the centre of their operations at Somascha, a village between Milan and Bergamo. Some fervent priests joined him, and they all lived a life of great regularity and austerity sanctified by continual prayer, at Somascha. The holy founder died in 1537, before his institute had been approved by the Holy See; he was beatified by Benedict XIV., and canonized by Clement XIII. The Papal confirmation came in 1568; it erected the congregation into a religious order, under the rule of St. Augustine and gave it the name of Regular Clerks of St. Mayeul, or of Somascha. The order was in course of time greatly extended in Italy, and was introduced in France; besides orphanages and Magdalen asylums, it had the direction of several colleges. Its principal house is now at Rome. (Hélyot; Heimbucher, "Orden und Kongregationen"; Hubert, "Der hl. Hieronymus Aemiliani.")

SORBONNE. This famous college took its name from the founder, Robert de Sorbon, who in 1252 founded within the University of Paris a college for the maintenance of sixteen theological students, four from each of the French, Norman, Picard, and English "nations." Burses were soon afterwards added for Flemish and German students. The discipline was in the hands of a provisor or curator, appointed by a board, presided over by the Archdeacon of Paris. The formal approbation of the Holy See was given in 1268. The credit and influence of the college continually increased; the majority of the Paris doctors in theology were there trained; in its halls were ordinarily held the meetings of that faculty; and in process of time "the Sorbonne" and the theological faculty became came identified. This was certainly the case as early as the beginning of the sixteenth century. From that time, since the theologians of the university were then and long afterwards its chief celebrities, the history of the Sorbonne can hardly be distinguished, down to the Revolution, from that of the university itself. On the important and not very consistent part which the Sorbonne played in the great Jansenist controversy, see the article JANSENISM.

In 1629 were opened the existing stately buildings of the Sorbonne in the Quartier Latin, including the church in which lie the ashes of Richelieu, an amphitheatre capable of seating more than 1,500 auditors, and residences for thirty-six "doctors of the Sorbonne." The old University of Paris was destroyed by the Revolution; when it was reorganized by Napoleon in 1808, a faculty of Catholic theology, with seven chairs, was established at the Sorbonne. It continued to exist in a feeble way until 1882, when it was finally suppressed. (See Feret, "La Faculté de Théologie de Paris," and in "Cath. Enc."; Rashdall, "The Universities of Europe in the Middle Ages"; Franklin, "La Sorbonne, ses Origines, sa Bibliothèque.")

SOUL. The Schoolmen, following Aristotle, mean by soul the primary principle of life, and by living things all such as have the capacity of motion from within. Thus, a stone has no life, and therefore no soul, because it does not move but is moved by forces external to itself; while, on the other hand, vegetables, beasts, and men all have souls. A plant, for example, unlike inorganic substances, has the power, so long as it lives, of absorbing moisture and of assimilating it by the activity of its organs. Brutes have the same power, and add to it that of sense; while the soul of man is at once vegetative, sensitive, and rational. We have to deal here only with the human or rational soul, and the object of this article is to note the principal heads of Catholic doctrine on the subject, not to enter on philosophical discussion foreign to the plan of this work.

1. The Soul is Immaterial.—In respect to his vegetative and animal functions man does not differ essentially from the lower animals; but whereas the soul of brutes is a principle which can only exist in matter and only operates in union with it, the human soul, though it also exists in and operates through matter, "has, nevertheless, an existence apart from matter and an operation in which the body takes no part." (Kleutgen). The Schoolmen find the proof of such immateriality in the power which the mind has of forming abstract and immaterial ideas. And although this immaterial or spiritual character of the soul and the freedom of the will are taught by faith, they may also be certainly proved by reason, and so the Congregation of the Index declared June 11, 1855.

2. The Unity of the Soul.—The three classes into which the functions of the soul naturally fall led some to assert the existence of three distinct souls—vegetative, animal, and rational. In the middle of the ninth century the question assumed theological importance, and Photius excited great opposition by his doctrine that man had two souls—one rational, one irrational—and that the latter only sinned (Hefele-Leclercq, iv. 420). The immoral consequences which flow from such a denial of the unity of human nature are obvious, and in 869 the Fourth General Council of Constantinople (can. 11), after stating that both Old and New Testaments attributed "one rational and intelligent soul" to man (unam animam rationabilem et intellectualem, μίαν ψυχὴν λογικήν τε καὶ νοεράν), anathematized the doctrine of "two souls" as a heresy. In the Middle Ages, however, trichotomy, or the doctrine of "three souls," was upheld by Ockham, who alleged that the doctrine of "two souls"—one good, one bad—not that of separate souls in itself and as a philosophical thesis, had been condemned by the Eighth General Council (Ockham, "Quodlib." II. qu. 10 and 11, quoted by Kleutgen). It deserves notice that although St. Thomas (on 1 Thess. v. 23) speaks of the doctrine of "two souls" as "reprobated in the decisions of the Church," the very learned Estius, in his commentary on the same passage, regards the dispute as merely philosophical, and evidently did not admit that the Church had decided the matter ("an vero ea duo, sc. pars rationalis animae et pars ejusdem sensitiva, re ipsa, an vero, quod magis recepta est, sola ratione distinguantur, philosophi disputant"). In our own time a celebrated German Catholic, Günther (d. 1863), defended the theory that there were in human nature two distinct principles—one the animal soul, the principle of vegetative and animal life; the other a spiritual soul.

3. Union of Soul and Body.—The Schoolmen speak of the one soul as the substantial form of the body. By the substantial form they understand that principle by which a thing is constituted in its proper species, that which makes it what it essentially is. They appeal to the unity of nature testified by consciousness and acknowledged in the common language of mankind. We express our consciousness of our own unity when we say, "I feel," "I reason," "I will." It is not, as Aristotle remarks, so correct to say "My eye sees" as "I see through the eye." Further, we are conscious that we who consider and resolve carry out our resolution through the bodily limbs. Our faculties, indeed, are different, but all proceed from one common principle of life which makes each of us a single being. The denial that the "substance of the rational or intellectual soul is truly and in itself the form of the human body" was condemned at the General Council of Vienne as erroneous and out of harmony with (inimicam) the truth of the Catholic faith. The condemnation was directed against the teaching of John of Oliva (1247–1297), a Provençal Franciscan, who joined the heretical party of the "Spiritual" Friars. The condemnation was repeated by Pius IX. in 1857, in his brief to the Archbishop of Cologne on the errors of Günther. It is, however, well to remember that the doctrine of Scotus is different here from that of the Thomists. He admitted that the single principle of life is the substantial form, but held that the body had a form of its own, this form of corporeity, as he called it, being distinct from that of inorganic bodies.

4. Immortality of the Soul.—Here there is a marked divergence of opinion among Catholic philosophers. St. Thomas and many who follow him believe that it can be proved by reason. Scotus, on the contrary, regards it as a truth cognizable by faith alone. The Roman Congregations have carefully avoided even the appearance of condemning the Scotist position. In the decree of the Congregation of the Index, already cited, it is the spiritual nature, not the immortality of the soul, which is said to be demonstrable by reason.

5. The Origin of the Soul.—Origen held with Plato that souls existed before they were united with the body, and this theory forms the subject of the first of the fifteen anathemas issued by Σύνοδος Ἐνδημοῦσα of Constantinople in 543 (see Hefele-Leclercq, ii. 1191 seq.). Putting this aside, we find that at least three distinct theories on the origin of the soul have been held in the Church.

(α) A few held that the soul of men was produced, like that of the brutes, by natural generation, no special power being attributed to the souls of the parents, except so far as the soul is the animating principle of the body. This theory is stated with characteristic coarseness by Tertullian ("De Anima," 27, PL, ii. 694); was stated as a possible theory by Rufinus (see Jerome "Adv. Rufin." ii. 8, PL, xxiii. 430); and perhaps adopted by Macarius (Hom. xxx. 1).[1]

(β) It was a common belief in the early Church (Clem. Al. "Strom." iv. 6, p. 638, ed. Potter; vi. 16, p. 808; Hieron. "In Ecclesiast." tom. iii. ed. Vallarsi, p. 492–3) that the soul was immediately created by God and infused by Him into the embryo when sufficiently organised. Jerome, however (Ep. 126 ad Marcellin. et Anapsych., PL, xxii. 1085), admits that most Westerns held the soul to be "ex traduce."

(γ) Augustine found it hard to defend himself against the Pelagians on the theory that the soul was immediately created by God. If the soul came straight from God, how could it come stained with original sin? The difficulty led Augustine to investigate the assumption from which it arose. He could find no proof in Scripture that the soul is directly created by God, and, while he repudiated Tertullian's theory, he thought it very possible (Ep. "Ad. Optat." 190, al. 157, PL, xxxiii. 861) that an immaterial element ("incorporeum semen") was communicated by the father to the mother. The philosophical reasons seemed to him fairly balanced on either side, though he inclined on theological grounds to the doctrine that the soul came by generation ("De Gen. ad Lit." x. 23, PL, xxxiv. 426). St. Augustine's influence led Fulgentius ("De Verit. Praedest." iii. 18), Gregory the Great (Ep. lib. ix. 52, "Ad Secundin." PL, lxxvii. 989), and Isidore ("De Ordine Creat." cap. 15)

[1] "Earthly fathers from their own nature, from their body and soul, beget children." The words are scarcely definite enough to show which theory Macarius held.

to decide, or rather to abstain from deciding, the matter, just as St. Augustine himself had done. On the other hand, St. Bernard (Serm. II. "De Nativ." sub fin.) and the Schoolmen generally (see, e.g., St. Thomas, I. q. 90) reverted to the older view—viz. creationism—and abandoned that of Augustine—viz. generationism. Benedict XII. required the Armenian bishops to accept creationism. The controversy was revived in 1854 by Frohschammer, priest and professor of philosophy at Munich. His errors on the relations of faith and reason were proscribed by Pius IX. in a brief to the Archbishop of Munich (1862), but nothing was said of his teaching on the origin of the soul. (See the dogmatic theologians in their treatise "De Creatione Hominis," and the philosophers on Anthropology and Psychology, e.g. St. Thomas, 1ª, qq. 75–93; "Cont. Gentes," ii. 56 sqq.; Suarez, "De Anima"; Kleutgen, "La Philosophie Scolastique," tr. iii. 1 sqq.; Maher, "Psychology"; Bainvel, &c., in DThC, Âme.)

SPEAR, THE HOLY. [See LANCE, THE HOLY.]

SPIRIT, HOLY. [See TRINITY, p. 827.]

SPIRITUALISM, a term formerly employed for philosophical belief in the immateriality of the soul, has been used for the last half-century for a supposed communication with the dead, and for the doctrines connected with such communication. The evocation of persons deceased has been part of every system of magic: its present form dates from 1848, when two girls of nine and twelve in the village of Hydesville, in the State of New York, began to communicate with the spirits by means of "raps" on the walls or on articles of furniture. The practice spread rapidly in the United States, and was introduced into this country by a Mrs. Hayden, in 1854, and further extended, here and on the continent of Europe, by the well-known D. D. Home. From that time spiritualism has been kept before the public by a series of persons laying claim to exceptional powers, as well as by numerous ordinary mediums, and by a few scientific men who have accepted its teachings. Some idea of its present extent may be gained from the account of the International Congress of Spiritualists, which was held in September 1889, in the rooms of the Grand Orient Masonic Lodge of Paris. It was then stated that more than ninety journals and periodicals are published in different countries in the interests of Spiritualism.

The manifestations of the so-called spirits were at first obtained by rapping answers to questions according to a prearranged code. This process was found to be tedious, and has been generally superseded by writing, either in the ordinary manner—but, as is alleged, without any conscious act of the medium—or by the use of a "planchette." Other phenomena appear to be designed as proofs of the power of the spirits, such as raising mediums in the air, elongating the body, "spirit-photographs," playing musical instruments, untying complicated knots, besides other acts too numerous to mention.

These supposed revelations from the unseen world have given rise to doctrines which vary in different schools of spiritualists, but are found most fully developed in the works of Allan Kardec, in whose obscure and verbose system the influence of the kindred views of Swedenborg may be traced. All space, he teaches, is peopled by the spirits of persons who once inhabited this or other worlds. Even when disembodied they retain an ethereal human form; they are of every degree of excellence and happiness, according to their life in the flesh, but all are subject to the law of progress and capable of arriving at perfection. All are able to communicate with mankind through "mediums."

The largest part of the supposed manifestations of Spiritualism may no doubt be set down to conscious imposture. This is especially true of the most striking phenomena, which have all in turn seemed preternatural, and all been repeated by professed conjurers. The mysterious character of many of the communications, and their differences from the apparent capacity of the mediums, have been traced in some instances at least to unconscious mental action ("cerebration"), which manifests itself during hypnotism or some of the allied states. In like manner another series of phenomena connected with Spiritualism—table-turning and thought-reading—have been shown to be due to unconscious muscular movements. Whether beyond all this there is any residue produced by direct spiritual agency is a point which must be left in doubt. If there be such agency it is enough to say that the Church is amply justified in treating it as diabolical, and in condemning all such practices. See particularly the Decree of the Holy Office, June 23, 1856, which permits the use of hypnotism (animal magnetism) as a merely natural process, but forbids all divination, sorcery, or invocation of devils explicit or implicit—every case, in short, where "ordinantur media physica ad effectus non naturales."

The diabolical character of Spiritualism is most clearly shown by its being a ghastly parody on those relations to the dead which religion has consecrated, and by the heartless deceptions and frauds which have sprung from it.

Further details on the theological aspect of the question will be found in Perrone, "De Virtute Religionis deque Vitiis oppositis," and in Ballerini, "Theol. Mor." ii. p. 250. Yung, "Hypnotisme et Spiritisme," Genève, 1890, is a good general account of the subject, while Gilles de la Tourette, "L'Hypnotisme et les états analogues au point de vue médico-légal," supplies full details of the present degraded state of Spiritualism in France. Raupert, "The Supreme Problem," "The Dangers of Spiritualism"; Miller, "Sermons on Modern Spiritualism."

SPONSORS. "Sponsores," "Fidejussores," "Susceptores," or "Offerentes," mentioned by Tertullian, "Lib. de Bapt.," St. Basil, Epist. cxxviii., and by St. Augustine, are the persons who, according to the practice of the Church, assist at the solemn administration of baptism, to make profession of Christian faith in the name of the baptized. In later times they were called "Patrini"—in English "Godfathers" and "Godmothers." "Gossips" was the old Saxon name by which they were known. They assist at the baptism of adults, but the latter are required to answer the questions put to them by the priest. According to the decree of the Council of Trent, two sponsors at most are permitted—a male and a female (sess. xxiv. "De Reform."). The sponsors in baptism contract a spiritual relationship to the person baptized; hence, not to widen the circle of this spiritual relationship, the number of sponsors is kept at two. According to St. Alphonsus, if a greater number be named the priest may permit them to be present, and even to touch the child, provided he designates from their number two who are the real sponsors. Theologians generally are satisfied that the person acting as sponsor should have been baptized and have attained the use of reason, being at least seven years old. A proxy may be deputed to act as sponsor for another; the sponsor or his deputy must physically hold or touch the child while it is receiving the sacrament, or take it, after baptism, from the hands of the priest. The Catechism of the Council of Trent quotes St. Augustine on the duties of sponsors towards their charges: "They [the sponsors] ought to admonish them to observe chastity, love justice, cherish charity; and, above all, they should teach them the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, the Ten Commandments, and the first rudiments of the Christian religion" ("Serm. 163, De Temp." PL, xxxix. Append. 2071). "Theologians, however, commonly teach," says O'Kane, in "Notes on the Rubrics," "with St. Thomas, that sponsors are bound to fulfil these duties only when there is reason to think that they are neglected by the parents or others on whom they naturally devolve in the first instance; and hence, generally speaking, sponsors need have no anxiety about the discharge of these duties towards the children of Christian parents." A Protestant sponsor alone cannot be admitted to act; but if one sponsor is a Catholic, the other might be permitted to act as a witness, or the priest, provided a heretic is presented as sponsor, may omit having a sponsor. Members of the secular clergy, except when they are excluded by diocesan or provincial synods, may act as sponsors. Sponsors contract a spiritual relationship with the child baptized and its parents, which is a diriment impediment to marriage between the godfather and the child or its mother, and between the godmother and the child or its father. Such a marriage would be no marriage at all, unless a dispensation had been obtained; but no spiritual relationship is contracted between the sponsors themselves and consequently no impediment exists (Carrière, "De Matrimonio"). Sponsors, if admitted in private baptism, contract no impediment; but a baptism in a private house with all the ceremonies is not a private baptism, according to high authorities.

In the sacrament of Confirmation there must also be at least one godparent, who becomes spiritually related to the recipient and its parents. [See BAPTISM; CONFIRMATION.]

SPOON. Formerly (and the practice continues in some places still) there used to be taken, along with the chalice, a little spoon for measuring, and letting fall into the wine, a few drops of water to be mingled with it in the Holy Sacrifice. An "Ordo Missae Pontificalis," from a ms. of the fourteenth century in the Vatican Library, says: "Debet portare ad altare calicem cum patena et hostiaria desuper, ac quodam parvo cocleari, cum quo debet poni aqua in calicem." These chalice-spoons are frequently mentioned in old wills and inventories, e.g. a testator leaves silver "ad faciendum j. cocleare ad calicem" (Test. Ebor. i. 172). (Rock, i. 126.)

In the Eastern rites a spoon is used in communicating the laity. The priest takes with a spoon a particle of the Host soaked in the consecrated wine, and gives It to the communicant.

In the Western church no mention is made of the spoon for the administration of the Precious Blood. But it is possible that it may have been used in exceptional cases, as the paten and spoon are sometimes associated together. STATES OF THE CHURCH. Under the Pagan emperors Christianity was a religio illicita, and the Roman Pontiffs were exposed by their position to the full severity of the laws; a large proportion of them suffered martyrdom. The edicts of Constantine in favour of the religion which he had embraced have been noticed in a previous article [CHURCH PROPERTY, p. 187]. In the Middle Ages it was long believed that the first Christian Emperor had made a solemn "Edict of Donation," conferring on the Pope, Sylvester I., the city of Rome, the imperial palace there, and the "provinces, places, and cities of all Italy, and the western regions." [1] This donation was long ago recognized as a forgery; Muratori assigns its invention to the eighth century.

At the end of the sixth century the Roman See was in possession of large landed estates, chiefly in Italy and Sicily. After the death of Gregory the Great the power of the Eastern Empire in Italy dwindled more and more, and the Lombards, pressing down from the North, threatened to seize upon Rome. Naturally, in the absence of other authority, the Romans and the people of the surrounding districts came to look on the Popes as their protectors and rulers. To drive back the Lombards, Pope Stephen II. appealed for aid to the young Frankish monarchy; Pepin (754) crossed the Alps, defeated Astolfo, the Lombard king, and endowed the Papacy with the Exarchate of Ravenna. This was the real beginning of the Ecclesiastical State. Charlemagne confirmed his father's grant, but with the understanding that the supreme civil authority remained in his hands as "Patrician" of Rome. The next great acquisition of territory came through the bequest of the Countess Matilda (†1115), the friend of Gregory VII.; it consisted of Southern Tuscany and other districts. But just as other portions of the Papal territory had been seized by various counts and princes, so now the rich lands of the countess were appropriated by the German emperors, and for a hundred years the Popes had little benefit from the gift. At length, under the vigorous rule of Innocent III. (†1216), the right of the Roman See was admitted, and a compact Ecclesiastical State, in which the Popes governed without a superior—except so far as a vague suzerainty was allowed to the emperors—now arose for the first time.

The emperors of the House of Hohenstaufen, ever seeking to extend their power in Italy, left the Popes no rest. After the extinction of that family in the middle of the thirteenth century, a new state of things arose. Rudolf of Hapsburg, the new emperor, guaranteed to the Pope (Gregory X.) in 1274 the tranquil possession of the Pontifical territory. The Popes had for a long time nothing to fear on the side of Germany; on the other hand, the establishment of the House of Anjou at Naples and the calamitous issue of the struggle between Boniface VIII. and Philip le Bel gave to the French monarchy, in the fourteenth century, an unhappy influence over the temporal policy of the Papacy. The Holy See was removed to Avignon,[2] and fixed there more than seventy years (1305–1378). Meantime its Italian territories were full of confusion; from which, indeed, the genius of Cardinal Albornoz (1353–1368) rescued them for a time; but after the schism had broken out (1378) the peaceful and regular government of the Papal States became for a long time impossible. The vice of nepotism was justly chargeable against several of the Popes in the fifteenth century. This culminated in the exaltation of Cæsar Borgia over all the petty princes of Central and Northern Italy. Pope Julius II. (1503–1513) compelled Cæsar to surrender his acquisitions, and with great ability and vigour took measures against all who had encroached upon the patrimony of the Church. He humbled the Venetians, recovered Bologna and Fermo, and became—after Innocent III. and Albornoz—the third founder and restorer of the Papal States. In 1596 Ferrara, and in 1631 Urbino, came by escheat to the Roman See. The States of the Church remained with their frontiers practically unchanged down to the French Revolution, constituting a territory of irregular shape in the centre of Italy, from Ferrara on the north to Terracina on the south, having Ancona for its eastern and Cività Vecchia for its western seaport. By the treaty of Tolentino (1797) Napoleon compelled the Pope to cede the Legations, Bologna, Ferrara, and Romagna, and admit a French garrison into Ancona; Avignon had been already seized and annexed to France. Subsequently the whole of the Papal territory was appropriated by the French, and when the Pope (Pius VII.) launched against Napoleon on this account the sentence of excommunication, he was arrested and kept a close prisoner, first at Savona and afterwards at Fontainebleau. After the fall of Napoleon, the Pope was reinstated in the government of an undiminished territory. Pius IX., being elected Pope in 1846, proclaimed an amnesty to political offenders, and sincerely endeavoured so thoroughly to reform the administration in every department as to leave his subjects without just cause of discontent. The hateful crime of the murder of his minister Pellegrino Rossi (1848) was the answer of the Roman democrats to the fatherly overtures of the Pontiff. The Pope was compelled to take refuge on Neapolitan territory, and a republic was set up at Rome by Mazzini and Garibaldi. Louis Napoleon, having been elected President of the new French Republic, sent troops to Rome, under General Oudinot, who, after a slight reverse, drove away the revolutionists and brought the Pope back. All this took place in 1849. A French garrison was left at Rome; but the Pope knew that it did not enter into the designs of Louis Napoleon to defend the entire Pontifical territory; in order, therefore, to keep it intact he raised a small army, commanded by the French General Lamoricière, and composed to a large extent of foreign Catholics. After the war between Austria and France, in which the power of the former was beaten down at Solferino (1859), Piedmont, ruled by the astute Cavour and assisted by the revolutionary sects, succeeded in obtaining possession of Tuscany, the Legations, Modena, Parma, and Naples. The small Papal army was overpowered by a Piedmontese force many times more numerous at Castelfidardo (1860). The Pope was now left with only one province, the "Patrimony of St. Peter," extending some fifty miles along the coast to the north of Rome. Of this also, and of his capital, Pius IX. was deprived in 1870 by the Piedmontese king, who took advantage of the reverses suffered by France in the war with Germany to set at naught the treaty of 1864, by which he had agreed that Florence should be the capital of the Italian kingdom. It was now said that Rome was the indispensable capital of that kingdom, but that the Pope's independence should be respected. The Papal palace of the Quirinal and all the public buildings of Rome were appropriated by the invaders; but the Vatican was left unassailed, and a "Law of Guarantees," passed by the Italian Parliament (and capable of being repealed by the same authority), while assigning to the Pope an annual dotation of two million lire, guaranteed to him sovereign rights within the limits of the Vatican. It is scarcely necessary to say that the dotation has not been accepted, while the fragment of sovereignty guaranteed has already been encroached upon in various ways, and is held on a tenure of the most precarious description. For the present, Rome and the Papal States are lost to the Papacy.

The Popes have not ceased to declare, on all fitting occasions, that the preservation of their temporal independence is necessary, as human affairs are constituted, to the free and full exercise of their spiritual authority. It has been argued that the raison d'être of the temporal power has ceased in modern times, because the lay power in states has ceased to be, as it often was in the Middle Ages, arbitrary, corrupt, violent, and ill-informed, but on the contrary is administered on fixed and equitable principles which ensure equal justice for all. It is further maintained that the danger of undue influence, which might reasonably be dreaded while the European Governments were seriously Christian in one direction or another, and which made intolerable to previous generations the notion of the Pope as a French, or Spanish, or Austrian subject, cannot be pleaded in an age when government has ceased to take theology into account, and is administered on a purely utilitarian basis. The Pope, on this view, though a subject of the Italian kingdom, might both be and be known to be absolutely untrammelled in the government of the Church. It is quite true that the objections to the inclusion of the seat of the Papacy in any modern state are no longer precisely what they were. They have changed their character; but they are not less cogent now than in former times. Formerly, even if the influence of a Catholic king or emperor at Rome appeared to be excessive, still it professed, like the Papacy itself, to be directed to Christian ends, and it made use of similar methods. The possession of Rome by a Charles V. or a Louis XIV. did not involve the deluging of the city with immoral and infidel publications, or the permission of the public exhibition of every form of heresy and absurdity. But all this is implied, and cannot but be implied, in the possession of Rome by such a state as Italy, which has ceased to be Christian. With such a state the Roman See cannot possibly live on terms of amity. It is not a question about reasonable toleration or respect for the rights of conscience. As the Popes have not in the past interfered, so they would not in the future interfere with any Protestants residing in Rome who might wish to practise their religious rites in a quiet and unobtrusive manner.

Protestants themselves, or the more reasonable and enlightened among them, view with grief and scorn the process by which Rome is being reduced to the level of an English or American town. They would prefer that at least one place should be left on earth where Catholic principles of government and maxims of life might be applied without disturbance. So far from the changed circumstances of Europe making it a matter of little moment that the Pope should be independent, there has never been a time since the conversion of Constantine when his independence has been more vitally necessary, because in no previous age has the civil authority so openly declared itself unchristian. The Pope must oppose, must be out of sympathy with the civil power, when he sees it establishing schools without religion, vexing and banishing religious orders, and throwing obstacles in the way of those who desire to embrace the religious life. To make the Pope a subject of any power that governs in this fashion—and nearly all civilized states do so—can only end in one of two ways: either he will be forced to acquiesce in what he knows to be a false and mischievous system, or he will find himself in a state of continual collision with the civil power. The first alternative is, of course, impossible; the second implies a state of things more or less resembling that which now exists, but still worse in this respect, that even the shadow of independence which the Piedmontese left to the Pope in 1870, through forbearing to seize on the Vatican palace, would be swept away if he were openly declared a subject of the King of Italy.

Works relating to the history of the Papal States are numberless. We need only mention Duchesne, "Liber Pontificalis," "Les Premiers Temps de l'État Pontifical"; Miley, "Hist. of the Papal States"; Mann, "Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages"; Pastor, "Hist. of the Popes," tr.; Hergenröther, "Der Kirchenstaat seit der Französischen Revolution"; Schnürer, in "Cath. STATIONS. (1) A name given to the fast kept on Wednesdays and Fridays. In the Roman Church the fast was one of devotion, not of precept, and it ended at None—i.e. three o'clock (Tertull. "De Jejun." 2, PL, ii. 956). Tertullian ("De Orat." 19, i. 1181) explains the word from the military usage; the Stations were days on which the Christian soldiers stood on guard and "watched in prayer." It was characteristic of the Montanists to prolong the fast of the Stations till the evening ("De Jejun." 10, ii. 966). Prudentius ("Peristeph." vi. 52 seq.) relates of the martyr Fructuosus that he refused the cup offered him because it was a Station and the ninth hour had not come. In the East, on the other hand, the fast of the Stations was obligatory ("Apost. Const." v. 20; "Canon. Apost." 69[1]; Epiphan. "Haer." 75, n. 3). In the West, the fast on Wednesday, never obligatory, died out altogether, while that of Friday became obligatory about the end of the ninth century. The Greeks, on the other hand, still maintain the fast of Wednesdays and Fridays. (Thomassin, "Traité des Jeûnes," P. ii. ch. 15; see ABSTINENCE and FAST.)

(2) The word, in another sense, still holds its place in the Roman Missal. Many of our readers must have noticed the words "Statio ad S. Petrum, ad S. Mariam Majorem," &c., before the Introit of certain Masses. Mabillon ("Museum Italicum," tom. ii. p. xxxi.) explains the term as meaning either a fast or "a concourse of the people to an appointed place—i.e. a church in which the procession of the clergy halts on stated days to say stated prayers. It is an ancient custom in Rome that the Roman clergy should on particular days meet for prayer in some one church where Mass and other divine services are performed. The procession of the Roman clergy to these Stations is either solemn or private; the latter when individuals betake themselves privately to the appointed place, the former when the Pope and the rest solemnly proceed thither singing litanies and other prayers." The gathering of clergy and people before this procession, Mabillon continues, was called collecta, and the name was given then to the prayer said over the people before the procession started from one church to the other in order to make the Station. "It was St. Gregory who regulated the Stations at Rome—i.e. the churches where the office was to be performed daily in Lent, on the Ember days, and on the solemn feasts. For the feasts of the saints were celebrated in the churches which contained their relics. St. Gregory then marked these Stations in his Sacramentary, as they are now in the Roman Missal, and attached them chiefly to the patriarchal and titular churches; but although the Stations were fixed, the Archdeacon did not fail, after the Pope's Communion, to announce the next Station to the people" (Fleury, "H.E." livr. xxxvi. § 17). In the Easter of 774, Charlemagne assisted at the Station of Easter Sunday at St. Mary Major, of Easter Monday at St. Peter's, Tuesday at St. Paul's—the same Stations still noted in our Missal (Eginhard, apud Fleury, xliv. § 5; Leclercq, in "Cath. Enc.").

STATIONS OF THE CROSS (Via Crucis, Via Calvarii). A series of images or pictures representing the different events in the Passion of Christ, each Station corresponding to a particular event. Each is surmounted by a cross, which is indeed essential to the devotion, the pictures not being necessary. Usually, they are ranged round the church, the first station being placed on one side of the high altar, the last on the other. The Stations are among the most popular of Catholic devotions, and are to be found in almost every church. Sometimes they are erected in the open air, especially on roads which lead to some church or shrine standing on a hill.

The devotion began in the Franciscan order. The Franciscans are the guardians of the Holy Places in Jerusalem, and these Stations are intended as a help to making in spirit a pilgrimage to the scene of Christ's sufferings and death. Innocent XII., in 1694, authentically interpreting a brief of his predecessor Innocent XI. in 1686, declared that the indulgences granted for devoutly visiting certain holy places in Palestine could be gained by all Franciscans and by all affiliated to the order if they made the way of the cross devoutly—i.e. passed or turned from Station to Station meditating devoutly on the stages of the history.

Benedict XIII., in 1726, extended these indulgences to all the faithful; Clement XII., in 1731, permitted persons to gain the indulgences at Stations erected in churches which were not Franciscan, provided they were erected by a Franciscan with the sanction of the ordinary. At present the connection of the Stations with the Franciscan order is almost forgotten, at least in England, except as a matter of history. Our bishops

[1] We follow Thomassin in his interpretation of the fourth canon. The passage in the Constitutions (πᾶσαν τετράδα καὶ πᾶσαν παρασκευὴν προστάσσομεν ὑμῖν νηστεύειν) is, as it seems to us, decisive against the view of Hefele (Concil. vol. i. p. 821) and others. Hefele's editor, Leclercq, does not support him (i. 1221). Τέτρας often means "the fourth day."

can, by Apostolic faculties, erect the Stations, with the indulgences attached to them, and they constantly delegate this faculty to priests. The English bishops received faculties to this effect, provided there were no religious in the neighbourhood to whom the privilege belonged, in 1857. In 1862 these faculties were renewed without this limitation. The faculties are quinquennial. (Conc. Prov. Westmonast. II. Append. I. Concil. III., Append. III.)

The number of the Stations has varied considerably at different times and in different places; and even when the number has been the same as now (14), they do not always correspond with ours. It is probable "that our present series of Stations, together with the accustomed prayers for them, comes to us not from Jerusalem, but from imitation Ways of the Cross in different parts of Europe, and that we owe the propagation of devotion as well as the number and selection of our Stations much more to the pious ingenuity of certain sixteenth century devotional writers than to the actual practice of pilgrims to the holy places" (Alston in "Cath. Enc."). The Stations now recognized are the following: There are fourteen Stations—viz. (1) the sentence passed on our Lord by Pilate; (2) the receiving of the cross; (3) our Lord's first fall; (4) His meeting with His mother; (5) the bearing of the cross by Simon of Cyrene; (6) the wiping of Christ's face by Veronica with a handkerchief; (7) His second fall; (8) His words to the women of Jerusalem, "Weep not for Me," &c.; (9) His third fall; (10) His being stripped of His garments; (11) His crucifixion; (12) His death; (13) the taking down of His body from the cross; (14) His burial. In the diocese of Vienna the number of the Stations at the end of the eighteenth century was reduced to eleven. On the other hand, a fifteenth Station has been sometimes added—viz. the finding of the cross by Helena. These changes are unauthorized. (See Thurston, "The Stations of the Cross"; De Montault, "De la Construction des Églises," liv. vii., "Le Chemin de la Croix"; Keppler, "Die XIV. Stationen des hl. Kreuzweg"; Alston, in "Cath. Enc.")

STIGMATA. The word occurs in Gal. vi. 15, "I bear the marks (στίγματα) of Jesus in my body." Such brands or marks were set on slaves who had run away, on slaves consecrated to the service of a heathen god, rarely on captives, and sometimes soldiers branded the name of their general on some part of their body. Probably St. Paul's metaphor is taken from the second of these customs. (See Lightfoot, ad loc.) He regarded the marks of suffering in Christ's cause as consecrating him the more to his Master's service. The Latin versions retain the word "stigmata," but no Catholic commentator of repute, so far as we know, ever dreamt that St. Paul received miraculous marks of Christ's Passion. Neither St. Thomas nor Estius allude to such an interpretation, and Windischmann only mentions it to dismiss it.

Still, the idea that miraculous wounds on hands, feet, and side, like those borne by our Lord, were a mark of divine favour certainly existed in the mediaeval Church independently of St. Francis, for in 1222, at a council in Oxford, an impostor who claimed to have stigmata of this kind confessed his guilt and was punished accordingly (Fleury, "H.E." lxxviii. § 56). Only two years later —i.e. 1224—St. Francis of Assisi (d. 1226) was on Mount Alvernus to keep his annual fast of forty days in honour of St. Michael. One morning, says St. Bonaventure, about the 14th of September, the feast of the Exaltation of the Cross, Francis saw a seraph flying towards him. There was a figure of a man attached to a cross between the wings. After the vision disappeared, the hands and feet of the saint were found to be marked with nails, and there was a wound in his side. The wounds were seen by some of the friars and by Alexander IV. during the lifetime of the saint, and after his death by fifty friars, St. Clare, and a multitude of seculars. St. Bonaventure assures us that he had the testimony of Alexander IV. from the Pope's own lips. The Church keeps a feast of the Stigmata of St. Francis, instituted by Benedict XII. (Sept. 17).

The Dominicans claimed a similar distinction for one of their own order, St. Catharine of Siena (1347–1380). They appealed to a letter from the saint to her confessor, Raymond of Capua, in which she states that our Lord had impressed the stigmata upon her, but had, at her own request, made them invisible to others. They also quoted the testimony of St. Antoninus and the hymn which alludes to the stigmata, inserted in the Office of St. Catharine with the approval of Pius II. The Franciscans, who maintained that the privilege was peculiar to their own founder, carried the matter before Sixtus IV. in 1483. The Pope (himself a Franciscan) forbade, under severe penalties, anyone to paint images of St. Catharine with the stigmata. (See Fleury, "H.E." lxxix. § 5, cxv. § 103.) Still the fact of her stigmatization is recorded in the Breviary office, and a special feast in commemoration of it was granted to the Dominicans by Benedict XIII. In a work on the subject Dr. Imbert-Gourbeyre enumerates 145 persons, twenty men, the rest women, who are stated to have received the stigmata. Of these, eighty lived before the seventeenth century. Some are canonized, others beatified, others simply persons of reputed holiness. The work just referred to ("Les Stigmatisées") was published by Palmé in 1873.

"Some physiologists, both Catholics and Freethinkers, have maintained that the wounds might be produced, in a purely natural manner, by the sole action of the imagination coupled with lively emotions. . . . We shall not attempt to solve this question. Physiological science does not appear to be far enough advanced to permit a definite solution, and the writer . . . adopts the intermediate position, which seems to him unassailable, that of showing that the arguments in favour of natural explanations are illusory. . . . It must be remembered that neither religion nor mysticism is dependent on the solution of these questions, and that, in processes of canonization, stigmata do not count as incontestable miracles" (Poulain in "Cath. Enc." and "The Graces of Interior Prayer"; Lefebre, "Louise Lateau, Étude Medicale," this famous stigmatic was born in 1850, and died in 1883.)

STIPEND. [See MASS, application of.]

STOLE. A narrow vestment made of the same stuff as the chasuble, and worn round the neck. The Pope always wears the stole. Bishops and priests wear it at Mass—the priest crossed over his breast; the bishop, who has already the pectoral cross on his breast, pendant on each side. They also wear it whenever they exercise their orders by administering sacraments or by blessing persons or things. In some places it is, in others it is not, worn in preaching, and the custom of the place is to be followed (S.C.R. 12 Nov. 1837, 23 Maii 1846.) Deacons wear it at Mass, or at Benediction, &c.—when they have to move the Blessed Sacrament—over the left shoulder and joined on the right side.

Stole—i.e. στολή in classical Greek—in the LXX and New Testament means a robe of any kind, sometimes (e.g. in Mk. xii. 38, Lk. xx. 46) a costly or imposing garment. In Latin stola was the upper garment worn by women of position. The conjecture of Meratus (on Gavant. tom. i. P. ii. tit. i.) that our stole is the Roman stola of which only the ornamental stripe has been left, is very unlikely, considering that the stola was, almost exclusively, a piece of female attire. The stole is never mentioned by that name before the ninth century. Theodoret ("H. E." ii. 27) speaks of "a holy stole" (ἱερὰ στολή) given to Macarius by Constantine, but he only means a "sacred vestment" in general, and Germanus of Constantinople, at the beginning of the eighth century, identifies the στολή with the φελώνιον or chasuble, and distinguishes it from the ὡράριον or stole according to our modern usage (Galland. "Bibliothec." tom. xiii. p. 226).

This word orarium belongs to the later Latin, and means a cloth for the face, a handkerchief. It was also used "in favorem," to applaud at theatres &c., and sometimes worn as a scarf. The first mention of it as an ecclesiastical vestment occurs about the middle of the fourth century, when the Council of Laodicea (can. 22 and 23) forbade clerics in minor orders to use it. A sermon attributed to Chrysostom, and probably not much later than his time, compares the deacons to angels, and the "stripes of thin linen on their left shoulders" (ταῖς λεπταῖς ὀθόναις ταῖς ἐπὶ τῶν ἀριστερῶν ὤμων) to wings ("Homily on the Prodigal Son," PG, lix. 520). In the West, for a long time after, orarium was used for a common handkerchief or napkin (Ambros. "De Excess. Sat." lib. i. 43, PL, xvi. 1304; August. "De Civit. Dei," xxii. 8, PL, xli. 765; Hieron. Ep. lii. 9, PL, xxii. 535; Prudent. "Peristeph." i. 86; Greg. Turon. "De Gloria Mart." i. 93; Greg. Magn. Ep. vii. 30. So the Council of Orleans in 511). It is in the Spanish church that we find the earliest traces of the orarium or stole as a sacred vestment among the Latins. The Council of Braga in 563 (can. 9) speaks of the orarium as worn by deacons; a council of Toledo in 633 recognizes it as a vestment of bishops, priests, and deacons (can. 28 and 40). Another synod of Braga in 675 mentions the present custom according to which priests wear the orarium crossed over the breast (can. 4); while the Synod of Mayence in 813 (can. 28) requires priests to wear it not only at Mass but habitually, as the Pope does now, to mark their sacerdotal dignity. Several of the Ordines Romani (the third, fifth, eighth, ninth, and thirteenth) also mention the orarium. Hence we may conclude that from about the time of Charlemagne the orarium or stole was generally adopted throughout the West as a vestment of bishops, priests, and deacons. The Greeks have always regarded the orarium as a vestment peculiar to deacons. The ἐπιτραχήλιον or περιτραχήλιον of priests differs both in form and in the manner in which it is worn from the orarium of deacons. The Syrian Christians have adopted the same word orro, ororo, but with them the orro is worn by clerics of all the orders. Readers among the Maronites wear the orro hanging from the right shoulder, subdeacons in all the Syrian rites round the neck, deacons on the left shoulder, priests round the neck and in front of the breast. The Syrians also use the same word for the ὠμοφόριον or pallium of bishops. (See Payne Smith, "Thesaurus Syriacus," col. 101, 102, sub voc. ܐܘܪܪ̈ܘ.) Hefele says it appears from ancient pictures that down to the twelfth century the deacon's stole hung over the left shoulder, and was not, as now, fastened together on the right side below the breast. Till a late period the stole was worn outside the dalmatic as now by the Greek deacons over the sticharion. Hefele finds the earliest notice of a deacon's stole worn under the dalmatic in a Salzburg Pontifical of the twelfth century, and in the fourteenth Roman Ordo, compiled about 1300. Bishops, however, wore the stole over the alb and under the tunicella and dalmatic as early at least as Rabanus Maurus ("De Cleric. Instit." i. 19, 20)—i.e. about 816.

The same author (loc. cit.) speaks of the orarium which "some call stole." This is the first certain instance of the use of the latter word, for its place in the Gregorian Sacramentary may be one of the many interpolations to which liturgical books are peculiarly subject. In the eleventh and twelfth centuries stole became the common word (so, e.g., the Synod of Coyaca, in the diocese of Oviedo, anno 1050, can. 3). The oraria on ancient pictures are exactly like our stoles, resembling the pattern known as Gothic. They were often adorned with jewels, bells hung from them, and letters or words were worked in. Hefele acknowledges his failure after much search to find the reason why the word "stole" came to be used for orarium. The vestment has been taken as a symbol of the yoke of Christ (Pseudo-Alcuin), of Christ's obedience (Innocent III.). The prayer in our present Missal evidently refers to the original meaning of the Greek στολή. "Give me back, O Lord, the stole or robe of immortality," &c. (Braun, in "Cath. Enc." and "Die Liturgische Gewandung," 562–620; Rock, i. 337 sqq.)

STOLE-FEES. The fees, varying in different countries, which it is customary among the laity to pay to a priest at the time of his discharging any sacred function for their benefit—e.g. in marriages, christenings, and funerals. [See FEES.]

STYLITES. (Pillar Saints, from στῦλος, a pillar.) Solitaries who, from motives of mortification, lived on the top of a pillar. The most famous of them, who was also the first of Christian Stylites, was St. Simeon. He began this extraordinary mode of life about the year 423, and continued it till his death in 459. He had many imitators in the East, but this form of asceticism found little favour in the West. "God," says Alban Butler ("Lives of the Saints, Jan. 5), "is sometimes pleased to conduct certain fervent souls through extraordinary paths in which others would find only dangers of illusion, vanity, and self-will, which we cannot sufficiently guard ourselves against. We should, notwithstanding, consider that the sanctity of these fervent souls does not consist in such wonderful actions or miracles, but in the perfection of their unfeigned charity, patience, and humility; and it was the exercise of these solid virutes that rendered so conspicuous the life of this saint." "No one had less about him (St. Simeon) of the arrogance or obstinacy of delusion. He comes down from his pillar at a word of advice from neighbouring monks. He casts away the chain that bound him at the suggestion of a visitor. Above all, the good which he effected marks him out as an apostle. . . . Not in the desert, but in the vicinity of vast wicked Antioch, he stands on his pillar and preaches. . . . From three o'clock in the afternoon till set of sun he preached from that strange pulpit to the most motley congregation ever assembled to hear the Word of God." (Dalgairns, "Holy Communion," 211–4; see Thurston in "Cath. Enc."; Erhard in "Kirchenlex." Styliten; Zingerle, "Leben und Wirken des hl. Symeon Stylites.")

SUBDEACONS. Ministers of the Church who rank next to deacons. In the Latin Church they prepare the sacred vessels and the bread and wine for Mass; pour the water into the chalice at the Offertory and sing the Epistle. Among the Greeks they guard the gates of the sanctuary during Mass, and prepare the sacred vessels at the Prothesis. They are therefore allowed to touch the paten and chalice, unless these contain the Holy Eucharist. The 21st Canon of Laodicea forbids them in general terms to touch the holy vessels; but Morinus and Van Espen interpret this canon as referring simply to the "Great Entrance" in the Greek liturgy, when the prepared elements are carried in procession at the beginning of the Missa Fidelium from the Prothesis to the altar.

Among the Greeks and Orientals the subdiaconate is a minor, among the Latins a greater or sacred order. But it was only about 1200 that even the Latins reckoned the subdiaconate among the greater orders. Martène indeed certifies that in Sacramentaries as early as 800 or thereabouts he found the ordination of subdeacons placed along with that of the superior and separated from that of the inferior ministers. In 1097, the Council of Benevento, over which Urban II. presided, says expressly, "We give the name of sacred orders to the presbyterate and diaconate." Fifty years later Hugo of St. Victor speaks of the subdiaconate as a minor order. But Peter Cantor, who died in 1197, says that in his time "the subdiaconate had been recently made a sacred order." Innocent III. really closed the question by ruling that subdeacons, like deacons and priests, might be chosen bishops.

Usually, subdeacons are ordained by bishops. But the Synod of Meaux in 845 permits (can. 44) chorepiscopi (q.v.) who certainly were not bishops,[1] to confer the subdiaconate with the sanction of the ordinary, and the same permission is said to have been given by the Pope to Cistercian abbots. In the very ancient collection known as the Canons of the Fourth Council of Carthage (but really drawn up by St. Cesarius of Arles in 505), can. 5 lays down the rule that a subdeacon is to be ordained by receiving the empty chalice and paten from the bishop, while the archdeacon gives him the cruet and towel. This ceremony is preserved with a very slight alteration in the present Roman Pontifical. The Pontifical also prescribes the tradition of the book of the Epistles, but this rite was unknown till the twelfth century at least; neither Hugo of St. Victor nor the Master of the Sentences, nor even St. Thomas, mentions it. The form among the Latins consists in the words which accompany the tradition: "See what kind of ministry is given to you," &c.; "Receive the book of the Epistles," &c. Even the form accompanying the tradition of the paten and the chalice is much more modern than the tradition itself, for the Gregorian Sacramentary has a prayer ("Benedictio subdiaconi") as the form of ordination. Among the Greeks the matter is the laying on of hands, and the form the prayer during this action. Such has been their use from the fifth century at least, as appears from the false Dionysius. They have no tradition of the instruments except after ordination, when the newly ordained are, as it were, put in possession, and this custom is of modern date.

In the time of Cornelius (elected 254) there were seven subdeacons at Rome. Their functions in the ancient Church were very important. They were the secretaries of bishops, and were often sent on distant and important missions. They had a great part in managing the alms and temporal goods of the Church. The letters of St. Gregory the Great show that in his time the Roman subdeacons administered the affairs of St. Peter's patrimony throughout the provinces, made reports to the Pope on the conduct of bishops, and by the Pope's orders admonished prelates, reformed abuses, and assembled councils. Pandulph, who signed the Magna Charta, is styled "domini Papae subdiaconus."

(Chardon, 789; Juenin, "Commentarius Historicus et Dogmaticus de Sacramentis," diss. ix. qu. vii.; Ferraris, Ordo; Gasparri, "De Sacra Ordinatione." For the obligations of the office, see BREVIARY and CELIBACY.)

SUB-DELEGATE. One to whom a judge-delegate transfers his jurisdiction in a particular case. [See DELEGATION.] This privilege is restricted to delegates appointed by the supreme authority in a state, except in the case of a delegate ad universitatem causarum—that is, one who is empowered by his principal to try all causes that fall within his jurisdiction, for such a delegate is really a "judex quasi ordinarius." A sub-delegate cannot be named (unless by the consent of both parties) to try cases of great importance, for with respect to these, the special qualifications of the delegate must be presumed to have been what moved his principal to appoint him; and the intention might be frustrated if he could commit the most weighty portions of his charge to another. A delegate whose commission only extends to the bare performance of certain acts cannot do them through a sub-delegate.

SUBREPTION. This term is used sometimes for any defect in a rescript, but more properly for concealment or omission of the truth. [See OBREPTION.] Subreption vitiates a rescript if it be fraudulent or malicious, or if it concern the motive of the rescript. But it has not this effect if it be done through ignorance, or if it does not affect the substantial part of the petition. (See Taunton; Ferraris, Rescriptum, 24 sqq. and the Canonists generally. The word "subreptio" occurs in the Oratio super populum in the Mass of Tuesday in Holy Week.)

SUBURBICARIAN DIOCESES. The dioceses in the immediate neighbourhood of Rome, i.e. Albano, Frascati (Tusculum), Palaestrina, Sabina, Ostia, Velletri, Porto and Santa Rufina. The bishops of these sees form the order of Cardinal Bishops. The bishop of Ostia is the Dean of the Sacred College, and has the right of consecrating the Pope. Since 1910 this diocese is assigned to the senior Cardinal Bishop, in addition to the diocese held by him already. As the Cardinal Bishops hold important posts in the Roman Curia, to the possible detriment of their sees, Pius X. decreed that in each suburbicarian diocese there should be a coadjutor (suffragan) bishop to govern the diocese in the name of the Cardinal Bishop ("Apostolicae Romanorum," 1910). But this arrangement was revoked by Benedict XV. in 1915. (See CARDINAL; Ferraris, Cardinal; Benigni, in "Cath. Enc.")

SUFFRAGAN. [See BISHOP SUFFRAGAN.]

SUICIDE. Those who voluntarily, and while in the full possession of their faculties (sui compotes) put an end to themselves, are deprived of ecclesiastical burial. But in such cases the canon law, like the common law of England, inclines to a lenient judgment; and if a person be found, for instance, drowned or poisoned, and it be not proved that he had expressed the deliberate intention of taking his own life, the law prefers to presume some other cause of death, such as the act of a malefactor, or accident, or temporary aberration of mind.

In many countries the civil law now requires that persons who have committed suicide, even though the wilfulness of the act and their sanity at the time be established, shall be buried in the churchyards. In such a case the ministers of the Church take no part in the funeral obsequies. (Ferraris, Homicidium; "Cath. Enc." Suicide.)

SULPICIANS. A society of priests who devote themselves to the care of theological seminaries. They derive their name from the seminary of S. Sulpice in Paris, where they were established by their founder, M. Olier, in 1642. [See SEMINARIES.]

SUNDAY. The Jewish Sabbath was the weekly day of rest with which the week ended. On that day the Hebrews were forbidden to gather manna (Exod. xv. 23–29). Thus the observance of the Sabbath was made a general law; they were to do no work upon it; the Hebrew family, the stranger in the gates, the slaves, even the cattle, were to rest; and this because God Himself finished the work of creation and rested on that day, blessing it and sanctifying it (Exod. xx. 8–11). In Deut. v. 12–15 it is the kindly and beneficent character of the institution which is emphasized, rather than its sacredness. No reference is made to creation, but the Hebrew is to keep the Sabbath, "that thy man slave and thy woman slave may rest even as thou. And thou shalt remember that thou wast a slave in the land of Egypt, and Jehovah thy God brought thee out thence," &c. The importance attached to the Sabbath in the Deuteronomical and Levitical codes is shown by the very fact that Sabbath-keeping is the subject of a precept in the Decalogue. Further, the Sabbath is the basis of a whole series of enactments. The seventh month is the holy month of the year. It is ushered in by the Feast of Trumpets, its tenth day is the Day of Atonement, its fifteenth the Feast of Tabernacles or ingathering, the "joy of the law." The seventh is the sabbatical year; during which the whole land is to rest [1] (Lev. xxv. 1–7); there is to be no sowing, or vintage, or reaping, and thus the Sabbath extends its dominion over nature. After "seven Sabbaths of years" (i.e. $7 \times 7 = 49$ years) comes the year of Jubilee, when Hebrew slaves are to go free, land to revert to its original owner, &c.

Something must be said on three points connected with the Jewish Sabbath which are of theological importance:—

(1) There is no trace of its being observed among the Hebrews before the time of Moses. No doubt, in Genesis ii. 3, we read that "God blessed the seventh day and hallowed it," but it is never said that He told men in the pre-Mosaic period to do so likewise, and evidently the sacred writers make no mention of a Sabbath kept by the Patriarchs. It is implied that the division of days into weeks, unknown among the Romans till the Empire, was very ancient among some of the Semitic people, for Laban (Gen. xxix. 27) speaks of the "week of this woman"—i.e. the week of marriage festivities. We now know that among the Assyrians the first twenty-eight days of every month were divided into four weeks of seven days each, the seventh, fourteenth, twenty-first, and twenty-eighth days being Sabbaths; and there was a general prohibition of work on these days (G. Smith, "Assyrian Eponym Canon," p. 19 seq.). The date of this usage among the Assyrians is still uncertain (Dillman on Exod. p. 214). But we may conjecture that the division was based, not on the seven planets, but on the phases of the moon (see, however, Sayce, "The Higher Criticism and the Monuments," p. 75), and was familiar within and without Israel before Moses. But from this it does not follow that there was any divine command to keep the Sabbath, or even that the Israelites rested on it. Indeed, the day of rest implies a settled and agricultural life; to a people of shepherds a Sabbath is not necessary or indeed scarcely possible. (So Wellhausen, "Geschichte des Volkes Israel," ch. iii.)

(2) The Jewish was at all times distinct from the Puritan idea of the Sabbath. It is the privilege of rest for the slave and even for the beasts on which the Book of Deuteronomy dwells with characteristic kindliness. In 4 Kings iv. 22, 23, it is mentioned, with the new moons, as a day on which people went to hear the prophets. One of the earliest prophets, Hosea (ii. 13) alludes to it (again in conjunction with the new moons) as a day of joy; Amos (viii. 5) as a day on which no business was done. The prophets of the Exile insist on strict rest; Jeremiah e.g. forbids carrying of burdens (xvii. 19 seq.). They enlarge on the sin of breaking the Sabbath, and the blessings which attend its observance (Ezech. xx. 16; xxii. 26; and so with reference to the Exile, Is. lvi. 2; lviii. 13); and the Levitical Code (Exod. xxvi.; xxxv. 3; Num. xv.) enforces the obligation of rest in minute detail, but not a word is said against recreation on the Sabbath.[1] Even the Pharisees, though they multiplied rules against servile work—forbade, e.g., journeys more than 2000 paces beyond the city; climbing a tree, lest a tree should break; works of mercy, &c., &c.—never prohibited pleasure as such. Even a Chief Pharisee did not scruple to entertain on the Sabbath (Lk. xiv. 1). The Rabbinical law on dancing illustrates exactly the difference between the Pharisaical and the Puritan view. The Rabbins forbid it, not because it is a worldly pleasure, but because it would lead to tuning the musical instruments, which is reckoned work (Buxtorf, "Lex. Rabbin." שְׁבוּת).

(3) Our Lord did not during His earthly

[1] According to the "Book of the Covenant" (Exod. xxi. 2–6), Hebrew slaves are to go free not on the, but on every, seventh year, dating from the beginning of their slavery; and every seventh year the harvest is to be left for the poor (xxiii. 10, 11). The former provision is repeated in Deut. xv. 12–18, and the second has its analogy in the law that on a seventh year proclaimed and fixed, debts are to be remitted (Deut. xv. 1–6). The developed Sabbatical year—i.e. the fixing of one year for the whole country, in which the land is to rest completely from being sown no less than from being reaped—is peculiar to Leviticus. So also is the crown of the whole system—viz. the year of Jubilee.

[1] Is. lviii. 13 is often quoted in the "Authorized Version," "If thou turn away thy foot . . . from doing thy pleasure on my holy day." But חֶפְצְךָ means "affairs," "business," as elsewhere in later Hebrew.

life abrogate the Sabbath. To do so would have been inconsistent with His position as one "made under the law," and with His own express teaching (see, especially, Mt. xxiii. 1–3). But he did expose the inconsistency and hypocrisy of men who loosed an ox or ass on the Sabbath and were shocked when Christ on the same day "loosed a daughter of Abraham whom Satan had bound" (Lk. xiii. 10–16). He, moreover, enunciated two great principles. The one was then, perhaps, part of the better Rabbinical teaching: "The Sabbath is made for man, not man for the Sabbath." (The words "The Sabbath is given into your hands, not you into the hands of the Sabbath," are to be found in the "Mechilta," a Midrash or Commentary on parts of Exodus, belonging to the early part of the third century A.D.) Man is made to fulfil the law of love. Not so with regard to the Sabbath, which is simply enforced for man's own good. Next, the "Son of Man is Lord also of the Sabbath." Just as the Sabbath law must give way before the natural needs of man, so, and much more, before the requirement of Him who is the head and representative of mankind (Mk. ii. 23–28). If, again, the ministers of the temple broke the Sabbath law in its service and were blameless, much more might the disciples do so in the service of One greater than the temple (Mt. xii. 5–8).

(4) The precept of observing the Sabbath was completely abrogated in the Christian Church. "Let no man judge you," says St. Paul (Coloss. ii. 16), "in eating and drinking or in the matter of a feast or a new moon or of a Sabbath-day [σαββάτων, from the Chaldee שַׁבְּתָא, not "Sabbath days"; cf. "Hodie tricesima Sabbata," Hor. "Sat." i. 9, 69], which things are a shadow of things to come, but the body is Christ's" (cf. Gal. iv.; Rom. xiv. 5, 9). Christians are not to be taken to task on such things; they do not furnish the materials of a judgment, good or bad, since the shadows are characteristic of the Jewish law, the substance of Christ's gospel. Once only does the N.T. refer to a Christian Sabbath. "There is left therefore a Sabbath-keeping (σαββατισμός) for the people of God" (Heb. iv. 9). The reference, however, is to no earthly Sabbath, but to that eternal rest of which the Sabbath was a type. The word "Sabbath" is kept in the Greek and the Latin of the Church to denote Saturday—a day which is not sacred among Christians.

(5) In commemoration of Christ's resurrection the Church observes Sunday. The observance does not rest on the natural law, which does indeed require us to give certain time to the worship of God, but not a whole day rather than parts of several days, much less any particular day; nor, again, on any positive divine law, of which there is no trace. Sunday is merely of ecclesiastical institution, dating, however, from the time of the Apostles. Such is the opinion of St. Thomas (2^a 2^{ae}, q. 122, a. 4, ad 2) and of the greatest Catholic theologians (so Billuart, "De Relig." diss. vi. a. 1; and Turrecremata, Thom. Waldensis, Cajetan, Sylvius, and others whom Billuart cites). The present rule obliges the faithful to hear Mass on that day and to rest from servile work—i.e. work done with the hands rather than with the head. But custom permits certain servile work even when not required by necessity or mercy—such, e.g., as cooking food—and ecclesiastical authority may dispense from the law. We proceed to trace the history of the observance.

In a single passage of the N.T.—viz. Apoc. i. 10—we find a special name for the first day of the week, "the Lord's day" (ἐν τῇ Κυριακῇ ἡμέρᾳ—very different from ἡ τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμέρα). In Acts xx. 7 we are told that St. Paul abode seven days at Troas, and that on the first day of the week (ἐν δὲ τῇ μιᾷ τῶν σαββάτων) the disciples came together "to break bread." The same Apostle writes to the Corinthians (1 Cor. xvi. 1 seq.), "Every first day of the week (κατὰ μίαν σαββάτου) let each of you lay up at home and collect whatever profit he had had," words which do not, indeed, directly imply that there was public service on Sunday, for παρ' ἑαυτῷ (=chez lui) cannot refer to a collection in the Christian assembly. But they do seem to indicate that Sunday was already a sacred day, on which deeds of love were specially suitable. Heb. x. 25 shows this much, that the Christians, when the epistle was written, had regular days of assembly.

(6) The Scriptural references given above show that the observance of Sunday had begun in the Apostolic age; but even were Scripture silent, tradition would put this point beyond all doubt. While, however, Sunday was observed from the first, it is possible to trace several stages in the observance.

(a) The earliest Fathers speak of the assembly for worship, and especially for the celebration of the Eucharist. As this is well known, the following references will suffice: Ep. Barnab. 15; Ignat. ad Magnes. 9; Justin Mart. i. Apol. 59; Dionys. Corinth. (apud Euseb. "H. E." iv. 23); Tertull. Apol. 16, PL, i. 571; "De Coron." 3, PL, ii. 79. These authors speak of Sunday, which they call the "Lord's Day," the "Day of the Lord's Resurrection," and sometimes, but only in addressing heathen, the "Day of the Sun" (see Probst, "Kirchliche Disciplin in den ersten drei Jahrhund." p. 247), as a day of sacred joy and prayer. But we know of only one passage in any Ante-Nicene Father which alludes to the Sunday rest. Tertullian, after mention of the ritual usage according to which Christians on Sunday prayed standing, not kneeling, adds that on that day business was put aside, that the soul might be left free for God's service ("differentes etiam negotia ne quem diabolo locum demus," "De Orat." 23, PL, i. 1191). Here was the contrast between Sabbath and Sunday. The former was primarily a day of rest from work, and, although the morning and evening sacrifices were doubled on the Sabbath, no law of Sabbatical worship was imposed on the Israelite. Attendance on the prophets and afterwards on the synagogue, arose naturally out of the enforced cessation of ordinary work. The Sunday, on the other hand, was primarily a day of prayer, and the words in the Apocalypse strike the key-note of Sunday observance: "I was in the Spirit on the Lord's day." The law of rest arose as a protection to the law of worship. It may be objected that, after all, the Church's law only requires a small portion of Sunday to be spent in prayer. But this objection rests on an anachronism, for we shall see presently that the ancient Church required the greater part of the day to be spent in devotion.

(β) When Christianity became, or was on the way to become, the religion of the state, it was necessary to pass some law of rest; otherwise a Christian who kept Sunday might obviously suffer inconvenience from being summoned to court, to military exercise &c., or even from the competition of his heathen rivals in trade. Hence Constantine, as Eusebius reports, required his subjects to rest on the feasts of our Lord (also on Fridays, if Valesius is right in correcting τὰς τοῦ σαββάτου into τὰς πρὸ τοῦ σαββάτου), and on Sundays the Christian soldiers were exempted from work that they might have leisure to pray (Euseb. "Vit. Constant." iv. 18). A long series of imperial enactments on the matter is to be found in the Roman codes. An edict of Constantine prohibited law business and mechanical arts in towns, though the country people were allowed to till the ground on that day. Later emperors not only closed the law courts, but also the theatre and circus on Sundays.

The decree of councils also became more and more stringent. The Synod of Laodicea (between 343 and 381) threatens with excommunication those who Judaize by resting on the Sabbath, but exhorts Christians to rest on Sunday "if they can" (c. 29). About the same time Chrysostom speaks (Hom. xliii. in 1 Cor. xvi. 1, PG, lxi. 368) of the Lord's Day as bringing "rest and immunity from labours.' The Second Council of Mâcon (c. 1) (anno 585) desires the faithful to spend the whole day in prayer. Theodulf, bishop of Orleans, in his Capitulary (cap. 24), will suffer no relaxation of prayer except to take food. The Third Council of Tours in 813 (c. 40) is still more explicit; the prayer and praise is to continue "till the evening," Sunday being reckoned from evening to evening. The Second Council of Aix-la-Chapelle in 836 (cap. 21) tried to restore the old custom of communicating every Sunday. Nor was this wide notion of Sunday observance peculiar to France and Germany. The Council of Friuli in 791 (can. 13) insists on the same devotion of the whole day to prayer, and the Spanish Council of Coyaca in 1050 (can. 6) prescribes not only attendance at matins, Mass, and the "hours," but also abstinence from travelling except in cases of necessity. Theodore of Tarsus (apud Thomassin, "Traité des Festes," p. 527), who became archbishop of Canterbury in 669, assures us that his fellow-Greeks would neither sail nor ride (except to church), or bake or bathe, or write any unnecessary letters on Sunday. In all these authorities and in the Fathers generally there is no confusion between Sunday and Sabbath. References to the Decalogue as in any sense the warrant for Sunday are extremely rare, though Chrysostom ("Gen." Hom. x. 7, PG, liii. 89) deduces this much from God's blessing and hallowing the seventh day, viz. that one day in the week should be given to God's service.[1] This principle is accepted by modern theologians, so far at least that they distinguish between the ceremonial part of the Third Commandment, which enjoins rest on the seventh day, and its moral part, which urges us to consecrate part of our time to heavenly thoughts. But usually the Fathers and even mediaeval writers, appeal simply to the resurrection of our Lord and the descent of the Holy Ghost, which happened on Sunday, to the custom of the Church and to Apostolic tradition.

(γ) Sunday used to be reckoned from evening to evening—i.e. the sanctification of the day began on Saturday and ended on Sunday evening. "It was," says Thomassin, "about the eleventh or twelfth century that after the abolition of public vigils in

[1] A sermon once attributed to Augustine (Appendix 280) says that the "glory of Jewish Sabbath-keeping" was transferred to Sunday, but the change is attributed to the "doctors of the Church," and, besides, the Benedictine editors have proved that the sermon is at least later than Alcuin. The universal teaching of the Fathers is that the Sabbath is abrogated in the letter, and that it is kept spiritually by rest from sin, or will be kept by eternal rest with Christ. This is the teaching of Justin (Dial. 12, PG, vi. 50); Iren. (Adv. Haer. iv. 16, PG, vii. 1015); Clem. Al. (Strom. iv. 3); Origen (Hom. viii. § 2, In Jos. Contr. Cels. ii. 7); Victorinus (Routh, Rell. Sacr. ii. pp. 4, 5, 8); Augustine (C. Faust. xviii. 5, PL, viii. 346); Jerome (In Isai. liii. ad fin., lvi. 2, lviii. 13, PL, xxiv. 513); Epiphanius (Haer. viii. 6, xxix. 7, xxx. 32; Exposit. Fid. 32); Gregory the Great (Moral. xviii. 43); Arethes (In Apoc. xi. 2). The Puritan idea of a Christian Sabbath was unknown to the first Reformers. But in Scotland we find the Book of Discipline drawn up by John Knox and five other ministers enforcing Sabbath observance; and in 1562 the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of Scotland petitioned the Queen to punish Sabbath-breakers. In England the Puritanical or Judaizing doctrine was developed and systematized by a learned Puritan clergyman, Dr. Nicolas Bownd, of Norton in Suffolk. The Westminster Confession of 1647 (ch. xxi.) was the first Creed which embodied this view. (For the history of Protestant opinion, see Schaff, Creeds of Christendom, vol. i. p. 775 seq.)

the Church, people began the celebration of Sundays and feasts on the morning of the same day." He quotes Gratian ("De Consec." d. 3, c. 1), Gregory IX. ("Extra. de Feriis," c. 1, 2), who recognizes the old custom; Alexander III. (ib.), who speaks of both customs as existing in his time; and Haytho, bishop of Basle in his Capitulary, (cap. 8), who says simply that Sunday lasts "a mane usque ad vesperam."

(δ) Down to the middle of the fourteenth century it was admitted on all hands that the faithful must hear Mass on Sundays and holidays of obligation in their parish church. But about this time the Mendicant Friars pleaded that this law had been changed by Papal privilege in their favour. This led to keen disputes between seculars and regulars under Innocent VI.; and Sixtus IV., more than a century afterwards, in his Constitution "Vices illius," declared that the law obliged parishioners to hear Mass in their own church unless when they absented themselves "for a good reason" ("ex honesta causa"). There has been much controversy on the sense of this last clause. (See Juenin, "Comment. de Sacram." diss. v. § 11.) But in any case the Council of Trent simply recommends (sess. xxii.) attendance at the parish church, and it is certain from a Constitution of Pius V. ("Etsi Mendicantium," anno 1567) that it is enough, so far as strict obligation goes, to hear Mass in any public church.

(ε) Modern discipline has introduced another and a much more important change. Mass used to last for two hours and more; it can now be heard in half an hour. Further, the public recitation of Matins on Sunday before Mass was usual even in secular churches till the end of the Middle Ages, and it was well understood that the faithful must assist at the Office as well as at Mass. This has been shown above from the decrees of councils. Maskell ("Monument. Rit." vol. iii. p. xxxii.) proves that the obligation of hearing Matins, Mass, and Evensong on Sundays and holidays was recognized in England till the change of religion. Even in the last century Billuart and many other theologians admit an obligation (though not a grave one) of hearing Vespers as well as Mass on Sundays. At present, a man who simply hears Low Mass satisfies the letter of the Church law. But if he absents himself from sermons, if, above all, he does not use the opportunity the day of rest affords for increased prayer, for reading good books, for instructing his family and the like, he will in many cases sin against his own soul. He can hardly fail to do so unless he be like the perfect Christian of whom Origen speaks ("C. Cels." viii. 22, 23), with whom every day is a spiritual feast. A man is in a bad way if he makes a practice of hearing a Low Mass, and spending the rest of the Sunday in frivolous recreation. (The moral theologians treat of Sunday under the Third Commandment of God, e.g. St. Alphonsus, "Theol. Mor." lib. iv. tract. 3; Ballerini, "Theol. Mor." ii. 506 sqq.; Slater, "Mor. Theol." i. 257 sqq.; see also Dublanchy, in DThC Dimanche, an excellent and exhaustive art.; Tournebize, "Le Repos Dominical.")

SUPERNATURAL ORDER. [See GRACE.]

SUPERSTITION. Etymologically the word means standing still over or by a thing, and so, in religious awe, both in the good sense of "God-fearing," and in the bad sense of excessive dread of the gods. In Acts xvii. 22, the Greek δεισιδαιμονεστέρους (translated in the Vulgate by "superstitiores") probably means "excessively religious" rather than superstitious in the ordinary use of the English word.

As pointed out in the art. RELIGION, superstition is the vice of excess in the worship of God; not that it is possible to give Him too much honour, but we may give it in the wrong way, or give to other persons or things the worship due to Him alone. "Superstitio est vitium religioni oppositum secundum excessum, non quia plus exhibeat in cultum divinum quam vera religio, sed quia exhibet cultum divinum vel cui non debet, vel eo modo quo non debet" (St. Thom. 2^a 2^{ae}, q. 92, a. 1). The Angelic Doctor divides superstitions into four classes: worshipping God in the wrong way, idolatry, divination, and vain observance. For the last three, see the articles under those heads. Wrongful worship of God may be due to the introduction of false or superfluous elements. Common examples are the prayers promising an infallible answer to various requests; indulgences which have never been granted; false relics, miracles, visions, revelations, &c., which have never taken place. In these cases, the propagators of them are often guiltless of formal sin either by their stupidity or by their mistaken zeal. The Fathers of the Council of Trent, knowing from sad experience what evil had been wrought by superstitious practices, issued a special decree for the removal of all abuses in this matter (sess. xxv.). In the art. SAINTS, INVOCATION OF, it is pointed out that the veneration of the Saints, and especially of the Blessed Virgin, in no way savours of the first kind of superstition. Of course, it is possible for foolish people to put their trust in the Saints alone, and to pray to them while neglecting to pray to God; or to use expressions about them derogatory to the honour due to God. A list of such will be found in Newman's "Difficulties of Anglicans," i. 113 sqq. But abusus non tollit usum: false worship of the Saints is no reason for paying them no honour at all. (St. Thomas, 2^a 2^{ae}, qq. 92–96; Ferraris; St. Alphonsus, "Theol. Mor." lib.

iv. tract. i. cap. 1; Ballerini, "Theol. Mor." ii. p. 222 sqq.; Wilhelm, in "Cath. Enc.").

SUPREMACY, ROYAL. By this is meant the doctrine that the king or chief authority in the state has the power to ordain and judge in the last resort without appeal "in all causes and over all persons, ecclesiastical as well as civil,"[1] within his dominions. Christianity is thus inferentially denied, inasmuch as the charge given by our Lord to St. Peter, not to feed only, but to govern (ποιμαίνειν) his whole flock in the things concerning everlasting life is ignored, and the judgment of the civil ruler substituted for that of the Apostolic See. Nor is this claim to supremacy less obstinately maintained in democratic communities which pretend to tolerate all religions, than by old Protestant monarchies. The modern Continental Liberal has no sense for the lofty yet humbling thoughts, the pure penetrating emotions, which are present in the souls of believers, and dispose the best of them to the practice of the evangelical counsels—chastity, voluntary poverty, and obedience. He considers that it is the duty of every man or woman to contribute to the advance of civilization, understood as he understands it; and all mental or bodily exercise which does not so contribute he looks upon as so much wasted force. This waste, if he has power to prevent it, he will not permit; he will therefore disperse religious communities, forbid the taking of vows, and generally, assume control in the last resort over religious society. The Radical Government of France, with nothing but toleration and enlightenment on its lips, is as vigilant in repressing the free development of Catholic life within the republic as the Czars are in Russia or Queen Elizabeth was in England.

The doctrine that the civil power has the right to control the ecclesiastical, even in purely religious matters, is generally attributed to Erastus, a German divine of the sixteenth century [see ERASTIANISM]; traces of it, however, may be found in the writings of Marsilius of Padua and other mediaeval writers. Cranmer, and afterwards Hooker, espoused it; it is indeed the fundamental tenet of the Church of England as such; Grotius and Hobbes argued on the same side.[2] On the other hand, all Catholic theologians maintain the independence and supremacy of the Church within her own sphere. This independence is of course implied in the very fact of canon law; for precepts which may be lawfully set aside at the bidding of some power claiming to be superior to the authority which framed them are strictly speaking not laws at all, but only regulations or monitions. [See CANON LAW; JURISDICTION; FORUM ECCLESIASTICUM.]

[2] Hallam, Lit. Hist. ii. 436.

The doctrine of the royal supremacy was carried out more consistently in England than in any other Protestant country. It was one of the main causes of the civil war in the seventeenth century; the King, as head of the Church, insisting on ecclesiastical arrangements which the conscience of the more advanced Protestants condemned. The Puritan republic, since it maintained the penal laws against Catholics, practically claimed the right of excluding Catholicism from the country, but it conceded to all Protestant sects the free management of their ecclesiastical concerns without state interference. At the Restoration the old state of things reappeared; but the Revolution of 1688 enforced the toleration of the sects, and withdrew, so far as they were concerned, the ecclesiastical supremacy of the Crown. The liberty thus given has been taken advantage of more and more in the two centuries which have since intervened, and at the present day the supremacy is admitted only by one-half of English Protestantism. In Scotland the Erastian doctrine was rejected from the first. The Presbyterian conception of the Church has no solid basis in Scripture, history, or general reason; but of this Church the Scotch always stoutly upheld the independence as against the State; and the record of their struggles and sacrifices in this cause, from the date of the First General Assembly in 1560 to the disruption of 1843, forms the most attractive feature in the history of Presbyterianism. [See PRESBYTERIANS, SCOTTISH.]

In Sweden and Denmark the sovereigns appoint the bishops; Lutheranism is the national religion, and till within the last few years no other has been tolerated. The Calvinism of Holland is more accommodating; the battle of toleration was fought out there in the seventeenth century, and practically won. The established religion is professed only by about one half of the people, and Catholics form nearly 40 per cent. of the whole population. In Russia the Czar appoints the bishops, and is practically supreme in religious matters. The sufferings which the exercise of this supremacy has entailed on the Catholics of Poland, Podolia, and Lithuania are matter of recent experience. In France religious affairs were regulated by a concordat or solemn treaty concluded (1801) between the civil power and the Catholic Church. Many other countries [CONCORDAT] have followed this example. The French concordat was repudiated by the government in 1905. Of course all Powers having concordats with Rome implicitly admit her spiritual independence. The British State does not make concordats with, but laws for, the Church of England, justly regarding it as its own creature and subject. [See ENGLISH CHURCH, Reformation Period; Tarquini, "Juris Eccl. Publici Institutiones.")

SUPPRESSION OF MONASTERIES. In every country of Europe there have been hostile suppressions of monastic societies; there have been also, from time to time, friendly, or ecclesiastical, suppressions carried out with the approbation of the Holy See. The first and most memorable instance of the former class is the closing of the religious houses in England (1535–1540); the particulars are exhibited in the following table:—

Monasteries with yearly revenue under 200*l.*	374
Monasteries with yearly revenue above that sum	186
Small Monasteries	52
Friaries—Augustinians	32
„ Carmelites	52
„ Dominicans	58
„ Franciscans[1]	65
Total	819

In Italy a great suppression of religious houses and ecclesiastical foundations, commenced by the Sardinian Government in 1855, has seriously changed the moral aspect of the country. Between 1855 and 1873 there were suppressed 3037 houses for men and 1027 for women, and small pensions were granted to a large proportion of their inmates, amounting to nearly 54,000 persons. Up to the end of 1877, Church and monastic lands representing a capital value of nearly 34,000,000*l.* had been confiscated by the state, which, to disarm local opposition, grants to the communes in which any such property was situated a certain proportion of the proceeds of its sale. The establishments spared for the present are compelled to submit to the forced sale of all their immovable property, the purchase money being entered by the Government to their credit in the Italian rentes. ("Encyc. Brit." Italy, 1881.)

The Culturkampf in Germany, commenced very soon after the Franco-German war (1870-1), employed the suppression of religious societies as one of its most effectual weapons. The Jesuits, and many other orders and congregations, were at that time expelled from all the territories of Prussia.

In France, a law passed during the Revolution (February 1790) enacted the suppression of all orders and regular congregations in which solemn vows were taken, and prohibited their re-establishment. This law had been long in abeyance, and a system of authorization had been followed, under which religious societies which laid their rules, statutes, and financial affairs open to the inspection of the Ministry of the Interior, were permitted to exist. Besides these authorized congregations, a large number of non-authorized societies, which for various reasons preferred a hazardous independence to the irksomeness of governmental supervision, had come into being; in 1877 there were five hundred such societies, comprising nearly 22,000 religious of both sexes. But the majority of the congregations of women were authorized. On March 29, 1880, the Government of M. Freycinet, a Protestant, issued two decrees, of which one ordered the absolute and irrevocable suppression of the Society of Jesus in every part of France; the other required that all other non-authorized corporations should within three months apply for authorization to the Government, supplying at the same time full and minute information as to all their concerns, internal and external. It was well understood that in the case of many societies the authorization, had it been applied for, would have been refused. In fact, it was in very few instances applied for, and when the prescribed period had passed by, the Government resorted to the various executive means at its disposal for suspending the common life of the non-authorized societies, causing closed doors to be broken open, seizing on property, and forcibly dispersing the religious. Some years later, however, though the decrees had not been withdrawn, the various religious orders found their way back and resumed their labours. But in 1905 a fresh persecution broke out, and the same harsh measures have been resorted to as before. [See FRANCE, CHURCH OF, p. 362.]

Ecclesiastical suppressions have been made for various reasons: either for the promotion of learning and education, or in the interest of discipline, or for the removal of presumed abuses and evils. Thus a monastery was suppressed by Bishop Alcock (1497) in order that he might transfer its revenues to his new foundation of Jesus College at Cambridge, and two others were closed at the request of the Countess Margaret, mother of Henry VII., and her executors (1505-1508), to aid in the foundation of Christ's and St. John's Colleges at the same university. Another suppression was allowed in favour of Bishop Smith (1515), when he was founding Brasenose College, Oxford. A measure of the same kind, but on a much larger scale, was permitted by the Holy See to Cardinal Wolsey, who (1524) suppressed twenty-five small priories, and applied their revenues to Christ Church at Oxford and the college at Ipswich which he was then founding. In 1528, experience having shown that when the number of monks in any house was very small, the rule was seldom properly observed, Clement VII. granted a bull to the Cardinals Wolsey and Campeggio, authorizing them to suppress houses having less than twelve monks, and transfer their revenues to the larger monasteries. (Taunton, "Thomas Wolsey, Legate and Reformer," p. 68 sqq.)

A suppression far more comprehensive was effected in France a few years before the Revolution through the agency of the "Commission on the Regulars," a board composed of bishops and high officials, appointed by the Crown in 1766 to inquire into the state of the religious orders. The result of their operations, which do not appear to have had at any time the sanction of the Pope, was, that all houses containing fewer than fifteen religious were closed, that monks were forbidden to take vows before the age of 21, and nuns before that of 18, and that nearly 1500 monasteries were suppressed.

[1] There were also forty-eight suppressed houses of the Knights Hospitallers.

(Tanner, "Notitia Monastica"; Hélyot [ed. Migne], vol. iv. See especially, "Henry VIII. and the English Monasteries," by Cardinal Gasquet.)

SUPRALAPSARIANS. [See INFRALAPSARIANS; CALVINISM.]

SURPLICE. A garment of white linen worn over the cassock in choir and in the administration of the sacraments. It is among the most familiar, and at the same time is one of the most modern of Church vestments.

The word superpellicium means a dress worn over a garment of skins. Such dresses of fur (pelliciae) came into use among monks early in the ninth century, probably to protect them from the cold and damp during the long offices in church. The great Synod of Aix-la-Chapelle in 817 (can. 22) ordered each monk to have two dresses of fur(pelliciae). Over these peicialle a linen garment, the superpellicium or surplice, was worn in choir. It is uncertain when this last custom began. The surplice is mentioned in 1050 by the Council of Coyaca, and Durandus in 1286 speaks of its use as already ancient, but by no means universal. The Spanish synod just mentioned (can. 3) requires it to be worn under the amice, alb, and the rest of the Mass vestments, and this usage is still recognized in the rubrics of the Roman Missal ("Ritus Servand." i. 2). In the twelfth century it reached to the ankles, and so the Council of Basle in the fifteenth century requires canons in choir to wear surplices "ultra medias tibias." Cardinal Bona, more than 200 years ago, speaks of surplices being already shorter than the rule of Basle required, but the pictures in Roman Pontificals of the last century show that the present form of the Italian surplice or cotta is very recent. To this day the length varies much in our English churches, but it never reaches below the knees, while in the new Italian fashion adopted by many of the English clergy the surplice does not reach nearly so far. It was not till the seventeenth century that surplices were commonly adorned with lace. (Hefele, "Beiträge," vol. ii. p. 174 seq.; Braun, "Die Liturgische Gewandung," 135 sqq.; see also ROCHET and COTTA.)

SUSPENSION. A censure by which a cleric is forbidden to exercise his orders or his clerical office, or to administer and enjoy the fruits of his benefice. It does not, like deposition, deprive a cleric of his benefice, or make him incapable of lawfully exercising his office without formal rehabilitation; much less does it, like degradation, deprive him of his status as a clergyman. Partial suspension inhibits a man from the use of his orders, of his office—i.e. from exercise of orders and jurisdiction, or, again, from the enjoyment and administration of his benefice. It may prohibit from all exercise of orders or jurisdiction, or only from certain acts of order and jurisdiction—e.g. a bishop may be suspended from ordaining, singing Mass pontifically, &c., and yet be perfectly free to say Mass, govern his diocese, &c. Entire suspension prohibits all use of order, jurisdiction, or benefice. Suspension may be perpetual—i.e. without any fixed limit, or for a definite time. If inflicted for a time, it ceases of itself when the time is over. Perpetual suspension for a fault altogether past is removed by the dispensation of the prelate who inflicted it, his superior, successor, or delegate. If inflicted as a censure[1] it may be removed by absolution given solemnly according to a form prescribed in the Rituale, if the suspension is public; or privately by absolution in a general form, if the suspension is secret. The power of absolution is sometimes held by every priest empowered to hear confessions, sometimes reserved to the bishop, sometimes to the Pope. According to the Bull "Apostolicae Sedis," October 12, 1869, a number of suspensions are incurred ipso facto, absolution being reserved to the Pope. They all depend upon the giving, receiving, or exercising orders or jurisdiction. (See Ballerini, "Theol. Mor." vii. p. 215 sqq. and 294 sqq.) Of course, provincial and diocesan statutes may inflict suspension to be incurred ipso facto, and prelates are empowered to visit the offences of clerks subject to them with suspension (xxv. De Ref. c. 14).

In the earliest times clerics were often punished, not by simple suspension, but by temporary deprivation of communion. (Canon Apost. 45, Illiber. 21, Epaon. 3.) But as early as 314 (Concil. Neocaesaren. c. 1) we have an instance of suspension perpetual and from all functions (ὅλως λειτουργεῖν), and so frequently in the following centuries (Agde, c. 43, in Trullo, c. 26). In the so-called Fourth Council of Carthage (c. 68), where a bishop who breaks the law is forbidden to ordain, we have an instance of partial suspension, and in another early council an instance of suspension from Mass (3 Aurel. [Orleans] c. 7). Often clerics suspended from order and office retained their stipend (3 Concil. Aurel. A.D. 538, c. 19), while in other cases they were suspended from their stipend (Concil. Narbonn. A.D. 589, c. 11 and 13). (Ferraris; Taunton; on the decrees of the councils mentioned consult Hefele-Leclercq.)

SYLLABUS. On Dec. 8, 1864, two important documents were issued at Rome—the one, an encyclical letter of Pius IX., beginning with the words Quanta cura, the other a "Syllabus containing the chief errors of our times which are censured in the consistorial allocutions, in the encyclicals, and in other Apostolical letters of our most holy Lord, Pius IX." In forwarding these documents to the bishops of the world, Cardinal Antonelli, the papal secretary of state, wrote as follows:—"Our Holy Father, Pius IX., being deeply anxious for the salvation of souls and for sound doctrine, has never ceased, from the beginning of his pontificate, to proscribe and condemn the chief errors and false doctrines, especially of this most unhappy age, by published encyclicals and consistorial allocutions and other Apostolical letters. But as it may come to pass that all the pontifical acts do not reach each one of the Ordinaries, therefore the same sovereign Pontiff has willed that a Syllabus of the said errors should be compiled to be sent to all the bishops of the Catholic world, in order that those bishops may have before their eyes all the errors and pernicious doctrines which have been reprobated and condemned by him. He has accordingly charged me to take care that this Syllabus when printed should be sent to your [Eminence] on this occasion and at this time when the same Pontiff, from his great solicitude for the security and welfare of the Catholic Church and the whole flock divinely entrusted to him, has thought fit to write another encyclical to all the Catholic bishops. Performing, therefore, as is my duty, with all suitable zeal and submission, the commands of the said Pontiff, I send your [Eminence] the said Syllabus annexed to this letter."

The Syllabus, then, is a digest or table of the errors condemned on various occasions by Pius IX., drawn up and circulated by his orders. It contains eighty propositions arranged under ten heads. After each proposition there is a reference to the allocution or letter in which false doctrine is condemned. Thus proposition 14, "Philosophy should be treated without any regard for supernatural Revelation," is followed by a reference to the letter addressed to the Archbishop of Munich on the occasion of the congress held in that city. If the Syllabus is compared with these documents it will be found that, as a rule, the latter speak in the concrete and the former in the abstract; or, to speak logically, where the Pope enunciates a particular affirmative, the Syllabus condemns the contradictory, viz. the universal negative. Again, it will be found that some of the propositions, e.g. the 24th, are taken from certain books. Hence, according to the rules of interpretation, such propositions must be understood in the sense of their authors. These considerations must be borne in mind, otherwise the propositions will seem to have a wider extent than was intended in their condemnation.

While all Catholics are at one concerning the doctrinal authority of the documents from which the Syllabus is drawn, there has been much discussion as to the authority of the Syllabus itself. W. G. Ward held that it was "quite certainly issued ex cathedra," by reason of the "solidarity of Encyclical and Syllabus." He quotes the authority of the eminent Jesuit theologian Schrader. On the other hand, Bishop Fessler, secretary general of the Vatican Council, writing in 1871 ("True and False Infallibility"), says that many theologians think it may be assumed as doubtful whether the Syllabus was issued ex cathedra, and accordingly whether any additional obligation of assent to its teaching was imposed by the Vatican Council—until some fresh declaration is made by the Holy See. This work was warmly approved by Pius IX. Cardinal Newman accepted this view in his letter to the Duke of Norfolk, &c., since republished in "Difficulties of Anglicans" (vol. ii., 1885). Some writers, while admitting that the ex cathedra character of the Syllabus was originally doubtful, hold that these doubts have been set at rest by subsequent declarations of Pius IX. and Leo XIII. (See "Acta SS. D.N. Pii PP. IX. ex quibus excerptus est Syllabus editus die viii. Decembris MDCCCLXIV.," Romae, 1865; Mgr. Dupanloup, "La Convention du 15 Septembre et l'Encyclique du 8 Décembre"—for which the author was thanked by Pius IX.; W. G. Ward, "Essays on the Church's Doctrinal Authority," p. 472 seq.)

SYLLABUS OF PIUS X., "LAMENTABILI," July 3, 1907. [See MODERNISM.]

SYLVESTRINES. A religious congregation following mainly the Benedictine rule, but adding many austerities beyond that rule and especially laying stress upon the observance of poverty. They were founded by St. Sylvester in 1231, and were approved by Innocent IV. Their habit is blue, and in form similar to that of the Cassinese Benedictines. They have never possessed many houses. Since 1855 they have had a flourishing mission in Ceylon, the head of which is the Abbey of St. Anthony at Kandy.

A convent of Sylvestrine nuns was founded during the lifetime of St. Sylvester at Serra San Quirico. At the present time there is only one convent, that at Perugia. (See Heimbucher, "Orden und Kongregationen"; Hélyot; Webster in "Cath. Enc.")

SYMBOLISM. 1. That an outward expression, or thing, or action may have an inward meaning is a familiar fact which is the basis of all simile and metaphor. Thus, the representation of a lion brings to our mind not only the king of beasts, but the qualities of strength and courage. In the domain of religion, in which there is much which, by reason of its spiritual character, cannot be directly represented, the use of material outward signs to convey inward spiritual meanings is a necessity. The subject is too large to be treated here. We can only speak briefly of Christian symbolism. Over and above the natural tendency to speak and act "symbolically," there were special circumstances in the early history of Christianity which contributed to make the use of symbols general. Persecution drove the faithful to conduct their worship underground, and even there to make use of language outwardly indifferent but inwardly conveying meanings known only to the initiated, and also pictorial representations apparently of ordinary subjects, but bringing to the minds of the faithful the sacred mysteries of their religion. Thus, a picture of fish and bread was to the eyes of a pagan a perfectly natural decoration for a funeral chamber; but to the faithful it brought to mind the miraculous feeding of the multitude (Jn. vi.) and the Eucharistic Banquet. Even pagan mythology was used for this purpose. The figure of Orpheus with his lyre and charmed animals is sometimes found in the Catacombs. To the faithful this figure represented Christ, the true Orpheus, taming and subduing mankind by His doctrine and example. In this way the early Christians were edified, while the suspicions of the pagans were not aroused. In the course of time the necessity for this "economy" passed away, but the practice had become so interwoven with religious worship that it was continued and even extended. There grew up a tendency to read into ordinary utilitarian actions inward meanings which originally had nothing to do with them. To take one example. It has been proved to demonstration that the vestments now worn by the priest at Mass were originally the dress ordinarily worn by lay persons. [See VESTMENTS.] The mediaeval liturgists read all sorts of mystical meanings into the use of them. Thus, the chasuble denoted charity, because (in those days) it covered the whole of the person (cf. 1 Pet. iv. 8); the girdle, continence and self-restraint (cf. Lk. xii. 35; Eph. vi. 14). On the other hand, there have been writers in our own day who have tried to explain all liturgical practices on utilitarian grounds. Thus the gradual extinction of the candles at Tenebrae [see HOLY WEEK] is said to be due to the fact that the service took place in the very early morning, and consequently less artificial light was required as the dawn advanced.

Closely connected with this subject is the allegorical or mystical interpretation of Holy Scripture, for which the Alexandrian school was famous [see MYSTICAL SENSE OF SCRIPTURE]. (Thurston in "Cath. Enc."; Barnes, "The Early Church in the Light of the Monuments," p. 81 sqq.; Jenner, "Christian Symbolism"; for mediaeval Symbolism, Durandus, "Rationale Divinorum Officiorum"; Braun, "Die Liturgische Gewandung," 701.)

2. The word Symbol is also used for Creed (q.v.). Möhler's great work on "Symbolism" takes it in this sense. "By Symbolism we understand the scientific exposition of the doctrinal differences among the various religious parties opposed to each other, in consequence of the ecclesiastical revolution of the sixteenth century, as these doctrinal differences are evidenced by the public confessions (creeds) or symbolical books of the parties" (i. 1).

SYNAXIS. [See LITURGIES.]

SYNCELLUS (a hybrid word, σύν, cella; one occupying the same cell). The thing signified by the term—namely, that a priest or deacon should live continually with a bishop, "propter testimonium ecclesiasticum"—was of very early institution; the "Liber Pontificalis" traces it to Pope Lucius, in the second century. The word (see Ducange) appears not to be traceable beyond the eighth century. Leo III., writing to Cenwulf of Mercia, speaks of Augustine (of Canterbury) having been the syncellus of Gregory the Great. Concellus or concellita would have been the natural Latin expression; and the latter term is actually used by Sidonius Apollinaris with reference to a monk of Lerins. The word syncellus must have been coined in the East; whence, probably not before the eighth century, it found its way into the Western Church. In the Eastern Church the syncelli were the chaplains and the confidential ministers of the metropolitans and patriarchs. At Constantinople they formed a corporation; and their chief, the protosyncellus, became in process of time a personage of so much importance as to take rank on public occasions next after the patriarch. Cedrenus (about 1050) says that before his time the protosyncellus had commonly succeeded to the patriarchal throne on its becoming vacant. (Morone, "Dizion. Eccl."; Smith and Cheetham, art. by Venables.)

SYNDIC (Gr. σύνδικος). In classical Greek the word was used in three senses: (1) an advocate, especially for the defendant; (2) a public orator; (3) a judge.[1] The term came into regular use in Italy during the Middle Ages; the municipal magistrates of cities were called syndics (sindaci). Louis of Bavaria was crowned at Rome (1328) by the four syndics of the city; again, in 1347, an official so entitled, chosen by the people for the purpose, knighted and crowned Rienzi the Tribune. At the present day it means an agent of a particular kind—"one chosen to take charge of the affairs of a community, of which he himself is a member." A proctor (procurator) may be agent either for a community or an individual; the term "syndic" is confined to agents representing communities (Morone).

SYNOD. [See COUNCIL.]

SYNOD, HOLY. [See GREEK CHURCH and RUSSIAN CHURCH.]

SYNODAL EXAMINERS. A committee of learned ecclesiastics, appointed in the diocesan synod,[1] numbering not less than six, and (as a rule) not more than twenty members, whose duty it is to ascertain and test the qualifications of candidates for benefices or other Church preferment. They hold office only from one diocesan synod to another. If the committee be reduced below six in the interval between two synods, the bishop makes provisional appointments so as to complete the prescribed number. In countries where diocesan synods cannot be held, as in North Germany, the Holy See authorizes the bishops to appoint synodal examiners with the consent of the chapters. (Ferraris, "Examinatores Synodales"; Taunton.)

SYNODALS. A small payment in the nature of a "cathedraticum" (q.v.), due from the incumbents of benefices to the bishop. The word occurs in the preface to the Anglican prayer-book. The name seems to have originated in the practice of making this payment on the occasions when the clergy met the bishop in synod. (Hook's "Church Dictionary.")

SYNOPTISTS. The name for the first three Evangelists, Matthew, Mark, and Luke. They are so called because their Gospels—differently from that of St. John—give a common outline or synopsis of our Lord's life and teaching. The "Synoptic problem"—that is, the relation between the first three Gospels, their resemblances and differences and dependences — does not fall within the scope of the present work. (See Huck, "Synopse der drei ersten Evangelien"; Camerlynck and Coppiers, "Evangeliorum secundum Matthaeum, Marcum, et Lucam Synopsis juxta Vulgatam Editionem"; Wright, "A Synopsis of the Gospels in Greek"; Pasquier, "La Solution du Problème Synoptique.")

SYNTAGMA CANONUM. Besides the collection called the "Nomocanon" (see that article), Photius, the Patriarch of Constantinople, made, in 833, a second collection of canons, which he designated as above. It contains the canons of the first seven General Councils, and of two councils held at Constantinople by Photius himself; also a series of extracts from the Fathers, and a few civil laws.

SYRIAN CATHOLICS. The name "Syrian Catholic" would naturally apply to all those who use a Syriac liturgy, and to whom Syriac, therefore, is the sacred language. Such are the Chaldeans, or converts from Nestorianism; the Maronites, originally Monothelites; and, finally, the converts from the Jacobite or Monophysite Church in Syria. But in the recognized language of the Church the name of Syrian Catholics is given to the last body, and to no other. These Syrian Christians are subject to the Pope, and of course hold the Catholic faith, but they keep the ancient Syriac rites, which are common to the Jacobites and themselves. [See LITURGIES.]

A congregation of Jacobite Christians had been reconciled to the Church in 1546,[1] and in 1781, on the death of George III., the Jacobite Patriarch, Ignatius [2] Michael Giarve, Bishop of the Syrian Catholics at Aleppo, went, with the approval of Propaganda, to Mardin, the seat of the Jacobite Patriarch, and persuaded the Jacobite clergy of inferior rank, many laymen, four bishops, and the Archbishop of Jerusalem to seek union with the Catholic Church. Ignatius was himself chosen Patriarch by the bishops, and, after being enthroned, he and his electors begged the pallium from the Pope. He nominated the Latin Bishop of Babylon his Procurator at Rome. Meantime, the rest of the Jacobites had chosen another Patriarch. Ignatius, whose election had been confirmed by the Pope in 1783, was driven from Mardin and took refuge at Kesrevân, in the Lebanon, where he founded the monastery of Sajideh el Sharfèh (Sta Maria Liberatrix), which Pius VI. took under his protection in 1787. He died in 1800, was succeeded by Ignatius Michael Daher (resigned 1810); by Simon (resigned 1818); by Ignatius Peter Giarve, elected 1820, but not confirmed, on account of the strife which had broken out, till 1828. Progress was made owing to the conversion of the Jacobite Archbishop of Jerusalem, Gregory Hyza, and his vicar-general, Ignatius Antony Samhiri, in 1827. In 1830 a firman of the Turkish Government recognized the Catholic Patriarch, Ignatius Peter Giarve, as independent of the Jacobites. In 1854 Pius IX. preconized Ignatius Antony Sanctiri [3] as Patriarch of the Syrians, and ruled that he should reside at Mardin. The Syrian Patriarch Ignatius Philip Harcus (d. 1874) was present at the Vatican Council. The Patriarch is chosen by the bishops. He is enthroned during Mass, receives the pastoral staff, takes the oath of obedience to the Pope, and makes the profession of faith prescribed for the Orientals by Urban VIII. in 1642. He sends these formulae, subscribed and sealed, to Rome, and deputes a priest or monk to beg the pallium. He has jurisdiction over all Catholics of his rite in Syria, Mesopotamia, and Egypt. He is himself immediately subject to Propaganda, and to the Vicar-Apostolic of Aleppo, as Apostolic Delegate. He is entitled Patriarch of Antioch.

The diocese of Aleppo is governed immediately by the Patriarch, who is also administrator of the diocese of Jerusalem. There are besides the archbishoprics of Bagdad, Damascus, Emessa, and the dioceses of Beyrout, Diarbekir and Mardin, Gezireh, and Mosul. The Syrians have two monasteries on the Lebanon, that of El-Sharfèh, already mentioned, that of St. Ephrem, and a third, that of Mar-Behnâm, north-east of Nimrud. They are not, however, monasteries in the strict sense, but only houses for communities of unmarried secular priests. The first two serve as clerical seminaries.

TE DEUM. A hymn in the form of a psalm, recited at the end of Matins on all feasts except Innocents' Day, and on all Sundays except during penitential seasons.

1. Its Author and Date.—According to the legend, given in the so-called Chronicle of Dacius, it was sung in alternate verses by Ambrose and Augustine after the baptism of the latter. Dacius, bishop of Milan, died about 555, but the Chronicle which bears his name is now known to be a late and worthless forgery, which, in important particulars, contradicts the confessions of St. Augustine himself. As late as 1695 the story was defended by an Augustinian hermit, Eustachius a S. Ubaldo, but everyone, say the Benedictine editors of St. Ambrose (PL, xvi. 1410), "not utterly ignorant" (non plane rudis) treats it as a fable.

The rule of St. Benedict (cap. 14) orders it to be sung after the twelfth responsory; this and the rule of Tiridius, a disciple of Caesarius of Arles, being, according to Menard ("Annot. in S. Gregor. Sacram." p. 586), the earliest documents which mention it. Gavantus ("Thesaur." tom. ii. § v. xix.) found it attributed, in an ancient MS. Breviary, to St. Abundius; Ussher (see Bingham, "Antiq." xiv. ii. § 9), to Nicetius, bishop of Trèves (d. circ. 535). Abbo, an author of the sixth century, attributed it to St. Hilary of Poitiers. The fact is, the author is absolutely unknown, but the form "suscepturus hominem," or, rather, "suscepisti hominem," as the older texts have it, points to an early date, for this expression fell out of use after the rise of Nestorianism. Daniel, in his dissertation on the "Te Deum" (in vol. ii. of his "Thesaur. Hymnolog."), seems to have established the fact that the psalm is based on a Greek hymn, the text of which he gives from an Alexandrian MS. The Latin is an expansion of the Greek, and the very different forms in which the "Te Deum" occurs show that the hymn gradually assumed its present fixed form.

2. Use as a Hymn of Thanksgiving.—The "Gloria in Excelsis" used to be sung, just as the "Te Deum" is now (Chrysost. "In Cap. i. Coloss." Hom. iii., PG, lxii. 321; Greg. Turon. "De Gloria Mart." i. 63; Anastas. in "In Vita Leon. III." vol. ii. p. 1215, in Migne's reprint). It was the "Te Deum," however, which was sung at the coronation of Charles the Bald, and even earlier, under Pepin, at the translation of the body of St. Germanus, bishop of Paris, if we may believe the author of the narrative in Surius (see Menard, loc. cit. p. 585).

3. Use in the Office.—This in the Roman Church came later than its use on festal occasions. When Amalarius went to Rome in 831 he found it was not sung there except "in nataliciis Pontificum" (Amalar. "De Ord. Antiphon." ad init. p. 1246 in Migne). On the other hand, the Benedictines in the eleventh century were reproached with singing it even in Lent and Advent. (See Henry in "Cath. Enc.," who says: "In 1894 Dom Morin put forward Nicetas of Remesiana for the honour of authorship. His suggestion has been adopted by Zahn, Kattenbusch, Kirsch (in Germany); Frere, Burn (in England), while the Anglican bishop of Salisbury (Wordsworth) considers Morin's conjecture very plausible; and in France by Batiffol; Julian, "Dict. of Hymnology"; Burn, "Nicetas of Remesiana, His Life and Works.")

TEMPERANCE. The last of the cardinal virtues (see that article). In a wide sense it is equivalent to restraint or moderation; but it is commonly used for moderation in certain strong appetites which are concerned with the preservation of the individual or of the race, such as eating, drinking, and generation. These desires are lawful in themselves, but on account of their vehemence they lead to excess, and so become sinful unless they are kept within bounds. Modesty, chastity, sobriety, and similar virtues come under the head of temperance. (See St. Thomas, $2^a\,2^{ae}$, qq. 141–170.)

Among us the word temperance is still further restricted to mean moderation in the use of intoxicants, and sometimes, but incorrectly, it is taken to mean total abstinence from these. The Catholic Church teaches that the use of wine is in itself perfectly lawful (see Ecclus. xxxi. 32 seq.; Jn. ii. 1 seq.; 1 Tim. v. 23). The opposite opinion was part of the Manichaean heresy (see Epiph. "Haeres." 45 et 47, PG, xli. 832, 850). [See ABSTINENCE.] At the same time, the Church holds that drunkenness is a mortal sin. Hence, all her children are bound at least to be temperate. Total abstinence is necessary to some, but only of counsel to others. Those who cannot be moderate or who know that drink, even in moderation, is a dangerous occasion of sin to them, are bound to abstain altogether. Generally speaking, we should insist more upon the advantages of abstinence than upon the obligation of it. Thus, we may abstain either to mortify ourselves, or to satisfy God for our sins, or for the benefit of our health, or for the sake of example, or to save money for our family or for charitable uses. The labours of Father Mathew and Cardinal Manning in the cause of total abstinence are well known. Leo XIII., writing to Bishop Ireland (March 27, 1887), said: "We esteem worthy of commendation the noble resolve of our pious associations, by which they pledge themselves to abstain altogether from every kind of intoxicating drink. Nor can it at all be doubted that this determination is a fitting and truly efficacious remedy for this very great evil [intemperance]; and that so much the more strongly will all be induced to put this bridle upon appetite, by how much the greater are the dignity and influence of those who give the example. But greatest of all in this matter should be the zeal of priests, who, as they are called to instruct the people in the word of life and to mould them to Christian morality, should also, and above all, walk before them in the practice of virtue. Let pastors, therefore, do their best to drive the plague of intemperance from the fold of Christ by assiduous preaching and exhortation, and to shine before all as models of abstinence, and so the many calamities with which this vice threatens both Church and State may, by their strenuous endeavours, be averted." It is noteworthy that the Church has not legislated on the subject. For a long time, however, total abstinence prevailed in the monasteries of Ireland. St. Gilbert of Sempringham, the only founder of a religious order in England [see SEMPRINGHAM, ORDER OF], forbade the use, or the making, of strong drink in his houses. [See LEAGUE OF THE CROSS.] (St. Thom. $2^a\,2^{ae}$, qq. 149, 150; "Discipline of Drink," by Father Bridgett. On recent temperance movements in the different countries see Liese, Joseph Keating, and Shanley "Cath. Enc.")

TEMPLARS. This military order was founded early in the twelfth century, soon after the establishment of the Christian kingdom of Jerusalem, by nine French knights, among whom the leading spirit seems to have been Hugo de Payens. High self-denying fervour and undoubting faith dictated the enterprise, of which the object was to levy a permanent militia, sworn to do battle for the defence and extension of that small area of Christian light and truth pent in on all sides by dark deserts of Mahometan misbelief. On the whole, the Temple—at any rate till within a short time before its dissolution—remained true to the purpose of its institution. Aspirants for knighthood joined it in great numbers; solemn forms of initiation were devised; like a religious order, it was organized into provinces, each containing so many preceptories and commanderies. The knights took the three vows of religion; wealth poured in upon them, was even thrust upon them, but it aggrandized the order, not the individual. In little more than a century the nine knights had grown into a trained army of fifteen thousand warriors. That fervour declined, that contact with Oriental manners sometimes corrupted, that the respect in which they were held engendered pride, and overflowing wealth sometimes brought luxury along with it—all this is true; but to admit it is but to say that the Templars, like other men, felt the pressure of circumstances and were subject to human frailty; it is no proof that their institute was either a mistake or a mischief. While the Christian kingdom endured, the Templars fought strenuously for its preservation; but the unfortunate rivalry between them and the Knights of St. John [HOSPITALLERS] robbed the military efforts of both orders of much of their efficacy. After the loss of Jerusalem (1187) the vassal Christian principalities carried on the struggle, with ever dwindling fortune, for a century longer; and in this struggle the swords of the Templars, though with far too little amenability to any higher control or general plan of operations, were ever wielded with distinguished bravery. At the closing scene of Christian power in Palestine—the fall of Acre in 1291—the forces of the besieged were commanded by the Master of the Temple, who was killed while fighting valiantly. The order then established itself in Cyprus, where the descendants of Guy de Lusignan still reigned, in the hope that time would bring some opening whereby they might regain their footing in the Holy Land. But years wore on and nothing was done. The Hospitallers, who had been driven out of Palestine at the same time as the Templars, still had work cut out for them; wherever they were they could tend the sick; and their well-considered project of attacking Rhodes (in which the Templars refused to share) proved to Christendom that the Knights of St. John had no intention of abandoning the conflict with Islam which they had been waging for two hundred years. The Templars, on the other hand, took up no definite enterprise; they were so rich that they could afford to wait, and so powerful that they dreaded no attack. At once the question arose, What was the use of the Templars? Why should not the order dissolve itself, now that the cause of which they were champions had failed, and that which they had undertaken to defend was lost beyond recovery? In Spain and Portugal only did the order continue to be popular because the knights flung themselves earnestly into the national contest against the Moors. Philip the Fair, irritated at the state and splendour which the Templars observed, and coveting their wealth, laid a deep plot for their destruction. An apostate Italian Templar and a French heretic, his accomplice, informed the king that they could make fearful revelations. Charges were formulated (1307), at the head of which was that of formally denying Christ and spitting on the cross at the time of initiation into the order. They were also accused of sorcery, of idolatry, of foul and unnatural lusts, of causing parts of the Canon of the Mass to be omitted in their churches, of betraying the Christian cause in the East, &c. The King caused all the Templars throughout France to be suddenly arrested on the same day and thrown into prison. Upon their answers to the charges made against them—their denials, admissions, re-denials, and prevarications—volumes have been written, but no solid result has been obtained. Nor can it ever be, since whatever confessions individual Templars made were extorted by torture (which was applied all through this trial with horrible frequency and severity), and were invariably retracted when the victims found themselves out of the King's power. The Pope, Clement V., interfered so far as he dared, but too weakly and irresolutely to save them. Great numbers of the French knights died under the torture or from the effects of long imprisonment; about a hundred were burnt at the stake, on the ground that having retracted their confessions they should be dealt with as relapsed heretics. The Grand Master, Du Molay, after being long kept in prison and driven by torture to admit the truth of some of the charges, finally (in March 1313) retracted those admissions and was burnt at the stake. The order was dissolved in France, and all its wealth seized by the King. In England (1310) Edward II., at the request of the Pope, had caused all the Templars in the kingdom to be imprisoned, but their trial was conducted with less inhumanity, and though condemned, it was upon evidence so flimsy that in the present day a man could not be convicted on it of the most trifling offence. In Spain and Portugal the knights were put on their trial on the same charges, but honourably and enthusiastically acquitted. In Germany also they were acquitted. The Council of Vienne (1311) decreed the entire dissolution of the order.

(The chief works on the history of the Templars are by G. Dupuy, Jos. von Hammer, Havemann, Michelet (in his "Hist. of France"), Raynouard, and Wilke; Fincke, "Papstthum und Untergang des Tempelordens"; Moeller in "Cath. Enc.," who sums up the question thus: "Without taking any side in this discussion, which is not yet exhausted, we may observe that the latest documents brought to light, particularly those which Fincke extracted from the archives of the Kingdom of Aragon, tell more and more strongly in favour of the order.")

TERTIARIES. The status of a tertiary, that is "a member of the third order," was originated by St. Francis of Assisi. After he had founded his own order, and after the order of Minorite nuns [POOR CLARES], living under a rule prescribed by him, had been founded by St. Clare, he instituted (1221) a third order, as a sort of middle term between the world and the cloister. The members, men and women, were bound by rule to dress more soberly, fast more strictly, pray more regularly, hear Mass more frequently, and practise works of mercy more systematically than ordinary persons living in the world. He called them Brothers and Sisters of Penance. They had to undergo a year's novitiate, and to take a simple vow to observe the rule. They were also to abstain from dances and theatrical entertainments, to eschew all quarrelling and contention, not to take up arms except in defence of the Church or their native land, and to take no unnecessary oaths. An immense number of persons, anxious to sanctify their life in the world, joined the order; among these in the thirteenth century were St. Louis of France and St. Elizabeth of Hungary. Many tertiaries in course of time, as circumstances permitted, desired to take solemn vows and live in community, while still conforming to the rule of the Third Order. Thus arose various congregations of tertiary monks and nuns—in Lombardy, Sicily, Dalmatia, France, Spain, and Portugal. One of these congregations alone, the Sisters of St. Elizabeth, reckoned in the middle of the sixteenth century 135 convents and nearly 4000 members. The regular tertiaries were in some cases invested by the Holy See with independent jurisdiction; more commonly they were under the government of the Observant or Conventual Franciscans. The double aspect of the Third Order was noticed by Benedict XIII. in the bull "Paternae sedis," where he speaks of it as "a true and proper order, uniting in one seculars scattered all over the world and regulars living in community"; adding that it is to be distinguished from all confraternities as having its own rule, approved by the Holy See, novitiate, profession, and a habit of determinate form and material. St. Elzear and his wife, St. Delphina, St. Roch, St. Elizabeth of Hungary, St. Bridgit of Sweden, St. Rose of Viterbo, and Anne of Austria were all members of the Third Order of St. Francis. In a rescript of the year 1883 Leo XIII. recommended this order to the careful attention of the faithful in every part of Christendom, as one most suitable to be embraced by seculars who sincerely desire to live nearer to God.

The Dominicans also had their Third Order, founded by St. Dominic himself, in what year is uncertain. These Penitents bound themselves to labour for the recovery and preservation of Church property. The glorious St. Catherine of Siena was for the greater part of her life a member of the Third Order of St. Dominic; St. Rose of Lima also belonged to it. The Augustinian Hermits established a Third Order at the beginning of the fifteenth century. The example was followed by the Minims (1501), the Servites, the Carmelites, and the Trappists, and later by other orders.

THEATINES. This congregation of "Regular Clerks," the first that had been so designated, derived its name from Theate, or Chieti, of which John Peter Carafa, one of its founders, was bishop. The idea of its institution arose in the mind of St. Cajetan, a native of Vicenza, who, having made his legal studies with great distinction at Padua, was appointed protonotary apostolic in the Roman Curia. He became a fervent member of the Confraternity of the Divine Love; and thirsting more and more for the salvation of souls, he resigned his office and took Holy Orders. Family affairs caused him to return to Vicenza, whence he proceeded to Venice, and laboured there for a considerable time. On the advice of his confessor he again fixed his abode at Rome. The reform of the lives of Christians, and especially of the irregularities too common at that time among the clergy, presented itself to him as the object to which God willed him to devote his life. Meeting with Bishop Carafa, who at the time was thinking of renouncing his preferments and joining the order of Camaldoli, St. Cajetan persuaded him to take part in the holy enterprise which he had matured. Two other men of piety and experience, Paul Consiglieri and Boniface de Colle, joined them; and these four, renouncing whatever benefices they had, founded the Theatine Congregation in 1524. It was approved by Clement VII. the same year, in a brief which permitted them to take the three ordinary vows, elect a superior, receive new members, and frame statutes, imparting to them at the same time the privileges of the canons of St. John Lateran. They embraced a more than Franciscan poverty, for they bound themselves not only to have no property or rents, but to abstain from asking for alms, being persuaded that the providence of God and the unsolicited charity of the faithful would sufficiently supply their wants. Carafa was elected the first superior; at the end of three years he was succeeded by St. Cajetan. By degrees the value of their services was recognized and their numbers increased. St. Cajetan died in 1547; Carafa, having been elevated to the cardinalate in 1536, was elected Pope in 1555, and took the title of Paul IV. The congregation received many favours and made signal progress during his pontificate. Besides numerous houses in Italy, they established themselves in Spain, Poland, Bavaria, and at Paris. St. Andrew Avellino, Goldwell, the last Catholic bishop of St. Asaph, the learned Cardinal Thomassi, and Father Ventura belonged to this congregation, which at the present day appears not to be found out of Italy, except at Durango, in Colorado, U.S.A. In 1909 Pius X. decreed the union of the ancient Congregation of the Regular Theatine Clergy with the youthful Spanish Congregation of the Holy Family at Barcelona. The Theatine nuns were founded by the B. Ursula Benincasa, who, having been suspected of being a visionary and a deluded extatica; was declared by St. Philip Neri to be a soul truly enlightened by God; she died in 1618. THEOLOGICAL VIRTUES. Faith, Hope, and Charity are called the theological virtues, because they relate immediately to God. The moral or cardinal virtues (see that article) are concerned with our duties, and so relate to Him indirectly; but the theological virtues have Him for their immediate object—it is God in Whom we believe and hope and Whom we love. These virtues are supernatural because they are beyond the reach of man's natural powers, and because they enable him to attain a supernatural end. THOMAS, ST., CHRISTIANS OF. A name given to Christians on the Malabar Coast, who were once all Nestorians, then all, nominally at least, Catholics, at present partly Catholic, partly Jacobite or Monophysite. The name is supposed to come from St. Thomas the Apostle, who, according to their legendary account, led them to Christian belief; others explain it as referring to a Thomas of Cananes,[1] who is said to have come to the Malabar Coast with authority from Eustathius of Antioch. Assemani, however ("Bibliothec. Orient." tom. iii. p. 2, p. 443), puts this latter Thomas four-and-a-half centuries after Eustathius. Be their origin as it may, the Christians of Malabar (Μαλὲ, ἔνθα τὸ πέπερι γίνεται) are mentioned by Cosmas Indicopleustes ("Topograph. Christ." iii. p. 169; xi. p. 45, ed. Migne), and at that time—viz. A.D. 522—they were in communion with the Nestorian patriarch, for Cosmas says they had a bishop ordained in Persia. Our Alfred is believed to have sent the Bishop Swithelm of Sherborne on an embassy to the shrine of St. Thomas in India (Turner's "Anglo-Saxons," vol. ii. p. 145 seq.). Marco Polo in the thirteenth century speaks of them, and Vasco da Gama in 1498, or at all events on his second arrival in 1502, found them numbering 200,000 souls (Howard). They were Nestorians, using the Syriac language and the three Nestorian liturgies, with a fourth, that of Diodorus (Howard). The Portuguese endeavoured by very cruel means to unite them to the Church, and did produce an external submission. In 1529 Menezes, archbishop of Goa, summoned them to a synod at Diamper, a few miles S.E. of Cochin. They were allowed to retain their chief Syriac liturgy, that of SS. Adeus and Maris, but striking alterations were made after the Roman pattern—e.g. the elevation of the Host was introduced, and the epiclesis common to all Eastern liturgies was placed before the words of institution. At this council Papal supremacy was solemnly accepted, all allegiance to the Nestorian patriarch renounced, and Nestorius anathematised.

The episcopal see was moved from Angalamalé to Cranganore, on the coast, so as to make it more accessible to the Portuguese. Menezes ordered their books to be burnt or in certain cases expurgated, and he did his work so thoroughly that no one has succeeded in finding a copy of their liturgy as it was before the Roman alterations. Four Portuguese or Spanish bishops in succession were set over them, the first of them being Francis Roz, a Jesuit.

These poor people cared very little about Nestorius, whom they had not seen, but they hated the Portuguese, whom they had. No sooner did the Portuguese settlements pass into the hands of the Dutch, who expelled the Jesuits, than about half the Malabar churches ceased to be Catholic. At this time, in 1655, after fruitless endeavours to get a bishop from Cairo, they succeeded in obtaining a visit from the Jacobite[1] Gregory of Jerusalem, who consecrated a native metropolitan. They adopted the Syriac liturgy of St. James from the Monophysites. To judge from a very interesting tract by Philipos, a schismatic chorepiscopus of Malabar, translated and published in 1869 by his friend the Rev. G. B. Howard, they have adopted the Monophysite tenets, the opposite extreme from their old error, in good earnest. In many ways, however, the tract of this chorepiscopus witnesses to Catholic doctrine. Its statements on the sacrifice of the Mass, the Real Presence, obligatory confession, Extreme Unction, prayer to the saints and for the dead, are entirely Catholic. The schismatics refused in 1806 to enter into communion with the Church of England on account of the uncertainty of Anglican ordinations (Howard, p. 157). The metropolitan has civil as well as ecclesiastical authority. He elects and consecrates his coadjutor and successor. The clergy are married; they say Matins and Vespers daily in the church, but are free to follow secular trades.

Soon after the Indian hierarchy was established by Leo XIII., two vicariates were founded for the Christians of St. Thomas, each of which was made subject to a bishop of the Latin rite, whose vicar-general, however, should belong to the Syro-Malabar rite (1887). In 1896 this arrangement came to an end, and four Syriac vicariates were established, viz. Trichur, Ernakulam, Kottayam, and Changanacherry. The number of the united Christians is at present about 450,000, with 470 priests, and 360 churches and chapels. They use the Syriac liturgy. (Assemani, "Bibliothec. Orient." iv. THOMISM. [See DOGMATIC THEOLOGY; also SCOTISTS.]

THREE CHAPTERS. The condemnation of the Three Chapters[1] means the condemnation of (1) Theodore of Mopsuestia, his person, and his writings; (2) of Theodoret's writings against Cyril and the Ephesine Council; (3) of a letter from Ibas to Maris the Persian, also against Cyril and the Council. Theodore anticipated the heresy of Nestorius. Ibas and Theodoret were indeed restored at Chalcedon, but only after they had given orthodox explanations and shown that they were free from Nestorianism. Hence, it was quite possible to condemn the Nestorian or semi-Nestorian error of the "Three Chapters" without falling into the opposite error of Eutychianism and rejecting the definitions of Chalcedon. The Emperor Justinian was led, chiefly by Theodore Ascidas, archbishop of Caesarea, and by Theodora his empress, to believe that the condemnation of the Three Chapters would serve to reconcile the Monophysites in Egypt, and strengthen the unity of the Eastern Empire. In fact, the Severian Monophysites had raised objections to the Council of Chalcedon on the ground that there Ibas and Theodoret had been declared orthodox. (Mansi, viii. 829.) Accordingly, in 544 an edict of Justinian condemned the Three Chapters, and at the same time maintained with Pope Leo the orthodox doctrine that there are two natures in Christ. This edict was accepted by the four Eastern Patriarchs, but opposed in Africa, where Facundus of Hermiane led the opposition, in Illyria, Dalmatia, and by Pope Vigilius, who was summoned that same year to Constantinople.

[1] Properly speaking, the κεφάλαια are the propositions containing the condemnations, not the condemned matter. But in later imperial edicts, the Acts of the Fifth Council, and Papal letters, the term always has the meaning given in the text. Hefele-Leclercq, iii. 1 sqq.

There the Pope changed his mind, and in his "Judicatum" of 548 anathematized the Three Chapters (Mansi, ix. 181).[1] This "Judicatum" excited great opposition in the West, particularly in Africa, where Pope Vigilius was excommunicated in a Council of Carthage, A.D. 550 (Hefele-Leclercq, iii. 37). Besides Facundus, the Africans Fulgentius, Ferrandus, and the deacon Liberatus ("Breviar. causae Nestor. et Eutych.") wrote in defence of the three chapters. That same year Vigilius withdrew his "Judicatum" (Mansi, ix. 153), and agreed to let the matter rest till a council could meet. But, probably in 551, Justinian, without waiting for the council, published another edict against the chapters (ὁμολογία κατὰ τῶν τριῶν κεφαλαίων, Mansi, ix. 537–582), and the Pope, who would not approve it, was subjected to cruel outrage, and at last fled to the Church of St. Euphemia at Chalcedon. In the negotiations between Pope and Emperor, the former gave and then withdrew his consent to the meeting of a council from which the Africans were to be excluded. The council (see CONSTANTINOPLE) met in 553, and to it, on May 14, 553, Vigilius sent his "Constitutum," in which he censured sixty propositions of Theodore, but strictly forbade any personal condemnation of him, or any censure of the writings of Ibas and Theodoret (Mansi, ix. 61–106). The council did precisely what the Pope had forbidden, and on December 8, 553, the latter declared in a letter to Eutychius of Constantinople that "Christ had removed the darkness from his mind," that "it was no shame to admit and retract error" after the example of St. Augustine, and accordingly he condemned the Three Chapters, just as the council had done (Mansi, ix. 413–20). He repeated the same decision in his second "Constitutum" of February 23, 554, which ends with an anathema of the Three Chapters and those who defend them (Mansi, 457–488). Vigilius died on his way home at Syracuse in 554 or January 555. His successor, Pelagius I., also approved the acts of the Fifth Council, which, however, was bitterly opposed in Asia, North Italy, Gaul, Spain, and Britain. The Africans, except a few who were exiled or imprisoned, gave way in 559. Milan was in formal schism till the publication of the "Henoticon" (q.v.) by Justin II. in 571. It was in Istria that the schism was most obstinate. In 607 the Bishop of Aquileia-Grado and those of his suffragans who were in the imperial territory were reunited to the Church. On the other hand, those suffragan bishops who were subject to the Lombard king or to the Duke of Friuli set up a schismatical patriarchate at Old Aquileia. Soon after the Popes granted the title of Patriarch to the Bishop of Aquileia-Grado. The schism continued till the Council of Aquileia in 700. After the union the two Bishops of Aquileia and Aquileia-Grado were both allowed to retain the title of Patriarch. The Patriarchate of Grado was transferred to Venice in 1451, and still continues. The Patriarchs of Old Aquileia, after its destruction, transferred their see to Udine, and the title was abolished by Benedict XIV. in 1751 at the request of Austria (Hefele-Leclercq, ii. p. 923).

(Chiefly from Hefele-Leclercq, iii. The Ballerini, "De Primat." cap. xv. § x. 38, argue that Vigilius did not issue contradictory definitions on the faith, but simply changed his mind on a matter of expediency, and this of course is the only theory consistent with the definitions of the Vatican Council, and the only one admissible. Bossuet ("Def. Cler. Gall." P. iii. lib. vii. cap. xx.), though he urges the history of Vigilius as an argument against Papal infallibility, still allows that the Pope and his opponents "de summa fidei facile consentiebant"; adding, however, "omnino ad fidei causam quaestio pertinebat." The attempt of Vincenzi ("Vigil. Orig. Justin. Triumph. in Syn. V.," Romae, 1865) to deny the most patent facts and treat some of the chief documents as forgeries is unworthy of serious notice. The conduct of Vigilius is defended by Palmieri, "De Romano Pontifice," 650 sqq.)

THURIBLE (θυμιατήριον, thimiamaterium, thuribulum) must be as old as the use of incense in the Church [see that article], and Anastatius in his Life of Sylvester (n. 36) says Constantine presented two thuribles of pure gold, weighing thirty pounds, to the Lateran Church, besides one of gold set with gems for the baptistery. Evagrius ("H. E." vi. 21) mentions a thurible sent by Chosroes to the shrine of St. Sergius. But thuribles in their present form—i.e. with chains attached—do not occur, according to Martigny ("Dict. des Antiq. Chrét." art. Encensoir), before the twelfth century.

Our word "boat" for the vessel in which the incense is carried answers to the Low Latin navicula, which had the same meaning (Ducange, sub voc.), and to the French navette; Ital. navicella.

TIARA. A cylindrical head-dress pointed at the top and surrounded with three crowns, which the Pope wears as a symbol of sovereignty. The word (τιάρα) occurs in the classics to denote the Persian head-dress, particularly that of the "great king." In the Vulgate it is a synonym of cidaris and mitra, and is used for the turban of the high priest (מִצְנֶפֶת, Exod. xxviii. 4), or of the common priest (מִגְבָּעָה, ib. 40). Till late in the Middle Ages tiara was a synonym of mitra, a bishop's mitre, regnum being the word for crown (Ducange, sub voc.).

The whole history of the Papal Tiara is uncertain. Nicholas I. (858–867) is said to have been the first to unite the princely crown with the mitre, though the Bollandists think this was done before his time (Bollandists, "Thesaur." vol. ii. p. 323, quoted by Hefele). But Braun ("Die Liturgische Gewandung," 499) shows that the passage in the biography of the Pope refers to the decoration of the city and not to his coronation (Duchesne, "Lib. Pont." ii. 152). He adds: "Probably the papal head-covering received the circlet at the time when the mitre developed from the tiara, perhaps in the tenth century, in order to distinguish the mitre and tiara from each other. In any case the latter was provided with a circlet by about 1130. The first proven appearance of the word tiara as the designation of the papal head-covering is in the life of Paschal II. (1099–1118), in the "Liber Pontificalis." The second crown was added by Boniface VIII. (1294–1303), as is proved by statues made during his lifetime. The reason for this addition is quite in keeping with the views of this pontiff on the twofold authority of the Holy See. [See UNAM SANCTAM, BULL.] The third crown appears for the first time on the monument of Benedict XII., fragments of which may be seen in the museum at Avignon. Since then the tiara with three crowns has been the rule, though there have been exceptions. The earliest name of the tiara, camelaucum (καμελαύκιον or καμηλαύκιον, made of camel's hair), points to a Byzantine origin. The tiara is placed on the Pope's head at his coronation by the second cardinal deacon in the loggia of St. Peter's, with the words "Receive the tiara adorned with three crowns, and know that thou art Father of princes and kings, Ruler of the world, Vicar of our Saviour Jesus Christ." [1] At ceremonies of a purely spiritual character the Pope wears the mitre, not the tiara. (Hefele, "Beiträge," vol. ii. p. 236 seq.; Ducange; Braun, "Die Liturgische Gewandung," 498 sqq.; Cabrol in DACL, Camelaucum.)

TIERCE. [See BREVIARY.]

TITHES. Tithes are commonly defined as "the tenth part of all fruits and profits justly acquired, owed to God in recognition of His supreme dominion over man, and to be paid to the ministers of the Church" (Ferraris). They were paid by Abram (Gen. xiv.), vowed by Jacob (Gen. xxviii.), and regulated by the Mosaic law (Exod. xxii.; Lev. xxvii.; Num. xviii.). In the early Christian ages the free-will offerings of the faithful supplied what was necessary both for the divine worship and the support of the clergy; but as the conversion of the Western nations proceeded a more permanent provision was seen to be necessary. In a canon of the Second Council of Mâcon (585) occurs the first express mention of the Christian obligation of paying tithes.[1] They began to be generally rendered in the eighth century, not earlier. In 855, Ethelwulf, king of Wessex, father of Alfred, "assigned the tenth part of his land all over his kingdom for the love of God and his own everlasting weal." [2] The tithe of the produce, not the tenth part of the land itself, is certainly here intended. Many authors, both Catholic and Protestant, have imagined that the proportion itself of 1 in 10 was fixed by a Divine precept for ever as that part of our substance which God requires to be devoted to Him; and mystical reasons have been invented to account for this. This belief is now less commonly held. Cardinal Soglia speaks of the tithe as "a certain part, not the tenth part; for it is sometimes greater, sometimes smaller, according to the custom of different places." [3]

Tithes are of two kinds, predial and personal. Predial are those receivable in respect of the annual crops, corn, wine, oil, fruit, &c., and of the increase of cattle, including milk and cheese. These last are called by some "mixed" tithes, but the distinction appears to be unnecessary. Great tithes are of corn, wine, and oil; small tithes, of vegetables and fruits. Personal tithes are receivable in respect of the profits of trade and industry. Property acquired on the title of gift, bequest, or inheritance is not itself tithable; but its annual increase, so far as it is produced by nature or human industry, is so.

Tithes were originally paid to the bishops, but with the erection of separate benefices the right to them passed to the parish priests, in whom it is now vested by the common law of the Church. Predial tithes are due to the parish in which the farm lies, or in which the animals are ordinarily fed; personal, to that in which the tithe-payer is bound to receive sacraments.

Exemption from tithe may be obtained by Papal privilege, by prescription, by custom, or by convention. The Popes in former times often granted the tithes of certain places or districts to princes or nobles who had rendered eminent services to the Church, and allowed them to transmit the same to their successors. Bishops used to grant tithes to laymen for similar reasons; but this was restrained by the Third Council of Lateran (1179), which ordered that no alienation of tithe be made by a bishop without the consent of the Pope. Prescription can only confer exemption, as against a parish church, if it be proved to have existed forty years, and to rest on some title, or if—without a title—it can be shown to be immemorial. Against other churches (monasteries, chapters, &c.) a shorter prescription is sufficient. [PRESCRIPTION.] Custom differs from prescription in that it regards places or countries, while prescription affects persons. By custom, "personal and mixed tithes have almost everywhere become obsolete, and praedial also, in many places, especially where competent revenues of a different kind have been assigned to the parish churches." On the other hand, "the law of tithes can never be abrogated by prescription or custom if the minister of the church have no suitable and sufficient provision from other sources; because then the natural and Divine law,[1] which can neither be abrogated nor antiquated, commands that the tithe be paid." [2] (Spelman, "Of Tythes," Eng. Works, 1723; Ferraris, Decimae; Soglia, "Inst. Can.")

TITLE TO ORDERS. According to the ancient law, no secular cleric could be admitted to Holy Orders except titulo beneficii; that is, he was required to show that he had been nominated to a benefice (of which he would have undisputed possession) sufficient for his decent maintenance (Conc. Tr. xxi. De Ref. c. 2). The same decree of the Council of Trent which lays down this general principle names two other titles to ordination as exceptionally admissible—that which consists in the possession of sufficient private property (titulus patrimonii), and that which depends on a guarantee to the ordinand by some solvent person or persons of an annual sum sufficient to maintain him, in the event of the failure or withdrawal of ecclesiastical resources (titulus pensionis). A fourth title to orders (titulus paupertatis) was, and is, the poverty professed by those who have taken solemn vows in any religious order; since this poverty (as was shown in the article PROFESSION, RELIGIOUS), while it debars the professed from possessing any private income, guarantees to him a maintenance for life on the part of the religious house or order of which he is a member. Benefices having now ceased to exist over a large part of Europe, one of the other titles noticed by the Council is now, under the name of titulus mensae, generally required in German countries. The titulus mensae is the legal undertaking of a third person to provide for the sufficient maintenance of a clerk in major orders, in case of, and during, his incapacity to discharge his functions.

Again, the pupils of certain seminaries—e.g. the College of Propaganda at Rome—and candidates for holy orders in countries where the Catholic Church is circumstanced as in Great Britain and Ireland, may be ordained titulo seminarii, or missionis, now denominated titulus servitii Ecclesiae. The acceptance of this last-named title imposes on the bishop the responsibility of providing for the support of the ordinand if he shall become incapable of discharging his functions, whether it be without fault (emeritus) or through his own fault (demeritus). (Ferraris, Titulus, § 31; Taunton; "Kirchenlex.")

TITULAR BISHOP. [See BISHOP IN PARTIBUS INFIDELIUM.]

TITULAR OF CHURCH. [See PATRON AND TITULAR.]

TITULI. A name given to the parish churches of Rome, as distinct on the one hand from the patriarchal churches, such as St. John Lateran, St. Peter's, St. Mary Major, St. Laurence in Agro Verano, St. Paul's, which belonged especially to the Pope, and on the other from the Diaconia and Oratories. Each titular church was under a cardinal presbyter, had a district attached to it, and a font for baptism in case of necessity. A Roman synod under Pope Symmachus, in 499, enumerates thirty tituli served by sixty-six priests. (Mabillon, "Comm. in Ord. Rom." c. 3.)

Baronius (An. 112, n. 5) supposes the name to be derived from the sign of the cross, which "title" marked them as belonging to Christ. Bingham ("Antiq." vii. 1, 10), with far greater probability, explains the name from the fact that these churches gave a "title of cure or denomination" to the presbyters who were set over them.

TONSURE. The shaving of the crown in a circle, which is a distinguishing mark of clerics. Among some of the monastic orders and friars the tonsure leaves only a circle of hair round the head; the tonsure of secular clerks, on the other hand, is small. The first tonsure is made by the bishop, in a form prescribed by the Pontifical, and the person receiving it is thereby admitted to the state and privileges of a cleric. [See CLERGY, CLERICAL STATE.] The bishop may confer it at any place or time. Mitred abbots may give it to their own subjects, cardinal priests to the clergy of their titles, and it may also be conferred by other priests with special privileges.

The clerical tonsure, it is scarcely necessary to say, was unknown in the first ages of the Church. Christians were simply expected to avoid vanity in dressing their hair (Tertull. "De Cult. Fem." ii., PL, i. 1322), or at most to keep it short ("Const. Apost." i. 3). Ascetics and clergymen were thus naturally led to make a point of cutting their hair close. Jerome ("In Ezech." xliv.) deprecates eccentricity in this respect, and expresses his dislike both of long hair and shaven heads. The so-called Fourth Council of Carthage (c. 44) simply forbids clerics to wear long hair: "nec comam nutriat, nec barbam."

We have, however, clear proof that the clerical tonsure was familiar at least in Gaul during the latter part of the fifth and in the sixth century. For Sidonius Apollinaris (lib. iv. Ep. 13) says the bishop Germanicus had his hair cut "in the shape of a wheel" ("in rotae speciem"), and St. Gregory of Tours ("Vit. Patr." 17) relates that Nicetius was miraculously designated from birth for the clerical state, being born with a fringe of hair like a "corona clerici."

The Fourth Council of Toledo (A.D. 633, c. 41) requires all clerics to shave their heads, leaving only a rim of hair behind, and reprobates the fashion of making only a small tonsure, prevalent among heretics.

Writers of the seventh and eighth centuries distinguish three kinds of tonsure: (1) The Roman tonsure, known as St. Peter's, which consisted in shaving the whole head, leaving only a circle of hair. It prevailed in France and Spain (vide supra) and in Rome (Joann. Diac. "Vit. Greg. Magn." iv. 83). It was only late in the Middle Ages that this tonsure was lessened, and the present distinction between the tonsure of clerics and of monks or friars arose. Chardon shows that the large clerical tonsure continued, at least in some places, down even to the fifteenth century. But as early as 1240 a synod of Worcester (Wilkins, "Concil." tom. i. p. 670) refers to a difference of size in tonsures, the tonsure being increased in size with each step in the sacred ministry.

(2) The tonsure of St. Paul, usual among the Easterns, was entire. When the Greek Theodore came to the see of Canterbury in 668, he had to wait four months and let his hair grow that he might receive the Roman tonsure.

(3) The Celtic tonsure, called St. John's, and by its Anglo-Saxon enemies that of Simon Magus, consisted in shaving the head in front of a line drawn from ear to ear. It was adopted by the British and Irish churches and the disciples of St. Columbanus on the Continent. No question on the comparative merits of the Roman and Celtic tonsures was raised by St. Augustine either at the Oak or at Bangor; but the matter became the subject of violent controversy in the seventh and eighth centuries—e.g. at the Council of Whitby, A.D. 663. (Bede, "H. Angl." iii. 25, 26.)

Even after the tonsure was introduced it was never given separately, but always with the order of reader. Nobody could belong to the clerical state without at least a minor order, and children dedicated to God were not simply tonsured, but made readers, since nothing short of ordination to some grade of the ecclesiastical ministry placed a person in the clerical state. (Isidore, "Ecclesiast. Off." ii. 1.) Then, from the seventh century, according to Chardon, children were tonsured without ordination; and in an ancient Ordo Romanus there is an office "ad puerum tonsurandum"; and lastly, very much later, adults anxious to be free from the secular courts, &c., were tonsured without any ordination. This last custom was of course an abuse

It was only gradually that the right to tonsure was limited to bishops, abbots, &c. Till the tenth century it was given by simple priests, or even by laymen, to each other. (Mabillon, "Annal. Benedict." Praef. ad Sacc. iii. Chiefly from Chardon, 755 sqq.; Taunton.)

TRACT. Verses of Scripture said after the Gradual (not "a form which the Gradual assumes," as Hammond supposes, "Ancient Liturgies," p. 385), instead of the Alleluia in all Masses from Septuagesima till Holy Saturday. Le Brun ("Explic. de la Messe," tom. i. p. 205) says the name means something sung tractim—i.e. without break or interruption of other voices, as in responsories and antiphons—by the cantor alone, and that the theory of Durandus—viz. that the tract is something sung tractim, i.e. in a slow or sad voice—arose by mistake in the tenth century. (Fortescue, "The Mass," 271–2.)

TRADITION (παράδοσις) means properly the act of handing down, and thus the doctrine so handed down. In its widest sense it includes all truths or supposed truths handed down from one generation to another; and in all societies which have no literature tradition is, with all its manifold imperfections, the great bond between the present and the past, and one of the great distinguishing marks between man and the brutes, which latter have no tradition, and therefore no history. Among the Hebrews, as among all other nations, tradition was the only history till an historical literature arose, but among the later Jews the word assumed another and a much more restricted sense. The early Hebrew tradition arose naturally before there was any written law or history; the later Jewish tradition interpreted the written law and added to it.[1] To a certain extent such a tradition arose of necessity, for the Pentateuch is a "Corpus Juris," and no system of law can remain absolutely unchanged. Additions and alterations are inevitable, as the conditions of society change in the course of ages, and the Rabbinical traditions were as defensible as the "fictions" of the Roman lawyers. The danger, however, lay in this, that the law of Moses determined the relation of man to God, the relation of love and kindness between man and man, and in such a sphere the legal spirit is sure to be dangerous, and even pernicious. Hence the charge which Christ makes against the Pharisees, "Ye have made void the law of God by your tradition" (Mt. xv. 6). They used the same "fictions" which lawyers employ to preserve the letter of a law which can no longer be really observed, in treating of God's eternal law. Again, just as a human legislator rightly and necessarily contents himself with regulating the external actions of man, so the Jewish Scribes were apt to make much of outward things, little comparatively of justice and mercy and truth. But we do not mean to discuss the merits and demerits or the unhistorical[1] character of Jewish tradition here. We will only add that Josephus uses the same word, παράδοσις, which was adopted in the N.T. and in ecclesiastical writers. The Pharisees, he says ("Antiq." xiii. 10, 6), imposed many "enactments" (νόμιμα) on the people, not to be found in the written law; the Sadducees, on the other hand, rejected the "tradition of the Fathers" (τὰ ἐκ παραδόσεως πατέρων). Jewish tradition in the strict sense never invaded the Church. In the Judaizing homilies which go under the name of Clement a false tradition is exalted at the expense of the Scriptural text, which is said to have been corrupted by irreligious interpretations (C. Hom. ii. 38–39, PG, ii. 104 sqq.). But this, of course, is quite opposed to the Rabbinical idea of tradition. In the Clementine Recognitions, on the other hand, tradition is only put forward as determining the sense of Scripture ("Recog." i. 21, cf. ii. 45), a notion which is neither Rabbinical nor heretical, but Catholic.

This brings us naturally to speak of tradition in the Church. So far from setting tradition, as such, aside, Christ left His Church with no written books, and with nothing but tradition to guide it. St. Paul insists on the necessity of holding to the Christian tradition (1 Cor. xi. 2; 2 Thess. ii. 15). Even when the Scriptures of the N.T. were written, tradition did not fall out of sight, for the early Christians were well aware that it was tradition which settled the canon of Scripture, and they were not unreasonable enough to reject tradition for Scripture, since the authority of Scripture itself was based on tradition. They knew very well that many barbarous nations furnished converts to the faith although they had no translations of the Bible as yet in their own languages, and could not therefore learn the truth from it. They were convinced, moreover, that though human tradition is in its own nature shifting and uncertain, the Holy Spirit preserved the tradition of truth in the Church. Add to all this the obscurity of Scripture, the fact that it is a collection of books which never professes to contain the sum of Christian truth, and the appeal of the Fathers to tradition becomes quite intelligible. Hence Heresippus (apud Euseb. "H.E." iii. 32) appeals to the "wholesome canon of saving preaching"; Irenaeus and Clement of

[1] The Halakah is legal (from הלך, to go); the Haggadah (from הגיד, to relate) legendary; the Kabbala (from קבל, to receive) mystical; the Massora (from מסר, to deliver) is textual tradition. The last of these has a very real value.

[1] The common account is given in Pirke Avoth, ad init. "Moses received the law [i.e. the secret and oral law, the תורה שבעל־פה. See Buxtorf, Lex. sub voc. מָסַר], from Sinai, and delivered it to Joshua, and Joshua to the elders, and the elders to the prophets, and the prophets to the men of the great synagogue."

Alexandria to the "canon of the truth" ("Adv. Haer." i. 9, 4, ii. 27, 1, PG, vii. 549, 802; Clem. Al. "Strom." iv. 1, p. 564, ed. Potter), and the "Canon of the Church" (ib. i. 19, p. 375[1]). The latter will have doubtful questions decided by an appeal to the Apostolic churches, and considers that tradition would have been a sufficient guide, even if the Church had been left without any Scriptures at all (iii. 4, 1). Just in the same way Tertullian invokes the decision of the Apostolic churches ("Praescr. 17 et passim, PL, ii. 30, and "De Corona," 3, ib. 78), asserts the decisive authority of unwritten tradition, in favour, it is true, of matters of custom and ritual, but of custom and ritual which involved questions of doctrine, such, e.g., as "oblations for the dead." Tertullian speaks for Africa and Rome, Irenaeus for Asia Minor and Gaul. Origen, the great representative of the early Alexandrian church, holds the same language. Since, he says ("De Princip." i. 2, PG, xi. 116), there are differences among Christians, "let the ecclesiastical teaching handed down by order of succession from the Apostles, and abiding till now in the churches, be observed; that only is to be believed the truth which no way differs from ecclesiastical and Apostolic tradition."

The following are some of the testimonies of later Fathers: "It is enough," says Gregory Nyssen ("Contr. Eunom." iv., PG, xlv. 653), "for the demonstration of our position to have the tradition which comes to us from the Fathers transmitted as an inheritance by succession from the Apostles through the saints that followed them." St. Basil ("De Spir. S." § 663, PG, xxxii. 188): "Of the doctrines and decrees [κηρυγμάτων = canons and decrees on discipline, &c.], we have some from written teaching; others we have received, apportioned to us from the tradition of the Apostles in a mysterious manner, both of which [i.e. Scripture and tradition] have the same force." St. Chrysostom ("In 2 Thess." Hom. iv. § 14, PG, lxii. 488), after saying that the Apostles did not hand down all by epistles, but much also without writing (πολλὰ καὶ ἀγράφως), adds: "The one and the other are worthy of belief, so that we consider the tradition of the Church also worthy of belief. It is a tradition: ask no more." St. Epiphanius ("Haer." lxi. 6, PG, xli. 1048): "We must also use tradition, since all cannot be got from the divine Scripture, wherefore the divine Apostles handed down some things in writings, others in tradition." So, much later, St. John of Damascus ("De Fid. Orthodox." iv. 16, PG, xciv. 1172) supports the received doctrine on images by a reference to "unwritten tradition." We have passed over one Greek Father, St. Gregory Nazianzen, because he attributes an exaggerated importance to tradition, and speaks as if the tradition of the Church had added new truths, not clearly taught even by the Apostles. The N.T., he thinks (Orat. xxxi. § 26, PG, xxxvi. 161), only hinted at (ὑπέδειξε) the divinity of the Holy Ghost: "Now the Holy Ghost dwells with us (ἐμπολιτεύεται), making the manifestation of Himself more plain." If we turn to the later Fathers of the Latin Church, we meet with the same appreciation of tradition. St. Augustine, treating of the dispute about the validity of heretical baptism ("Contr. Bapt. Donat." ii. 7, PL, xliii. 133), writes: "I believe it [i.e. the Roman rule of accepting such baptism as valid] comes from tradition of the Apostles, like many things which are not found in their letters, nor in earlier councils, and yet because observed by the whole Church are believed to have been handed down and commended by no others than by them" (the Apostles; see also ib. iv. 24, v. 23). Vincent, in his first "Commonitorium" (cap. 2), the classical work on the subject, argues for the necessity of tradition from the fact that the Bible may be understood in many different ways, although the canon of Scripture is perfect, and "in itself sufficient, and more than sufficient, for all." Here the reader may observe a difference. Other Fathers, and especially Basil, Gregory Nazianzen, Epiphanius, Chrysostom, look on Scripture and tradition as two co-ordinate authorities, each divine. To Vincent the authority is single, tradition not completing but merely determining the sense of Scripture. Cardinal Newman ("Via Media," i. p. 327) points out that even modern "Catholic controversialists, while insisting that they need not prove their doctrine from Scripture, always do so prove it." In other words, they would have no objection to admit that all Catholic doctrine is in some implicit way contained in Scripture, and to grant with Vincent the sufficiency of Scripture illustrated by tradition. There is, on the contrary, a radical difference between the Catholic belief on the necessity of tradition and the opinion of Protestants pure and simple that no doctrine can be an article of faith unless it can be clearly deduced without the aid of tradition from the sacred text. Of such a theory there is no trace in antiquity, except perhaps that Stephen Gobaras the Tritheist ("Phot. Bibliothec." Cod. 132) laboured to set Father against Father, apparently with the view of sapping the authority of tradition. Therefore the Council of Trent (sess. iv. De Canon. Script.), when it teaches that the truth of Christ is contained partly in the Bible, partly in unwritten tradition received by the Apostles from Christ or from the Holy Ghost, and entrusted by them to the Church, that Scripture and tradition (the latter of course only when proved Apostolic) are to be reverenced alike, follows the express teaching of many of the earliest and greatest Fathers, the spirit of all. The advocate of private judgment, on the other hand, is committed to the conclusion that the Church was left for a generation without any true and complete rule of faith; that when this rule was given nobody, not even the holiest and wisest, understood its purpose or use; and that when, after fifteen centuries, this use was understood, the rule intended to secure unity in faith became the most fertile source of strife and division.

In conclusion, the difficulties which arise from the statements of some Fathers who seem to make Scripture the sole guide are only apparent. St. Augustine ("De Doctr. Christ." ii. 9, PL, xxxiv. 42) no doubt allows that the things "openly stated in Scripture" contain the whole sum of faith and morals. We have seen already what St. Augustine thought of tradition, and in this place he adds, "namely, faith and hope," meaning that a Christian may find in the Bible all that he needs to know explicitly in order to be saved, a fact which is undeniable. Optatus ("Schism. Donat." v. 3, PL, xi. 1048) is contrasting Scripture, not with Apostolic, but with human tradition. St. Cyril of Jerusalem ("Cat." iv. 17, PG, xxxiii. 476) tells his catechumens that he will have them believe nothing he tells them except he can prove it out of Scripture. But (1) he refers to the articles of the Apostles' Creed, which can certainly be proved from the Bible; (2) he is contrasting Scripture, not with tradition, but with "probabilities," "ingenious arguments" (λόγων κατασκεύαις), "inventions" of his own (εὑρεσιλογίαις). (The modern dogmatic theologians, especially since the Council of Trent, have a special treatise "De Traditione" or under some similar title: e.g. Franzelin, "De Traditione"; Scheeben, "Theologische Erkentnisslehre"; Bainvel, "De Magisterio Vivo et Traditione." Among earlier writers: Stapleton, "De Principiis Fidei Doctrinalibus," the best refutation of the Protestant rule of faith; Bellarmine, "Controversia," i. 1, 3, and 4; Bossuet, "Défense de la Tradition.")

TRADITIONALISM. A system of philosophy in which intellectual cognition, so far as the human mind is concerned, is reduced to belief in truth communicated by a revelation from God, and received by traditional instruction through the medium of language, which was originally itself a supernatural gift. This system is also called Fideism, and is a reaction from the extreme of rationalism into an opposite extreme of anti-rationalism. De Bonald (†1840) is regarded as its author. In its strictest form this system reduces the intellect to a merely receptive faculty, capable of acquiring knowledge by instruction, which comes originally from God by a primitive revelation given to the first progenitors of the human race. In its modified and milder form it restricts the absolute necessity of a traditional instruction derived from revelation to metaphysical, religious, and moral truth, admitting the capacity of the human mind to discover other intellectual truths by its innate power. M. Bonnetty was the most conspicuous advocate of this modified traditionalism, which for a time obtained numerous adherents among Catholics, especially in France and Belgium. It has been partially adopted by some advocates of ontologism and combined with that philosophical theory. There are, besides, other thinkers and writers whose tendency is to minimize the rational and elevate towards the maximum the traditional element in the highest departments of human knowledge, but who cannot be classed as advocates of traditionalism properly so called. The best Catholic theologians and philosophers have always recognized the moral and practical need of revelation and traditional instruction, for the easy acquisition of complete and certain knowledge of the highest truths within the scope of the natural intelligence and rational faculty of man, by men in general. The reason of this need is accidental, extrinsic, and to be ascribed to the actual condition and environment of mankind in its present state. The specific difference which places the system of traditionalism in opposition to this common doctrine consists in this: to wit, that it makes this need to be a physical necessity arising from the intrinsic essence and nature of the human intellect. The former doctrine has been explicitly formulated and promulgated by the Council of the Vatican in the Constitution "Dei Filius," with an exclusion of the latter opinion. This is a condemnation of traditionalism proper. It had been already condemned by a decree of the Congregation of the Index bearing the date of June 11, 1855, and approved by Pius IX., which set forth four theses to be subscribed by M. Bonnetty. These theses are the contradictories of several propositions extracted from his writings. It may suffice to cite the second and third:

"II. Ratiocination can prove with certitude the existence of God, the spirituality of the soul, the liberty of man. Faith is posterior to Revelation, and cannot therefore suitably be alleged for proving the existence of God against an atheist, or for proving the spirituality and liberty of the rational soul against a follower of naturalism and fatalism.

"III. The use of reason precedes Faith and conducts man to it, by the aid of Revelation and of Grace."

The judgments of the supreme authority in the Church have been submitted to with docility by those Catholics who had adopted the theory of traditionalism, and the controversy respecting this matter has come to an end. For a very full historical and doctrinal exposition of the main points in this controversy see the works of Cardinal Dechamps, vol. vii. "Opuscules."

TRADITION OF INSTRUMENTS. [See ORDER, HOLY, p. 628.]

TRADITORES. A name given to Christians who, in the persecution of Diocletian, gave up to the officers of the law "the Holy Scriptures or the vessels of the Lord, or the names of their brethren" (Concil. 1 Arel. A.D. 314, c. 13). The first edict of Diocletian, A.D. 303, ordered the churches and the sacred books of the Christians to be burnt. Hence the surrender of sacred books (to be burnt), and of vessels (ad fiscum). The edict also deprived Christians of honours and civil rights, and made them, if slaves, incapable of freedom. Hence perhaps bishops, &c., were asked for the list of their flocks, though others think that the traditio nominum was a consequence of Diocletian's second edict, condemning all ecclesiastics to prison, and requiring them to sacrifice. The canon already quoted orders the deposition of all clerical traditores, but allowed persons ordained by traditores to remain in office. (See DONATISTS; Hefele-Leclercq, i. 289.)

TRADUCIANISM. [See SOUL.]

TRANSEPT. In architecture the part of the church which forms the short arms of the cross on which the plan is laid. It extends on the north and south side of the area between the nave and the choir.

TRANSFIGURATION, FEAST OF (ἡ ἁγία μεταμόρφωσις τοῦ K. I. X.). With the Greeks, who, like the Latins, keep it on August 6, it is one of the twelve greater feasts which come next after Easter in dignity (Daniel, "Cod. Lit." iv. p. 239). It is mentioned in the Constitution of Manuel Comnenus, and, of course in the Menologies (Thomassin, "Traité des Festes," p. 406).

In the West its institution is commonly attributed to Calixtus III. (1455–58). But Thomassin (loc. cit.) shows that the feast is mentioned in the Martyrology of Vandelbert (said to have lived about 850); by Ildefonsus in 845, who says it was kept the sixth day before the Calends of August, and was among the chief solemnities; and by Peter the Venerable in the Statutes of Clugny. Gregory IX. (see Bened. XIV. "De Fest.") speaks of it as celebrated on the present day—viz. August 6. Calixtus, however, promoted the observance, in order to obtain the help of God against the Turks, by granting indulgences. He also instituted an Office for the day, which was afterwards altered, in the hymns and lessons of the first two nocturns, by Pius V. (Gavant. "De Fest. Aug." §§ 7, 10, 6.)

TRAPPISTS. A branch of the Cistercian order; see that article. The founder, Armand Jean de Bouthillier de Rancé, born in 1626, was of a noble family. According to an abuse common in that age, the child, being destined to be a priest, was loaded by his father with preferment from his early years. Though only ten or eleven, he was commendatory abbot of La Trappe and two other abbeys, prior of two priories, and canon of Notre Dame of Paris; his ecclesiastical income was from 15,000 to 20,000 livres. He was ordained priest in 1651 by his uncle, the Archbishop of Tours, whose coadjutor he hoped one day to become. His youthful worldliness was gradually shaken by a series of striking incidents; the death of a cousin, a remarkable escape from death, a disappointment to his ambition in the assembly of the clergy, were among the occasions of his entering into himself, and recognizing the nothingness of all for which he had hitherto lived. In 1660 he resigned all his benefices except the abbacy of La Trappe; disposed of his patrimony for 300,000 livres; and gave the greater part of the money to the Hôtel Dieu, or great hospital at Paris. He then repaired to La Trappe, and told the monks that they would thenceforth have to live by the rule of what was called the "Strict Observance" of the Cistercian order. La Trappe was an ancient monastery lying in the heart of La Perche, not far from Séez, founded as a Cistercian house in 1140 by Rotrou, count of Perche. It suffered much during the long wars with England, but its discipline was still more fatally injured in later times by the system of commendation, which gave the name and emoluments of abbot to some non-resident layman or ecclesiastic. When de Rancé came there in 1662, the state of things was deplorable; the monks had ceased to live in community, and if they met at all it was for pleasure parties; the buildings were going to ruin, and persons from without were suffered to live in them. With much difficulty de Rancé succeeded in bringing from a neighbouring monastery some monks of the Strict Observance and in restoring regularity at La Trappe. Still he was not satisfied; an ideal had been for some time floating before his eyes in which were blended the union with God through contemplation and prayer, bodily mortification, and severance from causes of distraction. The final result was the discipline of La Trappe, of which we take an abridged account from Hélyot. "In summer the religious go to rest at eight, in winter at seven. They get up at two o'clock in the night to go to Matins, which usually last till half-past four, because they add the Office of the Blessed Virgin to the regular Office, and between the two make half an hour's meditation. . . . After Matins, in summer time, they may go and rest in their cells till Prime; in winter they go into a common room near the stove, where each reads to himself . . . . At half-past five they say Prime, and then go to chapter," which usually takes up half-an-hour. "At seven they go to work; the cowl is put off, and the under garment tucked up; some dig, others riddle [sift], others carry stones—each according to the task assigned to him, for they are not free to choose the kind of work which they like best. The abbot himself works, and often takes up the most abject sort of employment." Their indoor employments, when the weather does not allow of outdoor labour, include carpentry, joinery, copying, binding, sweeping, and many other useful toils. "When they have worked an hour and a half they go to office; Tierce is said, followed by Mass; then Sext; after which an interval of reading in their own cells is allowed." None is said at half-past eleven; on fast days a little later. They go to the refectory, a very large room with a long row of tables on each side. The abbot's table is laid for six; guests are entertained at it if they offer themselves, but this does not often happen. There are no table-cloths, but the tables are kept very clean. Each monk has his napkin, his mug, his knife, his wooden fork and spoon, which remain always in the same place. The repast consists of coarse brown bread, some vegetable soup made without butter or oil, a mess of carrots, or lentils, two apples or pears, and a little cider. "At or about one o'clock they return to work. . . . This second period of work lasts from an hour and a half to two hours. The recall being sounded, every monk takes off his 'sabots,' puts away his tools, puts on his cowl, and goes into his cell, where he reads and meditates till Vespers, at four o'clock." At five a collation, consisting of dry bread and some fruit, with a little cider, is taken in the refectory. After collation there is a short interval in the cells; then the monks go to chapter and listen to spiritual reading till six, when Compline is said. At seven a bell rings and they go to their dormitories; they sleep on straw palliasses, and in their ordinary dress. Probably the most trying part of all the discipline is the silence, no monk being allowed to speak to his brother on any occasion. The abbot and the guest-master are the only persons in the convent who are permitted to speak to strangers.

The monks of La Trappe for the most part resisted the sophistries of Jansenism. The local authorities in 1790 petitioned that so useful a body of men might be exempted from the general suppression; and when questioned individually as to their desire to change their mode of life, out of fifty-three monks forty-two declared that they wished to live and die in the monastery, in the observance of their rule. After the suppression, an energetic monk named Dom Augustin succeeded in finding a retreat for himself and a score of his brethren in the canton Fribourg, where they occupied the deserted monastery of Val Sainte. From this centre Trappist filiations spread the austere rule of the order into Spain, Belgium, Piedmont, England, and Ireland. Mount St. Bernard in Leicestershire and the Trappistine [1] convent of Stapehill in Dorset are their houses in this country; in Ireland they have flourishing monasteries at Mount Melleray and Roscrea. They have also houses in the United States, Canada, Syria, etc. (Hélyot; "The Cistercian Order, its Object, its Rule," Cambridge, 1895; Obrecht, in "Cath. Enc.")

TREASURE OF MERITS. [See INDULGENCE, p. 451.]

TRENT, COUNCIL OF. The general councils of the fifteenth century succeeded on the whole in one of the principal objects for which they were convened, that of restoring or maintaining the unity of Christendom. At Constance the great schism was closed; at Basle the difficulty with the Hussites was arranged; at Ferrara-Florence East and West were momentarily reunited. [See CONSTANCE, BASLE, COUNCILS OF.] Hence it was natural, that when religious dissension and disturbance broke out in the sixteenth century, a general council should be confidently looked to as the remedy. And yet, as Pallavicini remarks,[2] the remembrance that the Nicene Council did not put down Arianism, nor the Council of Chalcedon Eutychianism, with other like instances, might have served to moderate expectation and check disappointment. The great Oecumenical Council of the sixteenth century, though inferior in no respect to any, even the very greatest of its predecessors, nevertheless, far from suppressing Protestantism, ushered in a long period of strife between Catholics and the various heterodox bodies in every land—a strife of which the end appears to be still distant.

When Leo X. by the bull "Exsurge Domine" (1520) condemned the doctrine of Luther, the latter appealed from the judgment of the Pope to that of a general council. The Diet of Spires (1529) insisted on the convocation of a council, and the Recess of Augsburg (1530), while forbidding religious innovation, promised that the case of the reforming party should be laid before the Council, which the Emperor would induce the Pope to convene. With most of the Protestant leaders this appeal was merely a device of controversy. Luther wrote to Melanchthon: "We must admit the council in this sense, that our doctrine is true apart from the council, that the angels in heaven can change no part of it, and that the angel who should attempt to do so ought to be put under anathema and excommunicated; much more, then, is it inadmissible that the Emperor, the bishops, or the Pope should judge of it." [1]

During the troubled pontificate of Clement VII. (1523–1534) it was impossible to hold the Council; but Paul III. (Farnese) from the time that he was elected Pope bent all his energies to this end. He issued letters to the bishops and the sovereigns in 1537, proposing Mantua as the place of meeting. Various difficulties arose, especially on the part of the Protestants; and after long negotiation it was agreed between Charles V. and the Pope that the place of meeting should be Trent, the ancient Tridentum, an imperial and episcopal city on the Adige, where Italy borders upon Germany, so that the Protestants could not say that the council, being held in an Italian city, would of necessity be unduly influenced by the Pope. The Papal legates were at Trent in 1542, but the war which had just broken out between France and the Empire rendered any large gathering of bishops impossible. The Treaty of Crespy (1544) restored peace to Europe, and the Pope immediately announced his intention of holding the Council. The Emperor gave his consent, and his brother Ferdinand, meeting the German Protestant Princes at the Diet of Worms (May 1545), endeavoured to induce them to accede to the general desire of Christendom. But they pleaded that the Pope, by whom the Council was convened, and who would preside in it through his legates, had already pronounced against them, so that they would only go to Trent to hear their own condemnation pronounced. Yet how could they expect that the Pope and the Catholics would leave the authority of the see of Peter an open question? To do so would have been tantamount to admitting that the Protestants had been justified in separating themselves from the unity of the Church. It was therefore clear from the first that no considerable body of Protestants would submit to the Council; still the Pope hoped, and with good reason, that the firmer definition of Catholic doctrine, and the reform of discipline, which might be expected from the deliberations of the synod, would strengthen the position of all the Catholic rulers of states, and help them to arrest or undo innovation wherever the mischief had not grown to an incurable height.

The first session was held on December 13, 1545. The Pope was represented by three legates, the Cardinals Del Monte (afterwards Julius III.), Cervino, and Reginald Pole. There were present four archbishops, twenty-two bishops, five generals of orders, and envoys from the Emperor and the King of the Romans. The Prince-Bishop of Trent named Count Sigismund von Arco guardian of the council; its secretary was the able Angelo Massarelli. Cardinal Del Monte, addressing the assembly, said: "Is it your will, for the praise and glory of the undivided Trinity, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, for the increase and exaltation of the faith and religion of Christ, for the extirpation of heresies, the peace and union of the Church, the reformation of the Christian clergy and people, and the putting down and extinction of the enemies of the Christian name, to decree and declare that the sacred General Council of Trent begins and has begun?" The Fathers answered, "Placet." The next session was fixed for January 7, 1546.

Three points of great importance were settled soon after the opening of the Council. First, that the bishops should vote, as in the ancient synods, individually, and not, as had been done at Constance, by nations. Secondly, that the work of the definition of doctrine, and that of the reformation of discipline, should be carried on simultaneously. Thirdly, that the style of the conciliar decree should bear the impress of the Papal authority and presidency from the outset. Several bishops desired that, as at Constance, the Council should describe itself as "representing the universal Church." To this the legates would not consent, and it was determined that the style should run thus: "The sacrosanct Synod of Trent, legitimately gathered together in the Holy Ghost, the three legates of the Apostolic See therein presiding . . . decrees," &c.

In the second session the Council regulated various matters of procedure. In the third (Feb. 4, 1546), the Fathers present expressed their adhesion to the Creed of Nicaea and Constantinople, and caused it to be recited before them. New arrivals gradually added to their numbers, and at the fourth session (April 8, 1546), the important decree on Scripture and tradition, rendered signally opportune by the irrational or fanatical opinions on the subject which the Protestant press had been pouring forth for many years, was brought forward and adopted. It declared that the truth and teaching of Christ were contained "in the written word and in unwritten traditions" (in libris scriptis et sine scripto traditionibus), defined the canon of Scripture as embracing all those books, and those only, which we find in the Latin Vulgate (and the Douay Bible), and ordained that the Vulgate translation should be accepted everywhere as "authentic." In the fifth session (June 17, 1546), at which nine archbishops and fifty bishops were present, the doctrine of Original Sin was defined, an important part having been taken in the previous discussions by the Jesuits Laynez and Salmeron, who had come to the Council as papal theologians. The usual method of procedure was this: the projects of decrees on doctrine or discipline, proposed by the legates, were discussed point by point in private conferences of theologians and canonists, and moulded into shape; they were then laid before general congregations, in which each bishop had the right of speaking to them in his turn, and their form was finally settled; lastly, they were adopted and promulgated in public session. After a long interval, in the course of which the disturbed state of Germany nearly led to a prorogation of the Council, the celebrated decree on Justification, prepared in numberless conferences and a long series of general congregations, was adopted at the sixth session (Jan. 13, 1547). By this decree the Lutheran errors, that man is justified by faith only, and that his justice consists in the imputation to him of the merits of Christ, were solidly confuted and demolished. It is generally agreed that the records of no former general council contain a theological statement which for completeness, depth, and solidity of view, for careful and precise expression, and for general impressiveness and cogency, surpasses this Tridentine decree. Thirty-three canons, sanctioned by anathemas, were appended to it, in the twenty-third of which the Council condemns the tenet that man can avoid all, even venial, sins throughout his life, "unless by special Divine privilege, as the Church holds concerning the Blessed Virgin," thus paving the way for the definition of the absolute sinlessness of our Lady promulgated at Rome three hundred years afterwards. The decree on reform passed at this session renewed the ancient canons requiring the residence of bishops, and enacted new rules to the same end.[1]

The doctrine of Justification having been unanimously defined, the means by which the soul receives grace, or recovers it when forfeited, presented themselves for consideration. Accordingly, in the seventh session (March 3, 1547), the prevailing errors on the doctrine of the Sacraments in general were condemned in thirteen canons; fourteen others guarded and elucidated the doctrine of Baptism, three that of Confirmation. The necessity of intention on the part of the priest, at least to do what the Church does in a sacrament, was asserted in the eleventh canon, "De Sacramentis in Genere." [See SACRAMENTS.] A decree of reform in fifteen chapters was also adopted.

An epidemic now broke out at Trent; a bishop and the general of the Franciscans died of it; and the alarm was so great that ten or twelve bishops abandoned the Council and went home. The legates deemed it expedient to transfer the assembly to Bologna, and this view was adopted by the majority of the bishops; a minority, being chiefly those who were devoted to the Emperor, voted for remaining at Trent. Charles V. was strongly opposed to the removal of the Council, and regarded the alleged epidemic as a mere pretext; from that time there was no more cordiality between him and the Pope. There was much danger of a schism, for the imperial bishops would not leave Trent; but the danger was averted by the prudence of the Pope, who, though the labours in conference and congregation went steadily forward at Bologna, would allow nothing to be published while the circumstances were so critical. Sessions viii., ix., x. relate merely to this business of the translation. On September 14, 1547, in a general congregation held at Bologna, the next session, which was to have been on the following day, was postponed sine die. In the following May the Emperor published the Interim, q.v. (a system of doctrine substantially Catholic, but containing several important concessions to the Protestants), which was to be observed in all the German States until the General Council had completed its work.

Paul III. died in Nov. 1549. His successor, Julius III., lost no time in recalling the bishops to Trent, and the second period of the Council commenced with the eleventh session, held on May 1, 1551, under the presidency of the legate, Cardinal Crescenzio. The Council was formally resumed, and the next session fixed for September 1, on which day the business was further postponed to October 11, with an intimation that the Sacrament of the Eucharist would then be treated of. In session xiii. (Oct. 11, 1551), a decree on the Blessed Sacrament of the altar in eight chapters, with eleven canons appended to it, was adopted. The orthodox and primitive belief as to the nature of the gift of His Body and Blood left by Jesus Christ to His Church was re-stated, and the Council (chap. iv.) adopted the term "transubstantiation," as fitly expressing the change which takes place in the elements upon consecration. The Protestants, though their various sects propounded doctrines of every shade on the Eucharistic gift, naturally all fell short in their definitions of the stupendous reality; and this decree has consequently furnished ever since a ready touchstone to distinguish truth and error. In England, down to the date of Catholic emancipation, no one could sit in Parliament without first signing a declaration against transubstantiation.

The Council also resolved in the thirteenth session to postpone the discussion on four points of Eucharistic doctrine,[1] on which it was understood the German Protestants desired to be heard, to January 25, 1552, and meantime to publish a safe-conduct, pledging the public faith that all persons of the German

[1] Before this session it was long debated whether the residence of bishops was obligatory jure divino or jure ecclesiastico. As the obligation was the same in either case, the Pope was of opinion that the question need not be decided.

nation, of what status or rank soever, should be free to come to the Council, confer with the Fathers there, and leave it again, without molestation or interference of any kind.

In the fourteenth session (Nov. 25, 1551), the doctrine of the Sacrament of Penance and that of Extreme Unction were defined. A decree of reform was also passed in thirteen chapters.

By the middle of January, 1552, a considerable number of deputies from Protestant states and cities had come to Trent, and they were received by the Council in a general congregation on the 24th of January. Their demands, presented in writing, were found to be of an impracticable character. One was that their theologians should have an equal consultative and deliberative voice in the Council with the bishops; but to grant this would have been to revolutionize what had been the unbroken ecclesiastical practice from the time of the Apostles. A new safe-conduct, expressed in more ample terms, was read at the fifteenth session. But there was no other fruit of all these negotiations with the Protestants except to prove the earnest desire of the Pope and the bishops to leave the breakers of Church unity without excuse.

At the fifteenth session (January 25, 1552) the business which had been announced was postponed to March 19. But before that day Maurice of Saxony had commenced his march from Thuringia, Germany was full of confusion and alarm, and at the sixteenth session (April 28, 1552) the Fathers present adopted a decree suspending the Council for two years. In May the Emperor was nearly surprised by Maurice at Innsbruck; not long afterwards, disheartened and weary of of life, he abdicated the throne, and retired to the monastery of San Yuste. Thus ended the second period of the Council.

Paul IV. (Carafa), who sat in the chair of Peter between 1555 and 1559, took no step to reassemble the Council; but on the accession of Pius IV. (Medici) it was evident that the Church had received a ruler whose energy in her cause no difficulties could tire, no resistance overcome. He published a bull on November 29, 1560, convening "a sacred general and oecumenical council" to meet at Trent on Easter Day, 1561. It was not expressly said in the bull that this was a continuation of the former Council. That it should ultimately so be deemed was the firm resolution of the Pope, and in this he was altogether supported by Spanish opinion. But the King of France and the Emperor Ferdinand, fearing to exasperate their Protestant subjects, whose opinions had been condemned in the former sessions, were unwilling to consent to the present Council's being regarded as a continuation of the last; they wished it to appear that all debated questions were still open, and might be discussed de novo. Pius made two distinct efforts to interest Queen Elizabeth in the Council. Of the first we have spoken in a former article [ENGLISH CHURCH]; the second was made in 1561, when the Abbot Martinenghi was sent to Belgium, and application made on his behalf for leave to cross to England and lay before the Queen the Pope's entreaty that she would join the Council. The reply [1] to the application was an absolute refusal, based upon grounds some of which were flimsy enough, but such on the whole as the logic of the Anglican position required. The real drift of the document was that England had done with the Pope, and therefore it was useless, and might be mischievous, for her rulers to confer with his emissaries on any subject whatever. Froude thinks this attitude very grand; Catholics may allow that—assuming for a moment the Protestant contention as to the Papacy to have been true—it was consistent and sagacious. But what if England, in rejecting the Papacy, was rejecting an integral part of Christianity? In that case these proceedings were no matter of gratulation, and eventually could not but lead to evil results.

But in spite of the hostility of the English Government, England was not entirely unrepresented at the Council. At some of the earlier sessions Cardinal Pole and Pate, Bishop of Worcester, had been present; now, in 1562, Thomas Goldwell, bishop of St. Asaph, proceeding to Trent after his deprivation by Elizabeth, defined with the assembled Fathers that ancient Catholic faith which his countrymen had received more than eight hundred years before. Ireland was represented by three bishops, Thomas O'Herlaghy of Ross, Eugene O'Hart of Achonry, and Donald McCongail of Raphoe. Mary of Scotland wrote a Latin letter [2] in 1563 to the "Sacrosanct Synod of Trent," in which she referred the Fathers to her uncle, the Cardinal of Lorraine, for an explanation of her position. The Cardinal spoke on the matter at considerable length,[3] unfolding the ruinous state of religion in Scotland, and showing that the few Catholic bishops could not be spared from their task of watching over the feeble relics of Catholicity. The Council replied [4] in terms of feeling and lofty courtesy. They accepted the Queen's excuses, condoled with her on the state of her kingdom, admitted the Cardinal of Lorraine as her envoy and representative, and declared that, among the princes and rulers who in those evil times had been bold in the cause of the Church of God, "assuredly the illustrious name of Mary, Queen of Scotland, would be commended to the undying remembrance of mankind."

The Council was reopened in the seventeenth session (January 18, 1562) by the Papal legates, Cardinal Gonzaga of Mantua and four others, and immediately adjourned to February 26. On that day a decree was adopted relating to the censorship of books; a committee was appointed; ultimately the matter was referred to the Pope; and the result was seen at last in the erection of the Sacred Congregation of the Index [INDEX, &c.]. A fresh safe-conduct, addressed not to the German nation only, but to all those, whether nations or individuals, "who have not communion with us in the things which are of faith," guaranteeing their safety, and entreating them to come to Trent, was soon afterwards published.

Sessions nineteen and twenty were formal only. In the twenty-first (July 16, 1562), the four questions on Eucharistic doctrine, postponed at the thirteenth session, were dealt with. In the twenty-second (September 17, 1562) the doctrine of the sacrifice of the Mass was defined in nine chapters; things to be observed or avoided in the celebration of the same were noted; and the demand for the concession of the chalice to the laity (on which Ferdinand, pressed by his Bohemian and Hungarian subjects, and also the Duke of Bavaria, had much insisted) was referred to the judgment of the Pope.

Disciplinary questions of great difficulty and complexity, the satisfactory settlement of which required an active and patient interchange of views among the bishops and theologians of various countries, caused the next session to be deferred till July, 1563.[1] In the previous March the Cardinal of Mantua died, and was succeeded as legate by the able Cardinal Morone, under whose prudent management the remaining deliberations of the Council were swiftly and successfully carried through.

In January, 1563, the Anglican bishops had met in convocation at London, and adopted a code of Thirty-nine Articles to regulate the religious belief and practice of the English people. It can hardly be doubted that these articles came to the knowledge of the Fathers of Trent, and that several statements contained in them were included among the "errores nostri temporis," against which the dogmatic decree of the twenty-third session (the first held after the publication of the London symbol) was especially directed. Thus the twenty-fifth article denies "Orders" to be a "sacrament of the Gospel," and classes it among "those five commonly called sacraments," which "have grown partly of the corrupt following of the Apostles, partly are states of life allowed in the Scriptures." On the other hand, the Council defines: "If anyone shall say that Order or sacred ordination is not truly and properly a sacrament instituted by Christ the Lord . . . . let him be anathema." A similar opposition of view will come under our notice in other instances.

The decree of Reformation, in eighteen chapters, adopted at the twenty-third session, contained a number of important provisions on the residence of bishops and priests, on ordinations, on the qualifications for the priesthood, and on the erection of seminaries for the training of clergy.

At the twenty-fourth session (November 11, 1563) the doctrine of Christian marriage was defined, and anathema pronounced on whoever should deny it to be truly and properly a sacrament. Here again the conciliar decree is in precise contradiction to the teaching of the Anglican bishops in their twenty-fifth article. A decree in ten chapters on the reformation of marriage was added.

In the twenty-fifth and last session (December 3 and 4, 1563) the Council adopted decrees on Purgatory, on the Invocation, Veneration, and Relics of Saints and Holy Images, and on Indulgences. The Anglican twenty-second article, by a singular choice of words, describes the doctrine of the Holy See on these various and, in part, dissimilar subjects as "a fond thing vainly invented."[2] The Council states what is necessary to be believed upon them all, neither confining the liberty of theologians by an over-preciseness of definition nor leaving any essential point obscure. In the section on Holy Images, reference is naturally made to the decrees of the Second Council of Nicaea against the Iconoclasts. A number of important regulations affecting the religious orders were embodied in the decree "De Regularibus et Monialibus" (on the regular clergy and nuns).

Since the commencement of the third period of the Council, the opposition of the Emperor and the King of France to the view that it was a continuation of the former Council had gradually become weaker, and now the fact of continuity was assumed without disguise, and agreed to by all. The Fathers, arrived at the termination of their labours, agreed to request the confirmation of the Council in all its three phases from the Supreme Pontiff. This confirmation was given on January 26, 1564. It was also determined that all the decrees of the Council which affected ecclesiastical discipline and modified positive law should be considered as coming into force on May 1, 1564.

[1] About the time of the arrival of the Cardinal of Lorraine and the French prelates (Nov. 1562), stormy discussions took place on the jurisdiction of bishops; did it come immediately from God, or from God through the Pope? The Spanish bishops generally held the former opinion. Mendoza's speech is interesting (Döllinger, ii. 98). That episcopal order was jure divino, all, he said, were agreed; on the second point, relating to jurisdiction, "my view is that we receive it from the Supreme Pontiff." Next day the Spanish bishop of Guadix spoke vehemently on the other side; Cardinal Simoneta said he wondered at the speaker's language; there was great excitement. The Archbishop of Granada took part with the Bishop of Guadix, and protested against his being interrupted. But many bishops, with whom was the Cardinal of Lorraine, thought that at a time when the Protestants were denying the authority of bishops altogether the point in dispute might stand over; and this view at last prevailed.

Besides the ambassadors, the names of nine cardinals, three patriarchs, thirty-three archbishops, two hundred and thirty-seven bishops, eight abbots, eight generals of orders, and a hundred and fifty theologians and canonists were inscribed on the attendance-roll of the Council, as having been present at one or more of the sessions. As regards nationality, the Italian prelates, numbering 187, constituted more than half the Council.

Among the prelates at Trent distinguished for their virtue and learning were the Cardinals Del Monte, Cervino, and Seripando, Bartholomew de Martyribus, archbishop of Braga, Paulus Jovius, bishop of Nocera, Diego Covarruvias, bishop of Segovia, Vida, bishop of Alba, and Lipomani, bishop of Modon. Among the more eminent theologians were Peter de Soto and Melchior Canus, Dominicans; Salmeron, Laynez, Le Jay, and Turriani, Jesuits; Michael Baius, Jansenius, Ramirez, Fernandez, &c. The counsel of his holy nephew, St. Charles Borromeo, was a source of strength and enlightenment to Pius IV. during the whole third period of the Council.

(The literature of the Council is given in Cardinal Hergenröther's "Handbuch der allgem. Kirchengeschichte," iii. 232 (ed. 3). Among the most important sources are: Sforza Pallavicini,[1] "History, &c.," in Italian, 1656, in Latin, 1673; Le Plat, "Monumenta, &c.," 1786; Theiner, "Diary of Angelo Massarelli," 1874; Mendham, "Acta Concilii Trid." 1842; Döllinger, "Sammlung von Urkunden, &c." 1876; Druffel-Brandi, "Monumenta Tridentina," 1884–1897. The histories of Raynaldus, Gieseler, Menzel, Alzog, and Rohrbacher, and the critical work of Brischar, may also be consulted. Paul Sarpi's[2] "History of the Council of Trent," first published in Italian at London in 1619, under the feigned name of Polano, is quite unworthy of trust. The Görres Gesellschaft has undertaken the publication of a series of original documents relating to the Council: "Concil. Trid. Diariorum, Actorum, Epistolarum, Tractatuum Nova Collectio," vols. i. and ii., ed. by Merkle and Ehses.)

The martyr Edmund Campion (†1580) wrote in the following terms of the Council of Trent: "The Synod of Trent, the older it waxeth, the more it will flourish. Good God! what variety of nations! what choice of bishops of the whole world, what splendour of kings and commonwealths, what marrow of theologues, what sanctity, what weepings, what fasts, what academical flowers, what languages, what subtilties, what labour, what infinite reading, what riches of virtues and studies, did fill up that majestical sacred place!" (Quoted in Brent's English version of Sarpi's history, London, 1640.)

[1] Pallavicini, a Jesuit, and afterwards cardinal, wrote his history expressly to confute Sarpi; he had access to all the sources of information contained in the Roman archives.

[2] Sarpi was a Servite friar and theologian to the Republic of Venice; but under the frock and outward demeanour of a religious secretly intrigued to introduce Protestantism into the Republic. Pallavicini gives a list of 361 falsifications or misrepresentations of fact in his history, of which Bossuet wrote that it was the work not so much of the historian as of the open enemy of the Council.

TRENTAL. Trentale, trentuale, trentena, trentenarium, tricenarium, trigesimale, trigintale, are different names for the same thing, viz. an office of thirty Masses for the dead. (Ducange.)

TRICERION AND DICERION. Candlesticks with three and two lights signifying respectively the Trinity and the two natures of Christ, used by Greek bishops in blessing the people. (Daniel, "Thesaurus Liturg." tom. iv. p. 382.)

TRIDUUM (a space of three days). It is a pious custom to make preparation for great feasts by spending the previous three days in prayer or other devout practices. The selection of this number is probably due to the frequent mention of it in Scripture. Triduum sacrum is the liturgical name for the last three days of Holy Week. The Rogation days (q.v.) are another instance of the practice of three days' prayer (St. John, "Raccolta").

TRINITARIANS. This order was founded at Rome in 1198 by St. John of Matha, a native of Provence, and an aged French hermit, Felix of Valois, in order to redeem Christian captives out of the hands of the infidels. Affairs in the East had taken an unfortunate turn; Jerusalem had fallen into Saladin's hands, and great numbers of Christian soldiers were in captivity, which, with Mahometans, was equivalent to slavery. The dangers of every kind which beset these unfortunates were what moved the holy founder to make a great organized effort for their relief. The order was sanctioned by Innocent III.; the rule was that of St. Augustine with particular statutes; the diet was of great austerity; the habit, at least in France, was a soutane and scapular of white serge, with a red and blue cross on the right breast. The first monastery was at Cerfroy, in France; this continued to be the mother house till the French Revolution. The work was begun with great energy; John the Englishman and William the Scot, two of the earliest followers of St. John, were sent to Morocco, where they negotiated (1200) the ransom of 186 captives, and restored them to their friends. It was a fundamental rule of the order that at least one-third of its revenues should be set apart for the work of redemption. At Tunis, a short time after the success in Morocco, the saint, having redeemed 120 captives, embarked with them in a ship bound for Ostia. Some Mahometans boarded the vessel, took away the rudder, and tore the sails to ribands; but St. John is said to have hung his cloak and those of his companions from the yard, and to have obtained by prayer such effectual aid from heaven that the vessel was wafted after a few days into the harbour of Ostia.

The Trinitarians had at one time as many as two hundred and fifty houses. It was estimated in the seventeenth century that since its foundation the order had rescued 30,720 Christian captives.

St. John of Matha died in 1213. Five years later, the military order of Our Lady of Mercy (Ransom) for the redemption of captives, commonly called the Order of Mercy, was founded at Barcelona by James I., king of Aragon, and St. Peter Nolasco, with the same general object as that pursued by the Trinitarians. [See RANSOM.]

At the dissolution there were eleven Trinitarian houses in England, five in Scotland,[1] and one (Adare, co. Limerick) in Ireland. Though in fact regular canons, these religious were often called in England Red or Maturin friars, from the colour of the cross on the habit, and because they had a famous house at Paris built near the chapel of St. Maturin.

A reformation make by Father Juan Baptista was approved by the Holy See in 1599, and resulted in the erection of the congregation of "Discalced Trinitarians" in Spain. Their houses, as well as those of the unreformed portion of the order, were suppressed in Spain in the reign of the late Queen, Isabella II.

From the very beginning a number of pious ladies were associated with the order, and in 1236 were admitted to take vows. Their days were spent in prayer for the same pious object, in the education of young girls, and in the care of the sick. They do not seem to have had any houses in England before the Reformation. Some years ago (1886) they came to this country and settled at Bromley, Kent. More than thirty convents of the order have been established in Algiers since the French conquest, where the nuns are engaged in the schools and hospitals.

(Hélyot; Henryon; Latomy, "Hist. de la Fondation de l'Ordre de N.D. de la Mercy," 1618; Tanner; M. Walcott, "Scoti-monasticon"; Deslandres, "L'Ordre des Trinitaires.")

This order is sometimes confounded with that of the CRUTCHED, CROUCHED, or CROSSED FRIARS (q.v.).

TRINITY, FEAST OF. A decretal attributed to Alexander III. in the "Corpus Juris," but really of Alexander II., informs us that some churches kept this feast on the Sunday after Pentecost, others on the Sunday before Advent, while the Roman Church did not keep it at all, since every day the Trinity was praised and worshipped. Very early in the tenth century the feast was kept at Liége, in the twelfth the Abbot Rupert speaks of it as generally observed, and in 1334 John XXII. ordered its observance by the whole Church on the Sunday next after Pentecost. It was formerly kept as a double of the second class, but in 1911 Pius X. raised it to the first class. (Kellner, "Heortology," 116; Benedict XIV. "De Fest.")

TRINITY, HOLY. The mystery of the Trinity consists in this, that God, being numerically and individually one, exists in three Persons, or, in other words, that the Divine essence, which is one and the same in the strictest and most absolute sense, exists in three Persons, really distinct from each other, and yet each really identical with the same Divine essence. The Father is unbegotten, the Son begotten, the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father and Son. Each Person is really distinct from the other, each is the true, eternal God, and yet there is only one God. We can understand how three individual men are distinct from each other and yet possess humanity in common. The unity of the three Divine Persons is altogether different. When we speak of them as one God, we mean not only that each is God, but that each is one and the same God, and herein is the mystery, incomprehensible to any created intelligence. The word Trinity (τριὰς) first occurs in Theophilus of Antioch ("Ad Autol." ii. 15, PG, vi. 1078; cf. Tertullian "De Pud." 21, PL, ii. 1026), who wrote about 180, but the doctrine which the word expresses appears in the New and has its roots in the Old Testament.

(A) The Doctrine in the Old Testament.—(a) Catholics, from the Fathers downwards, full of faith in the Holy Trinity, and knowing that the author of the New Testament is also the author of the Old, have naturally been prepared to find traces of the doctrine in the ancient Scriptures, and have often satisfied themselves that such traces exist in cases where scholarship proves the possibility or even the correctness of another interpretation. In what follows, we have kept constantly in view the least an adversary must admit, the least which grammatical and historical considerations require us to see in any particular text.

Passages there are, quoted by the Fathers, in which God speaks of Himself in the plural. Such are Gen. i. 26, iii. 22, xi. 7; Is. vi. 8. In the first two the Fathers generally see an allusion to the Trinity, most of them do so in the third, a few only in the fourth, which is generally understood as addressed to the seraphim who are mentioned in the context (references in Petavius, "De Trin." ii. 7). Let us take the first passage from Genesis, the strongest, as Petavius thinks, among them all. "And God said, Let us make man in our image." The New Testament gives no exposition of the words. The oldest explanation is found in Philo, and adopted in the Targum of Pseudo-Jonathan, which paraphrases the words thus: "Jehovah said to the angels, ministering before Him, who were created on the second day of the creation of the world, 'Let us make man in our image.'" This view has met with the approval of some modern scholars, but there is no mention of angels in the context, and the notion of angelic agency in creation is Babylonian and Persian, but not Biblical. Another very popular view in modern times is that God uses the plural, just as kings do, as a mark of dignity (the so-called "plural of majesty"), but it is only late in Jewish history that such a form of speech occurs, and then it is used by Persian and Greek rulers (Esdr. iv. 18; 1 Macc. x. 19). Nor can the plural be regarded as merely indicating the way in which God summons Himself to energy, for the use of the language is against this (Gen. ii. 18; Is. xxxiii. 10). The most recent explanation is that of Dillmann (ad loc.), who thinks that God, in the solemn moment of man's creation, addresses Himself as the complex of Divine energies and powers. Akin to the arguments drawn from the above texts is that from the fact that the Hebrew word for God is plural, while it is usually construed with a singular verb. The real origin of this plural form is obscure, but anyhow Petavius most rightly refuses to see in it any allusion to a plurality of Divine Persons. The word for a human master is also often plural, and the same plural form of the word God with a singular verb is used of Dagon (Jud. xvi. 23). Lastly, under this head we may mention the "Holy, holy, holy" of Is. vi., the triple blessing in Num. vi. 24, and the apparent distinction between God and God in Gen. xix. 24: "And Jehovah rained on Sodom and Gomorrah sulphur and fire from Jehovah from the heavens." The first two places may only show that three, like seven and ten, was a favourite (cf. Jer. viii. 4) and perhaps a sacred number among the Hebrews; in Gen. xix. 24, the repetition of the words "from Jehovah" is perhaps merely an old and emphatic equivalent for "from Himself." Its meaning is much the same as that of the words which follow it—viz. from "the heavens," just as ἐκ Διὸς = ἐξ οὐρανοῦ.

(β) The so-called Theophanies. — God, whom no man can see and live, is represented as appearing to the Patriarchs without indication of time or mode, Gen. xii. 7, xxvi. 2, xxxv. 9, by night, xxvi. 24: "the word of Jehovah is said to have come in a vision, xv. 1. God spake to Adam (Gen. iii. 8), but it is not said that He appeared, and an angel (מַלְאָךְ, "legatus," but properly "legatio") who appears in God's name is alternately distinguished from and identified with God Himself (see, e.g., Gen. xvi. 7 seq., xviii., xxxi. 11 seq.; Jud. vi. 11 seq.; Zach. i. 19). The LXX (see Keil on Genesis, p. 128) regarded these cases as apparitions of a created angel, and it appears to us that the view is confirmed by various passages in the New Testament (e.g. Acts vii. 30; cf. Heb. ii. 2, 3; Gal. iii. 19; Acts vii. 53). In the early Church, Scripture was interpreted in another way, and the Fathers, down to St. Augustine's time (references in Petavius "De Trin." viii. 2), believed that "the angel of the Lord" was the Word of God, taking the form of an angel, and alleged such apparitions as a powerful argument against Jews and heretics for a distinction of Persons in God. The interpretation, however, was used by Arians to prove a difference of nature between Father and Son, the former being invisible, the latter visible. St. Augustine's view is expressed in his treatise on the Trinity, and finally prevailed. He argues that God in any Person cannot be seen corporeally, and that a creature, such as the angel who appeared to Abraham, &c., might represent any one of the three Persons. (Augustine, "De Trin." ii. 18, PL, xlii. 866; cf. Jerome, "In Gal." iii. 19, PL, xxvi. 366, who regards the appearances as of created angels representing the Mediator.) This, as it seems to us, is the reasonable view, or rather we should prefer to say that the angel represents God quite independently of His existence in one or more Persons. At the same time, we may fairly look on such apparitions as preparing the way for a belief in the Incarnation, especially when we remember that the "angel of Jehovah" is a title given to the Messiah (Mal. iii. 2). Again, the angel who led the Israelites is called the angel of God's "face or presence" (Is. lxiii. 9), which has a resemblance, though a very imperfect one, to the New Testament doctrine that God is manifested in Christ. So understood, the Theophanies would have an indirect connection with the doctrine of the Trinity.

(γ) Word, Wisdom, Spirit.—The personification of God's word and wisdom in the Old Testament brings us far closer to the doctrine of the Trinity. Even in Gen. i. God is represented as creating by His spoken command, and in Ps. xxxiii. 6 the creative energy of God is summed up in a single term—viz. His word: "By the word of Jehovah were the heavens made" (cf. Ps. cvii. 20, cxlvii. 15). Elsewhere we meet with another form of the same idea—viz. the wisdom of God, which is personified [1] in Job xxviii. 12 seq.; Prov. viii.

[1] It is, of course, hard to draw a clear line between poetical personification and doctrinal statement of hypostatical existence. The beautiful passage in Job, and the reflection of it in Baruch, are clear instances of the former.

ix.; Ecclus. i. 1–10, xxiv. 8; Baruch iii. 27–iv. 4. In the Alexandrian Book of Wisdom we get beyond mere personification, and a real personal existence is attributed to Wisdom (vii. 7–xi.). This Wisdom is "the effulgence of eternal light," "the image of God's goodness"; the spirit in her is "intelligent, holy, only-begotten" (vii. 22). On the other hand, though the book speaks of God's "almighty word" (xvii. 5) "leaping down from His royal throne" to take vengeance on the Egyptians, this seems to be no more than a figure of speech, and the conception of the Word of God falls into the background behind that of Wisdom. It is often difficult to decide whether the attributes ascribed to Wisdom answer most closely to those of the Λόγος in the New Testament, or to those of the Holy Ghost. On the one hand, it is through her that all things are made; on the other, she dwells in the hearts of the just. It can hardly be said that the Old Testament certainly expresses the hypostatical existence of the Holy Spirit, natural as it is for a believer in the Catholic doctrine to interpret various passages of the Old Testament in this way. The Spirit of God works in nature; it endows men with skill of various kinds (Exod. xxxi. 3–6), and particularly with moral virtues, whence it is called the Holy Spirit (Ps. li. 13); it is to rest specially on the Messiah and the people of the Messianic period (Is. xi. 2 seq., xxxii. 15, xliv. 3; Ezech. xxxix. 29; Joel iii. 1, 2). There is indeed one passage in the Vulgate which expressly attributes hypostatic existence to the Spirit of God—viz. Is. xlviii. 16: "The Lord God and his Spirit have sent me" (Is. xlviii. 16: "Dominus Deus misit me et Spiritus ejus"). But in the Hebrew "Spirit" may be, and probably is, the accusative: "The Lord God hath sent me and his Spirit"—i.e. His Spirit to dwell in and guide me.

(δ) In a few passages the Old Testament ascribes Divine attributes to the Messiah, and this, as the Messiah is sent by and is distinct from God (the Father), implies a duality of Persons in God. Some places often adduced, although their true sense and reference to our Lord are certain to us from the light of the New Testament, are scarcely conclusive in and by themselves. Thus in Ps. ii. 7, "Thou art my son, this day have I begotten thee," the sonship does not of itself imply divinity. Israel collectively was God's first-born (Exod. iv. 23), and Solomon as king of Israel was the son of God (2 Sam. vii. 14: "I shall be to him for a Father and he shall be to me for a son"), and the "day" might well be the day of coronation, for the Hebrew Bible never speaks of a mere private individual as a child of God. Sonship belongs to the people collectively or to their representative. In Ps. cx. 1, "Jehovah said to my Lord, Sit thou on my right hand," the word translated Lord (אֲדֹנִי, not אֲדֹנָי) is simply the common term for any lord or master (1 Sam. (1 Kings) xxii. 12); and in 1 Chron. xxix. 23 we read "Solomon sat on the throne of Jehovah, as king." In Ps. xlv. 7, 8, "Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever," the interpretation of the Hebrew words, on mere philological grounds and apart from New Testament authority, is very doubtful. "Thy divine throne" is a rendering to which there is no grammatical objection, and certainly the Psalm in its natural and literal meaning seems to celebrate a royal marriage of the ordinary kind. "This is the name which they shall call him, Jehovah-[is]-our-justice," says Jeremiah (xxiii. 6), speaking of the Messiah. Such a name does not necessarily imply divinity, and we must remember that the prophet says the city of Jerusalem will be called by the very same name. "And this is the name which they shall call her לָהּ fem., not masc. as in Vulg.], Jehovah-[is]-our-justice." In Mic. v. 1, where the origin of Messiah from Bethlehem is predicted, the Vulgate has "his going forth is from the beginning, from the days of eternity." It would be at least equally fair to translate, "from of old, from ancient days," for the word which answers to "initium" in the Vulgate is used by Micheas (vii. 20) of the oath made to the Patriarchs, in Isaiah (xxiii. 7) of the Tyrian commerce, and the word translated "eternity" is used of the ruined walls of Jerusalem at the time of the exile (Is. lviii. 12). There is nothing which compels us to see more in the words than a statement that the Messiah would spring from the ancient house of David. Much more weight must be given to Is. ix. 5, 6: "A child is born to us, a son is given to us, and the princedom is on his shoulder, and they have called his name—Wonderful-Counsellor, God-the-Mighty, Father-for-ever, Prince-of-Peace." "God the mighty one," though not an absolutely certain, is still the most probable rendering (x. 21, to which Gesenius, ad loc., appeals for his rendering "Strong hero," tells quite the other way; cf., however, Ezech. xxxii. 21). The force of the phrase is quite lost in the Septuagint (where, however, it was interpolated—θεὸς ἰσχυρός; see Field, "Orig. Hexapl." vol. ii. p. 4[illegible]), as well as in the other Greek versions (Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion, Field, loc. cit.), and this may account for its not being quoted in the New Testament. It is true that such an expression does not mean as much in the Old Testament, where the name of God is used far more freely (see, e.g., Zach. xii. 8, "the house of David will be as God," and Chron. loc. cit.), as it would in the New, though it is of course very startling and remarkable. In the Book of Daniel the language falls far short of the strength and sublimity which characterize Isaiah. But the doctrine on the personality of the Messiah is, as we should expect, more definite and full. The seer beholds one "like the Son of man" brought before the ancient of days, who gives him eternal dominion over the earth (Dan. vii. 13 seq.). Here the pre-existence and superhuman personality of the Messiah are clearly taught.

To sum up. Here and there the Old Testament clearly and by itself indicates portions of the doctrine, in more the New Testament helps us to discover certain or probable traces of it in the Old, while it is generally held by Catholic divines that some favoured saints of the old law had a knowledge more or less complete of the mystery.

(B) Ancient Jewish Tradition.—We have seen how the conception of the Divine Wisdom stands out in the Old Testament, while the "Word of God" is scarcely more than a metaphor, and the idea remains undeveloped. But in the Targums or Chaldee translations and paraphrases of the Old Testament the "word of Jehovah" is very prominent, and fills a definite position. The oldest of the Targums—that of Onkelos, on the Pentateuch—cannot be earlier than the latter half of the first century after Christ, and that of Jonathan, on the Prophets, belongs to about the same time. But it is admitted by all, even by scholars who put these Targums much later, that they preserve a very old exegetical and theological tradition; and this is the case to a certain extent even with those which, like that of the Pseudo-Jonathan on the Pentateuch, were compiled in the seventh century of our era or even later. In the Targums the Word of Jehovah or of God [1] appears in the main for two reasons. First, anthropomorphical expressions used in the Hebrew of God are applied in the Targums to his Word. Thus, for "they heard the voice of Jehovah walking in the garden" (Gen. iii. 8), the Targum of Onkelos has "the voice of the word of God;" for "Jehovah smelt a sweet savour, and said," &c. (Gen. viii. 21), "Jehovah received his offering with favour, and said by his Word;" for "God came to Balaam by night, and said," &c., "the word from before Jehovah came to Balaam," &c.; and where God is said to have "repented," the Targums qualify the expression, "God repented in his word" (Onk. Ben. vi. 6; Jon. 1 Sam. xv. 11). Next, the "Word" represents God, and is the instrument through which He acts in relation to the world. "I by my word made the earth" (Jon. Is. xlv. 12); "Israel is redeemed by the word of Jehovah" (Jon. Is. xlvi. 17, for "Israel is saved in Jehovah"); "I will place my word for thee there" (Onk. Exod. xxv. 22, instead of "I will make myself known to thee there"). We see no proof that personal existence was attributed to this "Word," [1] and it was certainly not identified either with the "angel of the face" or with the Messiah (Jon. Is. ix. 5, 6; Is. lxiii. 8, 9; Onk. Gen. xvi. 7). In later Jewish theology the "Word" falls into the background, and is replaced by the "Shechinah" (שְׁכִינָה), which denotes the presence of God among his people. It manifested itself specially in the Temple, but if ten persons pray together, if even a man and his wife live piously, the Shechinah is in their midst (Talmudical references in Levy sub voc.). Prominent, too, is the "Mitatron" (מִיטַטְרוֹן, perhaps from μετὰ τύραννον or μετὰ θρόνον), the "angel of the presence," whose name is like that of God. (With reference to Exod. xxiii. 21: the numeral value of the letters is equal, omitting the י, to those in the name of God.)

The theology of the Word is much more complete in Philo, who was born about 20 B.C. His position differed widely from that of the Targumists. Though he knew some Hebrew, he used the LXX, not the original text, and he was deeply imbued with Greek philosophy. The notions of Heraclitus, Plato, and the Stoics, as well as of Jewish tradition, contribute to his conception of the Word. This Word, or Λόγος, is the "idea of ideas" ("De Migrat. Abr." tom. i. p. 452, ed. Mangey); through him the world was made ("De Monarch." lib. ii. tom. ii. p. 225); he is the image of God and the brightness which reflects his essence ("De Somn." lib. i. tom. 1, p. 656); he is God, yet distinct from the Supreme God (Θεὸς, but not ὁ Θεὸς, "De Somn." lib. i. tom. i. 655); he is also the "oldest" or "supreme angel" (πρεσβύτατον ἄγγελον, "De Confus. Ling." tom. i. p. 427); "the first-begotten Son" ("De Agricult." tom. i. p. 308); "high-priest" (ὁ ἀρχιερεὺς λόγος, "De Gigant." tom. i. p. 653). "The Λόγος of Philo" says Siegfried ("Philo von Alexandria" p. 223) "is a thesaurus of all that had been thought out in the O.T. and in Palestinian Judaism on the 'face of God,' the 'angel of Jehovah,' 'Wisdom,' the 'Word,' the 'Name,' on σοφία among the Alexandrian Jews, on the Λόγος among the Greeks." It has been asked whether the "Word" of Philo was personal, and the question has received opposite answers. The truth seems to be that Philo often and distinctly affirms the personality of the Word, but that his language on the point is not consistent with itself. His theory requires him to believe in a personal Word, for he postulates the existence of the Logos on this ground—that the Supreme God could not come into immediate contact with matter, and here, plainly, the conception of the Word as a mere attribute would not have availed. This account of the matter seems to be now generally accepted by scholars (see Soulier, "Doctrine du Logos chez Philon," where there is a complete résumé of opinions). Most certainly, near as Philo comes to the language of the fourth Gospel, he would have utterly rejected the idea of an incarnate Word. Nothing could be more opposed to his whole view of matter, and he does not even "place the Logos in connection with the Messiah" (Westcott, on St. John, p. xvii.)

[1] "מֵימְרָא דיי" generally, דִבּוּרָא in the Jerusalem Targum (Jer. ii.). The Peshito has adopted a third Semitic word to express the Λόγος of St. John—viz. ܡܶܠܬܳܐ. It is worth noticing that this Syriac term can only mean "word," so that the authors of this early version show what sense they attached to Λόγος.

[1] Weber's references to the Targum on the Prophets in proof that the "Word" was the object of prayer are false.

(C) The Trinity in the New Testament.—The absolute unity of God was and is the great article of Israel's faith, and it is asserted with equal emphasis throughout the New Testament (Rom. xvi. 27; 1 Tim. vi. 15 seq.; John xvii. 3). If, then, the New Testament teaches the real, distinct, and divine personality of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, this comes to teaching the Catholic doctrine of the Trinity.

1. The Son or Word of God—The first three Gospels and the Acts describe Jesus as the "Son of God," a title which primarily implies this Messianic office. Because He is the Christ, death cannot bind Him (Acts ii. 24); He is "the prince of life" (iii. 15). After His resurrection, He "receives all power in heaven and earth" (Mt. xxviii. 18). Nowhere, however, is His pre-existence, much less His eternal generation, asserted in terms, but Christ in the Synoptic Gospels certainly claims attributes which can hardly be less than divine (see, particularly, Mt. xi. 27). In the earlier Epistles of St. Paul, His pre-existence is clearly affirmed. Through Him "are all things" (1 Cor. viii. 6); He is "the image of God" (2 Cor. iv. 4); He is "the Lord" (1 Cor. xii. 3; Rom. x. 9); He is absolutely sinless (2 Cor. v. 21); He is "the Spirit" (2 Cor. iii. 17)—i.e. the Holy Spirit is His Spirit, the living principle of His working and indwelling. In Rom. ix. 5, as commonly translated, we have the strongest statement of Christ's divinity in St. Paul, and, indeed, in the N.T.: "Whose are the Fathers, and from whom is the Christ according to the flesh, who is the God over all blessed for ever, Amen." We cannot enter on a discussion of the rendering here. In any case, the text cannot be conclusively urged against an opponent. There is no reason in grammar or in the context which forbids us to translate "God who is over all, be blessed for ever, Amen"—a doxology suddenly introduced, but quite in St. Paul's manner (Gal. i. 5; cf. Rom. i. 25; 2 Cor. xi. 31).

In the Apocalypse we find the term "Logos" peculiar in the N.T. to the Johannic writings (xix. 13, "Word of God;" not, however, ὁ λόγος, as in the Gospel). He is the "beginning of the creation of God" (iii. 14), though this phrase seems to imply priority in dignity rather than in existence.[1] He is "Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end" (xxi. 6), the same phrase which is used (i. 11) of the "Almighty." In the Epistle to the Hebrews the "Logos" is not used as a personal name, but the ideas prominent in the Book of Wisdom recur here, are applied to Christ, and united to the doctrine of his generation as the Son of God before the world was made. Thus, Wisdom (vii. 26) is the "effulgence (ἀπαύγασμα) of eternal light," "the unstained mirror of the working of God," and "the image of his goodness"; and so (Heb. i.) the Son is the "effulgence" (ἀπαύγασμα) of God's glory, the "stamp" or expressed image of "his substance." As Wisdom is the "artificer of all things" (Wisd. vii. 21), so through the Son all things were made, and He upholds all things by the "word of his power" (ῥήματι, not λόγῳ). Not only is the Son, because Son, raised above the angels, but He is addressed as God (v. 8), and the description of God's majesty (Ps. cii. 26-28) is applied to Him. Somewhat similar is the aspect which the doctrine assumes in the later Pauline Epistles, particularly in that to the Colossians, in which Christ is "the centre of the universe, of the spiritual and corporeal world" (the words are Hilgenfeld's). The Pastoral Epistles occupy themselves chiefly with discipline and morals, and supply little matter for our purpose. In Titus ii. 13—"the manifestation of the glory of the great God and [of] our Saviour, Christ Jesus"—a Unitarian could not be expected to admit that Jesus Christ is called "the great God," for the words will certainly bear the interpretation, "the manifestation of the glory of the great God and the manifestation of the glory of our Saviour," &c.—viz. at the second coming. In 1 Tim. iii. 16, ὃς, not Θεὸς, is the true reading. (So Lachmann, Tischendorf, Tregelles, Westcott and Hort. Even Scrivener—"Introduction to the Criticism of the N.T." p. 556—considers it "highly probable" that "Θεὸς of the more recent many must yield place to ὃς of the ancient few.")

The divinity and distinct existence of the Word are most clearly taught in St. John's Gospel. The Word (absolutely only in i. 1 and i. 14) existed before all time; "in the beginning," before things were made, He was. This existence was a personal one, for the Word is no mere attribute, like the reason or wisdom of God, but was πρὸς τὸν Θεὸν—i.e. in active communication with God. (For the force of πρὸς compare Mk. vi. 3, ix. 19; Mt. xiii. 56, xxvi. 55; 1 Cor. xvi. 6; Gal. i. 18, iv. 18.) As the spoken word is distinct from him who utters it, so was the Word distinct from God the Father (ὁ Θεός). Yet in nature or essence He is one with the Father—"the Word was God" (Θεός); "all things came into being through Him," and this without any exception. And the continuance of things, no less than their origin, depends on Him—"That which was made was life in Him."

[1] See Job xl. 19.

As He is the Word or perfect expression of God the Father's being before creation, so, after it, He is the source of all spiritual illumination (i. 9); and lastly, He "became flesh and tabernacled among us," replacing the partial revelations of the past by one which was full and perfect. He is Son as well as Word, but His sonship is different from that which is common to believers. He is Son in the strict sense, with the same nature as His Father; whence He is "the only-begotten from the Father," "the only-begotten Son" (or, perhaps, "the only-begotten God"; so Westcott and Hort, i. 14, iii. 16, 18; see also 1 Jn. iv. 9). He and the Father "are one" (x. 30); to have seen Him is to have seen the Father (xiv. 9). All that had been previously revealed in the Bible, all the results of extra-biblical speculation in the Jewish Church, are here combined—the "Word" of the Hebrew Bible and of the Targums; the λόγος or "reason" of Philo, the creative Wisdom of Proverbs and the Deutero-Canonical books. And the Bible, in one of its latest books, is the exposition of an idea which can be traced back to the words with which the Bible, as we have it, begins: "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth, and God said, Let there be light, and there was light."

2. The Spirit of God.—On the whole, the New Testament, like the Old, speaks of the Spirit as a divine energy or power particularly in the heart of man. The Spirit rests on Christ, and is a power within Him distinct from Himself (Mt. iii. 16, xii. 28; Lk. iv. 1-14; Jn. i. 32), having first caused His miraculous conception (Lk. i., &c.) The Spirit is imparted to Christ's disciples, the citizens of the Messianic kingdom, and is their guide (1 Pet. i. 12; Acts ii. 4 seq., xv. 28; cf. v. 2). This divine Spirit is clearly distinguished from the Spirit or conscience of man (Rom. viii. 16), and the authority of the Spirit is identified with that of God Himself (Mt. xii. 31; Acts v. 3, 9; 1 Cor. iii. 16; but cf. Exod. xvi. 8; 1 Thess. iv. 8). But is a personal existence clearly attributed to the Spirit? No doubt, all through the N.T. his action is described as personal. He speaks (Mk. xiii. 11; Acts viii. 29), bears witness (Rom. viii. 16; 1 Jn. v. 6), searches (1 Cor. ii. 10), decides (Acts xv. 28), helps and intercedes (Rom. viii. 26), apportions the gifts of grace (1 Cor. xii. 11). Most of these places furnish no cogent proof of personality. The spirit of God and Christ (Gal. iv. 6) may be said to do what He operates through man; and again, we must not forget that the N.T. personifies mere attributes such as love (1 Cor. xiii. 4), and sin (Rom. vii. 11), nay, even abstract and lifeless things, such as the law (Rom. iii. 19), the water and the blood (1 Jn. v. 8). However, if we look well to the passage above quoted from St. Paul (1 Cor. xii. 11), we find that the Spirit is distinguished from the gifts of the Spirit, and that personal action is predicated of Him: "All these things one and the same Spirit worketh, dividing to each separately, as He [the Spirit] wills." Poetical personification would be quite out of place here, and Meyer rightly treats the words as decisive. In the fourth Gospel, however, this personal existence is stated more fully and plainly (ch. xiv.). Even the author of the article on the Trinity in Schenkel's "Dictionary of the Bible" ("Bibel-Lexicon," art. Dreieinigkeit), though he writes to show that the doctrine of the Trinity is not Biblical, admits that the hypostatical existence of the Holy Spirit is taught here. "I will ask the Father and He will give you another advocate, that He may be with you for ever, the Spirit of truth. . . . I will not leave you orphans, I will come to you" (v. 16–18). "Advocate" is the same name given in 1 Jn. to Christ Himself, our advocate with the Father, and in each case the name is a personal one. In essence He is one with Christ, so that when He comes, Christ comes too. But He is not, as the writer just quoted thinks, represented as one in person with the glorified Christ; on the contrary, He is "another advocate."

3. Trinitarian formulae occur throughout the N.T. books. Baptism is to be given "into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit" (Mt. xxviii. 19; cf. 1 Cor. i. 13–15, x. 2), which indicates the prevalent idea of baptism, as bringing the baptized into relation with living persons. The persons of the Trinity are further mentioned together by St. Paul (2 Cor. xiii. 13) and by St. Peter (1 Ep. i. 1–2). Considering the strict Monotheism of the N.T., such language implies the divinity, as well as the personality, of Father, Son and Holy Ghost, and they are sufficient warrant for refusing to believe that N.T. writers did not know the doctrine, because they did not, like St. John, state it explicitly.

(D) The Development of the Doctrine in the Church.—1. The Scriptural doctrine of the Trinity, as a whole, is neither expanded nor reduced to system in the Apostolic Fathers. Clement of Rome follows closely the language of the Epistle to the Hebrews. Christ is the "sceptre of God's majesty" [1] (1 Ep. 46), "the effulgence of his majesty" [1] (36, PG, i. 281). The Logos is not used as a personal name (see 27, PG, i. 268; and cf. Heb. i. 3). The uncanonical but early Epistle of Barnabas speaks of Christ as the Son, not of man, but of God (12, PG, ii. 764). Ignatius, on the other hand, is familiar with the technical sense of Logos. Christ is God's "word proceeding from silence" [1] (Magnes.

[1] This is the correct reading, as has been shown by Lightfoot, Contemporary Review, Feb. 1875, p. 357 seq.

8, PG, iii. 669). He is God (Ep. 1 and 7); He is, "God having become in flesh" "from Mary and from God, first impassible, then passible," &c., so that His divine and human natures are distinguished. Among the earliest writers generally, "Spirit" is the term for Christ's pre-existent nature (Hermas, "Sim." ix. 1; "2 Ep. Clem." 9), and this use, which may be traced back even to the O.T. (Is. xxxi. 3: "The Egyptians are man and not God, and their horses flesh and not Spirit"), survived in writers much later than the Apostolic Fathers (Theoph. "Ad Autol." ii. 10; Tertull. "Adv. Marc." iii. 16, PL, ii. 343).

Passing to the middle of the second century after Christ we find much fuller statements, and an approach to a definite theology on the three divine Persons. All the Fathers between the Sub-Apostolic and Nicene age are permeated by the teaching of the fourth Gospel. Justin Martyr is the single exception, and even he is familiar with the doctrine of the Logos. All these writers recognize the divinity of the Word, and in many we meet with statements that the Son is one in substance with the Father, that He is in the Father and the Father in Him, that there are three divine Persons, each answering to the idea of God. Thus, Christ is said to be God by Justin ("Trypho," 126, PG, vi. 769), by Tatian ("Orat. ad Graec." 21, p. 90), by Theophilus ("Ad Autol." ii. 22, p. 120). Justin speaks of Christ as Son of God in the strict sense (1 Apol. 23, p. 60) as begotten like fire from fire ("Trypho," 128, p. 432), and Tatian expresses himself in like manner ("Orat. ad Graec." 5, p. 20); Tertullian ("Adv. Marc." iv. 25, PL, ii. 422) asserts Christ's equality with the Father, and His unity with Him in substance ("Adv. Prax." 2). Athenagoras confesses the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, to be each God ("Leg." 10, p. 44 seq., PL, ii. 422), their distinct personal existence, and their union in power ("Leg." 24, p. 124). These early Fathers reconcile the unity of God with the Trinity of persons by their doctrine of the monarchia or priority in nature of God the Father. Just as in later theology the Father is acknowledged to be the "fountain of Godhead" (πήγη θεότητος), because the one divine essence is communicated from Him to the Son and the Spirit, so the Ante-Nicene Fathers call the Father "the God" (ὁ Θεός) or God absolutely (ὄντως Θεός), the Son only "God" (Θεὸς without the article). This distinction is made explicitly by Clement of Alexandria ("Strom." iii. 12, p. 548; "Quis Dives," 6, p. 939), and usually observed by Justin, though in three places ("Trypho," 56, p. 184; 86, p. 300; 113, p. 180), as the text now stands, he calls Christ ὁ Θεός. Tertullian, writing in a language which has no article, makes an equivalent distinction. To him the Father is "ipse Deus," the Son "hactenus Deus, quatenus ex ipsius Dei substantia" ("Adv. Prax." 26, PL, ii. 189).

2. But in two ways the teaching of many Ante-Nicene Fathers was imperfect and inconsistent with itself. First, their belief on the principatus and on the Theophanies, the mediatorial work of Christ, &c., led them to speak as if the nature of the Son were inferior to that of the Father. Justin, e.g., describes the Word as a "God under the maker of the universe," as a God different in number from the God who made all" ("Trypho," 56, p. 180, p. 184). Clement of Alexandria attributes to the Son a "nature most near to the sole Almighty" Father ("Strom." vii. 2, p. 831). The word φύσις cannot be pressed, still it is noteworthy that in the message quoted he is exalting the Son's sanctity, which, of course, belongs to His nature in the proper sense. Tertullian ("Adv. Prax." 9, PL, ii. 164) declares that the whole substance of the divinity is in the Father, a "portion" of it only in the Son; Origen, that the Son is worthy of a "secondary honour" (τιμῆς δευτερευούσης) after the God of all ("C. Cels." vii. 57, PG. xi, 1501), that he is "different in essence" from the Father (ἕτερος κατ' οὐσίαν, "De Orat." 15), and in a passage, which can scarcely refer to Christ as man, that the Son perhaps foreknows the actions of all creatures.

Next, though in a sense the Ante-Nicene Fathers generally hold the eternity of the Logos, many of them affirm that His generation as Son happened in time. Logos may mean either reason or the Word. Now God, of course, was never without Logos or intellect, and Theophilus ("Ad Autol." ii. 10, p. 80 seq., ii. 22, p. 118) distinguishes between the Λόγος ἐνδιάθετος, the immanent reason of God, and the Λόγος προφορικός, which came forth from God, as a spoken word at the creation. This temporal generation of the Son is also held by Justin (2 "Apol." 6; PG, vi. 453), Tatian ("Orat. ad Graec." 5, p. 20 seq.), Hippolyt. ("Contr. Noct." 10), the author of the "Philosophumena" (x. 32–33), Tertullian ("Adv. Prax." 5, PL, ii. 160; "Adv. Hermog." 3), Novatian ("De Trin." 30), Lactant. ("Instit." ii. 9, PL, vi. 294, 461; iv. 6, PL, vi. 294, 461). On the other hand, the eternal generation of the Son was maintained by Irenaeus ("Adv. Haer." iv. 20, 3, PG, vii. 1033), and, as Cardinal Newman thinks, by the Alexandrian school. Certainly, this is true of Clem. Al. ("Strom." vii. 1, p. 829), of Origen ("De Princip." iv. 28, i. 2, p. 2; cf. Athanas. "De Decret. Syn. Nicaen." 25), if the Latin translation of Rufinus and the quotation of Athanasius are to be trusted. Moreover, we have a clear statement of the eternity of the Son by Dionysius, bishop of Rome, in the middle of the third century (Routh, "Rell. Sacr." tom. iii. p. 375). Enough has been said in previous articles on the Arian and Sabellian heresies. Here, however, we may remark that the Catholic doctrine unites the positive elements in two opposite systems, each of which errs, not by assertion, but by denial. Catholics agree with Sabellians in holding that the Son is consubstantial with the Father, and with Arians in maintaining that He is a distinct Person.

3. The full and perfect divinity of the Son and His eternal existence were defined once and for all in the Nicene Creed. True, the eternity of His Sonship was not defined, and for many years after the Council a few even of the orthodox continued to deny it. Cardinal Newman ("Tracts Theological and Ecclesiastical," p. 244 seq.) shows that this was the case with St. Zeno of Verona (consecrated 362), with his contemporary Victorinus and, for a time, with St. Hilary. But shortly after the Arian Councils of Seleucia and Ariminum this inconsistent opinion died out, and it is mentioned indeed by St. Augustine, but only mentioned as a heresy. (See Newman, loc. cit.)

4. The Nicene Creed in its original form ends with the words, "and [I believe] in the Holy Spirit," and the very fact that belief in the Holy Ghost is placed on the same level with belief in the Father and the Son implies the divinity of all three. Indeed, so much is involved in the very confession of a Trinity, as St. Athanasius points out ("Ep. 1, ad Serap." n. 2,[1] PG, xxvi. 433). This inference, however, was not pressed home by the Council. Some even of those who were orthodox on the divinity of the Son feared to call the Holy Ghost God, partly because they doubted whether Scripture justified such use of language, partly because they feared seeming to confess three Gods (Greg. Nazianz. "Orat." xxxi. n. 1, n. 13, PG, xxxvi. 133). St. Gregory Nazianzen believed that the divinity of the Holy Ghost was to be taught gradually, with great caution, and not to all ("Orat." xli. n. 6, PG, xxxvi. 437), and he defended St. Basil the Great for his prudent reserve on this point. Basil believed that the Holy Ghost was God, but did not at the time say so openly in set terms (Greg. Naz. "Ep." lviii., PG, xxxvii, 116). But it became plain that the matter could not rest here. The Semi-Arians, who thought it enough to admit the Son's likeness to the Father, but would not allow the second Person to be equal to or consubstantial with the first, were driven by the force of logic to make the Holy Ghost a creature. To them, difference in order implied difference in nature, and hence, if the second Person, because second, was only like the Father, the third, because third, could not be even like, with the same exclusive likeness which belonged to the Son. And so Macedonius admitted that "the Son was God, both in all things and in essence like the Father, but he declared that the Holy Ghost had no part in the same prerogatives, calling Him servant and minister" (Sozomen, "H. E." iv. 27). The true divinity of the third Person was asserted at a Council of Alexandria in 362, by two synods at Rome under Pope Damasus, and finally by the Council of Constantinople of 381, in a decree accepted by the whole Church. (Hefele-Leclercq, ii. 1–48.)

5. One great question still remained—viz. the nature of the unity in essence between the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. The heresy of Tritheism was maintained by Ascusnages (Assemani, "Bibl. Or." ii. p. 327), and by Philoponus (d. after 610). As he identified hypostasis or person with individual nature, he argued that, as in Christ there is but one Person, therefore also one nature only, and that as in the Trinity there are three Persons, therefore also three individual natures. On this view the unity of essence is specific, not numerical, and the three Persons are God, only so far as three individual human beings are each man. Such a theory overthrows the unity of God, which is a primary truth of religion, and it contradicts the περιχώρησις or inhesion of one Divine Person in another, which our Lord teaches when He says that the Father is in Him, and He in the Father. Petavius discusses the history of opinion on the point with that fulness of learning, acuteness, and impartiality which are his characteristic gifts, and we can only give his conclusions here. Many Fathers in their contest with Arians, who held a specific difference, wrote as if they believed merely in a specific unity of the Divine Persons. Of this Tritheistic theory, "certain seeds," says Petavius, "may seem to have been cast in the old Fathers, not only in such as lived before Arius, but also in those who lived in the very midst of the Arian controversy"[2] (Petav. "De Trin." lib. iv. cap. 13, n. 3; see also cap. 9, and 14–16). The same Tritheistic error was revived in the West by the Abbot Joachim and condemned by the Fourth Lateran Council (cap. 2, Def. contr. Abb. Joachim) in 1215. The Council defines the distinction of the Persons from each other and the absolute identity of each with the one "individual essence" of God. Another theological principle is involved in the Lateran definition. The Council speaks of the Incarnation as effected "by the whole Trinity in common." Of course the second Person only was incarnate, but all works exterior to the Trinity itself are effected by the three Persons. They are distinct only in virtue of their relations to each other. The Father alone generates, the Father and Son alone breathe the Holy Ghost. But all three have one single nature, and therefore one indivisible operation with respect to the outer world. We do indeed appropriate certain external actions to one of the Persons. We speak, e.g., of the Holy Ghost as the sanctifier because that work of love is attributed with special fitness to Him who proceeds from the mutual love of the Father and Son. In reality the renewal of man's heart is the work of all three Persons equally. It cannot, however, be said that all three Persons are sent, because mission consists in the procession of one Person from another with the production of a temporal effect, visible or invisible ("processio cum habitudine seu connatione temporalis effectus," Suarez, "De Trin." lib. xii. De Missione). All three Persons enter a soul which loves God, but the second and third Persons alone are sent, because they come by an impulse which is one with the nature which they receive, the Son from the Father, the Holy Ghost from the Father and Son. Suarez (loc. cit.) limits mission to cases where a supernatural effect is produced, because in these only God is present in a new way, so present that He would be there even if not already there by His omnipresence.

[1] Ποία οὖν αὕτη θεολογία ἐκ δημιουργοῦ καὶ κτίσματος συγκειμένη;

(E) The Trinity and Natural Reason. —All Catholic theologians are agreed that the existence of the Trinity cannot be proved by reason, and although they add that the doctrine is above but not contrary to reason, still Billuart at least ("De Trin." Prooem. a. 4) admits that we cannot prove "positively and evidently" that the doctrine does not involve a contradiction. The obvious objection presents itself that we cannot believe what is absolutely unintelligible, and again it may be said that a revelation which tells us nothing of God's character brings us no closer to Him, in no way affects our own life, is not a revelation at all.

We reply, that each single proposition held by Catholics concerning the Trinity is quite intelligible, and may, therefore, be the object of real assent, little as we can understand the consistency of these propositions with each other. Further, it is easy to see that the long contest on the Godhead of the Son and the Spirit had a most important meaning. Given, that the Son was the object of worship, then, unless His unity of essence with the Father had been established, Christianity, instead of perfecting the Jewish revelation, would have been a relapse into polytheism. As it was, the Trinitarian doctrine was a safeguard to the belief in the one God; it revealed an inner and eternal life of God which made all Pantheistic confusion between the life of God and the life of the world, all representations of God as the soul of the world, a sheer impossibility. Moreover, every other article of the Christian belief is affected by the faith in the Trinity. It is one thing to regard our Lord as the most perfect of human teachers or even of creatures, quite another to adore Him as the God-man. The daily life of Christians assumed a new sanctity when they came to believe that every good impulse within them came from God the Holy Ghost, that their very bodies are His temple. Nor is it without a special significance that God proclaims Himself as the Father of individual souls, that He teaches us to address Him as our Father in heaven, just when He reveals Himself as the Father from all eternity of our Lord Jesus Christ.

(The Fathers who have treated of the Trinity have been mentioned in the course of the above article. St. Augustine's great work "De Trinitate" goes into the subject much more deeply than his predecessors, and is the foundation of the speculations of the Schoolmen. He was followed by St. Anselm, lib. I., "De Fide Trinitatis"; St. Thomas, 1ª, qq. 27–43. After the Council of Trent the best works are Ruiz, "De Trinitate"; Petavius, "De Trinitate"; Thomassin, "Dogmata Theologica, Tract. De Trinitate." In recent times: Franzelin, "De Trinitate"; Lebreton, "Les Origines du Dogme de la Trinité"; Scheeben, "Dogmatik," i. 743 sqq.; Wilhelm and Scannell, "Cath. Theol." i. 257–354. Among Protestants should be mentioned Bull, "Defensio Fidei Nicaenae.")

TRIPLE CANDLESTICK. The rubric for the blessing of the Paschal Candle on Holy Saturday speaks of "a reed with three candles fixed on the top of it." It does not seem to be considered as a permanent piece of furniture. Nevertheless it has come to be such, and is often constructed of brass (HOLY WEEK, Holy Saturday). Bishops in the Greek Church use a triple and double candlestick in blessing the people. (See TRICERION; Thurston, "Lent and Holy Week," 414.)

TRISAGION. ("O holy God, holy and strong, holy and immortal, have mercy on us"; ἅγιος ὁ θεὸς, ἅγιος ἰσχυρὸς, ἅγιος ἀθάνατος, ἐλέησον ἡμᾶς), a brief hymn so named from the triple ascription of holiness to God. It is sung in the liturgy of Constantinople in the Mass at the "little entrance"—i.e. when the book of the Gospels is solemnly carried from the prothesis to the altar. It occurs more than once in the Syriac liturgy, and probably is identical with the "ajus" mentioned in the "Expositio Brevis" attributed to St. Germanus. This "ajus" was sung in the Gallican rite before the Old Testament lesson and before and after the Gospel. In our liturgy the Trisagion is said by the celebrant during the "adoration" of the Cross by the people on Good Friday. (Hammond, "Ancient Lit." p. 381.) It is also said in the ferial prayers at Prime for penitential days.

The legendary account of its origin is given by St. John of Damascus ("De Fid. Orthodox." iii. 10, PG, xciv. 1017). He says Proclus, bishop of Constantinople in the middle of the fifth century, was leading the prayers during a tempest, when a boy was caught up into the air (συνέβη ἁρπαγῆναι) and taught the Trisagion by the angels. Towards the end of the fifth century Peter the Fuller inserted the clause, "who wast crucified for us" (Hefele-Leclercq, ii. 869), in the interest of the Monophysite heresy, though the addition was capable of a good sense and was defended by some Catholics (Petav. "De Incarnat." v. 4). Calendius, who replaced Peter the Fuller at Antioch, added the other words "O King Christ," so as to remove the heretical taint. But the addition was generally rejected in the West, and in the East except among the Monophysites, who made it a watchword and were thence called Theopaschites. It was bitterly opposed by the monks called Acoemetae [see the article] who, however, fell into the heresy at the opposite pole—i.e. Nestorianism. The addition was also rejected by Acacius in a σύνοδος ἐνδημοῦσα at Constantinople, A.D. 478 (Hefele-Leclercq, ii. 914), and by the Synod in Trullo (c. 81). Gregory VII. ordered the Armenians who were re-united to the Church to abandon it as an occasion of scandal, and the prohibition was repeated by Propaganda in 1635 (Benedict XIV. "De Fest." cccxxx.).

TRIVIUM. [See UNIVERSITY, p. 834.]

TROPE, TROPARION, &c. In the Latin Church tropes were additional clauses, introduced to fill up the long neums sung at High Mass before or after and sometimes in the middle of the Kyrie, Introit, &c. This practice was called "farcing." They were introduced as early at least as 1000 by the monks, but entirely removed at the revision of the Missal under Pius V. The Troperion, Troparion, Troper, &c., i.e. the book containing the tropes, is often mentioned in Church inventories, though the word seems to have been also used for Sequentialis or Book of Sequences. The Bodleian contains a fine MS. Troperium. After Kyries and hymns written on the first few pages comes the title "Incipiunt Tropi de adventu Domini Nostri Jesu Christi." Then follow the other parts of the liturgy which were sung. (Maskell, "Mon. Rit." I. p. xliii. seq.)

In the Greek Church τροπάριον is the generic name for the short hymns with which the Offices of that Church abound. (Neale, "Introduction to History of Holy Eastern Church," p. 832, note b; Blume in "Cath. Enc.")

TRUCE OF GOD (Lat. treuga Dei, or treua Dei, from German Treue, faith). An institution of the Middle Ages, designed to mitigate the violence of private war by prohibiting hostilities from Thursday evening to Sunday evening of each week, also during the entire season of Advent and Lent, and on certain festival days. Respect was shown to Thursday as the day of Christ's ascension; to Friday as that of His Passion; to Saturday because on that day He lay in the grave; and to Sunday because it was the day of His resurrection. The truce was first proposed in the Council of Charroux in 989. St. Odo, or Odon, sixth abbot of Cluny, and Blessed Richard, abbot of St. Vannes, did much to extend it among the Neustrians. A synod at Roussillon in 1027 ordered that it should be observed from none of Saturday to prime of Monday. After the great famine of 1028–30 the bishops of Aquitaine proclaimed a universal peace, but were unable to enforce it, and then limited it to certain days. The right of sanctuary was denied to violators of it. Soon the regulation spread all over France. In 1041 the bishops of Aquitaine ordered that no private feuds should be prosecuted from sunset on Wednesday to sunrise on the following Monday, and this the Council of Clermont extended to the time from Advent to the Epiphany, from Lent to the octave of Pentecost, and afterwards to the feasts and vigils of the Blessed Virgin, of St. John the Baptist, of Sts. Peter and Paul, and All Saints. In 1042 England and Italy adopted it. At the Council of Rheims in 1119 Calixtus II. renewed the truce of God for the above-named seasons, pronouncing excommunication against violators, and commanding that, unless they or their children made satisfaction, they should be deprived of Christian burial. The Second and Third Councils of Lateran (1139 and 1179) confirmed the truce, and gradually the necessity for it wore away. (Hefele-Leclercq, v. 400, 582, 728; Semichon, "La Paix et la Trève de Dieu.")

TRULLO, COUNCIL IN. The word "trullus" (τροῦλλος, τροῦλλα) is base Greek for θόλος, or dome, and the Council in Trullo takes its name from the domical hall in the imperial palace at Constantinople which was the place of meeting. It is also known as πενθέκτη, or "quinisexta," because it was regarded as a supplement to the fifth and sixth councils, which passed no disciplinary decrees. It was convoked by Justinian II. in 692, and its decrees were subscribed by the Eastern Patriarchs, and by other bishops and episcopal proxies (211 in all, but all Easterns). In some of the 102 canons on discipline which the Council passed, the enmity against Rome and the West which at last led to the schism clearly betrays itself. Thus (c. 2), 85 apostolic canons are admitted as authentic, though corrupted by heretics, whereas Rome only accepted 50; and in a long list of canonical authorities there is no reference to Papal decrees or to any Western council except Sardica, and a synod of Cyprian, the latter being evidently mentioned only out of opposition to Rome. In canon 13, priests and deacons are allowed to continue in the married state, and the rule of Rome is contrasted with that of the Apostolic canons. Canon 55 strictly forbids the Roman custom of fasting on the Saturdays of Lent; can. 36 renews in defiance of Rome the 28th canon of Chalcedon on the patriarchal rank of Constantinople;[1] canon 67 condemns the eating of blood, permitted long before in the West, as unscriptural. Pope Sergius I. naturally refused to accept these decrees, and an insurrection prevented Justinian from forcing him to subscribe them. John VIII. accepted the Trullan canons, so far as they are consistent with sound morals and "earlier canons and decrees" of the Popes. Hadrian I. looked on the Council in Trullo as a continuation of the Sixth General Council, and accepted the canons "which were promulgated lawfully and by Divine help" in the first six councils, including that in Trullo (Mansi, xii. 982). Hefele-Leclercq (iii. 348) take the clause as qualifying the Papal acceptance. To the schismatic Greeks the Council in Trullo is a continuation of the sixth and therefore oecumenical. (Hefele-Leclercq, iii. 560–581.)

TUNIC (tunica or tunicella). A vestment proper to subdeacons, who are clothed in it by the bishop at ordination, and exactly like the dalmatic except that, according to Gavantus ("Thesaur." P. 1, tit. xix.), it is rather smaller. Even this distinction is not, so far as we know, generally observed. It is also worn by bishops under the dalmatic when they pontificate. Gregory the Great (Ep. ix. 12) says one of his predecessors had given the subdeacons linen tunics, and that some other churches had adopted this usage, but he himself had restored the old fashion, and left his subdeacons without any special vestment. There is no notice of the tunicella in the Gregorian Sacramentary. But the first (§ 6) and the fifth (§ 1) of the Roman Ordines distinguish between a greater and less dalmatic, and the latter probably is our tunicle. Amalarius expressly marks ("Eccles. Offic." ii. 21, 22) the difference between dalmatic and tunicle, and tells us that some bishops wore one, some the other, some, as now, both. He says the tunic was also called "subucula," and was, when worn as an episcopal vestment, purple (hyacinthina). Honorius of Autun calls the tunicle ("Gemma," i. 229) "subtile," and "tunica stricta" (i.e. narrow); Innocent III. ("De Altar. Myster." i. 39 and 55), "tunica poderes." (Braun, "Die Liturgische Gewandung," 247 sqq.)

TRUTH SOCIETY, CATHOLIC. Founded in 1884 by Bishop (afterwards Cardinal) Vaughan. The objects of the society are: To spread among Catholics small devotional works; to assist the uneducated poor to a better knowledge of their religion; to spread among Protestants information regarding Catholic faith and practice; and to promote the circulation of good and cheap literature. The Society is mainly supported by subscriptions, little profit being made out of the sale of publications. The original Catholic Truth Society was founded in England, but similar independent societies have been established in Ireland, Australia, and the United States. (Britten, in "Cath. Enc.")

TWELFTH DAY. Another name for the Epiphany [q.v.], it being the twelfth day after Christmas.

TYPE. Types, according to St. Thomas (1ª q. 1, a. 10), are persons, things, actions, and events of the Old Testament ordained by God to foreshadow the future. The existence of types is expressly set forth in both the Old and the New Testament. The term "type," which originally means model, form, or figure, is taken from the New Testament. St. Paul says that the first Adam was "a figure of Him that was to come" (τύπος τοῦ μέλλοντος), inasmuch as his carnal paternity is an image of the spiritual paternity of Christ (Rom. v. 14). The things which happened to the Israelites in the desert "happened to them in figure (τυπικῶς), and were written for our correction" (1 Cor. x. 11). The correlative term anti-type (ἀντί-τυπος) is used 1 Pet. iii. 21, where baptism is called the anti-type of the flood and the ark. The notions of type and anti-type are sometimes inverted. Thus the holy places made with hands are termed the patterns (ἀντίτυπα) of heaven, the true holy place (Heb. ix. 24). And in Gal. iv. 22 the two sons of Abraham are set forth as an "allegory" of the two Testaments—allegory being here used for type, as St. John Chrysostom observes. The tabernacle and the sacrifice of Abraham are a "parable" (παραβολή) of the present time (Heb. ix. 9, xi. 19). The priests who served in the tabernacle served "unto the example and shadow of heavenly things" (ὑποδείγματι καὶ σκιᾷ, Heb. viii. 5). Feasts, "new moons, sabbaths" are a shadow of the things to come, but the body (= the reality) is Christ's (τὸ δὲ σῶμα Χριστοῦ, Colos. ii. 16, 17). "For the law had a shadow of the things to come, not the very image (αὐτὴν τὴν εἰκόνα) of the things" (Heb. x. 1). The typical character of the Old Testament is due to Divine ordination: "The end of the law is Christ" (Rom. x. 4). This doctrine is implied in all passages of the New Testament in which occurs the formula "that it might be fulfilled" (Mt.

Societe de St Augustin,

X. b. 40.

ii. 15, xiii. 35; Jn. xix. 36), or "then was fulfilled," e.g. Mt. ii. 17, xxvii. 9, &c. Types or figures, then, are symbolical prophecies. Their object, like that of symbols, is to impart supersensible notions through the agency of things that strike the senses. They may refer to the present, as e.g. the wooden or iron yokes worn by Jeremiah; or to the past, as e.g. the veiling of the head to the sin of Adam; or to the future, as the paschal lamb to the sacrificial death of Christ. (Maas in "Cath. Enc."; Gigot, "General Introd. to H. Script." p. 387.)

UBIQUITARIANS. Ubiquity, or omnipresence, is a natural property of God, and the Apollinarists and Eutychians, who confused the two natures in Christ, taught that Christ, as man, was everywhere. Some taught that this confusion, by which divine attributes became proper to Christ as man, took place at the incarnation, others only after His death and resurrection. This theory is, of course, directly contrary to the definition of Chalcedon (Petav. "De Incarn." x. 7).

The Eutychian doctrine on the omnipresence of Christ's body was revived by Luther in his controversy with the Zwinglians. The latter denied that God Himself could cause a body to exist in more than one place at the same time; Luther, in a sermon of 1527 ("Quod Verba Stent"), and in the "Confessio Major" of 1528, replied that Christ's body was not only in heaven and in the Eucharist, but everywhere, and this of necessity. The humanity, he argued, is united to the divinity; the latter is omnipresent, therefore the former also. Again, Christ as man is at the right hand of God; God's right hand is everywhere, therefore also Christ as man (Bossuet, "Hist. des Variations," liv. ii. n. xliii.). Not only Calvinists and Zwinglians, but Melanchthon opposed this doctrine. He pointed out that it led to a confusion of the two natures, and also to a denial of that very mystery of the Real Presence which it was intended to support. Christ would not be more truly present in the Eucharist than in any piece of wood or stone (Bossuet, loc. cit. viii. n. xxxvii.). The belief in the ubiquity, however, became a mark of the Lutheran orthodoxy, and was inserted in the famous "Formula of Concord," A.D. 1577,[1] although the doctrine had been silently omitted in the Augsburg Confession, A.D. 1530 (Bossuet, ib. n. xlvi.).

UNAM SANCTAM (one, holy, Catholic Church). The bull on papal supremacy published by Boniface VIII. in 1302. Attempts have been made to disprove its genuineness, but this is established beyond all doubt by the entry of it in the official registers of papal briefs, and its incorporation in the canon law ("Corpus Jur. Can." 1, I., tit. v. viii., Extrav. Comm. de majoritate et obedientia, c. 1). After proving from Scripture that the Church is one and can have only one Shepherd, the bull goes on to the famous metaphor of the two swords: "The Gospel teaches us that there are two swords in the hand of this Shepherd, the spiritual sword and the temporal sword. When the apostles said 'Behold, here are two swords' (that is, in the Church), the Lord did not answer 'It is too many,' but 'It is enough.' He who would deny that the temporal sword is in the power of Peter misunderstands the word of the Lord: 'Put up again thy sword into its place.' The two swords, spiritual and temporal, are then in the Church's power; the first to be wielded (exercendus) by the Church, the other for the Church; the first by the priests, the other by kings and soldiers, but at the beck and permission of the priest (ad nutum et patientiam sacerdotis). Now the one sword must be under the other, and the temporal authority must be subject to the spiritual . . . That the spiritual power surpasses the temporal in honour and dignity must be acknowledged, all the more clearly seeing that spiritual things generally surpass temporal . . . 'The spiritual man judgeth all things, but he is judged by no man' (1 Cor. ii. 15). Although a man has received and exercises this power, it is no human power, but rather a divine power, given to Peter and his successors by the mouth of God: 'Whatsoever thou shalt bind,' &c. Whoso resisteth this power ordained by God resisteth the ordinance of God . . . Wherefore we declare, say, define, and pronounce that to be subject to the Roman Pontiff is for every human creature a necessity of salvation. (Porro subesse Romano pontifici omni creaturae humanae declaramus, dicimus, definimus, et pronunciamus omnino esse de necessitate salutis.)" As Cardinal Hergenröther remarks: "In this bull it is only defined that all must give due religious obedience to the Pope, not obedience in purely temporal matters. One sentence alone is marked out as a definition of the Church by the words 'We declare, define, &c.' All the rest of the bull is no definition." ("Catholic Church and Christian State," i. 31.) The Church has never declared it to be an article of faith that temporal princes, as such, are in temporal matters subject to the Pope, though individual theologians have indeed held them to be so in certain cases. UNION, LA SAINTE. The religious congregation of the Sisters of La Sainte Union des Sacrés Cœurs was founded at Douai by the Abbé Debrabant. The rule and constitutions are chiefly taken from the mild rule prescribed by St. Francis of Sales to the nuns of the Visitation. [VISITATION, ORDER OF THE.] The object of the institute is the education of girls in every rank of society. Before the suppression of religious houses in France in 1905 these sisters had many convents there. They have also many in Belgium, England, North and South America, &c.

UNITED GREEKS. The name includes all who follow the Greek rite and, at the same time, acknowledge the authority of the Pope —i.e. the United Melchites in the East; the Ruthenian Catholics, who use the Greek liturgy in a Slavonic version; the Greek Catholics of Italy; and the Catholics of the Greco-Roumaic rite in Hungary and Siebenbürgen. Of the Melchites and Ruthenians an account has been given already.

(1) The Greeks in Italy.—Many Greeks came thither from Albania about 1468, and the Greek settlements became more and more numerous after Soliman (1538–40) drove the Venetians from the Archipelago; after the conquest of Cyprus by Selim II. in 1571; and after 1718, when Venice lost the last remnant of her possessions in the Morea. In the eighteenth century there were about 100,000 Greeks in Italy, especially in Calabria and Sicily, and they obtained various privileges from Leo X., Paul III., and Julius III. Pius IV. withdrew these concessions in 1564, and placed the Greeks under Latin bishops, allowing them, however, to retain their rites. Their position was finally determined by the bull of Benedict XIV., "Etsi Pastoralis" (May 26, 1742). According to the rules there laid down, they have their own clergy, who may marry when in minor orders and continue in the married state after they are priests. They are forbidden, however, under pain of deposition, to contract a second marriage. They have three seminaries—viz. the Greek College of St. Athanasius at Rome, erected in 1577 by Gregory XIII.; the College at Palermo, erected in 1715; the College of S. Benedetto di Ullano, in the Calabrian diocese of Bisignano, erected by Clement XII. in 1732, and transferred to the Basilian monastery of St. Adrian in 1820. Each college has a bishop of the Greek rite residing in it, for the ordination of candidates; and the bishops at Palermo and in the seminary of S. Benedetto have to visit the Greek churches and see that the rite is duly observed. Otherwise, the Greeks in Italy are entirely subject to the bishop of the diocese in which they live. This bishop, however, must appoint a Greek as well as a Latin vicar-general; and the Metropolitan must appoint a Greek judge, if Greek cases come to the Metropolitan court of appeal. The number of Greeks in Italy is about 50,000. There are colonies at Ancona, Leghorn, Pianino in the diocese of Aquapendente, Naples, Villabadessa in the diocese of Atrie Penne, Barletta in the diocese of Trani, Lecce, Carghese in the Corsican diocese of Ajaccio. Further, in Calabria the diocese of Cassano has eight colonies, Rossano five, Bisignano two, Anglona four. Sicily has Greek colonies at Palermo, where there is also a Basilian monastery founded in 1609, at Monreale, Girgenti, Contessa, and Messina.

For an account of the Greeks in the United States see the art. RUTHENIAN CATHOLICS.

(2) Greco-Roumaic Church.—In the thirteenth century many Roumanians belonging to the Greek schismatic church found a refuge in Siebenbürgen and Hungary. In 1690 a few conversions were made, with the help of the Jesuits, by the imperial commissary Tullus Miglio, when two priors of Greek monasteries and six parish priests abjured the schism in the Jesuit church at Fünfkirchen. Nine years later, the efforts of Cardinal Kolonitsch and of the Jesuits Hevenes and Bárány were rewarded with much greater success. The Greek bishop of Siebenbürgen, Theophilus II., became Catholic; and on February 16, 1699, the diploma of union from the Emperor Leopold I. was solemnly read at the Landtag. The united Greeks of Hungary and Siebenbürgen number about 1,100,000, and form an ecclesiastical province. The Archbishop of Fogaras (see erected 1721; made head of a province, 1850) is Metropolitan; his suffragans are the Bishops of Grosswardein (erected 1776), Lugos (in 1853) and Szamos-Ujvar (erected 1865). The secular priests are married. There is a clerical seminary and a small Basilian monastery at Balasfalva. UNIVERSITY. The Museum of the Ptolemies (on which see Cardinal Newman's sketch in "The Office and Work of Universities"), the philosophic schools of Athens, the institute of Gondisapor under the Abbasside Caliphs, and perhaps Cordova under the Moors, were all eminent examples of schools for higher education, existing apart from Christianity. With regard to the matter of instruction, the universities of modern times, in which "arts" hold the chief place, stand in a direct line with the Roman imperial schools. On the other hand, their historical institution, machinery, and terminology are Christian, and are traceable to the activity of the Catholic clergy in the Middle Ages.

A great medical school arose at Salerno in the eleventh century, but Döllinger seems to be hardly justified in describing it as a university.[1] The first institution in Europe to deserve that name was undoubtedly the School of Paris, which passed through the stages of "High School" and "Studium Generale," and, favoured by its situation at the capital and the patronage of the bishops of the see, became, towards the end of the eleventh century, the University of Paris. That it was ecclesiastical in its origin is manifest. It grew up out of a concourse of able men, attracted to Paris partly by the encouragement and protection which they received from the authorities, partly by the intellectual sympathy which they were sure to find among an increasing body of students of mixed nationalities.[2] These men could not lecture until licensed by the Chancellor of the diocese, who thus gradually came to be considered the Chancellor of the University also. By the end of the twelfth century, instead of the Chancellor licensing anyone whom he chose at his own discretion, we find the teachers in the schools recommending to him those of their pupils whom they judge fit to receive the licence. By the end of the thirteenth century, the prestige and privileges of the university continually increasing, the Chancellor's right to license has disappeared; that right is now in the hands of the Faculties, and is given upon examination.

Regarded from the intellectual side, the university, when its organization was complete, consisted of four groups of teachers and students—viz. the Faculties[3] of Arts, Theology, Jurisprudence, and Medicine. Arts had the pre-eminence; the university was always said to "have its foundation in arts"; for these were the branches of learning and science which were the development and continuation of the old Trivium and Quadrivium. The Masters of Arts, strictly speaking, were the "Universitas"; the teachers in the other faculties were long regarded as more or less outsiders. At the same time, the theological school, especially after it took into itself the study of canon law, rapidly attained to a world-wide celebrity. The professorial campaigns of the great lecturers of the twelfth century—Abelard, St. Bernard, William of Champeaux, Saint Amour, Roscelin, &c.—are the very romance of education. The Church encouraged the free play of mind, which, as such, can never be otherwise than favourable to her; at the same time, she watched carefully that no heretical teaching should mar the soundness of that foundation of Catholic faith without which neither university nor any other teaching is of much value. The Popes were lavish of privileges to the rising institute; Gregory IX. gave to the teachers (magistri, doctores) the right of scholastic legislation—i.e. of settling all that concerned the manner and time of lecturing; another Pope authorized Paris masters to open a school anywhere. So great was the fame of the theological school that, according to Thomassin,[1] several universities were erected under Papal sanction without a theological faculty, on the understanding that students who wished to proceed in that branch should go to Paris. As the Church of Rheims was esteemed a model of discipline for other Churches, so the University of Paris was regarded as the model and rule for other universities in learning. For two centuries, says Döllinger, Germany sought learning at Paris or Bologna. The efforts of a rival school set up in the abbey of Ste. Geneviève, which was outside the jurisdiction of the see of Paris and appointed its own Chancellor to license teachers, served eventually to enhance the glory of the one great university, in which the singular phenomenon of two Chancellors, preserved to the end of its existence, survived as the only monument of a once formidable opposition. The degree of Bachelor (the origin of the word is doubtful) grew out of the scholastic disputations. That of Master originally depended on the licence to teach given by the Chancellor. When this came to be given by the teachers themselves, it became an honour—a dignity—a degree; and many competed for it who had no intention of opening a school. A pileus or hat was conferred as the symbol of admission inter magistros. From the circumstance that a body of masters who did not teach was thus gradually formed arose the distinction between Regentes and non-Regentes.

Thus far we have considered the University of Paris from the intellectual side. But the aggregation of large numbers of students presented an important disciplinary problem also, and to this we must devote a few words. "Outside the lecture-room the scholars fell into clans, based on community of language and manners, and technically called 'nations.'"[1] [2] These assumed spontaneously an independent organisation. Each of the four "nations" at Paris—the French, the Picards, the Normans, and the English—elected a Proctor as its ruler and representative; collectively they chose a Rector, who was head of the whole "Corpus Scholarium," and in time appears as the ruler of the teaching body as well as of the "nations." The student's life outside the lecture-room was the affair partly of the Rector and Proctors, partly of the authorities of the various colleges—if he happened to belong to one of them—of the Sorbonne [SORBONNE], of Navarre, Des Dix-Huit, of St. Thomas of the Louvre, Des Bernardins, of Cluny, of Prémontré, of Bayeux, &c.—which, in course of time, were founded within the university. But the Popes, "even in the fullest power of the universities," [1] claimed to and did interfere if the interests of morality and order demanded it.

[2] Ordericus Vitalis speaks of Normans being sent for instruction to the "schools of France" (Paris is probably meant), though he does not distinctly name the University. —Eccl. Hist. viii. 17.

[3] "Faculty" probably meant ability to teach.

[2] Huber, i. 24.

The Universities of Oxford and Cambridge were founded in imitation of that of Paris, and arose not long afterwards. The schools of Oxford began to be largely frequented in the reign of Stephen. About 1134, Robert Pullus or Pulleyn, educated at Paris, is said to have lectured on Scripture. In the conflict of jurisdiction between Henry of Blois, bishop of Winchester, the Papal Legate, and Archbishop Theobald, difficult questions of law were involved, and a general wish arose that the learning of the great Italian jurists should be made available in England. The Lombard Vacarius was summoned over, and "taught law at Oxford," [2] about 1149. The place was central, relatively to the then distribution of the population; it was also neutral ground—a long way both from Canterbury and Winchester. The students were divided into two "nations," the Northern and the Southern English, each with its proctor; hence the discipline of Oxford is to this day in the hands of two proctors. The supreme authority in the university was the Chancellor, originally appointed by the Bishop of Lincoln, in whose diocese Oxford was situated; afterwards elected by the Masters and confirmed by the Bishop. In the thirteenth century both Oxford and Cambridge were in high repute; Paris and Bologna also were at the height of their prosperity. At Bologna, in 1262, there were 20,000 students; [3] at Oxford, in 1231, there are said (à Wood) to have been 30,000. Halls (hospitia, aulae), presided over by masters of arts, provided the necessary accommodation. The first collegiate foundation within Oxford ("University") dates from 1249; the oldest collegiate buildings ("Merton") from about 1270. Gradually the great majority of the students were drawn within the colleges, in which discipline was more easily maintained.

Germany came into the field in the fourteenth century. Charles IV., taking Paris for his model, founded the University of Prague in 1348; that of Vienna dates from 1365. Salamanca in Spain and Coimbra in Portugal were founded in the thirteenth century. Nine universities were founded in Germany in the course of the fifteenth century, besides five already existing. In this central land, owing to the plurality of independent states, the solicitudes which beset a unified ambitious nationality, such as France or England, were absent; and it fell to Teutonic thinkers, pondering deeply on the philosophy of the matter, to develop the modern notion of a university, as a place where all sciences and all liberal arts are prosecuted and taught, with the aid of the best appliances, by the most competent persons anywhere to be found; [1] the learners being all those students, and no others, who willingly come to the professors to be taught. If to this notion the conception of the pastoral oversight of the Catholic Church be added as a postulate, nothing will be wanting to our ideal of a perfect Academe.

The Revolution destroyed the University of Paris; in its place the first Napoleon erected the huge examining machine which he called the "University of France."

URSULINES. This teaching order was founded by St. Angela Merici, of Brescia, in 1537. Angela was born at Desenzano on the Lake of Garda, in 1470. Her life was one long endeavour after perfection; she joined the third order of St. Francis, practised the greatest austerities, made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem and Rome, and on her return settled at Brescia, where she obtained a great influence among the piously disposed of her own sex, and gradually matured the plan of a new institute. She seems to have desired a freedom of action and of movement for herself and her associates, which would not have been compatible with enclosure and solemn vows. A fervent company of seventy-three women met together in the kitchen of Angela's house, at Brescia, in 1537; the objects of their institution—nursing the sick, teaching young girls, and sanctifying their own lives—were known to them all; the rules by which Angela endeavoured to conciliate a certain community of work and worship with the routine of domestic life in the world were considered and approved; and she was elected superior—foundress she would not be called—of the "Company of St. Ursula." A young girl from twelve years and upwards might join the company; at entrance each was to express the firm resolution of living chastely in the society, without taking the vow of chastity; they were to hear Mass daily; on the first Friday in each month they were to meet in some church in the city previously fixed upon, and all receive Communion; on the last Sunday of the month they were to assemble in the oratory belonging to the company to hear the rule read; their dress was to be always plain in texture, and sober in hue and make, but a distinctive habit was not at first adopted. St. Angela died in 1540. A bull of Paul III. (1544) confirmed her foundation under the title which she had given to it. The work of teaching was from the first the chief employment of the society; and as their success and popularity increased, the need of greater stability than was furnished by the original rule would naturally be felt. A uniform costume, with a leathern girdle, was introduced soon after the appearance of the Papal bull. St. Charles Borromeo brought the Ursulines to Milan in 1568, and favoured them in every way, advising all his suffragan bishops to introduce them in all the large towns in the North of Italy. In the Milanese alone there were eighteen Ursuline houses at the death of St. Charles. The excellent César de Bus assisted a lady of Avignon, Françoise de Bermont, to establish there a colony of Ursulines, on the original plan, in 1594. Françoise was a person of great energy; she travelled from city to city in the South of France, and planted Ursulines at Aix, Marseilles, and Lyons. She adhered to the design of St. Angela, except that, in obedience to a suggestion of César de Bus, she substituted the common life for dispersion in various homes. The conversion of the society into a religious order was chiefly the work of a French lady, Mme. de Ste.-Beuve, who built and endowed a monastery for Ursulines in the Rue St. Jacques at Paris in 1610, and obtained from Paul V., two years later, a bull, by which her foundation was subjected to the rule of St. Augustine, under the invocation of St. Ursula; the nuns were to be strictly enclosed; they were to take solemn vows, and were to add a fourth, that of instructing the young. This was the commencement of the Ursuline congregation of Paris, which soon numbered forty-five houses. The followers of St. Angela who preferred still to abide by her original plan were called "congregated" Ursulines—Ursulines congrégées; but the "religious" Ursulines, who observed enclosure and took solemn vows, appear to have better suited the prevalent mode of thought in the seventeenth century, and they were multiplied in every direction.

Several distinct congregations, each numbering many convents, were formed. Of the congregation of Paris we have spoken; that of Bordeaux was founded in 1606 by the Cardinal-Archbishop de Sourdis, with the aid of Mother Madeleine de la Croix, and approved by the Holy See in 1618; before long it had eighty-nine affiliated houses. The congregation of Dijon (1619) owed its existence to the zeal of Françoise de Xaintonge; the vows in it were simple, not solemn, and a fourth vow, of perseverance in the society, was taken. The congregation of Lyons, of which the commencement was the house founded by Françoise de Bermont in 1610 for Ursulines congrégées, adopted enclosure and solemn vows in 1620. The order was introduced into Canada, through the zealous exertions of Mme. de la Peltrie, in 1639. The site at Quebec which they still occupy was soon obtained for them, and till 1850 might be seen within the convent precinct a venerable ash tree, sole relic of the ancient forest, under which the first Ursulines used to teach the catechism to little Indian children. Having belonged to different congregations in Europe, the Ursulines of Quebec had for some years no determinate constitution, but in 1682 they affiliated themselves to the congregation of Paris. The services rendered by this community, during the two centuries and a half of its existence, in preserving a religious spirit among the French population and humanizing and instructing the Indians and half-castes, are beyond all estimation. In the chapel of their convent may be seen the tomb of the brave Marquis de Montcalm, slain in the unequal combat on the heights of Abraham (1759), which decided the fate of Canada.

The Irish Ursulines owe their establishment at Cork in 1771 to Miss Nano Nagle, the foundress of the Presentation Order (see that article). They regard themselves as a filiation of the convent of St. Jacques at Paris.

In 1900 a congress of Ursulines from all parts of the world met in Rome at the bidding of Leo XIII. for the purpose of bringing about a closer union between the different convents. Over one hundred communities joined the Roman Union of Ursulines, and others are continually being aggregated. "The united communities are divided into eight (sic) provinces, as follows: Italy, Austria-Hungary, Hungary, the East of France, the West of France, Holland-Belgium, England-Germany, the North of the United States, the South of the United States, Spain and Portugal. Many large and important communities still retain their independent organisation." "In Europe and America alike the Ursulines make it a point to secure state approval, and avail themselves of every advantage offered by the public institutions" (M. Mary Fidelis in "Cath. Enc."; O'Reilly, "Life of St. Ursula"; Heimbucher, in "Kirchenlex.").

USURY. Usury, in its wider signification, means all gain made by lending. This is a sense which usury often has in the classics, and, so understood, usury occurs whenever a man lends capital at interest. Now, however, usury signifies unjust gain on a loan, unjust because not justified by the loss, risk, &c., of the lender or the advantage to the borrower,[1] or because the amount of gain is exorbitant. In this latter case usury is forbidden both by the natural law and by the Bible. It is always unjust, and its wickedness is aggravated when advantage is taken of the needs of the poor to secure usurious interest. But we shall see presently that both in the Old Testament and for a long time in Christian legislation little distinction was made between the two kinds of interest. The laws of the Old Testament on the subject had a most important influence on Christian feeling, so that something must be said about the former here.

(1) Usury in the Bible.—Public loans and the humane spirit of the law in Christian nations have taught us to draw a clear line between lawful and usurious interest; but in the ancient world, as it is in the East at this day, interest was always usurious. The Egyptian law contented itself with prohibiting interest which was more than cent. per cent. (Diodor. Sic. i. 79); the laws of Menu permitted an interest of 18 or even 24 per cent. (see the reference in Smith's "Bible Dictionary," article Usury), and 12 per cent. is, or was till quite lately, a minimum rate in the East. Partly, no doubt, for this reason, partly because in an agricultural nation like Israel loans were only asked by those whose need put them at the creditor's mercy, partly to encourage kindness towards the poor, the Mosaic law prohibits lending at interest. The most ancient code (Exod. xxi.–xxxiii.) prohibits lending at interest נֶשֶׁךְ) to poor Hebrews. Deut. xxiii. 20 forbids interest to be taken from Hebrews generally; Levit. xxv. 35–37 repeats the precept of Exodus, forbidding also interest in kind (תַּרְבִּית, also מַרְבִּית). Lending at interest generally is reprobated in the strongest terms in Ps. xv. 5, Prov. xxviii. 8. Nehemiah, after the exile, restored the observance of the law against taking interest from Hebrews, and made the usurers restore the "hundredth part" of the money (i.e. "centesimae usurae," 1 per cent. a month =12 per cent. a year; 2 Esdr. v. 11). The New Testament gives no definite rule on the subject, though of course the spirit of Christ's words, "Give to him that asketh thee" (Mt. v. 42) excludes lending at interest.

(2) Usury in the Pagan World.—Both Plato ("Laws," v. 742) and Aristotle ("Politics," i. 10, 11) condemned the putting out of money at interest. The latter says: "The most hated sort of money-making, and with the greatest reason, is usury, which makes a gain out of money itself, and not from the natural use of it. For money was intended to be used in exchange, but not to increase at interest. And this term usury (τόκος), which means the birth of money from money, is applied to the breeding of money because the offspring resembles the parent. Wherefore of all modes of making money this is the most unnatural." The money-lender's trade presented much the same aspect in the Roman State as in the old Eastern world. Loans were still usually made to the needy who could not protect themselves. The "usura centesima" (12 per cent.) was under the later Republic and the Empire the legal rate of interest, which was due every month (i.e. 1 per cent. a month), so that Ovid very naturally calls the Calends "swift," and Horace "sad" ("Sat." i. 3, 87).

(3) Usury in the Church.—These views of the Greek philosophers and Roman lawyers account for the feeling of the Church on the matter down to modern times.

(a) The Fathers are unanimous in regarding all interest as usury, and, therefore, as a species of robbery. Their general opinion was that the prohibitions in the Old Testament bound Christians, and that in a more stringent form, since the taking of interest from strangers had only been tolerated among the Jews for the hardness of their hearts. Tertullian ("Adv. Marc." iv. 24, 25, PL, ii. 419, 424), Cyprian ("Testimon." iii. 48, ed. Hartel, 153), Ambrose ("De Tobia" throughout, PL, xiv. 777; see especially 14 and 15), Basil (in Ps. xiv.), Jerome (in cap. xviii. Ezech.), Chrysostom (in Matt. Hom. lvi. al. lvii, PG, lviii. 558), Augustine ("De Bapt. contr. Donat." iv. 9, in Ps. xxxvi.), Theodoret (in Ps. xiv. 5, PL, xliii. 162), in their condemnation of interest, appeal, or at least add a reference, to the Old Testament.[1] Other Fathers, probably from mere accident and for the sake of brevity, omit any such appeal—e.g. Apollonius (apud Euseb. "H.E." v. 18), Commodian ("Adv. Gent. Deos," 65), Lactantius ("Inst." vi. 18), Epiphanius (in

[1] I.e. the ordinary worth which money has to the borrower; for it is, of course, unjust to take advantage of the borrower's necessity in order to exact exceptional interest.

[1] Clem. Al. (ii. 18, p. 473) explains the word "brother," from whom interest may not be taken, as meaning not only one of the same kin, but anyone who "shares in the same doctrine."

the "Exposit. Fid." at the end of the "Haer." n. 24), Augustine (Ep. 153, PL, xxxiii. 664). These passages are all explicit. E.g. Tertullian ("foeneris sc. redundantiam; quod est usura"), Ambrose ("quodcunque sorti accidit"), Jerome ("usuram appellari et superabundantiam quicquid illud est, si ab eo quod dederit, plus acceperint"), define usury as taking interest; the word Epiphanius employs is τοκολῃψία, "taking interest"; "it is unjust," says Lactantius, "to take more than one gave."

(β) Conciliar and Papal Laws.—From early times the clergy were forbidden, under penalty, to take interest. So Canon. Apost. 44, Council of Arles A.D. 314 (c. 12), of Nicaea (c. 17), Laodicea (c. 4), Leo I. (Ep. 5, "Ad Episc. Campan."), Council in Trullo (c. 10). Not that taking interest was considered by these authorities permissible in laymen; such a thing, says Leo, is lamentable in the case of any Christian, and so of course specially reprehensible in clergymen. The mediaeval canon law extended the penalties to laymen. Thus the second Lateran Council, A.D. 1139 (c. 13, lib. v. Decret. tit. 19, c. 3, cf. c. 7), condemns usurers to excommunication and deprives them of Christian burial. Clement V. in the Council of Vienne (Clem. lib. v. tit. 5, De Usuris, c. Ex gravi) declares it heresy to maintain pertinaciously that usury is no sin. It is plain from St. Thomas (2^a $2^{æ}$, q. 78) that all taking of interest was still regarded as usury. Further, Alexander III. (lib. v. Decret. tit. 19, c. 6) decides a case proposed by the Bishop of Genoa. The merchants of that city used to sell spice above the market value, agreeing to wait a stated time for payment. The Pope replies that such a contract, unless there was some doubt whether the market price might not rise or fall in the meantime, though not strictly speaking usurious,[1] was sinful.

(γ) The Modern View.—It became more and more evident that commerce could not exist without a rate of interest, and reflection showed many just grounds on which a moderate rate could be exacted. Such are the risk to the lender, the loss to which he is put by the want of capital with which he might trade, the fruit which the money yields, &c. The law can remove many of the dangers of usury by fixing a legal rate, and the poor are now just the persons who would suffer most, were all interest prohibited. It was long, however, before opinion adapted itself to new circumstances. Luther consistently, and Melanchthon with some hesitation, stood where the Fathers and canonists had stood before them. (See the quotations in Herzog, art. Wucher.) Bossuet represents Calvin as the first theologian who propounded the modern distinction between interest and usury, and this seems to be true, so far at least as writing goes, though, according to Funk ("Zins und Wucher," p. 104), Eck and Hoogsträten had defended the same distinction at Bologna. Bossuet himself maintains the old doctrine as of faith ("Traité de l'Usure"), and this though he was fully aware of the arguments on the other side. He rejects as sinful the charge of interest on the general ground that the lender could have used the capital he lends in trade, though, very inconsistently, he allows interest to be charged if the lender has forgone a particular and definite gain[1] which he had in prospect. Benedict XIV., in his encyclical to the Italian bishops, "Vix pervenit," A.D. 1745, condemned the doctrine that interest might be taken, merely on the ground of loan, however low the rate of interest, and although the borrower might be ever so rich and have profited by using the money in trade, though he leaves the questions about the accidental or extrinsic reasons for taking interest, the risk, loss of profit, &c., quite unsettled. Further, this Pope, according to Ballerini (loc. cit. p. 615), allowed books defending the modern view to be dedicated to him. Keen controversy on the point among Catholics had arisen during that century, and the work of the famous Scipio Maffei (1675–1755) on the laxer side ("dell' impiego del danaro") had attracted great attention. In 1830 the Congregation of the Holy Office, with the approval of Pius VIII., decided that those who regarded the fact that the law fixed a certain rate of interest as in itself a sufficient reason for taking it were "not to be disturbed." This principle is now accepted throughout the Church, though the Holy See has given no positive decision on the matter. Even the laws restraining the clergy from taking interest are entirely obsolete. Gury accepts the position tolerated in the decree of the Sacred Congregation, and argues that the State has power in certain cases to transfer the property of one subject to another. No doubt. But where is there the faintest proof that the State means to exercise this power in the case, and to transfer the interest from the pocket of the borrower to that of the lender? We may add that the Fathers, in the places quoted above, expressly deny that the State-law makes usury lawful. Ballerini, rejecting Gury's explanation, argues that the words "loan" (mutuum) &c. imply spontaneous liberality, but that interest may be taken if there has been a previous contract to that effect. It is scarcely necessary to answer that the Fathers and Schoolmen meant much more than a truism like this—viz. that a man must

[1] Because there was no formal loan.

[1] The older theologians—e.g. St. Thomas (at least in his work "De Malo") and Scotus—would not admit even this excuse for interest, if the loan was voluntary and repaid at the time agreed upon. (See Ballerini's Gury, 2nd ed. vol. i. p. 598.)

not require interest if he professes to lend without it. Later on, Gury (ii. p. 611) seems to give the true reason. The ancient world believed that money was barren, and the Schoolmen inherited this principle from Aristotle. Experience proves that money, far from being barren, "produces fruit and multiplies of itself" ("fructum producit et multiplicatur per se," Gury, loc. cit.),[1] and a man may justly take e.g. 5 per cent. or more for money which is well worth that to the merchant, bank, railway company, &c., who receive the loan.

(Herzog, "Encycl. für Prot. Theol.," art. Wucher, gives useful citations from the Reformers. Smith and Cheetham; Funk's work "Zins und Wucher"; Hefele, "Beiträge"; Ballerini, "Theol. Mor." iii. 584–663; and Hefele-Leclercq, i. 604 sqq., have also been used. But for exhaustive learning and clear statements of the points at issue we have seen nothing comparable to Bossuet's "Traité de l'Usure.")

VALDENSES, WALDENSES, or VAUDOIS. It does not fall within the plan of the present work to give even an outline of the long and varied history of this sect; but since it exists now, and has been undoubtedly in being since the twelfth century—since, moreover, it now professes Protestant doctrine, and is regarded with the strongest favour and interest by English Protestants, who commonly believe that it can trace its origin to primitive if not even to Apostolic times—it is necessary to examine with some minuteness the nature of the evidence bearing on two questions: (1) when did it arise? (2) what kind of tenets did it originally profess?

(a) At the Council of Verona, held in 1184, Lucius III. condemned those who falsely called themselves the "humbled" or the "poor men of Lyons," with several other heretical sects. The first on the list of errors attributed to the condemned, or some of them, was that they presumed to preach in public without mission or authority from Pope or Bishop.

Writing to the Archbishop of Aix and his suffragans in 1198 (PL, ccxiv.), Innocent III. requests him and them to assist Rainier, the commissioner whom he is sending to Provence, in his efforts to put down the heretics in those parts, "qui Valdenses Catari et Paterini dicuntur," and by other names. This seems to be the earliest occurrence of the name in ecclesiastical history. The common characteristic of all these sects is stated to be, that they "reject the authority of the Roman Church."[2]

Bernard, abbot of Font-Cauld, wrote a special treatise, apparently about 1200, "against the sect of the Valdenses." He says nothing as to their founder, but playing upon their name derives it "a valle densa," from the thicket of errors in which they were entangled. Disobedience to ecclesiastical authority is the first and principal fault imputed to them, but they are also charged with allowing women to preach, with a systematic desertion of the churches, and with rejecting prayers and other ministrations for the dead. (See this tract in Migne, vol. 210.)

Alanus de Insulis, a celebrated theologian, in a work which must have been written before 1202, attacks heretics generally,[1] the Valdenses, the Jews, and the "Pagans or Mahometans." In the book devoted to the Valdenses he says that they are so called "from their heresiarch, who was named Waldus, who, led by his own spirit, not sent by God, invented a new sect, so that he presumed to preach without the authority of any prelate, without divine inspiration, without science, and without learning." "They assert," he says, "that no one is bound to obey anyone but God."

Conrad, elected abbot of Ursperg in 1215, when about to describe in his Chronicle the rise of the Franciscans and Dominicans, contrasts with these orders the "Poor Men of Lyons" and the "Humiliati." Both these sects, he says, arose in Italy. He thinks ("ut puto") that the founder of the Poor Men was one Bernhard, whom, attended by his followers, he had himself seen soliciting approbation for his institute at the Papal court. Bernard alleged that they imitated the life of the Apostles, having no property or fixed abodes, and that all their peculiar practices, among others that of men and women travelling about in company, had "descended from the Apostles." But the Pope, apprehending that some of their customs were superstitious, and others inexpedient, refused to confirm them. Such is Conrad's account. It seems likely that his memory misled him, and that he confounded Bernard, the archbishop of Narbonne, an active opponent of the Vaudois in the last years of the twelfth century, with the real founder of the sect.[1]

It cannot be doubted that the "Pauperes de Lugduno" of Conrad of Ursperg and the Council of Verona are identical with the "Valdenses" of Innocent III., Alanus, and Bernard. This identity is expressly stated by Rainier Sacho, a somewhat later authority, and it became the general belief. Thus in a tract by an unknown Carthusian monk (printed by Martène [2]), written about 1440, with the title "De Religionum Origine," this sect is called "Valdensium haeresis, seu pauperum de Lugduno." The early evidence all points to the rise of the sect as having taken place about thirty years before the end of the twelfth century. Their claim to great antiquity is indeed noticed by Conrad, but it seems easy of explanation. If the living authority of the Church was to be resisted, it could only be done by inducing the belief that their tenets were apostolic, "ab apostolis descendisse." The passages Acts ii. 44 and 1 Cor. iv. 11 and ix. 5 probably led to conscious imitation on the part of the Valdenses, and from such imitation to the assertion that their customs had come down from the Apostles the step was not great.

(b) Rainier Sacho, a Dominican, who died in 1260, and in his capacity of inquisitor must have had great opportunities for obtaining exact information, gives the following account of the origin of the Vaudois.[3] Peter Valdo, a rich merchant of Lyons, about 1160, shocked and stunned by the sudden death of a friend, resolved to strip himself of his wealth, and both practise and preach an Apostolical poverty. Followers soon gathered round him, and they were variously named "Valdenses," "Pauperes de Lugduno," "Leonists" (from the city), and "Insabatati" (from the sabots or wooden sandals which they wore). Valdo caused portions of the Bible to be translated into the vulgar tongue; these he used himself in preaching, and caused others to use; and when the clergy remonstrated he paid no heed to their admonitions. A rapid development of sectarian tenets was the natural consequence of this first resistance. Rainier divides the errors of the Valdenses into three classes—against the Church and the clergy, against the sacraments, against sacramentals. Under the first head they taught that the Church of Rome was not the Church of Christ, but, rather, the harlot mentioned in the Apocalypse; that it had become corrupt in the time of Pope Sylvester, when the poison of temporalities first infected it [1]; that scarce any but themselves held the true Gospel doctrine; that the Pope is the author of all errors; that tithes ought not to be paid, and the Church should not possess property; and that all members of the Church are equal. Under the second head, they found fault with all the sacraments of the Church; as to Baptism, they said that the washing of infants was of no avail to them, and they rejected many of the ceremonies proper to the rite. Confirmation they set aside; as to the Eucharist, they held that priests in mortal sin could not consecrate, and fell into a variety of other errors which we have not space to enumerate. As to Penance, they said that a bad priest could not absolve, but that a good layman could. With regard to Marriage, they set at naught the impediments established by the Church, and acknowledged no affinity as resulting from the sacrament. They disapproved of the sacrament of Extreme Unction, because it was only given to the rich. What respect they would have for the sacrament of Holy Orders is apparent from what has been already said. All laymen, they held, were entitled to preach, and women also.[2] Whatever was not in the Scriptures they held to be fabulous. They believed in no saints but the Apostles. With regard to the third head, that of Sacramentals, they made a clean sweep of all the beautiful and touching ceremonies—all the salutary institutes—with which the Church had surrounded the life of Christians here below. No festivals, no fast-days, no holy water, no lights, no ornaments, no incense, no images, no chanting; to hear a Valdensian ranter at uncertain times seems to have appeared to these poor sectaries the sum of all the support and delectation that the soul could possibly require. They held that it was unlawful to swear. "They condemn all princes and judges, being persuaded that it is not lawful to punish malefactors. Lastly, they condemn the ecclesiastical judgments."

Severe measures of repression were used against the Vaudois from time to time, but failed to extirpate them. A letter from a Franciscan inquisitor to the Council of Basle,[3] dated in 1432, states that although the writer had "made great executions on many heretics" within the past two years, the sect still flourished on both sides of the Alps; that he had several relapsed heretics in prison, both at Yverdun and at Briançon, and that these had revealed to him the existence of more than five hundred

[1] From some similar confusion, Philippe de Comines, describing the visit of St. Francis de Paule to the court of Louis XI., uniformly calls the saint "Robert."

[3] We take his narrative as excerpted by Dupin, Auteurs Ecclés. sæc. xiii. ch. 9.

[1] The Vaudois evidently believed the figment of the Donation of Constantine. (See STATES OF THE CHURCH.)

[2] From this account it would appear that Milman's statement, that "they rejected the seven sacraments, except Baptism and the Eucharist," which, if true, would assimilate them closely to the Anglicans, is not very accurate.

[3] Martène, Ampliss. Coll. viii. 162.

others. At the Reformation some of the Protestant leaders, who perceived the use that might be made in controversy of the alleged existence of a sect which had maintained a "pure" religion and resisted the authority of Rome for many centuries, made overtures to the Vaudois, and in 1530 their deputies, Masson and Morel, met Oecolampadius and Bucer at Basle. According to Dupin, these last engaged the deputies to renounce some of the more extravagant of their tenets—e.g. that a Christian might not lawfully swear, that ministers might not hold property, and that the ministrations of wicked pastors were invalid; and, on the other hand, to hold with the Protestants that the Body of Christ was not in the Eucharist, and that confession of sins was unnecessary. But the complete adoption by the Vaudois of Protestant doctrine is said not to have taken place till about 1630.

Such is the view which authentic history presents of the rise of the Vaudois and of their original doctrines. The modern popular view, which represents them as a race of primitive manners and simple piety, dwelling in remote Alpine valleys, and clinging to a Scriptural and Protestant religion, handed down from the first ages, in the teeth of continual persecution, appears to be founded in great part on a falsification. Soon after the Reformation broke out, "their whole history, and a part of their written documents, were subjected to a process of re-casting—just as already some older writings had been re-fashioned in a Hussite sense, owing to contact with the circle of Hussite sects."[1] For particulars of this falsification ("Fälschung") we must refer the reader to the Protestant writer just quoted, who states that no existing Vaudois MS. is of date earlier than the fifteenth century, although many were made to appear to have been written in the twelfth.

In 1655 the Duke of Savoy sent troops against the Vaudois, who were said to have spread themselves outside the limits to which they were confined by treaty. Great excesses were reported, and were denounced by the indignant Muse of Milton in the well-known sonnet beginning "Avenge, O Lord, Thy slaughtered saints." Cromwell interposed vigorously, and the Duke was obliged to grant the Vaudois favourable terms. At the present day they are said to number about 30,000; a large place of worship was built for them at Turin, chiefly by English money, in 1853.

VALENTINE, SAINT. There are at least three saints of this name mentioned in the martyrologies for Feb. 14. The Flaminian gate of Rome (Porta del Popolo) was called in the Middle Ages the gate of St. Valentine, from a church in the neighbourhood dedicated to one of these saints. It is probable that the popular customs connected with St. Valentine's day have nothing to do with the saints themselves, but only with the date of their feast, which occurs about the time when birds are said to begin to mate. In pagan days boys drew the names of girls, in honour of the goddess Februata Juno. (Alban Butler, "Lives of the Saints," Jan. 29, Feb. 14; Thurston in "Cath. Enc."; the notes of the commentators on "Hamlet," act iv. scene 5, "Good morrow, 'tis Saint Valentine's day," &c.). "St. Francis of Sales severely forbade the custom of Valentines, or giving boys, in writing, the names of girls to be admired and attended on by them; and to abolish it he changed it into giving billets with the names of certain saints for them to honour and imitate in a particular manner" (Butler, Jan. 29).

VANNE, ST., CONGREGATION OF. This congregation, of which the famous commentator Calmet was the chief literary ornament, was in a flourishing state at the outbreak of the French Revolution. Its houses were then suppressed, and it has not since been revived. [See BENEDICTINES; MAURISTS.]

VATICAN COUNCIL. This council met on December 8, 1869. No general council had been held for three hundred years, and the author of the article on Trent in Herzog's "Encyclopaedia," writing only about seven years before the bishops met in the Aula of the Vatican, speaks of another general council as a moral impossibility. Yet it is easy enough to see that the events of half a century had been preparing the way for the General Council of 1869. The interference of statesmen with the freedom of the Church had turned into a dead letter the law (Concil. Trid. sess. xxiv. "De Reform." c. 2) which requires Provincial Synods to be held every three years. The same cause would also have proved an obstacle, and probably an insuperable one, to great assemblies of the bishops at Rome. But the revolution which stripped the Church of her wealth certainly left her freer in action. The first Provincial Synod which had been known for long, assembled at Tuam in 1817, and its decrees were confirmed at Rome. It was followed by the National Synod of Hungary, held at Pressburg in 1822. But it was from the United States that the revival of Provincial Councils really came. There were Provincial Synods of Baltimore in 1829, 1833, 1837, 1840, 1843, 1846, and 1849. Pius IX., early in his Pontificate, urged upon the bishops the observance of the Church's law. Soon, no fewer than twenty provincial councils had assembled in France; Austria and Hungary followed the example in 1858 (Synods of Vienna and Grau), Holland in 1865 (Synod of Utrecht), and numerous synods were held in Germany, in England just after the hierarchy had been restored (1850), in Ireland, in Australia, and in South America (Quito and New Granada). Even the Catholics of the Oriental rites were affected by the movement. Syrians, Maronites, Armenians met in council, and the last Council of the Armenians at Constantinople in 1869 deserves special notice. In Italy, on the other hand, political troubles made the number of Provincial Councils very small. Nor was this revival of synodical action the only preparation for a General Council. Pius IX. had three times seen a vast number of bishops gathered round him—viz. at the definition of the Immaculate Conception, at the canonization of the Japanese martyrs, at the eighteenth centenary of the martyrdom of St. Peter and St. Paul. Since the Second Lateran Council of 1139, Rome had never witnessed such an assembly of bishops as this last one. Nor was it simply the fact of these unions which led the way to the General Council in the Vatican. It is evident now that the chief definition of this Council—viz. that of the Papal infallibility—came as the result of forces which had been long at work. The French universities had disappeared in the storms of the Revolution, and Gallican principles were dying out in France itself. In Italy, Spain, and Portugal, where, owing to the influence of the Governments, Gallicanism had found, even late in the last century, such representatives as Tamburini, Bishop Solari, Fontani, Palmieri, Degola, Bishop Clement of Barcelona, &c., it was now wholly extinct. Many of the Provincial Councils and the bishops in their assemblies at Rome had held language which showed that a proposal to define the Pope's infallibility would meet with no opposition among the majority. With the German Catholics it was otherwise. There many of the clergy were still educated at "mixed" universities—many of the Catholic professors had already manifested their distrust of the "Roman" theology, and some of them had come into collision with the Roman Congregations. They clung, in the supposed interests of science, to methods different from those which prevailed at Rome. And even in France there was a party, small in numbers, but strong in talent and character, which was attached to liberal principles in politics and distrustful of Roman interference in such matters. They had fought the Church's battle for freedom of instruction, and they were unwilling to admit that the appeal they had made to the principles of freedom and toleration was after all only an argumentum ad hominem. Ultramontanism then prevailed throughout the Church, but it was opposed by a small band of Catholic "liberals" in France, and by a number of learned men in Germany. The former advocated the interests of freedom, as they understood it; the latter, those of philosophy, history, and theology, as they understood them. There were, besides, Catholic statesmen in both countries who saw danger to the State in a definition of Papal infallibility.

Pius IX. first imparted his idea of convoking a General Council to the cardinals of the Congregation of Rites in December 1864; and shortly afterwards he consulted all the cardinals who resided in Rome on the matter. They were requested to submit to the Pope their opinions, in writing, on the opportuneness of such a convocation, and the subjects which, supposing the Council opportune, ought to be discussed. Nineteen advised the convocation, two were against it, one was doubtful. In March 1865, five cardinals (Patrizi, Reisach, Panebianco, Bizzarri, Caterini) were appointed to consider the votes sent in, and these, with the addition of some other cardinals and of consultors, were formed into a Congregation of Direction (Cecconi, "Storia del Concil. Vatic." lib. i. cap. 1). In April and May a circular was addressed to thirty-six bishops, begging their opinion on the subjects to be treated (ib. Doc. iii.), and letters were also addressed to the Nuncios at the various Courts, asking them to find theologians fit to act as consultors in the preliminary congregations (ib. Doc. iv.). Next year, in February and March, certain Oriental bishops and bishops of the Greek rite in the Austrian Empire were also consulted (ib. Doc. vi. and vii.). All these consultations were made in the strictest confidence. On June 4, 1867,[1] Cardinal Caterini wrote to all the bishops present for the centenary of the martyrdom of St. Peter and St. Paul. He added a list of seventeen questions on points of discipline, and invited suggestions on other matters (ib. Doc. ix.).

At last, in the same month, the Pope announced in a public Consistory of some 500 bishops his intention of convoking the Council (ib. Doc. x.), and by a bull of June 29, 1869 (ib. Doc. xxxvi.), the Council was summoned to meet at Rome on December 8, 1869. Meantime, in September of the previous year, "all bishops of the churches of Oriental rite not in communion with the Apostolic See" (ib. Doc. xxxvii.) and all "Protestants and non-Catholics" (ib. Doc. xxxviii.) were invited to attend. There was some thought of addressing a similar invitation to the Jansenist bishops in Holland, but it was resolved not to do so (ib. vol. 1, p. 119 seq.). It was intended that these Oriental bishops should be allowed no part in the Council till they professed the Catholic Roman faith whole and entire; and it was explained in a letter to Archbishop, afterwards Cardinal, Manning that the Protestants were only invited to attend that they might be referred to "experienced men," and have their difficulties solved. No effect followed from these letters to Orientals and Protestants except a few protests (Friedrich, "Geschichte des Vatikan-Concils," i. p. 723 seq.). Besides the Commission of General Direction, mentioned already, the Pope nominated six special commissions—for Ceremonial, the Relations of Church and State, the Churches and Missions of the East, the Religious Orders, Dogmatic Theology, and Discipline. Each consisted of a cardinal-president and of consultors from all parts of the world. Vercellone, Theiner, Tarquini, Franzelin, Schrader, Peronne, Gibert, Freppel, Hefele, Haneberg, Hergenröther, Alzog, Molitor, Moufang, Hettinger, Feijje, were among the consultors. Dr. (afterwards Cardinal) Newman was asked to be a consultor, but declined on account of bad health. It was the duty of these special congregations to prepare "schemata"—i.e. drafts of canons and decrees for the consideration of the Fathers. Their members were bound to absolute secrecy.

Till the Council met nothing was said by anyone in authority of any intention to define Papal infallibility. But attention was roused by statements in the French correspondence of the "Civiltà," February 6, 1869 (reprinted in Cecconi, Doc. cxl.). In this Jesuit organ, published at Rome, and believed by many to possess very high authority in the Roman Court, it was stated that the Council would probably set its seal to the condemnations of the Syllabus; that the bishops would define the Pope's infallibility by acclamation, and that the corporal assumption of the Blessed Virgin into heaven would be made an article of faith. This was the occasion soon after of the famous articles in the Augsburg "Allgemeine Zeitung," which afterwards appeared in the form of a book entitled "Janus." It professed to be written from a Catholic point of view, but was in reality a bitter attack on the Papacy. In April 1869 Prince Hohenlohe, Foreign Minister in Bavaria, sent a circular to the European Governments warning them of the political dangers which the Council might cause (Friedrich, ib. i. p. 774), and in September twenty-two of the German bishops assembled at Fulda laid before Pius IX. their fears as to the consequences in Germany should Papal infallibility be defined. This document was undoubtedly despatched to the Pope, but Cecconi, after laborious search, could not find it in the Roman archives (Cecconi, part i. vol. ii. sect. i. p. 479).

The time of convocation was drawing near, and Pius IX. in a brief "Multiplices inter," November 27, 1869 (ib. Doc. lii.), arranged the order of business at the Council. The preparatory commissions had done their work, and were to be replaced by new ones. The Pope appointed five cardinal-presidents; viz. Reisach (who died shortly afterwards and was replaced by De Angelis), De Luca, Bizzarri, Bilio, Capalti; a secretary—viz. Bishop Fessler of St. Pölten—and a deputation of members of the Council, who were to examine proposals made by the bishops. Four other deputations, for Dogma, Discipline, Religious Orders, and Oriental Rites, were to be chosen by the Fathers of the Council, but each was to be placed under a cardinal-president nominated by the Pope himself. The schemata drawn up by the preparatory commissions were to be printed and distributed to the Fathers. The bishops might send proposals to be examined by the new directive deputation. These new schemata or proposals, if approved by it, were also to be printed and circulated among the bishops some days before the discussion on them began. Bishops who wished to speak on any subject must notify their intention at least a day before. They were to do so in order of rank, and, after they had ended, others might obtain leave to speak from the presidents. If there was no prospect of agreement, schemata, according to their subject-matter, were to be referred to the special commissions for revisal, and then voted upon in general congregation. Finally, the canon or decree was to be read in the Pope's name in solemn session; the Fathers were to answer "Placet" or "Non placet"; the Pope was to announce the result, and, in case of acceptance by the Council, to confirm its decision by Apostolic authority. The Council opened on December 8, 1869. There were 719 members present and by March of the following year as many as 764. Of these 120 were archbishops or bishops in partibus infidelium, now called titular prelates, and 52 were abbots, generals of orders, &c. (From the lists in Schneemann.)

Much time was spent in discussions on discipline, the preparation of a Short Catechism, &c., which have issued as yet in no definite result. The work actually finished consists of two constitutions—one, "De Fide Catholica," made up of chapters and canons on the primary truths of natural religion, on revelation, on faith, and the connection between faith and reason; the other "De Ecclesia Christi," treating chiefly of the primacy of the Roman See, and defining the Pope's immediate authority over all Christians. The former constitution passed with comparatively little difficulty. It was unanimously accepted by the 667 Fathers present, and confirmed by the Pope in the third public session, April 24, 1870.

Very different was the fate of the second constitution. We have seen that nothing had been said, at least publicly and by authority, before the Council met, of any intention to define the Pope's infallibility, and Cecconi (lib. i. cap. i.) assures us that of the cardinals first consulted by the Pope—i.e. in 1864—two only even mentioned the subject. Scarcely, however, had the Council met when a "postulatum" representing the views of the great majority of the Fathers begged that the question should be proposed for decision. On the other hand, in January 1870, forty-five German and Austrian bishops, thirty-two French, joined by three Portuguese and four Orientals, twenty-seven from nations of English speech, seventeen Orientals, and seven Italians, begged the Pope to prevent the discussion. (Original texts in Friedrich, "Documenta ad Illustrandum Concil. Vatic." Abth. i. pp. 250, 251, 254, 256.) At the same time, outside the Council, a protest was made by Döllinger as well as by the French Minister Daru and the Austrian von Beust, supported by the Bavarian, Portuguese, Prussian, and English Cabinets. Archbishops Deschamps of Malines, Manning of Westminster, Spalding of Baltimore, and Bishop Martin of Paderborn were prominent on the side of the majority; while the learned Hefele, who was promoted to the bishopric of Rottenburg in November 1869, Strossmayer, bishop of Diakovar in Slavonia, Cardinal Rauscher, archbishop of Vienna, Darboy, archbishop of Paris, Dupanloup, bishop of Orleans, Maret, bishop in partibus, Kenrick, archbishop of St. Louis in the United States, and Clifford, bishop of Clifton, were strenuous supporters of the opposition.

New complications arose from a document issued by the cardinal-presidents at the wish of the Pope on February 20, 1870. Complaints were made of the way in which the discussions were protracted, and accordingly new arrangements were devised. In the discussion on any amended schema no one was to take part without giving notice beforehand of that particular portion of the said schema on which he meant to address the Council. Further, at the request of any ten Fathers, the presidents might ask the Council if they desired the discussion to proceed, and if a majority said no they might close it there and then. This led more than a hundred prelates to protest, in a document addressed to the presidents, that by these regulations "the freedom of the Council might seem in several respects to be impaired, nay, destroyed" ("minui imo tolli posse videatur"). They implored that nothing should be defined except with the moral unanimity of the Fathers, and appealed to the example of Pius IV. at the Council of Trent. Otherwise they feared that "the character of the Oecumenical Council might be exposed to doubt" ("oecumenici concilii character in dubium vocari possit." Text in Friedrich, Abth. i. p. 258 seq.). It must be remembered, however, that the whole discussion was extended over seven weeks. The points at issue must have been perfectly familiar to those with whom the decision lay, and the majority could not be expected to tolerate a protracted discussion which had no real influence on opinion, and only served to obstruct definition.

Early in May the schema "De Ecclesia," with the added clauses on Papal infallibility, was laid before the Council, and the conciliar discussion upon it began. On July 13 it was voted upon in general congregation; of the Fathers present 451 said "Placet," sixty-two "Placet juxta modum"—i.e. they were ready to accept the constitution with modifications, but not as it stood; eighty-eight said "Non placet"; seventy did not vote at all. In the last general congregation the Fathers protested against the calumnies of the press, especially against the report that the Council was not free. In a letter to the Pope fifty-five bishops declared that their mind was unaltered, but that they meant to absent themselves from the public session. This was held on July 18. The bull "Pastor Aeternus," containing the constitution "De Ecclesia" and the definition of Papal infallibility, was read. Thereupon 533 answered "Placet," the two others—viz. Bishop Riccio of Ajaccio and Bishop Fitzgerald of Little Rock—"Non placet." The Pope then confirmed the decree by Apostolic authority. On that same day Napoleon III. declared war against Prussia. On September 20 the Italians possessed themselves of Rome, and by a brief of October 20 the Pope prorogued the Council. It has never been reassembled.

In the articles on FAITH and on the POPE we have said something on the meaning of the Vatican decrees, and in that on OLD CATHOLICS we have spoken of the opposition made to them. No single bishop refused assent, and for that and other reasons a schism of any considerable magnitude was impossible.

(The histories of the Council by Cecconi and Friedrich resemble in more points than one those of the Tridentine Council by Pallavicino and Sarpi, with this notable difference that Sarpi wrote before Pallavicino, while Friedrich takes care to write after Cecconi, and to use his materials. Neither historian has reached the actual assembly of the Council. Cecconi had access to the Vatican archives, so that his work [first part published 1873] will always be indispensable. But it has already exceeded 3000 pages large octavo; it is filled with much irrelevant matter, is badly written and badly arranged. Friedrich's first volume [1877] is well arranged and interesting, and does not, so far as we can test it, alter the facts; but it is disfigured by a vehement invective against the Roman Court and Ultramontanism in general. For the actual history of the Council Friedrich's collection of documents [1871] was useful but incomplete, and has been replaced by the fuller collections of Bishop Martin [1873] and the Protestant Friedberg [1871]. The Jesuit Father Schneemann [1871] has prefixed a short history of the Council to his edition of its decrees, and there is another brief history by the learned Protestant Frommann [1872].

The most complete collection is by Schneeman and Granderath, "Acta et Decreta S. Oecumenici Concilii Vaticani," 1892. See also Granderath and Kirch, "Geschichte des Vatikanischen Koncils"; Manning, "The True Story of the Vatican Council"; Vacant, "Études Théologiques sur les Constitutions du Concile du Vatican.")

VEIL (velum, a covering). Pagan customs in regard to the use of the veil cannot here be considered, but we shall endeavour to give some account of the various kinds of veil recognized in the Catholic ritual for covering either things or persons. Three Eucharistic veils were in use in the ancient Eastern Church: the paten veil for covering the bread before consecration, the chalice veil [q.v.], and a very thin transparent veil for covering both paten and chalice. The offertory veil (offertorium) was used, according to the ritual of the Church of Sarum,[1] in various parts of the ceremonial of High Mass. It seems to be the same as the humeral veil [q.v.] with which the subdeacon now covers the chalice at High Mass, and which is also used at Benediction [BENEDICTION OF THE BLESSED SACRAMENT]. Magri (quoted in Morone) says that in Spanish churches from the first day of Lent a veil is drawn before the high altar while the hours are recited, and during Mass on ferias; it is withdrawn at the Gospel and the elevation of the Host. On Wednesday in Holy Week, when in the "Passion" the words occur "et velum templi scissum est," the veil is withdrawn and no more used. Rock (iv. 257) speaks of the velum quadragesimale used in old England during Lent till Holy Thursday. It was drawn aside at the Gospel of the Mass each day, and during the whole day of double feasts.

The nuptial veil or flammeum, as is well known, was in use among the Romans. St. Ambrose speaks of a veil (pallium) stretched over the heads of the bride and bridegroom during the celebration of marriage, with a mystical significance.[1] This custom was observed in the Sarum Rite. If neither the bride nor the bridegroom had been married before, a pall called the "care-cloth," was held over them by four clerics. Children born before marriage were placed under this cloth as a sign of legitimation according to the canon law. (Rock, iv. 201.)

As the consecration of a virgin to Christ is a sort of spiritual marriage (1 Cor. vii. 34; 2 Cor. xi. 2), the veil was early used at this ceremony. [See NUN.] (Rock, i. 36, 329–334; iii. 81; iv. 50, 218, 225, 257–262.

VESTMENTS. (1) Their Distinctive Character.—It was the common belief in the Middle Ages that the vestments used by the Church at Mass and other services were derived from the Jewish temple, though Walafrid Strabo had a better notion of the historical aspect of the question, and affirmed ("De Reb. Eccles." c. 24) that Christian priests in the early ages officiated in the common dress of daily life. Strabo's view (with a modification to be mentioned presently) is confirmed, to use the words of Dr. Rock, "by the concurrent testimony of writers who have bestowed much laborious research upon the investigation of this subject" ("Hierurgia," p. 414). No quotation can be adduced from any author of the first five centuries which so much as alludes to any difference in form between the dress of priests at the altar and of laymen in common life. True, St. John (Polycrat. apud Euseb. "H.E." iii. 31, v. 24; St. Jerome ("Vir Illustr." 45, PL, xxiii. 659) and St. James (Epiphan. "Haer." lxxviii. 14, PG, xlii. 721) are said to have worn the "shining plate" πέταλον, lamina ציץ) of the Jewish high priest; but even were we prepared to accept these testimonies as literal statements of fact, they would not affect the question, for no such ornament has ever found a place in the Church, and the mitre, which comes nearest to this "plate," was unknown, as has been already proved, for centuries after the Apostolic age. But the strongest proof will be found in the articles on the particular vestments. There it has been shown that the ecclesiastical vestments had their origin in the ordinary dress of the Roman empire.[2] It was after the fall of

[1] Morone.

[2] The alb and girdle, which are really most like Jewish vestments, had a purely secular origin; and the alb is first marked as a church dress by enactments which forbid the empire that the fashion in ordinary attire underwent a revolution, and the garb once common to all became peculiar to the servants of the altar, till at last the very memory of its original use was obscured. This obscuration was, as we should expect, gradual. Walafrid Strabo, as we have said, in the ninth century understood the true state of the case, and another writer of the same age—viz. Anastasius ("In Vit. S. Stephani," cf. Baron. "Annal." ad ann. 260, n. 6)—was not wholly ignorant of it, for he says of Pope Stephen: "He ordained that priests and Levites should not use the consecrated vestments in common life, but only in the church."

Long, however, before the ecclesiastical vestments were distinguished by their form from those in common use, certain garments were reserved for the officiating clergy, and, though these were identical in form with the ordinary garb, they were often no doubt of costlier material. The Apostolic Constitutions (viii. 12) describe the bishop as clothed in a "shining vestment" (λαμπρὰν ἐσθῆτα μετενδὺς), and we may perhaps take this as evidence for the practice at the end of the fourth or beginning of the fifth century. A little earlier Jerome ("In Ezech." xliv. 17, PL, xxv. 436), speaking of the vestments of the Jewish priests, adds: "Thence we learn that we should not enter the holy of holies with common attire or in any sort of dirty dress, such as will do for daily life, but that we should with clean conscience and in clean attire handle the mysteries of the Lord." It is not easy to decide how far this passage is to be taken literally.[1] Anyhow, we learn from Theodoret ("H.E." ii. 23) that Constantine gave Macarius, bishop of Jerusalem, "a sacred dress" (ἱερὰν στολὴν) "of gold thread"—i.e. a dress of the common form but of very costly material, and intended exclusively for use in church. It is very uncertain when the blessing of ecclesiastical vestments was introduced, but we find a form for that purpose, very like the one now used, in the Gregorian Sacramentary (PL, lxxviii. 157). The Council of Poitiers, A.D. 1100, can. 4 (Mansi, xx. 1123), forbids anyone not a bishop to give this blessing, and Innocent III. ("Altar. Myst." i. 9) lays down the same rule. It is still in force, though bishops constantly delegate the power to simple priests.

At first the vestments were of one colour—viz. white. Thus, when Pelagius alleged that all splendour in dress was irreligious, Jerome ("Adv. Pelag."i. n. 29, PL, xxiii. 524) charges him with exaggeration, and asks what harm there was in wearing "a tunic particularly clean" (tunicam mundiorem); what objection could be made "if bishop, priest, and deacon, and the rest of the clergy, appeared at the administration of the sacrifice in white array" (candida veste processerit). So Gregory of Tours ("De Gloria Conf." c. 20) describes the band of "priests and Levites in white vestments." Black was sometimes used in sign of mourning (Theodore Lector, lib. 1, excerpt quoted by Hefele). Even Pseudo-Alcuin, in the tenth or eleventh century, knows only of white vestments, except that he speaks of the scarlet stripes on the deacon's dalmatic ("Divin. Offic." c. 40), and of the use of black vestments during the litany and procession on the Feast of the Purification (c. 7). Innocent III. is the first to mention four colours—viz. white, which the Roman Church employs on feasts of confessors, virgins, and on joyful solemnities generally; red, used on the feasts of martyrs, of the cross (though then perhaps white is to be preferred), and on Whit-Sunday, by some also on All Saints, but not by the Curia Romana, in which white is the colour; black, used in penitential seasons and Masses for the dead; green, used on common days, because "midway between black and white." He regards violet, which is now the penitential colour, as a mere variety of black, and says the former was used on Holy Innocents and Laetare Sunday. So scarlet and saffron-yellow (coccineus et croceus) are varieties of red and green. Rose-coloured vestments, he says, were sometimes used on feasts of martyrs, and yellow ones on feasts of confessors ("Altar. Myst." i. 65). At present yellow counts as white, and rose-coloured vestments are only used at solemn Mass on the third Sunday in Advent and the fourth in Lent.

Bishops, when they celebrate pontifically, take their vestments from the altar, simple priests put them on in the sacristy. But this distinction is probably not very ancient, for even in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries it was the common custom for priests, at least in England, to vest in the sanctuary. (Maskell, "Ancient Liturgy of the Church of England," p. 219). The present law on the use of vestments at Mass is very strict, and many theologians (see Benedict XIV. "De Miss." iii. 7, 1) believe that no cause whatever will excuse a priest from observing it. (The chief recent authorities are Bock, "Gesch. der Liturg. Gewänder": Hefele, "Beiträge," ii. p. 150 seq.; Wharton Marriott, "Vestiarium Christianum"; Braun, "Die Liturgische Gewandung" and in "Cath. Enc."; Montault, "Le Costume Ecclésiastique," "La Construction &c. des Églises," liv. x., Les Ornements.)

VESTMENTS, GREEK AND ORIENTAL. Something has been said on this subject already in the account given of the various vestments used in the Latin Church, but it may be convenient to give a separate article on the vestments of the Greeks and Orientals.

1. Vestments worn by the Deacon.—In preparing to officiate at Mass, the first vestment clerics to use the same alb in common life and in church. Jerome (Ep. 64; PL, xxii. 612) gives Fabiola an elaborate account of the Jewish vestments, but never alludes to the use of analogous vestments in church.

[1] It is clear, however, from the passage quoted further on in this article, that Jerome was familiar with the use of special vestments by the clergy in church.

which he puts on is the στοιχάριον or στιχάριον. It answers to our alb, except that it is not bound by a girdle. It used to be of linen and always white, but now it is often made of silk. It takes its name from the stripes (στίχοι) with which it is adorned. In Lent, except on the Annunciation and Holy Saturday, it is of purple colour. It is used by all the Orientals. The Syrians call it Kûtino (ܟܘܬܢܐ = χιτών, and that again is really a Semitic word, cf. כְּתֹנֶת), and the Copts, according to Daniel, labat or touniak. It is also worn by readers and subdeacons. In form it has come to resemble our dalmatic, though worn, like the alb, immediately over the cassock. Next comes the ὡράριον or stole (see under that word), the distinctive badge of deacons, and lastly the ἐπιμανίκια, (cuffs), a barbarous compound of ἐπὶ and manus. They stretch from the wrist to the elbow, leaving the hand free. They are first mentioned by Balsamon in the twelfth century, and have apparently been adopted by the Syrians.

2. Priest's Vestments.—The priest puts on the στοιχάριον, then the ἐπιτραχήλιον, which is a stole broader than the deacon's and joined in front, next the ζώνη or girdle, the ἐπιμανίκια, the ὑπογονάτιον or ἐπιγονάτιον, a square piece of cloth which hangs from the girdle and is really proper to bishops, archimandrites, and other dignitaries, such as protosyncelli, protopopes, &c., but is in matter of fact worn by very many priests. Over all he puts the chasuble (φελώνιον, φελώνης, φαινόλιον), in shape much like one of our Gothic chasubles.[1]

3. Bishop's Vestments.—Bishops also use the above vestments. But their στοιχάριον is marked with white and red stripes, and they have a picture of Christ on their ἐπιγονάτιον and ἐπιμανίκια. Their chasuble is marked with many crosses and called πολυσταύριον. The σάκκος, which has sleeves, and, to judge from the woodcut in Daniel, resembles a dalmatic in shape, was at first worn by metropolitans only instead of the chasuble, and by them only on the three great festivals. From the time of Alexius Comnenus it became the habitual substitute for the chasuble with metropolitans, and now it is worn in Russia by all bishops. Lastly, the bishop takes the ὠμοφόριον, a sort of pallium made of wool, which is hung on the shoulders and falls over the back. At some of the functions, but not at Mass, bishops wear a monastic cloak called μανδύας. The word, which is said by Hesychius and Eustathius to be of Persian origin, occurs in the LXX (e.g. Judges iii. 16), and a MS. Greek lexicon quoted by Schleusner explains it as a "sort of upper garment and the cloak of monks" (εἶδος ἱματίου καὶ τὸ τῶν μοναχῶν πάλλιον). The mitre (κίδαρις) is never worn in the sanctuary except by the Patriarch of Alexandria. Greek bishops have no ring, but they wear a pectoral cross (τὸ πανάγιον) and use a pastoral staff (πατερήσσαν), which, however, is much shorter than those customary in the West and much less ornate.

VETO. (I forbid.) (1.) The right to exclude a cardinal or other candidate for the Papacy, on the ground that his election would not be pleasing to certain governments which claimed to have the right. These were France, Austria, and Spain. The veto was required to be exercised before the decisive vote was given. It was frequently exercised during the eighteenth century by each of the powers named: in 1721 by Germany (Austria); in 1730 by Spain; in 1758 by France. Exclusion both by Austria and Spain is recorded by Wiseman ("Last Four Popes," Gregory XVI. ch. i.). A recent striking instance was the exclusion of Cardinal Rampolla by Austria in 1903.

The Popes have frequently repudiated this right of interference in the freedom of a conclave, e.g. Pius IV., Gregory XV., Clement XII., Pius IX., and finally Pius X. The last-named, in the constitution Commissum nobis, imposes upon the cardinals an oath never to accept from any civil power the office of proposing the veto. The origin of this so-called right is obscure. Of course influence exercised by the civil rulers (Roman emperors) in ancient and mediaeval times is well known. This, however, has no direct connection with the right claimed by the different powers in modern times. (Sägmüller, "Die Papstwahlbullen und das staatl. Recht der Exclusive in der Papstwahl," and in "Cath. Enc."; Thurston, "The Intervention of the State in the Papal Elections" in Month, October, 1903.)

(2.) The royal veto in the appointment of bishops, especially in England and Ireland. [See EXEQUATUR.] At the time of the proposed union between the parliaments of England and Ireland, Pitt was anxious to make some provision for the support of the Catholic clergy. In return he insisted that no priest whose loyalty the king should have reason to suspect should be appointed to a bishopric. At first a certain number of the Irish hierarchy had no objection to this; but on their action being questioned by the Roman authorities they agreed with the other bishops in rejecting any attempts to interfere with the absolute freedom of election. As is well known, Pitt's promises come to nothing. When the subject of Catholic Relief came up again for discussion, there was a division of opinion between the Irish and the English bishops, the former being strongly against any veto, the latter, with the exception of Milner, being in favour of it. Appeal was made to Rome, and the secretary of Propaganda, Mgr. Quarantotti, declared that securities for the loyalty of the bishops might be allowed. (Feb. 15, 1814.) It should be remembered that the Pope (Pius VII.) was at this time in captivity. As soon as he recovered his freedom he repudiated Quarantotti's action. Cardinal Litta, prefect of Propaganda, however, admitted that names might be submitted to the king's ministers, who might state whether any of these were obnoxious or suspect (April, 1815). Thus the controversy was not set at rest. It continued until emancipation, pure and simple, without any conditions, was obtained in 1829. (Charles Butler, "Memoirs of the English, Irish, and Scottish Catholics"; Milner, "Supplementary Memoirs of English Catholics"; Wyse, "Hist, of the Catholic Association in Ireland"; O'Riordan in "Cath. Enc."; B. Ward, "Eve of Cath. Emancipation," vol. ii., a temperate statement of the controversy.)

[1] The Greeks have no change of colours for the feasts. The φελώνιον of the priest and the στοιχάριον of the deacon are black at Masses of the Dead, and purple, as we have seen, is used in Lent. Great feasts are marked by the splendour of the vestments.

VIATICUM. Holy Communion given to those in danger of death. Such persons are allowed to receive the Communion even if they are not fasting, and they may do so again and again in the same illness, if circumstances render it expedient. Viaticum is given by the parish priest, or by another priest deputed by him. The priest, wearing surplice and stole, carries the Blessed Sacrament in procession; lights are borne in front, and a bell is rung to excite the devotion of the faithful. In non-Catholic countries it is, of course, impossible to carry out all this ceremonial. A special form is used in administering the Sacrament—viz. "Receive, brother [or sister], the viaticum of the Body of our Lord Jesus Christ. May He guard thee from the malignant foe, and lead thee to eternal life!" Afterwards the priest cleanses his fingers in a little water, which the sick person drinks.

(1) The Origin of the Name.—The word "viaticum" came into Church use as a translation of the Greek ἐφόδιον. This latter word means provision for a journey; then, metaphorically, provision for the journey of life (Clem. Rom. Ep. i. 2; Dionys. Corinth. apud Euseb. "H.E." iv. 23). Next the metaphor was extended to the provision for the last journey—viz. from this world to the next—and so it occurs as an epithet of the Holy Communion given in the Council of Nicaea (can. 13) to the dying. There the Eucharist is said to be the "last and most necessary viaticum" (τοῦ τελευταίου καὶ ἀναγκαιοτάτου ἐφοδίου). Innocent I. ("Ad Exsuper."; Mansi, "Concil." iii. 1039) employs the Latin word "viaticum" in the same sense, and so does the First Council of Orange, A.D. 441 (can. 3; Mansi, vi. 437) with an evident allusion to the canon of Nicaea. Thus it became a technical term for Communion given to the dying. (So Council of Agde, A.D. 506, can. 15; Mansi, viii. 327; Bede, "H. E." iv. 14; Amalar. "Eccl. Offic." iii. 35.) But even late in the Middle Ages the word had not acquired its present fixed and exclusive sense. The Council of Vaison, A.D. 442 (can. 2; Mansi, vi. 453), speaks of the viaticum, meaning, probably, the absolution and Communion of the dying; and in the Council of Gerunda, A.D. 517 (can. 9; Mansi, vii. 550), it certainly includes absolution. Aubespine, indeed, in his note (ad loc. 554), takes it to mean simply reconciliation and absolution granted to dying penitents —the "benedictio beatifica," as the Council of Barcelona, A.D. 541 (can. 9; Mansi, ix. 110), calls it. Hence the so-called Fourth Council of Carthage (can. 78; Mansi, iii. 957) has the expression "Viaticum Eucharistiae," to distinguish it from "viaticum" in the other sense. The term was also applied to the Eucharist generally, as our support in our earthly pilgrimage; and we find it so employed not only in the liturgy of St. Mark (ἐφόδιον, Hammond, p. 191), but even in a synod of Durham early in the thirteenth century (Wilkins, "Concil." i. p. 578).

(2) Viaticum in One or Two Kinds.—In the third and fourth centuries we have clear instances of Viaticum given under the form of bread only (Dionys. Alex. apud Euseb. "H. E." vi. 44; the contemporary Life of St. Ambrose, by Paulinus, n. 47). There can be no reasonable doubt about these cases, and Bossuet ("Communion sous les deux espèces," P. 1, n. 2) seems to be quite right in taking can. 76 of the Fourth Council of Carthage as evidence that Communion was given in the form of wine to dying persons who were unable to swallow the Host ("infundatur ori ejus Eucharistia," Mansi, iii. 957). Still, Chardon (280) considers, and with reason, that the rule was to give Viaticum under both kinds, so long as those in health received Communion in this way. Chrysostom's letter to Innocent (Mansi, iii. 1089) shows that the Eucharist under the form of wine was reserved for the sick. He complains that the soldiers spilt the Precious Blood on Holy Saturday, and this cannot have been in the chalice at Mass; for women, he says, were waiting for baptism, which preceded the Mass of Holy Saturday. The Eleventh Council of Toledo, A.D. 675 (capit. 11), the direction in the Gregorian Sacramentary ("Oratio ad visitandum infirmum"), and three forms for administering Viaticum given from ancient MSS. by Menard in his notes on this Sacramentary, all assume that the dying man will receive under both kinds. The same thing follows from Bede's "Life of St. Cuthbert" (cap. 39).

(3) The Minister of Viaticum.—In the early days of persecution it was sometimes carried to the sick by laymen (Euseb. "H. E." vi. 44). The practice apparently continued long after, when it had become a mere abuse. For Leo IV. (847–55) strictly forbids priests to send it by laymen or women (Mansi, xiv. 891). About the same time, we find Hincmar of Rheims requiring his deans to ask whether the priests gave Communion to the sick with their own hands, and not through anyone they could get to do it for them ("per se, non per quemlibet," Hincmar, Opp. ed. Sirmond, p. 716, PL, cxxv. 779). The Council of Ansa, near Lyons, A.D. 990 (Mansi, xix. 101) permits no one except priests to give Viaticum. Deacons, however—at least, in some places—continued to do so. This is proved, according to Chardon, by the old statutes of the Carthusians; and a Council of Westminster, A.D. 1138 (can. 2; Wilkins, i. p. 415), puts priests and deacons precisely on the same level in this respect ("per sacerdotem aut diaconum, aut necessitate instante per quemlibet").

(4) Rites and Ceremonies, &c.—No special legislation, so far as we know, exempted the dying from the rule of fasting before Communion. But history witnesses to the anxiety of the Church in all ages that the dying should communicate, and we may fairly assume that the present rule was in force from the beginning. The ceremonies, much as we have them now—e.g. the wearing of the stole, the cross and lights in the procession, the carrying of the pyx, the bell—are prescribed in the Constitutions of St. Edmund of Canterbury, A.D. 1236; in the Council of Durham, to which we have already referred; and in a provincial council of Scotland in the time of the Scotch King Alexander II. (Wilkins, "Concil." i. pp. 579, 615, 637). On the other hand, we doubt if the special form in which Viaticum is now given was usual in the Middle Ages—"Accipe, frater, Viaticum," &c. The Gregorian Sacramentary simply says: "Then let him [the priest] give Communion with the Body and Blood of the Lord;" and the Salisbury Manual—i.e. Ritual—of 1543 (reprinted in Maskell, "Monument. Rit." vol. i.) has merely a Rubric to the same effect. The three forms given by Menard from old MSS., and also a fourth from a Soissons Manual printed only eighty years before his time, would be suitable for ordinary Communion. However, a Bangor Pontifical of the thirteenth century contains the form as we now use it—"Accipe, frater, Viaticum corporis Domini nostri Jesu Christi," &c. (Maskell, loc. cit. p. 81). Viaticum, in the modern Church, is given before Extreme Unction. In the Middle Ages the reverse order obtained, as Menard (loc. cit. p. 536) proves by a multitude of authorities, and such was the order followed in the English use till Queen Mary's time. The importance of receiving the Communion while the mind is still clear and calm is the reason given by theologians (Juenin, "De Sacram." p. 588) for the order now laid down in the Roman Ritual. For non-fasting Communion of the sick, see COMMUNION, p. 207. (Chardon, 277 sqq.; O'Kane, "Notes on the Rubrics," &c., ch. xiv.)

VICAR-APOSTOLIC. By this was formerly meant either a bishop or archbishop, generally of some remote see, to whom the Roman Pontiff delegated a portion of his jurisdiction; or an ecclesiastic, not necessarily a bishop, who, acting under a Papal brief, or in virtue of instructions received from the Sacred Congregation of Bishops and Regulars, was commissioned to exercise the episcopal jurisdiction (except in certain special cases) in a diocese where the ordinary, from whatever cause, was incapacitated from its full and efficient discharge. At the present day, vicars-apostolic are nearly always titular bishops [see that article], and are stationed either in countries where episcopal sees have not yet been established, or in those where the succession has been interrupted. On the vicars-apostolic in England, see ENGLISH CHURCH, p. 299. (Taunton.)

VICAR CAPITULAR. [See BISHOP, p. 83.]

VICAR FORANE (foraneus = qui foris est; one exercising authority at a distance from the place where the bishop resides). A vicar forane is either a dignitary or, at least, if possible, a parish priest, who is appointed by the bishop to exercise a limited jurisdiction in a particular town or district of his diocese. An appeal lies from his decision to the bishop, who can also remove him at pleasure. "The chief part of the office of a vicar forane is to report to the bishop on the lives of the clergy within his district, and to inquire into any charges brought against them; to promote the observance of the synodal constitutions and the decrees of the bishop; to preside at local conferences, in which moral or liturgical questions are treated of; and to give notice to the bishop of anything contrary to faith and good morals, or tending to impair the Divine worship, the reverence due to churches, the observance of holidays, and the maintenance of ecclesiastical discipline, which may occur within his district; finally, to decide civil causes of slight importance" (Soglia, "Instit. Canon." ii. § 71). The fourteenth decree of the first Council of Westminster, on Vicars Forane, is in general agreement with the above, but adds that it is their duty to "take care of sick priests, to watch over the administration of Church property, and to see that sacred buildings be kept in repair." The council treats the title "Vicar Forane" as equivalent to "Rural Dean." There are vicars forane in many Irish dioceses, but almost their sole function is to grant episcopal dispensations for the non-publication of banns. (Ferraris, Vicarius Foraneus; Taunton, Rural Dean.)

VICAR-GENERAL. This official has succeeded to much of the power formerly exercised in a diocese by the archdeacon [ARCHDEACON]. In the canon law he is styled indifferently "officialis" and "vicarius generalis" and the common use of the term in Italy is conformable to this state of the law. In Transalpine countries the name of "official" is commonly given to the ecclesiastic administering the contentious jurisdiction of the bishop, and that of "vicar-general" to him who exercises his voluntary jurisdiction [JURISDICTION].

The origin of the office is supposed to be traceable in a Papal Constitution, promulgated in the Fourth Lateran Council, by which Innocent III. authorized the appointment by any bishop who was overburdened by the weight of his episcopal duties of an ecclesiastic to assist him in performing them. Yet since no allusion to such an office occurs in the Decretals, compiled some years later under Gregory IX., it would seem that the permission granted at the Lateran Council was not for some time much acted upon. However, before the end of the thirteenth century vicars-general had become common, and the "Sext" of Boniface VIII. minutely regulates their functions.

A bishop is not obliged to appoint a vicar-general if the circumstances of the diocese are such that he is able to discharge all his episcopal duties without assistance. On the other hand, the bishop may, if he pleases, appoint two or more vicars-general, either assigning to each jurisdiction over a certain district, or giving to one the contentious, to another the voluntary jurisdiction, or, thirdly, making over to them joint and full jurisdiction over the whole diocese in solidum. The person appointed must be a clerk, not a layman, but the law does not require that he should be in Holy Orders; the modern practice of the Curia, however, obliges him, if possible, to have a doctor's or some other degree in canon law. No regular belonging to a mendicant order can be appointed to the office. A regular canon or a monk may be a vicar-general, if certain conditions be fulfilled. It is held to be desirable that, as far as possible, the office should be committed to an ecclesiastic belonging to another diocese, but in fact this is seldom the case.

In matters of jurisdiction the vicar is regarded as the ordinary, and his tribunal is identical with that of the bishop, so that there is no appeal from the one to the other. But he is bound to keep carefully within the limits of his commission; thus he may not do any of those things which come under the definition of "Pontificalia," and belong to the episcopal order, such as making the holy oils, consecrating churches, altars, chalices, &c. Nor may he decide anything without a special mandate, which it may be reasonably presumed the bishop could not have intended to entrust to him by his general commission. For instance, although his commission warrants him to do all formal acts required in the institution of ecclesiastics to benefices, offices, or dignities, it does not authorize him to confer any of these; to do so lawfully he must have a special mandate. He cannot summon a synod, nor convoke the chapter, nor visit the diocese; "and generally, in business of an arduous and weighty nature, he cannot act without consulting the bishop." [1] The powers of a vicar-general cease and determine—(1) when his commission is cancelled by the bishop; (2) upon his death or resignation; (3) when, from whatever cause, the bishop's own jurisdiction in the diocese ceases. (Soglia, "Instit. Canon." ii. §§ 69, 70; Ferraris; Taunton.)

VICE-CHANCELLOR. [See CURIA ROMANA.]

VIENNE. The fifteenth General Council was opened by Clement V. at Vienne, in Dauphiné, on October 16, 1311. Great uncertainty prevails as to the number of members present, and the number of bishops and mitred abbots is variously estimated at 114 and 300. The Pope in his address at the opening gives three reasons for the assembling of the Council—viz. the affair of the Templars, the rescue of the Holy Land, the reform of abuses in the Church.

The investigation of the charges against the Templars took a long time, and nearly six months passed between the first and second sessions. The order, as has been already said in a previous article [see TEMPLARS], was suppressed by a Papal bull, but no definite judgment was passed on the crimes laid to the charge of its members. The French king, Philip the Fair, did not succeed in obtaining the condemnation of Pope Boniface VIII., but a decree of Clement in 1307 had annulled the excommunications, interdicts, &c., issued by Boniface against Philip and his supporters, and secured them from any prejudice in the future.

The rest of the decrees of the Council were partly dogmatic, partly disciplinary. John Peter de Oliva, a Franciscan (born in Provence 1247, died 1297), belonged to the "Spiritual" party in his order, was an admirer of the abbot Joachim, the author of the "Eternal Gospel," and himself wrote a fantastical commentary on the Apocalypse. It was with reference to him that the Pope in Council condemned the opinions that the soul is not "in itself and essentially the form of the human body," and that Christ was still living when His body was pierced with the lance, and declared it the more probable view that sanctifying grace and the virtues are infused into the souls of children at baptism. The immoral Quietism of certain of the Beghards and Béguines was also reprobated, particularly their doctrine that man may become absolutely perfect, and attain perfect beatitude in this life; that a perfect man is free from subjection to the ecclesiastical or civil law, and may commit the grossest offences against the moral law without sin.

The following were the chief disciplinary decrees.[1] The "black" monks and nuns were forbidden to indulge in luxurious and worldly habits (e.g. hunting, attending the courts of princes, wearing silk or jewellery, being present at balls, &c.). An attempt, not altogether successful, was made to heal the schism in the Franciscan order caused by the "Spirituals."[2] The clerics, who were rectors of hospitals, were reproved for neglecting the poor and enriching themselves from the funds entrusted to them. For the future such institutions were to be placed under good and prudent men, who were to submit their accounts to the Ordinary. This, says Fleury, was the origin of the lay administrators of hospitals, established "to the shame of the clergy."[2] Many secular prelates were anxious that the exemptions, granted to religious orders, should be withdrawn. This was not done, but religious were forbidden under pain of excommunication to give Extreme Unction, Holy Communion, or the nuptial benediction without express leave from the parish priest. They were also forbidden to beguile lay people from attending the services in the parish church. Regulations were made on clerical decorum, and on the age for orders. A subdeacon must be at least in his eighteenth, a deacon in his twentieth, a priest in his twenty-fifth year. The bull of Urban IV. instituting the feast of Corpus Christi was repeated and confirmed. Steps were taken to promote the study of the Oriental languages, a measure which Raymond Lully had desired long before. Chairs of Hebrew, Chaldee, and Arabic were to be established in the Roman Court and in the Universities of Paris, Oxford, Bologna, and Salamanca. Lastly, a crusade was proclaimed for the recovery of the Holy Land; the Kings of England, France, and Navarre promised to take part in it, and a tithe was to be levied for six years to defray the expense. The third and last session ended on May 6, 1312. (Fleury, "H. E." livr. xci.; Hefele-Leclercq, vi.)

VIGILIUS. [See THREE CHAPTERS.]

VIGIL. Originally the watch kept on the night before a feast, and then, from the eleventh or twelfth century (Probst, "Brevier- und Brevier-Gebet," p. 176), the day and the night preceding a feast.

(1) The practice of spending the night in public prayer is probably older than Christianity, for Eusebius ("H. E." ii. 17) attributes it to the Therapeutae or Alexandrian Essenes. In Acts xx. 7 we have an instance of devotional exercises continued at least till midnight. Vigils are mentioned by Tertullian ("Ad Uxor." lib. ii. 5,[1] PL, i. 1296), and the vigil maintained till "cock-crow" on Holy Saturday is prescribed in the Apostolic Constitutions (v. 19). Chrysostom speaks of the observance of vigils as a proof of piety (Hom. iv. in illud "Vidi Dominum," PG, lvi. 120: ἴδε πένητας ἐκ μεσονυκτίων μεχρὶ τῆς ἡμέρας παραμένοντας, βλέπε παννυχίδας); and Socrates ("H. E." vi. 8) refers to the nocturnal hymns and vigils of Catholics and Arians at Constantinople in the saint's time. We learn from Basil (in Ps. cxiv.) that vigils were held before the feasts of martyrs, and it appears from Theodoret ("H. E." ii. 10) and Socrates that such vigils were the usual preludes to Mass on Saturday and on Sunday, or other feasts. Jerome (Ep. cix., PL, xxii. 907, and "Adv. Vigilant." n. 9; cf. Ep. cxlvii.) defends the custom against Vigilantius, admitting, however, the grave immorality by which they were sometimes accompanied. It was probably these and other abuses which led to the discontinuance of the devotion. Gautier, bishop of Poitiers, prohibited vigils within his diocese in 1280, and it seems from the language of the Papal legates at the Council of Valladolid in 1322 that the old use was dying out. St. Charles forbade the keeping of any vigil except that before Christmas, and at present the Matins and Lauds and the midnight Mass before that feast are the only relics of the old custom. (See Thomassin.)

(2) The Fast on the Vigils.—The statement in Smith and Cheetham that "the observance of a vigil by fasting came to be usual not later than the ninth century" is inaccurate, or at least misleading. Holy Saturday was kept as a fast from very early times (see "Const. Apost." v. 18; also HOLY WEEK and LENT); and Augustine (Ep. lxv., PL, xxxiii. 234) considered it a crime to break the fast on the vigil of Christmas in those churches where it was observed. But it was in the Middle Ages that the obligation of fasting was extended to vigils generally. Peter Damian (Opusc. lv. "De Vigil." al. Ep. lib. vi. 35) insists that the vigils of the birth of St. John the Baptist, St. Philip and St. James, St. James the Greater, St. Bartholomew, of Christmas, Easter, Pentecost, and the Assumption, are fasting days. Nay,

[1] A memoir, drawn up at the Pope's request by William Durand, bishop of Mende, gives an appalling picture of the state of the Church. He mentions particularly the want of all observance in monastic orders, the immorality of the monks and clergy, the venality of the Roman Court, the way in which benefices were kept vacant, &c. He pleads for reform in the Curia and among the clergy, and proposes that priests should be allowed to marry.

[1] There is, however, no reason to suppose that he is alluding to vigils in the strict sense—i.e. to public prayer at night.

he even contends that the law of fasting binds on the vigil of the Epiphany, because there is a Mass for the vigil in the Gregorian Sacramentary. Lanfranc, on the other hand, excepts this last vigil ("Decret. pro Ord. S. Benedict." PL, cl. 451), and this is the rule which has actually prevailed. Innocent III., writing to the Archbishop of Braga, says the Roman Church fasted on the vigils of all the Apostles, except on that of St. John the Evangelist (excepted because of Christmas), and St. Philip and St. James, excepted because of Easter. This letter has been incorporated in the canon law ("Decret." lib. v. tit. xlvi. cap. 2, "Consilium nostrum"). Such is the present law of the Church, apart from indult or dispensation, with regard to the vigils of the Apostles. On March 9, 1777, Pius VI. exempted English Catholics from the obligation of fasting on all vigils except those of the Assumption, SS. Peter and Paul, and All Saints, substituting the fast on the Wednesdays and Fridays of Advent. (See the new edition of "The Provincial Councils of Westminster," p. 199.) Fasting is also obligatory by the Church law on the vigils of Christmas and the Assumption, and by custom which has the force of law on the vigils of Pentecost, the Nativity of St. John the Baptist, St. Laurence, and All Saints (Meratus, s. 3, c. 7, n. 1).

(3) The Mass and Office of Vigils; their Translation, &c.—The Office used to be identical with that of the Feria till Pius V. introduced the Gospel from the Mass of the Vigil with a homily appended (Gavant. s. 3, c. 7, n. 5). Probably Corpus Christi has no vigil because introduced after vigils in the original sense had fallen into disuse. Greater vigils—i.e. those of Christmas, Epiphany, and Pentecost—are celebrated with semi-double, that of Christmas from Lauds onwards with double rite. If a feast with a vigil falls on Monday, the vigil and fast are kept on Saturday.[1] This rule is laid down by Innocent III. (loc. cit.), but was evidently not yet established shortly before, under Alexander III. ("Decret." lib. v. tit. xl. cap. 14, "Quaesivit a nobis"). (From various sources, chiefly Thomassin, "Traité des Jeûnes," P. I. ch. xviii.; P. II. ch. xiv.)

(4) The custom of watching the bodies of the dead before burial (wakes) is in itself a most laudable one and is very ancient. We may reasonably presume that the office of the Dead, which until recently consisted of Vespers, Matins, and Lauds, without day hours, grew out of the practice of passing the night in prayer beside the corpse. But such nocturnal watching easily degenerated into feasting and excesses of all kinds. (Thorpe, "Ancient Laws and Institutes of England," 448; Wilkins, "Concil." ii. 706.)

[1] This does not apply to the Mass and Office for the vigils of Christmas and Epiphany.

VINCENT OF PAUL, ST., SOCIETY OF. This society, which exists for the purpose of helping the poor, was founded at Paris in 1833. At that time a number of Catholic students, attending lectures in Paris, were brought into contact with students of various ways of thinking—Materialists, Deists, St.-Simonians, Fourierists, &c.—with whom they discussed subjects of common interest in a "Conférence d'Histoire," or historical club. One of these Catholic students was the well-known writer Frédéric Ozanam. The free-thinkers were wont to allow that Christianity had certainly accomplished great things, but they maintained that its ancient spirit had fled, and that great practical enterprises could no longer owe to it either their inspiration or their vitality. "What do you do?" they asked of the Catholics. "You are full of talk and theory, but there it ends." The taunt sank into the mind of Ozanam and others; they meditated, prayed, exchanged ideas; at last, at a meeting attended by five or six friends, after much had been said as to the benefit which works of charity would confer both on themselves and on the poor, some one (it was never ascertained who) cried out "Let us found a Conference of Charity." This was in the spring of 1833. But the particular mode of commencing their operations was a matter of difficulty. It was decided to go to Sister Rosalie, who at that time was superior of the Sisters of St. Vincent of Paul, and obtain from her the addresses of some poor families whom the members of the new conference could visit. This was done, and M. Bailly, an excellent layman, who was in intimate relations with many of the Paris clergy, was asked to be their president. He accepted the post, and provided the conference with rooms to meet in. Eight young students—Ozanam, Letaillandier, Devaux, Lamache, Lallier, Clavé, and two others—held the first conference in May 1833. The orders for relief to be given to the poor who were visited were in the first place purchased by the members from Sister Rosalie. The conference chose St. Vincent of Paul for its patron. Bailly was a parishioner of the curé of St. Étienne du Mont, M. Faudet, who sanctioned and favoured the new work among the poor of the parish. After a time rules for the conduct of meetings and the administration of relief, with appropriate "considerations" attached to them, were drawn up by M. Bailly and adopted. The objects of the new institute were stated to be—"(1) to encourage its members, by example and counsel in the practice of a Christian life; (2) to visit the poor and assist them when in distress, as far as our means will permit, affording them also religious consolations . . . (3) to apply ourselves, according to our abilities and the time which we can spare, to the elementary and Christian instruction of poor children, whether free or imprisoned . . .; (4) to distribute moral and religious books; (5) to be willing to undertake any other sort of charitable work to which our resources may be adequate, and which will not oppose the chief end of the society."

In 1835, the conference having been joined by many new members, the question of dividing it into sections, which should serve as new centres whence the work of charity among the swarming poor of Paris might be carried on more effectually than before, came on for discussion. The division was warmly opposed by many; at last, however, it was resolved upon, and thus a step was taken which facilitated and foreshowed the ultimate extension of the labours of the society to other cities and other lands. The new sections themselves were after a time called "Conferences," and the aggregate of the conferences formed the "Society of St. Vincent of Paul."

The movement originated among laymen, and the administration of the society has always been in lay hands, but in union with and subordination to the clergy. Its lay character is said to have much favoured its extension at the particular time when it arose, when it was enough for a society or enterprise of any kind to have an ecclesiastic at its head to be denounced in the press and the salons as an "œuvre jésuitique."

The members devote themselves to visiting and relieving the poor, and in order to do this effectually many special works of charity have been organized by it. Among these are libraries, clothing depôts, crèches, boarding out with farmers, visits to prisons and hospitals, and finding work for labourers and women out of employ. On urgent occasions the society will grant extraordinary help; thus it sent money for the relief of the terrible Irish distress in 1847 and 1848.

Soon after the division of the first conference, the presidents of the different conferences began the practice of meeting in council from time to time; thus was formed the "council-general." Other councils—c. centraux, c. supérieurs—arose as they were required. In 1853 the members of the Paris conferences were 2,000 in number, having 5,000 families inscribed on their visiting lists. The society had even at that time spread to England, Ireland, Spain, Belgium, America, and Palestine. Indulgences were granted to it by Popes Gregory XVI., Pius IX., and Leo XIII. The last-named Pope speaks of it in terms of the highest praise in his Encyclical "Humanum Genus" on the Labour question.

The society was introduced into England in 1844, mainly through the exertions of Frederick Lucas, Pagliano, and William Amherst (afterwards a Jesuit). The total number of active members is about 100,000, and there are as many honorary members. ("Vie de Frédéric Ozanam," 1879; "Manual of the Society of St. Vincent of Paul," 1896; "The Formation of the Soc. of St. Vincent of Paul in England," by W. J. Amherst, S.J., 1899.)

VIRTUE. The common scholastic definition of virtue, drawn from various passages of St. Augustine's writings, runs thus: "A good quality of the mind whereby a man lives rightly and which no one uses wrongly, which God works in us without our aid." The last clause, however, as St. Thomas observes, does not belong to virtue generally, but serves to distinguish infused from acquired virtue. A shorter definition would be, "A habit of right conduct." Virtue is a habit. A man who restrains himself upon a particular occasion does not necessarily possess the virtue of temperance; a temperate man is one who has the permanent disposition of being moderate. Virtue may, like a habit, be acquired by repeated acts, or may be straightway infused by God. Supernatural virtues can, of course, be only infused. St. Thomas divides the virtues into three great classes: intellectual, moral, and theological. The first class, which includes wisdom, knowledge (scientia), and understanding, need not detain us here. The moral virtues are called "principal" or "cardinal" on account of their generality and importance. These two classes embrace all the natural virtues. The theological virtues are supernatural, and are so styled because they relate immediately to God. [See CARDINAL VIRTUES; THEOLOGICAL VIRTUES.] (St. Thomas, 1^a $2^æ$, qq. 55–67.)

VISION. In the ecclesiastical sense a vision is the supernatural appearing of the Deity, or angels, or saints, or even of the devils and the damned. It is not a mere subjective imagination of these, but their objective reality. Vision is often used as synonymous with apparition; but it is better to take these words as expressing two different aspects of the same fact: vision being reserved for the subjective aspect, and apparition for the objective. The appearances from the other world in dreams are not properly visions. [See DREAMS.]

Holy Scripture is full of instances of supernatural appearances, from the early chapters of Genesis to the final chapter of the Apocalypse. These Biblical visions will not be dealt with here except for the purpose of illustration; but just as in the case of other miracles, so it is hard to see how a person can readily accept all the visions recorded in Scripture, and yet deny with scorn all those recorded in the history of the Church. The possibility of such appearances being vouched for by Holy Writ, the belief in ecclesiastical visions is merely a question of evidence. In the processes of Canonization the visions seen by the saints are inquired into with the greatest care, and none are admitted unless upon the strongest evidence. (Benedict XIV., "De Servorum Dei Beatificatione et Canonizatione," iii., c. 50.) The Church, however, does not command us to accept them as matters of faith. To reject them systematically would indeed be rash; but they are still subject to respectful examination according to the rules of historical criticism, like other miraculous incidents. Many examples of this examination are to be found in the present volume. [ROSARY, SCAPULAR, &c.]

On the appearances of the Deity, the so-called Theophanies, see TRINITY (β). On those of the Angels see that article. In the case of our Lord and His Blessed Mother, as their bodies have already been raised to life, these bodies are actually seen when they appear. Thus, the Apostles saw the actual risen body of Christ (Lk. xxiv. 39, &c.); and what St. Paul saw was the same glorified body (1 Cor. xv. 8 &c.). In the case of saints who have appeared, various explanations have been given. (St. Thomas treats of the subject in several parts of his "Summa"; e.g. appearances of our Lord, 3^a, q. 54, a. 1, q. 57, a. 6; on the appearances of angels, 1^a, q. 51, a. 2; on the appearances of human beings, 1^a, q. 89, a. 8, $2^a\,2^{ae}$, q. 95, a. 4, q. 174, a. 5, Suppl. q. 69, a. 3. VISIT TO THE BLESSED SACRAMENT. The daily visit to a church in order to engage in silent prayer before the Blessed Sacrament is a practice common in all religious houses, and ascetical writers recommend the custom to persons living in the world. This devotion, natural as it is on Catholic principles, was not familiar to Christians in the early or even the Middle Ages. Fr. Bridgett, in his learned work on the "History of the Holy Eucharist in Great Britain" (new ed. Thurston, 169), does produce instances—e.g. from the earlier part of the Middle Ages—of prayer made before the altar at a time when, evidently, no service was going on; but there is no express reference to the Holy Eucharist.

In the Greek and most of the Oriental churches to this day there is no cultus of the Blessed Sacrament outside the Mass. The Easterns believe in the Real Presence just as we do. The chalice containing the Holy Eucharist is kept in a small tabernacle on the prothesis or on the altar. The priests do not genuflect to it or pray to it. Of course they have no Exposition or processions of the Blessed Sacrament.

Thus it is only in comparatively modern times (and not at all in the East) that the abiding presence of our Lord in the Holy Eucharist has come to be realized in the Church. In all ages it has been believed that the Eucharist is a sacrifice and a sacrament, and that our Lord is ever present in It. But these different aspects have been prominent in different ages. In patristic days the sacramental aspect (Communion) was to the fore; in the Middle Ages, the sacrificial aspect (the Mass); in modern times, the abiding presence (Visits, Exposition, Processions). Perhaps we should rather say that in these latter days we have a fuller realization of all the treasures of the Eucharist than the Church has ever had before. [See RESERVATION.] The subject has aroused considerable interest of late, owing principally to the researches of Father Thurston. (See "The Month," Apr. and Dec. 1907, and in "Cath. Enc."; Corblet, "Hist. du Sacrement de l'Eucharistie"; Raible, "Das Tabernakel einst und jetzt.")

VISITATIO LIMINUM APOSTOLORUM. That it was a duty incumbent on a Catholic bishop to visit from time to time the tombs of the Apostles Peter and Paul at Rome, in order to honour the institution of Christ in the person of His Vicar, to strengthen his own communion and that of his flock with the living centre of Christianity, and to report the state of his diocese to the Supreme Pastor and Ruler, was a conviction which had been growing in force for centuries, and had found continuous practical expression in those innumerable visits of bishops to Rome which the annals of the Church record. Leo III. (Ep. i.) ordained that bishops should visit the limina Apostolorum, but without prescribing anything as to the time. In the sixteenth century the practice assumed the form of a positive law. Sixtus V., by the Constitution "Romanus Pontifex" (1585), ordained that the bishops of Italy, the islands in the Adriatic, and the neighbouring parts of Greece, should be bound to visit the limina Apostolorum once in three years; the bishops of France, Spain, England, Germany, and other countries between the North and Baltic Seas, as also of the islands in the Mediterranean, once in four years; all other bishops in Europe and those of Africa, once in five years; and all Asiatic and American bishops, once in ten years. The visit was to be made either in person, or, if a legitimate hindrance intervened, by a suitable proctor or representative.

What was a visit of duty for a bishop was a pious pilgrimage for a clerk or layman, and so good a work that by the sound Catholic feeling of ancient times it was almost raised to the level of a duty. Benedict Biscop, the founder of the monasteries of Wearmouth and Jarrow in the seventh century, visited Rome six different times. Ordericus Vitalis († about 1142), after describing the martyrdoms of SS. Peter and Paul under Nero, says: "Rome, the capital of the world, glories in having for her patrons such exalted saints, to whose temples the faithful resort from all parts of the world, in order that by the assistance of these powerful advocates they may be protected from all their adversaries and all hostile influences." [1] (Ferraris, Limina Apost.; Soglia, ii. § 63; Taunton.)

VISITATION, EPISCOPAL. To visit his diocese, and ascertain the state and progress of religion in every part of it, is of course one of the main portions of that "oversight" which belongs to the bishop's office. The Council of Trent [2] prescribed that all bishops, either in person or by their vicars-general or visitors, should, if the size of the diocese rendered the annual visitation of the whole of it impossible, at least visit every part at intervals not exceeding two years. The aim of such visitations is described as comprehending the maintenance of sound doctrine, the expulsion of heresy, the reformation of morals, the right arrangement of whatever relates both to persons and things ecclesiastical, and the encouragement of the faithful, by preaching and other means, to lead religious and peaceful lives. The visitor, whether the bishop or his deputy, is counselled to eschew vain pomp and show, and to accept no fees or gratifications for any service connected with the visitation except such as are expressly authorized by law. All that the visitor can claim is board and lodging, or (if such be the local custom) the equivalent thereof in money. But if it be the custom of the place or province to give nothing at all, not even board, to visitors, that custom must be respected.

Bishops may in their own right, and also as delegates of the Apostolic See, visit the chapters of cathedral and collegiate churches within their dioceses, and correct what may be found amiss in them.[3] In the decree on seminaries (sess. xxiii. c. 18, De Ref.) it is assumed that these institutions will be frequently visited by the bishops. Benefices with cure of souls, which are annexed to churches, monasteries, &c., as part of their endowment, should be annually visited by the bishop, who should take care that the vicars administering them be reasonably remunerated out of the revenues.[4] When the members of a regular community (except the monastery of Cluny and the houses in which the heads of orders have their ordinary principal residence) have the care of the souls of secular persons, other than their own servants and dependants, they are so far as regards such control subject to the visitation and control of the bishop of the diocese.[5] As delegates of the Apostolic See, bishops are empowered to visit—(1) monasteries and benefices held in commendam; (2) hospitals, colleges, confraternities, schools, monts-de-piété, and "pia loca" in general; (3) churches in nullius dioecesi, or "peculiar," provided that the cathedral of the bishop so visiting be the nearest to the place; if that is a doubtful point, the right of visit belongs to the bishop who has been elected to it by the prelate of the "peculiar" in a provincial council. The results of an episcopal visitation are to be reported to the Sacred Congregation of the Council. (Soglia, lib. ii. § 63; Ferraris, Visitatio; Taunton.)

VISITATION, ORDER OF THE. This order was founded at Annecy in 1610 by the holy widow Jane Frances, Mme. de Chantal (who was canonized in 1767), under the direction of St. Francis de Sales, then bishop of Geneva. It was designed by the bishop to be open to widows and ladies of weak health as well as to the young and robust; hence but few corporal austerities were required by the rule, and at first there was no enclosure, so that the religious could freely visit the sick and needy in their own homes. On the other hand, the employment of time and the regulation of the thoughts were provided for in the rule with great minuteness. St. Francis did not wish the religious to be exempt from the jurisdiction of the bishops, and therefore he would not consent to the appointment of a superior for the whole order. The rule of enclosure was adopted in 1618. Many houses of "Visitandines"—so these nuns are called in France—soon arose, and have ever been conspicuous for the order, harmony, and piety which reigned in them. Some few of their convents—e.g. Blois and Troyes—resisted the bull "Unigenitus" [JANSENISM], but the great majority showed an excellent spirit. The Blessed Margaret Mary Alacoque, so well known in connection with the devotion to the Sacred Heart, belonged to this order. At the time of the third centenary of the order (1910) there were 170 convents in various parts of the world.

VOCATION. In its more restricted and special sense vocation is taken for that disposition of Divine Providence whereby persons are invited to serve God in some special state—e.g. as ecclesiastics or religious. The ecclesiastical vocation is manifested by the pious desires of the heart, by innocence of life, by the sincere love of Christ, by pure zeal for God's glory and the salvation of souls. That to the religious state, or the perfect practice of the evangelical counsels, comes to souls with a certain pressing invitation, with a strong desire of self-sacrifice and a clear perception of worldly vanity, with a certain attractiveness for intimacy with Christ and for the exaltation of His holy Name. But it is given differently to different persons, and prepares them "powerfully" though "sweetly" for the practice of solid virtue. "If thou wouldst be perfect," said our Lord, "go, sell what thou hast, and give to the poor,

. . . and come, follow Me." But the vocation to the priesthood or to the religious state by no means consists in the mere desire or aspiration on the part of the candidate, or in some sort of revelation made to him by God. All that is required on his part is that he should have a right intention and should be endowed with the qualities of nature and grace fitting him for the office. But this does not give him any right to ordination until he has been freely called by the bishop. "The burden of this great office is not rashly to be imposed on anyone, but only on those who, by sanctity of life, knowledge, faith, and prudence, can sustain it. 'Neither let anyone take to himself this honour but he that is called by God, as Aaron was' (Heb. v. 4); but they are said to be called by God who are called by the lawful ministers of the Church; for those who arrogantly intermeddle with and intrude themselves into this ministry, the Lord, it is to be taught, had in view when He said: 'I did not send prophets, yet they ran'" (Jer. xxiii. 21). ("Cat. of the Council of Trent," part ii., ch. 7.) To speak in the terms of the schools: the fitness of the candidate is the material element of vocation, while the formal element is the calling by the bishop.

The subject of vocation has been warmly discussed in recent years. We have not space to go into it here. Suffice it to say that the strong approval granted by Pius X. to Lahitton's book ("La Vocation Sacerdotale"), in which the above views were formulated, has decided the case against those who maintained that vocation consisted in some interior intimation that the person is called by God. (Besides Lahitton see St. Thomas, Suppl. q. 36; Vermeersch in "Cath. Enc." Some account of the controversy will be found in "Revue Pratique et Apologétique," xii. 558 sqq.)

VOTIVE MASS. [See MASS.]

VOTIVE OFFERINGS. Objects vowed or dedicated to God or His saints. As pointed out by Newman ("Development," p. 373), votive offerings on recovery from illness or preservation from danger were common in pagan times. They are mentioned by Virgil, Aen. xii. 766; Horace, Od. i. 5, 13; Juvenal, xii. 27. But this fact does not tell against the lawfulness of the practice; it ceased to be pagan as soon as it was accepted and interpreted by the Church. The eighth book of Theodoret's work "Adversus Gentiles" treats largely on the subject, e.g. "That they [pilgrims] obtain what they ask in faith their dedications openly witness, in token of their cure. For some bring likenesses of eyes, others of feet, others of hands; some of gold, others of silver; and their Lord accepts even the small and the cheap, measuring the gift by the offerer's ability" (quoted by Newman). A remarkable instance of the taking over of a pagan object and making it Christian is the Navicella at Rome, which is copied from a votive offering made to Jupiter Redux. The objects hung up in shrines abroad are at once testimonies of favours received and marks of gratitude from the donors. We need not remind our readers of the valuable votive offerings made in pre-Reformation days to the shrines of Canterbury, Walsingham, &c. (Jarrett in "Cath. Enc.")

VOTIVE OFFICE. An office recited at discretion instead of the offices fixed for ferial days. Such substitution (especially of Our Lady's office on Saturdays) for the ferial office may be traced back to the early Middle Ages. By a decree dated July 5, 1883, the office of the Angels could be said on Monday; of the Apostles on Tuesday; of St. Joseph on Wednesday; of the Blessed Sacrament on Thursday; of the Passion on Friday; and of the Immaculate Conception on Saturday. These votive offices were abolished by Pius X. (Constit. "Divino Afflatu," Nov. 1, 1911). [See BREVIARY.]

VOWS. A vow is a deliberate promise made to God in regard to something possessing superior goodness. To be valid it must proceed from the free, deliberate will of one who by age and social position is capable of contracting a solemn obligation. It is to God alone that a vow is made, and because, in a special manner, it belongs immediately to God's service, it is an act of religion, or of divine worship. To vow to a saint means to vow to God in honour of a saint. What is illicit or altogether indifferent, or imperfect, or impossible, cannot be the subject-matter of a vow; in the circumstances in which it is taken it must always turn on "the greater good"—"de bono meliori." The vow gives to the actions which it covers a special merit—a merit which St. Thomas derives from a threefold source. First, since a vow appertains to religion or the order of divine worship, it communicates its character to acts of other virtues practised under its control, or elevates them to the rank, as it were, of sacrifice. Secondly, because the offering made to God by the performance of virtuous actions under the obligation of a vow is a much greater offering than the performance of the same without that obligation. In the latter case the bare action is offered; in the former not only the action but the faculty from which it proceeds. Thirdly, because by a vow the will is bound to a virtuous line of action, receiving stability therein not only for the present but for the future. Thus, by being immovably allied to the good by the force of a vow, the will is strengthened to tend to the perfection of virtue. One can, however, break through the obligation of his vow; but he may not do so—that is, he has the physical but not the moral power of violating the law which he has imposed on himself. But it must never be forgotten that an action done without the obligation may be and constantly is more holy and pleasing to God than a corresponding action done under vow, because the former may proceed from a more intense love of God. It is on this that the intrinsic perfection of our deeds depends. And an action which is vowed is more perfect than one not so vowed, only if other things are equal.

It is true that by vows the will is limited in its sphere of action; by its promise to God its scope is bounded by a certain special law. Still, for all that, it is none the less free, since true freedom exists only within the range of the virtuous. "The Blessed" are free, though irrevocably confirmed in glory; God, who by His nature is infinitely just, is free; and man under vows is free "by the freedom with which Christ has made us free." Vows certainly do not exempt those who take them from sinning against them; but to say that on that account they ought not to take them is equivalent to saying that, as a rule, one ought not to undertake what is good in itself, lest though his own fault he should violate his purpose; or, for instance, that he ought not to go to Mass on Sunday, lest some accident might befall him by the way.

From the earliest times vows have been taken. Under the old law they are spoken of, among other passages, in Genesis xxviii., Leviticus xxvii., and Deuteronomy xxiii. Christ could not have bound Himself by vow, according to St. Thomas, because He was God, and because His human will was confirmed in goodness. The Apostles are supposed by many to have vowed whatever belongs to the state of perfection when, after having left all, they followed Christ. It is also said of St. Paul in the Acts of the Apostles that he had a vow; and, again, that the four men whom he took into the temple to be purified "had a vow on them." As to the special vows of religious life, or "the evangelical counsels" [q.v.], as they are called, their substance or subject-matter was marked out by our Lord Himself. These have been observed, at least partially, by individuals or communities since the Apostolic age, and form the basis and substance of the religious state. Vows are of divine institution, but the forms under which they are to be taken in different religious bodies are determined by the legislation of the Church. She admits vows, temporal or perpetual, conditional or absolute, simple or solemn. Vows are solemn because they have been instituted as such and have been accepted as such by the Church.[1] Their obligations are more stringent and their privileges greater than those of simple vows, and form one of the special characteristics of a religious order. According to the law enacted by Pope Pius IX. in 1857, only simple vows are to be taken after the novitiate in all religious orders, and that for the term of at least three years; after which time, if superiors should sanction it, their subjects are entitled to take solemn vows. In the Society of Jesus, according to its constitutions, the novitiate being ended, simple vows, with the approbation of superiors, are taken by its members, and after trials of many years either three public but simple vows or four solemn vows are to be taken by the same members, as their superiors shall decide. In a few convents of the Visitation order in the United States, nuns, after having lived duly under simple vows during five years, are admitted to the profession of solemn vows. The members of all other religious communities of women in the United States take only simple vows. When the subject-matter of vows, or the reason for which they were taken, or the possibility of fulfilling them ceases to exist, they cease to be binding. Their obligation also is cancelled by a dispensation of the Church. To her has been granted by Christ the power of binding and loosing by the words, "Whatsoever you shall bind upon earth shall be bound also in heaven, and whatever you shall loose upon earth shall be loosed also in heaven." To the Pope, therefore, as vicar of Christ, belongs the supreme authority through the whole Church of dispensing from vows for legitimate reasons; and under him bishops and religious superiors having quasi-episcopal jurisdiction have the power of dispensing, on just grounds, from the vows of those who are under their spiritual care. What has been said of the dispensation of vows may, according to due measure, be said also of the commutation of them. For dispensations from solemn vows recourse is to be had to the Pope; for dispensations from simple vows, in religious congregations whose rule has received Papal sanction—from vows of chastity, vows of entering religion, and vows of pilgrimage to the Holy Sepulchre, the limina Apostolorum, or St. James of Compostela—application is likewise to be made to the Holy See or to a superior specially delegated by it for that purpose. Vows taken in religious associations which have received only episcopal approbation may be dispensed from by episcopal authority. (Ferraris; St. Thomas, 2^a 2^{ae}, q. 88;

[1] Theologians are much divided on the essential nature of the distinction between solemn and simple vows. It has, of course, nothing to do with the public or private manner in which the vow is made, or the ceremonies which accompany the making of it. A solemn vow implies an absolute and irrevocable surrender, and the acceptance of it by lawful authority. Whereas a simple vow makes marriage unlawful and deprives the person who has made it of the right to use his property, a solemn vow makes marriage invalid and takes away all dominion over property. The vows which Jesuits make at the end of the novitiate annul marriage, but are not irrevocably accepted by the superiors, and therefore are not solemn.

VULGATE. The name is now commonly given to the Latin version of the Bible, authorized by the Catholic Church. In this version all the books found in the Hebrew Bible were translated by Jerome from the Hebrew and Aramaic originals, except the Psalter, which belongs to an Old Latin version revised by Jerome. Judith and Tobias were freely translated by Jerome from the Aramaic (this Aramaic, however, being merely the version of Hebrew originals now lost; see Neubauer, "Book of Tobias," p. xvi). In the rest of the Old Testament books, and in the deuterocanonical portions of Esther and Daniel, we have the Old Latin translation unaltered; the New Testament consists of the Old Latin text revised by Jerome from the Greek. It was only very slowly that this composite work supplanted the Old Latin which had preceded it, and became known as the Vulgate or common edition. It was the Old Latin which, till the seventh century, was recognized as the Vulgate; and not till the thirteenth, according to Kaulen ("Geschichte der Vulgata," p. 22), was the present use of the word firmly fixed.[1] Jerome himself employs the term (1) of the LXX in contrast with the Hebrew ("In Is." lxv. 20, xxx. 22; Osee vii. 13); (2) of the LXX in the κοινὴ ἔκδοσις—i.e. the corrupt and current text, as opposed to the critical text in Origen's "Hexapla" (Ep. cvi. § 2); sometimes (3) of the Old Latin version as made directly from the LXX ("In Is." xiv. 29); (4) of the New Testament in the Old Latin ("In Matt." xiii. 35).

(I.) The Old Latin Version, or Versions, the Itala, &c.—This part of the subject is involved in no little obscurity, and the very fact that the most eminent scholars differ on essential points proves that as yet no certainty has been reached. The critics of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries believed that several translations of the LXX and New Testament into Latin were made in very early times, and that one of these was known as the "Vulgata" or "Communis," because generally received, and again as the Italian version or Itala, from the place of its origin. (So Simon, "Hist. Crit. V.T." livr. ii. ch. 11, A.D. 1680; Hody, "De Bibliorum textibus originalibus, versionibus Graecis, et Latina Vulgata," p. 342, A.D. 1705; Mill, "Prolegom. in N.T." p. xli, A.D. 1707.) An epoch was made in the criticism of the history by Wiseman. ("Two Letters on some Parts of the Controversy concerning 1 John v. 7.")[1] He maintained that the Latin Church before Jerome had only one translation of the Bible; that this version arose not in Rome or Italy, but in North Africa; that it underwent many recensions or revisions, of which the best and most famous was called by St. Augustine, from the place where it was made, "Itala"; that the saint became acquainted with it at Milan and used it in his works. Every part of this theory was received with extraordinary favour. It was adopted by Lachmann, Tischendorf, Tregelles, and many others. Westcott (article Vulgate in Smith's "Dictionary of the Bible") considered its truth demonstrated, and Reinkens ("Hilarius von Poitiers," A.D. 1864) thought some courage was necessary to oppose such a strong consent of scholars. We shall see, however, that the number of dissentient voices has increased of late, and some of those who are best qualified to judge reject the whole of Wiseman's arguments and conclusions. We will take the points one by one.

(a) Were there several Old Latin Versions of the whole Bible current in the early Church? We say of the whole Bible, for it is, we believe, admitted that there was more than one version of Tobias, Maccabees 1 and 2, and of Baruch. A recent authority—viz. Fritzsche (Plitt und Herzog, "Encycl. für Prot. Theol." art. Latein. Bibelübersetz.)—follows Wiseman and Westcott,[2] and answers in the negative. Reinkens (op. cit. p. 343) believes in several independent versions; so does a very eminent authority—viz. Ziegler ("Lateinische Bibelübersetzungen von Hieron." A.D. 1879, pp. 4–18); so do Rönsch ("Itala und Vulgata" ad init. A.D. 1875) and Kaulen ("Einleit. in die H. Schrift," A.D. 1876), while the tone in Westcott and Hort's New Testament ("Introd." p. 79, A.D. 1881) is much less confident than that of Dr. Westcott in Smith's Dictionary.

This divergence of opinion among scholars is quite intelligible considering the uncertainty of the tradition. Tertullian ("Monog." 11, PL, ii. 946) mentions and censures a rendering of 1 Cor. vii. 39 "si dormierit vir ejus," as current in his time ("in usum exiit"), and again he rejects ("Adv. Prax." 5, PL, ii. 160) the customary translation ("in usu est nostrorum") of the Greek λόγος by "sermo," for which he substitutes "ratio." This seems to show that the African Church about 200 A.D. had one received text, though the possible existence of several translations is not excluded. He speaks ("Adv. Marc." ii. 9, PL, ii. 294) of a translation of the word πνοὴν (Gen. ii.) as given by some ("quidam enim de Graeco interpretantes"; cf. v. 4, "duae ostensiones, sicut invenimus interpretatum"); but this need not carry us further than the fact that one Latin version was in various places emended from the Greek, which is admitted on all hands. Jerome clearly believed in many types of text, many revisions of the same version ("tot exemplaria quot codices," Praef. in Jos., and so Praef. in iv. Evang. ad Damas.), but not in many independent versions. His commentary on Jonas ii. 5 (PL, xxv. 1134) is decisive on this point ("Hoc quod in Graeco dicitur ἆρα et habet vulgata editio putas interpretari potest igitur"), considering that nothing can be produced from him on the other side.[1] Cassiodorus ("De Inst. Div. Lit." 14) is explicit. "This text [of the New Testament], varied by the translation of many . . . . was left emended and arranged by the diligent care of the Father Jerome." This can only mean that there was one text which appeared in many recensions, because so many tried their hand at retranslating particular passages from the Greek, while they left the version, as a whole, in its original state. On the other hand, there seems to be no reasonable doubt that St. Augustine attributed the variety of texts to the effect of independent translations. Thus, he says ("Doctr. Christ." ii. 11, PL, xxxiv. 43): "Those who turned the Bible from Hebrew into Greek can be counted, but the Latin translators are innumerable, for in the earliest days of the faith everyone who got a Greek MS. into his hands, and thought he had some little acquaintance with each tongue, ventured to translate." The force of this testimony is broken if we accept Wiseman's explanation of "interpretari," "interpres," as meaning "revise," "reviser," of the same version. But the contrast between the Greek translators and the Latin "interpretes" is fatal to Wiseman's view. Besides, Augustine ("Doctr. Christ." ii. 14, 15, PL, xxxiv. 45, 46) expressly distinguishes between translation and mere emendation. "The skill of those who desire to know the divine Scriptures must be on the watch, that MSS. not emended may give place to such as are emended, provided they come from one class of translation" ("emendatis non emendati cedant, ex uno duntaxat interpretationis genere venientes"; so "Retract." i. 7, 2 and 3, PL, xxxii. 592: "ejusdem interpretationis alii codices," "codices ejusdem interpretationis"). For a more complete discussion we must refer to Ziegler (p. 6).

In ancient then, as in modern times, we find authority ranged against authority, and the proper appeal is to the MSS. of the Old Latin. Here it is only specialists versed in the examination of MSS. and their texts who can claim to be heard. But probably Fritzsche, with whom Westcott and Hort are in accord, is right in the account he gives. In spite, he says, of differences which can only be explained by independent translation of single verses, nay, of "smaller and greater sections," still the fact that the most discordant MSS. fall back again into unity justifies the belief in one single "Vetus Latina," which is the common basis of all the recensions. The differences he noticed may well have led Augustine, who was no critic, to think there had been many independent versions; and, in fact, the instances of difference which he gives are mere variants quite consistent with fundamental unity. (See August. "Doctr. Christ." ii. 12, PL, xxxiv. 43; "Quaest. in Heptateuch." iii. 25.)

(β) Where did the Old Latin Version (supposing that there was one only or one commonly received) arise? Here, too, no certain answer can be given. Wiseman tried to establish a theory suggested by Eichhorn ("Einleit. N.T." vol. iv. p. 355 seq.)—viz. that the "Vetus Latina" arose in North Africa. Westcott and Hort (ii. p. 78), Rönsch ("Itala u. Vulgat." ad init.), Fritzsche still maintain this position, but it has been abandoned by Gams ("Kirchengeschichte von Spanien," i. p. 86 seq.), Reinkens ("Hilarius von Poitiers," 335), and Kaulen ("Geschichte der Vulgat." 109 seq.). Greek, no doubt, was the official language of the early Roman Church. Clement, Caius (circ. 210), Hippolytus, wrote in that tongue; and Pope Victor and the Senator Apollonius are the only Latin authors prior to Tertullian whom Jerome ("Vir. Illustr." 53, PL, xxiii. 661) names. This supplies a probable argument for African origin, since in Africa Greek certainly had not the same currency as in Rome. But it is quite another question whether Greek, even at Rome, was the popular language, and whether the poor to whom the Gospel was preached would not require a Latin version as much as the Christians at Carthage. The inscriptions even at Pompeii and Herculaneum are almost without exception in Latin, and De Rossi's collection of Christian inscriptions in the Lateran Museum leads to the same conclusion (Ziegler, p. 23). Wiseman tried to show that the Old Latin and the Vulgate of the New Testament—i.e. the Old Latin or an Old Latin version revised by Jerome—is full of "Africanisms," and this, if true, would settle the question. But Gams (p. 86–100) has simply annihilated this argument. He has shown that every supposed Africanism can be met with parallels from Christian and heathen writers who had nothing to do with Africa. To accept Wiseman's instances, we must suppose that the Latin version of Irenaeus, the Muratorian fragment, the Latin version of Hermas, were made in Africa; and even this gratuitous assumption would not suffice. The linguistic peculiarities of the Old Latin and Vulgate belong partly to the decadence of Latin, partly to the "lingua rustica," or vulgar language. Even Rönsch, who still appeals to this theory of Africanisms, admits that these "Africanisms" were common to the language of South Italy, and this amounts to a surrender of the argument.

[1] We say this advisedly, after careful consideration of Ziegler's references and arguments to establish Jerome's belief in a multiplicity of versions.

(γ) As to the date and authorship of the earliest Latin version, we can only say that most of the New Testament books must have existed at the close of the second century, and that the version came from many authors. The latter point was established long ago by Mill ("Proleg." 2 seq.).

(δ) What is meant by the Itala?—The word as a technical term occurs once only in Patristic literature—viz. in August. "Doctr. Christ." ii. 14, 15, PL, xxxiv. 46. "Among translations let the Italian be preferred to the rest, for it sticks closer to the words and gives a clear sense." St. Augustine must mean some version of Italian origin, for we cannot think Ott's suggestion that "Itala" means simply the Latin version in the use of the African Church, or that of Rönsch —viz. that it was written in "the popular provincial dialect of Italy; therefore the name 'Itala'"—even plausible. "Itala" then must mean either a translation or the revision of a translation made in North Italy, and most likely St. Augustine made acquaintance with it at Milan, took it to Africa, and used it in his works. Scholars believe it a translation or a recension, according to the views they take on the previous questions. Fritzsche and (with some hesitation) Westcott and Hort hold it to have been a recension of the original African work. The last two, indeed, regard it as a revision of a revision, for they distinguish between the Old Latin of African origin, a revision of this current in Europe, and a revision of this European text made from Greek MSS. and also with a desire to improve the style. This last, current from about 350, they call the Itala. They think it survives in f (Cod. Brixian., vi. Saec., Gospels) and q (Cod. Monacens., Saec. vi., Fragments of Gospels), and in St. Augustine's quotations. Ziegler, on the other hand, distinguishes between the version of Tertullian (for the divergence of this author from all known authorities see Hilgenfeld, "Einleit. Nov. Test." p. 798), that of most African writers—viz. Cyprian, Lactantius (educated in Africa), Commodian, Firmicus, Maternus, Primasius; that represented by Augustine, the Italian Fathers, and the Friesingen Fragments of the Pauline Epistles.

(II.) The Vulgate in the Modern Sense.—1, Jerome's Labours: (a) In revising the Old Latin.—Pope Damasus requested Jerome to revise the Latin version of the New Testament, then in terrible confusion, and in A.D. 383 the Gospels, so revised, made their appearance. He tells us ("Praef. ad Dam.") that he corrected the errors of scribes, false emendations, and false translations; that he used for this purpose Old Greek MSS., but left the faults of the old version untouched if they did not affect the sense. To the rest of his revision of the New Testament he has left no preface, probably because so much revision was not needed (see Westcott in Smith). In the same year he made a cursory revision of the Psalter from the LXX. This revision is known as the Roman Psalter, because used in the Roman Church till the time of St. Pius V. It is still retained at St. Peter's and in the Ambrosian rite, in the invitatory Psalm at matins in our own Breviary, and very generally in the Missal.[1] Soon after retiring to Bethlehem in 387, Jerome made a more careful revision of the Psalter from the Hexaplar text (the Roman had been made from the κοινή. See Jerome's "Praef. in Psalm." with Vallarsi's note). This revision is the one in present use. It is known as the Gallican Psalter, because, as it is said, introduced into Gaul by Gregory of Tours (Walafr. Strabo, "De Reb. Eccles." i. 25). He then proceeded to revise all the books of the Old Testament which he recognized as canonical (i.e. all except the deutero-canonical ones. See "Praef. ad. Salom. Libr."). It is certain that this revision was completed (in Tit. ii. Ep. lxxi. 5, PL. xxii. 671, clii. 19; "Adv. Ruf." ii. 25, PL, xxiii. 448), but great part of it seems to have been lost in Jerome's own time (Ep. cxxxiv. 2, PL, xxii. 1162), and besides the two revisions of the Psalter the book of Job alone is extant. But we have also the prefaces to Job, Prov., Cant., Paralip., Eccles. (Kaulen, p. 163), and much may be restored from Jerome's commentaries on the Prophets, particularly on the Minor Prophets and on Ecclesiastes (Hody, p. 354 seq.).

(β) Translation from the Hebrew.—Jerome began to learn Hebrew when forty-five, under a converted Jew, as a remedy against sensual temptation (Ep. cxxv. 12, PL, xxii. 1079). He speaks ("Praef. ad Job" and "In Habac." ii. 15) of a Jew of Lydda whom he hired at great cost, and (Ep. lxxxiv. 3, PL, ib. 745) of a certain Baraninas who came to him by night for fear of his brother Jews. It is this Baraninas who in the silly joke of Rufinus ("Apol." ii. 12), appears as Barabbas. Thus prepared, Jerome began to translate from the Hebrew. The four books of Kings were published first. Then followed the book of Job, the Prophets, and the version of the Psalter from the "Hebrew truth." This last, of which the best edition is the recent one by Lagarde, has never been admitted to public use. Illness interrupted Jerome's labour, but in 393 he resumed it again, and translated the three books of Solomon. Esdras, Paralipomena, and Genesis appeared between 394 and 396; early in 404 the rest of the Pentateuch had been published; in 404 and 405 Josue, Judges, Ruth, Esther, with the deuterocanonical portions of Daniel and Esther, and the books of Tobias and Judith.[1] No attempt was made to translate or even to revise Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, or Maccabees (Kaulen, p. 168 seq.; but see also Westcott in the "Bible Dictionary").

2. Reception of the Vulgate in the Church. Jerome at first met with little gratitude. He had his own reward, for he had lived "to pluck sweet fruit from the bitter root" of Hebrew study, which he again and again had given up in despair and begun afresh "in eagerness to learn" (Ep. cxxv. 12, PL, xxii. 1079). But that for a time was all. He was attacked by those who mistake ignorance for piety—nay, a letter was forged in his name to the effect that he had been induced to pervert the Scriptures by the Jews ("Adv. Rufin." ii. 25, PL, xxxiii. 448). Even Augustine objected to Jerome's translating from the Hebrew, because it was impossible to improve on the LXX (August. Ep. xxviii. 2, PL, xxxiii. 112), and because of the discord a new translation would cause (Ep. lxxi., PL, xxxiii. 242). He admits that the Jews (who were the only persons capable of judging) testified to Jerome's accuracy, but adds that he himself keeps to the prevailing belief in the inspiration of the LXX ("De Civ. Dei," xviii. 43, PL, xli. 603). But gradually scholarship prevailed against prejudice. Cassian ("Collat." xxiii. 9) quotes the Vulgate of Job as the "emendatior translatio," and in the fifth century it was adopted by Eucherius of Lyons, Vincent of Lerins, Sedulius, Claudianus Mamertus, and Faustus Rhegensis (Hody, p. 397 seq.), though the Old Latin held its ground in Africa and Britain (Hody, ib.). In the sixth century the Vulgate was coming into general use. Cassiodorus ("Inst. Div. Lit." 12) strongly prefers it to the old version, though at a later date St. Gregory the Great ("Praef. ad Job" 5, PL, lxxv. 516) speaks of "the Apostolic see" as using both. In the seventh century St. Isidore of Seville ("Eccles. Offic." i. 12) says "all the churches" used the Vulgate, which must have been true at least of Spain. Early in the ninth century Rabanus Maurus ("Cler. Inst." ii. 54) says the same thing, almost in the words of Isidore; and Walafrid Strabo, the disciple of Rabanus, writes ("Praef. in Gloss. ordinar.") "the whole Roman Church now everywhere uses this translation" (i.e. Jerome's). The Council of Trent, in a decree which we shall have to examine further on, declared the Vulgate to be the authentic version of the Church, and in doing so appealed with good right to the long use of ages.

3. History of the Text.—The text of this composite work which we call the Vulgate was exposed to special danger of corruption. Side by side with it stood the Old Latin used for a long time after Jerome's death in many churches, familiar to the scribes, and standing in the most curious relations to our Vulgate—in some books identical with it; in others differing to a slight extent; in others offering an independent translation. Hence "mixed texts" arose in which the Vulgate and Old Latin were confused, when they should have been kept distinct. In 802 Alcuin revised the text with marked success from ancient Vulgate MSS., but without consulting the Greek (Porson to Travis, p. 145). Subsequent revisions were made by Theodulf of Orleans (787–821); Lanfranc, afterwards archbishop of Canterbury (d. 1089); the Cistercian abbot Stephen II. (1109), and Cardinal Nicolaus (1150). After that, different corporations issued "Correctoria," in which various readings were mentioned and discussed. Such were the "Correctorium Parisiense" (also called "Senonense," because approved by the Archbishop of Sens), the Correctorium of the Dominicans drawn up by Hugo a S. Caro about 1240, and shortly after replaced by another, and that of the Franciscans.

The first printed book was a copy of the Vulgate (Mayence, about 1450), and after 1470 a number of editions appeared, professing to be emended from the original texts (Kaulen, p. 311). In 1516 Erasmus revised the Vulgate New Testament, which he altered partly to bring the text into harmony with his own Greek text, which was of little value, and partly from a desire to improve the style. The really critical work of giving a purer Vulgate text from old MSS. was undertaken by Gumelli (Paris, 1504), the Dominican Castellaer (Venice, 1511), and Laridius (Cologne, 1530). None of these editions is of much account, but valuable contributions to the restoration of a critical text were made by Cardinal Ximenes in the Complutensian Polyglot (1502–1517), and by R. Stephen (1528, many subsequent editions). The Theological Faculty of Louvain entrusted the task of a new critical revision to Henten, of Malines, and his first edition, based on that of Stephen in 1540 and a collation of Latin MSS., was published in 1547. After Henten's death, in 1566, the Louvain theologians resolved to issue a correct edition of the Vulgate, answering to the requirements of the Council of Trent ("Vulgata editio quam emendatissima imprimatur"). With the help of the Antwerp printer Plantinus, and under the guidance of one of their own members, Lucas Brugensis (i.e. of Bruges), a great number of MSS. were collated; but their text of 1574 is identical with that of Henten (1547) except that they had added to the number of marginal readings. We must also mention a Lyons Vulgate of 1545, which gives valuable and ancient, readings though without naming the sources.

[1] We take these conjectural dates from Westcott, with whom, however, neither Kaulen nor Fritzsche entirely agrees.

Meantime, commissions had set to work in Rome at the preparation of an official text, and in 1590 Sixtus V. issued an edition, prefixing to it the constitution "Aeternus ille," in which he ordered it to be used in all discussions, public and private, and to be received as "true, lawful, authentic and unquestioned." Unfortunately, the Pope revised the work of the commission with his own hand, and on principles different from theirs; he called needless attention to typographical errors, by pasting them over with pieces of paper; and nobody was satisfied with the result.[1] In 1592 the definitive edition known as the Clementine (Clement VIII.) saw the light. The printer's work in the first edition of the Clementine was worse done than in the Sixtine Bible, but it had this merit, that it returned to the text fixed by the Roman commissions (Kaulen, "Einleit." p. 126). It was not a perfect text of the Vulgate. The preface disclaims any such exaggerated praise—nay, admits that imperfections had been left "of set purpose," lest offence should be given to the people, as well as for other reasons. But the Clementine editors rightly claim to have supplied a purer text than any hitherto known, and Vercellone ("Dissertaz." iv.) has shown that it is the fruit of long and well-directed toil and of great opportunities. The work of correction was continued for about forty years with few interruptions. The most eminent men from all countries were summoned to take part in the revision: among them Sirlet, Carafa, Bellarmine, Morinus (a critic who has had few equals), Allen, Turrianus, Toletus, Sà (the famous Portuguese commentator), Agellius, whose commentary on the Psalms is still esteemed, especially for its critical remarks on the Alexandrine and Vulgate texts. They used the Codex Amiatinus (A), written about 541 (?); the Codex Paullinus (C), a ninth-century copy of Alcuin's recension; the Vallicellianus (D), a MS. of the same type, but rather older; the Ottobonianus (E, Saec. viii., imperfect at the beginning, and ending with Judges xiii. 20); besides a number of Vatican MSS. Further, they had collations of the Toletanus (B, Saec. viii. according to Westcott, later according to Vercellone) and of another Spanish MS. from Leon. They had the benefit of French readings in the Stephanic edition of 1540 and collations of sixty Belgian MSS. made by Plantinus; and they understood the weight due to ancient authorities. Vercellone tells us they "preferred to every codex" that known as the "Amiatinus," the Queen of Vulgate MSS.[1] Still there were precious MSS., like the Fuldensis of the New Testament (A.D. 546), unknown to them; and textual criticism has advanced a long way since their time. Valuable contributions to the formation of a better text have been made by Vercellone ("Variae Lectiones"), and a distinguished scholar, Bishop Wordsworth, has published a new critical edition of the Vulgate New Testament in collaboration with Dr. White (1889–1905; ed. Minor 1911).

4. The Critical Value of the Vulgate and its Merits as a Translation.—The latter point is of course quite distinct from the former. The LXX is a very imperfect translation, but its critical value is very great (Swete, "Introd. to the O.T. in Greek," 440 sqq.). We have no Hebrew MSS. older than the ninth century, and those we have represent one single type of text, fixed by the Masorets, or "holders of tradition," who did not finish their work till eight centuries after Christ, and preserved with superstitious care ever since. Again, the earlier Hebrew writing simply gave the consonants of each word, and the vowel points are an invention not completed till the seventh century of our era. We have, indeed, a collection of various readings in our Hebrew Bibles, but as a rule they are of little interest, and the diligent labours of Kennicott and De Rossi at the end of the last and the beginning of this century prove how scanty is the harvest which can be reaped from the most exhaustive collation of existing Hebrew MSS. Most welcome, then, is the light which comes to us from times far before the fixing of the Masoretic text. We find important variations in that Hebrew Pentateuch which the Samaritans received from the Jews about 430, while the Book of Jubilees, a Hebrew work written shortly before the final destruction of Jerusalem, agrees in some of the numbers assigned to the age of the Patriarchs, and in other readings with the Samaritan edition of the Pentateuch. But the LXX offers the fullest and most valuable evidence now accessible on the early state of the Hebrew text. The Pentateuch was translated about 280, and the rest of the version some time before 133 B.C., and we find ourselves carried back at once to a text differing in important respects from that of our Hebrew Bibles. It is not only that we meet with various

[1] Sixtus was himself a scholar, and a more favourable judgment of his edition will be found in a masterly treatise by Mr. Law, prefixed to the last edition of Haydock's Bible.

[1] Mr. Law draws attention to the verdict of Ranke (Codex Fuldens. p. 562), one of the highest authorities on the Latin Bible, and himself a Protestant. Ranke rejects as undoubtedly erroneous the opinion of those who think the authorized revision of the Vulgate uncritical.

readings, often strongly commended by internal evidence, but we find certain sections present in the Greek and wanting in the Hebrew, or vice versa. These differences are most striking in the books of Samuel and Kings, in Proverbs and in Jeremias, in the last of which no less than 2,700 words of the Hebrew have nothing answering to them in the Greek. The Vulgate of the Old Testament, so far as it is Jerome's work, possesses no such interest as this. His text is far nearer that of the Masoretic, and many scholars have denied it any independent value. It is as close to the Masoretic text, says Eichhorn, as any Spanish MS. from a modern synagogue; and Wellhausen, in his edition of Bleek's Introduction, says much the same thing, in a more guarded way. The true state of the case seems to be put by Nowack ("Bedeutung des Hieron. für die A.T. Kritik," 1875), and the following is a summary of his judgment. Jerome had before him a text with the words divided much as in our modern Hebrew Bibles; it was, however, destitute of vowel points or diacritic marks. His vocalization, compared with that of other versions, was the nearest of all to the Masoretic, and his consonant text very near to it on the whole; for it presents no great omissions or additions like those of the LXX. Still, many of his readings are "indispensable for a correct understanding of the text," especially those which are peculiar to him, or only common to the Chaldee and Syriac versions. The case stands very differently with the Vulgate text of the New Testament. Here we have to deal with two distinct elements: the Old Latin, which forms the substratum, and the corrections due to Jerome. The latter carry us back to the fourth century, when Jerome lived, and beyond that, since he consulted MSS. which were old even then.[1] Hence, as we have no MS. of the New Testament prior to the fourth century, and only two at most which belong to it, the value of the Vulgate for critical purposes may be easily seen. "It represents," says Dr. Westcott, "the received Greek text of the fourth century, and so far claims a respect (speaking roughly) due to a first-class Greek MS." Jerome supplements "the original testimony of Greek MSS. by an independent witness." When identical with the Old Latin, the Vulgate, says the same scholar, has "a more venerable authority," for this translation was "fixed and current more than a century before the transcription of the oldest Greek MS. Thus it is a witness to a text more ancient and caeteris paribus more valuable than is represented by any other authority, unless the Peshito in its present form be excepted." This value is much increased by the fact that the extremely literal character of the Old Latin enables us as a rule to restore with confidence the Greek text which the translators read, and though the Old Latin was marred by interpolations, the corruptions proceeded according to a different law from those of Greek MSS., so that "the two authorities mutually correct each other."

[1] It has been often said that Jerome consulted by preference Greek MSS. with a text resembling that of the O'd Latin. Mr. Law has shown that this statement is groundless.

We turn next to the merits of the Vulgate as a translation. It is admitted on all hands that Jerome's version from the Hebrew is a masterly work, and that there is nothing like it or near it in antiquity. A perfect work it could not be, and this for the very reasons which may well increase admiration of the measure of success which Jerome actually reached. Few advantages were open to him which are denied to modern scholars. Hebrew had ceased for centuries to be a living tongue, and Jerome, moreover, had to learn it orally: there was no such thing as a Hebrew grammar, or a dictionary, or a concordance. The comparative philology of the Semitic languages, often the only key to the meaning of Hebrew words, is the creation of modern times; and Jerome knew no other Semitic language except Chaldee (Aramaic), and that very imperfectly ("Praef. ad Job"). He made many mistakes now impossible to a tyro of average intelligence who has learnt the elements in a good grammar. For instance, he believed Hebrew to be the mother of all languages (Ep. xviii.; PL, xxii. 365), whereas it is generally agreed that Arabic on the whole comes nearer the primitive form even of the Semitic tongues; that the guttural ע was a vowel (in Osee ii. 16, 17); that the noun צֶדֶק was an adjective meaning "just" (in Is. i. 21); he confuses עָפָר, "dust," with אֵפֶר, "ashes" ("Quaest. in Gen." ii. 14); חֶרֶב, a "sword," with עֹרֵב a "raven" in Zeph. ii. 14). His version tells the same tale as his commentaries. He had no idea of the elementary rules on the construct state (Jer. xxxiii. 4; Ezech. xl. 14; Osee x. 4, xiv. 3; Ezech. xxi. 77); he makes a plur. masc. agree with a sing. fem. (Jer. xi. 15), breaks other simple laws of concord and construction (Ezech. xlviii. 10; Is. xli. 7; Zach. iv. 12; Zeph. i. 2); misunderstands the force of tenses (Jer. xliv. 25; Ezech. xi. 16; Joel iv. 4); shows his ignorance of syntax (Jud. viii. 5; Eccles. ii. 3). As a natural consequence of all this, he very often misses the sense in difficult places. We have no room for instances, which would need explanation to those who have no acquaintance with Hebrew; while those who are Hebrew scholars will find them easily enough if they turn, e.g., to Job or the harder parts of the Prophets. We can only explain the excellence of the Vulgate from the fidelity of Jewish exegetical tradition, and the honest industry with which Jerome used it.

No admiration can be too great for Jerome's courage and independence, his thirst for learning, his outspoken candour, his contempt for the ignorant bigotry which he fought and conquered; but they know little of his spirit who, blind to the progress of Hebrew learning, use the very arguments against modern philology which were employed against Jerome by the advocates of the LXX. Little need be said on the translation of the New Testament. It is close and literal, and executed when Greek was a living tongue; and even its faults arise "most commonly from a servile adherence to the exact words of the original" (Westcott).

5. The Authority of the Vulgate in the Church.—The Council of Trent, "considering that no small profit would accrue to the Church of God if it be made known which of all the Latin editions of the sacred books in actual circulation is to be esteemed authentic, ordains and declares that the same (haec ipsa) old and Vulgate edition which has been approved by the long use of so many ages in the Church itself, is to be held for authentic in public readings, discourses and disputes, and that nobody may dare or presume to reject it on any pretence." A little earlier it had anathematized those who knowingly refuse to accept the canonical books "with all their parts, as they have been accustomed to be read in the Catholic Church, and are contained in the old Latin Vulgate" (Concil. Trid. sess. iv., Decret, de Canon. Script., Decret. de Edit. et Us. Sacr. Libr.). We shall begin by explaining what the council does not mean, and we shall distinguish points in our interpretation now at least universally admitted from those on which there is still difference of opinion.

First, then, no particular edition of the Vulgate is declared to be authentic; and as a matter of fact neither the Sixtine nor Clementine, nor any other authoritative edition, existed at the time of the decree. The Sixtine edition by implication, and the Clementine expressly, admit that they are not perfect; and if, says Franzelin ("De Traditione et Scriptura," p. 535), we can show that a text of whatever kind, though found in the Clementine edition, is no part of the old Vulgate, that text is not declared authentic by the council. Hence a Catholic is perfectly free to reject the text of the "three witnesses" (1 John v. 7) on this among other grounds, that it formed no part of the primitive Vulgate. "In fact," says Kaulen, an author of unquestioned orthodoxy, "the passage occurs neither in the oldest MSS. of the original, nor in the old versions, nor in the Fathers before the end of the fifth century, and is only to be regarded as commentary on v. 8, venerable on account of its diffusion in the Church" ("Einleit." p. 36). Vercellone, as we shall see presently, goes much further than Kaulen-Franzelin ("De Deo Trino," Thes. iv.) and Scheeben ("Dogmatik," i. p. 757) insist on the necessity of accepting the text, because in any case it is part of the Vulgate as received for many centuries in the Church.[1] We reply that the council does not require us to acknowledge as authentic any text simply because received for many centuries. The Fathers of Trent only bid us receive the Vulgate version which in matter of fact, and with substantial identity of form, has been approved by the long use of the Church.[2] Besides, Pallavicino ("Istoria del Concil. di Trento," vi. 17, n. 5) takes the "long use of ages" to mean from St. Gregory's time; and we have good ground for thinking that the text in question was no part of the Vulgate even then, for it is wanting in the two oldest MSS. (Amiatinus and Fuldensis), written about 545, and in Alcuin's reputed copies at Rome (prima manu), and at London (Scrivener, p. 562), as well as in some other MSS. (Wordsworth and White, in loc.).

Next, no comparison is made between the Vulgate and versions in other languages—e.g. the Peshito—much less between the Vulgate and the originals. The council compares the Vulgate with other Latin versions, and pronounces the former authentic.

Thirdly, the Vulgate even in its purest form is not declared to be perfect. Such perfection was, indeed, attributed to it by some Post-Tridentine theologians, but was utterly denied by many Catholic scholars at the time (Hody, p. 509 seq.), and now probably would be affirmed by nobody. Franzelin sets this exaggerated view aside as little better than fanatical.[3]

Fourthly, Franzelin admits the lawfulness of holding that texts directly intended to teach dogmatic truth may have been omitted in the Vulgate; and again that even when such texts are given, considerable alterations may have been made in their form. For example, he grants that we are at liberty in Gen. iii. 15 to reject the Vulgate (or supposed Vulgate) reading, "she shall crush thy head," as an error for "he shall crush thy head"; and similarly, that we may deny the correctness of the rendering "ante luciferum" (Ps. cix. 3), "fundetur" (Lk. xxii. 20), "in quo omnes peccaverunt" (Rom. v. 12), "omnes quidem resurgemus" (1 Cor. xv. 21).

[1] The S. Congregation of the Inquisition decided that the authenticity of 1 John v. 7 "could not safely (tuto) be called in doubt" (Jan. 13, 1897). But afterwards this was explained to mean that only the theological value of the passage was in question. See the Guardian, June 9, 1897.

[2] The council regarded the version as the species of which particular copies were the individuals, and approved the former only (Letter of the Cardinal di S. Croce, apud Vercellone, p. 85); and desired that the Vulgate should be corrected from the most ancient texts (ib. p. 80). This settles the question of 1 John v. 7.

[3] He shows (De Tradit. et Script. p. 568) that a decree of the Congregation of the Council (Jan. 17, 1576), which misled many theologians, is of no authority.

Here, however, Franzelin (as also Scheeben and others) makes two reservations. He argues that the decree of Trent requires us to believe that the Vulgate is accurate substantially (quoad substantiam) in texts "which are in themselves (i.e. directly and in their primary intention) testimonies concerning matters of faith and morals." We confess that we are quite unable to see any sufficient ground for this part of his thesis. No such distinction is made by the council. It is not even hinted at in the important correspondence on the sense of the decree between the Papal legates and the Congregation at Rome, printed by Vercellone ("Dissertaz." p. 79 seq.). We can find no trace of it in the elaborate collection of Catholic theological opinions in Hody;[1] while Vercellone's opinion is supported by Vega and Didacus, both of whom were at the council, as well as by Ruggerius and Natalis Alexander (Hody, pp. 511, 520, 522, 545). The distinction which allows us to reject such a reading as, e.g., "she shall bruise thy head," and binds us to accept such a verse as, e.g., "This kind goeth not forth save by prayer and fasting" (Mk. ix. 29), is surely a very subtle one. To determine what texts are directly and primarily dogmatic, and then what changes will affect only the mode in which the doctrine is presented, leaves immense scope for private judgment. Had the council meant to limit criticism, it would surely have expressed itself more clearly. Be this as it may, it is certain that the question is an open one. Vercellone, who was probably the greatest of all authorities on the Vulgate, published his treatise "On the Authenticity of the Single Parts of the Vulgate Bible" ("Sulla Autenticità delle Singole Parti della Bibbia Volgata") at Rome in 1866. This dissertation appeared with the imprimatur of the Master of the Sacred Palace, and in no way lessened the high reputation of its author. He holds that there may be an error of translation even in passages which the Fathers and the Church herself have regarded as dogmatic, and he rejects by anticipation the whole of Franzelin's distinction. Besides the reasons given, he urges that it would need a series of miracles to preserve a text pure in the hands of copyists from all error in dogmatic texts, and the very same reasons which plead for an immaculate translation also plead for a perfect preservation of the text; he points out that we have no right to expect such a miracle, since the versions received for centuries in the East and West contain many variations in passages considered to be dogmatic, with some faults of omission and addition; while all theologians admit that councils may err in the texts they allege in proof of their definitions, although the definitions themselves are exempt from error.

Franzelin's second reservation concerns sections like Mk. xvi. 9–20; Jn. vii. 53–viii. 11; Jn. v. 4. Many Protestant critics have rejected them as interpolations, but Franzelin is of opinion that they must be accepted by Catholics on the authority of the council which sets its seal to the books of the Bible, as contained in the Vulgate, "with all their parts." The judgment of Vercellone is diametrically opposite. He believes that the words "cum omnibus suis partibus" refer simply "to those deuterocanonical portions which were disputed by the heretics of that age, such as the additions to Daniel and Esther." If criticism showed such sections as Mk. xvi. 9–20, &c., to be apocryphal, he "would have no difficulty in accepting its conclusions," and "would not believe them contrary to the decree of Trent" (p. 46).

What, then, is the meaning of the council? It teaches that the Vulgate contains nothing contrary to true faith and sound morals. This was the great point present to the mind of the Fathers. They were unwilling, the legates write, to abstain from a formal approval of the Vulgate, "which was never suspected of heresy, that being the chief thing in the sacred books" (Vercellone, loc. cit. p. 16). But this is not all. The Vulgate is "authentic": in other words, the council assures us that the books in that version "are in substance entire and incorrupt, and therefore to be received by us as divine" (ib. p. 37). We may admit in the Vulgate all defects which may exist "in any book whatever without destroying its substantial integrity" (p. 36). To be more precise: the Church has never in any age or in any place mistaken a counterfeit for the written Word of God. "Therefore, all those innumerable variations which occur between the modern Latin Vulgate and the old Latin version lawfully employed for so many centuries in the Western Church do not destroy the substantial integrity of the Bible. Nor is this integrity destroyed by all those variations which are found if we confront our copies of the modern Vulgate with the ancient copies of the Greek Church, or with those of the Syrians, Armenians, Copts, or other Catholics in any part of the Church. . . . From a theological point of view (dogmaticamente), all the versions employed by lawful authority in the Church are equal" (p. 33). If we take the decree in this, as we believe, its true sense, no defence of it is so much as needed. A Catholic is not at liberty to say with Calvin (Hody, p. 551) that there are scarcely three verses

[1] I.e. none of the theologians makes Franzelin's distinction between the substance of a dogmatic text and the mode of its presentation. Hody divides Catholic theologians into two classes: (1) those who "contend for the translation against the original"; (2) those who hold that the Vulgate was declared authentic "quia nullum continet in fide et moribus perniciosum errorem" (pp. 510, 511).

in the Vulgate without some striking blunder, but a statement of this kind is contrary to sober criticism as well as to the Tridentine decree. "An authorised edition," says Westcott (p. 1705), "became a necessity for the Roman Church, and however gravely later theologians may have erred in explaining the policy or intentions of the Tridentine Fathers on this point, there can be no doubt that . . . the principle of their decision—the preference, that is, of the oldest Latin text to any later Latin version—was substantially right." (See also Scrivener, p. 311.)

Little need be said on the public use of the Vulgate, which is of course a mere matter of discipline. Catholic scholars may, and often do, translate from the original, and Vercellone has made valuable collections of various readings in the Vulgate text. But it is not lawful to use any except the Clementine edition in church, or to print any other text of the Vulgate, or even to insert various readings in the margin (Preface to the Clementine edition, ad fin.); though there is no objection to placing them at the foot of the page.

The revision of the Vulgate ordered by Pius X in 1907, and entrusted to a commission presided over by Cardinal Gasquet, is not intended to produce a Latin Bible to be proposed as an official text for the approbation of the Church. It is merely a preliminary step towards that official version. It is the aim of the Commission to determine St. Jerome's Latin text, and not to bring out any new version of the Latin Scriptures. How far St. Jerome himself was correct in his translation may be the work of some future commission. (See Card. Gasquet in "Cath. Enc." Vulgate.)

WAKES. [See VIGILS.]

WALDENSES. [See VALDENSES.]

WAR. The resort to force on the part of two or more nations which cannot settle their difference by peaceful methods. The word "nation" implies that war must be carried on by the people of a country regarded as a whole, and represented by its government, not by any section of the population acting for itself. That concentrated and organized force of political society which is behind the tribunal of the magistrate, and executes the sentence of the judge, in war is turned outward, and applied to the overcoming of the corresponding force exerted by the hostile nation.

There have been sects, notably the Quakers, which have denied altogether the lawfulness of war, partly because they believed it to be prohibited by Christ (Mt. v. 39, &c.), partly on humanitarian grounds. On the Scriptural ground they are easily refuted; the case of the soldiers instructed in their duties by St. John the Baptist, and that of the military men whom Christ and His Apostles loved and familiarly conversed with, without a word to imply that their calling was unlawful, sufficiently prove the point. They are on stronger ground when they point to the frightful evils of every kind which war unchains upon a community, and the more so in proportion to its civilization; and when they urge that war should be put an end to by a general agreement among nations to resort to arbitration it is impossible not to go a long way with them. There have been, however, and there probably will be again, many disputes between nations which they would under no circumstances submit to arbitration; and in these cases, if negotiation has failed, and there be, on one side or on both, great exasperation, war must inevitably ensue. But the voice of morality, enlightened by religion, is not thereby silenced; it claims to define both what wars may be justly undertaken and how they should be conducted. On these subjects there is a tolerably general consensus of opinion as to a number of important points among theologians, canonists, and publicists.

(a) The question what wars are just resolves itself into two inquiries—what is just for the State, and what is just for the individual. A State may justly declare war in order to recover territory of which it has been unjustly deprived, or to reassert its authority over subjects who have declared themselves independent, or to punish gross and wanton insults to its citizens while invested with a public capacity, and for several other causes. The canonists hold that a State may lawfully make war upon a heretic people, which is actively spreading heresy, and stirring up dissension and rebellion within its own subject provinces; or upon a pagan people, which prevents the preaching of the Gospel, and refuses free passage to missioners who desire to carry the light of faith to countries beyond. When the justice of a war is doubtful, Grotius ("De Jure Belli et Pacis," c. 23, cited in Ferraris) urges that, considering the evils which war entails, particularly upon innocent persons, governments ought to prefer to remain at peace; and this is probably now the general opinion. It is no just cause of war that a State desires to rule over its neighbour, or to enlarge its dominions, or add to its wealth or power, or to preserve a certain balance of force and prevent another nation from becoming dangerously powerful, unless the aggrandizement feared tend manifestly and indisputably to the subjugation of other nations.

The subjects and citizens of a government declaring war are safe in obeying it, and taking up arms in its behalf, unless they are certain that its cause is unjust. "In doubtful matters we ought always to obey, . . . because, though the ruler may sin in commanding, the subject does not sin in obeying" (Glossa on St. Augustine, quoted by Ferraris). But a foreign auxiliary, enlisting himself voluntarily in the service of a nation at war, is bound to satisfy himself beforehand that its cause is just. If a soldier is certain that the cause in which his government is fighting is unjust, he ought to obtain his discharge as soon as he can, and in the meantime to abstain, so far as possible, from acts of hostility.

(β) As to the manner of conducting war, opinion formerly tended to harsher conclusions than those now commonly received. All movable property used to be looked upon as the lawful spoil of the soldiers of an invading force. "Quae ab hostibus capimus, jure gentium statim nostra fiunt"—"The things which we take from our enemies, by the law of nations immediately become our own" (Ferraris, art. iii. § 34, quoting Justinian, "Instit." ii. tit. 1). Animals used for ploughing, and seed corn, were excepted from this right of spoil enjoyed by conquerors. At the present day, among civilized nations, private property on land is held to be exempt from spoliation in time of war. The invading general requisitions the authorities of the towns and villages which he occupies for such supplies as he may require, with or without payment; and, if these requisitions be complied with, it is held to be his duty to restrain his soldiers from every species of plunder. Private property at sea is still subject to be seized, and converted to the use of the captors.

The duties of a soldier in war towards the State which he serves and the general who commands him comprehend faithful service, courage, and prompt obedience. Hence desertion, cowardice, and breaches of discipline are in a soldier grievous sins.

Ambush, stratagem, and deceit are lawful in time of war, for those whose lives are in continual peril cannot be expected to abstain from any practice against their enemies which might tend to lessen that peril. In practice, the resort to such means is limited in some degree by the code of military honour. The use of poisoned weapons and explosive bullets is generally condemned, as causing a great increase of suffering to those wounded by them, without any corresponding military advantage. WASHING OF FEET. [See HOLY WEEK.]

WASHING OF HANDS BEFORE AND AFTER MASS. A rubric of the Roman Missal directs the celebrating priest to wash his hands in the sacristy before he puts on his vestments. The Jewish priests used to wash their hands and feet before they officiated at the altar (Ex. xxx. 18–21; 2 Paralip. iv. 2, 6), and in such passages as Ps. xxvi. 6 and lxxiii. 13 there is an allusion to the ethical meaning of this rite. The early Christians adopted a similar usage; only with them the preliminary lustration before prayer was common to all the laity. Many of the Fathers testify to the prevalence of this custom. (See, e.g., Euseb. "H.E." x. 4; Chrysost. Hom. iii. "In Epist. ad Ephes.," PG, lxii. 28; and Caesar. Serm. 51, numbered 229 in Appendix iv. to St. Augustine.) In later times this preliminary ablution was prescribed for priests only. It is also usual for priests to wash their fingers in the sacristy after Mass when they have taken off their vestments.

Quite distinct from either of these washings is the washing of the priest's hands after the offertory, and again after Communion. [See LAVABO; ABLUTION; PURIFICATION.]

WHITE FATHERS. (Missionaries of Our Lady of Africa.) They are not, strictly speaking, a religious order, though the members (priests and lay-brothers) bind themselves by oath to labour for the conversion of Africa. They were founded by Cardinal Lavigerie, archbishop of Algiers, in 1868. [See SLAVERY; "Life of Card. Lavigerie," by Clarke.]

WHITE FRIARS. [See CARMELITES.]

WHITE GARMENT. [See BAPTISM, and LOW SUNDAY.]

WHIT-SUNDAY. The common name in England for Pentecost [q.v.]. Skeat ("Etymological Dictionary," sub voc.) shows that the derivation is plain and certain. It descends from the Anglo-Saxon "hwita Sunnandæg," and means "White Sunday."

It is difficult to say why the name was given, but probably the author just quoted is right in his suggestion that it refers to the white robe of baptism. Easter and Pentecost were for many ages the times at which baptism was administered, and in cold climates, like our own, Pentecost would be preferred to Easter for the reception of baptism, which, in those days, was given by immersion. If this explanation is correct, our name for Pentecost would resemble the Latin title for Low Sunday, viz. "Dominica in Albis," but in the latter case it is the day on which the white robes are put off.

WILL. The ancient definition of a will or testament by the Roman jurists was "the lawful sentence of our will concerning that which a person wishes to be done after his death." Many writers hold that the words "with the institution of an heir" should be added to the definition, because such institution is "of the essence of the testament" (Ferraris). The business of will-making, in England at least, is now regulated in all its parts by the statute-law; and those desiring information respecting it can find what they seek in the ordinary law-books, or, which is the safer course, obtain it from their lawyer. All that will be here attempted is (1) to point out some special circumstances about the wills of Christians which the history of primitive times brings to our knowledge; (2) to advert generally to the manner in which the subject was regarded in the Middle Ages; (3) to specify some of the principal features of the modern canon law in regard to testamentary disposition.

(1) After the conversion of Constantine the imperial law (Cod. Theod. 16, 2, 4) sanctioned and facilitated the bequest of property of all kinds to the Church. Such property became the patrimony of the Church and the poor, and could not thereafter be the subject of a will, except so far as a man might desire, and be entitled, to point out its future dispensers.[1] Clerics, therefore, of all grades, could not dispose by will of any property, movable or immovable, of which they had become possessed in virtue of their office. Justinian, in the Code, allowed bishops to bequeath property which they possessed before, or which they had inherited since, their consecration; everything else they could only leave to the Church. This law was enforced by Gregory the Great in several remarkable instances. Justinian, also, while allowing secular priests to make wills (Nov. 76, 1), withheld the right altogether from monks. The power of testamentary disposition was frequently taken from and restored to heretics in the imperial legislation. A constitution of Valentinian (370) forbade women to bequeath property to ecclesiastical persons.

[1] Thomassin, Vet. et Nova Disc. iii. 2, 38.

A remarkable anecdote is told by Possidius of St. Augustine. A certain Januarius, who had joined the congregation of clerks which the saint had instituted in his house at Hippo, bequeathed his money to the Church, disinheriting his two children. St. Augustine refused the bequest; first, because his religious had renounced the power of willing when they joined the congregation; secondly, because of the wrong done to the children. He sent for the heirs, and arranged for the division of the money between them. Satyrus left all his property to his brother, St. Ambrose, with a verbal request that he would give to the poor as much of it as he thought right. St. Ambrose gave it all to the poor. The saint made no will, having stripped himself of everything at the time of his ordination, when he made over his lands to the Church, reserving the usufruct, or annual profits of them, to his sister for her life.

(2) During the Middle Ages, the practice of devising land and other property for religious purposes (ad pias causas) was still largely resorted to. In countries where the society was feudal, the kings and superior lords, finding that the accumulation of lands held by the Church deprived them of various incidental advantages (such as reliefs, wardships, and escheats) which they derived from the same lands while in lay tenure, commenced to legislate against such accumulation, whether effected by grant or will. Hence arose the laws of mortmain, forbidding any further conveyance of lands to the Church. These laws, however, in England could be evaded by means of a licence in mortmain granted by the Crown. A practice also arose of bequeathing lands to certain persons as the legal owners, to the use of certain other persons—a religious community, for instance; and in these cases the Court of Chancery regarded the beneficial ownership as belonging to those to whom the use was devised. This practice—long before uses were turned into possession—was prevented from being of any benefit to the Church by the statute of 1392, which enacted that uses should be subject to the statutes of mortmain, and liable to be forfeited on any infringement thereof, equally with the lands themselves.[1] Licences in mortmain ceased to be given after the Reformation, and the statute of 23 Henry VIII. (1532) declared that all grants of lands, on trust for parish churches or other institutions "erected and made of devotion," if for more than twenty years, should be deemed null and void. This statute was held to cut off grants to superstitious uses; those to charitable uses were still valid. But the Mortmain Act of 1736 (9 George II. c. 36) enacted that any grant to a charitable use should be by a deed executed at least twelve months before the donor's death, enrolled in the Court of Chancery within six months after execution, and taking effect immediately upon enrolment.

(3) With regard to wills in modern times, the general rule has been (Ferraris, Test. art. i. § 40) to follow the prescriptions of the civil law, in ecclesiastical no less than in secular courts, in all countries belonging to the Holy Roman Empire; in countries subject to the Roman Pontiff the canon law was followed. The (Roman) civil law requires that a will be attested by seven witnesses, all males. If the testator is unable to sign it, an eighth witness is required, who signs in his name. The canon law only requires attestation by two good witnesses (idonei testes) and the parish priest. In the absence of the parish priest, there must be four witnesses. According to the rigour of the law, clerks without the consent of the bishops, and religious without the consent of their superior, cannot witness wills. But custom has sanctioned their acting without consent, and they frequently do so.

If executed without the required formalities, and not afterwards validated in one of the ways pointed out by the imperial legislation, a will ad causas profanas, according both to the civil and the canon law, is null; and a celebrated question has arisen, whether, if the intention of the testator be clear, the nullity of the will for want of form should be extended to the forum conscientiae as well as the forum externum. Much has been written on both sides; an abstract of the arguments may be seen in Ferraris (art. i. 44–57).

Privileged wills (testamenta privilegiata) are those which are held in canon law to be valid although the forms required by the civil law have not been complied with. Such are those ad pias causas, those of soldiers made on a campaign, those of peasants, &c. A testamentum ad pias causas is a will in which a religious purpose or destination is substituted for the heir—such as the support of a church or convent, an almshouse, a school, &c. This is held to be valid, even without witnesses, if written and signed in the known hand of the testator; otherwise, it requires two witnesses.

Professed regulars cannot make a will, because they cannot, as individuals, own property [PROFESSION, RELIGIOUS]; nevertheless they can interpret and declare a testamentary disposition made previously to profession. Secular clerks of all grades can devise their patrimonial and quasi-patrimonial or individual property as freely as laymen.[1]

All regulars (except Franciscans) can, with the licence of their superior, act as testamentary executors. Even if they have not such licence, their executorial acts, though not licit, are valid. They are bound to render an account of their administration to the bishop of the diocese.

A will is said to be "ambulatory," because it can at any time be revoked or changed down to the last day of life.

(Ferraris, Testamentum; Soglia, lib. iii. § 50; Smith and Cheetham; Stephen's "Commentaries.")

WITCHCRAFT, WITCH (Anglo-Saxon, wiccancræft, wicce; probably connected with Old High German wihan, German weihen). Witchcraft has been defined (Bergier, "Dict. Théol.") as "the art of doing things wonderful, and apparently supernatural, without the intervention of God." Perhaps a more exact definition would be "a power, real or supposed, of producing, in concert with an evil spirit, effects beyond the reach of natural means and operations."

Those who deny the existence of evil spirits, and maintain that all the cases of demoniacal possession mentioned in the Bible and recorded elsewhere are merely cases of disease, are of course still less inclined to admit the reality of witchcraft. Imagination, morbid fancy, terror of the unknown, private spite, knavery, credulity, and hallucination sufficiently account, in their eyes, for all of which witches have ever been accused, or have accused themselves. The former opinion—namely, that any commerce between human beings and evil spirits is imaginary and impossible—is repugnant to Scripture and the, at least implicit, teaching of the Church, and cannot be held by Catholics. But it does not follow that because we believe that obsession is a fact, and that human beings can and do come under the influence of evil spirits, we should therefore admit the reality of any such leagues or compacts with the devil as the records of witchcraft assume. Perrone, indeed, describes as "rash" the denial of the common opinion that dealings and compacts with the devil actually take place.[1] But other Catholic theologians (see the article Zauberei in "Kirchenlex.") take a different view, and argue that, just as the belief in the Sabbaths or nightly meetings of the witches, though once universally held, has been so dissipated by reflection and experience that Perrone himself does not admit it, so the tendency of sound opinion is to the extirpation of the view that the phenomena of witchcraft imply, or ever implied, an actual diabolic compact.

Without troubling ourselves with the sagae and lamiae of Roman antiquity, let us consider the popular notions about witches and their power which prevailed in Europe till quite recent times, and still are harboured in many weak and ill-taught minds. It used to be believed that witches were of three kinds—black, white, and grey: the first could only hurt; the second only help; the third could both help and hurt. Their power came to them in virtue of a compact with the devil, by which they bartered their souls for some earthly object of desire. The witch was thought to be usually "a decrepit, superannuated old woman, who is tempted by a man in black to sign a contract to become his, both soul and body." He gives her a piece of money, and she delivers to him a slip of parchment, on which her name is signed with her blood. An imp or familiar, often in the form of a cat, is given to her, and the bargain is concluded. From this time the witch bore the devil's mark on some part of her body.[1] Whether the witch were the devil's instrument, or the devil hers, was a point not quite settled; but in either case she deserved to be burnt.

[1] Ferraris, art. iii. 26.

[1] Praelectiones, iv. 60.

Reginald Scot, who lived at a time when there were as many as seventeen or eighteen reputed witches in many an English village, describes the way in which the character of witch came to be assigned to a woman. A morose old woman, who has lost her children and friends, lives alone in a hut; she begs food and other things of her neighbours; sometimes she meets with a refusal, resenting which she uses bad language, and wishes some harm may come to the refuser. After a time, some altercation of this kind has taken place between her and many families in the parish. To some members of these mishaps are sure to happen—sudden seizures of illness, murrain among the cattle, failure of crops, &c. The cause is unknown; one must therefore be invented; the curses of the old woman are remembered, and the whole thing is clear—she has bewitched them. Even the doctors, says Scot, if they find a case defy their art, often encourage the superstitious belief, for inscitiae pallium veneficium et incantatio ("witchcraft and enchantment are the cloak of ignorance").

True religion supports the mind under misfortune, ascribing every event to the will or the permission of God, who does nothing except in love. But when the Christianity professed is but skin-deep, and temporal gain or loss is the engrossing object of our hope or fear, an ignorant age resorts to witchcraft, whether to explain ill-luck, or to find a short cut to prosperity. "If any adversitie, greefe, sicknesse, losse of children, corne, cattell, or libertie, happen unto them, by and by they exclaime upon witches." So writes Reginald Scot, and illustrates what he says by relating what had happened within his own knowledge. The Rev. J. Ferrall, vicar of Brenchley in Kent, charged Margaret Symons, one of his parishioners, with having bewitched his son, and caused him to fall seriously ill. The woman's dog had barked at the boy as he was passing her house; about this a quarrel had arisen, and angry words been exchanged. When his son, soon afterwards, fell ill, the reverend gentleman, confirmed in his opinion by the other witches living in the village, thought Margaret Symons must have cast a spell upon him. The words printed in italics illustrate a fact which witch-trials abundantly teach—viz. that the belief in witchcraft tends to establish and extend itself in proportion to the number of the reputed witches. The boy was said to have been cured of his illness by another Brenchley witch! and Margaret Symons, we may hope, escaped.

As by degrees the theory of witchcraft, arranging itself round two principal points—the league with the devil and the nightly meetings or Sabbaths—became more definite, the catalogue of mischiefs, rogueries, and portentous events of all kinds, which the witches were believed capable of causing, was continually on the increase. If a German jurisconsult, in a "dissertatio juridica," were at the present day to write as the learned Walburger of Anhalt wrote in 1670, he would be set down as insane. But, at the time, Walburger was considered to write on the conservative, safe, and orthodox side. In his belief, witches can and do cause disease (p. 30), and lay snares to kill unbaptized infants (p. 35) for the gratification of their master the devil; they kill their own children and offer them to the devil in sacrifice (p. 36); cause wet-nurses and nursing-mothers to lose their milk (ib.); and kill great numbers of children, after bringing them into the world as midwives, by running long needles into their heads. In the previous century a German count had "dedicated to the flames" (Vulcano consecravit) eight witches, who had killed, between them, one hundred and forty infants. Two witches were detected, one summer night, boiling an infant in a cauldron; had they not been interrupted, they said, a strong frost would have been caused by the mighty spell they were brewing, which would have destroyed all the crops. One of the abominations of which, in Walburger's opinion, witches were most frequently guilty, was that of "nodatio"; the coarse and grotesque details in connection with this charge may be seen in Ghirlandus, Bodin, and Delrio, as well as in his own treatise. Witches are in the habit of killing animals, usually by poison; of drying up cows, causing abortion, preventing butter from coming and beer from working, and diverting, with the aid of the devil, the milk from cows belonging to other women into their own milk-pails. The Satanic Sabbaths, Walburger tells us, are organized

[1] Margaret Flower, executed at Lincoln in 1618 for bewitching Lord Rosse, son of the Earl of Rutland, and other persons, confessed that she had two familiar spirits sucking on her—the one white, the other black spotted. When she first entertained them she promised them her soul, and they covenanted to do all things which she commanded them. (Brand, Popular Antiquities, ii. 387.)

by the devil with peculiar care. The judge Remigius, he says, condemned 800 persons to death in Lorraine for the crime of attending these meetings, all of whom testified that they really took place. The witches ride to them on broomsticks, reeds, goats, bulls, horses, or dogs—the transporting power being supplied by the devil. In Germany the Blocksberg is a favourite place of meeting.

Great though the power of the witch was believed to be, the popular imagination imposed limits upon it, and invented antidotes against their spells. At Christmastide the Babe of Bethlehem restrained the powers of hell:—

> "then no planet strikes,
> No fairy takes, nor witch hath power to charm,
> So hallow'd and so gracious is the time."
> (Hamlet, Act I. Sc. 1.)

If one could succeed in drawing the witch's blood, her spells were defeated (Brand, ii. 378). Herb Paris was thought an excellent preservative; vervain and dill were also recommended; people used to hang up these things at their doors. It was also believed that there were infallible means of proving witchcraft against a witch who declared herself innocent. Of these the one first resorted to was to search for the devil's mark; this being found, according to Scot,[1] the judge might sentence her to death at once. A mole, or wart, or birth-mark found on the unhappy woman must often have sealed her doom. Another method was to weigh the witch against the church Bible; if the latter were the heavier, she was guilty. Another was to make her say the Lord's Prayer, it being believed that no witch could repeat it to the end without a mistake. Another was to cross-tie her (right thumb to left toe, left thumb to right toe) and throw her into a pond or river: if guilty she could not sink; if she did sink, this proof of her innocence unluckily came too late. A notorious witch-finder in the seventeenth century, Matthew Hopkins, was famous for applying all these tests; he "hanged, in one year, no less than sixty reputed witches in his own county of Essex." [2]

What are we to say to all this? That confessions of being in league with the devil, and of attendance at the Sabbaths, were sometimes extorted by torture is undoubted; and such confessions few persons would now hesitate to pronounce worthless. But it is no less certain that in numberless instances the witches voluntarily accused themselves of the greatest monstrosities and crimes imaginable. Shall we believe, on their own word, that they went where they said they went, made the covenants which they said they made, saw what they said they saw? To resist belief in their asseverations must have been for a long time extremely difficult, especially when judges and advocates came to the investigation with a fixed conviction that witchcraft was a real crime. But experience must have kept continually adding to the mass of disproved assertions and detected impostures; so that at last it seemed more reasonable to trace the enormities with which these miserable creatures charged themselves to their own crazy and turbid imagination than to suppose them to have an objective existence. To say this is not to deny that the evil spirit has anything to do with witchcraft. Many recorded cases are apparently inexplicable, unless we suppose a demoniacal agency to have been at work. The fact of obsession, and the remedy of exorcism, remain unshaken; but the crime of witchcraft, consisting in a distinct and conscious bargain with the evil one in order to obtain unlawful power, would appear to rest on no secure foundation.[1]

The history of juridical and theological opinion is very curious, and was admirably traced by Tartarotti in the last century. From the introduction to his work, "Del Congresso Notturno," most of the details in the following sketch are taken. The first among mediaeval writers to notice the witches' Sabbath was Regino, abbot of Prume, at the beginning of the tenth century; he speaks of "wicked women," who say that they attend great meetings by night "with Diana, the goddess of the pagans," and do her bidding. Diana (Hecate, Trivia) was the goddess of the ways (viarum dea), and therefore supposed to preside at a meeting of her votaries gathered from every quarter.[2] A century later, Burchard, bishop of Worms, speaks of women who believed themselves to ride to the meetings on different beasts. A Council of Treves (1310) forbade any woman to pretend that she rode by night with Diana or with Herodiana—"haec enim daemoniaca illusio est." By Herodiana was meant the daughter of Herodias, whose skill in dancing was supposed to be displayed at these Satanical assemblies. From the fifteenth century date the systematic severities of the Inquisition for witchcraft (processus de crimine magiae, Hexenprozess). Dominican writers of that age—Nider, Jaquerio, Sprenger, Institor, &c.—defended the process, and asserted the reality of what the witches confessed; but the Franciscans Cassini and Spina took the opposite view. Cassini wrote a treatise to prove that the witches did not really ride to the Sabbata, but in ecstasy believed that they did so. Sprenger and Institor were the joint authors of the celebrated work "Malleus Maleficarum," which is full of the most startling and horrible stories. After the middle of the sixteenth century the number of those who opposed the popular belief grew rapidly. The work of Wierus, a Cleves physician, on the "Pseudomonarchia Daemonum," which appeared about that time, made a great sensation. Against Wierus —besides several Catholic writers, as Tanner and Layman—the Protestants Daneus, Hemming, T. Erastus, and Bodin appeared. Bodin, author of "Daemonomania," was a French jurisconsult. Wierus declared that the Protestants believed in the Sabbata more firmly than the Catholics themselves. Reginald Scot, evidently a humane and enlightened man, published his "Discoverie of Witchcraft," in which he takes the same line as Wierus, in 1584; but, being in English, the work appears to have been unknown on the Continent. Nicholas Remigio, the Lorraine judge mentioned above, published his "Daemonolatria" in 1595. Towards 1600 appeared the ponderous work of Martin Delrio, a Jesuit, "Disquisitiones Magicae," in which the revelations of the witches are still treated seriously. This became everywhere a work of authority in the courts, so that Thomasius says that Protestant jurisconsults "all but copy him out word for word." James I., in his "Denonology," took the same side. The first great shock to the received system came through the publication of a work by the Jesuit Frederic Spee, "Cautio Criminalis circa Processus contra Sagas," 1631. Father Spee had attended the execution of many persons condemned for witchcraft in the dioceses of Würzburg and Bamberg, and had come to the conclusion that many of them were entirely innocent. Yet so strong at that time was the general opinion on the other side that Father Spee did not attach his name to his work, nor did he express disbelief in the Sabbata or midnight meetings, nor propose to abandon the process; he simply pleaded for more caution and circumspection.[1] Leibnitz[2] tells us that this work produced a strong impression on the mind of Schönborn, afterwards Elector of Mayence, and through him on other German princes.

Yet, in spite of Father Spee, a crowd of writers all through the seventeenth century, both Protestants and Catholics, defended the process, and the assumptions on which it rested. Among these were Carpzovius, Crusius, Ghirlandus, Méric Casaubon, and Glanvile. The Lutheran Thomasius published an able tract (1701), "Theses de Crimine Magiae," on the other side. In the eighteenth century the mistrust of the process grew stronger and stronger. In England the Act 9 Geo. II. (1736) abolished all prosecutions for witchcraft and sorcery; pretensions of the kind were from that time treated as charlatanerie and imposture, and, if attended by attempts to gain money, were punished. Maria Theresa abolished witch-trials in Austria in 1766. The last execution of witches in Great Britain appears to have been in Scotland in 1727, when a woman was burnt on the charge of having ridden her own daughter to the meetings, the said daughter having been transformed into a pony and shod by the devil![1] At Tring in Hertfordshire, in 1751, an old man and his wife, being suspected of witchcraft, were beaten, ducked, and otherwise ill-used by a mob until they expired. The latest instances of witch-burning in Europe appear to have been at Glarus in 1782, and Posen in 1793.

WYCLIFFITES. John Wyclif (Wycliffe, Wiclif), a native of Yorkshire, born about 1324, studied in the University of Oxford, and afterwards became master of Balliol College and warden of Canterbury Hall. He was a proficient in the scholastic divinity of his day, and also betook himself zealously to the study of the Scriptures. The Dominicans, Franciscans, Carmelites, and Augustinians, all had at this time flourishing houses at Oxford, and were the object of considerable ill-will to a large body of masters and doctors belonging to the secular clergy, chiefly because they were said to attract promising students from the colleges, and induce them by various means to enter one of their convents. The Franciscans were accustomed to lecture on the excellence of poverty, and to dwell in their sermons on the fact that Christ and His Apostles lived chiefly by alms. Fitzralph, archbishop of Armagh, maintained that the poverty of Christ was not, like that of the friars, voluntary. On all the controverted matters he took a decided part against the friars, and Wyclif and others joined him. In 1366 Wyclif wrote a tract to justify the king (Edward III.) in refusing to pay, on the demand of Urban V., the arrears of the tribute granted by King John to the Holy See. Some years after this, being made doctor in theology, he began pertinaciously to attack the friars, declaring that their multiplication impoverished the realm, that their letters of fraternity were a delusion, that they introduced many superstitious practices, estranged the laity from their parochial clergy, were avaricious, abetted wars, &c.; also that they taught novel doctrines on the sacrament of the Altar. Wyclif developed about the same time opinions similar to those which had been put forward earlier in the century by Marsilius of Padua, to the effect that the clergy ought to have no coercive jurisdiction, and that no temporal penalty of any kind ought to be inflicted except with the sanction of the civil power. To these he added that lay lords had full power to take away temporal possessions from the clergy if they judged that a bad use was made of them, and that no one was bound to pay tithes or offerings to parish priests whose lives were not edifying. The Pope (Gregory XI.) heard of this teaching and addressed letters (1376) to Edward III., the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of London, and the University of Oxford, urging that Wyclif should be arrested and put on his trial. Some cause of delay arose, and it was not till February 1378 that Wyclif appeared to answer for his doctrine before Bishop Courtenay in St. Paul's Cathedral. An immense crowd thronged the cathedral and its approaches. The Duke of Lancaster, who was present, was at this time rather favourably inclined towards Wyclif; high words passed between him and the bishop; the people, imagining that an outrage was being offered to their bishop in his own cathedral, became angry and clamorous; and the assembly was broken up in confusion. Soon afterwards another assembly was held at Lambeth before the archbishop, to which Wyclif was cited. He handed in a paper in Latin, explaining his teaching on the connection between dominion (or ownership) and grace, on the jurisdiction in temporals claimed for the Church, on the effects of excommunication, and similar questions.[1] This paper is full of scholastic subtleties and distinctions, so that it is difficult in many places to catch Wyclif's real meaning. The judges decided that it was not satisfactory, and the archbishop inhibited him from lecturing or publishing any more on the subjects in dispute. Wyclif then (April 1378) presented a paper in English—or a paper was presented for him—to the Parliament, which is palpably more anti-Papal and insurgent in tone than the statement presented to the archbishop, though it follows generally the same line. About this time Gregory XI. died, and the proceedings against Wyclif were dropped.

[1] He mentions an accusation brought by several witches against a certain regular of having been present at their meeting at a particular hour; but at that hour the regular was in choir singing the divine office, as all his brother monks attested.

In 1378–9 Wyclif appears to have been actively engaged on the translation of the Vulgate Bible into English. It is not known what proportion of either of the two versions which have been printed (Oxford University Press, 1850) actually came from his pen, but there seems no reason to doubt that the first impulse came from him, and that he had an important share in the actual execution. Cardinal Gasquet has disputed the genuineness of this authorship ("The Old English Bible"). It is certain that the Bible was familiar even to laymen in the fourteenth century, and that the whole of the N.T. at least could be read in translations. Blessed Thomas More distinctly says: "The whole Bible was long before (Wycliffe's) days by virtuous and well-learned men translated into the English tongue, and by good and godly people with devotion and soberness well and reverently read" ("Dialogue," Works, p. 233). And again he says: "Myself have seen and can show you Bibles fair and old written in English, which have been known and seen by the bishop of the diocese and left in laymen's hands and women's, to such as he knew for good and Catholic folk that used it with devotion and discretion" (ib. p. 234). "Some exaggeration indeed of what Wycliffe did," says Gairdner, "appears to have prevailed even from an early period. It has been a common belief that he was the first to translate the Bible into English, and also that it was the whole Bible that he himself translated. Both these ideas must be considered questionable; the latter extremely so. . . What 'Master Wycliffe' translated and vulgarised, Knighton tells us, was 'the Gospel that Christ committed to the clergy and the doctors of the Church'; and the 'Gospel' here cannot be understood as more than the four Gospels at the utmost. It may, in fact, be less." ("Lollardy and the Reformation in England," i. 102.)

In 1381 Wyclif lectured on the Eucharist, and was led on by his bitter antagonism to the theologians of the mendicant orders to the enunciation of views which scandalized the Church and the university, and were formally condemned by both. In brief, he propounded the tenet of consubstantiation. "Right as hit is heresye," he said, "to trowe that Crist is a spiryt and no body, so hit is heresye to trowe that this sacrament is God's body and no bred; for hit is bothe togedir."[1] So again, in the "Trialogus,"[2] written probably in 1383, to quote one among many similar passages, he says that the whole Church militant, "since the time of the promulgation of the Gospel, has rightly believed that this sacrament or consecrated host is naturally real bread" (verus panis), "and sacramentally the body of Christ." The chancellor, William de Berton, convened a court of twelve doctors in the schools of the Augustinian friary, who adopted a definition in which, Wyclif not being named, the Catholic doctrine of transubstantiation is formally asserted. Wyclif, who was present, put in a document known as his "Confession," [1] in which, under cover of a cloud of words and copious extracts from the Fathers, he tried to vindicate the soundness of his Eucharistic teaching. Soon after this, the terrible rising of the Commons (in the summer of 1381) turned away men's thoughts for a time from every other subject. Sudbury, the archbishop of Canterbury, was murdered. The new archbishop (Courtenay) lost no time in following up the proceedings against Wyclif. He convened a council at Black Friars in London, which met in May 1382, and condemned twenty-four propositions extracted from the reformer's writings. Of these ten were declared to be heretical, and fourteen erroneous. The first of the ten was, "That the substance of material bread and wine remains after consecration in the sacrament of the Altar." The fourteen erroneous conclusions belonged either to the peculiar politico-ecclesiastical system which Wyclif, following the Valdenses [q.v.], had built up in various treatises, or were strong opinions suggested by his animosity towards the friars. The Pope's confirmation of the proceedings of the council was soon obtained, and the archbishop then took very energetic steps to repress the teaching of the condemned opinions both in the university and the country. Wyclif was obliged to leave Oxford and retire to his living of Lutterworth. That no other severity was used towards him seems to have been owing to the state of his health, for about the end of 1382 he was stricken with paralysis. During the two remaining years of his life his literary activity must have been prodigious; the great bulk of his English works (of which the three volumes printed by the Clarendon Press, edited by T. Arnold, with the supplementary volume edited by Matthew, are far from exhausting the list) was produced in this period. According to Gascoyne (Lewis, p. 336), he had another paralytic stroke on December 28, 1384, and died on the last day of the year.

It is not known in what part of his career Wyclif founded the institution of the "Poor Priests," whom he sent to various parts of the country to propagate what he conceived to be the Gospel, and declaim against ecclesiastical abuses. Among these men, Herford, Repyngdon, Patrington, Swinderby, and Purvey were conspicuous. They and their followers were called Lollards, and that they were numerous might be inferred, even if there were not abundant direct evidence, from the chance allusion to them in Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales." [1] To Courtenay Arundel succeeded, and to Arundel Chicheley; and all three—but especially Chicheley, who established in 1416 a regular inquisition of heresy for the purpose of exterminating the sect—used strenuous measures of repression against the Wycliffites. In this the princes of the House of Lancaster, the weakness of whose title to the crown disposed them to court the good will of the hierarchy, zealously aided them. In 1396 twelve delegates appointed by the university picked out two hundred and ninety-eight propositions from Wyclif's works as deserving of censure. In 1411 a council held at London by Archbishop Arundel, attended by thirteen bishops and thirty doctors, condemned forty-five Wycliffite errors. The Council of Constance, among the theologians attending which was the great Carmelite Thomas of Walden, enumerated the forty-five propositions just mentioned, and declared that many of them were notoriously heretical, others erroneous, others scandalous and blasphemous, some offensive to pious ears, and some rash and seditious. At the same time Wyclif's "Dialogus" and "Trialogus" were condemned by name; others of his writings were reprobated in general terms.

(The best book on the subject is "Lollardy and the Reformation in England," by James Gairdner; Rashdall in "Dict. Nat. Biogr." gives a list of contemporary authorities; Stevenson, "The Truth about John Wyclif"; Urquhart in "Cath. Enc."; Bellesheim in "Kirchenlex."; Trevelyan, "England in the Age of Wyclif.")

XAVERIAN BROTHERS. This teaching institute was commenced at Bruges in 1839, and definitely established in 1846, by Theodore James Ryken, a native of Elshout, in the Catholic province of North Brabant, Holland. His object was to "found a congregation of men who would sacrifice their lives to the Christian education of youth." The first professions were those of himself and twelve young brothers, made on October 22, 1846. Ryken took the name of Brother Francis Xavier, after the Apostle of the Indies, who was chosen patron of the congregation. Soon afterwards he opened St. Francis Xavier's College at Bruges for day scholars and boarders: this is said to have become "the most flourishing school in the city." The Brothers came to England in 1846; they have a number of houses up and down the country. Archbishop Spalding introduced them into the United States in 1854. The bishops and the Catholic communities of the States and Canada have eagerly welcomed the new institute, and desired to entrust to it the education of children. "They have applications from nearly every State in the Union, which for the present cannot be [complied with] for want of members." (Br. Isidore in "Cath. Enc.")
